Subject: FOI request

I just received your email message. For future inquiries, please note my email address so that you can contact me directly.

With respect to your question, I believe that the information sought is available in great measure, if not in its entirety. Nevertheless, I offer the following points.

First, the Freedom of Information Law pertains to existing records, and section 89(3) states in part that an agency need not create a record in response to a request. If no list exists or can be generated electronically, the County would not be required to prepare a new record on behalf of the applicant.

Second, insofar as the information sought does exist in the form of a record or records, with one exception, I believe that it would be available. If a violation was found, even if it was later corrected, the determination that a person or entity failed to comply with law would, in my view, clearly be a matter of public record. Inspection reports would constitute "intra-agency materials" that fall within the coverage of section 87(2)(g) of the FOIL. Portions of those materials consisting of opinions, advice, recommendation and the like may be withheld. However that provision specifies that statistical or factual information or final agency determinations, for example, found within those materials must be disclosed.

If an inspection report includes factual information reflective of the inspector's observations, that aspect of the report would be available. If the inspector also offers recommendations in the report, those portions could be withheld. Again, if a report does not contain recommendations, but rather findings of violations of a health code, I do not believe that there would be any basis for denying access to the violations.

If you want to discuss the matter, please feel free to call me at (518) 474-2518.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Dear Mr. Hernandez:

I have received your letter of December 9. You have sought assistance in obtaining a "pedigree" of a DD-5, a complaint follow up report prepared by the New York City Police Department. It is your view that the report is "bogus", and you want a means of ascertaining its "legitimacy." Based on a review of your correspondence, I offer the following comments.

First, since you referred to 5 USC 552 and 552a, which are, respectively, federal Freedom of Information and Privacy Acts, I note that those provisions do not apply to state or local government; they apply only to records maintained by federal agencies.

Second, the Freedom of Information Law, the New York statute that deals with records of state and local government, pertains to existing records. Section 89(3) of the Law states in part that an agency need not create a record in response to a request. As I understand your request, you are seeking a description or explanation relating to the preparation of the report in question. If no description or explanation exists, the Department would not be obliged to create such a record on your behalf.

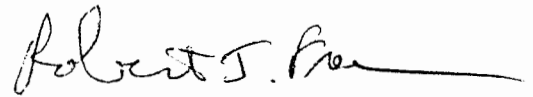

Third, it appears that you would like to obtain the report in conjunction with an indictment or docket number. In this regard, the Police Department makes arrests; it does not assign docket or indictment numbers. Those identification numbers are assigned by the office of a district attorney and a court. As such, it may be that the Police Department has no means of relating a complaint follow up report to an indictment or docket number based on its filing or recordkeeping systems.

January 5, 1999

In short, the Department indicated that it would disclose the report to the extent required by the Freedom of Information Law, and it is my view that is the extent of its obligations under that statute.

I hope that the foregoing serves to clarify your understanding of the matter and that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Dear Ms. Armeno:

I have received your letter of December 11 and the correspondence attached to it.

You described difficulty experienced in obtaining records under the Freedom of Information Law from the Village of Fleischmanns. You referred specifically to a request for "tapes of a Public Workshop held between the Village Board, the Planning Board and a business owner submitting plans to the village." In what you characterized as a "typical response" from the Mayor, he acknowledged the receipt of the request and wrote that "Normally, FOIL requests can be granted or denied within 30 days" of their receipt. With respect to the request for the tapes, which was acknowledged on October 30, you had received no further response as of the date of your letter to this office.

You have sought an opinion concerning the matter. In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First, the Freedom of Information Law provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies must respond to requests. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

"Each entity subject to the provisions of this article, within five business days of the receipt of a written request for a record reasonably described, shall make such record available to the person requesting it, deny such request in writing or furnish a written acknowledgement of the receipt of such request and a statement of the approximate date when such request will be granted or denied..."

Based on the foregoing, an agency must grant access to records, deny access or acknowledge the receipt of a request within five business days of receipt of a request. When an acknowledgement is given, it must include an approximate date indicating when it can be anticipated that a request will be granted or denied. The acknowledgement by the records access officer did not make reference to such a date.

I note that there is no precise time period within which an agency must grant or deny access to records. The time needed to do so may be dependent upon the volume of a request, the possibility that other requests have been made, the necessity to conduct legal research, the search and retrieval techniques used to locate the records and the like. In short, when an agency acknowledges the receipt of a request because more than five business days may be needed to grant or deny a request, so long as it provides an approximate date indicating when the request will be granted or denied, and that date is reasonable in view of the attendant circumstances, I believe that the agency would be acting in compliance with law. Notwithstanding the foregoing, in my view, every law must be implemented in a manner that gives reasonable effect to its intent, and I point out that in its statement of legislative intent, §84 of the Freedom of Information Law states that "it is incumbent upon the state and its localities to extend public accountability wherever and whenever feasible." Therefore, if records are clearly available to the public under the Freedom of Information Law, and if they are readily retrievable, there may be no basis for a lengthy delay in disclosure.

If neither a response to a request nor an acknowledgement of the receipt of a request is given within five business days, or if an agency delays responding for an unreasonable time after it acknowledges that a request has been received, a request may, in my opinion, be considered to have been constructively denied. In such a circumstance, I believe that the denial may be appealed in accordance with §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law. That provision states in relevant part that:

"...any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive, or governing body, who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

In addition, it has been held that when an appeal is made but a determination is not rendered within ten business days of the receipt of the appeal as required under §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, the appellant has exhausted his or her administrative remedies and may initiate a challenge to a constructive denial of access under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Rules [Floyd v. McGuire, 87 AD 2d 388, appeal dismissed 57 NY 2d 774 (1982)].

Second, I believe that recordings of open meetings are clearly accessible and that a lengthy delay in disclosure would be inconsistent with the requirements of the Freedom of Information Law. That statute pertains to agency records, and §86(4) of the Law defines the term "record" expansively to include:

Ms. CherylAnn Armeno

"any information kept, held, filed, produced, reproduced by, with or for an agency or the state legislature, in any physical form whatsoever including, but not limited to, reports, statements, examinations, memoranda, opinions, folders, files, books, manuals, pamphlets, forms, papers, designs, drawings, maps, photos, letters, microfilms, computer tapes or discs, rules, regulations or codes."

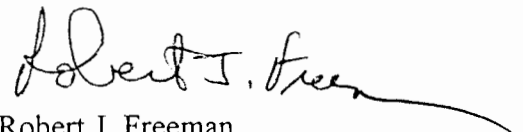

In view of the foregoing, when a public body, such as a village board of trustees, maintains tape recordings of its meetings, any such tape would constitute a "record" that falls within the coverage of the Freedom of Information Law.

Further, as a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law. In my view, a tape recording of an open meeting is accessible, for any person could have been present, and none of the grounds for denial would apply. Moreover, case law indicates that a tape recording of an open meeting is accessible for listening and/or copying under the Freedom of Information Law [see Zaleski v. Board of Education of Hicksville Union Free School-District, Supreme Court, Nassau County, NYLJ, December 27, 1978].

In an effort to enhance compliance with and understanding of the Freedom of Information Law, a copy of this opinion will be forwarded to the Mayor.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Robert J. Freeman

Mr. Marty Glennon
Meyer, Suozzi, English & Klein, P.C.
One Commerce Plaza, Suite 1810
Albany, NY 12260

Dear Mr. Glennon:

I have received your letter of December 3 in which you requested a declaratory ruling on behalf of the Laborers' International Union of North America, Local Union No. 17, based on "the failure" of the New York State Department of Transportation ("DOT") "to provide access under FOIL to a certain lease agreement" between DOT and Cargex Newburgh Limited Partnership ("Cargex").

Before addressing the substance of the matter, I point out that the Committee on Open Government is not empowered to issue declaratory rulings. Rather, pursuant to §89(1)(b) of the Public Officers Law, it is authorized to render advisory opinions. Consequently, the ensuing commentary should be considered wholly advisory in nature.

By way of background, the correspondence attached to your letter indicates that a request was made on April 15 for a copy of the "proposed lease agreement." The request was denied on May 12 by DOT's Records Access Officer "pursuant to Article 6 §87(2)(c) of the Public Officers Law as the subject lease is not yet approved and disclosure would impair present or imminent contract awards or collective bargaining negotiations." In your appeal of June 22, you contended "that the only term in the contract that could possibly interfere with the contract award would be the price" and that the contract should be disclosed following the redaction of the "amount of the agreement." In a determination of your appeal rendered on July 7, Ms. Marie Corrado, the Appeals Officer, the denial was affirmed, and she wrote that:

"The Cargex lease will not be a final, enforceable contract until it is approved by both the NYS Attorney General ('AG') and the NYS Office of the Comptroller ('OSC'). In researching your appeal, I have have determined that the lease has now been approved by the AG but not the Office of the State Comptroller. OSC has broad discretion under section 112 of the State Finance Law and could raise questions that would require further refinements of the terms of the lease, including but not limited to the terms involving the payment of rent to the State. It is the Department's judgment that making a draft lease public before it is fully executed could jeopardize the bargaining position of the Department in any negotiations made necessary by the comments of OSC. As a result, it has been a longstanding practice of this Department to withhold draft leases from public access until such time as they have been approved by both the AG and OSC."

Ms. Corrado added that "[a]s soon as OSC executes the lease, it will be available to the public..."

In your letter to me, you wrote that DOT continued its denial of access even though "the terms of the lease agreement, including all construction for the project, had commenced prior to the approval of the Attorney General and the Comptroller" and that "the work was nearly completed before the final approval of the New York State Attorney General and Comptroller" (emphasis yours).

If your description of the facts is accurate, it would appear that the delay in disclosure would have been inconsistent with law.

As you may be aware, as a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law.

The provision upon which the DOT has relied to withhold the record sought, §87(2)(c), permits an agency to deny access to records to the extent that disclosure "would impair present or imminent contract awards or collective bargaining negotiations." The key word in that provision in my opinion is "impair", and the question under that provision involves whether or the extent to which disclosure would "impair" the contracting process by diminishing the ability of the government to reach an optimal agreement on behalf of the taxpayers. That a contract has not been approved, signed or ratified, in my view, is not determinative of rights of access or, conversely, an agency's ability to deny access to records. Rather, I believe that consideration of the effects of disclosure is the primary factor in determining the extent to which §87(2)(c) may justifiably be asserted.

As I understand its application, §87(2)(c) generally encompasses situations in which an agency or a party to negotiations maintains records that have not been made available to others. For example, if an agency seeking bids or proposals has received a number of bids, but the deadline for their submission has not been reached, premature disclosure for the bids to another possible submitter might provide that person or firm with an unfair advantage vis a vis those who already submitted bids. Further, disclosure of the identities of bidders or the number of bidders might enable another potential

Meyer, Suozzi, English & Klein, P.C.

bidder to tailor his bid in a manner that provides him with an unfair advantage in the bidding process. In such a situation, harm or "impairment" would likely be the result, and the records could justifiably be denied. However, after the deadline for submission of bids or proposals are available after a contract has been awarded, and that, in view of the requirements of the Freedom of Information Law, "the successful bidder had no reasonable expectation of not having its bid open to the public" [Contracting Plumbers Cooperative Restoration Corp. v. Ameruso, 105 Misc. 2d 951, 430 NYS 2d 196, 198 (1980)]. Similarly, if an agency is involved in collective bargaining negotiations with a public employee union, and the union requests records reflective of the agency's strategy, the items that it considers to be important or otherwise, its estimates and projections, it is likely that disclosure to the union would place the agency at an unfair disadvantage at the bargaining table and, therefore, that disclosure would "impair" negotiating the process.

It is noted that the Court of Appeals sustained the assertion of §87(2)(c) in a case that did not clearly involve "contract awards" or collective bargaining negotiations. In Murray v. Troy Urban Renewal Agency [56 NY2d 888 (1982)], the issue pertained to real property transactions where appraisals in possession of an agency were requested prior to the consummation of a transaction. Because premature disclosure would have enabled the public to know the prices the agency sought, thereby potentially precluding the agency from receiving optimal prices, the agency's denial was upheld [see Murray v. Troy Urban Renewal Agency, 56 NY 2d 888 (1982)].

In each of the kinds of the situations described earlier, there is an inequality of knowledge. In the bid situation, the person who seeks bids prior to the deadline for their submission is presumably unaware of the content of the bids that have already been submitted; in the context of collective bargaining, the union would not have all of the agency's records relevant to the negotiations; in the appraisal situation, the person seeking that record is unfamiliar with its contents. As suggested above, premature disclosure of bids would enable a potential bidder to gain knowledge in a manner unfair to other bidders and possibly to the detriment of an agency and, therefore, the public. Disclosure of an records regarding collective bargaining strategy or appraisals would provide knowledge to the recipient that might effectively prevent an agency from engaging in an agreement that is most beneficial to taxpayers.

In a case involving negotiations between a New York City agency and the Trump organization, the court referred to an opinion that I prepared and adopted the reasoning offered therein, stating that:

"Section 87(2)(c) relates to withholding records whose release could impair contract awards. However, here this was not relevant because there is no bidding process involved where an edge could be unfairly given to one company. Neither is this a situation where the release of confidential information as to the value or appraisals of property could lead to the City receiving less favorable price.

"In other words, since the Trump organization is the only party involved in these negotiations, there is no inequality of knowledge between other entities doing business with the City" [Community Board 7 v. Schaffer, 570 NYS 2d 769, 771 (1991); Aff'd 83 AD 2d 422; reversed on other grounds 84 NY 2d 148 (1994)].

The extent to which the kinds of considerations described in the illustrations described in the preceding paragraphs is pertinent to the instant situation is unclear. Nevertheless, based on the language of §87(2)(c), it is clear in my opinion that the absence of final approvals by the Attorney General or the Comptroller is not determinative of an agency's ability to deny access to records relating to the contracting process. If in the situation at hand the terms of the agreement were being carried out, notwithstanding absence of approvals by the Attorney General and the Comptroller, DOT could not, in my view, justify a denial of access; disclosure would not have "impaired" the award of a contract, for the terms of the agreement (albeit not officially approved) were apparently being executed.

It is emphasized that the courts have consistently interpreted the Freedom of Information Law in a manner that fosters maximum access. As stated by the Court of Appeals more than decade ago:

"To be sure, the balance is presumptively struck in favor of disclosure, but in eight specific, narrowly constructed instances where the governmental agency convincingly demonstrates its need, disclosure will not be ordered (Public Officers Law, section 87, subd 2). Thus, the agency does not have carte blanche to withhold any information it pleases. Rather, it is required to articulate particularized and specific justification and, if necessary, submit the requested materials to the courts for in camera inspection, to exempt its records from disclosure (see Church of Scientology of N.Y. v. State of New York, 46 NY 2d 906, 908). Only where the material requested falls squarely within the ambit of one of these statutory exemptions may disclosure be withheld" [Fink v. Lefkowitz, 47 NY 2d 567, 571 (1979)]."

In another decision rendered by the Court of Appeals, it was held that:

"Exemptions are to be narrowly construed to provide maximum access, and the agency seeking to prevent disclosure carries the burden of demonstrating that the requested material falls squarely within a FOIL exemption by articulating a particularized and specific justification for denying access" [Capital Newspapers v. Burns, 67 NY 2d 562, 566 (1986); see also, Farbman & Sons v. New York City, 62 NY 2d 75, 80 (1984); and Fink v. Lefkowitz, 47 NY 2d 567, 571 (1979)].

Moreover, in the same decision, in a statement regarding the intent and utility of the Freedom of Information Law, it was found that:

Mr. Marty Glennon
Meyer, Suozzi, English & Klein, P.C.

"The Freedom of Information Law expresses this State's strong commitment to open government and public accountability and imposes a broad standard of disclosure upon the State and its agencies (see, Matter of Farbman & Sons v New York City Health and Hosps. Corp., 62 NY 2d 75, 79). The statute, enacted in furtherance of the public's vested and inherent 'right to know', affords all citizens the means to obtain information concerning the day-to-day functioning of State and local government thus providing the electorate with sufficient information 'to make intelligent, informed choices with respect to both the direction and scope of governmental activities' and with an effective tool for exposing waste, negligence and abuse on the part of government officers" (id., 565-566).

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Dear Mr. Pritchard:

I have received your letter concerning the status of preliminary plans provided by a developer to the Town of Hartwick Planning Board under the Freedom of Information Law.

With this communication, I am also sending a copy of an opinion recently rendered dealing with a similar issue. In brief, it is my view that once the plans, whether preliminary or otherwise, come into the possession of a government agency, they constitute "records" that fall within the scope of the Freedom of Information Law.

While most of the kinds of records that the Planning Board receives would in my opinion be public, I note that §87(2)(d) enables an agency to withhold records that:

"are trade secrets or are submitted to an agency by a commercial enterprise or derived from information obtained from a commercial enterprise and which if disclosed would cause substantial injury to the competitive position of the subject enterprise..."

Dear Mr. Muszak:

I have received your letter of January 2 in which you requested a variety of information from this office based on the provisions of the Freedom of Information Law.

Please be advised that the Freedom of Information Law pertains to agency records and that §89(3) of that statute provides in part that an agency is not required to create or prepare records in response to a request for information. Similarly, while the Freedom of Information Law requires agencies to disclose existing records, it does not require agency officials to answer questions. In short, your request in my opinion is not a request for records made under the Freedom of Information Law.

With respect to your first question, whether there are laws dealing with state employees' "interactions with taxpayers", I know of no such general provisions. Nevertheless, since the jurisdiction of this office involves issues relating to public access to government records, I do not have expertise in relation to your inquiry.

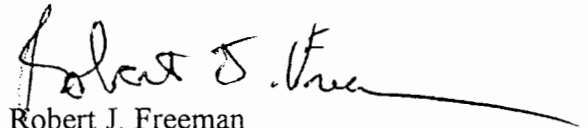

You also referred to the Office of Professional Discipline, which investigates complaints against licensed professionals, and you asked whether there is a similar entity "that taxpayers can turn to with respect to complaints against state employees." I know of no such entity. However, as a general matter, complaints about employees may be directed to their supervisors or the heads of agencies.

Lastly, as you may recall, an opinion sent to your address was rendered on December 21 relating to confidentiality restrictions imposed upon the Commission on Judicial Conduct. In short, due to statutory requirements, that agency cannot disclose its records except in rare circumstances.

95-B-0367
P.O. Box 618
Auburn, NY 13024

Dear Mr. Wilson:

I have received your letter of December 11. You wrote that the Monroe County District Attorney "is repeatedly refusing" to provide access to records sought under the Freedom of Information Law. You added that the requests have been denied "with boilerplate answers" and that it has been contended that records are not available in second degree murder cases.

From my perspective, while some aspects of the records may clearly be withheld, it is likely in my view that blanket denials of access are inappropriate. In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First and perhaps most importantly, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law. It is emphasized that the introductory language of §87(2) refers to the authority to withhold "records or portions thereof" that fall within the scope of the exceptions that follow. In my view, the phrase quoted in the preceding sentence evidences a recognition on the part of the Legislature that a single record or report, for example, might include portions that are available under the statute, as well as portions that might justifiably be withheld. That being so, I believe that it also imposes an obligation on an agency to review records sought, in their entirety, to determine which portions, if any, might properly be withheld or deleted prior to disclosing the remainder.

The Court of Appeals expressed its general view of the intent of the Freedom of Information Law in a decision involving access to records of a law enforcement agency, Gould v. New York City Police Department [87 NY 2d 267 (1996)], stating that:

"To ensure maximum access to government records, the 'exemptions are to be narrowly construed, with the burden resting on the agency to demonstrate that the requested material indeed qualifies for exemption' (Matter of Hanig v. State of New York Dept. of Motor Vehicles, 79 N.Y.2d 106, 109, 580 N.Y.S.2d 715, 588 N.E.2d 750 see, Public Officers Law § 89[4][b]). As this Court has stated, '[o]nly where the material requested falls squarely within the ambit of one of these statutory exemptions may disclosure be withheld' (Matter of Fink v. Lefkowitz, 47 N.Y.2d, 567, 571, 419 N.Y.S.2d 467, 393 N.E.2d 463)" (id., 275).

Just as significant, the Court in Gould repeatedly specified that a categorical denial of access to records is inconsistent with the requirements of the Freedom of Information Law. In that case, the agency contended that complaint follow up reports, also known as "DD5's", could be withheld in their entirety on the ground that they fall within the exception regarding intra-agency materials, §87(2)(g). The Court, however, wrote that: "Petitioners contend that because the complaint follow-up reports contain factual data, the exemption does not justify complete nondisclosure of the reports. We agree" (id., 276). The Court then stated as a general principle that "blanket exemptions for particular types of documents are inimical to FOIL's policy of open government" (id., 275). The Court also offered guidance to agencies and lower courts in determining rights of access and referred to several decisions it had previously rendered, directing that:

"...to invoke one of the exemptions of section 87(2), the agency must articulate 'particularized and specific justification' for not disclosing requested documents (Matter of Fink v. Lefkowitz, supra, 47 N.Y.2d, at 571, 419 N.Y.S.2d 467, 393 N.E.2d 463). If the court is unable to determine whether withheld documents fall entirely within the scope of the asserted exemption, it should conduct an in camera inspection of representative documents and order disclosure of all nonexempt, appropriately redacted material (see, Matter of Xerox Corp. v. Town of Webster, 65 N.Y.2d 131, 133, 490 N.Y.S. 2d, 488, 480 N.E.2d 74; Matter of Farbman & Sons v. New York City Health & Hosps. Corp., supra, 62 N.Y.2d, at 83, 476 N.Y.S.2d 69, 464 N.E.2d 437)" (id.).

Second, as a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law. Since I am unaware of the contents of the records in which you are interested, or the effects of their disclosure, I cannot offer specific guidance. Nevertheless, the following paragraphs will review the provisions that may be significant in determining rights of access to the kinds of records that you are seeking.

The provision at issue in Gould, §87(2)(g) of the Freedom of Information Law, enables an agency to withhold records that:

"are inter-agency or intra-agency materials which are not:

- i. statistical or factual tabulations or data;
- ii. instructions to staff that affect the public;
- iii. final agency policy or determinations; or
- iv. external audits, including but not limited to audits performed by the comptroller and the federal government..."

It is noted that the language quoted above contains what in effect is a double negative. While inter-agency or intra-agency materials may be withheld, portions of such materials consisting of statistical or factual information, instructions to staff that affect the public, final agency policy or determinations or external audits must be made available, unless a different ground for denial could appropriately be asserted. Concurrently, those portions of inter-agency or intra-agency materials that are reflective of opinion, advice, recommendation and the like could in my view be withheld.

In its analysis of the matter, the decision states that:

"...we note that one court has suggested that complaint follow-up reports are exempt from disclosure because they constitute nonfinal intra-agency material, irrespective of whether the information contained in the reports is 'factual data' (see, Matter of Scott v. Chief Medical Examiner, 179 AD2d 443, 444, supra citing Public Officers Law §87(2)(g)). However, under a plain reading of §87(2)(g), the exemption for intra-agency material does not apply as long as the material falls within any one of the provision's four enumerated exceptions. Thus, intra-agency documents that contain 'statistical or factual tabulations or data' are subject to FOIL disclosure, whether or not embodied in a final agency policy or determination (see, Matter of Farbman & Sons v. New York City Health & Hosp. Corp., 62 NY2d 75, 83, supra; Matter of MacRae v. Dolce, 130 AD2d 577)..."

"...Although the term 'factual data' is not defined by statute, the meaning of the term can be discerned from the purpose underlying the intra-agency exemption, which is 'to protect the deliberative process of the government by ensuring that persons in an advisory role [will] be able to express their opinions freely to agency decision makers' (Matter of Xerox Corp. v. Town of Webster, 65 NY2d 131, 132 [quoting Matter of Sea Crest Constr. Corp. v. Stubing, 82 AD2d 546, 549]). Consistent with this limited aim to safeguard internal government consultations and deliberations, the exemption does not apply when the requested material consists of 'statistical or factual tabulations or data' (Public Officers Law 87(2)(g)(i). Factual data,

therefore, simply means objective information, in contrast to opinions, ideas, or advice exchanged as part of the consultative or deliberative process of government decision making (see, Matter of Johnson Newspaper Corp. v. Stainkamp, 94 AD2d 825, 827, affd on op below, 61 NY2d 958; Matter of Miracle Mile Assocs. v. Yudelson, 68 AD2d 176, 181-182).

"Against this backdrop, we conclude that the complaint follow-up reports contain substantial factual information available pursuant to the provisions of FOIL. Sections of the report are devoted to such purely factual data as: the names, addresses, and physical descriptions of crime victims, witnesses, and perpetrators; a checklist that indicates whether the victims and witnesses have been interviewed and shown photos, whether crime scenes have been photographed and dusted for fingerprints, and whether neighborhood residents have been canvassed for information; and a blank space denominated 'details' in which the officer records the particulars of any action taken in connection with the investigation.

"However, the Police Department argues that any witness statements contained in the reports, in particular, are not 'factual' because there is no assurance of the statements' accuracy and reliability. We decline to read such a reliability requirement into the phrase 'factual data', as the dissent would have us do, and conclude that a witness statement constitutes factual data insofar as it embodies a factual account of the witness's observations. Such a statement, moreover, is far removed from the type of internal government exchange sought to be protected by the intra-agency exemption (see, Matter of Ingram v. Axelrod, 90 AD2d 568, 569 [ambulance records, list of interviews, and reports of interviews available under FOIL as 'factual data']). By contrast, any impressions, recommendations, or opinions recorded in the complaint follow-up report would not constitute factual data and would be exempt from disclosure. The holding herein is only that these reports are not categorically exempt as intra-agency material. Indeed, the Police Department is entitled to withhold complaint follow-up reports, or specific portions thereof, under any other applicable exemption, such as the law-enforcement exemption or the public-safety exemption, as long as the requisite particularized showing is made" [Gould, Scott and DeFelice v. New York City Police Department, 89 NY2d 267, 276-277 (1996); emphasis added by the Court].

Based on the foregoing, the agency could not claim that the complaint reports can be withheld in their entirety on the ground that they constitute intra-agency materials. However, the Court was careful to point out that other grounds for denial might apply in consideration of those records, as well as others that you requested.

For instance, of potential significance is §87(2)(b) of the Freedom of Information Law, which permits an agency to withhold records or portions thereof when disclosure would constitute "an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy". That provision might be applicable relative to the deletion of identifying details in a variety of situations, i.e., where a record identifies a confidential source or a witness, for example.

Often the most relevant provision concerning access to records maintained by law enforcement agencies is §87(2)(e), which permits an agency to withhold records that:

"are compiled for law enforcement purposes and which, if disclosed, would:

- i. interfere with law enforcement investigations or judicial proceedings;
- ii. deprive a person of a right to a fair trial or impartial adjudication;
- iii. identify a confidential source or disclose confidential information relating to a criminal investigation; or
- iv. reveal criminal investigative techniques or procedures, except routine techniques and procedures."

In my view, the foregoing indicates that records compiled for law enforcement purposes can only be withheld to the extent that disclosure would result in the harmful effects described in sub- paragraphs (i) through (iv) of §87(2)(e).

Another possible ground for denial is §87(2)(f), which permits withholding to the extent that disclosure "would endanger the life or safety of any person". The capacity to withhold on that basis is dependent upon the facts and circumstances concerning an event.

Also relevant is the first ground for denial, §87(2)(a), which pertains to records that "are specifically exempted from disclosure by state or federal statute". One such statute, §190.25(4) of the Criminal Procedure Law deals with grand jury proceedings and provides in relevant part that:

"Grand jury proceedings are secret, and no grand juror, or other person specified in subdivision three of this section or section 215.70 of the penal law, may, except in the lawful discharge of his duties or upon written order of the court, disclose the nature or substance of any grand jury testimony, evidence, or any decision, result or other matter attending a grand jury proceeding."

As such, grand jury related records would be outside the scope of rights conferred by the Freedom of Information Law. Any disclosure of those records would be based upon a court order or perhaps a vehicle authorizing or requiring disclosure that is separate and distinct from the Freedom of Information Law.

Lastly, in a decision concerning a request for records maintained by the office of a district attorney that would ordinarily be exempted from disclosure under the Freedom of Information Law, it was held that "once the statements have been used in open court, they have lost their cloak of confidentiality and are available for inspection by a member of the public" [see Moore v. Santucci, 151 AD 2d 677, 679 (1989)]. Based upon that decision, it appears that records introduced into evidence or disclosed during a public judicial proceeding should be available. However, in the same decision, it was also found that:

"...if the petitioner or his attorney previously received a copy of the agency record pursuant to an alternative discovery device and currently possesses the copy, a court may uphold an agency's denial of the petitioner's request under the FOIL for a duplicate copy as academic. However, the burden of proof rests with the agency to demonstrate that the petitioner's specific requests are moot. The respondent's burden would be satisfied upon proof that a copy of the requested record was previously furnished to the petitioner or his counsel in the absence of any allegation, in evidentiary form, that the copy was no longer in existence. In the event the petitioner's request for a copy of a specific record is not moot, the agency must furnish another copy upon payment of the appropriate fee...unless the requested record falls squarely within the ambit of 1 of the 8 statutory exemptions" (id., 678).

The Court in Moore also specified that an agency "is not required to make available for inspection or copying any suppression hearing or trial transcripts of a witness' testimony in its possession, because the transcripts are court records, not agency records" (id. at 680).

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Dear Mr. Greenberg:

I have received your recent letter in which you requested an opinion concerning the release of certain information under the Freedom of Information Law.

You referred to the decision rendered in New York Times Company and Newsday, Inc. v. New York State Department of Health [243 AD2d 157 (1998)] in which it was held, in brief, that the disclosure of physician identifiers contained in the Statewide Planning and Research Cooperative System ("SPARCS") would not constitute an unwarranted invasion of privacy of patients. Of concern in relation to the decision, according to your letter, "is the release of physician identifiers which would tend to identify the name of any provider who has performed an abortion." You suggested that "[g]iven attacks on abortion providers, including the recent shooting of a physician in western New York, and other activities such as the posting of names of abortion providers on the Internet, it would seem reasonable to withhold information tending to identify abortion providers on the basis that such disclosure would endanger the life or safety of those physicians."

I agree with your contention. In this regard, I offer the following comments.

As a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law.

Pertinent is the provision to which you alluded, §87(2)(f), which permits an agency to withhold records or portions thereof which if disclosed "would endanger the life or safety of any person." As you are aware, an agency has the burden of defending secrecy and demonstrating that records that have been withheld clearly fall within the scope of one or more of the grounds for denial [see §89(4)(b)]. However, in the case of the assertion of the provision at issue, the standard developed by the courts is somewhat less stringent. In citing §87(2)(f), it has been found that:

"This provision of the statute permits nondisclosure of information if it would pose a danger to the life or safety of any person. We reject petitioner's assertion that respondents are required to prove that a danger to a person's life or safety will occur if the information is made public (see, Matter of Nalo v. Sullivan, 125 AD2d 311, 312, lv denied 69 NY2d 612). Rather, there need only be a possibility that such information would endanger the lives or safety of individuals...."[Stronza v. Hoke, 148 AD2d 900,901 (1989)].

It is noted that the principle enunciated in Stronza has appeared in several other decisions [see Ruberti, Girvin & Ferlazzo v. NYS Division of the State Police, 641 NYS 2d 411, 218 AD2d 494 (1996), Connolly v. New York Guard, 572 NYS 2d 443, 175 AD 2d 372 (1991) and McDermott v. Lippman, Supreme Court, New York County, NYLJ, January 4, 1994.] Additionally, it was determined in American Broadcasting Companies, Inc. v. Siebert that when disclosure would "expose applicants and their families to danger to life or safety", §87(2)(f) may properly be asserted [442 NYS2d 855, 859 (1981)].

In sum, in view of the violence that has been committed in New York and elsewhere in relation to abortion providers, I believe that the Department could properly withhold the names of those physicians contained within the SPARCS database.

I hope that I have been of assistance. If you would like to discuss the matter, please feel free to contact me.

Sincerely,

Robert J. Freeman

Mr. Kenneth Jenkins

Southport Correctional Facility
P.O. Box 2000
Pine City, NY 14871

Dear Mr. Jenkins:

I have received your letter of December 7 in which you sought assistance in obtaining records pertaining to your case from the New York City Police Department.

In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First, the Freedom of Information Law provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies must respond to requests. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

"Each entity subject to the provisions of this article, within five business days of the receipt of a written request for a record reasonably described, shall make such record available to the person requesting it, deny such request in writing or furnish a written acknowledgement of the receipt of such request and a statement of the approximate date when such request will be granted or denied..."

If neither a response to a request nor an acknowledgement of the receipt of a request is given within five business days, or if an agency delays responding for an unreasonable time after it acknowledges that a request has been received, a request may, in my opinion, be considered to have been constructively denied. In such a circumstance, I believe that the denial may be appealed in accordance with §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law. That provision states in relevant part that:

Mr. Kenneth Jenkins

"...any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive, or governing body, who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

In addition, it has been held that when an appeal is made but a determination is not rendered within ten business days of the receipt of the appeal as required under §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, the appellant has exhausted his or her administrative remedies and may initiate a challenge to a constructive denial of access under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Rules [Floyd v. McGuire, 87 AD 2d 388, appeal dismissed 57 NY 2d 774 (1982)].

For your information, the person designated by the Department to determine appeals is Susan Petito, Special Counsel.

Second, as a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law. Since I am unaware of the contents of all of the records in which you are interested, or the effects of their disclosure, I cannot offer specific guidance. Nevertheless, the following paragraphs will review the provisions that may be significant in determining rights of access to the records in question.

In considering the records falling within the scope of your request, relevant is a recent decision by the Court of Appeals concerning "complaint follow up reports" prepared by police officers and police officers' memo books in which it was held that a denial of access based on their characterization as intra-agency materials would be inappropriate.

The provision at issue, §87(2)(g) of the Freedom of Information Law, enables an agency to withhold records that:

"are inter-agency or intra-agency materials which are not:

- i. statistical or factual tabulations or data;
- ii. instructions to staff that affect the public;
- iii. final agency policy or determinations; or
- iv. external audits, including but not limited to audits performed by the comptroller and the federal government..."

It is noted that the language quoted above contains what in effect is a double negative. While inter-agency or intra-agency materials may be withheld, portions of such materials consisting of statistical or factual information, instructions to staff that affect the public, final agency policy or determinations or external audits must be made available, unless a different ground for denial could appropriately be asserted. Concurrently, those portions of inter-agency or intra-agency materials that are reflective of opinion, advice, recommendation and the like could in my view be withheld.

In its analysis of the matter, the decision states that:

"...we note that one court has suggested that complaint follow-up reports are exempt from disclosure because they constitute nonfinal intra-agency material, irrespective of whether the information contained in the reports is 'factual data' (see, Matter of Scott v. Chief Medical Examiner, 179 AD2d 443, 444, supra citing Public Officers Law §87(2)(g)). However, under a plain reading of §87(2)(g), the exemption for intra-agency material does not apply as long as the material falls within any one of the provision's four enumerated exceptions. Thus, intra-agency documents that contain 'statistical or factual tabulations or data' are subject to FOIL disclosure, whether or not embodied in a final agency policy or determination (see, Matter of Farbman & Sons v. New York City Health & Hosp. Corp., 62 NY2d 75, 83, supra; Matter of MacRae v. Dolce, 130 AD2d 577)...

"...Although the term 'factual data' is not defined by statute, the meaning of the term can be discerned from the purpose underlying the intra-agency exemption, which is 'to protect the deliberative process of the government by ensuring that persons in an advisory role [will] be able to express their opinions freely to agency decision makers' (Matter of Xerox Corp. v. Town of Webster, 65 NY2d 131, 132 [quoting Matter of Sea Crest Constr. Corp. v. Stubing, 82 AD2d 546, 549]). Consistent with this limited aim to safeguard internal government consultations and deliberations, the exemption does not apply when the requested material consists of 'statistical or factual tabulations or data' (Public Officers Law 87(2)(g)(i). Factual data, therefore, simply means objective information, in contrast to opinions, ideas, or advice exchanged as part of the consultative or deliberative process of government decision making (see, Matter of Johnson Newspaper Corp. v. Stainkamp, 94 AD2d 825, 827, affd on op below, 61 NY2d 958; Matter of Miracle Mile Assocs. v. Yudelson, 68 AD2d 176, 181-182).

"Against this backdrop, we conclude that the complaint follow-up reports contain substantial factual information available pursuant to the provisions of FOIL. Sections of the report are devoted to such purely factual data as: the names, addresses, and physical descriptions of crime victims, witnesses, and perpetrators; a checklist that indicates whether the victims and witnesses have been interviewed and shown photos, whether crime scenes have been photographed and dusted for fingerprints, and whether neighborhood residents have been canvassed for information; and a blank space denominated 'details' in which the officer records the particulars of any action taken in connection with the investigation.

"However, the Police Department argues that any witness statements contained in the reports, in particular, are not 'factual' because there is no assurance of the statements' accuracy and reliability. We decline to read such a reliability requirement into the phrase 'factual data', as the dissent would have us do, and conclude that a witness statement constitutes factual data insofar as it embodies a factual account of the witness's observations. Such a statement, moreover, is far removed from the type of internal government exchange sought to be protected by the intra-agency exemption (see, Matter of Ingram v. Axelrod, 90 AD2d 568, 569 [ambulance records, list of interviews, and reports of interviews available under FOIL as 'factual data']). By contrast, any impressions, recommendations, or opinions recorded in the complaint follow-up report would not constitute factual data and would be exempt from disclosure. The holding herein is only that these reports are not categorically exempt as intra-agency material. Indeed, the Police Department is entitled to withhold complaint follow-up reports, or specific portions thereof, under any other applicable exemption, such as the law-enforcement exemption or the public-safety exemption, as long as the requisite particularized showing is made" [Gould, Scott and DeFelice v. New York City Police Department, 89 NY2d 267, 276-277 (1996); emphasis added by the Court].

Based on the foregoing, the agency could not claim that the complaint reports can be withheld in their entirety on the ground that they constitute intra-agency materials. However, the Court was careful to point out that other grounds for denial might apply in consideration of those records, as well as others that you requested.

For instance, of potential significance is §87(2)(b) of the Freedom of Information Law, which permits an agency to withhold records or portions thereof when disclosure would constitute "an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy". That provision might be applicable relative to the deletion of identifying details in a variety of situations, i.e., where a record identifies a confidential source or a witness, for example.

Often the most relevant provision concerning access to records maintained by law enforcement agencies is §87(2)(e), which permits an agency to withhold records that:

"are compiled for law enforcement purposes and which, if disclosed, would:

Mr. Kenneth Jenkins

January 6, 1999

- i. interfere with law enforcement investigations or judicial proceedings;
- ii. deprive a person of a right to a fair trial or impartial adjudication;
- iii. identify a confidential source or disclose confidential information relating to a criminal investigation; or
- iv. reveal criminal investigative techniques or procedures, except routine techniques and procedures."

In my view, the foregoing indicates that records compiled for law enforcement purposes can only be withheld to the extent that disclosure would result in the harmful effects described in sub- paragraphs (i) through (iv) of §87(2)(e).

Another possible ground for denial is §87(2)(f), which permits withholding to the extent that disclosure "would endanger the life or safety of any person". The capacity to withhold on that basis is dependent upon the facts and circumstances concerning an event.

Lastly, in a decision concerning a request for records maintained by the office of a district attorney that would ordinarily be exempted from disclosure under the Freedom of Information Law, it was held that "once the statements have been used in open court, they have lost their cloak of confidentiality and are available for inspection by a member of the public" [see Moore v. Santucci, 151 AD 2d 677, 679 (1989)]. Based upon that decision, it appears that records introduced into evidence or disclosed during a public judicial proceeding should be available. However, in the same decision, it was also found that:

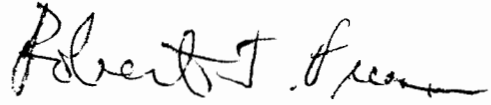

"...if the petitioner or his attorney previously received a copy of the agency record pursuant to an alternative discovery device and currently possesses the copy, a court may uphold an agency's denial of the petitioner's request under the FOIL for a duplicate copy as academic. However, the burden of proof rests with the agency to demonstrate that the petitioner's specific requests are moot. The respondent's burden would be satisfied upon proof that a copy of the requested record was previously furnished to the petitioner or his counsel in the absence of any allegation, in evidentiary form, that the copy was no longer in existence. In the event the petitioner's request for a copy of a specific record is not moot, the agency must furnish another copy upon payment of the appropriate fee...unless the requested record falls squarely within the ambit of 1 of the 8 statutory exemptions" (id., 678).

The Court in Moore also specified that an agency "is not required to make available for inspection or copying any suppression hearing or trial transcripts of a witness' testimony in its possession, because the transcripts are court records, not agency records" (id. at 680).

Dear Mr. Sobota:

As you are aware, I have received your letter of December 15. You have sought an advisory opinion under the Freedom of Information Law concerning the responsibility of a village to disclose certain records.

According to your letter, the village has received a request for "an agreement to settle a disciplinary case it brought against an employee for on-the-job misconduct", as well as other "available documents" pertaining the proceedings against the employee. You made specific reference to paragraph 16 of the agreement, which states that:

"The parties further agree not to make any public comments about the terms of this Agreement, and pledge to use their best efforts to maintain the confidentiality of this settlement, to the extent permitted by law. It is understood that if this Agreement must be disclosed pursuant to a valid request filed under the Freedom of Information Law, such Agreement will be released, and the parties may comment upon the Agreement in connection with such release at such time, provided that any such comment shall not disparage the other party or this Agreement in any manner" (emphasis added).

You added that the agreement requires the employee to retire by a specified date, and that the village agreed to pay the employee certain sums of money and to withdraw the disciplinary charges. The employee did not admit his guilt in relation to the charges.

Mr. Henry F. Sobota

You have asked whether the village must disclose the settlement agreement, notwithstanding paragraph 16, the disciplinary charges "or other pre-settlement documents, such as correspondence suspending the employee or transmitting the charges." You also indicated that while the employee was suspended pending a hearing on the charges, he filed for unemployment insurance benefits. A hearing was held, and it was determined that the employee "committed misconduct, making him ineligible for unemployment benefits." You asked whether the decision of the Administrative Law Judge is accessible.

First, paragraph 16 in my view has no impact on the village's duty to disclose under the Freedom of Information Law. From my perspective, it is likely that the parties could validly agree not to speak about the settlement. However, the Freedom of Information Law pertains to records, not to speech. In a decision that is somewhat analogous to the matter that you described, Paul Smith's College of Arts and Sciences v. Cuomo, it was stated that:

"Plaintiff was the subject of a complaint made by a former employee who alleged that he was a victim of age discrimination. Prior to a scheduled hearing and with the assistance of an employee of defendant State Division of Human Rights (hereinafter SDHR), plaintiff entered into a stipulation of settlement with the complaining employee. Plaintiff's stated purpose for settling was to eliminate any negative publicity resulting from a public hearing on the allegations. The order after stipulation signed by defendant Commissioner of Human Rights on August 23, 1989 provided for absolute confidentiality except for enforcement purposes. The order also provided for the withdrawal of the charges and discontinuance of the administrative proceeding. Plaintiff did not admit to a Human Rights violation. On October 27, 1989, SDHR issued a press release detailing the allegations, disclosing that the matter had been settled and set forth certain parts of the settlement terms" [589 NYS2d 106,107, 186 AD2d 888 (1992)].

The Appellate Division determined that the issuance of the press release "was both arbitrary and capricious and an abuse of discretion" (id.), but it also found that the stipulation of settlement was subject to rights of access conferred by the Freedom of Information Law.

I note that it has been held in variety of circumstances that a promise or assertion of confidentiality cannot be upheld, unless a statute specifically confers confidentiality. In Gannett News Service v. Office of Alcoholism and Substance Abuse Services [415 NYS 2d 780 (1979)], a state agency guaranteed confidentiality to school districts participating in a statistical survey concerning drug abuse. The court determined that the promise of confidentiality could not be sustained, and that the records were available, for none of the grounds for denial appearing in the Freedom of Information Law could justifiably be asserted. In a decision rendered by the Court of Appeals, it was held that a state agency's:

"long-standing promise of confidentiality to the intervenors is irrelevant to whether the requested documents fit within the Legislature's definition of 'record' under FOIL. The definition does not exclude or make any reference to information labeled as 'confidential' by the agency; confidentiality is relevant only when determining whether the record or a portion of it is exempt..." [Washington Post v. Insurance Department, 61 NY 2d 557, 565 (1984)].

Second, I believe that the settlement agreement must be disclosed. As a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law.

There is nothing in the Freedom of Information Law that deals specifically with personnel records or personnel files. Further, the nature and content of so-called personnel files may differ from one agency to another, and from one employee to another. In any case, neither the characterization of documents as "personnel records" nor their placement in personnel files would necessarily render those documents "confidential" or deniable under the Freedom of Information Law (see Steinmetz v. Board of Education, East Moriches, Sup. Ct., Suffolk Cty., NYLJ, Oct. 30, 1980). On the contrary, the contents of those documents serve as the relevant factors in determining the extent to which they are available or deniable under the Freedom of Information Law. Two of the grounds for denial are relevant to an analysis of the matter; neither, however, would in my view serve to justify a denial of access.

Perhaps of greatest significance is §87(2)(b), which permits an agency to withhold records to the extent that disclosure would constitute "an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy". In addition, §89(2)(b) provides a series of examples of unwarranted invasions of personal privacy.

While the standard concerning privacy is flexible and may be subject to conflicting interpretations, the courts have provided substantial direction regarding the privacy of public officers employees. It is clear that public officers and employees enjoy a lesser degree of privacy than others, for it has been found in various contexts that public officers and employees are required to be more accountable than others. With regard to records pertaining to public officers and employees, the courts have found that, as a general rule, records that are relevant to the performance of a their official duties are available, for disclosure in such instances would result in a permissible rather than an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy [see e.g., Farrell v. Village Board of Trustees, 372 NYS 2d 905 (1975); Gannett Co. v. County of Monroe, 59 AD 2d 309 (1977), aff'd 45 NY 2d 954 (1978); Sinicropi v. County of Nassau, 76 AD 2d 838 (1980); Geneva Printing Co. and Donald C. Hadley v. Village of Lyons, Sup. Ct., Wayne Cty., March 25, 1981; Montes v. State, 406 NYS 2d 664 (Court of Claims, 1978); Powhida v. City of Albany, 147 AD 2d 236 (1989); Scaccia v. NYS Division of State Police, 530 NYS 2d 309, 138 AD 2d 50 (1988); Steinmetz v. Board of Education, East Moriches, supra; Capital Newspapers v. Burns, 67 NY 2d 562 (1986)]. Conversely, to the extent that records are irrelevant to the performance of one's official duties, it has been found that disclosure would indeed constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy [see e.g., Matter of Wool, Sup. Ct., Nassau Cty., NYLJ, Nov. 22, 1977].

