Margot Kidder, who starred as the Lois Lane to Christopher Reeve's Clark Kent in four "Superman" films in the late '70s and '80s, died Sunday at her home in Montana. She was 69.

The actress's cause of death is unknown, and TMZ reports she is survived by one daughter.

Kidder, who reprised her role as Lane in three "Superman" sequels in addition to the 1978 original, was a longtime mental health advocate, as her battle with bipolar disorder played out in the public eye in the late '90s.

The native Canadian maintained her acting career until her death, and recent credits include Rob Zombie's "Halloween II" in 2009, as well as a series of Canadian films, including "The Neighborhood" and "The Red Maple Leaf."

MAY 13: MARGOT KIDDER

Canadian actor Margot Kidder, who rose to global fame playing Lois Lane, died on Sunday, May 13, at the age of 69.

Born in Yellowknife, N.W.T., in 1948, Kidder began acting professionally in the late 1960s. In the following decade, Kidder became better known appearing in several Hollywood features starring with the likes of Peter Fonda and Robert Redford.

Her breakthrough role came in 1978 when she played Lois Lane in the blockbuster Superman opposite Christopher Reeve. The movie was an undeniable financial and critical success, which led to a movie franchise. Kidder reprised the role three more times.

Kidder continued to act appearing in various movie and television roles for another 30 years after her final appearance as Lois Lane in 1987.

In her later years, Kidder lived in Montana where she died in her home. She is survived by a daughter.