The other ground for denial of significance, §87(2)(g), states that an agency may withhold records that:

- "are inter-agency or intra-agency materials which are not:
- i. statistical or factual tabulations or data;
 - ii. instructions to staff that affect the public;
 - iii. final agency policy or determinations; or
 - iv. external audits, including but not limited to audits performed by the comptroller and the federal government..."

It is noted that the language quoted above contains what in effect is a double negative. While inter-agency or intra-agency materials may be withheld, portions of such materials consisting of statistical or factual information, instructions to staff that affect the public, final agency policy or determinations or external audits must be made available, unless a different ground for denial could appropriately be asserted. Concurrently, those portions of inter-agency or intra-agency materials that are reflective of opinion, advice, recommendation and the like could in my view be withheld. Insofar as a request involves a final agency determination, I believe that such a determination must be disclosed, again, unless a different ground for denial could be asserted.

In Geneva Printing, supra, a public employee charged with misconduct and in the process of an arbitration hearing engaged in a settlement agreement with a municipality. One aspect of the settlement was an agreement to the effect that its terms would remain confidential. Notwithstanding the agreement of confidentiality, which apparently was based on an assertion that "the public interest is benefited by maintaining harmonious relationships between government and its employees", the court found that no ground for denial could justifiably be cited to withhold the agreement. In so holding, the court cited a decision rendered by the Court of Appeals and stated that:

"In Board of Education v. Areman, (41 NY2d 527), the Court of Appeals in concluding that a provision in a collective bargaining agreement which bargained away the board of education's right to inspect personnel files was unenforceable as contrary to statutes and public policy stated: 'Boards of education are but representatives of the public interest and the public interest must, certainly at times, bind these representatives and limit or restrict their power to, in turn, bind the public which they represent. (at p. 531).

"A similar restriction on the power of the representatives for the Village of Lyons to compromise the public right to inspect public records operates in this instance.

"The agreement to conceal the terms of this settlement is contrary to the FOIL unless there is a specific exemption from disclosure. Without one, the agreement is invalid insofar as restricting the right of the public to access."

It was also found that the record indicating the terms of the settlement constituted a final agency determination available under the Law. The decision states that:

"It is the terms of the settlement, not just a notation that a settlement resulted, which comprise the final determination of the matter. The public is entitled to know what penalty, if any, the employee suffered...The instant records are the decision or final determination of the village, albeit arrived at by settlement..."

Perhaps most pertinent to the instant situation is a decision rendered approximately a month ago in which the subject of a settlement agreement with a town that included a confidentiality clause brought suit against the town for disclosing the agreement under the Freedom of Information Law. In considering the matter, the court stated that:

"Plaintiff argues that provisions of FOIL did not mandate disclosure in this instance. However, it is clear that any attempt to conceal the financial terms of this expenditure would violate the Legislative declaration of §84 of the Public Officer's Law, as it would conceal access to information regarding expenditure of public monies.

"Although exceptions to disclosure are provided in §§87 and 89, plaintiff has not met his burden of demonstrating that the financial provisions of this agreement fit within one of these statutory exceptions (see Matter of Washington Post v New York State Ins. Dept. 61 NY2d 557, 566). While partially recognized in Matter of LaRocca v Bd. of Education, 220 AD2d 424, those narrowly defined exceptions are not relevant to defendants' disclosure of the terms of a financial settlement (see Matter of Western Suffolk BOCES v Bay Shore Union Free School District, ___ AD2d ___ 672 NYS2d 776). There is no question that defendants lacked the authority to subvert FOIL by exempting information from the enactment by simply promising confidentiality (Matter of Washington Post, supra p567).

"Therefore, this Court finds that the disclosure made by the defendant Supervisor was 'required by law', whether or not the contract so provided" (Hansen v. Town of Wallkill, Supreme Court, Orange County, December 9, 1998).

While I believe that the settlement agreement must be disclosed for the reasons discussed in the preceding paragraphs, the charges, which were never proven, could, in my view, be withheld. When allegations or charges of misconduct have not yet been determined or did not result in a finding of misconduct, the records relating to such allegations may, in my view, be withheld, for disclosure would result in an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy [see e.g., Herald Company v. School District of City of Syracuse, 430 NYS 2d 460 (1980)]. Similarly, to the extent that charges are dismissed or allegations are found to be without merit, I believe that they may be withheld.

The other correspondence to which you referred would appear to consist of intra-agency material. To the extent that it is predecisional and does not contain the kinds of information required to be disclosed under subparagraphs (i), (ii) or (iii) of §87(2)(g), or if disclosure would constitute an unwarranted invasion of privacy, I believe that it may be withheld.

With respect to records reflective of a suspension, such records must in my view be disclosed, in this instance, for either of two reasons.

Although a suspension in some situations might not reflect an agency's final determination of a matter, it would represent factual information that must be made available under §87(2)(g)(i). Further, with respect to privacy, it has been established that attendance records of public employees must be disclosed. In Capital Newspapers v. Burns [109 AD 2d 292, aff'd 67 NY 2d 562 (1986)], it was held that records indicating days and dates of sick leave claimed by a particular police officer must be made available. On the basis of that decision, which was reached unanimously by both the Appellate Division and the Court of Appeals, it is clear in my opinion that time sheets, attendance records and similar documentation, including those elements that indicate the reasons for absences, must be disclosed. A member of the public could request and obtain the attendance records of any public employee and ascertain from those records the identity of a person who was suspended.

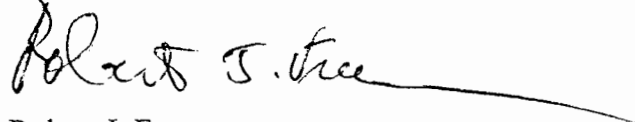

Perhaps more importantly, the suspension would apparently have been referenced in the decision of the Administrative Law Judge who determined eligibility for unemployment insurance benefits, and that decision, in my view, would clearly be public. In Herald Company v. Weisenberg [59 NY2d 378 (1983)], the Court of Appeals held that "an unemployment insurance hearing is presumed to open, and may not be closed to the public unless there is demonstrated a compelling reason for closure and only after the affected members of the news media are given an opportunity to be heard" (id. at 380). Further, the Court based its holding on "the strong public policy in this State of public access to judicial and administrative proceedings", which "has found expression through legislative language in a variety of contexts", one of which included a citation of the Freedom of Information Law (id., 381).

Because unemployment insurance hearings are presumptively open to the public, not only are transcripts of those portions of the hearings that are open accessible under the Freedom of Information Law; the decisions are also available, and based on a telephone contact, it is the routine practice of the Unemployment Insurance Appeal Board to disclose them.

Dear Mr. Penna:

I have received your letter of December 10. You have sought guidance concerning your ability to obtain the criminal history record of a person who testified against you, as well as records from an insurance company that the person allegedly defrauded.

In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First, the Freedom of Information Law pertains to agency records, and §86(3) of that statute defines the term "agency" to mean:

"any state or municipal department, board, bureau, division, commission, committee, public authority, public corporation, council, office or other governmental entity performing a governmental or proprietary function for the state or any one or more municipalities thereof, except the judiciary or the state legislature."

Based on the foregoing, the Freedom of Information Law applies to records of state and local government; it does not apply to private entities, such as an insurance company. As such, the insurance company would not be obligated to disclose its records to you.

With respect to criminal history records, the general repository of those records is the Division of Criminal Justice Services. While the subject of a criminal history record may obtain such record from the Division, it has been held that criminal history records maintained by that agency are exempted from public disclosure pursuant to §87(2)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law [Capital

Newspapers v. Poklemba, Supreme Court, Albany County, April 6, 1989]. Nevertheless, if, for example, criminal conviction records were used in conjunction with a criminal proceeding by a district attorney, it has been held that the district attorney must disclose those records [see Thompson v. Weinstein, 150 AD 2d 782 (1989); also Geames v. Henry, 173 AD 2d 825 (1991)]. It is also noted that while records relating to convictions may be available from the courts or other sources, when charges are dismissed in favor of an accused, records relating to arrests that did not result in convictions are generally sealed pursuant to §160.50 of the Criminal Procedure Law.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Mr. George Williams

Marcy Correctional Facility
P.O. Box 5000
Marcy, NY 13403

Dear Mr. Williams:

I have received your letter of December 12. You wrote that you have attempted to obtain records indicating the dates of your incarceration at Riker's Island, but that you have received no response to your requests.

In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First, pursuant to the regulations promulgated by the Committee on Open Government (21 NYCRR Part 1401), each agency is required to designate one or more persons as "records access officer." The records access officer has the duty of coordinating an agency's response to requests, and requests should ordinarily be sent to that person. While I believe that the person in receipt of your request should have responded in a manner consistent with the Freedom of Information Law or forwarded your request to the records access officer, it is suggested that you resubmit your request to Mr. Thomas Antenen, Records Access Officer, Department of Correction, 6th Floor, 60 Hudson Street, New York, NY 10013.

Second, for future reference, I point out that the Freedom of Information Law provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies are required to respond to requests. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

acknowledgement of the receipt of such request and a statement of the approximate date when such request will be granted or denied..."

If neither a response to a request nor an acknowledgement of the receipt of a request is given within five business days, or if an agency delays responding for an unreasonable time after it acknowledges that a request has been received, a request may, in my opinion, be considered to have been constructively denied. In such a circumstance, I believe that the denial may be appealed in accordance with §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law. That provision states in relevant part that:

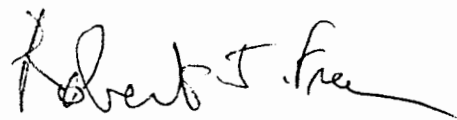

"...any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive, or governing body, who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

In addition, it has been held that when an appeal is made but a determination is not rendered within ten business days of the receipt of the appeal as required under §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, the appellant has exhausted his or her administrative remedies and may initiate a challenge to a constructive denial of access under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Rules [Floyd v. McGuire, 87 AD 2d 388, appeal dismissed 57 NY 2d 774 (1982)].

Lastly, as a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law. From my perspective, the records of your interest should be disclosed, for none of the grounds for denial would be applicable.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Robert J. Freeman

Dear Mr. Broadhurst:

I have received your letter of January 6 in which you appealed a denial of access to a record sought on December 6. You indicated that the Department of Correctional Services has delayed disclosure in a manner that precluded you from using the record in an appeal relating to a disciplinary hearing.

In this regard, first, the Committee on Open Government is authorized to provide advice concerning the Freedom of Information Law. The Committee does not have the authority to determine appeals. The provision that pertains to the right to appeal, §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, states in relevant part that:

"any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive or governing body of the entity, or the person thereof designated by such head, chief executive, or governing body, who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

For your information, the person designated by the Department of Correctional Services to determine appeals is Anthony J. Annucci, Counsel to the Department.

Second, the Freedom of Information Law provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies must respond to requests. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

Mr. Thomas Broadhurst
January 8, 1999
Page -2-

"Each entity subject to the provisions of this article, within five business days of the receipt of a written request for a record reasonably described, shall make such record available to the person requesting it, deny such request in writing or furnish a written acknowledgement of the receipt of such request and a statement of the approximate date when such request will be granted or denied..."

If neither a response to a request nor an acknowledgement of the receipt of a request is given within five business days, or if an agency delays responding for an unreasonable time after it acknowledges that a request has been received, a request may, in my opinion, be considered to have been constructively denied. In such a circumstance, I believe that the denial may be appealed in accordance with §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law. That provision states in relevant part that:

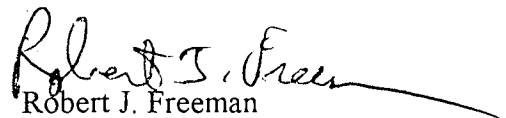

"...any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive, or governing body, who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

In addition, it has been held that when an appeal is made but a determination is not rendered within ten business days of the receipt of the appeal as required under §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, the appellant has exhausted his or her administrative remedies and may initiate a challenge to a constructive denial of access under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Rules [Floyd v. McGuire, 87 AD 2d 388, appeal dismissed 57 NY 2d 774 (1982)].

Third, I point out that it has been held that a failure to respond in a timely manner to a request made under the Freedom of Information Law is irrelevant to the validity of a determination made in a separate proceeding [see Brusco v. NYS Division of Housing and Community Renewal, 170 AD2d 796, appeal dismissed, 77 NY2d 939 (1991)].

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Dear Mr. Quinones:

I have received your letter of December 15. You have sought guidance concerning your ability to obtain your mental health records from two hospitals where you were treated.

In this regard, while the statute within the Committee's advisory jurisdiction, the Freedom of Information Law, pertains generally to government records in New York, a different provision of law, §33.16 of the Mental Hygiene Law, deals specifically with the records in question.

As I understand §33.16 of the Mental Hygiene Law, it provides rights of access to clinical mental health records, with certain exceptions, to "qualified persons," and paragraph 7 of subdivision (a) of that section defines that phrase to include "any properly identified patient or client." It appears that you are a "qualified person" and that you may assert rights of access under that statute.

I note that §33.16(b) states in relevant part that a facility must respond to a request within ten days, and subdivision (d) of §33.13 pertains to the right to appeal a denial of access and states that:

"(d) Clinical records access review committees. The commissioner of mental health the commissioner of mental retardation and developmental disabilities and the commissioner of alcoholism and substance abuse services shall appoint clinical record access review committees to hear appeals of the denial of access to patient or client records as provided in paragraph four of subdivision (c) of this section. Members of such committee shall be appointed by the respective commissioners. Such clinical record access review committees shall consist of no less than three nor more than five persons. The commissioners shall promulgate rules and regulations necessary to effectuate the provisions of this subdivision."

If you do not receive a satisfactory response to your request, it is suggested you request the rules and regulations from the appropriate commissioner in order to ensure that you are following the correct procedure and that you can properly assert your rights.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Dear Mr. Caldero:

I have received your letter of December 10, which reached this office on December 21. Please note that the address of the Committee on Open Government has changed.

As I understand the matter, you requested records from a parole aide at your facility, and you were informed that the rules of the Division of Parole limit the time during which an individual can seek the records in question to two months before or after an appeal. You have questioned the validity of such a rule.

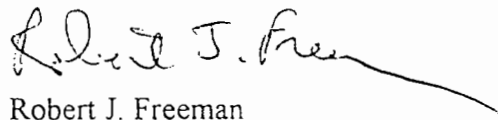

If there is a rule that limits the ability of individuals to seek records to a certain time period, I believe that the rule would be invalid. In short, any person can request records under the Freedom of Information Law at any time, and the status or interest of the person making the request is irrelevant to that person's rights of access [see M. Farbman & Sons v. New York City Health and Hosps. Corp., 62 NY 2d 75 (1984) and Burke v. Yudelson, 368 NYS2d 779, aff'd 51 AD2d 673, 378 NYS2d 165 (1976)]. From my perspective, when a request is made under the Freedom of Information Law, the only issue involves the extent to which the records must be disclosed in accordance with §87(2) of that statute.

It is suggested that you resubmit your request to the Division of Parole's Records Access Officer, Mr. David Molik.

Mr. Yarvey Alston
96-R-3229
Butler Minimum Security Correctional Facility
P.O. Box 388
Red Creek, NY 13143

Dear Mr. Alston:

I have received your letter of December 16. You have sought assistance in relation to unanswered requests for records of the New York City Police Department and Queens County Supreme Court.

In this regard, it is emphasized that the Freedom of Information Law is applicable to agency records, and that §86(3) defines the term "agency" to include:

"any state or municipal department, board, bureau, division, commission, committee, public authority, public corporation, council, office or other governmental entity performing a governmental or proprietary function for the state or any one or more municipalities thereof, except the judiciary or the state legislature."

In turn, §86(1) defines the term "judiciary" to mean:

"the courts of the state, including any municipal or district court, whether or not of record."

Based on the provisions quoted above, the courts and court records are not subject to the Freedom of Information Law. This is not to suggest that court records are not generally available to the public, for other provisions of law (see e.g., Judiciary Law, §255) may grant broad public access to those records. Even though other statutes may deal with access to court records, the procedural provisions associated with the Freedom of Information Law (i.e., those involving the designation of a records access officer or the right to appeal a denial) would not ordinarily be applicable. It is suggested that any request for court records be made to the clerk of the court, citing an appropriate provision of law as the basis for the request.

With respect to the New York City Police Department, which is an agency, I point out that the regulations promulgated by the Committee on Open Government (21 NYCRR Part 1401) require that each agency designate one or more persons as "records access officer." The records access officer has the duty of coordinating an agency's response to requests, and a request should ordinarily be made to that person. While I believe that the person in receipt of your request should have responded in a manner consistent with the Freedom of Information Law or forwarded your request to the records access officer, it is suggested that you resubmit your request to the Records Access Officer, Room 110C, One Police Plaza, New York, NY 10038.

Lastly, for future reference, the Freedom of Information Law provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies must respond to requests. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

If neither a response to a request nor an acknowledgement of the receipt of a request is given within five business days, or if an agency delays responding for an unreasonable time after it acknowledges that a request has been received, a request may, in my opinion, be considered to have been constructively denied. In such a circumstance, I believe that the denial may be appealed in accordance with §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law. That provision states in relevant part that:

"...any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive, or governing body, who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

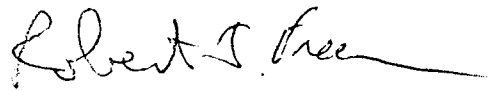

In addition, it has been held that when an appeal is made but a determination is not rendered within ten business days of the receipt of the appeal as required under §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, the appellant has exhausted his or her administrative remedies and may initiate a challenge to a constructive denial of access under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Rules [Floyd v. McGuire, 87 AD 2d 388, appeal dismissed 57 NY 2d 774 (1982)].

For your information, the person designated by the Department to determine appeals is Susan Petito, Special Counsel.

Mr. Richard Arlen

Dear Mr. Arlen:

I have received your letter of December 17 and the correspondence attached to it. You requested the 1997 vacation schedule pertaining a certain employee of the Bronx Civil Court. It is your belief that the records sought are accessible to the public and you asked that I inform you of "the correctness of [your] assumption."

In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First, as you appear to be aware, the Freedom of Information Law pertains to agency records, and §86(3) of that statute defines the term "agency" to include:

"any state or municipal department, board, bureau, division, commission, committee, public authority, public corporation, council, office or other governmental entity performing a governmental or proprietary function for the state or any one or more municipalities thereof, except the judiciary or the state legislature."

In turn, §86(1) defines the term "judiciary" to mean:

"the courts of the state, including any municipal or district court, whether or not of record."

If the records in which you are interested are maintained by a court and can be characterized as court records, the Freedom of Information Law in my opinion would not apply. It has been determined that the Office of Court Administration is not a court, but rather is an "agency" and, therefore, is subject to the Freedom of Information Law [see Babigian v. Evans, 427 NYS 2d 699, aff'd 97 AD 2d 827 (1984) and Quirk v. Evans, 455 NYS 2d 918, 97 AD 2d 992 (1983)]. As its name suggests, that entity oversees and administers the court system. In this instance, it appears that the records sought are not court records, but rather administrative or personnel records that would constitute agency records. If that is so, they are subject to rights conferred by the Freedom of Information Law.

Second, as a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law. While two of the grounds for denial are relevant to an analysis of rights of access, neither in my opinion could validly be asserted to withhold the information in which you are interested.

Of significance is §87(2)(g), which permits an agency to withhold records that:

"are inter-agency or intra-agency materials which are not:

- i. statistical or factual tabulations or data;
- ii. instructions to staff that affect the public;
- iii. final agency policy or determinations; or
- iv. external audits, including but not limited to audits performed by the comptroller and the federal government..."

It is noted that the language quoted above contains what in effect is a double negative. While inter-agency or intra-agency materials may be withheld, portions of such materials consisting of statistical or factual information, instructions to staff that affect the public, final agency policy or determinations or external audits must be made available, unless a different ground for denial could appropriately be asserted. Concurrently, those portions of inter-agency or intra-agency materials that are reflective of opinion, advice, recommendation and the like could in my view be withheld.

The records in question would constitute "intra-agency materials." However, they would appear to consist solely of statistical or factual information that must be disclosed under §87(2)(g)(i), unless a different ground for denial could properly be asserted.

The other provision of relevance is §87(2)(b), which permits an agency to withhold record or portions of records when disclosure would result in "an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy." While the standard concerning privacy is flexible and may be subject to conflicting interpretations, the courts have provided substantial direction regarding the privacy of public officers employees. It is clear that public officers and employees enjoy a lesser degree of privacy than others, for it has been found in various contexts that public officers and employees are required to be more accountable than others. Further, with regard to records pertaining to public officers and employees, the courts have found that, as a general rule, records that are relevant to the performance of a their official duties are available, for disclosure in such instances would result in a permissible rather than an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy [see e.g., Farrell v. Village Board of Trustees, 372 NYS 2d 905 (1975); Gannett Co. v. County of Monroe, 59 AD 2d 309 (1977), aff'd 45 NY 2d 954 (1978); Sinicropi v. County of Nassau, 76 AD 2d 838 (1980); Geneva Printing Co. and Donald C. Hadley v. Village of Lyons, Sup. Ct., Wayne Cty., March 25, 1981; Montes v. State, 406 NYS 2d 664 (Court of Claims, 1978); Powhida v. City of Albany, 147 AD 2d 236 (1989); Scaccia v. NYS Division of State Police, 530 NYS 2d 309, 138 AD 2d 50 (1988); Steinmetz v. Board of Education, East Moriches, Sup. Ct., Suffolk Cty., NYLJ, Oct. 30, 1980); Capital Newspapers v. Burns, 67 NY 2d 562 (1986)]. Conversely, to the extent that records are irrelevant to the performance of one's official duties, it has been found that disclosure would indeed constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy [see e.g., Matter of Wool, Sup. Ct., Nassau Cty., NYLJ, Nov. 22, 1977 regarding membership in a union; also Seelig v. Sielaff, 201 AD2d 298 (1994) regarding social security numbers].

In a case dealing with attendance records indicating the dates and dates of sick leave claimed by a particular employee that was affirmed by the Court of Appeals, it was found, in essence, that disclosure would result in a permissible rather than an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy. Specifically, the Appellate Division found that:

"One of the most basic obligation of any employee is to appear for work when scheduled to do so. Concurrent with this is the rights of an employee to properly use sick leave available to him or her. In the instant case, intervenor had an obligation to report for work when scheduled along with a right to use sick leave in accordance with his collective bargaining agreement. The taxpayers have an interest in such use of sick leave for economic as well as safety reasons. Thus it can hardly be said that disclosure of the dates in February 1983 when intervenor made use of sick leave would constitute an unwarranted invasion of privacy. Further, the motives of petitioners or the means by which they will report the information is not determinative since all records of government agencies are presumptively available for inspection without regard to the status, need, good faith or purpose of the applicant requesting access..." [Capital Newspapers v. Burns, 109 AD 2d 92, 94-95 (1985), aff'd 67 NY 2d 562 (1986)].

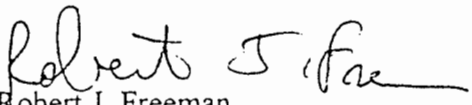

Insofar as attendance records or time sheets include reference to reasons for an absence, it has been advised that an explanation of why sick time might have been used, i.e., a description of an illness or medical problem found in records, could be withheld or deleted from a record otherwise available, for disclosure of so personal a detail of a person's life would likely constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy and would not be relevant to the performance of an employee's duties. A number, however, which merely indicates the amount of sick time or vacation time accumulated or used, or the dates and times of attendance or absence, including the reason for the absence, would not in my view represent a personal detail of an individual's life and would be relevant to the performance of one's official duties. Therefore, I do not believe that §87(2)(b) could be asserted to withhold that kind of information contained in an attendance record.

In sum, I agree with your view that a public employee's vacation schedule should be made available under the Freedom of Information Law.

Hon. Lawrence L. Marmet
Richfield Town Justice
491 Richfield Hill Road
Richfield Springs, NY 13429

Dear Justice Marmet:

I have received your communication of December 20 in which you referred to delays in response to requests for records of the Town of Richfield and constructive denials of access by the Town.

In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First, in general, the Freedom of Information Law is intended to enable the public to request and obtain accessible records. Further, it has been held that accessible records should be made equally available to any person, without regard to status or interest [see e.g., Burke v. Yudelson, 368 NYS 2d 779, aff'd 51 AD 2d 673, 378 NYS 2d 165 (1976) and M. Farbman & Sons v. New York City, 62 NY 2d 75 (1984)]. Nevertheless, if it is clear that records are requested in the performance of one's official duties, the request might not be viewed as having been made under the Freedom of Information Law. In such a situation, if a request is reasonable, and in the absence of a rule or policy to the contrary, I believe that a public official should not generally be required to resort to the Freedom of Information Law in order to seek or obtain records.

However, viewing the matter from a more technical perspective, one of the functions of a public body involves acting collectively, as an entity. A town board, as the governing body of a public corporation, generally acts by means of motions carried by an affirmative vote of a majority of its total membership (see General Construction Law, §41). In my view, in most instances, a member of the board or other officer such as yourself acting unilaterally, without the consent or approval of a majority of the total membership of the board, has the same rights as those accorded to a member of the public, unless there is some additional right conferred by means of law or rule. In such a case, a public officer seeking records could presumably be treated in the same manner as the public generally.

Second, as you are aware, the Freedom of Information Law provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies must respond to requests. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

"Each entity subject to the provisions of this article, within five business days of the receipt of a written request for a record reasonably described, shall make such record available to the person requesting it, deny such request in writing or furnish a written acknowledgement of the receipt of such request and a statement of the approximate date when such request will be granted or denied..."

While an agency must grant access to records, deny access or acknowledge the receipt of a request within five business days, when such acknowledgement is given, there is no precise time period within which an agency must grant or deny access to records. The time needed to do so may be dependent upon the volume of a request, the possibility that other requests have been made, the necessity to conduct legal research, the search and retrieval techniques used to locate the records and the like. In short, when an agency acknowledges the receipt of a request because more than five business days may be needed to grant or deny a request, so long as it provides an approximate date indicating when the request will be granted or denied, and that date is reasonable in view of the attendant circumstances, I believe that the agency would be acting in compliance with law.

Notwithstanding the foregoing, in my view, every law must be implemented in a manner that gives reasonable effect to its intent, and I point out that in its statement of legislative intent, §84 of the Freedom of Information Law states that "it is incumbent upon the state and its localities to extend public accountability wherever and whenever feasible." Therefore, if records are clearly available to the public under the Freedom of Information Law, or if they are readily retrievable, there may be no basis for a lengthy delay in disclosure. As the Court of Appeals has asserted:

"...the successful implementation of the policies motivating the enactment of the Freedom of Information Law centers on goals as broad as the achievement of a more informed electorate and a more responsible and responsive officialdom. By their very nature such objectives cannot hope to be attained unless the measures taken to bring them about permeate the body politic to a point where they become the rule rather than the exception. The phrase 'public accountability wherever and whenever feasible' therefore merely punctuates with explicitness what in any event is implicit" [Westchester News v. Kimball, 50 NY 2d 575, 579 (1980)].

In my opinion, if, as a matter of practice or policy, an agency acknowledges the receipt of requests and indicates in every instance that it will determine to grant or deny access to records "within thirty days" or some other particular period, following the date of acknowledgement, such a practice or policy would be contrary to the thrust of the Freedom of Information Law. If a request is voluminous and a significant amount of time is needed to locate records and review them to determine rights of access, thirty days, in view of those and perhaps the other kinds of factors mentioned earlier, might be reasonable. On the other hand, if a record or report is clearly public and can be found easily, there would appear to be no rational basis for delaying disclosure for as much as thirty days. In a case in which it was found that an agency's "actions demonstrate an utter disregard for compliance set by FOIL", it was held that "[t]he records finally produced were not so voluminous as to justify any extension of time, much less an extension beyond that allowed by statute, or no response to appeals at all" (Inner City Press/Community on the Move, Inc. v. New York City Department of Housing Preservation and Development, Supreme Court, New York County, November 9, 1993).

Lastly, since you referred to minutes of Town Board meetings, I point out that subdivision (3) of §106 of the Open Meetings Law states that:

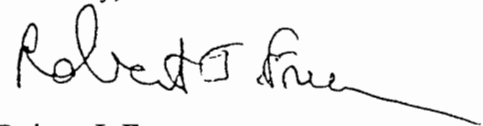

"Minutes of meetings of all public bodies shall be available to the public in accordance with the provisions of the freedom of information law within two weeks from the date of such meetings except that minutes taken pursuant to subdivision two hereof shall be available to the public within one week from the date of the executive session."

As such, a public body has two weeks from a meeting to prepare minutes and make them available, not ten days as you suggested in your letter. Further, there is nothing in the Open Meetings Law or any other statute of which I am aware that requires that minutes be approved. Nevertheless, as a matter of practice or policy, many public bodies approve minutes of their meetings. In the event that minutes have not been approved, to comply with the Open Meetings Law, it has consistently been advised that minutes be prepared and made available within two weeks, and that if the minutes have not been approved, they may be marked "unapproved", "draft" or "non-final", for example. By so doing within the requisite time limitations, the public can generally know what transpired at a meeting; concurrently, the public is effectively notified that the minutes are subject to change. If minutes have been prepared within less than two weeks, I believe that those unapproved minutes would be available as soon as they exist, and that they may be marked in the manner described above.

In an effort to enhance compliance with and understanding of the requirements of the Freedom of Information Law, copies of this opinion will be forwarded to the Town Board and the Town Clerk.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Robert J. Freeman

Mr. Eric Birdsall
93-A-1028
Woodbourne Correctional Facility
Pouch #1
Woodbourne, NY 12788

Dear Mr. Birdsall:

I have received your letter of December 17. You have sought my opinion concerning a request made under the Freedom of Information Law sent to the Ulster County District Attorney.

In addition, you wrote that you were told that if you send a request to one agency, that agency can "play unfair" and deliver its records to another agency, in which case, the first agency would have the ability to indicate that it does not have possession of the records. From my perspective, once a request for records has been received by an agency, the cannot destroy or dispose of the records [see Freedom of Information Law, §89(8)].

With respect to your request, it is noted at the outset that the Freedom of Information Law pertains to records, and that §89(3) states in part that an agency is not required to create or prepare a record in response to a request. Since you referred to telephone conversations, for example, if there is no record of conversations, the Freedom of Information Law would not apply. Similarly, in the "index" attached to your letter, reference was made to "socks, shoes, earrings, jewelry, keys", etc. Here I point out that it has been held that items of physical evidence do not constitute "records" that fall within the scope of the Freedom of Information Law [see Allen v. Strojnowski, 70 NY2d 871 (1989)].

Second, as a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law. Since I am unaware of the contents of all of the records in which you are interested, or the effects of their disclosure, I cannot offer specific guidance. Nevertheless, the following paragraphs will review the provisions that may be significant in determining rights of access to the records in question.

In considering the records falling within the scope of your request, relevant is a recent decision by the Court of Appeals concerning "complaint follow up reports" prepared by police officers and police officers' memo books in which it was held that a denial of access based on their characterization as intra-agency materials would be inappropriate.

The provision at issue, §87(2)(g) of the Freedom of Information Law, enables an agency to withhold records that:

"are inter-agency or intra-agency materials which are not:

- i. statistical or factual tabulations or data;
- ii. instructions to staff that affect the public;
- iii. final agency policy or determinations; or
- iv. external audits, including but not limited to audits performed by the comptroller and the federal government..."

It is noted that the language quoted above contains what in effect is a double negative. While inter-agency or intra-agency materials may be withheld, portions of such materials consisting of statistical or factual information, instructions to staff that affect the public, final agency policy or determinations or external audits must be made available, unless a different ground for denial could appropriately be asserted. Concurrently, those portions of inter-agency or intra-agency materials that are reflective of opinion, advice, recommendation and the like could in my view be withheld.

In its analysis of the matter, the decision states that:

"...Although the term 'factual data' is not defined by statute, the meaning of the term can be discerned from the purpose underlying the intra-agency exemption, which is 'to protect the deliberative process of the government by ensuring that persons in an advisory role [will] be able to express their opinions freely to agency decision makers' (Matter of Xerox Corp. v. Town of Webster, 65 NY2d 131, 132 [quoting Matter of Sea Crest Constr. Corp. v. Stubing, 82 AD2d 546, 549]). Consistent with this limited aim to safeguard internal government consultations and deliberations, the exemption does not apply when the requested material consists of 'statistical or factual tabulations or data' (Public Officers Law 87[2][g][i]. Factual data, therefore, simply means objective information, in contrast to opinions, ideas, or advice exchanged as part of the consultative or deliberative process of government decision making (see, Matter of Johnson Newspaper Corp. v. Stainkamp, 94 AD2d 825, 827, affd on op below, 61 NY2d 958; Matter of Miracle Mile Assocs. v. Yudelson, 68 AD2d 176, 181-182).

or specific portions thereof, under any other applicable exemption, such as the law-enforcement exemption or the public-safety exemption, as long as the requisite particularized showing is made" [Gould, Scott and DeFelice v. New York City Police Department, 89 NY2d 267, 276-277 (1996); emphasis added by the Court].

Based on the foregoing, the agency could not claim that the complaint reports can be withheld in their entirety on the ground that they constitute intra-agency materials. However, the Court was careful to point out that other grounds for denial might apply in consideration of those records, as well as others that you requested.

For instance, of potential significance is §87(2)(b) of the Freedom of Information Law, which permits an agency to withhold records or portions thereof when disclosure would constitute "an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy". That provision might be applicable relative to the deletion of identifying details in a variety of situations, i.e., where a record identifies a confidential source or a witness, for example.

Often the most relevant provision concerning access to records maintained by law enforcement agencies is §87(2)(e), which permits an agency to withhold records that:

"are compiled for law enforcement purposes and which, if disclosed, would:

- i. interfere with law enforcement investigations or judicial proceedings;
- ii. deprive a person of a right to a fair trial or impartial adjudication;
- iii. identify a confidential source or disclose confidential information relating to a criminal investigation; or
- iv. reveal criminal investigative techniques or procedures, except routine techniques and procedures."

In my view, the foregoing indicates that records compiled for law enforcement purposes can only be withheld to the extent that disclosure would result in the harmful effects described in sub- paragraphs (i) through (iv) of §87(2)(e).

Another possible ground for denial is §87(2)(f), which permits withholding to the extent that disclosure "would endanger the life or safety of any person". The capacity to withhold on that basis is dependent upon the facts and circumstances concerning an event.

Also relevant is the first ground for denial, §87(2)(a), which pertains to records that "are specifically exempted from disclosure by state or federal statute". Several areas of the records of your interest would likely fall within statutes that exempt certain records from disclosure. For instance, records of 911 calls in an enhanced 911 system are confidential under §308 of the County Law; autopsy reports and related records prepared by a coroner or medical examiner are confidential under §677 of the County Law; grand jury related records are exempt from disclosure under §190.25 of the Criminal Procedure Law.

Mr. Eric Birdsall

Lastly, in a decision concerning a request for records maintained by the office of a district attorney that would ordinarily be exempted from disclosure under the Freedom of Information Law, it was held that "once the statements have been used in open court, they have lost their cloak of confidentiality and are available for inspection by a member of the public" [see Moore v. Santucci, 151 AD 2d 677, 679 (1989)]. Based upon that decision, it appears that records introduced into evidence or disclosed during a public judicial proceeding should be available. However, in the same decision, it was also found that:

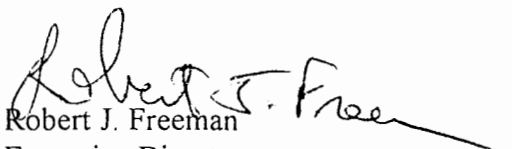

"...if the petitioner or his attorney previously received a copy of the agency record pursuant to an alternative discovery device and currently possesses the copy, a court may uphold an agency's denial of the petitioner's request under the FOIL for a duplicate copy as academic. However, the burden of proof rests with the agency to demonstrate that the petitioner's specific requests are moot. The respondent's burden would be satisfied upon proof that a copy of the requested record was previously furnished to the petitioner or his counsel in the absence of any allegation, in evidentiary form, that the copy was no longer in existence. In the event the petitioner's request for a copy of a specific record is not moot, the agency must furnish another copy upon payment of the appropriate fee...unless the requested record falls squarely within the ambit of 1 of the 8 statutory exemptions" (id., 678).

The Court in Moore also specified that an agency "is not required to make available for inspection or copying any suppression hearing or trial transcripts of a witness' testimony in its possession, because the transcripts are court records, not agency records" (id. at 680).

Enclosed, as you requested, are materials that may be useful to you.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Robert J. Freeman

Dear Mr. D'Amico:

I have received your letter of December 16 and the material attached to it. You have sought an advisory opinion concerning your right to obtain an evaluation prepared pursuant to the Merle Cooper Program.

From my perspective, your rights may be dependent upon the nature of the record. In this regard, I offer the following comments.

If rights of access to the evaluation are governed by the Freedom of Information Law, it is likely in my view that substantial portions or perhaps the entire evaluation could be withheld. As a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law.

Relevant to analysis of rights conferred by that statute is §87(2)(g), which permits an agency to withhold records that:

"are inter-agency or intra-agency materials which are not:

- i. statistical or factual tabulations or data;
- ii. instructions to staff that affect the public;
- iii. final agency policy or determinations; or

iv. external audits, including but not limited to audits performed by the comptroller and the federal government..."

It is noted that the language quoted above contains what in effect is a double negative. While inter-agency or intra-agency materials may be withheld, portions of such materials consisting of statistical or factual information, instructions to staff that affect the public, final agency policy or determinations or external audits must be made available, unless a different ground for denial could appropriately be asserted. Concurrently, those portions of inter-agency or intra-agency materials that are reflective of opinion, advice, recommendation and the like could in my view be withheld.

I point out that a decision rendered in 1989 might have dealt with records similar to that of your interest. In that case, it was stated that:

"The petitioner seeks disclosure of unredacted portions of five Program Security and Assessment Summary forms, prepared semi-annually or upon the transfer of an inmate from one facility to another, which contain information to assist the respondents in determining the placement of the inmate in the most appropriate facility. The respondents claim that these documents are exempted from disclosure under the intra-agency memorandum exemption contained in the Freedom of Information Law (Public Officers Law, section 87[2][g]). We have examined in camera unredacted copies of the documents at issue (see Matter of Nalo v. Sullivan, 125 AD 2d 311, 509 NYS 2d 53; see also Matter of Allen Group, Inc. v. New York State Dept. of Motor Vehicles, App. Div., 538 NYS 2d 78), and find that they are exempted as intra-agency material, inasmuch as they contain predecisional evaluations, recommendations and conclusions concerning the petitioner's conduct in prison (see Matter of Kheel v. Ravitch, 62 NY 2d 1, 475 NYS 2d 814, 464 NE 2d 118; Matter of Town of Oyster Bay v. Williams, 134 AD 2d 267, 520 NYS 2d 599)" [Rowland D. v. Scully, 543 NYS 2d 497, 498; 152 AD 2d 570 (1989)].

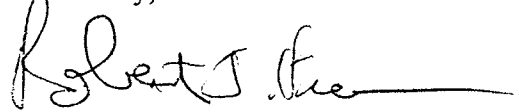

Insofar as the record sought is analogous to those described in Rowland D., it appears that they could be withheld.

If, however, the evaluation could be characterized as a "clinical record" as that phrase is defined in §33.16 of the Mental Hygiene Law, that statute, in my opinion, would govern rights of access. In brief, under §33.16, with certain limitations, the subject of a clinical record, a "qualified person", has rights of access to that record. I note that among the limitations involves the situation in which disclosure to the subject "can reasonably be expected to cause substantial and identifiable harm to the patient or client or others which would outweigh the qualified person's right of access to the record..." [see §33.16(c)].

Dear Mr. Rivera:

I have received your letter of December 7, which reached this office on December 21. You have sought guidance in relation to a request for records of the Office of the Bronx County District Attorney.

In this regard, first, the Freedom of Information Law provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies must respond to requests. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

"Each entity subject to the provisions of this article, within five business days of the receipt of a written request for a record reasonably described, shall make such record available to the person requesting it, deny such request in writing or furnish a written acknowledgement of the receipt of such request and a statement of the approximate date when such request will be granted or denied..."

If neither a response to a request nor an acknowledgement of the receipt of a request is given within five business days, or if an agency delays responding for an unreasonable time after it acknowledges that a request has been received, a request may, in my opinion, be considered to have been constructively denied. In such a circumstance, I believe that the denial may be appealed in accordance with §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law. That provision states in relevant part that:

who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

In addition, it has been held that when an appeal is made but a determination is not rendered within ten business days of the receipt of the appeal as required under §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, the appellant has exhausted his or her administrative remedies and may initiate a challenge to a constructive denial of access under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Rules [Floyd v. McGuire, 87 AD 2d 388, appeal dismissed 57 NY 2d 774 (1982)].

Second, having reviewed your appeal, I point out that as a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law. Since I am unaware of the contents of all of the records in which you are interested, or the effects of their disclosure, I cannot offer specific guidance. Nevertheless, the following paragraphs will review the provisions that may be significant in determining rights of access to the records in question.

In considering the records falling within the scope of your request, relevant is a decision by the Court of Appeals concerning "complaint follow up reports" prepared by police officers and police officers' memo books in which it was held that a denial of access based on their characterization as intra-agency materials would be inappropriate.

The provision at issue, §87(2)(g) of the Freedom of Information Law, enables an agency to withhold records that:

"are inter-agency or intra-agency materials which are not:

- i. statistical or factual tabulations or data;
- ii. instructions to staff that affect the public;
- iii. final agency policy or determinations; or
- iv. external audits, including but not limited to audits performed by the comptroller and the federal government..."

It is noted that the language quoted above contains what in effect is a double negative. While inter-agency or intra-agency materials may be withheld, portions of such materials consisting of statistical or factual information, instructions to staff that affect the public, final agency policy or determinations or external audits must be made available, unless a different ground for denial could appropriately be asserted. Concurrently, those portions of inter-agency or intra-agency materials that are reflective of opinion, advice, recommendation and the like could in my view be withheld.

In its analysis of the matter, the decision states that:

"...Although the term 'factual data' is not defined by statute, the meaning of the term can be discerned from the purpose underlying the intra-agency exemption, which is 'to protect the deliberative process of the government by ensuring that persons in an advisory role [will] be able to express their opinions freely to agency decision makers' (Matter of Xerox Corp. v. Town of Webster, 65 NY2d 131, 132 [quoting Matter of Sea Crest Constr. Corp. v. Stubing, 82 AD2d 546, 549]). Consistent with this limited aim to safeguard internal government consultations and deliberations, the exemption does not apply when the requested material consists of 'statistical or factual tabulations or data' (Public Officers Law 87(2)(g)(i)). Factual data, therefore, simply means objective information, in contrast to opinions, ideas, or advice exchanged as part of the consultative or deliberative process of government decision making (see, Matter of Johnson Newspaper Corp. v. Stainkamp, 94 AD2d 825, 827, affd on op below, 61 NY2d 958; Matter of Miracle Mile Assocs. v. Yudelson, 68 AD2d 176, 181-182).

"However, the Police Department argues that any witness statements contained in the reports, in particular, are not 'factual' because there is no assurance of the statements' accuracy and reliability. We decline to read such a reliability requirement into the phrase 'factual data', as the dissent would have us do, and conclude that a witness statement constitutes factual data insofar as it embodies a factual account of the witness's observations. Such a statement, moreover, is far removed from the type of internal government exchange sought to be protected by the intra-agency exemption (see, Matter of Ingram v. Axelrod, 90 AD2d 568, 569 [ambulance records, list of interviews, and reports of interviews available under FOIL as 'factual data']). By contrast, any impressions, recommendations, or opinions recorded in the complaint follow-up report would not constitute factual data and would be exempt from disclosure. The holding herein is only that these reports are not categorically exempt as intra-agency material. Indeed, the Police Department is entitled to withhold complaint follow-up reports, or specific portions thereof, under any other applicable exemption, such as the law-enforcement exemption or the public-safety exemption, as long as the requisite particularized showing is made" [Gould, Scott and DeFelice v. New York City Police Department, 89 NY2d 267, 276-277 (1996); emphasis added by the Court].

Based on the foregoing, the agency could not claim that the complaint reports can be withheld in their entirety on the ground that they constitute intra-agency materials. However, the Court was careful to point out that other grounds for denial might apply in consideration of those records, as well as others that you requested.

For instance, of potential significance is §87(2)(b) of the Freedom of Information Law, which permits an agency to withhold records or portions thereof when disclosure would constitute "an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy". That provision might be applicable relative to the deletion of identifying details in a variety of situations, i.e., where a record identifies a confidential source or a witness, for example.

Often the most relevant provision concerning access to records maintained by law enforcement agencies is §87(2)(e), which permits an agency to withhold records that:

"are compiled for law enforcement purposes and which, if disclosed, would:

- i. interfere with law enforcement investigations or judicial proceedings;
- ii. deprive a person of a right to a fair trial or impartial adjudication;

- iii. identify a confidential source or disclose confidential information relating to a criminal investigation; or
- iv. reveal criminal investigative techniques or procedures, except routine techniques and procedures."

In my view, the foregoing indicates that records compiled for law enforcement purposes can only be withheld to the extent that disclosure would result in the harmful effects described in sub- paragraphs (i) through (iv) of §87(2)(e).

Another possible ground for denial is §87(2)(f), which permits withholding to the extent that disclosure "would endanger the life or safety of any person". The capacity to withhold on that basis is dependent upon the facts and circumstances concerning an event.

Also relevant is the first ground for denial, §87(2)(a), which pertains to records that "are specifically exempted from disclosure by state or federal statute". Several areas of the records of your interest would likely fall within statutes that exempt certain records from disclosure. For instance, records of 911 calls in an enhanced 911 system are confidential under §308 of the County Law; autopsy reports and related records prepared by a coroner or medical examiner are confidential under §677 of the County Law; grand jury related records are exempt from disclosure under §190.25 of the Criminal Procedure Law.

Third, in a decision concerning a request for records maintained by the office of a district attorney that would ordinarily be exempted from disclosure under the Freedom of Information Law, it was held that "once the statements have been used in open court, they have lost their cloak of confidentiality and are available for inspection by a member of the public" [see Moore v. Santucci, 151 AD 2d 677, 679 (1989)]. Based upon that decision, it appears that records introduced into evidence or disclosed during a public judicial proceeding should be available. However, in the same decision, it was also found that:

"...if the petitioner or his attorney previously received a copy of the agency record pursuant to an alternative discovery device and currently possesses the copy, a court may uphold an agency's denial of the petitioner's request under the FOIL for a duplicate copy as academic. However, the burden of proof rests with the agency to demonstrate that the petitioner's specific requests are moot. The respondent's burden would be satisfied upon proof that a copy of the requested record was previously furnished to the petitioner or his counsel in the absence of any allegation, in evidentiary form, that the copy was no longer in existence. In the event the petitioner's request for a copy of a specific record is not moot, the agency must furnish another copy upon payment of the appropriate fee...unless the requested record falls squarely within the ambit of 1 of the 8 statutory exemptions" (id., 678).

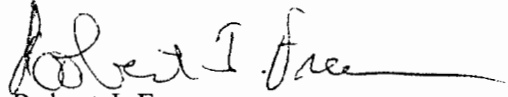

Mr. Marcus Rivera

The Court in Moore also specified that an agency "is not required to make available for inspection or copying any suppression hearing or trial transcripts of a witness' testimony in its possession, because the transcripts are court records, not agency records" (id. at 680).

Lastly, several aspects of your appeal appear to refer to provisions of the Personal Privacy Protection Law. Please be advised that the cited statute pertains only to state agencies and specifically excludes offices of district attorneys from its coverage.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Robert J. Freeman

The staff of the Committee on Open Government is authorized to issue advisory opinions. The ensuing staff advisory opinion is based solely upon the information presented in your correspondence.

Dear Ms. Levy:

I have received your letter of December 19 in which you raised questions concerning the Freedom of Information Law.

You asked initially whether there is "a Step III and Step IV Appeal." In this regard, The Freedom of Information Law provides what might be characterized as a "one step" appeal process. Moreover, it has been held that an agency's addition of another "step" is inconsistent with law.

When an agency denies access to records, the applicant has the right to appeal pursuant to §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, which states in relevant part that:

"any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive or governing body of the entity, or the person therefor designated by such head, chief executive, or governing body, who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

Further, the regulations promulgated by the Committee on Open Government (21 NYCRR Part 1401), which govern the procedural aspects of the Law, state that:

"(a) The governing body of a public corporation or the head, chief executive or governing body of other agencies shall hear appeals or shall designate a person or body to hear appeals regarding denial of access to records under the Freedom of Information Law.

(b) Denial of access shall be in writing stating the reason therefor and advising the person denied access of his or her right to appeal to the person or body established to hear appeals, and that person or body shall be identified by name, title, business address and business telephone number. The records access officer shall not be the appeals officer" (section 1401.7).

It is also noted that the state's highest court has held that a failure to inform a person denied access to records of the right to appeal enables that person to seek judicial review of a denial. Citing the Committee's regulations and the Freedom of Information Law, the Court of Appeals in Barrett v. Morgenthau held that:

"[i]nasmuch as the District Attorney failed to advise petitioner of the availability of an administrative appeal in the office (see, 21 NYCRR 1401.7[b]) and failed to demonstrate in the proceeding that the procedures for such an appeal had, in fact, even been established (see, Public Officers Law [section] 87[1][b], he cannot be heard to complain that petitioner failed to exhaust his administrative remedies" [74 NY 2d 907, 909 (1989)].

Perhaps most pertinent to the question is a decision in which an agency's "two-tiered" appeal procedure included within a local law was found to be invalid. As stated by the court:

"Given the scope, history and legislative declaration of FOIL, it is apparent that the Legislature has evidenced its intent to preempt the field of regulation. Additionally, the 'prerequisite 'additional restrictions' on rights under State law (F.T.B. Realty Corp. v. Goodman, 300 NY 140,147-148) which Local Law No. 8-1978 imposes, namely, a two-tiered appeals procedure before Article 78 CPLR review can be had, would be sufficient to invalidate the local law (See Con Ed v. Town of Red Hook, 60 NY2d 99), as being inconsistent with the state law's single tier appeals procedure. Accordingly, respondents' reliance upon the local law in support of their argument that petitioners have failed to exhaust their administrative remedies is misplaced" (Reese v. Mahoney, Supreme Court, Erie County, June 28, 1984).

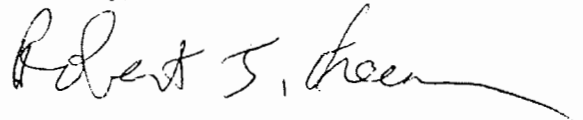

If an appeal is denied, or if an agency fails to determine the appeal within ten business days as required by law, the applicant would have exhausted his or her administrative remedies. At that point, the applicant could seek judicial review of the denial by initiating a proceeding under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Law and Rules. In such a proceeding, the issue is whether a government agency or official acted unreasonably, i.e. was arbitrary and capricious, or failed to perform a duty required to be performed by law. An Article 78 proceeding is initiated in Supreme Court in the county in which the agency's determination was made. While a person may initiate such an action pro se, in my experience, that is relatively rare.

With respect to the role of the Committee on Open Government, as a matter of policy and fairness, the Committee does not prepare formal written opinions or otherwise participate in any official manner following the commencement of litigation. Prior to the initiation of litigation, the Committee prepares advisory opinions at the request any person or agency. Opinions are frequently used in judicial proceedings as exhibits, and many judicial decisions have cited opinions rendered by the Committee.

I hope that I have been of assistance. Should any further questions arise, please feel free to contact me.

Mr. Donald Robideau

[REDACTED]
[REDACTED]

Dear Mr. Robideau:

I have received your undated letter, which reached this office on December 28. You have sought assistance in obtaining certain bills from the Town of Brandon.

From my perspective, the records of your interest must be disclosed. In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First, as a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law. In my opinion, none of the grounds for denial would be pertinent with respect to the records sought.

Second, I believe that the records in question must be maintained and made available pursuant to §29(4) of the Town Law. That provision states that the Town Supervisor:

"Shall keep an accurate and complete account of the receipt and disbursement of all moneys which shall come into his hands by virtue of his office, in books of account in the form prescribed by the state department of audit and control for all expenditures under the highway law and in books of account provided by the town for all other expenditures. Such books of account shall be public records, open and available for inspection at all reasonable hours of the day, and, upon the expiration of his term, shall be filed in the office of the town clerk."

In addition, subdivision (1) of §119 of the Town Law states in part that:

Mr. Donald Robideau
Page -2-

"When a claim has been audited by the town board of the town clerk shall file the same in numerical order as a public record in his office and prepare an abstract of the audited claims specifying the number of the claim, the name of the claimant, the amount allowed and the fund and appropriation account chargeable therewith and such other information as may be deemed necessary and essential, directed to the supervisor of the town, authorizing and directing him to pay to the claimant the amount allowed upon his claim."

That provision also states that "The claims shall be available for public inspection at all times during office hours."

Lastly, the Freedom of Information Law provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies must respond to requests. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

If neither a response to a request nor an acknowledgement of the receipt of a request is given within five business days, or if an agency delays responding for an unreasonable time after it acknowledges that a request has been received, a request may, in my opinion, be considered to have been constructively denied. In such a circumstance, I believe that the denial may be appealed in accordance with §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law. That provision states in relevant part that:

"any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive, or governing body, who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

In addition, it has been held that when an appeal is made but a determination is not rendered within ten business days of the receipt of the appeal as required under §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, the appellant has exhausted his or her administrative remedies and may initiate a challenge to a constructive denial of access under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Rules [Floyd v. McGuire, 87 AD 2d 388, appeal dismissed 57 NY 2d 774 (1982)].

In an effort to enhance compliance with and understanding of applicable law, copies will be forwarded to Town officials.

Mr. Melvin Castro

Green Haven Correctional Facility
Drawer B
Stormville, NY 12582-0100

Dear Mr. Castro:

I have received your letter of December 20. You asked "who would have information on an Albany appointed disciplinary hearing officer in the Department of Correctional Services." You added that you would like to know how many inmates he has found guilty or not guilty, the sentences of those found guilty, and the "nationalities" of those found guilty.

In this regard, first, if the information of your interest exists, it would appear that the only source would be the Department of Correctional Services. Insofar as an agency maintains records, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law.

Second, it is emphasized that the Freedom of Information pertains to existing records and that §89(3) of that statute provides in relevant part that an agency is not required to create a record in response to a request for information. If there are statistics or tabulations indicating the number of persons found guilty or not guilty, I believe that any such figures would be available under the law. I note that §87(2)(g)(i) of the Freedom of Information Law generally requires that "statistical or factual tabulations or data" found within "inter-agency or intra-agency materials" must be disclosed. On the other hand, if no such statistics or tabulations have been prepared, the Department would not be required to create a record containing those figures on your behalf.

I would conjecture that no records exist that deal with the ethnicity or nationality of the persons who have been the subjects of disciplinary proceedings. Again, if that is so, the Freedom of Information Law would not apply.

If there are no statistics containing the information sought, in the alternative and if the Department maintains them in a manner in which they can be retrieved, you might request copies of the determinations rendered by the individual in question. As I understand the nature of your inquiry, determinations in which there have been findings of guilt would be accessible under the Freedom of Information Law [see §87(2)(g)(iii)]. In situations in which an individual was found not guilty or where charges were dismissed, the name and other identifying details concerning the subject of the charges could in my opinion be withheld or deleted on the ground that disclosure would constitute "an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy" [see §87(2)(b)].

Lastly, I note that an agency may charge up to twenty-five cents per photocopy when making copies available.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Mr. Francis X. Stock
First Ward Trustee
Village of Lancaster
25 Sherborne Avenue
Lancaster, NY 14086-3115

Dear Trustee Stock:

I have received your letter of December 19, as well as the materials relating to it. In brief, in your capacity as a member of the Village of Lancaster Board of Trustees, you described a series of difficulties in obtaining records involving the use of a cellular telephone by a Village employee, an individual who serves as code enforcement officer and building inspector. While some aspects of the records sought have been disclosed, substantial portions have been withheld.

In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First, from my perspective, the Freedom of Information Law is intended to enable the public to request and obtain accessible records. Further, it has been held that accessible records should be made equally available to any person, without regard to status or interest [see e.g., Burke v. Yudelson, 368 NYS 2d 779, aff'd 51 AD 2d 673, 378 NYS 2d 165 (1976) and M. Farbman & Sons v. New York City, 62 NY 2d 75 (1984)]. Nevertheless, if it is clear that records are requested in the performance of one's official duties, the request might not be viewed as having been made under the Freedom of Information Law. In such a situation, if a request is reasonable, and in the absence of a board rule or policy to the contrary, I believe that a mayor or member of the board should not generally be required to resort to the Freedom of Information Law in order to seek or obtain records.

However, viewing the matter from a more technical perspective, one of the functions of a public body involves acting collectively, as an entity. A board of trustees, as the governing body of a public corporation, generally acts by means of motions carried by an affirmative vote of a majority of its total membership (see General Construction Law, §41). In my view, in most instances, a board, including a mayor, member acting unilaterally, without the consent or approval of a majority of the total membership of the board, has the same rights as those accorded to a member of the public, unless there is some right conferred upon a board member by means of law or rule. In such a case, a member seeking records could presumably be treated in the same manner as the public generally.

Second, pursuant to the regulations promulgated by the Committee on Open Government (21 NYCRR Part 1401), each agency is required to designate one or more persons as "records access officer." The records access officer has the duty of coordinating an agency's response to requests, and requests should ordinarily be sent to that person. As I understand the matter, the Village Clerk is the records access officer, and it is his responsibility, therefore, to coordinate Village's response to requests for records. I note that the Village's request form includes the following as a possible response: "Record is Not maintained by this officer." Assuming that the Clerk is the only person designated by the Board of Trustees as records access officer, I believe that his duties would involve all Village records, and not only those in his physical possession.

I point out, too, that the Freedom of Information Law provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies are required to respond to requests. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

"Each entity subject to the provisions of this article, within five business days of the receipt of a written request for a record reasonably described, shall make such record available to the person requesting it, deny such request in writing or furnish a written acknowledgement of the receipt of such request and a statement of the approximate date when such request will be granted or denied..."

If neither a response to a request nor an acknowledgement of the receipt of a request is given within five business days, or if an agency delays responding for an unreasonable time after it acknowledges that a request has been received, a request may, in my opinion, be considered to have been constructively denied. In such a circumstance, I believe that the denial may be appealed in accordance with §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law. That provision states in relevant part that:

"...any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive, or governing body, who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

In addition, it has been held that when an appeal is made but a determination is not rendered within ten business days of the receipt of the appeal as required under §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, the appellant has exhausted his or her administrative remedies and may initiate a challenge to a constructive denial of access under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Rules [Floyd v. McGuire, 87 AD 2d 388, appeal dismissed 57 NY 2d 774 (1982)].

Third, as a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law, and the introductory language of §87(2) refers to the capacity to withhold "records or portions thereof" that fall within the scope of the grounds for denial that follow. In my opinion, the phrase quoted in the preceding sentence indicates that a single record may be both accessible or deniable in whole or in part. I believe that the quoted phrase also imposes an obligation on agency officials to review records sought, in their entirety, to determine which portions, if any, may justifiably be withheld.

In my view, two of the grounds for denial may be relevant to an analysis of rights of access to the records in question.

Section 87(2)(g) states that an agency may withhold records that:

"are inter-agency or intra-agency materials which are not:

- i. statistical or factual tabulations or data;
- ii. instructions to staff that affect the public;
- iii. final agency policy or determinations; or
- iv. external audits, including but not limited to audits performed by the comptroller and the federal government..."

It is noted that the language quoted above contains what in effect is a double negative. While inter-agency or intra-agency materials may be withheld, portions of such materials consisting of statistical or factual information, instructions to staff that affect the public, final agency policy or determinations or external audits must be made available, unless a different ground for denial could appropriately be asserted. Concurrently, those portions of inter-agency or intra-agency materials that are reflective of opinion, advice, recommendation and the like could in my view be withheld.

If the records are generated by the Village, I believe that they could be characterized as intra-agency materials. Nevertheless, in view of their content, they would apparently consist solely of statistical or factual information accessible under §87(2)(g)(i) unless another basis for denial applies. As such, §87(2)(g) would not, in my opinion, serve as a basis for denial. If the bills were generated by a telephone company, an entity outside of government that is not an agency, §87(2)(g) would not apply.

The other ground for denial of relevance is §87(2)(b), which permits an agency to withhold records to the extent that disclosure would constitute "an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy."

Although the standard concerning privacy is flexible and may be subject to conflicting interpretations, the courts have provided substantial direction regarding the privacy of public employees. It is clear that public employees enjoy a lesser degree of privacy than others, for it has been found in various contexts that public employees are required to be more accountable than others.

Trustee Francis X. Stock

With regard to records pertaining to public employees, the courts have found that, as a general rule, records that are relevant to the performance of a public employee's official duties are available, for disclosure in such instances would result in a permissible rather than an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy [see e.g., Farrell v. Village Board of Trustees, 372 NYS 2d 905 (1975); Gannett Co. v. County of Monroe, 59 AD 2d 309 (1977), aff'd 45 NY 2d 954 (1978); Sinicropi v. County of Nassau, 76 AD 2d 838 (1980); Geneva Printing Co. and Donald C. Hadley v. Village of Lyons, Sup. Ct., Wayne Cty., March 25, 1981; Montes v. State, 406 NYS 2d 664 (Court of Claims, 1978); Powhida v. City of Albany, 147 AD 2d 236 (1989); Scaccia v. NYS Division of State Police, 530 NYS 2d 309, 138 AD 2d 50 (1988); Steinmetz v. Board of Education, East Moriches, Sup. Ct., Suffolk Cty., NYLJ, Oct. 30, 1980); Capital Newspapers v. Burns, 67 NY 2d 562 (1986)]. Conversely, to the extent that records are irrelevant to the performance of one's official duties, it has been found that disclosure would indeed constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy [see e.g., Matter of Wool, Sup. Ct., Nassau Cty., NYLJ, Nov. 22, 1977].

When a public officer or employee uses a telephone in the course of his or her official duties, records involving the use of the telephone would, in my opinion, be relevant to the performance of that person's official duties. On that basis, I do not believe that disclosure would result in an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy with respect to an officer or employee serving as a government official.

Since phone bills often list the numbers of callers or the person called, the time and length of calls and the charges, it has been contended by some that disclosure of the phone numbers might result in an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy, not with respect to a public employee, but rather with respect to the person who called a public employee or the recipient of a call made by a public employee.

There is but one decision of which I am aware that deals with the issue. In Wilson v. Town of Islip, one of the categories of the records sought involved bills involving the use of cellular telephones. In that decision, it was found that:

"The petitioner requested that the respondents provide copies of the Town of Islip's cellular telephone bills for 1987, 1988 and 1989. The court correctly determined that the respondents complied with this request by producing the summary pages of the bills showing costs incurred on each of the cellular phones for the subject period. The petitioner never specifically requested any further or more detailed information with respect to the telephone bills. In view of the information disclosed in the summary pages, which indicated that the amounts were not excessive, it was fair and reasonable for the respondents to conclude that they were fully complying with the petitioner's request" [578 NYS 2d 642, 643, 179 AD 2d 763 (1992)].

The foregoing represents the entirety of the Court's decision regarding the matter; there is no additional analysis of the issue. I believe, however, that a more detailed analysis is required to deal adequately with the matter.

When phone numbers appear on a bill, those numbers do not necessarily indicate who in fact was called or who picked up the receiver in response to a call. Therefore, an indication of the phone number would disclose nothing regarding the nature of a conversation. Further, even though the numbers may be disclosed, nothing in the Freedom of Information Law would require an individual to indicate the nature of a conversation. In short, I believe that the holding in Wilson is conclusory in nature and lacks a substantial analysis of the issue.

This is not to suggest, however, that the numbers appearing on every phone bill must be disclosed in every instance. Exceptions to the general rule of disclosure might arise if, for example, a telephone is used to contact recipients of public assistance or persons seeking certain health services. It has been advised in the past that if a government employee contacts those classes of persons as part of the employee's primary ongoing and routine duties, there may be grounds for withholding phone numbers listed on a bill. For instance, disclosure of numbers called by a caseworker who phones applicants for or recipients of public assistance might identify those who were contacted. In my view, the numbers could likely be deleted in that circumstance to protect against an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy due to the status of those contacted. Similarly, if a law enforcement official phones informants, disclosure of the numbers might endanger an individual's life or safety, and the numbers might justifiably be deleted pursuant to §87(2)(f) of the Freedom of Information Law.

In my opinion, a person serving as code enforcement officer or building inspector does not likely engage in calls analogous to the caseworker or law enforcement official, for the numbers appearing on a bill could not be used to identify a class of individuals in conjunction with a certain characteristic.

The only situation in which a deletion would appear to be justified would involve a clearly personal call, i.e., to or from the employee's home. In that circumstance, assuming that the employee reimburses the Village for the cost of the call, the number might properly be deleted. If there is no reimbursement, it must be assumed, in my opinion, that the call was made or received in the performance of one's official duties.

Other items, such as the time and duration of calls, must be disclosed in every instance, even if the number could be withheld. Those items would indicate how a public employee uses time on the job, a matter clearly relevant to the performance of his official duties. If calls are made at times off the job, disclosure might indicate an inappropriate use of the phone and, therefore, would be a matter of public concern.

In one of the decisions cited earlier, Capital Newspapers, supra, the State's highest court determined that the public has the right to obtain records indicating the days and dates of sick leave claimed by a police officer, for the public has economic and safety reasons for acquiring the records. For similar reasons, I believe that the law requires disclosure of records indicating the time or extent of use of a phone by a public employee. In that decision, the Court found that the Freedom of Information Law:

"affords all citizens the means to obtain information concerning the day-to-day functioning of the state and local government thus providing the electorate with sufficient information to 'make intelligent, informed choices with respect to both the direction and scope of governmental activities' and with an effective tool for exposing waste, negligence or abuse on the part of government officers" (id. at 566).

Lastly, I agree with the Village's contention that is not required to obtain records from the phone company. It is required, however, to disclose records in its possession a manner consistent with the Freedom of Information Law.

In an effort to enhance compliance with and understanding of the Freedom of Information Law, copies of this opinion will be forwarded to Village officials.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Dear Mr. Hinckson:

I have received your letter of December 20 and the materials attached to it. You have sought assistance in relation to an unanswered appeal sent on November 30 relating to a denial of your request for records of the Department of Correctional Services. Your request involves an attempt to know whether the name of a certain correction officer "is held in the files as a guard accused of inappropriate behavior." It is your view that the information sought is available based on the decision rendered in Faulkner v. DelGiaccio [529 NYS2d 255 (1988)].

In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First, although you cited §89(5)(c)(2) of the Freedom of Information Law concerning your appeal, the applicable provision is §89(4)(a), which states in relevant part that:

I note that it has been held that if an agency fails to determine an appeal within ten business days of its receipt, the appellant may consider the appeal to have been denied and may initiate a proceeding for judicial review of the denial under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Law and Rules [see Floyd, cite]

Second, notwithstanding the foregoing, as I understand the situation, it is likely that the record or records of your interest may be withheld.

As a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law.

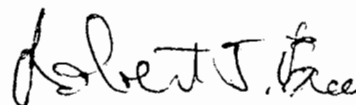

Relevant under the circumstances is §87(2)(a), which pertains to records that "are specifically exempted from disclosure by state or federal statute." One such statute is §50-a of the Civil Rights Law. In brief, that statute provides that personnel records of police and correction officers that are used to evaluate performance toward continued employment or promotion are confidential. It has been found that the exemption from disclosure conferred by §50-a of the Civil Rights Law "was designed to limit access to said personnel records by criminal defense counsel, who used the contents of the records, including unsubstantiated and irrelevant complaints against officers, to embarrass officers during cross-examination" [Capital Newspapers v. Burns, 67 NY 2d 652, 568 (1986)].

In another decision, which dealt with unsubstantiated complaints against correction officers, the Court of Appeals held that the purpose of §50-a "was to prevent the release of sensitive personnel records that could be used in litigation for purposes of harassing or embarrassing correction officers" [Prisoners' Legal Services v. NYS Department of Correctional Services, 73 NY 2d 26, 538 NYS 2d 190, 191 (1988)]. Additionally, when allegations or charges of misconduct have not yet been determined or did not result in disciplinary action, the records relating to such allegations may, in my view, be withheld, for disclosure would result in an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy pursuant to §87 (2)(b), [see e.g., Prisoners' Legal Services, supra; also Herald Company v. School District of City of Syracuse, 430 NYS 2d 460 (1980)]. Therefore, to the extent that charges have not been determined are dismissed or allegations are found to be without merit, I believe that the records related to and including such charges or allegations may be withheld.

Lastly, I believe that the decision rendered in Faulkner, supra, in neither controlling nor precedential. That case involved records of the Commission of Correction, which is not subject to §50-a of the Civil Rights Law. Further, it was decided prior to the holding of the State's highest court in Prisoners Legal Services.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Robert J. Freeman

Dear Mr. Barber:

I have received your letter of December 21. You have sought assistance in relation to your unanswered requests for records of the New York City Department of Probation.

In this regard, the Freedom of Information Law provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies must respond to requests and appeals. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

If neither a response to a request nor an acknowledgement of the receipt of a request is given within five business days, or if an agency delays responding for an unreasonable time after it acknowledges that a request has been received, a request may, in my opinion, be considered to have been constructively denied. In such a circumstance, I believe that the denial may be appealed in accordance with §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law. That provision states in relevant part that:

explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

In addition, it has been held that when an appeal is made but a determination is not rendered within ten business days of the receipt of the appeal as required under §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, the appellant has exhausted his or her administrative remedies and may initiate a challenge to a constructive denial of access under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Rules [Floyd v. McGuire, 87 AD 2d 388, appeal dismissed 57 NY 2d 774 (1982)].

Lastly, since you referred to a waiver of fees, I point out that there are provisions in the federal Freedom of Information Act, which applies only to federal agencies, dealing with fee waivers. There are, however, no such provisions in the New York Freedom of Information Law, and it has been held that an agency may charge its established fees in accordance with that statute, even when a request is made by an indigent inmate [see Whitehead v. Morgenthau, 552 NYS2d 518 (1990)].

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Dear Mr. Brooks:

I have received your letter of December 17, which reached this office on December 28. You have sought assistance in relation to unanswered requests for records of the Office of the Kings County District Attorney.

In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First, the Freedom of Information Law provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies must respond to requests and appeals. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

"Each entity subject to the provisions of this article, within five business days of the receipt of a written request for a record reasonably described, shall make such record available to the person requesting it, deny such request in writing or furnish a written acknowledgement of the receipt of such request and a statement of the approximate date when such request will be granted or denied..."

If neither a response to a request nor an acknowledgement of the receipt of a request is given within five business days, or if an agency delays responding for an unreasonable time after it acknowledges that a request has been received, a request may, in my opinion, be considered to have been constructively denied. In such a circumstance, I believe that the denial may be appealed in accordance with §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law. That provision states in relevant part that:

Mr. Luther Brooks

"...any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive, or governing body, who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

In addition, it has been held that when an appeal is made but a determination is not rendered within ten business days of the receipt of the appeal as required under §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, the appellant has exhausted his or her administrative remedies and may initiate a challenge to a constructive denial of access under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Rules [Floyd v. McGuire, 87 AD 2d 388, appeal dismissed 57 NY 2d 774 (1982)].

Second, as a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law. Since I am unaware of the contents of all of the records in which you are interested, or the effects of their disclosure, I cannot offer specific guidance. Nevertheless, the following paragraphs will review the provisions that may be significant in determining rights of access to the records in question.

In considering the records falling within the scope of your request, relevant is a recent decision by the Court of Appeals concerning "complaint follow up reports" prepared by police officers and police officers' memo books in which it was held that a denial of access based on their characterization as intra-agency materials would be inappropriate.

The provision at issue, §87(2)(g) of the Freedom of Information Law, enables an agency to withhold records that:

"are inter-agency or intra-agency materials which are not:

- i. statistical or factual tabulations or data;
- ii. instructions to staff that affect the public;
- iii. final agency policy or determinations; or
- iv. external audits, including but not limited to audits performed by the comptroller and the federal government..."

It is noted that the language quoted above contains what in effect is a double negative. While inter-agency or intra-agency materials may be withheld, portions of such materials consisting of statistical or factual information, instructions to staff that affect the public, final agency policy or determinations or external audits must be made available, unless a different ground for denial could appropriately be asserted. Concurrently, those portions of inter-agency or intra-agency materials that are reflective of opinion, advice, recommendation and the like could in my view be withheld.

In its analysis of the matter, the decision states that:

"...Although the term 'factual data' is not defined by statute, the meaning of the term can be discerned from the purpose underlying the intra-agency exemption, which is 'to protect the deliberative process of the government by ensuring that persons in an advisory role [will] be able to express their opinions freely to agency decision makers' (Matter of Xerox Corp. v. Town of Webster, 65 NY2d 131, 132 [quoting Matter of Sea Crest Constr. Corp. v. Stubing, 82 AD2d 546, 549]). Consistent with this limited aim to safeguard internal government consultations and deliberations, the exemption does not apply when the requested material consists of 'statistical or factual tabulations or data' (Public Officers Law 87(2)(g)(i). Factual data, therefore, simply means objective information, in contrast to opinions, ideas, or advice exchanged as part of the consultative or deliberative process of government decision making (see, Matter of Johnson Newspaper Corp. v. Stainkamp, 94 AD2d 825, 827, affd on op below, 61 NY2d 958; Matter of Miracle Mile Assocs. v. Yudelson, 68 AD2d 176, 181-182).

"However, the Police Department argues that any witness statements contained in the reports, in particular, are not 'factual' because there is no assurance of the statements' accuracy and reliability. We decline to read such a reliability requirement into the phrase 'factual data', as the dissent would have us do, and conclude that a witness statement constitutes factual data insofar as it embodies a factual account of the witness's observations. Such a statement, moreover, is far removed from the type of internal government exchange sought to be protected by the intra-agency exemption (see, Matter of Ingram v. Axelrod, 90 AD2d 568, 569 [ambulance records, list of interviews, and reports of interviews available under FOIL as 'factual data']). By contrast, any impressions, recommendations, or opinions recorded in the complaint follow-up report would not constitute factual data and would be exempt from disclosure. The holding herein is only that these reports are not categorically exempt as intra-agency material. Indeed, the Police Department is entitled to withhold complaint follow-up reports, or specific portions thereof, under any other applicable exemption, such as the law-enforcement exemption or the public-safety exemption, as long as the requisite particularized showing is made" [Gould, Scott and DeFelice v. New York City Police Department, 89 NY2d 267, 276-277 (1996); emphasis added by the Court].

Based on the foregoing, the agency could not claim that the complaint reports can be withheld in their entirety on the ground that they constitute intra-agency materials. However, the Court was careful to point out that other grounds for denial might apply in consideration of those records, as well as others that you requested.

For instance, of potential significance is §87(2)(b) of the Freedom of Information Law, which permits an agency to withhold records or portions thereof when disclosure would constitute "an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy". That provision might be applicable relative to the deletion of identifying details in a variety of situations, i.e., where a record identifies a confidential source or a witness, for example.

Often the most relevant provision concerning access to records maintained by law enforcement agencies is §87(2)(e), which permits an agency to withhold records that:

"are compiled for law enforcement purposes and which, if disclosed, would:

- i. interfere with law enforcement investigations or judicial proceedings;
- ii. deprive a person of a right to a fair trial or impartial adjudication;

iii. identify a confidential source or disclose confidential information relating to a criminal investigation; or

iv. reveal criminal investigative techniques or procedures, except routine techniques and procedures."

In my view, the foregoing indicates that records compiled for law enforcement purposes can only be withheld to the extent that disclosure would result in the harmful effects described in sub- paragraphs (i) through (iv) of §87(2)(e).

Another possible ground for denial is §87(2)(f), which permits withholding to the extent that disclosure "would endanger the life or safety of any person". The capacity to withhold on that basis is dependent upon the facts and circumstances concerning an event.

Lastly, in a decision concerning a request for records maintained by the office of a district attorney that would ordinarily be exempted from disclosure under the Freedom of Information Law, it was held that "once the statements have been used in open court, they have lost their cloak of confidentiality and are available for inspection by a member of the public" [see Moore v. Santucci, 151 AD 2d 677, 679 (1989)]. Based upon that decision, it appears that records introduced into evidence or disclosed during a public judicial proceeding should be available. However, in the same decision, it was also found that:

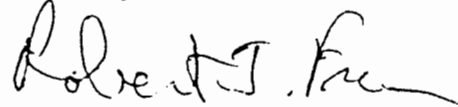

"...if the petitioner or his attorney previously received a copy of the agency record pursuant to an alternative discovery device and currently possesses the copy, a court may uphold an agency's denial of the petitioner's request under the FOIL for a duplicate copy as academic. However, the burden of proof rests with the agency to demonstrate that the petitioner's specific requests are moot. The respondent's burden would be satisfied upon proof that a copy of the requested record was previously furnished to the petitioner or his counsel in the absence of any allegation, in evidentiary form, that the copy was no longer in existence. In the event the petitioner's request for a copy of a specific record is not moot, the agency must furnish another copy upon payment of the appropriate fee...unless the requested record falls squarely within the ambit of 1 of the 8 statutory exemptions" (id., 678).

The Court in Moore also specified that an agency "is not required to make available for inspection or copying any suppression hearing or trial transcripts of a witness' testimony in its possession, because the transcripts are court records, not agency records" (id. at 680).

Inv. J. M. Cassalia
Police Investigator
Town of Manlius Police Dept.
1 Elmbrook Drive West
Manlius, NY 13014

Dear Investigator Cassalia:

I have received your letter of December 23. You have questioned whether you must disclose written requests made to gain access to the "level three sub-directory" maintained pursuant to the Sex Offender Registration Act, which is also known as "Megan's Law." You referred to a requirement in the Act that written requests include "biographical data, and a specific reason for viewing."

By way of background, pursuant to §168-l(6)(c) of the Act, "[i]f the risk of repeat offense is high and there exists a threat to the public safety, such sex offender shall be deemed a 'sexually violent predator' and a level three designation shall be given to such sex offender." That provision describes information to be maintained about level three sex offenders, indicates that the information "shall also be provided in the subdirectory established" by the Act, and that, "notwithstanding any other provision of law, such information shall, upon request, be made available to the public."

When there is a request for the subdirectory, which is distributed to police departments pursuant to §168-q of the Act, that provision states that those departments "shall require that a person in writing express a purpose in order to have access to the subdirectory and such department shall maintain these requests." Based on the foregoing, while there is no requirement that a police department obtain "biographical data" from a person seeking access to the subdirectory, the Act requires that a request be made in writing indicating the reason for the request. Having spoken with a representative of the Division of Criminal Justice Services, the reason for a request need not be specific. Personal interest, curiosity, or, in the case of the news media, news gathering, would be sufficient expressions of purposes for gaining access.

With respect to your question, I believe that identifying details pertaining to persons who seek access to the subdirectory may be withheld.

As a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law.

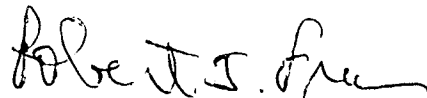

In view of the content of the subdirectory, it is likely in my view that many of those submitting requests would be victims of a sex offense, family members related to those persons, women, and parents of children who may want to ascertain whether sex offenders reside near their residences, schools or other locations that members of the public may frequent. In short, from my perspective, it is simply nobody's business that an individual has expressed an interest in the subdirectory, irrespective of that person's reason for gaining access.

In conjunction with the foregoing, two of the grounds for denial are pertinent. Section 87(2)(b) permits an agency to withhold records insofar as disclosure would constitute "an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy"; §87(2)(f) authorizes an agency to deny access to records to the extent that disclosure "would endanger the life or safety of any person." I believe that either of those provisions would justify a police department's denial of access to those portions of written requests that might identify applicants for the subdirectory.

I note that when records are accessible under the Freedom of Information Law, it has been held that they must be made equally available to any person, regardless of one's status or interest [see M. Farbman & Sons v. New York City Health and Hosps. Corp., 62 NY 2d 75 (1984) and Burke v. Yudelson, 368 NYS 2d 779, aff'd 51 AD 2d 673, 378 NYS 2d 165 (1976)]. That being so, if the identities of those requesting the subdirectory were accessible, they would be available to any person, including level three sex offenders. That being so, again, it is my opinion that names or other identifying details regarding persons who submit requests for the subdirectory may be withheld.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Robert J. Freeman

Stormville, NY 12582-0010

Dear Mr. Washington:

I have received your letter of December 7, which reached this office on December 31. You have sought assistance in relation to unanswered requests for records of the Office of the Albany County District Attorney.

In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First, the Freedom of Information Law provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies must respond to requests and appeals. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

"Each entity subject to the provisions of this article, within five business days of the receipt of a written request for a record reasonably described, shall make such record available to the person requesting it, deny such request in writing or furnish a written acknowledgement of the receipt of such request and a statement of the approximate date when such request will be granted or denied..."

If neither a response to a request nor an acknowledgement of the receipt of a request is given within five business days, or if an agency delays responding for an unreasonable time after it acknowledges that a request has been received, a request may, in my opinion, be considered to have been constructively denied. In such a circumstance, I believe that the denial may be appealed in accordance with §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law. That provision states in relevant part that:

Mr. John Washington

"...any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive, or governing body, who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

In addition, it has been held that when an appeal is made but a determination is not rendered within ten business days of the receipt of the appeal as required under §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, the appellant has exhausted his or her administrative remedies and may initiate a challenge to a constructive denial of access under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Rules [Floyd v. McGuire, 87 AD 2d 388, appeal dismissed 57 NY 2d 774 (1982)].

Second, as a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law. Since I am unaware of the contents of all of the records in which you are interested, or the effects of their disclosure, I cannot offer specific guidance. Nevertheless, the following paragraphs will review the provisions that may be significant in determining rights of access to the records in question.

In considering the records falling within the scope of your request, relevant is a decision by the Court of Appeals concerning "complaint follow up reports" which are also known as DD5's, prepared by police officers and police officers' memo books in which it was held that a denial of access based on their characterization as intra-agency materials would be inappropriate.

The provision at issue, §87(2)(g) of the Freedom of Information Law, enables an agency to withhold records that:

"are inter-agency or intra-agency materials which are not:

- i. statistical or factual tabulations or data;
- ii. instructions to staff that affect the public;
- iii. final agency policy or determinations; or
- iv. external audits, including but not limited to audits performed by the comptroller and the federal government..."

It is noted that the language quoted above contains what in effect is a double negative. While inter-agency or intra-agency materials may be withheld, portions of such materials consisting of statistical or factual information, instructions to staff that affect the public, final agency policy or determinations or external audits must be made available, unless a different ground for denial could appropriately be asserted. Concurrently, those portions of inter-agency or intra-agency materials that are reflective of opinion, advice, recommendation and the like could in my view be withheld.

In its analysis of the matter, the decision states that:

"...we note that one court has suggested that complaint follow-up reports are exempt from disclosure because they constitute nonfinal intra-agency material, irrespective of whether the information contained in the reports is 'factual data' (see, Matter of Scott v. Chief Medical Examiner, 179 AD2d 443, 444, supra citing Public Officers Law §87(2)(g)). However, under a plain reading of §87(2)(g), the exemption for intra-agency material does not apply as long as the material falls within any one of the provision's four enumerated exceptions. Thus, intra-agency documents that contain 'statistical or factual tabulations or data' are subject to FOIL disclosure, whether or not embodied in a final agency policy or determination (see, Matter of Farbman & Sons v. New York City Health & Hosp. Corp., 62 NY2d 75, 83, supra; Matter of MacRae v. Dolce, 130 AD2d 577)...

"However, the Police Department argues that any witness statements contained in the reports, in particular, are not 'factual' because there is no assurance of the statements' accuracy and reliability. We decline to read such a reliability requirement into the phrase 'factual data', as the dissent would have us do, and conclude that a witness statement constitutes factual data insofar as it embodies a factual account of the witness's observations. Such a statement, moreover, is far removed from the type of internal government exchange sought to be protected by the intra-agency exemption (see, Matter of Ingram v. Axelrod, 90 AD2d 568, 569 [ambulance records, list of interviews, and reports of interviews available under FOIL as 'factual data']). By contrast, any impressions, recommendations, or opinions recorded in the complaint follow-up report would not constitute factual data and would be exempt from disclosure. The holding herein is only that these reports are not categorically exempt as intra-agency material. Indeed, the Police Department is entitled to withhold complaint follow-up reports, or specific portions thereof, under any other applicable exemption, such as the law-enforcement exemption or the public-safety exemption, as long as the requisite particularized showing is made" [Gould, Scott and DeFelice v. New York City Police Department, 89 NY2d 267, 276-277 (1996); emphasis added by the Court].

Based on the foregoing, the agency could not claim that the complaint reports can be withheld in their entirety on the ground that they constitute intra-agency materials. However, the Court was careful to point out that other grounds for denial might apply in consideration of those records, as well as others that you requested.

For instance, of potential significance is §87(2)(b) of the Freedom of Information Law, which permits an agency to withhold records or portions thereof when disclosure would constitute "an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy". That provision might be applicable relative to the deletion of identifying details in a variety of situations, i.e., where a record identifies a confidential source or a witness, for example.

Often the most relevant provision concerning access to records maintained by law enforcement agencies is §87(2)(e), which permits an agency to withhold records that:

- "are compiled for law enforcement purposes and which, if disclosed, would:
 - i. interfere with law enforcement investigations or judicial proceedings;
 - ii. deprive a person of a right to a fair trial or impartial adjudication;
 - iii. identify a confidential source or disclose confidential information relating to a criminal investigation; or
 - iv. reveal criminal investigative techniques or procedures, except routine techniques and procedures."

In my view, the foregoing indicates that records compiled for law enforcement purposes can only be withheld to the extent that disclosure would result in the harmful effects described in sub- paragraphs (i) through (iv) of §87(2)(e).

Another possible ground for denial is §87(2)(f), which permits withholding to the extent that disclosure "would endanger the life or safety of any person". The capacity to withhold on that basis is dependent upon the facts and circumstances concerning an event.

Lastly, in a decision concerning a request for records maintained by the office of a district attorney that would ordinarily be exempted from disclosure under the Freedom of Information Law, it was held that "once the statements have been used in open court, they have lost their cloak of confidentiality and are available for inspection by a member of the public" [see Moore v. Santucci,

Mr. John Washington

151 AD 2d 677, 679 (1989)]. Based upon that decision, it appears that records introduced into evidence or disclosed during a public judicial proceeding should be available. However, in the same decision, it was also found that:

"...if the petitioner or his attorney previously received a copy of the agency record pursuant to an alternative discovery device and currently possesses the copy, a court may uphold an agency's denial of the petitioner's request under the FOIL for a duplicate copy as academic. However, the burden of proof rests with the agency to demonstrate that the petitioner's specific requests are moot. The respondent's burden would be satisfied upon proof that a copy of the requested record was previously furnished to the petitioner or his counsel in the absence of any allegation, in evidentiary form, that the copy was no longer in existence. In the event the petitioner's request for a copy of a specific record is not moot, the agency must furnish another copy upon payment of the appropriate fee...unless the requested record falls squarely within the ambit of 1 of the 8 statutory exemptions" (id., 678).

The Court in Moore also specified that an agency "is not required to make available for inspection or copying any suppression hearing or trial transcripts of a witness' testimony in its possession, because the transcripts are court records, not agency records" (id. at 680).

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Mr. Jeffrey H. Greenfield

[REDACTED]

Dear Mr. Greenfield:

I have received your letter of December 23 in which you raised questions relating to the Freedom of Information and Open Meetings Laws.

You referred initially to the acknowledgement of the receipt of your request for records by Martha Krisel, Village Attorney for the Village of Rockville Centre. Although you indicated that correspondence was attached, no materials were included with your letter. Nevertheless, you asked "what legal time obligation the Village has to complete the FOIL request other than just sending an acknowledgement."

In this regard, the Freedom of Information Law provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies must respond to requests. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

"Each entity subject to the provisions of this article, within five business days of the receipt of a written request for a record reasonably described, shall make such record available to the person requesting it, deny such request in writing or furnish a written acknowledgement of the receipt of such request and a statement of the approximate date when such request will be granted or denied..."

While an agency must grant access to records, deny access or acknowledge the receipt of a request within five business days, when such acknowledgement is given, there is no precise time period within which an agency must grant or deny access to records. The time needed to do so may be dependent upon the volume of a request, the possibility that other requests have been made, the necessity to conduct legal research, the search and retrieval techniques used to locate the records and the like. In short, when an agency acknowledges the receipt of a request because more than five business days may be needed to grant or deny a request, so long as it provides an approximate date indicating when the request will be granted or denied, and that date is reasonable in view of the attendant circumstances, I believe that the agency would be acting in compliance with law.

Next, you wrote that you are "somewhat confused as to whether inter-agency and intra-agency materials are subject to disclosure under FOIL." The contents of those records determine the extent to which they must be disclosed. Specifically, §87(2)(g) of the Freedom of Information Law permits an agency to withhold records that:

"are inter-agency or intra-agency materials which are not:

- i. statistical or factual tabulations or data;
- ii. instructions to staff that affect the public;
- iii. final agency policy or determinations; or
- iv. external audits, including but not limited to audits performed by the comptroller and the federal government..."

It is noted that the language quoted above contains what in effect is a double negative. While inter-agency or intra-agency materials may be withheld, portions of such materials consisting of statistical or factual information, instructions to staff that affect the public, final agency policy or determinations or external audits must be made available, unless a different ground for denial could appropriately be asserted. Concurrently, those portions of inter-agency or intra-agency materials that are reflective of opinion, advice, recommendation and the like could in my view be withheld.

Lastly, "when a quorum of the Board is present for a political meeting and a notice is given for that meeting", you asked whether "that then constitute[s] a public Village meeting necessitating the minutes to be included with the official Village minutes and approved at a subsequent meeting."

"Political" meetings are generally outside the scope of the Open Meetings Law and the requirements imposed by that statute relating to minutes. Section 108 of the Open Meetings Law exempts from its provisions "deliberations of political committees, conferences and caucuses." Further, §108(2)(b) states that:

"for purposes of this section, the deliberations of political committees, conferences and caucuses means a private meeting of members of the senate or assembly of the state of New York, or the legislative body of a county, city, town or village, who are members or adherents of the same political party, without regard to (i) the subject matter under discussion, including discussions of public business, (ii) the majority or minority status of such political committees, conferences and caucuses or (iii) whether such political committees, conferences and caucuses invite staff or guests to participate in their deliberations..."

Mr. Jeffrey H. Greenfield

Based on the foregoing, in general, either the majority or minority party members of a legislative body may conduct closed political caucuses, either during or separate from meetings of the public body.

It is also noted that, even when the Open Meetings Law clearly applies, there is no requirement see that minutes be approved. Nevertheless, as a matter of practice or policy, many public bodies approve minutes of their meetings. In the event that minutes have not been approved, to comply with the Open Meetings Law, it has consistently been advised that minutes be prepared and made available within two weeks in accordance with §106 (3), and that if the minutes have not been approved, they may be marked "unapproved", "draft" or "non-final", for example. By so doing within the requisite time limitations, the public can generally know what transpired at a meeting; concurrently, the public is effectively notified that the minutes are subject to change.

I hope that the foregoing serves to clarify your understanding of the Freedom of Information and Open Meetings Laws and that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Dear Mr. Thomas:

I have received your letter in which you sought guidance in using the Freedom of Information Law to obtain certain court records.

In this regard, the Freedom of Information Law, the statute within the advisory jurisdiction of the Committee on Open Government, is applicable to agency records. Section 86(3) of that statute defines the term "agency" to include:

"any state or municipal department, board, bureau, division, commission, committee, public authority, public corporation, council, office or other governmental entity performing a governmental or proprietary function for the state or any one or more municipalities thereof, except the judiciary or the state legislature."

In turn, §86(1) defines the term "judiciary" to mean:

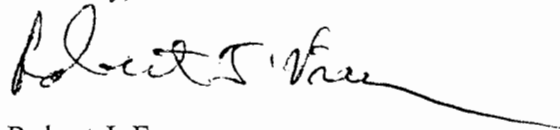

"the courts of the state, including any municipal or district court, whether or not of record."

Based on the provisions quoted above, the courts and court records are not subject to the Freedom of Information Law. This is not to suggest that court records are not generally available to the public, for other provisions of law (see e.g., Judiciary Law, §255) may grant broad public access to those records. It is recommended that a request for court records be directed to the clerk of the court in which the proceeding was conducted, citing an applicable provision of law as the basis for your request.

Dear Mr. Nevarez:

I have received your letter of December 17, which reached this office on December 28. You have sought assistance in relation to unanswered requests for records of the Office of the Bronx County District Attorney.

In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First, the Freedom of Information Law provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies must respond to requests and appeals. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

"Each entity subject to the provisions of this article, within five business days of the receipt of a written request for a record reasonably described, shall make such record available to the person requesting it, deny such request in writing or furnish a written acknowledgement of the receipt of such request and a statement of the approximate date when such request will be granted or denied..."

If neither a response to a request nor an acknowledgement of the receipt of a request is given within five business days, or if an agency delays responding for an unreasonable time after it acknowledges that a request has been received, a request may, in my opinion, be considered to have been constructively denied. In such a circumstance, I believe that the denial may be appealed in accordance with §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law. That provision states in relevant part that:

"...any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive, or governing body, who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

In addition, it has been held that when an appeal is made but a determination is not rendered within ten business days of the receipt of the appeal as required under §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, the appellant has exhausted his or her administrative remedies and may initiate a challenge to a constructive denial of access under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Rules [Floyd v. McGuire, 87 AD 2d 388, appeal dismissed 57 NY 2d 774 (1982)].

Second, as a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law. Since I am unaware of the contents of all of the records in which you are interested, or the effects of their disclosure, I cannot offer specific guidance. Nevertheless, the following paragraphs will review the provisions that may be significant in determining rights of access to the records in question.

In considering the records falling within the scope of your request, relevant is a recent decision by the Court of Appeals concerning "complaint follow up reports" prepared by police officers and police officers' memo books in which it was held that a denial of access based on their characterization as intra-agency materials would be inappropriate.

The provision at issue, §87(2)(g) of the Freedom of Information Law, enables an agency to withhold records that:

"are inter-agency or intra-agency materials which are not:

- i. statistical or factual tabulations or data;
- ii. instructions to staff that affect the public;
- iii. final agency policy or determinations; or
- iv. external audits, including but not limited to audits performed by the comptroller and the federal government..."

It is noted that the language quoted above contains what in effect is a double negative. While inter-agency or intra-agency materials may be withheld, portions of such materials consisting of statistical or factual information, instructions to staff that affect the public, final agency policy or determinations or external audits must be made available, unless a different ground for denial could appropriately be asserted. Concurrently, those portions of inter-agency or intra-agency materials that are reflective of opinion, advice, recommendation and the like could in my view be withheld.

In its analysis of the matter, the decision states that:

"...Although the term 'factual data' is not defined by statute, the meaning of the term can be discerned from the purpose underlying the intra-agency exemption, which is 'to protect the deliberative process of the government by ensuring that persons in an advisory role [will] be able to express their opinions freely to agency decision makers' (Matter of Xerox Corp. v. Town of Webster, 65 NY2d 131, 132 [quoting Matter of Sea Crest Constr. Corp. v. Stubing, 82 AD2d 546, 549]). Consistent with this limited aim to safeguard internal government consultations and deliberations, the exemption does not apply when the requested material consists of 'statistical or factual tabulations or data' (Public Officers Law 87[2][g][i]. Factual data, therefore, simply means objective information, in contrast to opinions, ideas, or advice exchanged as part of the consultative or deliberative process of government decision making (see, Matter of Johnson Newspaper Corp. v. Stainkamp, 94 AD2d 825, 827, affd on op below, 61 NY2d 958; Matter of Miracle Mile Assocs. v. Yudelson, 68 AD2d 176, 181-182).

"However, the Police Department argues that any witness statements contained in the reports, in particular, are not 'factual' because there is no assurance of the statements' accuracy and reliability. We decline to read such a reliability requirement into the phrase 'factual data', as the dissent would have us do, and conclude that a witness statement constitutes factual data insofar as it embodies a factual account of the witness's observations. Such a statement, moreover, is far removed from the type of internal government exchange sought to be protected by the intra-agency exemption (see, Matter of Ingram v. Axelrod, 90 AD2d 568, 569 [ambulance records, list of interviews, and reports of interviews available under FOIL as 'factual data']). By contrast, any impressions, recommendations, or opinions recorded in the complaint follow-up report would not constitute factual data and would be exempt from disclosure. The holding herein is only that these reports are not categorically exempt as intra-agency material. Indeed, the Police Department is entitled to withhold complaint follow-up reports, or specific portions thereof, under any other applicable exemption, such as the law-enforcement exemption or the public-safety exemption, as long as the requisite particularized showing is made" [Gould, Scott and DeFelice v. New York City Police Department, 89 NY2d 267, 276-277 (1996); emphasis added by the Court].

Based on the foregoing, the agency could not claim that the complaint reports can be withheld in their entirety on the ground that they constitute intra-agency materials. However, the Court was careful to point out that other grounds for denial might apply in consideration of those records, as well as others that you requested.

For instance, of potential significance is §87(2)(b) of the Freedom of Information Law, which permits an agency to withhold records or portions thereof when disclosure would constitute "an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy". That provision might be applicable relative to the deletion of identifying details in a variety of situations, i.e., where a record identifies a confidential source or a witness, for example.

Often the most relevant provision concerning access to records maintained by law enforcement agencies is §87(2)(e), which permits an agency to withhold records that:

"are compiled for law enforcement purposes and which, if disclosed, would:

- i. interfere with law enforcement investigations or judicial proceedings;
- ii. deprive a person of a right to a fair trial or impartial adjudication;

- iii. identify a confidential source or disclose confidential information relating to a criminal investigation; or
- iv. reveal criminal investigative techniques or procedures, except routine techniques and procedures."

In my view, the foregoing indicates that records compiled for law enforcement purposes can only be withheld to the extent that disclosure would result in the harmful effects described in sub- paragraphs (i) through (iv) of §87(2)(e).

Another possible ground for denial is §87(2)(f), which permits withholding to the extent that disclosure "would endanger the life or safety of any person". The capacity to withhold on that basis is dependent upon the facts and circumstances concerning an event.

Lastly, in a decision concerning a request for records maintained by the office of a district attorney that would ordinarily be exempted from disclosure under the Freedom of Information Law, it was held that "once the statements have been used in open court, they have lost their cloak of confidentiality and are available for inspection by a member of the public" [see Moore v. Santucci, 151 AD 2d 677, 679 (1989)]. Based upon that decision, it appears that records introduced into evidence or disclosed during a public judicial proceeding should be available. However, in the same decision, it was also found that:

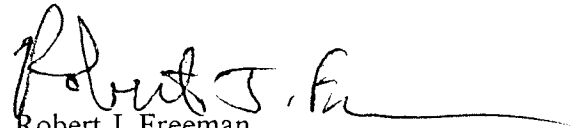

"...if the petitioner or his attorney previously received a copy of the agency record pursuant to an alternative discovery device and currently possesses the copy, a court may uphold an agency's denial of the petitioner's request under the FOIL for a duplicate copy as academic. However, the burden of proof rests with the agency to demonstrate that the petitioner's specific requests are moot. The respondent's burden would be satisfied upon proof that a copy of the requested record was previously furnished to the petitioner or his counsel in the absence of any allegation, in evidentiary form, that the copy was no longer in existence. In the event the petitioner's request for a copy of a specific record is not moot, the agency must furnish another copy upon payment of the appropriate fee...unless the requested record falls squarely within the ambit of 1 of the 8 statutory exemptions" (id., 678).

The Court in Moore also specified that an agency "is not required to make available for inspection or copying any suppression hearing or trial transcripts of a witness' testimony in its possession, because the transcripts are court records, not agency records" (id. at 680).

Dear Ms. Pew:

I have received your letter of December 30, as well as the correspondence attached to it. You have sought guidance in your efforts in gaining access to records of the Town of Brookhaven. Based on a review of the materials, I offer the following comments.

First, by way of background, §89(1) of the Freedom of Information Law requires the Committee on Open Government to promulgate regulations concerning the procedural implementation of that statute (21 NYCRR Part 1401). In turn, §87(1) requires the governing body of a public corporation to adopt rules and regulations consistent those promulgated by the Committee and with the Freedom of Information Law. Further, §1401.2 of the regulations provides in relevant part that:

"(a) The governing body of a public corporation and the head of an executive agency or governing body of other agencies shall be responsible for insuring compliance with the regulations herein, and shall designate one or more persons as records access officer by name or by specific job title and business address, who shall have the duty of coordinating agency response to public requests for access to records. The designation of one or more records access officers shall not be construed to prohibit officials who have in the past been authorized to make records or information available to the public from continuing to do so."

I am unaware of the number of records access officers designated by the Town Board. If there is one access officer for the Town, that person has the duty of coordinating responses to requests for records. For instance, if records are in possession of the Deputy Supervisor, the records access officer, as the "coordinator", would have the responsibility of ascertaining the nature of the records sought and reviewing them to determine rights of access or ensuring that the person in possession of the records discloses them to the extent required by law. If there is more than one records access officer, it is suggested that you determine the identity of the proper access officer or officers in relation to your request.

Second, the Freedom of Information Law provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies must respond to requests. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

"Each entity subject to the provisions of this article, within five business days of the receipt of a written request for a record reasonably described, shall make such record available to the person requesting it, deny such request in writing or furnish a written acknowledgement of the receipt of such request and a statement of the approximate date when such request will be granted or denied..."

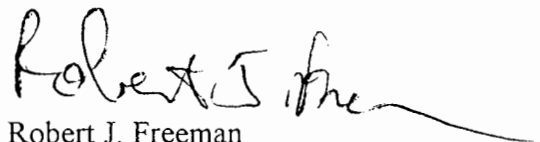

If neither a response to a request nor an acknowledgement of the receipt of a request is given within five business days, or if an agency delays responding for an unreasonable time after it acknowledges that a request has been received, a request may, in my opinion, be considered to have been constructively denied. In such a circumstance, I believe that the denial may be appealed in accordance with §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law. That provision states in relevant part that:

"...any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive, or governing body, who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

In addition, it has been held that when an appeal is made but a determination is not rendered within ten business days of the receipt of the appeal as required under §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, the appellant has exhausted his or her administrative remedies and may initiate a challenge to a constructive denial of access under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Rules [Floyd v. McGuire, 87 AD 2d 388, appeal dismissed 57 NY 2d 774 (1982)].

I hope that I have been of assistance.

[REDACTED]
[REDACTED]

Dear Ms. Witt:

I have received your letter of December 30 and the materials attached to it. You have sought assistance in obtaining records from the New York City Police Department.

In brief, as I understand the matter, you have requested records, particularly DD5's and memo book entries, relating to a series of complaints involving yourself and the families of two neighbors made at the 115th precinct in Queens. It appears that you have already acquired detailed information, for numerous requests include the date of a complaint, often the time within a two hour period, the complaint number, and the names of complainants and "alleged perpetrators." In another request, you sought all complaints filed against you at the 115th precinct during a period of nearly two years. You were informed in response to that request that the request was "too broad" and that you would need to supply dates and times, in addition to the precinct.

First, with respect to the request that was characterized as "too broad", among the issues is whether the request "reasonably described" the records sought as required by §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law. I point out that it has been held by the Court of Appeals that to deny a request on the ground that it fails to reasonably describe the records, an agency must establish that "the descriptions were insufficient for purposes of locating and identifying the documents sought" [Konigsberg v. Coughlin, 68 NY 2d 245, 249 (1986)].

The Court in Konigsberg found that the agency could not reject the request due to its breadth and also stated that:

"respondents have failed to supply any proof whatsoever as to the nature - or even the existence - of their indexing system: whether the Department's files were indexed in a manner that would enable the identification and location of documents in their possession (cf. National Cable Tel. Assn. v Federal Communications Commn., 479 F2d 183, 192 [Bazelon, J.] [plausible claim of nonidentifiability under Federal Freedom of Information Act, 5 USC section 552 (a) (3), may be presented where agency's indexing system was such that 'the requested documents could not be identified by retracing a path already trodden. It would have required a wholly new enterprise, potentially requiring a search of every file in the possession of the agency'])" (id. at 250).

In my view, whether a request reasonably describes the records sought, as suggested by the Court of Appeals, may be dependent upon the terms of a request, as well as the nature of an agency's filing or record-keeping system. In Konigsberg, it appears that the agency was able to locate the records on the basis of an inmate's name and identification number.

While I am unfamiliar with the record keeping systems of the Department, to extent that the records sought can be located with reasonable effort, I believe that the request would have met the requirement of reasonably describing the records. On the other hand, if the records are not maintained in a manner that permits their retrieval except by reviewing perhaps hundreds or even thousands of records individually in an effort to locate those falling within the scope of the request, to that extent, the request would not in my opinion meet the standard of reasonably describing the records. Based on the response, it appears that complaints may be located based on the precinct, the date and the time; it does not appear that complaints can be found on the basis of the names of those who are the subjects of the complaints. If that is so, the request would not, in my opinion, meet the requirement of reasonably describing the records.

The other requests that include substantial detail, i.e., those involving DD5's and police officers' memo book entries, would likely comply with the requirement that the records sought be reasonably described.

Second, as a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law. Since I am unaware of the contents of the records in which you are interested, or the effects of their disclosure, I cannot offer specific guidance. Nevertheless, the following paragraphs will review the provisions that may be significant in determining rights of access to the records in question.

In considering the records falling within the scope of your request, relevant is the decision by the Court of Appeals to which you referred concerning "complaint follow up reports", also known as DD5's, prepared by police officers and police officers' memo books in which it was held that a denial of access based on their characterization as intra-agency materials would be inappropriate.

The provision at issue, §87(2)(g) of the Freedom of Information Law, enables an agency to withhold records that:

"are inter-agency or intra-agency materials which are not:

- i. statistical or factual tabulations or data;
- ii. instructions to staff that affect the public;
- iii. final agency policy or determinations; or
- iv. external audits, including but not limited to audits performed by the comptroller and the federal government..."

It is noted that the language quoted above contains what in effect is a double negative. While inter-agency or intra-agency materials may be withheld, portions of such materials consisting of statistical or factual information, instructions to staff that affect the public, final agency policy or determinations or external audits must be made available, unless a different ground for denial could appropriately be asserted. Concurrently, those portions of inter-agency or intra-agency materials that are reflective of opinion, advice, recommendation and the like could in my view be withheld.

In its analysis of the matter, the decision states that:

"...Although the term 'factual data' is not defined by statute, the meaning of the term can be discerned from the purpose underlying the intra-agency exemption, which is 'to protect the deliberative process of the government by ensuring that persons in an advisory role [will] be able to express their opinions freely to agency decision makers' (Matter of Xerox Corp. v. Town of Webster, 65 NY2d 131, 132 [quoting Matter of Sea Crest Constr. Corp. v. Stubing, 82 AD2d 546, 549]). Consistent with this limited aim to safeguard internal government consultations and deliberations, the exemption does not apply when the requested material consists of 'statistical or factual tabulations or data' (Public Officers Law 87[2][g][i]). Factual data, therefore, simply means objective information, in contrast to opinions, ideas, or advice exchanged as part of the consultative or deliberative process of government decision making (see, Matter of Johnson Newspaper Corp. v. Stainkamp, 94 AD2d 825, 827, affd on op below, 61 NY2d 958; Matter of Miracle Mile Assocs. v. Yudelton, 68 AD2d 176, 181-182).

"Against this backdrop, we conclude that the complaint follow-up reports contain substantial factual information available pursuant to the provisions of FOIL. Sections of the report are devoted to such purely factual data as: the names, addresses, and physical descriptions of crime victims, witnesses, and perpetrators; a checklist that indicates whether the victims and witnesses have been interviewed and shown photos, whether crime scenes have been photographed and dusted for fingerprints, and whether neighborhood residents have been canvassed for information; and a blank space denominated 'details' in which the officer records the particulars of any action taken in connection with the investigation.

"However, the Police Department argues that any witness statements contained in the reports, in particular, are not 'factual' because there is no assurance of the statements' accuracy and reliability. We decline to read such a reliability requirement into the phrase 'factual data', as the dissent would have us do, and conclude that a witness statement constitutes factual data insofar as it embodies a factual account of the witness's observations. Such a statement, moreover, is far removed from the type of internal government exchange sought to be protected by the intra-agency exemption (see, Matter of Ingram v. Axelrod, 90 AD2d 568, 569 [ambulance records, list of interviews, and reports of interviews available under FOIL as 'factual data']). By contrast, any impressions, recommendations, or opinions recorded in the complaint follow-up report would not constitute factual data and would be exempt from disclosure. The holding herein is only that these reports are not categorically exempt as intra-agency material. Indeed, the Police Department is entitled to withhold complaint follow-up reports, or specific portions thereof, under any other applicable exemption, such as the law-enforcement exemption or the public-safety exemption, as long as the requisite particularized showing is made" [Gould, Scott and DeFelice v. New York City Police Department, 89 NY2d 267, 276-277 (1996); emphasis added by the Court].

Based on the foregoing, the agency could not claim that the complaint reports can be withheld in their entirety on the ground that they constitute intra-agency materials. However, the Court was careful to point out that other grounds for denial might apply in consideration of those records, as well as others that you requested.

For instance, of potential significance is §87(2)(b) of the Freedom of Information Law, which permits an agency to withhold records or portions thereof when disclosure would constitute "an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy". That provision might be applicable relative to the deletion of identifying details in a variety of situations, i.e., where a record identifies a confidential source or a witness, for example. It might also be cited in other circumstances in which, for example, records include intimate personal information or where a person is the subject of a complaint or allegation that was determined to be without merit.

Often the most relevant provision concerning access to records maintained by law enforcement agencies is §87(2)(e), which permits an agency to withhold records that:

"are compiled for law enforcement purposes and which, if disclosed, would:

- i. interfere with law enforcement investigations or judicial proceedings;
- ii. deprive a person of a right to a fair trial or impartial adjudication;
- iii. identify a confidential source or disclose confidential information relating to a criminal investigation; or
- iv. reveal criminal investigative techniques or procedures, except routine techniques and procedures."

In my view, the foregoing indicates that records compiled for law enforcement purposes can only be withheld to the extent that disclosure would result in the harmful effects described in sub- paragraphs (i) through (iv) of §87(2)(e).

Another possible ground for denial is §87(2)(f), which permits withholding to the extent that disclosure "would endanger the life or safety of any person". The capacity to withhold on that basis is dependent upon the facts and circumstances concerning an event.

Also of possible significance is §87(2)(a), which pertains to records that "are specifically exempted from disclosure by state or federal statute." One such statute, §160.50 of the Criminal Procedure Law, generally requires that records relating to charges that have been dismissed in favor of an accused be sealed. In those situations, the records would be exempted from disclosure.

Lastly, it is emphasized that the Freedom of Information Law pertains to existing records. Insofar as the records sought do not exist, that statute would not apply.

[REDACTED]

Dear Mr. Philippo:

I have received your letter of January 1. In conjunction with your review of opinions rendered by this office pertaining to access to adoption records and adoptees' original birth records, you have raised a series of questions.

First, you sought my opinion concerning the holding in Malowsky v. D'Elia [160 AD2d 798 (1990)], in which the court determined that what you characterized as adoption agencies "must yield to the strong policy considerations underlying FOIL." In this regard, I note that Malowsky dealt with a request for records apparently maintained by a county department of social services, which clearly is an "agency" as that term is defined in §86(3) of the Freedom of Information Law. Adoption agencies and other entities subject to §373-a of the Social Services Law are frequently not governmental in nature and, therefore, not subject to the Freedom of Information Law.

With respect to the Court's statement that you quoted, I see no inconsistency between the general thrust of the Freedom of Information Law and the decision. The former is intended to provide maximum access to government records; §373-a deals with particular records and creates what essentially is a special right of access to medical histories to the subjects of those records, so long as identifying details pertaining to the adoptees natural parents are "eliminated." The thrust of §373-a is analogous to both the Freedom of Information Law and the Personal Privacy Protection Law. Under both of those statutes, in general, an individual cannot invade his or her own privacy; however, both statutes include provisions designed to protect the privacy of others.

In a related vein, you asked whether the Personal Privacy Protection Law "would permit an adoptee to access his or her own birth, foster care, and adoption records." In my view, it would not. That statute pertains only to records maintained by state agencies; it does not apply to records of private entity, a unit of local government or a court. Further, insofar as the records at issue are maintained by state agencies, I note that §95(6)(a) specifies that the Personal Privacy Protection Law does not require a state agency to provide the subject of a record with "personal information to which he or she is specifically prohibited by statute from gaining access." Each of the records to which you referred is confidential by statute, and each of those statutes limits the circumstances under which the records may be disclosed. As such, I do not believe that the Personal Privacy Protection Law would serve to grant access to those records.

Lastly, you wrote that you "would like to know what guarantees the public has that the Department of Family Assistance (AKA Social Services) is accountable to the public." While I cannot respond in detail due to my lack of familiarity with the agency in question, I believe that all state agencies strenuously seek to comply with law.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Mr. Mitchell Kalwasinski
82-A-4795
Auburn Correctional Facility
135 State Street
Auburn, NY 13021

Dear Mr. Kalwasinski:

I have received your letter of January 4 in which you sought assistance in relation to unanswered requests for a variety of records. The records sought include medical records pertaining to yourself, grievances and complaints that you filed, including "any and all documents created as a result of" having filed those documents, and complaints and grievances filed by yourself and other inmates "alleging the denial of food by SHUD staff", as well as records created in relation to such complaints and grievances.

In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First, the Freedom of Information Law provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies must respond to requests. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

"Each entity subject to the provisions of this article, within five business days of the receipt of a written request for a record reasonably described, shall make such record available to the person requesting it, deny such request in writing or furnish a written acknowledgement of the receipt of such request and a statement of the approximate date when such request will be granted or denied..."

If neither a response to a request nor an acknowledgement of the receipt of a request is given within five business days, or if an agency delays responding for an unreasonable time after it acknowledges that a request has been received, a request may, in my opinion, be considered to have been constructively denied. In such a circumstance, I believe that the denial may be appealed in accordance with §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law. That provision states in relevant part that:

Mr. Mitchell Kalwasinski

"...any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive, or governing body, who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

In addition, it has been held that when an appeal is made but a determination is not rendered within ten business days of the receipt of the appeal as required under §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, the appellant has exhausted his or her administrative remedies and may initiate a challenge to a constructive denial of access under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Rules [Floyd v. McGuire, 87 AD 2d 388, appeal dismissed 57 NY 2d 774 (1982)].

As you may be aware, the person at the Department of Correctional Services designated to determine appeals is Anthony J. Annucci, Counsel to the Department.

Second, as a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law.

Since you cannot invade your own privacy, it appears that you have the right to gain access to medical records pertaining to yourself under both the Freedom of Information Law and §18 of the Public Health Law [see Mantica v. NYS Department of Health, 679 NYS2d 469, ___ AD2d ___ (1998)]. Similarly, I believe that you would have the right to review or obtain complaints or grievances that you submitted. With respect to grievances or complaints submitted by other inmates, I believe that any identifying details pertaining to those persons could be withheld on the ground that disclosure would constitute "an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy" pursuant to §87(2)(b).

Third, with respect to records created as a result of the grievances or complaints, again, personally identifiable details relating to inmates other than yourself could in my view be withheld to protect their privacy. In addition, records prepared by facility or Department staff would fall within the scope of §87(2)(g). That provision permits an agency to withhold records that:

"are inter-agency or intra-agency materials which are not:

- i. statistical or factual tabulations or data;
- ii. instructions to staff that affect the public;
- iii. final agency policy or determinations; or

Mr. Mitchell Kalwasinski

iv. external audits, including but not limited to audits performed by the comptroller and the federal government..."

It is noted that the language quoted above contains what in effect is a double negative. While inter-agency or intra-agency materials may be withheld, portions of such materials consisting of statistical or factual information, instructions to staff that affect the public, final agency policy or determinations or external audits must be made available, unless a different ground for denial could appropriately be asserted. Concurrently, those portions of inter-agency or intra-agency materials that are reflective of opinion, advice, recommendation and the like could in my view be withheld.

While I am unfamiliar with the contents of any such records, there may be other grounds for denial that may be pertinent. For instance, documentation might involve facility security, in which case §87(2)(f) may be relevant. That provision enables an agency to deny access to records insofar as disclosure "would endanger the life or safety of any person."

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Dear Mr. McAllister:

I have received your letter of January 4 and the correspondence attached to it. You have sought assistance in relation to your requests made under the Freedom of Information Act for records from ABC News and WINS, both of which are broadcast media in New York City.

In this regard, the statute that you cited, the federal Freedom of Information Act, applies only to records maintained by federal agencies. Similarly, the New York Freedom of Information Law, the statute within the advisory jurisdiction of the Committee on Open Government, pertains to agency records, and §86(3) of that statute defines the term "agency" to mean:

"any state or municipal department, board, bureau, division, commission, committee, public authority, public corporation, council, office or other governmental entity performing a governmental or proprietary function for the state or any one or more municipalities thereof, except the judiciary or the state legislature."

Based on the foregoing, the Freedom of Information Law pertains to records of entities of state and local government in New York. Neither the state nor the federal statutes would apply to records of private companies, such as those referenced in your letter.

FROM: Robert J. Freeman, Executive Director

Dear Mr. Kinney:

I have received your letter of January 6. In brief, you complained with respect to the treatment of a request for records made to the City Auburn and questioned the functions and performance of a variety of government officials and agencies.

In this regard, the Committee on Open Government is authorized to offer advice and opinions concerning public access to government records. As such, my comments will be limited to that issue.

With regard to the request, although you did not include information concerning the nature of the records sought, I point out that the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law.

Further, the Freedom of Information Law provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies must respond to a request. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

Mr. John Kinney

If any portion of the records sought has been withheld, if neither a response to a request nor an acknowledgement of the receipt of a request is given within five business days, or if an agency delays responding for an unreasonable time after it acknowledges that a request has been received, a request may, in my opinion, be considered to have been denied. In such a circumstance, I believe that the denial may be appealed in accordance with §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law. That provision states in relevant part that:

"...any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive, or governing body, who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

In addition, it has been held that when an appeal is made but a determination is not rendered within ten business days of the receipt of the appeal as required under §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, the appellant has exhausted his or her administrative remedies and may initiate a challenge to a constructive denial of access under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Rules [Floyd v. McGuire, 87 AD 2d 388, appeal dismissed 57 NY 2d 774 (1982)].

I hope that I have been of assistance.

[REDACTED]

Dear Mr. Sanchez:

I promised, please consider this to be a response to the question raised in your letter of January 4. If the Department of Records and Information Services (DORIS) possesses records of your interest, you asked whether you may seek those records under the Freedom of Information Law, despite its policy that "only a certified or authorized employee" may obtain such records.

In this regard, as I understand its relationship with the Office of the Queens County District Attorney and other agencies, one of the functions of DORIS involves serving essentially as a storehouse for the preservation of agencies' inactive records. If that is so, records kept by DORIS in that capacity would be in its physical custody but not its legal custody; legal custody and control would remain in the agencies that use DORIS facilities for storage. Therefore, if the Office of the District Attorney has sent records to DORIS for the purpose of storage, that agency would have the responsibility of dealing with a request for those records. My assumption is that a request made to DORIS would be forwarded to the agency that has legal custody of the records.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Ms. Deborah A. Taylor
Labor Relations Specialist

Potsdam, NY 13676

Dear Ms. Taylor:

I have received your letter of January 8, as well as the materials attached to it. You have sought an opinion concerning a denial of access by the Malone Central School District to a record requested by the Malone Federation of Teachers and by an employee of the District.

According to your letter, the record sought is a "private investigation report" prepared at the direction and expense of the District in the spring of 1994 by Brian McKee Investigations. The report pertains to "the behavior of Board of Education member Patrick R. White during a wrestling match he attended at a neighboring school district." The employee who made the request sought the report under the Personal Privacy Protection Law because he was interviewed as part of the investigation and believes that he has a right of access to the record. The District denied access on the basis of paragraphs (b) and (c) of §87(2) of the Freedom of Information Law.

In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First, the Personal Privacy Protection Law does not apply. That statute pertains only to state agencies and specifically excludes units of local government, such as school districts, from its coverage [see Personal Privacy Protection Law, §92(1) definition of "agency"].

Second, the correspondence indicates that the request was initially denied because the report "is not part of our school district records..." From my perspective, if the record was prepared for the District, it is a District record that falls within the scope of the Freedom of Information Law, irrespective of its physical location. That statute pertains to agency records, and a school district is clearly an "agency" as that term is defined in §86(3) of the Freedom of Information Law. Section 86(4) defines the term "record" expansively to include:

"any information kept, held, filed, produced, reproduced by, with or for an agency or the state legislature, in any physical form whatsoever including, but not limited to, reports, statements, examinations, memoranda, opinions, folders, files, books, manuals, pamphlets, forms, papers, designs, drawings, maps, photos, letters, microfilms, computer tapes or discs, rules, regulations or codes."

Since the report in question was commissioned by the District, even though it may have been prepared by a private company, the report in my view clearly constitutes a "record" subject to rights conferred by the Freedom of Information Law. Even if the report never came into the physical custody of the School District, because it was produced for the District, I believe that it is an agency record.

Third, with respect to rights of access, as a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law.

In the initial denial, it was contended that the report "is a confidential file between the attorney and client." As I understand the matter, Brian McKee Investigations was not retained as an attorney or to provide legal advice, but rather as an investigator. If that is so, there would have been no attorney-client relationship, and the assertion of confidentiality on that basis would have been misplaced.

The other ground for denial cited initially involves the protection of privacy. In that response and in the appeal, it was found that disclosure would constitute "an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy" in accordance with §87(2)(b). Although the standard concerning privacy is flexible and may be subject to conflicting interpretations, the courts have provided substantial direction regarding the privacy of public employees. It is clear that public employees enjoy a lesser degree of privacy than others, for it has been found in various contexts that public employees are required to be more accountable than others. Further, the courts have found that, as a general rule, records that are relevant to the performance of a public employee's official duties are available, for disclosure in such instances would result in a permissible rather than an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy [see e.g., Farrell v. Village Board of Trustees, 372 NYS 2d 905 (1975); Gannett Co. v. County of Monroe, 59 AD 2d 309 (1977), aff'd 45 NY 2d 954 (1978); Sinicropi v. County of Nassau, 76 AD 2d 838 (1980); Geneva Printing Co. and Donald C. Hadley v. Village of Lyons, Sup. Ct., Wayne Cty., March 25, 1981; Montes v. State, 406 NYS 2d 664 (Court of Claims, 1978); Powhida v. City of Albany, 147 AD 2d 236 (1989); Scaccia v. NYS Division of State Police, 530 NYS 2d 309, 138 AD 2d 50 (1988); Steinmetz v. Board of Education, East Moriches, Sup. Ct., Suffolk Cty., NYLJ, Oct. 30, 1980); Capital Newspapers v. Burns, 67 NY 2d 562 (1986)]. Conversely, to the extent that records are irrelevant to the performance of one's official duties, it has been found that disclosure would indeed constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy [see e.g., Matter of Wool, Sup. Ct., Nassau Cty., NYLJ, Nov. 22, 1977].

Ms. Deborah A. Taylor

Several of the decisions cited above, for example, Farrell, Sinicropi, Geneva Printing, Scaccia and Powhida, dealt with situations in which determinations indicating the imposition of some sort of disciplinary action pertaining to particular public employees were found to be available. However, when allegations or charges of misconduct have not yet been determined or did not result in disciplinary action, the records relating to such allegations may, according to case law, be withheld, for disclosure would result in an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy [see e.g., Herald Company v. School District of City of Syracuse, 430 NYS 2d 460 (1980)].

If there was no determination to the effect that the Board member engaged in misconduct, I believe the denial based upon considerations of privacy would have been consistent with law. Contrarily, insofar as a determination may have been made indicating that the Board member engaged in misconduct, portions of the report reflective of that finding and upon which the Board relied in reaching such a determination would likely be available. In that event, however, if those portions of the report otherwise available include personally identifiable details pertaining to others, such as students, witnesses, persons interviewed, etc., those details might justifiably be deleted to protect the privacy of those persons.

Lastly, the determination by the Superintendent also cited §87(2)(c), which enables an agency to withhold records insofar as disclosure "would impair present or imminent contract awards or collective bargaining negotiations." As I understand the matter, the conduct of a member of a Board of Education at a wrestling match would have nothing to do with the impairment of a contract or collective bargaining negotiations. If that is so, §87(2)(c) would be irrelevant.

I hope that the foregoing serves to enhance your understanding of the Freedom of Information Law and the Personal Privacy Protection Law and that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Robert J. Freeman
Executive Director

Mr. Lorin L. Reisner
Debevoise & Plimpton
875 Third Avenue
New York, NY 10022

Dear Mr. Reisner:

I have received your recent letter in which you requested an advisory opinion concerning a denial of access to a certain record by the Office of the Suffolk County District Attorney (the "District Attorney").

By way of background, you wrote that you represent a Long Island television station, News 12, which requested "a copy of a videotape played by the District Attorney in open court on November 4 at the trial of Robert Shulman in Suffolk County Criminal Court." You added that the proceeding is the first death penalty trial on Long Island since the reinstatement of capital punishment in New York. The videotape, according to your letter, "depicts images of the location at which the offenses that are the subject of the trial allegedly took place."

In denying the request, it was contended that "because this is a capital case...prudence dictates that we refrain from any action which the defendant may again allege, in the context of an appeal from a conviction, operated to deny his right to a fair trial", citing §87(2)(e)(ii) of the Freedom of Information Law. That provision, as you are aware, permits an agency to withhold records "compiled for law enforcement purposes" to the extent that disclosure would "deprive a person of a right to a fair trial or impartial adjudication..." You indicated that, following an appeal, the County Attorney sustained the denial, also citing §87(2)(e)(ii), and additionally suggesting that disclosure would frustrate the purpose of §160.50 of the Criminal Procedure Law ("CPL"). That statute provides, in brief, that when criminal charges against an accused are dismissed in his or her favor, the records relating to the matter become sealed.

From my perspective, based on the language of the Freedom of Information Law and its judicial interpretation, the videotape must be disclosed. In this regard, I offer the following comments.

As a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law.

The basis for denial cited by the District Attorney in response to both the request and the appeal, that disclosure might serve to deny the defendant his right to a fair trial, is, in my view, without merit. In my opinion, the purpose and intent of the exception involve the ability of a government agency to withhold records when premature disclosure would adversely impact a person's right to be treated fairly by those empowered to make determinations. The videotape was shown in open court to the jurors and any member of the public present in the courtroom on November 4, 1998, nearly three months ago. To suggest that disclosure of the videotape now, or at any time after having been presented to the jury, would in some way prejudice a defendant or "deprive" that person of a right to a fair trial is, in my opinion, contrary to the thrust of the exception.

Further, even when records might ordinarily be withheld under the Freedom of Information Law, it has been held that there is no basis for denial once the records have been presented in a public judicial proceeding. In Moore v. Santucci, a decision rendered by the Appellate Division, Second Department, the Court found that:

"...while statements of the petitioner, his codefendants and witnesses obtained by the respondent in the course of preparing a criminal case for trial are generally exempt from disclosure under FOIL (see, Matter of Knight v Gold, 53 AD2d 694, appeal dismissed 43 NY2d 841), once the statements have been used in open court, they have lost their cloak of confidentiality and are available for inspection by a member of the public" [151 AD2d 677,679 (1989)].

In short, by showing the videotape in open court, a public disclosure has already been made. Once that occurs, unless the record is later sealed, nothing in the Freedom of Information Law would serve to enable an agency to deny access to that record.

That principle appears to have been recognized in a separate but related proceeding. As you are aware, News 12 attempted to obtain the same videotape from the court, which denied the request "based on the court's concerns that the integrity of the evidence in question would be placed in jeopardy" (see People v. Shulman, Supreme Court, Suffolk County, NYLJ, December 24, 1998). Although the trial judge's refusal to provide the videotape was based on its fear that the tape, as evidentiary material, might in some way be damaged, he emphasized that:

"...there are other mechanisms which have already been confirmed by the court in that they could simply file a Foil request with the district attorney's office for a copy of the tape, and based on the appellate law, it's clear that the district attorney's office, if they have a copy, would have to turn it over to News 12...It seems to me that would be the appropriate way to proceed" (Transcript of Order by Hon. Arthur G. Pitts, pp. 5-6, November 6, 1998, County Court, Suffolk County).

In consideration of the foregoing, while the trial judge denied the request for the court's copy of the videotape based on concern for the physical integrity and security of the tape, he essentially recommended that a copy be sought from the District Attorney and recognized that a duplicate must be disclosed by the District Attorney in response to a request made under the Freedom of Information Law.

The suggestion offered by the County Attorney that disclosure would subvert the purpose of §160.50 of CPL in my view is contrary to common law, statutes, and centuries of history. If the possibility of a dismissal of charges against an accused served as a valid basis for withholding records prior to a dismissal, innumerable court records that have routinely been public prior to and during the pendency of judicial proceedings, such as records of indictments and arraignments, motion papers and other documentation, would be beyond public view. Additionally, a variety of other records that have been historically available and found to be accessible under the Freedom of Information Law, such as booking records, police blotter entries, mugshots and the like would arguably be removed from public rights of access if the County Attorney's contention has merit. In my opinion, it does not.

Lastly, the courts have consistently interpreted the Freedom of Information Law expansively. The Court of Appeals reiterated its general view of the intent of the Freedom of Information Law most recently in Gould v. New York City Police Department, stating that:

"To ensure maximum access to government records, the 'exemptions are to be narrowly construed, with the burden resting on the agency to demonstrate that the requested material indeed qualifies for exemption' (Matter of Hanig v. State of New York Dept. of Motor Vehicles, 79 N.Y.2d 106, 109, 580 N.Y.S.2d 715, 588 N.E.2d 750 see, Public Officers Law § 89[4][b]). As this Court has stated, '[o]nly where the material requested falls squarely within the ambit of one of these statutory exemptions may disclosure be withheld' (Matter of Fink v. Lefkowitz, 47 N.Y.2d, 567, 571, 419 N.Y.S.2d 467, 393 N.E.2d 463)" [89 NY2d 267, 275 (1996)].

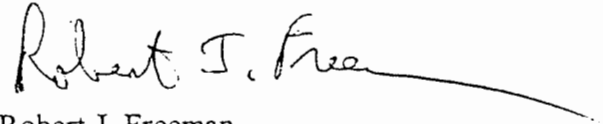

For the reasons expressed in the preceding commentary, I believe that the District Attorney is required to disclose the videotape sought by News 12.

In an effort to enhance compliance with and understanding of the Freedom of Information Law and to obviate the need to engage in litigation, copies of this opinion will be forwarded to the offices of the County Attorney and the District Attorney.

Ms. Carolyn Schurr
Counsel
Newsday
235 Pinelawn Road
Melville, NY 11747-4250

Dear Ms. Schurr:

I have received your correspondence of January 13 in which you sought an opinion concerning the Freedom of Information Law. You wrote that "Newsday reporters have recently had difficulties obtaining crime locations from the Nassau County Police Department." You added that "[i]n connection with a burglary-rape in Elmont...the Police Department stated that it was denying [Newsday] the crime location based upon Section 50-b of the Civil Rights Law."

From my perspective, portions of records indicating the locations of crimes have been historically available to the public and have implicitly been determined to be available under the Freedom of Information Law. In this regard, I offer the following comments.

As you are aware, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law.

In my view, police records indicating the location of crimes have historically been available as police blotter entries or as portions of equivalent records. The phrase "police blotter" is not specifically defined in any statute. It is my understanding that it is a term that has been used, in general, based upon custom and usage. The contents of what might be characterized as a police blotter may vary from one police department to another, and often police departments use different terms for records or reports analogous to police blotters. In Sheehan v. City of Binghamton [59 AD 2d 808 (1977)], it was determined that, based on custom and usage, a police blotter is a log or diary in which any event reported by or to a police department is recorded. The decision specified that a traditional police blotter contains no investigative information, but rather merely a summary of events or occurrences and that, therefore, it is accessible under the Freedom of Information Law. When a police blotter or other record is analogous to that described in Sheehan in terms of its contents, I believe that the public has the right to review it in its entirety.

If police blotters or records prepared for a similar purpose are more expansive than the traditional police blotter described in Sheehan, portions might be withheld, depending upon their contents and the effects of disclosure. For instance, a police blotter or equivalent record might include names of witnesses or victims, the disclosure of which might constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy [see §87(2)(b)] or even endanger one's life or safety [see §87(2)(f)]. However, those portions of the records indicating that an event occurred at a particular location, i.e., a crime, an automobile accident, etc., would be the kinds of items found to be clearly accessible.

The statute upon which the Police Department has relied to deny access would not be applicable in my opinion, for the disclosure of the location of an event would not identify the victim. Subdivision (1) of §50-b states that:

"The identity of any victim of a sex offense, as defined in article one hundred thirty or §255.25 of the penal law, shall be confidential. No report, paper, picture, photograph, court file or other documents, in the custody or possession of any public officer or employee, which identifies such victim shall be made available for public inspection. No such public officer or employee shall disclose any portion of any police report, court file, or other document, which tends to identify such a victim except as provided in subdivision two of this section."

When §50-b is pertinent, a record identifying the victim of a sex offense would be exempted from disclosure pursuant to §87(2)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law. Nevertheless, in this instance, if the location of the commission of the crime is disclosed, it would be impossible to identify the victim with any degree of certainty or accuracy. A victim of a rape that occurred at a particular location might have been a resident, a friend, a relative, a cleaning person, a meter reader or any other person performing some sort of function or providing a service at that location.

In short, I believe that the location of a crime is an item of information that has routinely been disclosed both prior to the enactment of and in accordance with the Freedom of Information Law. Further, revelation of the location would not, in my view, enable recipients of that information to ascertain the identity of the victim.

Lastly, it is emphasized that the burden of defending secrecy rests with the agency that denies access and that the Freedom of Information Law has consistently been construed expansively by the courts. The Court of Appeals expressed its general view of the intent of the Freedom of Information Law most recently in a decision focusing on a denial of access to records by another police department. In Gould v. New York City Police Department [87 NY 2d 267 (1996)], the Court determined that:

"To ensure maximum access to government records, the 'exemptions are to be narrowly construed, with the burden resting on the agency to demonstrate that the requested material indeed qualifies for exemption' (Matter of Hanig v. State of New York Dept. of Motor Vehicles, 79 N.Y.2d 106, 109, 580 N.Y.S.2d 715, 588 N.E.2d 750 see, Public Officers Law § 89[4][b]). As this Court has stated, '[o]nly where the material requested falls squarely within the ambit of one of these statutory exemptions may disclosure be withheld' (Matter of Fink v. Lefkowitz, 47 N.Y.2d, 567, 571, 419 N.Y.S.2d 467, 393 N.E.2d 463)" (id., 275).

Ms. Carolyn Schurr

Just as significant, the Court in Gould repeatedly specified that a categorical denial of access to records is inconsistent with the requirements of the Freedom of Information Law. In that case, the agency contended that complaint follow up reports could be withheld in their entirety on the ground that they fall within the exception regarding intra-agency materials, §87(2)(g), an exception separate from that cited in response to Newsday's request. The Court, however, wrote that: "Petitioners contend that because the complaint follow-up reports contain factual data, the exemption does not justify complete nondisclosure of the reports. We agree" (id., 276). The Court then stated as a general principle that "blanket exemptions for particular types of documents are inimical to FOIL's policy of open government" (id., 275). The Court also offered guidance to agencies and lower courts in determining rights of access and referred to several decisions it had previously rendered, directing that:

"...to invoke one of the exemptions of section 87(2), the agency must articulate 'particularized and specific justification' for not disclosing requested documents (Matter of Fink v. Lefkowitz, supra, 47 N.Y.2d, at 571, 419 N.Y.S.2d 467, 393 N.E.2d 463). If the court is unable to determine whether withheld documents fall entirely within the scope of the asserted exemption, it should conduct an in camera inspection of representative documents and order disclosure of all nonexempt, appropriately redacted material (see, Matter of Xerox Corp. v. Town of Webster, 65 N.Y.2d 131, 133, 490 N.Y.S. 2d, 488, 480 N.E.2d 74; Matter of Farbman & Sons v. New York City Health & Hosps. Corp., supra, 62 N.Y.2d, at 83, 476 N.Y.S.2d 69, 464 N.E.2d 437)" (id.).

In an effort to resolve the matter, a copy of this opinion will be forwarded to Nassau County Police Department.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Hon. Victor K. Hamilton II
Councilman
Town of Bath
132 West Morris Street
Bath, NY 14810

Dear Councilman Hamilton:

I have received your letter of January 5. In your capacity as a member of the Bath Town Board, you described a situation in which an employee of the Town accused of misconduct reached an agreement with the Town prior to any determination of charges that you prepared against him. Since the matter was considered in executive session, you asked whether there are "criteria, law, regulation, etc...stating what must be kept in executive session and is illegal to release to the public" (emphasis yours).

In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First, I note that the Open Meetings Law is permissive. Although a public body may enter into an executive session in accordance with the provisions of §105(1) of the Law, there is no obligation to do so. Therefore, even when there is a valid basis for discussing an issue during an executive session, a public body is not required to consider the matter in private.

Moreover, in a case in which the issue was whether discussions occurring during an executive session held by a school board could be considered "privileged", it was held that "there is no statutory provision that describes the matter dealt with at such a session as confidential or which in any way restricts the participants from disclosing what took place" (Runyon v. Board of Education, West Hempstead Union Free School District No. 27, Supreme Court, Nassau County, January 29, 1987). In my opinion, although information may be obtained during an executive session properly held, a claim of confidentiality can only be based upon a statute that specifically confers or requires confidentiality. Unless a statute prohibits disclosure, I know of no law that would preclude a member of a public body from disclosing information acquired during an executive session.

While there may be no prohibition against disclosure of information acquired during executive sessions withheld, the foregoing is not intended to suggest such disclosures would be uniformly appropriate or ethical. Obviously, the purpose of an executive session is to enable members of public bodies to deliberate, to speak freely and to develop strategies in situations in which some degree of secrecy is permitted. Inappropriate disclosures could work against the interests of a public body as a whole and the public generally. The unilateral disclosure by a member of a public body might serve to defeat or circumvent the principles under which those bodies are intended to operate.

Historically, I believe that public bodies were created in order to reach collective determinations, determinations that better reflect various interests within a community than a single decision maker could reach alone. Members of boards need not in my opinion be unanimous in every instance; on the contrary, they should represent disparate points of view which, when conveyed as part of a deliberative process, lead to fair and representative decision making. Nevertheless, notwithstanding distinctions in points of view, the decision or consensus of the majority of a public body should in my opinion generally be recognized and honored by those members who may dissent. Disclosures made contrary to or in the absence of consent by the majority could result the revelation of litigation strategy, in unwarranted invasions of personal privacy, impairment of collective bargaining negotiations or even interference with criminal or other investigations. In those kinds of situations; even though there may be no statute that prohibits disclosure, release of information could be damaging to individuals and the functioning of government.

In the context of the situation that you described, while I believe that the terms of the agreement between the employee and the Town must be disclosed, charges or allegations that were never formally proven, in my opinion, may be withheld. Here I direct your attention to the Freedom of Information Law, which pertains to access to records and states, in part, that an agency may withhold records insofar as disclosure would result in "an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy" [see §87(2)(b)].

Although the standard concerning privacy is flexible and may be subject to conflicting interpretations, the courts have provided substantial direction regarding the privacy of public employees. It is clear that public employees enjoy a lesser degree of privacy than others, for it has been found in various contexts that public employees are required to be more accountable than others. Further, the courts have found that, as a general rule, records that are relevant to the performance of a public employee's official duties are available, for disclosure in such instances would result in a permissible rather than an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy [see e.g., Farrell v. Village Board of Trustees, 372 NYS 2d 905 (1975); Gannett Co. v. County of Monroe, 59 AD 2d 309 (1977), aff'd 45 NY 2d 954 (1978); Sinicropi v. County of Nassau, 76 AD 2d 838 (1980); Geneva Printing Co. and Donald C. Hadley v. Village of Lyons, Sup. Ct., Wayne Cty., March 25, 1981; Montes v. State, 406 NYS 2d 664 (Court of Claims, 1978); Powhida v. City of Albany, 147 AD 2d 236 (1989); Scaccia v. NYS Division of State Police, 530 NYS 2d 309, 138 AD 2d 50 (1988); Steinmetz v. Board of Education, East Moriches, Sup. Ct., Suffolk Cty., NYLJ, Oct. 30, 1980); Capital Newspapers v. Burns, 67 NY 2d 562 (1986)]. Conversely, to the extent that records are irrelevant to the performance of one's official duties, it has been found that disclosure would indeed constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy [see e.g., Matter of Wool, Sup. Ct., Nassau Cty., NYLJ, Nov. 22, 1977].

Several of the decisions cited above, for example, Farrell, Sinicropi, Geneva Printing, Scaccia and Powhida, dealt with situations in which determinations indicating the imposition of some sort of disciplinary action pertaining to particular public employees were found to be available. However, when allegations or charges of misconduct have not yet been determined or did not result in disciplinary action, the records relating to such allegations may, according to case law, be withheld, for disclosure would result in an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy [see e.g., Herald Company v. School District of City of Syracuse, 430 NYS 2d 460 (1980)].

If there was no determination to the effect that the employee engaged in misconduct, I believe that a denial of access to the charges based upon considerations of privacy would be consistent with law. Nevertheless, there are several decisions indicating that the terms of settlement agreements reached in lieu of disciplinary proceedings must generally be disclosed [see Geneva Printing, supra; Western Suffolk BOCES v. Bay Shore Union Free School District, Appellate Division, Second Department, NYLJ, May 22, 1998, ___ AD2d ___; Anonymous v. Board of Education for Mexico Central School District, 616 NYS2d 867 (1994); and Paul Smith's College of Arts and Science v. Cuomo, 589 NYS2d 106, 186 AD2d 888 (1992)].

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Mr. Thomas J. Walsh

[REDACTED]

Dear Mr. Walsh:

I have received your letter of January 10. You referred to an "internal memo" prepared by the attorney for the Hicksville Union Free School District Board of Education and indicated that you requested that document and other communications between the law firm retained by the District and District officials concerning a certain project. Your request was denied on the ground that "the records requested are specifically exempted from disclosure by federal or state statute." You have sought my views on the matter.

In this regard, I offer the following comments.

As a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law.

The first ground for denial, §87(2)(a), pertains to records that are "specifically exempted from disclosure by state or federal statute." For more than a century, the courts have found that legal advice given by a municipal attorney to his or her client, i.e., a board of education, is privileged when it is prepared in conjunction with an attorney-client relationship [see e.g., People ex rel. Updyke v. Gilon, 9 NYS 243, 244 (1889); Pennock v. Lane, 231 NYS 2d 897, 898, (1962); Bernkrant v. City Rent and Rehabilitation Administration, 242 NYS 2d 752 (1963), aff'd 17 App. Div. 2d 392]. As such, I believe that a municipal attorney may engage in a privileged relationship with municipal officials and that records prepared in conjunction with an attorney-client relationship are considered privileged under §4503 of the Civil Practice Law and Rules. Further, since the enactment of the Freedom of Information Law, it has been found that records may be withheld when the privilege can appropriately be asserted when the attorney-client privilege is read in conjunction with §87(2)(a) of the Law [see e.g., Mid-Boro Medical Group v. New York City Department of Finance, Sup. Ct.,

Bronx Cty., NYLJ, December 7, 1979; Steele v. NYS Department of Health, 464 NY 2d 925 (1983)]. Similarly, the work product of an attorney may be confidential under §3101 of the Civil Practice Law and Rules.

In a discussion of the parameters of the attorney-client relationship and the conditions precedent to its initiation, it has been held that:

"In general, 'the privilege applies only if (1) the asserted holder of the privilege is or sought to become a client; (2) the person to whom the communication was made (a) is a member of the bar of a court, or his subordinate and (b) in connection with this communication relates to a fact of which the attorney was informed (a) by his client (b) without the presence of strangers (c) for the purpose of securing primarily either (i) an opinion on law or (ii) legal services (iii) assistance in some legal proceeding, and not (d) for the purpose of committing a crime or tort; and (4) the privilege has been (a) claimed and (b) not waived by the client'" [People v. Belge, 59 AD 2d 307, 399 NYS 2d 539, 540 (1977)].

Based on the foregoing, assuming that the privilege has not been waived, and that records consist of legal advice or opinion sought by District officials and provided by counsel to the client, such records would be confidential pursuant to §4503 of the Civil Practice Law and Rules and, therefore, exempted from disclosure under §87(2)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law.

Another ground for denial of potential significance, §87(2)(g), permits an agency to withhold records that:

"are inter-agency or intra-agency materials which are not:

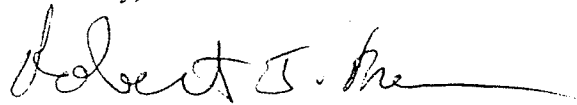

- i. statistical or factual tabulations or data;
- ii. instructions to staff that affect the public;
- iii. final agency policy or determinations; or
- iv. external audits, including but not limited to audits performed by the comptroller and the federal government..."

It is noted that the language quoted above contains what in effect is a double negative. While inter-agency or intra-agency materials may be withheld, portions of such materials consisting of statistical or factual information, instructions to staff that affect the public, final agency policy or determinations or external audits must be made available, unless a different ground for denial could appropriately be asserted. Concurrently, those portions of inter-agency or intra-agency materials that are reflective of opinion, advice, recommendation and the like could in my view be withheld.

Mr. Wilbert Hockenbury
Erie County Correctional Facility
11581 Western Avenue
Alden, NY 14004

Dear Mr. Hockenbury:

I have received your letter of January in which you sought assistance in relation to a request made under the Freedom of Information Law.

According to your letter, you requested a "property receipt" from the Buffalo Police Department pertaining the arrest of a "John Doe". You indicated that you are the John Doe and that you provided personal information sufficient to establish your identity. As I understand the matter, you had received no response to the request as of the date of your letter to this office.

In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First, the Freedom of Information Law provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies must respond to requests for records. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

"Each entity subject to the provisions of this article, within five business days of the receipt of a written request for a record reasonably described, shall make such record available to the person requesting it, deny such request in writing or furnish a written acknowledgement of the receipt of such request and a statement of the approximate date when such request will be granted or denied..."

If neither a response to a request nor an acknowledgement of the receipt of a request is given within five business days, or if an agency delays responding for an unreasonable time after it acknowledges that a request has been received, a request may, in my opinion, be considered to have been constructively denied. In such a circumstance, I believe that the denial may be appealed in accordance with §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law. That provision states in relevant part that:

Mr. Wilbert Hockenbury

"...any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive, or governing body, who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

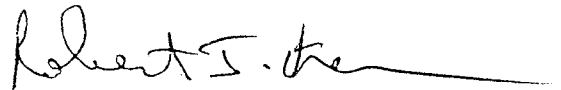

In addition, it has been held that when an appeal is made but a determination is not rendered within ten business days of the receipt of the appeal as required under §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, the appellant has exhausted his or her administrative remedies and may initiate a challenge to a constructive denial of access under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Rules [Floyd v. McGuire, 87 AD 2d 388, appeal dismissed 57 NY 2d 774 (1982)].

Second, as a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law. -

From my perspective, assuming that you provided adequate information to establish your identity, the record sought would be accessible. In short, none of the grounds for denial would, in my opinion, serve to enable the agency to deny access to that record.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Robert J. Freeman

Dear Mr. Cheung:

I have received your letter of January 6 in which you sought advice concerning the Freedom of Information Law.

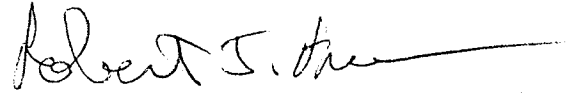

First, you asked how you can know "what exactly is in [your] criminal files" in order that you "can know what specifically to request through F.O.I.L." In my view, there may be no method of knowing the exact contents of a file or the names or titles of each and every document within the file. Nevertheless, the Freedom of Information Law does not require that specific records be requested. By way of background, when the Freedom of Information Law was initially enacted in 1974, it required that an applicant seek "identifiable" records. That standard often resulted in difficulties, for applicants for records were often unaware of the particular records sought and therefore could not identify them. Nonetheless, when the Freedom of Information Law was revised, the standard for requesting records was altered. Since 1978, §89(3) has stated that an applicant must "reasonably describe" the records sought. I point out that it has been held that a request reasonably describes the records when the agency can locate and identify the records based on the terms of a request, and that to deny a request on the ground that it fails to reasonably describe the records, an agency must establish that "the descriptions were insufficient for purposes of locating and identifying the documents sought" [Konigsberg v. Coughlin, 68 NY 2d 245, 249 (1986)].

Second, of potential relevance to the matter is the decision rendered in Moore v. Santucci [151 AD 2d 677 (1989)], in which it was held that if records have been disclosed during a public proceeding, they are generally available under the Freedom of Information Law. In that decision, it was also found, however, that an agency need not make available records that had been previously disclosed to the applicant or that person's attorney, unless there is an allegation "in evidentiary form, that the copy was no longer in existence."

Dear Mr. Lashley:

I have received your letter of January 8 and the correspondence attached to it.

You referred to alleged failures on the part of officials of the Department of Correctional Services to respond to your letters relating to the shock incarceration program. Based on a review of the correspondence, I offer the following comments.

First, your letters to Department officials seek answers to a series of questions. In this regard, I know of no provision of law that would require those officials to answer your questions. While they may do so, in my opinion, there is no obligation to do so.

Similarly, although you did not refer to the Freedom of Information Law, the principle would be the same. While that statute generally requires the disclosure of records, it does not require that agencies supply answers to questions. Further, §89(3) states in relevant part that the Freedom of Information Law pertains to existing records, and that an agency is not required to create or prepare a new record in response to a request for information.

Lastly, in his letter of February 12, Deputy Commissioner Bartlett, in my view, either answered your questions or provided the means to obtain the answers on your own by referring to Article 26-A of the Correction Law, §§865 to 867. If you have not yet reviewed those provisions, it is suggested that you do so, for they include much of the information that you seek.

[REDACTED]

Dear Ms. Muszak:

I have received your letter of January 11 and the correspondence attached to it. You complained that Robert R. Snashall, Chairman of the Workers' Compensation Board, "did not reply to [your] inquiry within 5 (five) business days, as required by the law."

Based on a review of your letter to Mr. Snashall, your inquiry, in my view, did not constitute a request made under the Freedom of Information Law. Consequently, I do not believe that he would have been required to respond within any particular time period.

In this regard, first, I note that the title of the Freedom of Information Law may be somewhat misleading, for it is not a vehicle that requires agencies to provide information per se; rather, it requires agencies to disclose records to the extent provided by law. As such, while an agency official may choose to answer questions or to provide information by responding to questions, those steps would represent actions beyond the scope of the requirements of the Freedom of Information Law.

Second, the Freedom of Information Law pertains to existing records. Section 89(3) of that statute states in part that an agency need not create a record in response to a request. Therefore, if, for example, an agency does not maintain records containing the information sought, there would be no obligation to prepare new records on behalf of an applicant.

In short, your to Mr. Snashall consisted of questions, not a request for records. While he could choose to respond, I do not believe that he is required to do so, for the inquiries, in my opinion, cannot be equated with a request for records under the Freedom of Information Law.

Dear Supervisor Doyle:

I appreciate receipt of a copy of your letter of January 26 addressed to Mr. Howard Ostrander.

One element of the letter indicates that an appeal made under the Freedom of Information Law may be made to this office. In this regard, the Committee on Open Government is authorized to issue advice and opinions. The Committee is not empowered to determine appeals or otherwise compel an agency to grant or deny access to records.

The provision dealing with the right to appeal a denial of access, §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, states in relevant part that:

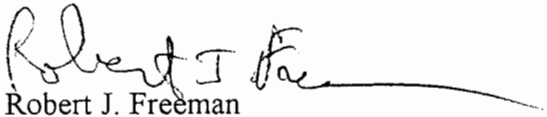

"any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive or governing body of the entity, or the person thereof designated by such head, chief executive, or governing body, who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought. In addition, each agency shall immediately forward to the committee on open government a copy of such appeal and the ensuing determination thereon."

Enclosed are copies of the regulations promulgated by the Committee on Open Government, which deal with the procedural aspects of the Freedom of Information Law, and model regulations designed to enable agencies to adopt appropriate procedural rules.

Mr. Steven L. Fornal

Dear Mr. Fornal:

I have received your letter of January 11 and the materials relating to it. In brief, it is your belief that a portion of a tape recording of a meeting of the Town of Rochester Planning Board was erased, and you have sought my views on the matter.

First, the Freedom of Information Law pertains to agency records, and §86(4) of the Law defines the term "record" expansively to include:

"any information kept, held, filed, produced, reproduced by, with or for an agency or the state legislature, in any physical form whatsoever including, but not limited to, reports, statements, examinations, memoranda, opinions, folders, files, books, manuals, pamphlets, forms, papers, designs, drawings, maps, photos, letters, microfilms, computer tapes or discs, rules, regulations or codes."

Based on the foregoing, when a public body prepares or maintains a tape recording of a meeting, the tape would constitute a "record" that falls within the coverage of the Freedom of Information Law.

As a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law. In my view, a tape recording of an open meeting is accessible, for any person could have been present, and none of the grounds for denial would apply. Moreover, there is case law indicating that a tape recording of an open meeting is accessible for listening and/or copying under the Freedom of Information Law [see Zaleski v. Board of Education of Hicksville Union Free School District, Supreme Court, Nassau County, NYLJ, December 27, 1978].

Second, of possible relevance to the matter is the "Local Government Records Law", Article 57-A of the Arts and Cultural Affairs Law, which deals with the management, custody, retention and disposal of records by local governments. For purposes of those provisions, §57.17(4) of the Arts and Cultural Affairs Law defines "record" to mean:

"...any book, paper, map, photograph, or other information-recording device, regardless of physical form or characteristic, that is made, produced, executed, or received by any local government or officer thereof pursuant to law or in connection with the transaction of public business. Record as used herein shall not be deemed to include library materials, extra copies of documents created only for convenience of reference, and stocks of publications."

With respect to the retention and disposal of records, §57.25 of the Arts and Cultural Affairs Law states in relevant part that:

"1. It shall be the responsibility of every local officer to maintain records to adequately document the transaction of public business and the services and programs for which such officer is responsible; to retain and have custody of such records for so long as the records are needed for the conduct of the business of the office; to adequately protect such records; to cooperate with the local government's records management officer on programs for the orderly and efficient management of records including identification and management of inactive records and identification and preservation of records of enduring value; to dispose of records in accordance with legal requirements; and to pass on to his successor records needed for the continuing conduct of business of the office...

2. No local officer shall destroy, sell or otherwise dispose of any public record without the consent of the commissioner of education. The commissioner of education shall, after consultation with other state agencies and with local government officers, determine the minimum length of time that records need to be retained. Such commissioner is authorized to develop, adopt by regulation, issue and distribute to local governments retention and disposal schedules establishing minimum retention periods..."

In view of the foregoing, records cannot be destroyed without the consent of the Commissioner of Education, and local officials cannot destroy or dispose of records until the minimum period for the retention of the records has been reached. I note that the provisions relating to the retention and disposal of records are carried out by a unit of the State Education Department, the State Archives and Records Administration, which has developed schedules that indicate minimum retention periods for various records. I believe that tape recordings and notes of meetings must be retained for a minimum of four months.

Third, and this is not to suggest that they apply, of potential significance are §240.65 of the Penal Law and its companion, §89(8) of the Freedom of Information Law (which is Article 6 of the Public Officers Law). The former states that:

"A person is guilty of unlawful prevention of public access to records when, with intent to prevent the public inspection of a record pursuant to article six of the public officers law, he willfully conceals or destroys any such record."

From my perspective, the preceding may be applicable in two circumstances: first, when an agency employee receives a request for a record and indicates that the agency does not maintain the record even though he or she knows that the agency does maintain the record; or second, when an agency employee destroys a record following a request for that record in order to prevent public disclosure of the record. If there is a belief that the provisions referenced above apply, it is suggested that you contact the appropriate law enforcement agencies.

Lastly, in the correspondence attached to your letter, you referred to "the right of any citizen of the United States to speak anywhere they want to; a right protected by the U.S. Constitution." In this regard, while individuals may have the right to express themselves and to speak, I do not believe that they necessarily have the right to do so at meetings of public bodies. It is noted that there is no constitutional right to attend meetings of public bodies. Those rights are conferred by statute, i.e., by legislative action, in laws enacted in each of the fifty states. In the absence of a statutory grant of authority to attend such meetings, I do not believe that the public would have the right to attend.

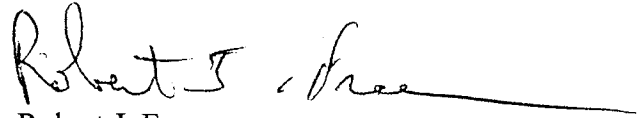

In the case of the New York Open Meetings Law, in a statement of general principle and intent, that statute confers upon the public the right to attend meetings of public bodies, to listen to their deliberations and observe the performance of public officials. However, that right is limited, for public bodies in appropriate circumstances may enter into closed or executive sessions. As such, in my opinion, there is no constitutional right to attend or speak at meetings.

Within the language of the Open Meetings Law, there is nothing that pertains to the right of those in attendance to speak or otherwise participate. Certainly a member of the public may speak or express opinions about meetings or about the conduct of public business before or after meetings to other persons. However, since neither the Open Meetings Law nor any other provision of which I am aware provides the public with the right to speak during meetings, a public body, in my view, is not required to permit the public to do so during meetings. A public body may choose to permit the public to speak, and if it does so, it has been suggested that rules and procedures be developed that regarding the privilege to speak that are reasonable and that treat members of the public equally.

Dear Mr. Marshall:

I have received your letter of January 12. As I understand the matter, you have requested records from the New York City Police Department and the Office of the Queens County District Attorney, but neither agency had responded as of the date of your letter to this office.

In this regard, while you did not detail the nature of the records sought, I point out that the Freedom of Information Law provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies must respond to requests. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

"Each entity subject to the provisions of this article, within five business days of the receipt of a written request for a record reasonably described, shall make such record available to the person requesting it, deny such request in writing or furnish a written acknowledgement of the receipt of such request and a statement of the approximate date when such request will be granted or denied..."

If neither a response to a request nor an acknowledgement of the receipt of a request is given within five business days, or if an agency delays responding for an unreasonable time after it acknowledges that a request has been received, a request may, in my opinion, be considered to have been constructively denied. In such a circumstance, I believe that the denial may be appealed in accordance with §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law. That provision states in relevant part that:

Mr. Harold Marshall

who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

In addition, it has been held that when an appeal is made but a determination is not rendered within ten business days of the receipt of the appeal as required under §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, the appellant has exhausted his or her administrative remedies and may initiate a challenge to a constructive denial of access under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Rules [Floyd v. McGuire, 87 AD 2d 388, appeal dismissed 57 NY 2d 774 (1982)].

For your information, the person at the Police Department designated to determine appeals is Susan Petito, Special Counsel; the person so designated by the District Attorney is Andrew L. Zwerling.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Dear Mr. Thomas:

I have received your letter of January 9. You have questioned the propriety of a delay in determining rights of access to records that you have requested from Monroe County.

In this regard, the Freedom of Information Law provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies must respond to requests. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

"Each entity subject to the provisions of this article, within five business days of the receipt of a written request for a record reasonably described, shall make such record available to the person requesting it, deny such request in writing or furnish a written acknowledgement of the receipt of such request and a statement of the approximate date when such request will be granted or denied..."

If neither a response to a request nor an acknowledgement of the receipt of a request is given within five business days, or if an agency delays responding for an unreasonable time after it acknowledges that a request has been received, a request may, in my opinion, be considered to have been constructively denied. In such a circumstance, I believe that the denial may be appealed in accordance with §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law. That provision states in relevant part that:

who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

In addition, it has been held that when an appeal is made but a determination is not rendered within ten business days of the receipt of the appeal as required under §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, the appellant has exhausted his or her administrative remedies and may initiate a challenge to a constructive denial of access under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Rules [Floyd v. McGuire, 87 AD 2d 388, appeal dismissed 57 NY 2d 774 (1982)].

I note that although an agency must grant access to records, deny access or acknowledge the receipt of a request within five business days, when such acknowledgement is given, there is no precise time period within which an agency must grant or deny access to records. The time needed to do so may be dependent upon the volume of a request, the possibility that other requests have been made, the necessity to conduct legal research, the search and retrieval techniques used to locate the records and the like. In short, when an agency acknowledges the receipt of a request because more than five business days may be needed to grant or deny a request, so long as it provides an approximate date indicating when the request will be granted or denied, and that date is reasonable in view of the attendant circumstances, I believe that the agency would be acting in compliance with law.

Notwithstanding the foregoing, in my view, every law must be implemented in a manner that gives reasonable effect to its intent, and I point out that in its statement of legislative intent, §84 of the Freedom of Information Law states that "it is incumbent upon the state and its localities to extend public accountability wherever and whenever feasible." Therefore, if records are clearly available to the public under the Freedom of Information Law, or if they are readily retrievable, there may be no basis for a lengthy delay in disclosure. As the Court of Appeals has asserted:

"...the successful implementation of the policies motivating the enactment of the Freedom of Information Law centers on goals as broad as the achievement of a more informed electorate and a more responsible and responsive officialdom. By their very nature such objectives cannot hope to be attained unless the measures taken to bring them about permeate the body politic to a point where they become the rule rather than the exception. The phrase 'public accountability wherever and whenever feasible' therefore merely punctuates with explicitness what in any event is implicit" [Westchester News v. Kimball, 50 NY 2d 575, 579 (1980)].

Further, in my opinion, if, as a matter of practice or policy, an agency acknowledges the receipt of requests and indicates in every instance that it will determine to grant or deny access to records within a particular period following the date of acknowledgement, such a practice or policy would be contrary to the thrust of the Freedom of Information Law. If a request is voluminous and a significant amount of time is needed to locate records and review them to determine rights of access, a delay beyond five business days, in view of those and perhaps the other kinds of factors mentioned earlier, might be reasonable. On the other hand, if a record or report is clearly public and can be found easily, there would appear to be no rational basis for delaying disclosure. In a case in which it was found that an agency's "actions demonstrate an utter disregard for compliance set by FOIL", it was held that "[t]he records finally produced were not so voluminous as to justify any extension of time, much less an extension beyond that allowed by statute, or no response to appeals at all" (Inner City Press/Community on the Move, Inc. v. New York City Department of Housing Preservation and Development, Supreme Court, New York County, November 9, 1993).

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Attorney at Law
P.O. Box 3289
Church Street Station
New York, NY 10008-3289

Dear Mr. Morris:

I have received your letter of January 14 in which you sought my views concerning a denial by the New York City Economic Development Corporation ("EDC") of your request for copies of responses to a Request for Expressions of Interest "RFEI" concerning Governors Island and communications between all parties relating to the RFEI's. The EDC denied the request in its entirety based on §87(2)(c) of the Freedom of Information Law.

While it is possible that some aspects of the records sought might justifiably be withheld, a blanket denial of access would, in my opinion, be inconsistent with law. In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First and perhaps most importantly, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law. It is emphasized that the introductory language of §87(2) refers to the authority to withhold "records or portions thereof" that fall within the scope of the exceptions that follow. In my view, the phrase quoted in the preceding sentence evidences a recognition on the part of the Legislature that a single record or report, for example, might include portions that are available under the statute, as well as portions that might justifiably be withheld. That being so, I believe that it also imposes an obligation on an agency to review records sought, in their entirety, to determine which portions, if any, might properly be withheld or deleted prior to disclosing the remainder.

The Court of Appeals expressed its general view of the intent of the Freedom of Information Law in Gould v. New York City Police Department [87 NY 2d 267 (1996)], stating that:

"To ensure maximum access to government records, the 'exemptions are to be narrowly construed, with the burden resting on the agency to demonstrate that the requested material indeed qualifies for exemption' (Matter of Hanig v. State of New York Dept. of Motor Vehicles, 79 N.Y.2d 106, 109, 580 N.Y.S.2d 715, 588 N.E.2d 750 see, Public Officers Law § 89[4][b]). As this Court has stated, '[o]nly where the material requested falls squarely within the ambit of one of these statutory exemptions may disclosure be withheld' (Matter of Fink v. Lefkowitz, 47 N.Y.2d, 567, 571, 419 N.Y.S.2d 467, 393 N.E.2d 463)" (id., 275).

Just as significant, the Court in Gould repeatedly specified that a categorical denial of access to records is inconsistent with the requirements of the Freedom of Information Law. In that case, the agency contended that certain reports could be withheld in their entirety on the ground that they fall within the exception regarding intra-agency materials, §87(2)(g). The Court, however, wrote that: "Petitioners contend that because the complaint follow-up reports contain factual data, the exemption does not justify complete nondisclosure of the reports. We agree" (id., 276). The Court then stated as a general principle that "blanket exemptions for particular types of documents are inimical to FOIL's policy of open government" (id., 275). The Court also offered guidance to agencies and lower courts in determining rights of access and referred to several decisions it had previously rendered, directing that:

"...to invoke one of the exemptions of section 87(2), the agency must articulate 'particularized and specific justification' for not disclosing requested documents (Matter of Fink v. Lefkowitz, supra, 47 N.Y.2d, at 571, 419 N.Y.S.2d 467, 393 N.E.2d 463). If the court is unable to determine whether withheld documents fall entirely within the scope of the asserted exemption, it should conduct an in camera inspection of representative documents and order disclosure of all nonexempt, appropriately redacted material (see, Matter of Xerox Corp. v. Town of Webster, 65 N.Y.2d 131, 133, 490 N.Y.S. 2d, 488, 480 N.E.2d 74; Matter of Farbman & Sons v. New York City Health & Hosps. Corp., supra, 62 N.Y.2d, at 83, 476 N.Y.S.2d 69, 464 N.E.2d 437)" (id.).

Second, the provision cited by the EDC, §87(2)(c), enables agencies to withhold records to the extent that disclosure "would impair present or imminent contract awards or collective bargaining negotiations." In my view, the key word in the quoted provision is "impair", and the question involves how or the extent to which disclosure would impair the process of awarding a contract.

Section 87(2)(c) often applies in situations in which agencies seek bids or RFP's. While I am not an expert on the subject, I believe that bids and the processes relating to bids and RFP's or, as in this case, RFEI's, are different. In the traditional competitive bidding process, so long as the bids meet the requisite specifications, an agency must accept the low bid and enter into a contract with the submitter of the low bid. When an agency seeks proposals by means of RFP's or RFEI's, there is no obligation to accept the proposal reflective of the lowest cost; rather, the agency may engage in negotiations with the submitters regarding cost as well as the nature or design of goods or services, or the nature of the project in accordance with the goal sought to be accomplished. As such, the process of evaluating RFP's and RFEI's is generally more flexible and discretionary than the process of awarding a contract following the submission of bids.

When an agency solicits bids, but the deadline for their submission has not been reached, premature disclosure to another possible submitter might provide that person or firm with an unfair advantage vis a vis those who already submitted bids. Further, disclosure of the identities of bidders or the number of bidders might enable another potential bidder to tailor his bid in a manner that provides him with an unfair advantage in the bidding process. In such a situation, harm or "impairment" would likely be the result, and the records could justifiably be denied. However, when the deadline for submission of bids has been reached, all of the submitters are on an equal footing and, as suggested earlier, an agency is generally obliged to accept the lowest appropriate bid. In that situation, the bids would, in my opinion, be available, even before a contract has been signed.

In the case of the RFEI's, even though the deadline for submission of proposals has passed, I would conjecture that the EDC may be engaged in negotiations or evaluations with several of the submitters that may result in alterations in proposals or costs. Whether disclosure at that juncture would "impair" the process of awarding a contract is, in my view, a question of fact. In some instances, disclosure might impair the process; in others, disclosure may have no harmful effect or even encourage firms to be more competitive, thereby resulting in benefit to the agency and the public generally.

Claims have been made in situations similar to that described in your correspondence that proposals and other records pertaining to the kind of process at issue may always be withheld prior to the final award of a contract. In general, I have disagreed with those blanket assertions. Again, unlike the bid process in which an agency essentially has no choice but to accept the low appropriate bid, in this situation, the proposals and figures offered by submitters are subject to negotiation and change; they do not reflect the "bottom line." In view of the flexibility of the process, it is questionable how disclosure would adversely affect an agency's ability to engage in the best contractual arrangement on behalf of the taxpayers.

It has also been contended that the kinds of records at issue should be withheld because the negotiations with an apparently successful submitter may not culminate in an agreement or may be rejected by the ultimate decision maker. It is my understanding that the RFP or RFEI process is intended to encourage creativity on the part of submitters so that they can offer the best possible solutions in terms of an agency's needs or goals. That being so, and because proposals are subject to negotiation and alteration, even if an apparently successful proposal is rejected or set aside for some reason, the agency is not bound but rather is free to continue to attempt to engage in an optimal agreement. If anything, disclosure might encourage submitters to better accommodate the needs of the agency or propose what might be characterized as a better deal. Rather than impairing the process, disclosure might enhance it.

Based on a review of the "Submission Requirements", it appears that numerous aspects of the submissions would not, if disclosed, impair the ability of EDC to engage in appropriate agreements.

For instance, since the deadline for submission of RFEI's has passed, the names of submitters and general descriptions their proposals would in my opinion be accessible, as would several aspects of financial information, including the submitters' indications regarding economic benefits to the City. Among what may be extensive portions of the submissions that would appear to be available are descriptions of "the development projects completed in New York City or other metropolitan areas by each member" of a submitter's development team, "specifying the member's role and the cost of the project."

Without additional knowledge regarding the project and the contents of the records sought, I cannot offer unequivocal guidance concerning the extent to which the records should be disclosed. However, it is clear in my opinion that some elements of the records must be disclosed and that a blanket denial of your request was inappropriate.

Lastly, while the EDC did not cite any other basis for denial, I believe that §87(2)(d) would also be pertinent to an analysis of rights of access. That provision states that an agency may withhold records or portions thereof that:

"are trade secrets or are submitted to an agency by a commercial enterprise or derived from information obtained from a commercial enterprise and which if disclosed would cause substantial injury to the competitive position of the subject enterprise..."

In my view, the nature of records and the area of commerce in which a commercial entity is involved, as well as other similar considerations, would be the factors used to determine the extent to which disclosure would "cause substantial injury to the competitive position" of a commercial enterprise. Therefore, the proper assertion of §87(2)(d) would be dependent upon the facts and the effect of disclosure upon the competitive position of the entity to which the records relate.

Of possible significance is a decision rendered by the Court of Appeals which, for the first time, considered the phrase "substantial competitive injury" [Encore College Bookstores, Inc. v. Auxiliary Service Corporation of the State University of New York at Farmingdale, 87 NY2d 410, [(1995)]. In that decision, the Court reviewed the legislative history of the Freedom of Information Law as it pertains to §87(2)(d), and due to the analogous nature of equivalent exception in the federal Freedom of Information Act (5 U.S.C. §552), it relied in part upon federal judicial precedent.

In its discussion of the issue, the Court stated that:

"FOIL fails to define substantial competitive injury. Nor has this Court previously interpreted the statutory phrase. FOIA, however, contains a similar exemption for 'commercial or financial information obtained from a person and privileged or confidential' (see, 5 USC § 552[b][4]). Commercial information, moreover, is 'confidential' if it would impair the government's ability to obtain necessary information in the future or cause 'substantial harm to the competitive position' of the person from whom the information was obtained...

Mr. L. Blake Morris

"As established in Worthington Compressors v Costle (662 F2d 45, 51 [DC Cir]), whether 'substantial competitive harm' exists for purposes of FOIA's exemption for commercial information turns on the commercial value of the requested information to competitors and the cost of acquiring it through other means. Because the submitting business can suffer competitive harm only if the desired material has commercial value to its competitors, courts must consider how valuable the information will be to the competing business, as well as the resultant damage to the submitting enterprise...

"...as explained in Worthington:

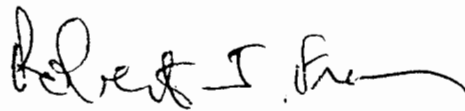

Because competition in business turns on the relative costs and opportunities faced by members of the same industry, there is a potential windfall for competitors to whom valuable information is released under FOIA. If those competitors are charged only minimal FOIA retrieval costs for the information, rather than the considerable costs of private reproduction, they may be getting quite a bargain. Such bargains could easily have competitive consequences not contemplated as part of FOIA's principal aim of promoting openness in government" (id., 419-420).

In conjunction with the foregoing, it is likely in my view that portions of the records sought would fall within the coverage of §87(2)(d).

In an effort to enhance compliance with and understanding of the Freedom of Information Law, copies of this opinion will be forwarded to the EDC.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Dear Mr. George:

I have received your letter of January 12 concerning requests made under the Freedom of Information Law to the Legal Aid Society and the Office of the New York County District Attorney.

In this regard, I point out that the Freedom of Information Law pertains to records maintained by agencies. Section 86(3) of that statute defines the term "agency" to mean:

"any state or municipal department, board, bureau, division, commission, committee, public authority, public corporation, council, office or other governmental entity performing a governmental or proprietary function for the state or any one or more municipalities thereof, except the judiciary or the state legislature."

Therefore, in general, the Freedom of Information Law is applicable to entities of state and local government, including offices of district attorneys.

It is my understanding that there are a variety of entities within New York that use the name "Legal Aid Society". Some are a part of the federal Legal Services Corporation, some may be private not-for profit corporations, and some may be parts of units of local government. While legal aid societies which are agencies of local government may be subject to the Freedom of Information Law, most are not "agencies" as that term is defined in the Freedom of Information Law and, as such, are not subject to that statute.

Although I am not fully familiar with the specific status of the Legal Aid Society, I believe that it is a corporate entity separate and distinct from government, and that it is not an "agency" subject to the Freedom of Information Law. If that is so, the records of that entity are outside the scope of public rights of access.

Mr. Briant George

Dear Collette and Mike:

While there are no judicial decisions on the subject of your inquiry of which I am aware, section 87(2) of the FOIL requires that accessible records be made available for inspection and copying, and the regulations promulgated by the Committee on Open Government state in part that: "...each agency shall designate the locations where records shall be available for inspection and copying" (21 NYCRR section 1401.3). In my view, neither the FOIL nor the regulations requires that records be transferred from their usual locations to accommodate an applicant at a site convenient to that person. If the applicant cannot travel to the location where the records are routinely kept, he or she can obtain copies upon payment of the appropriate fee.

With regard to the other aspect of your communication, there is no requirement that agencies report to the Committee on Open Government on an annual basis. Further, I do not know the nature of the logs that you referenced. If you provide additional information, perhaps I could respond more appropriately.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Dear Mr. Jones:

I have received your letter of January 11 in which you sought assistance in relation to unanswered requests for records made to the New York City Police Department, a court, and a hospital.

In view of your comments, I note that the Committee on Open Government is authorized to provide advice and opinions concerning the Freedom of Information Law. The Committee is not empowered to determine appeals or otherwise compel an entity to grant or deny access to records. In an effort to assist you, however, I offer the following remarks.

First, it is emphasized that the Freedom of Information Law is applicable to agency records, and that §86(3) defines the term "agency" to include:

"any state or municipal department, board, bureau, division, commission, committee, public authority, public corporation, council, office or other governmental entity performing a governmental or proprietary function for the state or any one or more municipalities thereof, except the judiciary or the state legislature."

In turn, §86(1) defines the term "judiciary" to mean:

"the courts of the state, including any municipal or district court, whether or not of record."

Mr. Milton Jones
February 1, 1999

Based on the provisions quoted above, the courts and court records are not subject to the Freedom of Information Law. This is not to suggest that court records are not generally available to the public, for other provisions of law (see e.g., Judiciary Law, §255) may grant broad public access to those records. Even though other statutes may deal with access to court records, the procedural provisions associated with the Freedom of Information Law (i.e., those involving the designation of a records access officer or the right to appeal a denial) would not ordinarily be applicable. In seeking court records, it is suggested that a request be made to the court clerk, citing an appropriate provision as the basis for the request.

Second, with respect to your request for medical records pertaining to you maintained by a hospital, if the facility is a governmental entity, its records would be subject to the Freedom of Information Law.

Assuming that the Freedom of Information applies, in terms of rights granted by that statute, it is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law.

With regard to medical records, the Freedom of Information Law, in my view, likely permits that some of those records may be withheld in whole or in part, depending upon their contents. For instance, medical records prepared by Hospital personnel could be characterized as "intra-agency materials" that fall within the scope of §87(2)(g) of the Freedom of Information Law. To the extent that such materials consist of advice, opinion, recommendation and the like, I believe that the Freedom of Information Law would permit a denial.

Nevertheless, a different statute, §18 of the Public Health Law, generally grants rights of access to medical records to the subjects of the records. As such, that statute may provide greater access to medical records than the Freedom of Information Law. It is suggested that you send your request to the hospital and make specific reference to §18 of the Public Health Law when seeking medical records.

To obtain additional information concerning access to medical records and the fees that may be charged for searching and copying those records, you may write to:

Access to Patient Information Program
New York State Department of Health
Hedley Park Place
Suite 303
433 River Street
Troy, NY 12180

Third, the Police Department is an "agency" required to comply with the Freedom of Information Law. Since you indicated that your request was made to the Commissioner, I point out that the regulations promulgated by the Committee (21 NYCRR Part 1401) require that each agency designate one or more persons as "records access officer." The records access officer has the duty of coordinating an agency's response to requests, and requests should ordinarily be made to that person. While I believe that the person in receipt of your request should have responded in a manner consistent with the Freedom of Information Law or forwarded the request to the records access officer, it is suggested that you might renew your request and send it to the records access officer, whose office is located in Room 110C at One Police Plaza.

Mr. Milton Jones

Lastly, I point out that the Freedom of Information Law provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies must respond to requests. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

"Each entity subject to the provisions of this article, within five business days of the receipt of a written request for a record reasonably described, shall make such record available to the person requesting it, deny such request in writing or furnish a written acknowledgement of the receipt of such request and a statement of the approximate date when such request will be granted or denied..."

If neither a response to a request nor an acknowledgement of the receipt of a request is given within five business days, or if an agency delays responding for an unreasonable time after it acknowledges that a request has been received, a request may, in my opinion, be considered to have been constructively denied. In such a circumstance, I believe that the denial may be appealed in accordance with §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law. That provision states in relevant part that:

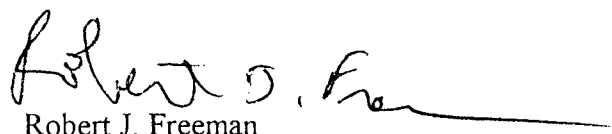

"...any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive, or governing body, who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

In addition, it has been held that when an appeal is made but a determination is not rendered within ten business days of the receipt of the appeal as required under §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, the appellant has exhausted his or her administrative remedies and may initiate a challenge to a constructive denial of access under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Rules [Floyd v. McGuire, 87 AD 2d 388, appeal dismissed 57 NY 2d 774 (1982)].

For your information, the person designated by the Police Department to determine appeals is Susan Petito, Special Counsel.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Robert J. Freeman

Mr. Paul E. Cabo

Dear Mr. Cabo:

I have received your letter of January 17 in which you sought my views concerning the propriety of a partial denial of access to records by the Office of the Kings County District Attorney. The records in question involve "grand jury voir dire testimony", statements of witnesses scheduled to testify, statements of witnesses who did not testify at trial, a "chronological record" of the criminal proceeding, and the work product of prosecuting attorneys.

In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First, since you suggested that some of the records at issue may constitute Rosario material or may be exculpatory, I point out that the courts have provided direction concerning the Freedom of Information Law as opposed to the use of discovery under the Civil Practice Law and Rules (CPLR) in civil proceedings, and discovery in criminal proceedings under the Criminal Procedure Law (CPL). The principle is that the Freedom of Information Law is a vehicle that confers rights of access upon the public generally, while the disclosure provisions of the CPLR or the CPL, for example, are separate vehicles that may require or authorize disclosure of records due to one's status as a litigant or defendant.

As stated by the Court of Appeals in a case involving a request made under the Freedom of Information Law by a person involved in litigation against an agency: "Access to records of a government agency under the Freedom of Information Law (FOIL) (Public Officers Law, Article 6) is not affected by the fact that there is pending or potential litigation between the person making the request and the agency" [Farbman v. NYC Health and Hospitals Corporation, 62 NY 2d 75, 78 (1984)]. Similarly, in an earlier decision, the Court of Appeals determined that "the standing of one who seeks access to records under the Freedom of Information Law is as a member of the public, and is neither enhanced...nor restricted...because he is also a litigant or potential litigant" [Matter of John P. v. Whalen, 54 NY 2d 89, 99 (1980)]. The Court in Farbman, supra, discussed the distinction between the use of the Freedom of Information Law as opposed to the use of discovery in Article 31 of the CPLR. Specifically, it was found that:

"FOIL does not require that the party requesting records make any showing of need, good faith or legitimate purpose; while its purpose may be to shed light on governmental decision-making, its ambit is not confined to records actually used in the decision-making process (Matter of Westchester Rockland Newspapers v. Kimball, 50 NY 2d 575, 581.) Full disclosure by public agencies is, under FOIL, a public right and in the public interest, irrespective of the status or need of the person making the request.

"CPLR article 31 proceeds under a different premise, and serves quite different concerns. While speaking also of 'full disclosure' article 31 is plainly more restrictive than FOIL. Access to records under CPLR depends on status and need. With goals of promoting both the ascertainment of truth at trial and the prompt disposition of actions (Allen v. Crowell-Collier Pub. Co., 21 NY 2d 403, 407), discovery is at the outset limited to that which is 'material and necessary in the prosecution or defense of an action'" [see Farbman, supra, at 80].

In sum, I believe that the Freedom of Information Law imposes a duty to disclose records, as well as the capacity to withhold them, irrespective of the status or interest of the person requesting them. To be distinguished are other provisions of law that may require disclosure based upon one's status, e.g., as a defendant, and the nature of the records or their materiality to a proceeding. Therefore, even if records might be available in the context of Rosario in criminal discovery, it does not necessarily follow that they would be available under the Freedom of Information Law.

Second, when the Freedom of Information Law is applicable, that statute is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law.

With respect to the records of the voir dire to which you referred, pertinent in my view is §87(2)(a), which states that an agency may deny access to records that "are specifically exempted from disclosure by state or federal statute". One such statute, §190.25(4) of the Criminal Procedure Law deals with grand jury proceedings and provides in relevant part that:

"Grand jury proceedings are secret, and no grand juror, or other person specified in subdivision three of this section or section 215.70 of the penal law, may, except in the lawful discharge of his duties or upon written order of the court, disclose the nature or substance of any grand jury testimony, evidence, or any decision, result or other matter attending a grand jury proceeding."

As such, grand jury related records would be outside the scope of rights conferred by the Freedom of Information Law. Any disclosure of those records would be based upon a court order or perhaps a vehicle authorizing or requiring disclosure that is separate and distinct from the Freedom of Information Law.

With regard to the witness statements, the decision rendered in Moore v. Santucci [151 AD 2d 677 (1989)], which involved a request made to the office of a district attorney, may be pertinent to the matter. In Moore, it was found that:

"while statements of the petitioner, his codefendants and witnesses obtained by the respondent in the course of preparing a criminal case for trial are generally exempt from disclosure under FOIL (see Matter of Knight v. Gold, 53 AD2d 694, appeal dismissed 43 NY2d 841), once the statements have been used in open court, they have lost their cloak of confidentiality and are available for inspection by a member of the public" (id., 679).

Based on the foregoing, insofar as witnesses' statements are submitted into evidence or disclosed by means of a public judicial proceeding, I believe that they must be disclosed. On the other hand, if witness statements have not been previously disclosed, two grounds for denial appearing in the Freedom of Information Law would appear to be relevant.

Section 87(2)(b) permits an agency to withhold records to the extent that disclosure would constitute "an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy. Since you referred to the possibility of deleting identifying details from the statements and disclosing the remainder, the propriety of so doing would, in my opinion, be dependent on the facts. In some instances, the deletion of identifying details would adequately serve to protect personal privacy. In others, however, deletions of names or other identifiers would still enable a recipient of the records to ascertain the identities of witnesses. In that circumstance, I believe that the statements could be withheld in their entirety.

Also potentially relevant is §87(2)(e), which states in part that:

"are compiled for law enforcement purposes and which, if disclosed, would...

iii. identify a confidential source or disclose confidential information relating to a criminal investigation..."

The extent to which the foregoing would be applicable would, again, be dependent on the facts and circumstances.

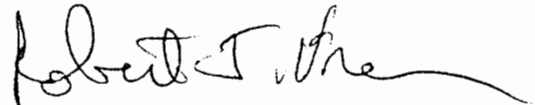

Mr. Paul E. Cabo

Lastly, with respect to the other records at issue, §3101(c) of the CPLR provides that "[t]he work product of an attorney shall not be obtainable." In my view, when that provision applies, the records would be exempted from disclosure by statute in conjunction with §87(2)(a). In a decision in which it was determined that records could justifiably be withheld as attorney work product, the "disputed documents" were "clearly work product documents which contain the opinions, reflections and thought process" of attorneys involved in a particular matter that had "not been communicated or shown to individuals outside of that law firm [Estate of Johnson, 538 NYS 2d 173 (1989)]. While the office of a district attorney is not a law firm, I believe that the principle would apply nonetheless.

Also relevant with respect to those records may be §87(2)(g), which permits an agency to withhold internal documents insofar as they consist of opinions, advice, conjecture, ideas and the like.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Dear Mr. Hagenbuch:

I have received your letter of January 28 in which you asked for copies of agencies' procedures and regulations concerning the inspection and copying of records. You referred to records of the State Police, court clerks, sheriffs, district attorneys and grand juries.

In this regard, this office does not maintain copies of the procedures or regulations that you requested. However, §89(1)(b)(iii) of the Freedom of Information Law requires the Committee on Open Government to promulgate general rules and regulations pertaining to the procedural implementation of the Freedom of Information Law. Enclosed is a copy of those regulations, which are published in 21 NYCRR Part 1401. In turn, §87(1) of the Freedom of Information Law requires each agency to adopt its own procedural rules and regulations consistent with the Law and the Committee's regulations.

It is noted that the Freedom of Information Law is applicable to agency records, and that §86(3) defines the term "agency" to include:

"any state or municipal department, board, bureau, division, commission, committee, public authority, public corporation, council, office or other governmental entity performing a governmental or proprietary function for the state or any one or more municipalities thereof, except the judiciary or the state legislature."

In turn, §86(1) defines the term "judiciary" to mean:

"the courts of the state, including any municipal or district court, whether or not of record."

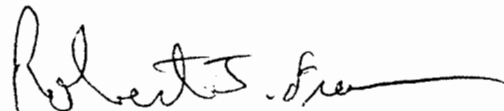

Mr. David Hagenbuch

Based on the provisions quoted above, the Freedom of Information Law generally applies to entities of state and local government, but the courts and court records are not subject to its provisions. This is not to suggest that court records are not generally available to the public, for other provisions of law (see e.g., Judiciary Law, §255) may grant broad public access to those records. Even though other statutes may deal with access to court records, the procedural provisions associated with the Freedom of Information Law (i.e., those involving the designation of a records access officer or the right to appeal a denial) would not ordinarily be applicable.

Since you referred to grand juries, I point out that records pertaining to grand jury proceedings are generally confidential under §190.25(4) of the Criminal Procedure Law and are outside the coverage of the Freedom of Information Law.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Dear Mr. Cabo:

I have received your letter of January 17 in which you sought my views concerning the propriety of a partial denial of access to records by the Office of the Kings County District Attorney. The records in question involve "grand jury voir dire testimony", statements of witnesses scheduled to testify, statements of witnesses who did not testify at trial, a "chronological record" of the criminal proceeding, and the work product of prosecuting attorneys.

In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First, since you suggested that some of the records at issue may constitute Rosario material or may be exculpatory, I point out that the courts have provided direction concerning the Freedom of Information Law as opposed to the use of discovery under the Civil Practice Law and Rules (CPLR) in civil proceedings, and discovery in criminal proceedings under the Criminal Procedure Law (CPL). The principle is that the Freedom of Information Law is a vehicle that confers rights of access upon the public generally, while the disclosure provisions of the CPLR or the CPL, for example, are separate vehicles that may require or authorize disclosure of records due to one's status as a litigant or defendant.

As stated by the Court of Appeals in a case involving a request made under the Freedom of Information Law by a person involved in litigation against an agency: "Access to records of a government agency under the Freedom of Information Law (FOIL) (Public Officers Law, Article 6) is not affected by the fact that there is pending or potential litigation between the person making the request and the agency" [Farbman v. NYC Health and Hospitals Corporation, 62 NY 2d 75, 78 (1984)]. Similarly, in an earlier decision, the Court of Appeals determined that "the standing of one who seeks access to records under the Freedom of Information Law is as a member of the public, and is neither enhanced...nor restricted...because he is also a litigant or potential litigant" [Matter of John P. v. Whalen, 54 NY 2d 89, 99 (1980)]. The Court in Farbman, supra, discussed the distinction between the use of the Freedom of Information Law as opposed to the use of discovery in Article 31 of the CPLR. Specifically, it was found that:

"FOIL does not require that the party requesting records make any showing of need, good faith or legitimate purpose; while its purpose may be to shed light on governmental decision-making, its ambit is not confined to records actually used in the decision-making process (Matter of Westchester Rockland Newspapers v. Kimball, 50 NY 2d 575, 581.) Full disclosure by public agencies is, under FOIL, a public right and in the public interest, irrespective of the status or need of the person making the request.

"CPLR article 31 proceeds under a different premise, and serves quite different concerns. While speaking also of 'full disclosure' article 31 is plainly more restrictive than FOIL. Access to records under CPLR depends on status and need. With goals of promoting both the ascertainment of truth at trial and the prompt disposition of actions (Allen v. Crowell-Collier Pub. Co., 21 NY 2d 403, 407), discovery is at the outset limited to that which is 'material and necessary in the prosecution or defense of an action'" [see Farbman, supra, at 80].

In sum, I believe that the Freedom of Information Law imposes a duty to disclose records, as well as the capacity to withhold them, irrespective of the status or interest of the person requesting them. To be distinguished are other provisions of law that may require disclosure based upon one's status, e.g., as a defendant, and the nature of the records or their materiality to a proceeding. Therefore, even if records might be available in the context of Rosario in criminal discovery, it does not necessarily follow that they would be available under the Freedom of Information Law.

Second, when the Freedom of Information Law is applicable, that statute is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law.

With respect to the records of the voir dire to which you referred, pertinent in my view is §87(2)(a), which states that an agency may deny access to records that "are specifically exempted from disclosure by state or federal statute". One such statute, §190.25(4) of the Criminal Procedure Law deals with grand jury proceedings and provides in relevant part that:

"Grand jury proceedings are secret, and no grand juror, or other person specified in subdivision three of this section or section 215.70 of the penal law, may, except in the lawful discharge of his duties or upon written order of the court, disclose the nature or substance of any grand jury testimony, evidence, or any decision, result or other matter attending a grand jury proceeding."

As such, grand jury related records would be outside the scope of rights conferred by the Freedom of Information Law. Any disclosure of those records would be based upon a court order or perhaps a vehicle authorizing or requiring disclosure that is separate and distinct from the Freedom of Information Law.

With regard to the witness statements, the decision rendered in Moore v. Santucci [151 AD 2d 677 (1989)], which involved a request made to the office of a district attorney, may be pertinent to the matter. In Moore, it was found that:

"while statements of the petitioner, his codefendants and witnesses obtained by the respondent in the course of preparing a criminal case for trial are generally exempt from disclosure under FOIL (see Matter of Knight v. Gold, 53 AD2d 694, appeal dismissed 43 NY2d 841), once the statements have been used in open court, they have lost their cloak of confidentiality and are available for inspection by a member of the public" (id., 679).

Based on the foregoing, insofar as witnesses' statements are submitted into evidence or disclosed by means of a public judicial proceeding, I believe that they must be disclosed. On the other hand, if witness statements have not been previously disclosed, two grounds for denial appearing in the Freedom of Information Law would appear to be relevant.

Section 87(2)(b) permits an agency to withhold records to the extent that disclosure would constitute "an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy. Since you referred to the possibility of deleting identifying details from the statements and disclosing the remainder, the propriety of so doing would, in my opinion, be dependent on the facts. In some instances, the deletion of identifying details would adequately serve to protect personal privacy. In others, however, deletions of names or other identifiers would still enable a recipient of the records to ascertain the identities of witnesses. In that circumstance, I believe that the statements could be withheld in their entirety.

Also potentially relevant is §87(2)(e), which states in part that:

"are compiled for law enforcement purposes and which, if disclosed, would...

iii. identify a confidential source or disclose confidential information relating to a criminal investigation..."

The extent to which the foregoing would be applicable would, again, be dependent on the facts and circumstances.

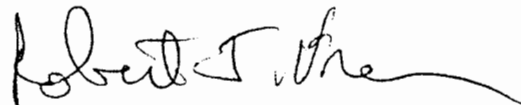

Mr. Paul E. Cabo

Lastly, with respect to the other records at issue, §3101(c) of the CPLR provides that "[t]he work product of an attorney shall not be obtainable." In my view, when that provision applies, the records would be exempted from disclosure by statute in conjunction with §87(2)(a). In a decision in which it was determined that records could justifiably be withheld as attorney work product, the "disputed documents" were "clearly work product documents which contain the opinions, reflections and thought process" of attorneys involved in a particular matter that had "not been communicated or shown to individuals outside of that law firm [Estate of Johnson, 538 NYS 2d 173 (1989)]. While the office of a district attorney is not a law firm, I believe that the principle would apply nonetheless.

Also relevant with respect to those records may be §87(2)(g), which permits an agency to withhold internal documents insofar as they consist of opinions, advice, conjecture, ideas and the like.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Dear Mr. Hagenbuch:

I have received your letter of January 28 in which you asked for copies of agencies' procedures and regulations concerning the inspection and copying of records. You referred to records of the State Police, court clerks, sheriffs, district attorneys and grand juries.

In this regard, this office does not maintain copies of the procedures or regulations that you requested. However, §89(1)(b)(iii) of the Freedom of Information Law requires the Committee on Open Government to promulgate general rules and regulations pertaining to the procedural implementation of the Freedom of Information Law. Enclosed is a copy of those regulations, which are published in 21 NYCRR Part 1401. In turn, §87(1) of the Freedom of Information Law requires each agency to adopt its own procedural rules and regulations consistent with the Law and the Committee's regulations.

It is noted that the Freedom of Information Law is applicable to agency records, and that §86(3) defines the term "agency" to include:

"any state or municipal department, board, bureau, division, commission, committee, public authority, public corporation, council, office or other governmental entity performing a governmental or proprietary function for the state or any one or more municipalities thereof, except the judiciary or the state legislature."

In turn, §86(1) defines the term "judiciary" to mean:

"the courts of the state, including any municipal or district court, whether or not of record."

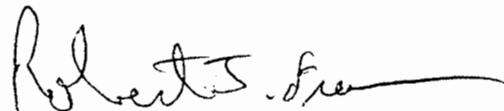

Mr. David Hagenbuch

Based on the provisions quoted above, the Freedom of Information Law generally applies to entities of state and local government, but the courts and court records are not subject to its provisions. This is not to suggest that court records are not generally available to the public, for other provisions of law (see e.g., Judiciary Law, §255) may grant broad public access to those records. Even though other statutes may deal with access to court records, the procedural provisions associated with the Freedom of Information Law (i.e., those involving the designation of a records access officer or the right to appeal a denial) would not ordinarily be applicable.

Since you referred to grand juries, I point out that records pertaining to grand jury proceedings are generally confidential under §190.25(4) of the Criminal Procedure Law and are outside the coverage of the Freedom of Information Law.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Mr. Terry Wilbert

[REDACTED]

Dear Mr. Wilbert:

I have received your letter of January 17 in which you requested an advisory opinion under the Open Meetings Law.

According to your letter, "it would appear that the Albion Central School District School Board had a meeting prior to the regularly scheduled public meeting in July." You wrote that the Board discussed possible candidates for president and vice president and indicated that those interested in those positions "were asked to discuss their ideas for the office and what they hoped to accomplish if elected to the office." You added that after "this private meeting, the Board of education swore in its new members and proceeded to nominate, in public, people for these same offices", and that even though more than one candidate had been nominated for president, "only one candidate was nominated for each position in the public session."

In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First, by way of background, it is emphasized at the outset that the Open Meetings Law has been broadly interpreted by the courts. In a landmark decision rendered in 1978, the Court of Appeals, the state's highest court, found that any gathering of a quorum of a public body for the purpose of conducting public business is a "meeting" that must be convened open to the public, whether or not there is an intent to take action and regardless of the manner in which a gathering may be characterized [see Orange County Publications v. Council of the City of Newburgh, 60 AD 2d 409, aff'd 45 NY 2d 947 (1978)].

I point out that the decision rendered by the Court of Appeals was precipitated by contentions made by public bodies that so-called "work sessions" and similar gatherings held for the purpose of discussion, but without an intent to take action, fell outside the scope of the Open Meetings Law. In discussing the issue, the Appellate Division, whose determination was unanimously affirmed by the Court of Appeals, stated that:

"We believe that the Legislature intended to include more than the mere formal act of voting or the formal execution of an official document. Every step of the decision-making process, including the decision itself, is a necessary preliminary to formal action. Formal acts have always been matters of public record and the public has always been made aware of how its officials have voted on an issue. There would be no need for this law if this was all the Legislature intended. Obviously, every thought, as well as every affirmative act of a public official as it relates to and is within the scope of one's official duties is a matter of public concern. It is the entire decision-making process that the Legislature intended to affect by the enactment of this statute" (60 AD 2d 409, 415).

The court also dealt with the characterization of meetings as "informal," stating that:

"The word 'formal' is defined merely as 'following or according with established form, custom, or rule' (Webster's Third New Int. Dictionary). We believe that it was inserted to safeguard the rights of members of a public body to engage in ordinary social transactions, but not to permit the use of this safeguard as a vehicle by which it precludes the application of the law to gatherings which have as their true purpose the discussion of the business of a public body" (id.).

Based upon the terms of the Open Meetings Law and its judicial interpretation, if a majority of the Board gathered to conduct public business, any such gathering would have constituted a "meeting" subject to the Open Meetings Law. Further, when there is an intent to conduct a meeting, the gathering must be preceded by notice given pursuant to §104 of the Open Meetings Law, convened open to the public and conducted in public as required by the Open Meetings Law.

It is also noted that the phrase "executive session" is defined in §102(3) of the Open Meetings Law to mean a portion of an open meeting during which the public may be excluded. As such, an executive session is not separate and distinct from a meeting, but rather is a portion of an open meeting. The Law also contains a procedure that must be accomplished during an open meeting before an executive session may be held. Specifically, §105(1) states in relevant part that:

"Upon a majority vote of its total membership, taken in an open meeting pursuant to a motion identifying the general area or areas of the subject or subjects to be considered, a public body may conduct an executive session for the below enumerated purposes only..."

As indicated in the language quoted above, a motion to enter into an executive session must be made during an open meeting and include reference to the "general area or areas of the subject or subjects to be considered" during the executive session.

It has been consistently advised and held that a public body cannot schedule or conduct an executive session in advance of a meeting, because a vote to enter into an executive session must be taken at an open meeting during which the executive session is held. In a decision involving the propriety of scheduling executive sessions prior to meetings, it was held that:

"The respondent Board prepared an agenda for each of the five designated regularly scheduled meetings in advance of the time that those meetings were to be held. Each agenda listed 'executive session' as an item of business to be undertaken at the meeting. The petitioner claims that this procedure violates the Open Meetings Law because under the provisions of Public Officers Law section 100[1] provides that a public body cannot schedule an executive session in advance of the open meeting. Section 100[1] provides that a public body may conduct an executive session only for certain enumerated purposes after a majority vote of the total membership taken at an open meeting has approved a motion to enter into such a session. Based upon this, it is apparent that petitioner is technically correct in asserting that the respondent cannot decide to enter into an executive session or schedule such a session in advance of a proper vote for the same at an open meeting" [Doolittle, Matter of v. Board of Education, Sup. Cty., Chemung Cty., July 21, 1981; note: the Open Meetings Law has been renumbered and §100 is now §105].

For the reasons expressed in the preceding commentary, a public body cannot in my view conduct or schedule an executive session in advance of a meeting. In short, because a vote to enter into an executive session must be made and carried by a majority vote of the total membership during an open meeting, technically, it cannot be known in advance of that vote that the motion will indeed be approved.

Second, in my opinion, discussions regarding the election of officers would not have fallen within any of the grounds for entry into executive session. The only provision that appears to be relevant, §105(1)(f), permits a public body to conduct an executive session to discuss:

"the medical, financial, credit or employment history of a particular person or corporation, or matters leading to the appointment, employment, promotion, demotion, discipline, suspension, dismissal or removal of a particular person or corporation..."

Although the discussion and election of officers involves consideration of particular individuals, it is unlikely that any of the specific subjects included within §105(1)(f) would have been applicable in conjunction with deliberations involving the selection of school board officers. In short, while

"matters leading to" certain actions relating to specific persons may be discussed during executive sessions, matters leading to the election of officers is not among them.

Third, with respect to the absence of any record indicating how the members voted at the closed session, I point out in passing that, as a general rule, a public body may take action during a properly convened executive session [see Open Meetings Law, §105(1)]. If action is taken during an executive session, minutes reflective of the action, the date and the vote must be recorded in minutes pursuant to §106(2) of the Law. If no action is taken, there is no requirement that minutes of the executive session be prepared. Various interpretations of the Education Law, §1708(3), however, indicate that, except in situations in which action during a closed session is permitted or required by statute, a school board cannot take action during an executive session [see United Teachers of Northport v. Northport Union Free School District, 50 AD 2d 897 (1975); Kursch et al. v. Board of Education, Union Free School District #1, Town of North Hempstead, Nassau County, 7 AD 2d 922 (1959); Sanna v. Lindenhurst, 107 Misc. 2d 267, modified 85 AD 2d 157, aff'd 58 NY 2d 626 (1982)]. Stated differently, based upon judicial interpretations of the Education Law, a school board generally cannot vote during an executive session, except in rare circumstances in which a statute permits or requires such a vote, none of which would have been present in the situation in question.

With regard to information indicating how each member voted, I direct your attention to the Freedom of Information Law. Section 87(3)(a) provides that:

"Each agency shall maintain:

(a) a record of the final vote of each member in every agency proceeding in which the member votes..."

Based upon the foregoing, when a final vote is taken by an "agency", which is defined to include a state or municipal board [see §86(3)], such as a school board, a record must be prepared that indicates the manner in which each member who voted cast his or her vote. Ordinarily, records of votes will appear in minutes.

In terms of the rationale of §87(3)(a), it appears that the State Legislature in precluding secret ballot voting sought to ensure that the public has the right to know how its representatives may have voted individually with respect to particular issues. Although the Open Meetings Law does not refer specifically to the manner in which votes are taken or recorded, I believe that the thrust of §87(3)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law is consistent with the Legislative Declaration that appears at the beginning of the Open Meetings Law and states that:

"it is essential to the maintenance of a democratic society that the public business be performed in an open and public manner and that the citizens of this state be fully aware of and able to observe the performance of public officials and attend and listen to the deliberations and decisions that go into the making of public policy.

The people must be able to remain informed if they are to retain control over those who are their public servants."

Moreover, in an Appellate Division decision that was affirmed by the Court of Appeals, it was found that "The use of a secret ballot for voting purposes was improper." In so holding, the Court stated that: "When action is taken by formal vote at open or executive sessions, the Freedom of Information Law and the Open Meetings Law both require open voting and a record of the manner in which each member voted [Public Officers Law §87[3][a]; §106[1], [2]" Smithson v. Ilion Housing Authority, 130 AD 2d 965, 967 (1987); aff'd 72 NY 2d 1034 (1988).

Further, there is case law dealing with the notion a consensus reached at a meeting of a public body. In Previdi v. Hirsch [524 NYS 2d 643 (1988)], which involved a board of education, the issue involved access to records, i.e., minutes of executive sessions held under the Open Meetings Law. Although it was assumed by the court that the executive sessions were properly held, it was found that "this was no basis for respondents to avoid publication of minutes pertaining to the 'final determination' of any action, and 'the date and vote thereon'" (id., 646). The court stated that:

"The fact that respondents characterize the vote as taken by 'consensus' does not exclude the recording of same as a 'formal vote'. To hold otherwise would invite circumvention of the statute.

"Moreover, respondents' interpretation of what constitutes the 'final determination of such action' is overly restrictive. The reasonable intentment of the statute is that 'final action' refers to the matter voted upon, not final determination of, as in this case, the litigation discussed or finality in terms of exhaustion or remedies" (id. 646).

As such, if a public body reaches a "consensus" that is reflective of its final determination of an issue, I believe that minutes must be prepared that indicate the manner in which each member voted. I recognize that the public bodies often attempt to present themselves as being unanimous and that a ratification of a vote is often carried out in public. Nevertheless, if a unanimous ratification does not indicate how the members actually voted behind closed doors, the public may be unaware of the members' views on a given issue. If indeed a consensus represents action upon which the a public body relies in carrying out its duties, I believe that the minutes should reflect the actual votes of the members.

With respect to the enforcement of the Open Meetings Law, §107(1) states in relevant part that:

"Any aggrieved person shall have standing to enforce the provisions of this article against a public body by the commencement of a proceeding pursuant to article seventy-eight of the civil practice law and rules, and/or an action for declaratory judgment and injunctive relief. In any such action or proceeding, the court shall have the power, in its discretion, upon good cause shown, to declare any action or part thereof taken in violation of this article void in whole or in part."

Mr. Terry Wilbert
February 2, 1999

It is noted that the time for initiating a proceeding under Article 78 expires four months after the date of an agency's final determination. Since the meeting in question was held in July, it appears that the statute of limitations would preclude any meaningful action that might otherwise have been taken. However, in an effort to enhance compliance with and understanding of applicable statutes, a copy of this opinion will be forwarded to the Board of Education.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Dear Mr. Thompson:

I have received your letter of January 18. As in the case of your previous correspondence, you have sought assistance in obtaining a recommendation that you believe has been sent by the Department of Correctional Services to the Immigration and Naturalization Service. You have been informed by the Department's records access and appeals officers that the Department maintains no such record, and it is your view that the Department has failed to comply with §147 of the Correction Law.

In this regard, if the record that you are seeking does not exist, the Freedom of Information Law does not apply. I note that when an agency indicates that it does not maintain or cannot locate a record, an applicant for the record may seek a certification to that effect. Section 89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law provides in part that, in such a situation, on request, an agency "shall certify that it does not have possession of such record or that such record cannot be found after diligent search." If you consider it worthwhile to do so, you could seek such a certification.

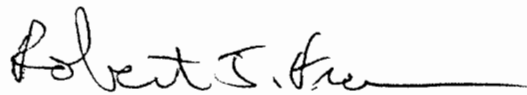

Lastly, the authority of the Committee on Open Government is limited to matters relating to public access to government information. Interpreting §147 of the Correction Law is within the province of Department officials and beyond the scope of the Committee's jurisdiction or expertise.

As you requested, your correspondence is being returned to you.

Dear Mr. Reiter:

I have received your letter of January 19 and the correspondence attached to it. You have requested an opinion concerning your efforts in obtaining records pursuant to the Freedom of Information Law from Senior Citizens of Green Island, Inc.

In this regard, it appears that you misunderstand the scope of the Freedom of Information Law. That statute pertains to agency records, and §86(3) defines the term "agency" to mean:

"any state or municipal department, board, bureau, division, commission, committee, public authority, public corporation, council, office or other governmental entity performing a governmental or proprietary function for the state or any one or more municipalities thereof, except the judiciary or the state legislature."

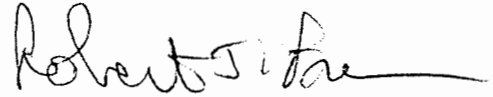

Based on the foregoing, the Freedom of Information Law applies to records of entities of state and local government.

Your correspondence indicates that the entity of your interest is a not-for-profit corporation that is not part of any unit of government. If that is so, it would be outside the coverage of the Freedom of Information Law.

Dear Mr. Rivera:

I have received your letter of January 25 in which you requested an advisory opinion.

You indicated that you requested records pertaining to your conviction from the New York City Police Department. The Department acknowledged receipt of the request and "estimated" that locating and reviewing the records to determine the extent to which they must be disclosed would be completed within 120 days. It is your view that the Department has placed you "in a catch-22 position for requesting 120 days (4 months) the exact amount of time that could preclude judicial review."

I disagree with your conclusion. When the Department completes its review of the records and grants or denies access in whole or in part, that would represent its initial determination. If any aspect of the request is then denied, the Department would be required to inform you of the right to appeal. Pursuant to §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, you would then have thirty days to appeal the denial. Upon receipt of the appeal, the appeals officer would have ten business days to render a final agency determination. At that time, from the time of the final determination, you would have four months to initiate a proceeding under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Law and Rules.

As you may be aware, the Freedom of Information Law provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies must respond to requests. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

requesting it, deny such request in writing or furnish a written acknowledgement of the receipt of such request and a statement of the approximate date when such request will be granted or denied..."

While an agency must grant access to records, deny access or acknowledge the receipt of a request within five business days, when such acknowledgement is given, there is no precise time period within which an agency must grant or deny access to records. The time needed to do so may be dependent upon the volume of a request, the possibility that other requests have been made, the necessity to conduct legal research, the search and retrieval techniques used to locate the records and the like. In short, when an agency acknowledges the receipt of a request because more than five business days may be needed to grant or deny a request, so long as it provides an approximate date indicating when the request will be granted or denied, and that date is reasonable in view of the attendant circumstances, I believe that the agency would be acting in compliance with law.

I hope that the foregoing serves to clarify your understanding of the matter and that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Dear Mr. Jones:

As you are aware, your letter addressed to the Attorney General has been forwarded to the Committee on Open Government. The Committee, a unit of the Department of State, is authorized to provide advice and opinions concerning the Freedom of Information Law. You have sought assistance in obtaining certain statistical information from the Department of Correctional Services.

Specifically, you requested "statistical records of all violent parole applicants that appear each month before the Parole Board between the years of January first of 1995 and December of this year 1998 that have sentences of ten (10) years or longer or have been placed on a six (6) to twenty-four (24) month hold status, effectively denying parole."

In this regard, it is emphasized that the Freedom of Information Law pertains to existing records. Moreover, §89(3) of that statute provides in relevant part that an agency is not required to prepare a new record in response to a request.

Based on the response to your request offered by Mark E. Shepard, the Records Access Officer for the Department of Correctional Services, the information sought does not exist. That being so, there would be no obligation imposed on the Department to review its records for the purpose of creating the statistical data of your interest on your behalf.

I hope that the foregoing serves to clarify your understanding of the Freedom of Information Law and that I have been of assistance.

Dear Mr. Blocker:

I have received your letter of January 21 in which you referred to an opinion addressed to you on December 22. Among the points offered in the opinion was my belief that records maintained by the Nassau County District Attorney fall within the scope of the New York Freedom of Information Law, rather than the federal Freedom of Information Act, even though the records are kept in accordance with provisions of federal law. You have questioned that aspect of the opinion.

In this regard, I direct your attention to a recent decision of the Court of Appeals, Citizens for Alternatives to Animal Labs, Inc. v. Board of Trustees of the State University of New York (___ NY2d ___, October 22, 1998). In that case, even though records were kept pursuant to federal law by a state agency, the Court determined that the records fell within the coverage of the New York Freedom of Information Law and were subject to rights conferred by that statute. In short, the fact that records are kept or held by an agency brings them within the coverage of the Freedom of Information Law, irrespective of "the function or purpose for which an agency's documents are generated or held." The Court held further that "FOIL's scope...is not to be limited based on the [Federal] purpose' for which the certifications were kept 'or the function to which [they] relate [],' i.e., serving to comply with a Federal mandate..."

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Subject: Status of Labor Unions under the Freedom of Information Law

Dear Mr./Ms. Abbate:

Your email of January 26 sent to the Department of State was delivered to this office, the Committee on Open Government, today. The Committee is authorized to provide advice and opinions concerning the Freedom of Information Law.

You have asked whether "labor unions headquartered in New York State with a not-for-profit status [are] covered under the Freedom of Information Law. From my perspective, it is clear that labor unions are not subject to that statute.

In this regard, the Freedom of Information Law pertains to agency records, and section 86(3) of the Law defines the term "agency" to mean:

"any state or municipal department, board, bureau, division, commission, committee, public authority, public corporation, council, office or other governmental entity performing a governmental or proprietary function for the state or any one or more municipalities thereof, except the judiciary or the state legislature."

Based on the foregoing, the Freedom of Information Law includes entities of state and local government within its scope. Labor unions, which are not governmental entities, are not agencies and, therefore, are not subject to that statute.

I hope that I have been of assistance. Should any further questions arise, please feel free to contact me.

Dear Mr. Hinckson:

I have received your letter of January 21 in which you referred to a determination of an appeal rendered under the Freedom of Information Law by Anthony J. Annucci, Counsel to the Department of Correctional Services.

You criticized the determination based on "failure and bad faith effort to follow Article 6 section 89(5)(c)(2) time limit of (10) days to respond to [your] appeal infringed and created an unwarranted hindrance to appellant to file an Article 78 pursuant to the guideline requirements of Article 6 section 89(5)(d)." You also questioned Mr. Annucci's citation of §87(2)(f) based on your contention that a conclusion that disclosure "may" endanger the life or safety of any person is inadequate.

First, the provisions relating to the appeal to which you referred are not pertinent or applicable. Subdivision (5) of §89 pertains only to situations in which a commercial enterprise has asked that records be kept confidential by a state agency on the ground that disclosure would result in substantial injury to its competitive position. If your interest involves initiating an Article 78 proceeding to seek judicial review of Mr. Annucci's determination, you have the ability to do so pursuant to §89(4)(b) of the Freedom of Information Law within four months of the determination.

Second, as you are likely aware, §87(2)(f) permits an agency to withhold records to the extent that disclosure "would endanger the life or safety of any person." In cases involving the assertion of that provision, it has been determined that an agency is not required to demonstrate that disclosure "would" endanger life or safety. In citing §87(2)(f), it has been found that:

“This provision of the statute permits nondisclosure of information if it would pose a danger to the life or safety of any person. We reject petitioner’s assertion that respondents are required to prove that a danger to a person’s life or safety will occur if the information is made public (see, Matter of Nalo v. Sullivan, 125 AD2d 311, 312, lv denied 69 NY2d 612). Rather, there need only be a possibility that such information would endanger the lives or safety of individuals...” [Stronza v. Hoke, 148 AD2d 900, 901 (1989)].

It is noted that the principle enunciated in Stronza has appeared in several other decisions [see Ruberti, Girvin & Ferlazzo v. NYS Division of the State Police, 641 NYS2d 411, 218 AD2d 494 (1996), Connolly v. New York Guard, 572 NYS2d 443, 175 AD2d 372 (1991) and McDermott v. Lippman, Supreme Court, New York County, NYLJ, January 4, 1994]. Additionally, it was determined in American Broadcasting Companies, Inc. V. Siebert that when disclosure would “expose applicants and their families to danger to life or safety”, §87(2)(f) may properly be asserted [442 NYS2d 855, 859 (1981)].

I hope that the foregoing serves to enhance your understanding of the Freedom of Information Law and that I have been of assistance.

Dear Mr. Nolen:

I have received your letter of January 20 in which you sought an advisory opinion concerning the calculation of fees that may be assessed under the Freedom of Information Law in conjunction with the scenario that you presented.

In this regard, as you are aware, the Freedom of Information Law pertains to agency records and §86(4) defines the term "record" expansively to include:

"any information kept, held, filed, produced, reproduced by, with or for an agency or the state legislature, in any physical form whatsoever including, but not limited to, reports, statements, examinations, memoranda, opinions, folders, files, books, manuals, pamphlets, forms, papers, designs, drawings, maps, photos, letters, microfilms, computer tapes or discs, rules, regulations or codes."

Based upon the language quoted above, if information is maintained in some physical form, it would in my opinion constitute a "record" subject to rights of access conferred by the Law. Further, the definition of "record" includes specific reference to computer tapes and discs, and it was held more than ten years ago that "[i]nformation is increasingly being stored in computers and access to such data should not be restricted merely because it is not in printed form" [Babigian v. Evans, 427 NYS 2d 688, 691 (1980); aff'd 97 AD 2d 992 (1983); see also, Szikszy v. Buelow, 436 NYS 2d 558 (1981)].

When information is maintained electronically, in a computer, for example, it has been advised that if the information sought is available under the Freedom of Information Law and may be retrieved by means of existing computer programs, an agency is required to disclose the information. In that kind of situation, the agency in my view would merely be retrieving data that it has the capacity to retrieve. Disclosure may be accomplished either by printing out the data on paper or perhaps by duplicating the data on another storage mechanism, such as a computer tape or disk. On the other hand, if information sought can be retrieved from a computer or other storage medium only by means of new programming or the alteration of existing programs, those steps would, in my opinion, be the equivalent of creating a new record. As stated earlier, since §89(3) does not require an agency to create a record, I do not believe that an agency would be required to reprogram or develop new programs to retrieve information that would otherwise be available [see Guerrier v. Hernandez-Cuebas, 165 AD 2d 218 (1991)].

In Brownstone Publishers Inc. v. New York City Department of Buildings, the question involved an agency's obligation to transfer electronic information from one electronic storage medium to another when it had the technical capacity to do so and when the applicant was willing to pay the actual cost of the transfer. As stated by the Appellate Division, First Department:

"The files are maintained in a computer format that Brownstone can employ directly into its system, which can be reproduced on computer tapes at minimal cost in a few hours time-a cost Brownstone agreed to assume (see, POL [section] 87[1] [b] [iii]). The DOB, apparently intending to discourage this and similar requests, agreed to provide the information only in hard copy, i.e., printed out on over a million sheets of paper, at a cost of $10,000 for the paper alone, which would take five or six weeks to complete. Brownstone would then have to reconvert the data into computer-usable form at a cost of hundreds of thousands of dollars.

"Public Officers Law [section] 87(2) provides that, 'Each agency shall...make available for public inspection and copying all records...' Section 86(4) includes in its definition of 'record', computer tapes or discs. The policy underlying the FOIL is 'to insure maximum public access to government records' (Matter of Scott, Sardano & Pomerantz v. Records Access Officer, 65 N.Y.2d 294, 296-297, 491 N.Y.S.2d 289, 480 N.E.2d 1071). Under the circumstances presented herein, it is clear that both the statute and its underlying policy require that the DOB comply with Brownstone's reasonable request to have the information, presently maintained in computer language, transferred onto computer tapes" [166 Ad 2d, 294, 295 (1990)].

Further, in a more recent decision that cited Brownstone, it was held that: "[a]n agency which maintains in a computer format information sought by a F.O.I.L. request may be compelled to comply with the request to transfer information to computer disks or tape" (Samuel v. Mace, Supreme Court, Monroe County, December 11, 1992).

With respect to fees, §87(1)(b)(iii) of the Freedom of Information Law stated until October 15, 1982, that an agency could charge up to twenty-five cents per photocopy or the actual cost of reproduction unless a different fee was prescribed by "law". Chapter 73 of the Laws of 1982 replaced the word "law" with the term "statute". As described in the Committee's fourth annual report to the Governor and the Legislature of the Freedom of Information Law, which was submitted in December of 1981 and which recommended the amendment that is now law:

"The problem is that the term 'law' may include regulations, local laws, or ordinances, for example. As such, state agencies by means of regulation or municipalities by means of local law may and in some instances have established fees in excess of twenty-five cents per photocopy, thereby resulting in constructive denials of access. To remove this problem, the word 'law' should be replaced by 'statute', thereby enabling an agency to charge more than twenty-five cents only in situations in which an act of the State Legislature, a statute, so specifies."

Therefore, prior to October 15, 1982, a local law, an ordinance, or a regulation for instance, establishing a search fee or a fee in excess of twenty-five cents per photocopy or higher than the actual cost of reproduction was valid. However, under the amendment, only an act of the State Legislature, a statute, would in my view permit the assessment of a fee higher than twenty-five cents per photocopy, a fee that exceeds the actual cost of reproducing records that cannot be photocopied, (i.e., electronic information), or any other fee, such as a fee for search or overhead costs. In addition, it has been confirmed judicially that fees inconsistent with the Freedom of Information Law may be validly charged only when the authority to do so is conferred by a statute [see Sheehan v. City of Syracuse, 521 NYS 2d 207 (1987)].

Further, the specific language of the Freedom of Information Law and the regulations promulgated by the Committee on Open Government indicate that, absent statutory authority, an agency may charge fees only for the reproduction of records. Section 87(1)(b) of the Freedom of Information Law states:

"Each agency shall promulgate rules and regulations in conformance with this article...and pursuant to such general rules and regulations as may be promulgated by the committee on open government in conformity with the provisions of this article, pertaining to the availability of records and procedures to be followed, including, but not limited to...

(iii) the fees for copies of records which shall not exceed twenty-five cents per photocopy not in excess of nine by fourteen inches, or the actual cost of reproducing any other record, except when a different fee is otherwise prescribed by statute."

Mr. Wallace S. Nolen
February 4, 1999
Page -4-

The regulations promulgated by the Committee state in relevant part that:

"Except when a different fee is otherwise prescribed by statute:

(a) There shall be no fee charged for the following:

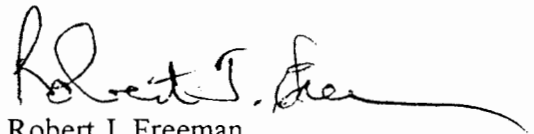

- (1) inspection of records;
- (2) search for records; or
- (3) any certification pursuant to this Part" (21 NYCRR 1401.8)."

Based upon the foregoing, a fee for reproducing electronic information would involve the cost of computer time, plus the cost of an information storage medium (i.e., a computer tape or disk) to which data is transferred. If, for example, the duplication of the data involves a transfer of data from one disk to another, computer time is minimal, likely a matter of seconds. If that is so, the actual cost may involve only the cost of the disks.

I note that in a recent decision (see attached, Simpson v. Town of East Hampton, Supreme Court, Suffolk County, June 4, 1997), it was determined that the fee for the duplication of electronic information would be based on the cost of computer tapes and the energy, i.e., electricity used in the process of duplicating the data onto the tapes.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Robert J. Freeman
Executive Director

Dear Mr. McCoy:

I have received your letter of January 25 and the correspondence attached to it. You have sought guidance concerning a delay in response to your request for records by the Office of the Rockland County Attorney.

In this regard, the Freedom of Information Law provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies must respond to requests. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

"Each entity subject to the provisions of this article, within five business days of the receipt of a written request for a record reasonably described, shall make such record available to the person requesting it, deny such request in writing or furnish a written acknowledgement of the receipt of such request and a statement of the approximate date when such request will be granted or denied..."

Based on the foregoing, an agency must grant access to records, deny access or acknowledge the receipt of a request within five business days of receipt of a request. When an acknowledgement is given, it must include an approximate date indicating when it can be anticipated that a request will be granted or denied. The acknowledgement by the records access officer did not make reference to such a date.

I note that there is no precise time period within which an agency must grant or deny access to records. The time needed to do so may be dependent upon the volume of a request, the possibility that other requests have been made, the necessity to conduct legal research, the search and retrieval techniques used to locate the records and the like. In short, when an agency acknowledges the receipt of a request because more than five business days may be needed to grant or deny a request, so long as it provides an approximate date indicating when the request will be granted or denied, and that date is reasonable in view of the attendant circumstances, I believe that the agency would be acting in compliance with law.

If neither a response to a request nor an acknowledgement of the receipt of a request is given within five business days, or if an agency delays responding for an unreasonable time after it acknowledges that a request has been received, a request may, in my opinion, be considered to have been constructively denied. In such a circumstance, I believe that the denial may be appealed in accordance with §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law. That provision states in relevant part that:

"...any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive, or governing body, who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

In addition, it has been held that when an appeal is made but a determination is not rendered within ten business days of the receipt of the appeal as required under §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, the appellant has exhausted his or her administrative remedies and may initiate a challenge to a constructive denial of access under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Rules [Floyd v. McGuire, 87 AD 2d 388, appeal dismissed 57 NY 2d 774 (1982)].

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Dear Mr. Ramsey:

I have received your letter of January 25. Your inquiry pertains to your ability to obtain a copy of your pre-sentence report.

In this regard, although the Freedom of Information Law provides broad rights of access to records, the first ground for denial, §87(2)(a), states that an agency may withhold records or portions thereof that "...are specifically exempted from disclosure by state or federal statute..." Relevant under the circumstances is §390.50 of the Criminal Procedure Law, which, in my opinion represents the exclusive procedure concerning access to pre-sentence reports.

Section 390.50(1) of the Criminal Procedure Law states that:

"Any pre-sentence report or memorandum submitted to the court pursuant to this article and any medical, psychiatric or social agency report or other information gathered for the court by a probation department, or submitted directly to the court, in connection with the question of sentence is confidential and may not be made available to any person or public or private agency except where specifically required or permitted by statute or upon specific authorization of the court. For purposes of this section, any report, memorandum or other information forwarded to a probation department within this state is governed by the same rules of confidentiality. Any person, public or private agency receiving such material must retain it under the same conditions of confidentiality as apply to the probation department that made it available."

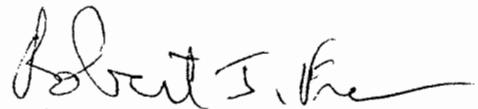

Mr. Kent L. Ramsey

In addition, subdivision (2) of §390.50 states in part that: "The pre-sentence report shall be made available by the court for examination and copying in connection with any appeal in the case..."

In view of the foregoing, I believe that a pre-sentence report may be made available only upon the order of a court, and only under the circumstances described in §390.50 of the Criminal Procedure Law. It is suggested that you review that statute.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Dear Mr. Holmes:

I have received your letter of January 27. You have sought assistance in relation to a request for records made to the FOIL officer at your facility that had not been answered.

In this regard, the Freedom of Information Law provides direction concerning the time and manner in which an agency must respond to requests. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

"Each entity subject to the provisions of this article, within five business days of the receipt of a written request for a record reasonably described, shall make such record available to the person requesting it, deny such request in writing or furnish a written acknowledgement of the receipt of such request and a statement of the approximate date when such request will be granted or denied..."

If neither a response to a request nor an acknowledgement of the receipt of a request is given within five business days, or if an agency delays responding for an unreasonable time after it acknowledges that a request has been received, a request may, in my opinion, be considered to have been constructively denied. In such a circumstance, I believe that the denial may be appealed in accordance with §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law. That provision states in relevant part that:

"...any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive, or governing body, who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

In addition, it has been held that when an appeal is made but a determination is not rendered within ten business days of the receipt of the appeal as required under §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, the appellant has exhausted his or her administrative remedies and may initiate a challenge to a constructive denial of access under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Rules [Floyd v. Mr. Steven L. Fornal

Dear Mr. Fornal:

I have received your letter of January 27. While some of the issues that you raised were considered in the opinion addressed to you on January 29, for purposes of clarity, I offer the following remarks.

First, you wrote that the Chairman of the Town of Rochester Planning Board stated, in your words, that "by law -- the town planning board is required to keep stenographic notes and the approved/accepted minutes as the official record." In this regard, I know of no law that requires that a planning board or any public body maintain stenographic notes of meetings. In general, the "official record" of a meeting, the information to be memorialized and kept permanently, would be the minutes.

In this regard, the Open Meetings Law offers direction on the subject and provides what might be characterized as minimum requirements concerning the contents of minutes. Specifically, §106 of that statute states that:

"1. Minutes shall be taken at all open meetings of a public body which shall consist of a record or summary of all motions, proposals, resolutions and any other matter formally voted upon and the vote thereon.

2. Minutes shall be taken at executive sessions of any action that is taken by formal vote which shall consist of a record or summary of the final determination of such action, and the date and vote thereon; provided, however, that such summary need not include any matter which is not required to be made public by the freedom of information law as added by article six of this chapter.

3. Minutes of meetings of all public bodies shall be available to the public in accordance with the provisions of the freedom of information law within two weeks from the date of such meetings except that minutes taken pursuant to subdivision two hereof shall be available to the public within one week from the date of the executive session."

Based upon the foregoing, minutes must be prepared and made available within two weeks, and it is clear that minutes need not consist of a verbatim account of every comment that was made.

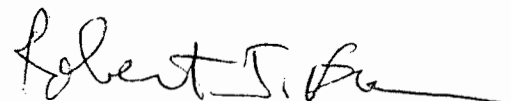

Moreover, there is nothing in the Open Meetings Law or any other statute of which I am aware that requires that minutes be approved. Nevertheless, as a matter of practice or policy, many public bodies approve minutes of their meetings. In the event that minutes have not been approved, to comply with the Open Meetings Law, it has consistently been advised that minutes be prepared and made available within two weeks, and that they may be marked "unapproved", "draft" or "non-final", for example. By so doing within the requisite time limitations, the public can generally know what transpired at a meeting; concurrently, the public is effectively notified that the minutes are subject to change.

Second, for reasons discussed in the earlier correspondence, a tape recording of a meeting constitutes a "record" that falls within the coverage of the Freedom of Information Law. Whether it is characterized as "official" has no bearing on its status under that statute; it is a record subject to rights of public access.

Lastly, since the Chairman apparently recommended that rules be adopted to state that "the tape recorder may be turned off during meetings", again, there is no law of which I am aware that requires that meetings be tape recorded in whole or in part. However, I note that judicial decisions indicate that any person present at a meeting, i.e., any member of the public, may use his or her own device to record an open meeting, so long its use is not disruptive [see Mitchell v. Board of Education of the Garden City Union Free School District, 113 AD2d 924 (1985); Peloquin v. Arsenault, 616 NYS 2d 716 (1994); and People v. Ystueta, 99 Misc. 2d 1105, 418 NYS 2d 508 (1979)].

Dear Mr. Thomas:

I have received a copy of your letter to a court reporter in which you requested copies of certain records under the Freedom of Information Law.

In this regard, it is emphasized that the Freedom of Information Law is applicable to agency records, and that §86(3) defines the term "agency" to include:

"any state or municipal department, board, bureau, division, commission, committee, public authority, public corporation, council, office or other governmental entity performing a governmental or proprietary function for the state or any one or more municipalities thereof, except the judiciary or the state legislature."

In turn, §86(1) defines the term "judiciary" to mean:

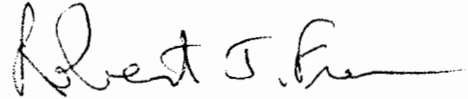

"the courts of the state, including any municipal or district court, whether or not of record."

Based on the provisions quoted above, the courts and court records are not subject to the Freedom of Information Law. This is not to suggest that court records are not generally available to the public, for other provisions of law (see e.g., Judiciary Law, §255) may grant broad public access to those records. Even though other statutes may deal with access to court records, the procedural provisions associated with the Freedom of Information Law (i.e., those involving the designation of a records access officer or the right to appeal a denial) would not ordinarily be applicable. It is suggested that a request for court records be made to the clerk of the appropriate court, citing an applicable provision of law as the basis for the request.

[REDACTED]

Dear Mr. Brixner:

I have received your letter of January 29 in which you asked whether "a State Assembly member is covered under the Freedom of Information Law."

In this regard, the State Legislature is subject to provisions in the Freedom of Information Law that are in some instances different from those applicable to agencies of state and local government. Section 88(1) pertains to the State Legislature and states in relevant part that:

"The temporary president of the senate and the speaker of the assembly shall promulgate rules and regulations for their respective houses in conformity with the provisions of this article, pertaining to the availability, location and nature of records, including, but not limited to:

- (a) the times and places such records are available;
- (b) the persons from whom such records may be obtained..."

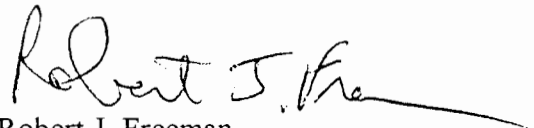

I believe that the Assembly's rules include the designation of a records access officer, whose duty involves the coordination of responses to requests for records of the Assembly. In my view, when a request is made under the Freedom of Information Law for records a member of the Assembly, that person should either respond in a manner consistent with the Freedom of Information Law or forward to the request to the Assembly's records access officer, Ms. Sharon Walsh.

Mr. Jerry Brixner

With respect to rights of access, in brief, as the Freedom of Information Law applies to agencies, that statute is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law. As the Law applies to the State Legislature, §88(2) and (3) include reference to certain categories of records that must be disclosed. Therefore, unless records of the Legislature fall within one or more of those categories of accessible records, there is no obligation to disclose. From my perspective, it is questionable whether the records of your interest, if they exist, would fall within the categories of records that must be disclosed by the State Legislature.

I hope that the foregoing serves to clarify your understanding of the matter and that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Mr. Briant George
94-A-3921
Auburn Correctional Facility
135 State Street/POB 618
Auburn, NY 13021

Dear Mr. George:

I have received your letter of January 25 in which you asked that this office monitor and offer an opinion concerning your request for records sent to the Manhattan Robbery Squad. You also suggested that requests from inmates are frequently ignored.

In this regard, first, pursuant to the regulations promulgated by the Committee on Open Government (21 NYCRR Part 1401), each agency is required to designate one or more persons as "records access officer." The records access officer has the duty of coordinating an agency's response, and requests should ordinarily be made to that person. I believe that the person in receipt of your request should have responded in a manner consistent with the Freedom of Information Law or forwarded your request to the records access officer. Nevertheless, it is suggested that you resubmit your request to the Records Access Officer, New York City Police Department, Room 110C, One Police Plaza, New York, NY 10038.

Second, I note that the Freedom of Information Law provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies must respond to requests. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

If neither a response to a request nor an acknowledgement of the receipt of a request is given within five business days, or if an agency delays responding for an unreasonable time after it acknowledges that a request has been received, a request may, in my opinion, be considered to have been constructively denied. In such a circumstance, I believe that the denial may be appealed in accordance with §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law. That provision states in relevant part that:

"...any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive, or governing body, who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

In addition, it has been held that when an appeal is made but a determination is not rendered within ten business days of the receipt of the appeal as required under §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, the appellant has exhausted his or her administrative remedies and may initiate a challenge to a constructive denial of access under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Rules [Floyd v. McGuire, 87 AD 2d 388, appeal dismissed 57 NY 2d 774 (1982)].

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Dear Mr. Johnson:

I have received your letter of February 1 in which you requested certain records from this office.

In this regard, first, the Committee on Open Government (formerly known as the Committee on Public Access to Records) is authorized to provide advice and opinions concerning the Freedom of Information Law. The Committee does not have custody or control of records generally, and neither this office nor the Department of State has possession of the records of your interest.

Second, since your request appears to involve court records, I note that the Freedom of Information Law is applicable to agency records, and that §86(3) defines the term "agency" to include:

"any state or municipal department, board, bureau, division, commission, committee, public authority, public corporation, council, office or other governmental entity performing a governmental or proprietary function for the state or any one or more municipalities thereof, except the judiciary or the state legislature."

In turn, §86(1) defines the term "judiciary" to mean:

Dear Mr. Brown:

I have received your letter of January 23, which reached this office on February 16. You have appealed an alleged denial of access to court records.

In this regard, the Committee on Open Government is authorized to provide advice concerning the Freedom of Information Law. The Committee is not empowered to determine appeals or otherwise compel an entity to grant or deny access to records. The provisions in the Freedom of Information Law pertaining to the right to appeal are found in §89(4)(a) of that statute.

In addition, it is emphasized that the Freedom of Information Law is applicable to agency records, and that §86(3) defines the term "agency" to include:

"any state or municipal department, board, bureau, division, commission, committee, public authority, public corporation, council, office or other governmental entity performing a governmental or proprietary function for the state or any one or more municipalities thereof, except the judiciary or the state legislature."

Dear Mr. Hemingway:

I have received your letter of January 29, as well as the correspondence attached to it.

You referred to a delay in response to certain requests for records and asked that this office contact those agencies "to ascertain why [your] requests [have] not been granted...."

In this regard, the primary function of the Committee on Open Government involves providing advice concerning the Freedom of Information Law. The Committee generally does not contact agencies to ascertain why a request might not have been granted. Further, based on a review of the correspondence, the Freedom of Information Law would not be applicable.

It is emphasized that the Freedom of Information Law pertains to agency records. Section 86 (3) of that statute defines the term "agency" to mean:

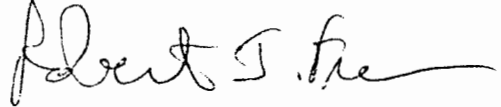

"any state or municipal department, board, bureau, division, commission, committee, public authority, public corporation, council, office or other governmental entity performing a governmental or proprietary function for the state or any one or more municipalities thereof, except the judiciary or the state legislature."

Based on the foregoing, the Freedom of Information Law generally applies to entities of state and local government. Since the entities identified in your correspondence are not governmental in nature, they would fall beyond the coverage and the requirements of the Freedom of Information Law.

Dear Mr. Luis;

I have received your letter of January 25, which reached this office on February 3.

You have asked whether you are entitled to obtain records from the Office of the State Comptroller indicating amounts awarded to inmates in civil litigation by court order or through settlement, as well as the names of any such cases.

In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First, as a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law. In my view, the kinds of records in which you are interested would be available, for none of the grounds for denial would appear to be applicable.

Second, however, an issue of likely significance likely involves the extent to which such a request would "reasonably describe" the records as required by §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law. I point out that it has been held by the Court of Appeals that to deny a request on the ground that it fails to reasonably describe the records, an agency must establish that "the descriptions were insufficient for purposes of locating and identifying the documents sought" [Konigsberg v. Coughlin, 68 NY 2d 245, 249 (1986)].

The Court in Konigsberg found that the agency could not reject the request due to its breadth and also stated that:

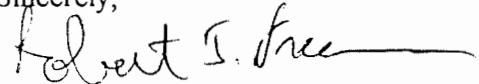

"respondents have failed to supply any proof whatsoever as to the nature - or even the existence - of their indexing system: whether the Department's files were indexed in a manner that would enable the identification and location of documents in their possession (cf. National Cable Tel. Assn. v Federal Communications Commn., 479 F2d 183, 192 [Bazelon, J.] [plausible claim of nonidentifiability under Federal Freedom of Information Act, 5 USC section 552 (a) (3), may be presented where agency's indexing system was such that 'the requested documents could not be identified by retracing a path already trodden. It would have required a wholly new enterprise, potentially requiring a search of every file in the possession of the agency'])" (id. at 250).

In my view, whether a request reasonably describes the records sought, as suggested by the Court of Appeals, may be dependent upon the terms of a request, as well as the nature of an agency's filing or record-keeping system. In Konigsberg, it appears that the agency was able to locate the records on the basis of an inmate's name and identification number.

While I am unfamiliar with the recordkeeping systems of the Office of the State Comptroller, to the extent that the records can be located with reasonable effort, I believe that a request would meet the requirement of reasonably describing the records. On the other hand, if the records are not maintained in a manner that permits their retrieval except by reviewing perhaps hundreds or even thousands of records individually in an effort to locate those falling within the scope of the request, to that extent, the request would not in my opinion meet the standard of reasonably describing the records. If the agency maintains all of its records regarding awards to inmates, since the beginning of its existence, in a single file, it may be a simple task to locate the records. If, however, records or awards are not maintained in a separate file or system pertaining to inmates, but rather alphabetically or chronologically, locating the records might involve a search, in essence, for the needle in the haystack. Based on the holding by the State's highest court, an agency is not required to engage in that kind of effort.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Robert J. Freeman

Mr. Francis X. Stock
First Ward Trustee
Village of Lancaster
25 Sherborne Avenue
Lancaster, NY 14086-3115

Dear Trustee Stock:

I have received your letter of February 12 in which you sought an advisory opinion.

You indicated that you "have periodically sent the Village Board letters and have also had letters at Board meetings", but that the Board "has refused to enter [your] letters into the Village's correspondence" or to include them in minutes of meetings. You added that it is your "feeling that they do not want to accept your correspondence as official correspondence or even enter [your] statements into official Board minutes as a measure to circumvent the Freedom of Information Law." You have sought guidance concerning the requirement in relation to the foregoing.

In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First, the Freedom of Information Law does not distinguish between "official correspondence" and other correspondence. That statute pertains to agency records and §86 (4) defines the term "record" expansively to include:

"any information kept, held, filed, produced, reproduced by, with or for an agency or the state legislature, in any physical form whatsoever including, but not limited to, reports, statements, examinations, memoranda, opinions, folders, files, books, manuals, pamphlets, forms, papers, designs, drawings, maps, photos, letters, microfilms, computer tapes or discs, rules, regulations or codes."

Mr. Francis X. Stock

Based on the language quoted above, when a letter or other item of correspondence comes into the possession of the Village, irrespective of its source, the letter or other correspondence constitutes a "record" that falls within the scope of the Freedom of Information Law. However, there is nothing in the Freedom of Information Law or any other statute of which I am aware that would require the Board of Trustees to acknowledge, "officially accept", or answer your letters or similar items of correspondence.

In short, while the items to which you referred are Village records, the Board is not obliged to take any public or official step in publicly acknowledging their receipt.

Second, with respect to reference to your comments or correspondence in minutes of meetings, I note that the Open Meetings Law contains what might be characterized as minimum requirements concerning contents of minutes. Specifically §106 (1) of the Open Meetings Law pertains to minutes of meetings of public bodies and states that:

"Minutes shall be taken at all open meetings of a public body which shall consist of a record or summary of all motions, proposals, resolutions and any other matter formally voted upon and the vote thereon."

Based on the foregoing, minutes need not consist of a verbatim account of everything said at a meeting; on the contrary, so long as the minutes include the kinds of information described in §106, I believe that they would be appropriate and meet legal requirements.

I point out that in an opinion issued by the State Comptroller, it was advised that when a member of a board requests that his statement be entered into the minutes, the board must determine, under its rules of procedure, whether to record the statement in writing, which would then be entered as part of the minutes (1980 Op.St.Comp. File #82-181). From my perspective, a village board of trustees, like other public bodies, functions by means of action taken by a majority vote of its total membership. Pertinent is §41 of the General Construction Law, entitled "Quorum and majority", which states that:

"Whenever three or more public officers are given any power or authority, or three or more persons are charged with any public duty to be performed or exercised by them jointly or as a board or similar body, a majority of the whole number of such persons or officers, at a meeting duly held at a time fixed by law, or by any by-law duly adopted by such board of body, or at any duly adjourned meeting of such meeting, or at any meeting duly held upon reasonable notice to all of them, shall constitute a quorum and not less than a majority of the whole number may perform and exercise such power, authority or dy. For the purpose of this provision the words 'whole number' shall be construed to mean the total number which the board, commission, body or other group of persons or officers would have were there no vacancies and were one of the persons or officers disqualified from acting."

Based on §41, a quorum is a majority of the total membership of a public body, notwithstanding absences or vacancies. Further, in order to carry a motion or take action, there must be an affirmative vote of a majority of the total membership of a public body. Therefore, if, for example, the Board consists of five members, three affirmative votes would be required to take action.

In the context of your question, I do not believe that a single member or a minority of members could insist or require that their comments or letters be included in minutes; those additions would be required to be included only following an approval to do so by means of an affirmative vote by a majority of the Board's total membership.

I hope that the foregoing serves to enhance your understanding of the matter and I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Mr. Ralph R. Martinelli
Publisher
Martinelli Publications
40 Larkin Plaza
Yonkers, NY 10701

Dear Mr. Martinelli:

I have received your letter of February 2 in which you sought an advisory opinion concerning the Freedom of Information Law.

According to your letter, you indicated, in brief, that you have been unable to obtain "time sheet records" pertaining to a person employed by Senator Nicholas Spano.

In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First, I point out that §88 of the Freedom of Information Law deals with rights of access to records of the State Legislature. Further, while there have been numerous judicial decisions concerning rights of access to agency records in accordance with provisions applicable to agencies, there are few decisions that have been rendered with respect to access to records of the Legislature.

It is also noted that the structure of the Freedom of Information Law as it pertains to the State Legislature, differs from its structure as it pertains to agencies of state and local government subject to §87 of the Law. Section 86 (3) of the Law defines the term "agency" to mean:

"any state or municipal department, board, bureau, division, commission, committee, public authority, public corporation, council, office or other governmental entity performing a governmental or proprietary function for the state or any one or more municipalities thereof, except the judiciary or the state legislature."

In brief, as the Freedom of Information Law applies to agencies, that statute is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law. As the Law applies to the State Legislature, §88(2) and (3) include reference to certain categories of records that must be disclosed. Therefore, unless records of the Legislature fall within one or more of those categories of accessible records, there is no obligation to disclose.

Second, of potential relevance to your inquiry is §88(3)(b), which requires that each house of the State Legislature maintain and make available "a record setting forth the name, public office address, title and salary of every officer or employee." While that record is not the subject of your request, it may relate to the records sought. Among the categories of records available from the State Legislature is §88(2)(e), which requires the disclosure of "internal or external audits and statistical or factual tabulations of, or with respect to, material otherwise available for inspection and copying pursuant to this section or any other applicable provision of law."

I am unfamiliar with the content of the records in which you are interested. However, if they are analogous to some time and attendance records, arguably, they would include "statistical or tabulations of, or with respect to" the payroll record required to be made available pursuant to §88(3)(b); on the other hand, if their contents are different or unrelated to records otherwise available by law, they would be beyond the scope of rights of access.

Lastly, it is noted that in a decision affirmed by the State's highest court dealing with attendance records maintained by an agency (not the State Legislature), specifically those indicating the days and dates of sick leave claimed by a particular employee, it was found that the records are accessible. In that case, the Appellate Division found that:

"One of the most basic obligations of any employee is to appear for work when scheduled to do so. Concurrent with this is the rights of an employee to properly use sick leave available to him or her. In the instant case, intervenor had an obligation to report for work when scheduled along with a right to use sick leave in accordance with his collective bargaining agreement. The taxpayers have an interest in such use of sick leave for economic as well as safety reasons. Thus it can hardly be said that disclosure of the dates in February 1983 when intervenor made use of sick leave would constitute an unwarranted invasion of privacy. Further, the motives of petitioners or the means by which they will report the information is not determinative since all records of government agencies are presumptively available for inspection without regard to the status, need, good faith or purpose of the applicant requesting access..."[Capital Newspapers v. Burns, 109 AD 2d 92, 94-95 (1985), aff'd 67 NY 2d 562 (1986)].

Insofar as an agency's attendance records or time sheets include reference to reasons for an absence, it has been advised that an explanation of why sick time might have been used, i.e., a description of an illness or medical problem found in records, could be withheld or deleted from a record otherwise available, for disclosure of so personal a detail of a person's life would likely constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy and would not be relevant to the performance of an employee's duties. A number, however, which merely indicates the amount of sick time or vacation time accumulated or used, or the dates and times of attendance or absence, would not in my view represent a personal detail of an individual's life and would be relevant to the performance of one's official duties.

Based on the preceding analysis, it is clear that an agency's attendance records must be disclosed under the Freedom of Information Law. As suggested earlier, whether that is so with respect to similar records maintained by the State Legislature would be dependent upon their contents and their relationship to records that are available pursuant to law.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Mr. Frank L. Gennuso
85-C-0127
Erie County Correctional Facility
11581 Walden Avenue
Alden, NY 14004

Dear Mr. Gennuso:

I have received your letter of January 28. You have sought an advisory opinion concerning a request made to the City of Buffalo Police Department for "the written procedures laboratory testing of alleged controlled substances." You added that as of the date of your letter to this office, you had received no response to the request.

In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First, the Freedom of Information Law provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies must respond to requests. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

"Each entity subject to the provisions of this article, within five business days of the receipt of a written request for a record reasonably described, shall make such record available to the person requesting it, deny such request in writing or furnish a written acknowledgement of the receipt of such request and a statement of the approximate date when such request will be granted or denied..."

If neither a response to a request nor an acknowledgement of the receipt of a request is given within five business days, or if an agency delays responding for an unreasonable time after it acknowledges that a request has been received, a request may, in my opinion, be considered to have been constructively denied. In such a circumstance, I believe that the denial may be appealed in accordance with §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law. That provision states in relevant part that:

"any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive, or governing body, who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

In addition, it has been held that when an appeal is made but a determination is not rendered within ten business days of the receipt of the appeal as required under section 89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, the appellant has exhausted his or her administrative remedies and may initiate a challenge to a constructive denial of access under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Rules [Floyd v. McGuire, 87 AD 2d 388, appeal dismissed 57 NY 2d 774 (1982)].

Second, as a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more of the grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law. I am unfamiliar with the contents of the records in which you are interested. However, from my perspective, three of the grounds for denial may be relevant to your inquiry.

Specifically, §87(2)(g) states that an agency may withhold records that:

"are inter-agency or intra-agency materials which are not:

- i. statistical or factual tabulations or data;
- ii. instructions to staff that affect the public;
- iii. final agency policy or determinations; or
- iv. external audits, including but not limited to audits performed by the comptroller and the federal government..."

It is noted that the language quoted above contains what in effect is a double negative. While inter-agency or intra-agency materials may be withheld, portions of such materials consisting of statistical or factual information, instructions to staff that affect the public, final agency policy or determinations or external audits must be made available, unless a different basis for denial is applicable. Concurrently, those portions of inter-agency or intra-agency materials that are reflective of opinion, advice, recommendation and the like could in my view be withheld. It would appear that the records in question consist of instructions to staff that affect the public or an agency's policy. Therefore, I believe that rules and regulations would be available, unless a different basis for denial could be asserted.

A second provision of potential significance is §87(2)(e), which permits an agency to withhold records that:

"are compiled for law enforcement purposes and which, if disclosed, would:

- i. interfere with law enforcement investigations of judicial proceedings...
- ii. deprive a person of a right to a fair trial or impartial adjudication;
- iii. identify a confidential source or disclose confidential information relating to a criminal investigation; or
- iv. reveal criminal investigative techniques or procedures, except routine techniques and procedures."

Under the circumstances, it appears that most relevant is §87(2)(e)(iv). The leading decision concerning that provision is Fink v. Lefkowitz, which involved access to a manual prepared by a special prosecutor that investigated nursing homes, in which the Court of Appeals held that:

"The purpose of this exemption is obvious. Effective law enforcement demands that violators of the law not be apprised the nonroutine procedures by which an agency obtains its information (see Frankel v. Securities & Exch. Comm., 460 F2d 813, 817, cert den 409 US 889). However beneficial its thrust, the purpose of the Freedom of Information Law is not to enable persons to use agency records to frustrate pending or threatened investigations nor to use that information to construct a defense to impede a prosecution.

"To be distinguished from agency records compiled for law enforcement purposes which illustrate investigative techniques, are those which articulate the agency's understanding of the rules and regulations it is empowered to enforce. Records drafted by the body charged with enforcement of a statute which merely clarify procedural or substantive law must be disclosed. Such information in the hands of the public does not impede effective law enforcement. On the contrary, such knowledge actually encourages voluntary compliance with the law by detailing the standards with which a person is expected to comply, thus allowing him to conform his conduct to those requirements (see Stokes v. Brennan, 476 F2d 699, 702; Hawkes v. Internal Revenue Serv., 467 F2d 787, 794-795; Davis, Administrative Law [1970 Supp], section 3A, p 114).

"Indicative, but not necessarily dispositive of whether investigative techniques are nonroutine is whether disclosure of those procedures would give rise to a substantial likelihood that violators could evade detection by deliberately tailoring their conduct in anticipation of avenues of inquiry to be pursued by agency personnel (see Cox v. United States Dept. of Justice, 576 F2d 1302, 1307-1308; City of Concord v. Ambrose, 333 F Supp 958). It is no secret that numbers on a balance sheet can be made to do magical things by scrupulous nursing home operators the path that an audit is likely to take and alerting them to items to which investigators are instructed to pay particular attention, does not encourage observance of the law. Rather, release of such information actually countenances fraud by enabling miscreants to alter their books and activities to minimize the possibility of being brought to task for criminal activities. In such a case, the procedures contained in an administrative manual are, in a very real sense, compilations of investigative techniques exempt from disclosure. The Freedom of Information Law was not enacted to furnish the safecracker with the combination to the safe" (id. at 572-573).

In applying those criteria to specific portions of the manual, which was compiled for law enforcement purposes, the Court found that:

"Chapter V of the Special Prosecutor's Manual provides a graphic illustration of the confidential techniques used in a successful nursing home prosecution. None of those procedures are 'routine' in the sense of fingerprinting or ballistic tests (see Senate Report No. 93-1200, 93 Cong 2d Sess [1974]). Rather, they constitute detailed, specialized methods of conducting an investigation into the activities of a specialized industry in which voluntary compliance with the law has been less than exemplary.

"Disclosure of the techniques enumerated in those pages would enable an operator to tailor his activities in such a way as to significantly diminish the likelihood of a successful prosecution. The information detailed on pages 481 and 482 of the manual, on the other hand, is merely a recitation of the obvious: that auditors should pay particular attention to requests by nursing homes for Medicaid reimbursement rate increases based upon projected increase in cost. As this is simply a routine technique that would be used in any audit, there is no reason why these pages should not be disclosed" (id. at 573).

While I am unfamiliar with the records in question, it would appear that those portions which, if disclosed, would enable potential lawbreakers to evade detection could likely be withheld. It is noted that in another decision which dealt with a request for certain regulations of the State Police, the Court of Appeals found that some aspects of the regulations were non-routine, and that disclosure could "allow miscreants to tailor their activities to evade detection" [De Zimm v. Connelie, 64 NY 2d 860 (1985)]. Nevertheless, other portions of the records might be "routine" and apparently would not if disclosed preclude police officers from carrying out their duties effectively.

The remaining ground for denial of possible relevance is §87(2)(f). That provision permits an agency to withhold records when disclosure "would endanger the life of safety of any person." To the extent that disclosure would endanger the life of safety of law enforcement officers or others, it appears that §87(2)(f) would be applicable.

In sum, while some aspects of the records might be deniable, others must in my opinion be disclosed in conjunction with the preceding commentary.

Enclosed, as requested, is a copy of the latest report of the Committee on Open Government.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Ms. Jeanne E. Stives
Village Clerk- Treas.
Village of Portville
P.O. Box 436
Portville, NY 14770

Dear Ms. Stives:

I have received your correspondence of February 5 in which you sought guidance concerning public rights of access to water and sewer bills, including customers' or users' names. The bills have been sought by a citizens committee "looking for ways to lower their bills."

From my perspective, the bills should be disclosed, including the names of customers or users of water and sewers. In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First, as a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law.

Second, the only ground for denial pertinent to an analysis of rights of access is §87(2)(b), which enables an agency to withhold records or portions thereof which "if disclosed would constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy under the provisions of subdivision two of section eighty-nine of this article." In my opinion, the use of water or a sewer hardly represents an intimate or personal detail of peoples' lives that could, if disclosed, be characterized as an unwarranted invasion of privacy. It is also noted that the records in question had been available under §51 of the General Municipal Law long before the enactment of the Freedom of Information Law. Further, analogous information is routinely disclosed in other records. For example, assessment records, which are clearly public, indicate the owner and location of real property, its assessed value, details regarding structures on the property, the amount owed or paid by the owner and whether the owner is delinquent in the payment of taxes. The bills in question in my opinion include less information than the assessment records, and disclosure would not be so significant as to result in an unwarranted invasion of privacy.

Third, §89(2)(b) contains a series of examples of unwarranted invasions of privacy. The only example relevant to the facts of the situation presented is §89(2)(b)(iv), which states that an unwarranted invasion of privacy includes:

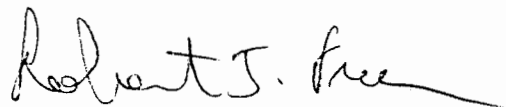

"disclosure of information of a personal nature when disclosure would result in economic or personal hardship to the subject party and such information is not relevant to the work of the agency requesting or maintaining it..."

In construing that provision, it has been found that its language is conjunctive. As stated by the state's highest court, the Court of Appeals, in Gannett Co. Inc. v. County of Monroe, which considered the same provision in the original Freedom of Information Law, "the exception...is available only if there is both proof of such hardships and it is established that the records sought are not relevant or essential to the ordinary work of the agency or municipality. The latter branch of this conjunctive requirement cannot be met in this instance" [emphasis added by court, 45 NY 2d 954, 955 (1978)]. Similarly, in another case that involved §89(2)(b)(iv), the court cited the Gannett decision and found that the application of that provision required that the "test" of finding that disclosure would result in personal or economic hardship and that the information was not relevant to the work of the agency could not be met. Therefore, it was held that the records were required to be made available [Flatbush Development Corp. v. Insurance Department, Sup. Ct., New York County, NYLJ, October 7, 1983].

In this instance, for reasons described earlier, I do not believe that disclosure would result in personal or economic hardship. Moreover, the records are clearly relevant to the work of the agency. Consequently, again, I believe that the records must be disclosed, including the names found within them.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Robert J. Freeman

[REDACTED]

Dear Ms. Carney:

I have received your letter of February 3 and the materials attached to it.

Having submitted a request to the City Clerk of the City of Oneonta under the Freedom of Information Law, you received responses that included "cc's" to several City officials. You have questioned the propriety of the distribution of your request to those officials and asked whether you "have the right to request public information without uninvolved City officials being notified of [your] actions."

In this regard, there is no provision of law that would preclude the City Clerk from sharing your request with City officials or transmitting copies of his responses to them. Situations frequently arise in which an agency's designated records access officer seeks the services of other agency officials, for those officials may have physical custody of the records sought, they may be familiar with the contents of the records and offer assistance concerning the extent to which the records should be disclosed, or attorneys may offer legal advice concerning the obligations imposed by law. In short, it is not uncommon for requests and the responses to them to be distributed to agency staff.

It is also noted that requests made under the Freedom of Information Law are generally accessible to the public under that statute. As a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law. From my perspective, with rare exceptions, requests are accessible under the law.

In my view, the only instances in which requests may be withheld in part would involve situations in which, due to the nature of their contents, disclosure would constitute "an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy" [see Freedom of Information Law, §§87(2)(b) and 89(2)]. For instance, if a recipient of public assistance seeks records pertaining to his or her participation in a public assistance program, disclosure of the request would itself indicate that he or she has received public assistance. In that case, I believe that identifying details could be deleted to protect against an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy.

Having reviewed your request, I do not believe that it includes what may be characterized as intimate or personal information or that disclosure would constitute an unwarranted invasion of privacy.

I hope that the foregoing serves to enhance your understanding of the matter and that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Mr. Larry G. Campbell
79-C-0029
Sing Sing Correctional Facility
354 Hunter Street
Ossining, NY 10562-5442

Dear Mr. Campbell:

I have received your letter of February 2 in which you sought assistance in relation to a request for records of the Erie County Department of Central Police Services.

The correspondence attached to your letter indicates that on June 30, you asked that coordinator at the Department of Police Services "identify any and all records, papers and forms, analyses reports, memoranda, correspondence, or documents regarding any and all analyses made by any 'Central Police Services person' and/or any person or persons for the CPS laboratory concerning the results of examinations, comparisons, or tests performed in connection with any physical evidence gathered in the above-referenced case and which was the subject of grand jury proceedings conducted on either the 1st/and or 15th days of July, 1976."

Although the receipt of your request was acknowledged in July, you have apparently received no further response. You have sought assistance in the matter.

First, in view of the delay in determining rights of access, I point out that the Freedom of Information Law provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies must respond to requests. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

Mr. Larry G. Campbell

If neither a response to a request nor an acknowledgment of the receipt of a request is given within five business days, or if an agency delays responding for an unreasonable time after it acknowledges that a request has been received, a request may, in my opinion, be considered to have been constructively denied. In such a circumstance, I believe that the denial may be appealed in accordance with §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law. That provision states in relevant part that:

"...any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive, or governing body, who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

In addition, it has been held that when an appeal is made but a determination is not rendered within ten business days of the receipt of the appeal as required under §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, the appellant has exhausted his or her administrative remedies and may initiate a challenge to a constructive denial of access under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Rules [Floyd v. McGuire, 87 AD 2d 388, appeal dismissed 57 NY 2d 774 (1982)].

Second, as a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law.

The first ground for denial in the Freedom of Information Law, §87(2)(a), pertains to records that "are specifically exempted from disclosure by state or federal statute". One such statute, §190.25(4) of the Criminal Procedure Law deals with grand jury proceedings and provides in relevant part that:

"Grand jury proceedings are secret, and no grand juror, or other person specified in subdivision three of this section or section 215.70 of the penal law, may, except in the lawful discharge of his duties or upon written order of the court, disclose the nature or substance of any grand jury testimony, evidence, or any decision, result or other matter attending a grand jury proceeding."

The extent to which the records sought involve matters "attending a grand jury proceeding" is unclear. However, insofar as that is the case, the Freedom of Information Law would not, in my opinion, apply. Any disclosure of those records would be based on a court order or perhaps a vehicle authorizing or requiring disclosure that is separate from the Freedom of Information Law.

Insofar as the Freedom of Information Law is pertinent and governs rights of access, two of the grounds for denial would appear to be relevant.

Section 87(2)(g) states that an agency may withhold records that:

"are inter-agency or intra-agency materials which are not:

- i. statistical or factual tabulations or data;
- ii. instructions to staff that affect the public;

- iii. final agency policy or determinations; or
- iv. external audits, including but not limited to audits performed by the comptroller and the federal government..."

It is noted that the language quoted above contains what in effect is a double negative. While inter-agency or intra-agency materials may be withheld, portions of such materials consisting of statistical or factual information, instructions to staff that affect the public, final agency policy or determinations or external audits must be made available, unless a different basis for denial is applicable. Concurrently, those portions of inter-agency or intra-agency materials that are reflective of opinion, advice, recommendation and the like could in my view be withheld. It would appear that the records in question largely consist of statistical or factual information that would be available, unless a different basis for denial could be asserted.

A second provision of potential significance is §87(2)(e), which permits an agency to withhold records that:

"are compiled for law enforcement purposes and which, if disclosed, would:

- i. interfere with law enforcement investigations of judicial proceedings...
- ii. deprive a person of a right to a fair trial or impartial adjudication;

- iii. identify a confidential source or disclose confidential information relating to a criminal investigation; or

- iv. reveal criminal investigative techniques or procedures, except routine techniques and procedures."

Under the circumstances, it appears that most relevant is §87(2)(e)(iv). The leading decision concerning that provision is Fink v. Lefkowitz, which involved access to a manual prepared by a special prosecutor that investigated nursing homes, in which the Court of Appeals held that:

"The purpose of this exemption is obvious. Effective law enforcement demands that violators of the law not be apprised the nonroutine procedures by which an agency obtains its information (see Frankel v. Securities & Exch. Comm., 460 F2d 813, 817, cert den 409 US 889). However beneficial its thrust, the purpose of the Freedom of Information Law is not to enable persons to use agency records to frustrate pending or threatened investigations nor to use that information to construct a defense to impede a prosecution.

"To be distinguished from agency records compiled for law enforcement purposes which illustrate investigative techniques, are those which articulate the agency's understanding of the rules and regulations it is empowered to enforce. Records drafted by the body charged with enforcement of a statute which merely clarify procedural or substantive law must be disclosed. Such information in the hands of the public does not impede effective law enforcement. On the contrary, such knowledge actually encourages voluntary compliance with the law by detailing the standards with which a person is expected to comply, thus allowing him to conform his conduct to those requirements (see Stokes v. Brennan, 476 F2d 699, 702; Hawkes v. Internal Revenue Serv., 467 F2d 787, 794-795; Davis, Administrative Law [1970 Supp], section 3A, p 114).

"Indicative, but not necessarily dispositive of whether investigative techniques are nonroutine is whether disclosure of those procedures would give rise to a substantial likelihood that violators could evade detection by deliberately tailoring their conduct in anticipation of avenues of inquiry to be pursued by agency personnel (see Cox v. United States Dept. of Justice, 576 F2d 1302, 1307-1308; City of Concord v. Ambrose, 333 F Supp 958). It is no secret that numbers on a balance sheet can be made to do magical things by scrupulous nursing home operators the path that an audit is likely to take and alerting them to items to which investigators are instructed to pay particular attention, does not encourage observance of the law. Rather, release of such information actually countenances fraud by enabling miscreants to alter their books and activities to minimize the possibility of being brought to task for criminal activities. In such a case, the procedures contained in an administrative manual are, in a very real sense, compilations of investigative techniques exempt from disclosure. The Freedom of Information Law was not enacted to furnish the safecracker with the combination to the safe" (id. at 572-573).

In applying those criteria to specific portions of the manual, which was compiled for law enforcement purposes, the Court found that:

"Chapter V of the Special Prosecutor's Manual provides a graphic illustration of the confidential techniques used in a successful nursing home prosecution. None of those procedures are 'routine' in the sense of fingerprinting or ballistic tests (see Senate Report No. 93-1200, 93

Cong 2d Sess [1974]). Rather, they constitute detailed, specialized methods of conducting an investigation into the activities of a specialized industry in which voluntary compliance with the law has been less than exemplary.

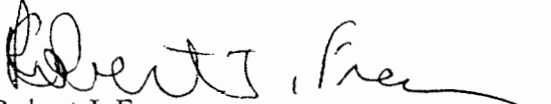

"Disclosure of the techniques enumerated in those pages would enable an operator to tailor his activities in such a way as to significantly diminish the likelihood of a successful prosecution. The information detailed on pages 481 and 482 of the manual, on the other hand, is merely a recitation of the obvious: that auditors should pay particular attention to requests by nursing homes for Medicaid reimbursement rate increases based upon projected increase in cost. As this is simply a routine technique that would be used in any audit, there is no reason why these pages should not be disclosed" (id. at 573).

While I am unfamiliar with the records in question, it would appear that those portions which, if disclosed, would enable potential lawbreakers to evade detection could likely be withheld. It is noted that in another decision which dealt with a request for certain regulations of the State Police, the Court of Appeals found that some aspects of the regulations were non-routine, and that disclosure could "allow miscreants to tailor their activities to evade detection" [De Zimm v. Connelie, 64 NY 2d 860 (1985)]. Nevertheless, other portions of the records might be "routine" and apparently would not if disclosed preclude police officers from carrying out their duties effectively.

As you requested, enclosed is the latest supplement to the annual report of the Committee on Open Government.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Mr. Howard Ostrander

Dear Mr. Ostrander:

I have received your letter of February 9 and your appeal in relation to your request to the Town of Guilford for a "separate accounting of Town of Guilford general and highway funds."

In this regard, first, it is emphasized that the Committee on Open Government is authorized to provide advice and opinions concerning the Freedom of Information Law. The Committee is not empowered to determine appeals or compel an agency to grant or deny access to records. The provision concerning the right to appeal, §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, states in relevant part that:

"any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive, or governing body of the entity, or the person therefor designated by such head, chief executive, or governing body, who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

Second, the Freedom of Information Law pertains to existing records, and §89(3) of that statute provides in part that an agency is not required to create a record in response to a request. Therefore, if the Town does not maintain the information of your interest in the format in which you want it, the Town would not be obliged to prepare new records to accommodate you. In short, if there is no "separate accounting", the Town, in my view, would not be obliged to create new records reflective of a separate accounting on your behalf.

Third, it appears that the information of your interest may be available in records routinely maintained pursuant to §29(4) of the Town Law. That provision states that the supervisor:

"Shall keep an accurate and complete account of the receipt and disbursement of all moneys which shall come into his hands by virtue of his office, in books of account in the form prescribed by the state department of audit and control for all expenditures under the highway law and in books of account provided by the town for all other expenditures. Such books of account shall be public records, open and available for inspection at all reasonable hours of the day, and, upon the expiration of his term, shall be filed in the office of the town clerk."

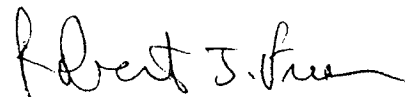

In addition, subdivision (1) of §119 of the Town Law states in part that:

"When a claim has been audited by the town board of the town clerk shall file the same in numerical order as a public record in his office and prepare an abstract of the audited claims specifying the number of the claim, the name of the claimant, the amount allowed and the fund and appropriation account chargeable therewith and such other information as may be deemed necessary and essential, directed to the supervisor of the town, authorizing and directing him to pay to the claimant the amount allowed upon his claim."

That provision also states that "The claims shall be available for public inspection at all times during office hours."

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Robert J. Freeman
Executive Director

Mr. Willie Kears
93-A-8665
Coxsackie, NY 12051

Dear Mr. Kears:

I have received your letter of February 2 in which you sought guidance concerning your ability to obtain your "institutional visiting list".

In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First, the regulations promulgated by the Department of Correctional Services indicate that a request for records kept at a facility may be made to the facility superintendent or his designee.

Second, if a list is maintained that pertains only to your visitors, I believe that it would be accessible. As a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law. From my perspective, if such a list exists, none of the grounds for denial would be applicable.

If, however, no separate visitors list is maintained with respect to each inmate, rights of access may be different. For instance, if a visitor's log or similar documentation is kept in plain sight and can be viewed by any person, and if the staff at the facility have the ability to locate portions of the log of your interest, I believe that those portions of the log would be available. If such records are not kept in plain sight and cannot ordinarily be viewed, it is my opinion that those portions of the log pertaining to persons other than yourself could be withheld on the ground that disclosure would constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy. In short, the identities of those with whom a person associates is, in my view, nobody's business.

A potential issue involves the requirement imposed by §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law that an applicant "reasonably describe" the records sought. In considering that standard, the State's highest court has found that to meet the standard, the terms of a request must be adequate to enable the agency to locate the records, and that an agency must "establish that 'the descriptions were insufficient for purposes of locating and identifying the documents sought'...before denying a FOIL request for reasons of overbreadth" [Konigsberg v. Coughlin, 68 NY 2d 245, 249 (1986)].

Although it was found in the decision cited above that the agency could not reject the request due to its breadth, it was also stated that:

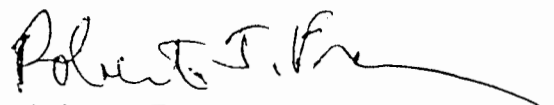

"respondents have failed to supply any proof whatsoever as to the nature - or even the existence - of their indexing system: whether the Department's files were indexed in a manner that would enable the identification and location of documents in their possession (cf. National Cable Tel. Assn. v Federal Communications Commn., 479 F2d 183, 192 [Bazelon, J.] [plausible claim of nonidentifiability under Federal Freedom of Information Act, 5 USC section 552 (a) (3), may be presented where agency's indexing system was such that 'the requested documents could not be identified by retracing a path already trodden. It would have required a wholly new enterprise, potentially requiring a search of every file in the possession of the agency']" (id. at 250).

In my view, whether a request reasonably describes the records sought, as suggested by the Court of Appeals, may be dependent upon the terms of a request, as well as the nature of an agency's filing or record-keeping systems. In Konigsberg, it appears that the agency was able to locate the records on the basis of an inmate's name and identification number.

I am unaware of the means by which a visitors log, if it exists, is kept or compiled. If an inmate's name or other identifier can be used to locate records or portions of records that would identify the inmate's visitors, it would likely be easy to retrieve that information, and the request would reasonably describe the records. On the other hand, if there are chronological logs of visitors and each page would have to be reviewed in an effort to identify visitors of a particular inmate, I do not believe that agency staff would be required to engage in such an extensive search.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Mr. Frank E. Redl
Town of Poughkeepsie
One Overocker Road
Poughkeepsie, NY 12603

Dear Mr. Redl:

I have received your letter of February 4 in which you sought an advisory opinion.

You indicated that the Town of Poughkeepsie recently honored a request made under the Freedom of Information Law for payroll information, which it made available on a printout. However, the applicant, a newspaper, has asked that the information contained in the printout be made available on computer disk. You have contended that "one cannot request that the information be supplied to them in any specific form."

I respectfully disagree with your contention. In my view, the Freedom of Information Law, in terms of its intent and its judicial interpretation, has and should be construed to require agencies to produce accessible information in the format of the applicant's choice, so long as the agency is able to do so and the applicant pays the requisite fee.

Illustrative of that principle is a case in which an applicant sought a database in a particular format, and even though the agency had the ability to generate the information in that format, it refused to make the database available in the format requested and offered to make available a printout. In holding that the agency was required to make the data available in the format requested and upon payment of the actual cost of reproduction, the Court in Brownstone Publishers, Inc. v. New York City Department of Buildings unanimously held that:

"Public Officers Law [section] 87(2) provides that, 'Each agency shall...make available for public inspection and copying all records...' Section 86(4) includes in its definition of 'record', computer tapes or discs. The policy underlying the FOIL is 'to insure maximum public access to government records' (Matter of Scott, Sardano & Pomerantz v. Records Access Officer, 65 N.Y.2d 294, 296-297, 491 N.Y.S.2d 289, 480 N.E.2d 1071). Under the circumstances presented herein, it is clear that both the statute and its underlying policy require that the DOB comply with Brownstone's reasonable request to have the information, presently maintained in computer language, transferred onto computer tapes" [166 Ad 2d, 294, 295 (1990)].

Further, in a more recent decision that cited Brownstone, it was held that: "[a]n agency which maintains in a computer format information sought by a F.O.I.L. request may be compelled to comply with the request to transfer information to computer disks or tape" (Samuel v. Mace, Supreme Court, Monroe County, December 11, 1992).

In short, assuming that the data sought is available under the Freedom of Information Law, that it can be made available in the format in which an applicant requests it, and that the applicant is willing to pay the requisite fee, I believe that an agency would be obliged to do so.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Mr. John Solak

Dear Mr. Solak:

As you are aware, your letter of January 19 addressed to Assistant Attorney General Dennis McCabe has been forwarded to the Committee on Open Government. The Committee, a unit of the Department of State, is authorized to provide advice and opinions concerning the Open Meetings and Freedom of Information Laws.

You referred to a public hearing conducted in Broome County concerning pay raises during which the County Attorney presided. You wrote, however, that no elected officials were present, other than the County Clerk and the Sheriff, both of whom were members of the audience. You have requested a "follow up" on the matter.

In this regard, it is noted at the outset that there are distinctions between "meetings", which must be held in accordance with the Open Meetings Law, and hearings. A "meeting" is a convening of a majority of the membership of a public body, such as a county legislature, city council, town board, etc., for the purpose of discussion, deliberation, and potentially, the taking of action. A hearing, on the other hand, typically involves a situation in which members of the public are given the opportunity to speak and express their views on a given subject. A meeting can be held only with a majority of a public body present; there is no such requirement with respect to a hearing.

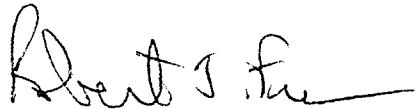

Since the issue involves a hearing, the Open Meetings Law would not have applied. Without additional information concerning the hearing and the statute under which it was held, I cannot offer additional guidance.

If you continue to wish to question whether the hearing was held in a manner consistent with law, it is suggested that you contact Mr. Harry Willis, an attorney with the Department of State who is an expert in the area of municipal law.

Dear Mr. Harrison:

I have received your letter of February 5 in which you questioned the propriety of a denial of access to a certain record maintained at your facility. Specifically, you sought a "memorandum detailing the reasons why [your] disciplinary hearing determination was modified."

In this regard, as a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law.

Pertinent to the matter is §87(2)(g), which permits an agency to withhold records that:

"are inter-agency or intra-agency materials which are not:

- i. statistical or factual tabulations or data;
- ii. instructions to staff that affect the public;
- iii. final agency policy or determinations; or
- iv. external audits, including but not limited to audits performed by the comptroller and the federal government..."

It is noted that the language quoted above contains what in effect is a double negative. While inter-agency or intra-agency materials may be withheld, portions of such materials consisting of statistical or factual information, instructions to staff that affect the public, final agency policy or determinations or external audits must be made available, unless a different ground for denial could appropriately be asserted. Concurrently, those portions of inter-agency or intra-agency materials that are reflective of opinion, advice, recommendation and the like could in my view be withheld.

If the memorandum consists of recommendations, as indicated in the denial of your request, I believe that the denial would have been proper. On the other hand, insofar as the memorandum is reflective of a final determination, it would, in my view, be accessible under §87(2)(g)(iii).

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Dear Mr. Charnock:

I have received your letter of January 31. As I understand the matter, you requested a copy of your parole warrant relating to a new conviction and containing a "declaration of delinquency." The request was denied pursuant to §87(2)(e)(i) of the Freedom of Information Law and you have since appealed. You have questioned the propriety of the denial of access.

In this regard, as a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law.

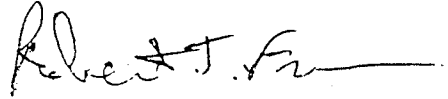

The provision to which you referred indicates that an agency may withhold records compiled for law enforcement purposes when disclosure would "interfere with law enforcement investigations or judicial proceedings." If I have interpreted the facts correctly, the exception cited in the denial would not serve to justify withholding the record in question. Typically a warrant is served upon the subject of the conviction or delinquency. That being so, a denial of a request for the record that should have been served upon you would, in my view, be unjustifiable. Further, I cannot envision how disclosure of the record at issue would interfere with either an investigation or a judicial proceeding.

Since you wrote that you appealed, it is assumed that the appeal was directed to Mr. Terrence X. Tracy, Counsel to the Division of Parole. If the appeal was not sent to Mr. Tracy, it is suggested that you do so.

Dear Mr. McKinney:

I have received your letter of February 5, as well as the correspondence attached to it. You described an incident that occurred in the City of Auburn and your efforts in obtaining records pertaining to the incident.

In this regard, I am unaware of the nature of records kept or prepared by the City of Auburn or its Police Department. However, the primary consideration in my view with respect to your inquiry is that the Freedom of Information Law pertains to existing records. Section 89(3) of that statute provides in part that an agency is not required to prepare a record that does not exist. Consequently, insofar as the City does not maintain records that contain the information in which you are interested or which are as expansive as you would want, it would not be obliged to prepare new records on your behalf. Similarly, because the Freedom of Information Law pertains to records, that statute does not require that agency officials answer questions. Certainly if a government official wants to answer a question or provide an explanation, that person may do so. Nevertheless, the responsibility under the Freedom of Information involves disclosure of existing records to the extent required by that statute; it does not require that agencies provide responses to questions or explanations of their actions.

I hope that the foregoing serves to clarify your understanding of the matter and that I have been of assistance.

Cayuga Correctional Facility
Route 38A
P.O. Box 1150
Moravia, NY 13118

Dear Mr. Fowler:

I have received your letter of February 2. You have raised a series of questions concerning rights of access to records maintained by two hospitals, St. Luke's and Metropolitan, both of which are in New York City. You wrote that your intent is to obtain portions of records indicating the time that paramedics received an initial call to respond to a crime scene involving victims that you were accused of assaulting.

In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First, the Freedom of Information Law pertains to agency records, and §86(3) of that statute defines the term "agency" to mean:

"any state or municipal department, board, bureau, division, commission, committee, public authority, public corporation, council, office or other governmental entity performing a governmental or proprietary function for the state or any one or more municipalities thereof, except the judiciary or the state legislature."

Based on the foregoing, the Freedom of Information Law generally applies to records maintained by governmental entities. St. Luke's Hospital is private and, therefore, would not be subject to the Freedom of Information Law. I believe that Metropolitan Hospital, however, is part of the New York City Health and Hospitals Corporation. If that is so, it would be part of an "agency" required to comply with the Freedom of Information Law.

Mr. Jamal Sharif Fowler

As it applies to agencies, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law.

If the record containing the information sought is a medical record, I do not believe that you would have the ability to obtain it under the Freedom of Information Law. The first ground for denial, §87(2)(a), pertains to records that are "specifically exempted from disclosure by state or federal statute." One such statute, §18 of the Public Health Law, removes medical records from the scope of public rights of access. If the document containing the information of your interest could not be characterized as a medical record, the portion indicating the time of receipt of a call would, in my view, be available; other aspects of that record identifiable to individuals receiving emergency or medical treatment could in my opinion be withheld on the ground that disclosure would constitute an unwarranted invasion of privacy pursuant to §§87(2)(b) and 89(2)(b) of the Freedom of Information Law.

Lastly, the address of the Metropolitan Hospital Center is 1901 First Avenue, New York, NY 10029.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

P.O. Box 500
Elmira, NY 14902

Dear Mr. Bretti:

I have received your letter of February 9 and the materials attached to it. You have sought an opinion concerning your right to obtain the "investigatory file" of the New York State Organized Crime Task Force that was used in relation to your arrest and conviction.

In this regard, as a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law.

Since I am unaware of the contents of the records in question or the effects of their disclosure, I cannot offer unequivocal guidance. Nevertheless, the following paragraphs will review the provisions that may be significant in determining rights of access to the records in question.

Potentially relevant is a decision by the Court of Appeals concerning records prepared by police officers in which it was held that a blanket denial of access based on their characterization as intra-agency materials would be inappropriate. The provision at issue, §87(2)(g) of the Freedom of Information Law, enables an agency to withhold records that:

"are inter-agency or intra-agency materials which are not:

- i. statistical or factual tabulations or data;
- ii. instructions to staff that affect the public;
- iii. final agency policy or determinations; or

iv. external audits, including but not limited to audits performed by the comptroller and the federal government..."

It is noted that the language quoted above contains what in effect is a double negative. While inter-agency or intra-agency materials may be withheld, portions of such materials consisting of statistical or factual information, instructions to staff that affect the public, final agency policy or determinations or external audits must be made available, unless a different ground for denial could appropriately be asserted. Concurrently, those portions of inter-agency or intra-agency materials that are reflective of opinion, advice, recommendation and the like could in my view be withheld.

In its analysis of the matter, it was determined that the agency could not claim that the records can be withheld in their entirety on the ground that they constitute intra-agency materials. However, the Court was careful to point out that other grounds for denial might apply in consideration of those records. [Gould, Scott and DeFelice v. New York City Police Department, 89 NY2d 267 (1996)].

For instance, of potential significance is §87(2)(b) of the Freedom of Information Law, which permits an agency to withhold records or portions thereof when disclosure would constitute "an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy". That provision might be applicable relative to the deletion of identifying details in a variety of situations, i.e., where a record identifies a confidential source, a witness, or others interviewed in an investigation.

Often the most relevant provision concerning access to records maintained by law enforcement agencies is §87(2)(e), which permits an agency to withhold records that:

"are compiled for law enforcement purposes and which, if disclosed, would:

- i. interfere with law enforcement investigations or judicial proceedings;
- ii. deprive a person of a right to a fair trial or impartial adjudication;
- iii. identify a confidential source or disclose confidential information relating to a criminal investigation; or
- iv. reveal criminal investigative techniques or procedures, except routine techniques and procedures."

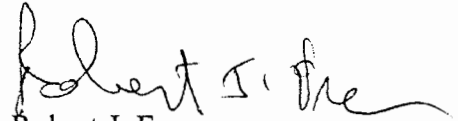

In my view, the foregoing indicates that records compiled for law enforcement purposes can only be withheld to the extent that disclosure would result in the harmful effects described in sub- paragraphs (i) through (iv) of §87(2)(e).

Mr. Dominic Bretti

Another possible ground for denial is §87(2)(f), which permits withholding to the extent that disclosure "would endanger the life or safety of any person". The capacity to withhold on that basis is dependent upon the facts and circumstances concerning an event.

I hope that the foregoing serves to enhance your understanding of the Freedom of Information Law and that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Dear Ms. Prater and Mr. Eissing:

I have received your letter of February 10 and the correspondence attached to it. In brief, you complained that requests for records made to various officials of the Town of Greenville have not been answered.

In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First, pursuant to regulations promulgated by the Committee on Open Government (21 NYCRR Part 1401), each agency is required to designate one person as "records access officer." The records access officer has the duty of coordinating an agency's response to requests. While I believe that the persons in receipt of your requests should either have responded in a manner consistent with the Freedom of Information Law or forwarded the requests to the appropriate person, it is suggested that, in the future, your requests for records be made to the designated records access officer. In most towns, the person so designated is the town clerk.

Second, irrespective of which Town officials received requests, I point out that the Freedom of Information Law provides direction concerning the time and manner in which an agency must respond to requests. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

Ms. Gertrude M. Prater
Mr. Rudolph L. Eissing

If neither a response to a request nor an acknowledgement of the receipt of a request is given within five business days, or if an agency delays responding for an unreasonable time after it acknowledges that a request has been received, a request may, in my opinion, be considered to have been constructively denied. In such a circumstance, I believe that the denial may be appealed in accordance with §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law. That provision states in relevant part that:

"...any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive, or governing body, who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

In addition, it has been held that when an appeal is made but a determination is not rendered within ten business days of the receipt of the appeal as required under §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, the appellant has exhausted his or her administrative remedies and may initiate a challenge to a constructive denial of access under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Rules [Floyd v. McGuire, 87 AD 2d 388, appeal dismissed 57 NY 2d 774 (1982)].

Third, in one of your requests, you sought "a listing of the violations found" and "a listing of fines" imposed by the Code Enforcement Officer. Here I point out that the Freedom of Information Law pertains to existing records, and that §89(3) of the Law states in relevant part that an agency is not required to create a record in response to a request. If, for example, there are no "listings" of violations or fines, the Town, in my view, would not be obliged to prepare such records on your behalf.

It is likely that another issue involves the extent to which the requests "reasonably describe" the records sought as required by §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law. I point out that it has been held by the Court of Appeals that to deny a request on the ground that it fails to reasonably describe the records, an agency must establish that "the descriptions were insufficient for purposes of locating and identifying the documents sought" [Konigsberg v. Coughlin, 68 NY 2d 245, 249 (1986)].

The Court in Konigsberg found that the agency could not reject the request due to its breadth and also stated that:

Ms. Gertrude M. Prater
Mr. Rudolph L. Eissing
February 24, 1999

already trodden. It would have required a wholly new enterprise, potentially requiring a search of every file in the possession of the agency']" (id. at 250).

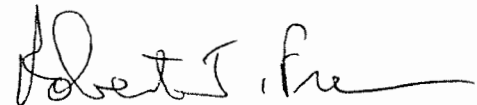

In my view, whether a request reasonably describes the records sought, as suggested by the Court of Appeals, may be dependent upon the terms of a request, as well as the nature of an agency's filing or record-keeping system. In Konigsberg, it appears that the agency was able to locate the records on the basis of an inmate's name and identification number.

While I am unfamiliar with the recordkeeping systems of the Town, to extent that the records sought can be located with reasonable effort, I believe that the request would have met the requirement of reasonably describing the records. On the other hand, if the records are not maintained in a manner that permits their retrieval except by reviewing perhaps hundreds or even thousands of records individually in an effort to locate those falling within the scope of the request, to that extent, the request would not in my opinion meet the standard of reasonably describing the records. Further, in the context of one request, the request for all records "relating to the Baraba's" at a certain address, a real question involves, very simply, where Town officials might begin to look for records. It is possible that records falling within the scope of the request may be maintained in several locations by a variety of units within Town, and that those units maintain their records by means of different filing and retrieval methods. If an office maintains all of its records regarding violations, since the beginning of its existence, in a single file, it may be a simple task to locate the records. If, however, records are not maintained by subject, but rather are kept chronologically, locating the records might involve a search, in essence, for the needle in the haystack. Based on the holding by the State's highest court, an agency is not required to engage in that kind of effort. Similarly, records relating a certain address might involve code enforcement, police or fire calls, water or sewer problems, assessment, zoning, junked cars, garage sales, deaths or any number of subjects.

It is suggested that it may be worthwhile to resubmit requests that include sufficient detail to enable Town officials to locate and identify the records of your interest.

I hope that the foregoing serves to clarify your understanding of the matter and that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Robert J. Freeman

[REDACTED]

Dear Mr. McAndrew:

I have received your letter of February 8 and the materials attached to it.

According to your letter, the Board of Education of the Port Jervis City School District received an anonymous donation of software, and you have asked whether the District is required to disclose the identity of the donor.

Assuming that a record is maintained by the District identifying the donor, such a record would fall within the coverage of the Freedom of Information Law. As a general matter, that statute is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law. The only ground for denial of relevance in my opinion would be §87(2)(b), which permits an agency to withhold records insofar as disclosure would constitute "an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy." Further, §89(2)(b) includes a series of examples of unwarranted invasions of personal privacy.

From my perspective, if the donation was made by a natural person, the District could likely deny access to his or her identity. One of the examples of unwarranted invasions of personal privacy, §89(2)(b)(iv), pertains to:

"disclosure of information of a personal nature when disclosure would result in economic or personal hardship to the subject party and such information is not relevant to the work of the agency requesting it or maintaining it..."

Disclosure of the identity of the donor might result in personal or economic hardship to that person. Moreover, in my view, his or her identity would be irrelevant to the ordinary work of the District.

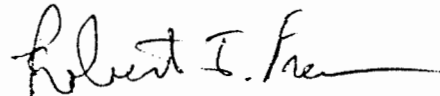

Mr. Jack McAndrew

Consequently, it would appear that identifying details pertaining to a natural person who made the donation could be withheld.

If the donation was made by a business or other similar organization, rather than a natural person, I believe that the identity of that entity would be accessible. In short, the exception pertaining to personal privacy is applicable only to records identifying natural persons; it would not apply to records relating to entities.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

P.O. Box 500
Elmira, NY 14902-0500

Dear Mr. Sinkler:

I have received your letter of January 30 and the materials attached to it. You have sought advice concerning your ability to obtain certain records from the Division of Parole.

According to your letter, the key prosecution witness in your case "is on parole for life." Although he apparently testified that he had been given immunity by the investigating officer and the prosecuting attorney, the police and the District Attorney have denied that any promises or considerations were given. Although the Division of Parole appears to have records concerning a deal or agreement with that person, it has denied access.

In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First, as a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law.

From my perspective, if indeed the Division of Parole maintains records indicating a deal or an agreement, for example, with the individual in question, it is likely that the denial of access would be proper. Section 87(2)(b) permits an agency to withhold records when disclosure would constitute "an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy." Section 87(2)(e)(iii) permits an agency to withhold records compiled for law enforcement purposes when disclosure would "identify a confidential source or disclose confidential information relating to a criminal investigation." Additionally, §87(2)(f), as you are aware, authorizes an agency to withhold records when disclosure would "endanger the life or safety of any person."

Mr. Terrence Sinkler

If the record or records sought exists, each of the three exceptions cited above could serve as a justification for denial of access. While an agency has the burden of defending secrecy and demonstrating that records that have been withheld clearly fall within the scope of one or more of the grounds for denial [see §89(4)(b)], I note that in the case of the assertion of §87(2)(f), the standard developed by the courts is less stringent. In citing §87(2)(f), it has been found that:

"This provision of the statute permits nondisclosure of information if it would pose a danger to the life or safety of any person. We reject petitioner's assertion that respondents are required to prove that a danger to a person's life or safety will occur if the information is made public (see, Matter of Nalo v. Sullivan, 125 AD2d 311, 312, lv denied 69 NY2d 612). Rather, there need only be a possibility that such information would endanger the lives or safety of individuals...."[Stronza v. Hoke, 148 AD2d 900,901 (1989)].

The principle enunciated in Stronza has appeared in several other decisions [see Ruberti, Girvin & Ferlazzo v. NYS Division of the State Police, 641 NYS 2d 411, 218 AD2d 494 (1996), Connolly v. New York Guard, 572 NYS 2d 443, 175 AD 2d 372 (1991) and McDermott v. Lippman, Supreme Court, New York County, NYLJ, January 4, 1994.] Additionally, it was determined in American Broadcasting Companies, Inc. v. Siebert that when disclosure would "expose applicants and their families to danger to life or safety", §87(2)(f) may properly be asserted [442 NYS2d 855, 859 (1981)].

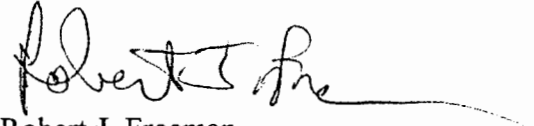

Second, on the basis of the correspondence, it appears that you are suggesting that since various records were submitted into evidence during your trial that the records in question must be available due to those prior disclosures. While it is true that records made available by means of public judicial proceedings must be disclosed under the Freedom of Information Law [see Moore v. Santucci, 543 NYS 2d 103, 151 Ad 2d 677 (1989)], it does not necessarily follow that records relating to testimony or other information publicly disclosed must be made available. Frequently records maintained by law enforcement agencies and prosecutors relating to information disclosed during public proceedings may fall within one or more of the grounds for denial appearing in the Freedom of Information Law.

Lastly, in your request of January 30 to the Division of Parole, you asked for "a list specifically identifying the dates of any and all parole violation hearings held against James Hackett, and the name and business address of the person or persons who recorded those proceedings." Here I point out that the Freedom of Information Law pertains to existing records and that §89(3) states in part that an agency is not required to create a record in response to a request. If no list containing the information sought has been prepared, the Division would not be obliged to create a new record containing that information on your behalf.

Subject: Endangered species and Archaeological sites

Dear Professor Felleman:

I have received your email of February 19 concerning the treatment under the Freedom of Information Law of records indicating the locations of endangered species and archaeological sites.

In this regard, as you may be aware, the Freedom of Information Law provides as a general matter that all agency records are available, unless they fall within an exception to rights of access. The first ground for denial pertains to records that "are specifically exempted from disclosure by state or federal statute."

With respect to the locations of the habitats of endangered flora or fauna, the NYS Environmental Conservation Law, section 3-0301((2)(r) gives the Commissioner of the Department of Environmental Conservation the authority to withhold records indicating those locations "where the destruction of such habitat or the removal of such species therefrom would impair their ability to survive provided, however, that the commissioner may, in his descretion permit access to such inspection to persons engaged in legitimate scientific and academic research."

With regard to records indicating the locations of archaeological sites, there is no state statute dealing with the issue. However, section 427.8 of the regulations of the Office of Parks, Recreation and Historic Preservation provides restrictions on access. Further, a federal statute provides confidentiality under certain circumstances. See 16 USC section 470hh. Also potentially relevant is 16 USC section 470w-3 concerning the confidentiality of the location of sensitive historic resources. I obtained the citations to those federal statutes from the FOI office at the US Department of the Interior and can fax their contents to you if you need them.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Dear Mr. Hatfield:

I have received your letter of February 9 in which you sought guidance concerning the refusal of several entities in Niagara County to respond to your requests for records.

In this regard, it is emphasized that the Freedom of Information Law is applicable to agency records, and that §86(3) defines the term "agency" to include:

"any state or municipal department, board, bureau, division, commission, committee, public authority, public corporation, council, office or other governmental entity performing a governmental or proprietary function for the state or any one or more municipalities thereof, except the judiciary or the state legislature."

In turn, §86(1) defines the term "judiciary" to mean:

"the courts of the state, including any municipal or district court, whether or not of record."

Based on the provisions quoted above, the courts and court records are not subject to the Freedom of Information Law. This is not to suggest that court records are not generally available to the public, for other provisions of law (see e.g., Judiciary Law, §255) may grant broad public access to those records. Even though other statutes may deal with access to court records, the procedural provisions associated with the Freedom of Information Law (i.e., those involving the designation of a records access officer or the right to appeal a denial) would not ordinarily be applicable.

Mr. Kenneth P. Hatfield

As the Freedom of Information Law applies to agencies, that statute provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies must respond to requests and appeals. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

"Each entity subject to the provisions of this article, within five business days of the receipt of a written request for a record reasonably described, shall make such record available to the person requesting it, deny such request in writing or furnish a written acknowledgement of the receipt of such request and a statement of the approximate date when such request will be granted or denied..."

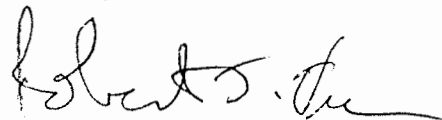

If neither a response to a request nor an acknowledgement of the receipt of a request is given within five business days, or if an agency delays responding for an unreasonable time after it acknowledges that a request has been received, a request may, in my opinion, be considered to have been constructively denied. In such a circumstance, I believe that the denial may be appealed in accordance with §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law. That provision states in relevant part that:

"...any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive, or governing body, who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

In addition, it has been held that when an appeal is made but a determination is not rendered within ten business days of the receipt of the appeal as required under §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, the appellant has exhausted his or her administrative remedies and may initiate a challenge to a constructive denial of access under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Rules [Floyd v. McGuire, 87 AD 2d 388, appeal dismissed 57 NY 2d 774 (1982)].

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Dear Mr. Page:

I have received your letter of February 9 in which you sought the "intervention" of this office in relation to a request for records directed to the Office of the Schenectady County District Attorney.

In this regard, it is noted at the outset that the Committee on Open Government is authorized to advise with respect to the Freedom of Information Law. The Committee is not empowered to "intervene" in the legal sense. Nevertheless, in an effort to enhance your understanding of the matter, I offer the following comments.

First, as I interpret the correspondence, your request for records was rejected because the records sought were made available to your attorney. Based on the decision rendered in Moore v. Santucci [151 AD2d 677 (1989)], if a record was made available to you or your attorney, there must be a demonstration that neither you nor your attorney possesses the record in order to successfully obtain a second copy. Specifically, the decision states that:

"...if the petitioner or his attorney previously received a copy of the agency record pursuant to an alternative discovery device and currently possesses the copy, a court may uphold an agency's denial of the petitioner's request under the FOIL for a duplicate copy as academic. However, the burden of proof rests with the agency to demonstrate that the petitioner's specific requests are moot. The respondent's burden would be satisfied upon proof that a copy of the requested record was previously furnished to the petitioner or his counsel in the absence of any allegation, in evidentiary form, that the copy was no longer in existence. In the event the petitioner's request for a copy of a specific record is not moot, the agency must furnish another copy upon payment of the appropriate fee...unless the requested record falls squarely within the ambit of 1 of the 8 statutory exemptions" (id., 678).

In view of the foregoing, it is suggested that you contact your attorney to determine whether he or she continues to possess the record. If the attorney no longer maintains the record, he or she should prepare an affidavit so stating that can be submitted to the office of the district attorney.

Second, you referred to the decision rendered in Pennington v. McMahon [234 AD2d 624 (1998)] as a means of contending that the District Attorney must maintain an index of the records kept in the file of your case. That decision related in part to an inventory of items found in a vehicle; it does not suggest, in my opinion, that an agency must maintain or prepare an index identifying each and every record contained within a file. If no such index exists, the Office of the District Attorney would not be required to prepare such a record on your behalf. If an index has been prepared, I believe that it would be available to the extent required by the Freedom of Information Law.

Similarly, since you referred to §87(3)(c) of the Freedom of Information Law, that provision requires an agency to maintain a reasonably detailed list, by subject matter, of the kinds of records that it maintains. The subject matter list is not required to consist of index of each and every record maintained by an agency; rather, it is a categorization of the kinds of records maintained by an agency. Further, the statute does not require the maintenance of a subject matter list in relation to individual cases.

I hope that the foregoing serves to clarify your understanding of the matter and that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Robert J. Freeman
Executive Director

Mr. Jamal Sharif Fowler
91-A-5610
Cayuga Correctional Facility
P.O. Box 1186
Moravia, NY 13118

Dear Mr. Fowler:

I have received your letter of February 8 and have reviewed your request for records of the New York City Police Department.

In this regard, as a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law. Since I am unaware of the contents of the records in which you are interested or the effects of their disclosure, I cannot offer specific guidance. Nevertheless, the following paragraphs will review the provisions that may be significant in determining rights of access to the records in question.

In considering the records falling within the scope of your request, relevant is a decision by the Court of Appeals concerning "complaint follow up reports" prepared by police officers and police officers' memo books in which it was held that a denial of access based on their characterization as intra-agency materials would be inappropriate.

The provision at issue, §87(2)(g) of the Freedom of Information Law, enables an agency to withhold records that:

"are inter-agency or intra-agency materials which are not:

- i. statistical or factual tabulations or data;
- ii. instructions to staff that affect the public;

- iii. final agency policy or determinations; or
- iv. external audits, including but not limited to audits performed by the comptroller and the federal government..."

It is noted that the language quoted above contains what in effect is a double negative. While inter-agency or intra-agency materials may be withheld, portions of such materials consisting of statistical or factual information, instructions to staff that affect the public, final agency policy or determinations or external audits must be made available, unless a different ground for denial could appropriately be asserted. Concurrently, those portions of inter-agency or intra-agency materials that are reflective of opinion, advice, recommendation and the like could in my view be withheld.

In its analysis of the matter, the decision states that:

61 NY2d 958; Matter of Miracle Mile Assocs. v. Yudelson, 68 AD2d 176, 181-182).

"Against this backdrop, we conclude that the complaint follow-up reports contain substantial factual information available pursuant to the provisions of FOIL. Sections of the report are devoted to such purely factual data as: the names, addresses, and physical descriptions of crime victims, witnesses, and perpetrators; a checklist that indicates whether the victims and witnesses have been interviewed and shown photos, whether crime scenes have been photographed and dusted for fingerprints, and whether neighborhood residents have been canvassed for information; and a blank space denominated 'details' in which the officer records the particulars of any action taken in connection with the investigation.

"However, the Police Department argues that any witness statements contained in the reports, in particular, are not 'factual' because there is no assurance of the statements' accuracy and reliability. We decline to read such a reliability requirement into the phrase 'factual data', as the dissent would have us do, and conclude that a witness statement constitutes factual data insofar as it embodies a factual account of the witness's observations. Such a statement, moreover, is far removed from the type of internal government exchange sought to be protected by the intra-agency exemption (see, Matter of Ingram v. Axelrod, 90 AD2d 568, 569 [ambulance records, list of interviews, and reports of interviews available under FOIL as 'factual data']). By contrast, any impressions, recommendations, or opinions recorded in the complaint follow-up report would not constitute factual data and would be exempt from disclosure. The holding herein is only that these reports are not categorically exempt as intra-agency material. Indeed, the Police Department is entitled to withhold complaint follow-up reports, or specific portions thereof, under any other applicable exemption, such as the law-enforcement exemption or the public-safety exemption, as long as the requisite particularized showing is made" [Gould, Scott and DeFelice v. New York City Police Department, 89 NY2d 267, 276-277 (1996); emphasis added by the Court].

Based on the foregoing, the agency could not claim that the complaint reports can be withheld in their entirety on the ground that they constitute intra-agency materials. However, the Court was careful to point out that other grounds for denial might apply in consideration of those records, as well as others that you requested.

For instance, of potential significance is §87(2)(b) of the Freedom of Information Law, which permits an agency to withhold records or portions thereof when disclosure would constitute "an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy". That provision might be applicable relative to the deletion of identifying details in a variety of situations, i.e., where a record identifies a confidential source or a witness, for example.

Often the most relevant provision concerning access to records maintained by law enforcement agencies is §87(2)(e), which permits an agency to withhold records that:

"are compiled for law enforcement purposes and which, if disclosed, would:

- i. interfere with law enforcement investigations or judicial proceedings;
- ii. deprive a person of a right to a fair trial or impartial adjudication;
- iii. identify a confidential source or disclose confidential information relating to a criminal investigation; or
- iv. reveal criminal investigative techniques or procedures, except routine techniques and procedures."

In my view, the foregoing indicates that records compiled for law enforcement purposes can only be withheld to the extent that disclosure would result in the harmful effects described in sub- paragraphs (i) through (iv) of §87(2)(e).

Another possible ground for denial is §87(2)(f), which permits withholding to the extent that disclosure "would endanger the life or safety of any person". The capacity to withhold on that basis is dependent upon the facts and circumstances concerning an event.

Also relevant is the first ground for denial, §87(2)(a), which pertains to records that "are specifically exempted from disclosure by state or federal statute". One such statute, §190.25(4) of the Criminal Procedure Law deals with grand jury proceedings and provides in relevant part that:

"Grand jury proceedings are secret, and no grand juror, or other person specified in subdivision three of this section or section 215.70 of the penal law, may, except in the lawful discharge of his duties or upon written order of the court, disclose the nature or substance of any grand jury testimony, evidence, or any decision, result or other matter attending a grand jury proceeding."

As such, grand jury related records would be outside the scope of rights conferred by the Freedom of Information Law. Any disclosure of those records would be based upon a court order or perhaps a vehicle authorizing or requiring disclosure that is separate and distinct from the Freedom of Information Law.

Mr. Jamal Sharif Fowler

Lastly, in a decision concerning a request for records maintained by the office of a district attorney that would ordinarily be exempted from disclosure under the Freedom of Information Law, it was held that "once the statements have been used in open court, they have lost their cloak of confidentiality and are available for inspection by a member of the public" [see Moore v. Santucci, 151 AD 2d 677, 679 (1989)]. Based upon that decision, it appears that records introduced into evidence or disclosed during a public judicial proceeding should be available. However, in the same decision, it was also found that:

"...if the petitioner or his attorney previously received a copy of the agency record pursuant to an alternative discovery device and currently possesses the copy, a court may uphold an agency's denial of the petitioner's request under the FOIL for a duplicate copy as academic. However, the burden of proof rests with the agency to demonstrate that the petitioner's specific requests are moot. The respondent's burden would be satisfied upon proof that a copy of the requested record was previously furnished to the petitioner or his counsel in the absence of any allegation, in evidentiary form, that the copy was no longer in existence. In the event the petitioner's request for a copy of a specific record is not moot, the agency must furnish another copy upon payment of the appropriate fee...unless the requested record falls squarely within the ambit of 1 of the 8 statutory exemptions" (id., 678).

The Court in Moore also specified that an agency "is not required to make available for inspection or copying any suppression hearing or trial transcripts of a witness' testimony in its possession, because the transcripts are court records, not agency records" (id. at 680).

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Robert J. Freeman

Dear Mr. Lilker:

I have received your letter of February 10 and the materials attached to it. You have asked whether the Village of Freeport has forwarded records to this office in accordance with §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law.

The cited provision states in relevant part that:

"any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive or governing body of the entity, or the person thereof designated by such head, chief executive, or governing body, who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought. In addition, each agency shall immediately forward to the committee on open government a copy of such appeal and the ensuing determination thereon."

Based on a search of our files regarding appeals involving the time period to which you referred, this office has not received copies of appeals or determinations thereon from the Village of Freeport.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Gustave J. DeTraglia, Jr., Esq.
Attorney and Counselor at Law
1425 Genesee Street
Utica, NY 13501

Dear Mr. DeTraglia:

As you are aware, I have received your letter of February 11. In your capacity as attorney for the Town of New Hartford, you raised a series of issue relating to a request for records received by the Town from a law firm. While you expressed the view that certain aspects of the records should be disclosed, you contended that "the name of the law firm and their address and phone number should be redacted for a combination of privacy and confidentiality principles." You added that the town is the client of the law firm.

In addition to the issue of the disclosure of the name and address of the law firm, you indicated that the Town Clerk contacted me concerning the matter without your knowledge and that she did not raise the issue of attorney-client privilege. Further, you asked whether the Town can "raise issues of harassment and abuse of the law" when requests "seem to have no legitimate purpose other than curiosity and/or political motivations."

In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First, I believe that the Town Clerk is the records access officer designated in accordance with the regulations promulgated by the Committee on Open Government (21 NYCRR §1401.2). In that capacity, she has the duty of coordinating the Town's responses to requests for records. Although she may consult with you prior to granting or denying access to records or contacting me, there is no obligation to do so pursuant to the Freedom of Information Law or the regulations promulgated thereunder.

Second, although I do not recall the particular conversation between the clerk and myself, it is clear in my opinion that the identity of the law firm, unlike the legal advice rendered to a client, would fall within the scope of the attorney-client privilege.

As a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law. If indeed records fall within the coverage of the attorney-client privilege, I believe that they would be "specifically exempted from disclosure pursuant to state...statute" in accordance with §87(2)(a). Nevertheless, a judicial decision involving the assertion of the privilege under the Freedom of Information Law indicates that a disclosure of the name, address and telephone number of a law firm providing legal services to a municipality would not be privileged.

That decision, Orange County Publications, Inc. v. County of Orange [637 NYS 2d 596 (1995)], involved access to billing statements submitted to a municipality by a law firm. The court found that the mere communication between the law firm and the County as its client does not necessarily involve a privileged communication; rather, the court stressed that it is the content of the communications that determine the extent to which the privilege applies. Further, the court distinguished between actual communications between attorney and client and descriptions of the legal services provided, stating that:

"Thus, respondent's position can be sustained only if such descriptions rise to the level of protected communications.

"In this regard, the Court recognizes that not all communications between attorney and client are privileged. Matter of Priest v. Hennessy, supra, 51 N.Y.2d 68, 69, 409 N.E.2d 983, 431, N.Y.S.2d 511. In particular, 'fee arrangements between attorney and client do not ordinarily constitute a confidential communication and, thus, are not privileged in the usual case' (Ibid.). Indeed, '[a] communication concerning the fee to be paid has no direct relevance to the legal advice to be given', but rather "[i]s a collateral matter which, unlike communications which relate to the subject matter of the attorney's professional employment, is not privileged' Matter of Priest v. Hennessy, supra, 51 N.Y.2d at 69, 409 N.E.2d 983, 431 N.Y.S.2d 511.

"Consequently, while billing statements which 'are detailed in showing services, conversations, and conferences between counsel and others' are protected by the attorney-client privilege (Licensing Corporation of America v. National Hockey League Players Association, 153 Misc.2d 126, 127-128, 580 N.Y.S.2d 128 [Sup. Ct. N.Y.Co. 1992]; see, De La Roche v. De La Roche, 209 A.D.2d 157, 158-159 [1st Dept. 1994]), no such privilege attaches to fee statements which do not provide 'detailed accounts' of the legal services provided by counsel..." (id., 602).

It was also contended that the records could be withheld on the ground that they constituted attorney work product or material prepared for litigation that are exempted from disclosure by statute [see CPLR, §3101(c) and (d)]. In dealing with that claim, it was stated by the court that:

"Respondent's denial of the FOIL request cannot be upheld unless the descriptive material is uniquely the product of the professional skills of respondent's outside counsel. The preparation and submission of a bill for fees due and owing, not at all dependent on legal expertise, education or training, cannot be 'attribute[d]...to the unique skills of an attorney' (Brandman v. Cross & Brown Co., 125 Misc.2d 185, 188 479 N.Y.S.2d 435 [Sup. Ct. Kings Ct. 1984]). Therefore, the attorney work product privilege does not serve as an absolute bar to disclosure of the descriptive material. (See, id.)"

Based on the foregoing, those portions of a record identifying a law firm by name, address and telephone number would not, in my view, constitute a privileged communication.

With respect to privacy, §87(2)(b) of the Freedom of Information Law authorizes an agency to withhold records to the extent that disclosure would constitute "an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy." From my perspective, it is clear that the privacy exception is applicable to natural persons, not to entities, such as law firms. Moreover, there are several judicial decisions, both New York State and federal, that pertain to records about individuals in their business or professional capacities and which indicate that the records are not of a "personal nature." For instance, one involved a request for the names and addresses of mink and ranch fox farmers from a state agency (ASPCA v. NYS Department of Agriculture and Markets, Supreme Court, Albany County, May 10, 1989). In granting access, the court relied in part and quoted from an opinion rendered by this office in which it was advised that "the provisions concerning privacy in the Freedom of Information Law are intended to be asserted only with respect to 'personal' information relating to natural persons". The court held that:

"...the names and business addresses of individuals or entities engaged in animal farming for profit do not constitute information of a private nature, and this conclusion is not changed by the fact that a person's business address may also be the address of his or her residence. In interpreting the Federal Freedom of Information Law Act (5 USC 552), the Federal Courts have already drawn a distinction between information of a 'private' nature which may not be disclosed, and information of a 'business' nature which may be disclosed (see e.g., Cohen v. Environmental Protection Agency, 575 F Supp. 425 (D.C.D.C. 1983))."

In another decision, Newsday, Inc. v. New York State Department of Health (Supreme Court, Albany County, October 15, 1991)], data acquired by the State Department of Health concerning the performance of open heart surgery by hospitals and individual surgeons was requested. Although the Department provided statistics relating to surgeons, it withheld their identities. In response to a request for an advisory opinion, it was advised by this office, based upon the New York Freedom of Information Law and judicial interpretations of the federal Freedom of Information Act, that the names should be disclosed. The court agreed and cited the opinion rendered by this office.

Like the Freedom of Information Law, the federal Act includes an exception to rights of access designed to protect personal privacy. Specifically, 5 U.S.C. 552(b)(6) states that rights conferred by the Act do not apply to "personnel and medical files and similar files the disclosure of which would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy." In construing that provision, federal courts have held that the exception:

"was intended by Congress to protect individuals from public disclosure of 'intimate details of their lives, whether the disclosure be of personnel files, medical files or other similar files'. Board of Trade of City of Chicago v. Commodity Futures Trading Com'n supra, 627 F.2d at 399, quoting Rural Housing Alliance v. U.S. Dep't of Agriculture, 498 F.2d 73, 77 (D.C. Cir. 1974); see Robles v. EOA, 484 F.2d 843, 845 (4th Cir. 1973). Although the opinion in Rural Housing stated that the exemption 'is phrased broadly to protect individuals from a wide range of embarrassing disclosures', 498 F.2d at 77, the context makes clear the court's recognition that the disclosures with which the statute is concerned are those involving matters of an intimate personal nature. Because of its intimate personal nature, information regarding 'marital status, legitimacy of children, identity of fathers of children, medical condition, welfare payment, alcoholic consumption, family fights, reputation, and so on' falls within the ambit of Exemption 4. Id. By contrast, as Judge Robinson stated in the Chicago Board of Trade case, 627 F.2d at 399, the decisions of this court have established that information connected with professional relationships does not qualify for the exemption" [Sims v. Central Intelligence Agency, 642 F.2d 562, 573-573 (1980)].

In Cohen, the decision cited in ASPCA v. Department of Agriculture and Markets, supra, it was stated pointedly that: "The privacy exemption does not apply to information regarding professional or business activities...This information must be disclosed even if a professional reputation may be tarnished" (supra, 429). In short, in my opinion and as indicated in the decisions cited above, the exception concerning privacy does not extend to the kind of information at issue. If that is so, disclosure would not constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy, and the information in question would be accessible.

Lastly, I know of no decision that deals with the use of the Freedom of Information Law for purposes of curiosity or political advantage in a manner that could be characterized as harassing or abusive. In my opinion, while requests made based on political motivation may be viewed as abusive from a government official's point of view, it may be considered as an assertion of rights or an attempt to ensure accountability from the point of view of others. When records are accessible under the Freedom of Information Law, it has been held that they should be made equally available to any person, regardless of one's status, interest or the intended use of the records [see Burke v. Yudelson, 368 NYS 2d 779, aff'd 51 AD 2d 673, 378 NYS 2d 165 (1976)]. Moreover, the Court of Appeals has held that:

Gustave J. DeTraglia, Jr., Esq.

"FOIL does not require that the party requesting records make any showing of need, good faith or legitimate purpose; while its purpose may be to shed light on government decision-making, its ambit is not confined to records actually used in the decision-making process. (Matter of Westchester Rockland Newspapers v. Kimball, 50 NY 2d 575, 581.) Full disclosure by public agencies is, under FOIL, a public right and in the public interest, irrespective of the status or need of the person making the request" [Farbman v. New York City Health and Hospitals Corporation, 62 NY 2d 75, 80 (1984)].

Based on the foregoing, unless there is a basis for withholding records in accordance with the grounds for denial appearing in §87(2), the use of the records, including curiosity or political gain, is in my opinion irrelevant; when records are accessible, once they are disclosed, the recipient may do with the records as he or she sees fit.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Robert J. Freeman

[REDACTED]

Dear Ms. Paskoff:

I have received your letter of February 16. You wrote that you serve as a member of the Board of Trustees of the Elmont Public Library. Having requested oaths of office pertaining to Library Trustees from the Director of the Library, you were informed that other than your oath of office, the records were not maintained by the Library or any other agency. Following other attempts, the Director phoned to indicate "that she had been 'mistaken' when she reported that there was only one oath of office on file" and said that two other written oaths had been filed.

You wrote that you "doubt the veracity of the Director's statement to [you] regarding the existence of the other written oaths at the time [you] requested them." As such, you asked "[w]hat, if anything, is [your] recourse, now that [you] have found out that [you] have been denied access to records which [you were] entitle to inspect." Conversely, you asked what your recourse might be "if records that exist are proven to be false."

In this regard, when an agency indicates that it does not maintain or cannot locate a record, an applicant for the record may seek a certification to that effect. Section 89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law provides in part that, in such a situation, on request, an agency "shall certify that it does not have possession of such record or that such record cannot be found after diligent search." If you consider it worthwhile to do so, you could seek such a certification.

I point out that in Key v. Hynes [613 NYS 2d 926, 205 AD 2d 779 (1994)], it was found that a court could not validly accept conclusory allegations as a substitute for proof that an agency could not locate a record after having made a "diligent search". However, in another decision, such an allegation was found to be sufficient when "the employee who conducted the actual search for the documents in question submitted an affidavit which provided an adequate basis upon which to conclude that a 'diligent search' for the documents had been made" [Thomas v. Records Access Officer, 613 NYS 2d 929, 205 AD 2d 786 (1994)].

Ms. Edna Paskoff

In addition, while I am not suggesting that it would apply, I note that §89(8) of the Freedom of Information Law pertains to "unlawful prevention of public access to records" and that §240.65 of the Penal Law, which states that:

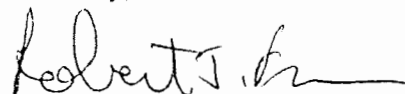

"A person is guilty of unlawful prevention of public access to records when, with intent to prevent the public inspection of a record pursuant to article six of the public officers law, he willfully conceals or destroys any such record."

From my perspective, the preceding may be applicable in two circumstances: first, when an agency employee receives a request for a record and indicates that the agency does not maintain the record even though he or she knows that the agency does maintain the record; or second, when an agency employee destroys a record following a request for that record in order to prevent public disclosure of the record.

Your remaining question does not deal directly with the Freedom of Information Law. Pertinent may be other provisions of law, such as those in the Penal Law dealing with the filing of a false instrument.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Dear Ms. Graves:

I have received your letter of February 9. According to your letter, following a request for records made to the Office of the Queens County District Attorney, you were informed that the records are lost. You questioned whether losing the records is a frequent occurrence and whether there may be another source of the records that you are seeking.

In this regard, I am unaware of the number of requests that are made in comparison to the number of situations in which the records cannot be found. I would conjecture that the loss of records is some what rare.

It is noted that when an agency indicates that it does not maintain or cannot locate a record, an applicant for the record may seek a certification to that effect. Section 89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law provides in part that, in such a situation, on request, an agency "shall certify that it does not have possession of such record or that such record cannot be found after diligent search." While I am unfamiliar with the specific nature of the records sought, frequently copies are maintained by a police department or a court. In the context of your inquiry, if you believe that the records may be maintained by the New York City Police Department, a request may be made to the Records Access Officer, Room 110C, One Police Plaza, New York, New York 10038. Although the courts are not subject to the Freedom of Information Law, court records are generally available under other statutes (see e.g., Judiciary Law, §255). If you believe that the records may be maintained by the court, a request may be made to the court clerk, citing an applicable provision of law as the basis for the request.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Dear Ms. Adler:

I have received your letter of January 31, which reached this office on February 18. You have questioned the use of records identifying users of the Great Neck Library in its election procedures.

In this regard, it does not appear that the Freedom of Information Law is pertinent or controlling. Rather, I believe that statutory direction is provided by §4509 of the Civil Practice Law and Rules, which states that:

“Library records, which contain names or other personally identifying details regarding the users of public, free association, school, college and university libraries and library systems of this state, including but not limited to records related to the circulation of library materials, computer database searches, interlibrary loan transactions, reference queries, requests for photocopies of library materials, title reserve requests, or the use of audio-visual materials, films or records, shall be confidential and shall not be disclosed except that such records may be disclosed to the extent necessary for the proper operation of such library and shall be disclosed upon request or consent of the user or pursuant to subpoena, court order or where otherwise required by statute.”

As I understand the foregoing, the Library is prohibited from disclosing records that contain personally identifying details regarding its users. If its election procedures are inconsistent with the requirements of §4509, they should, in my view, be altered to comply with law.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Mr. Carlos Yepes Rodas
95-A-5856
Green Haven Correctional Facility
Drawer B
Stormville, NY 12582

Dear Mr. Rodas:

I have received your letter of February 9 in which you sought "input or advice" concerning a request for records of the New York City Police Department. One aspect of the request involves records relating to your indictment in 1994. Another involves records "referring to or relating to any investigation conducted by law enforcement personnel into alleged conspiracies [of any kind] of defendant's from 1990 before or until trial."

With respect to the first aspect of your request, as a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law. Since I am unaware of the contents of all of the records in which you are interested, or the effects of their disclosure, I cannot offer specific guidance. Nevertheless, the following paragraphs will review the provisions that may be significant in determining rights of access to the records in question.

In considering the records falling within the scope of your request, relevant is a recent decision by the Court of Appeals concerning "complaint follow up reports" prepared by police officers and police officers' memo books in which it was held that a denial of access based on their characterization as intra-agency materials would be inappropriate.

The provision at issue, §87(2)(g) of the Freedom of Information Law, enables an agency to withhold records that:

"are inter-agency or intra-agency materials which are not:

- i. statistical or factual tabulations or data;
- ii. instructions to staff that affect the public;
- iii. final agency policy or determinations; or
- iv. external audits, including but not limited to audits performed by the comptroller and the federal government..."

It is noted that the language quoted above contains what in effect is a double negative. While inter-agency or intra-agency materials may be withheld, portions of such materials consisting of statistical or factual information, instructions to staff that affect the public, final agency policy or determinations or external audits must be made available, unless a different ground for denial could appropriately be asserted. Concurrently, those portions of inter-agency or intra-agency materials that are reflective of opinion, advice, recommendation and the like could in my view be withheld.

In its analysis of the matter, the decision states that:

"...we note that one court has suggested that complaint follow-up reports are exempt from disclosure because they constitute nonfinal intra-agency material, irrespective of whether the information contained in the reports is 'factual data' (see, Matter of Scott v. Chief Medical Examiner, 179 AD2d 443, 444, supra citing Public Officers Law §87(2)(g)). However, under a plain reading of §87(2)(g), the exemption for intra-agency material does not apply as long as the material falls within any one of the provision's four enumerated exceptions. Thus, intra-agency documents that contain 'statistical or factual tabulations or data' are subject to FOIL disclosure, whether or not embodied in a final agency policy or determination (see, Matter of Farbman & Sons v. New York City Health & Hosp. Corp., 62 NY2d 75, 83, supra; Matter of MacRae v. Dolce, 130 AD2d 577)..."

"...Although the term 'factual data' is not defined by statute, the meaning of the term can be discerned from the purpose underlying the intra-agency exemption, which is 'to protect the deliberative process of the government by ensuring that persons in an advisory role [will] be able to express their opinions freely to agency decision makers' (Matter of Xerox Corp. v. Town of Webster, 65 NY2d 131, 132 [quoting Matter of Sea Crest Constr. Corp. v. Stubing, 82 AD2d 546, 549]). Consistent with this limited aim to safeguard internal government consultations and deliberations, the exemption does not apply when the requested material consists of 'statistical or factual tabulations or data' (Public Officers Law 87(2)(g)(i)). Factual data, therefore, simply means objective information, in contrast to opinions, ideas, or advice exchanged as part of the consultative or deliberative process of government decision making (see, Matter of Johnson Newspaper Corp. v. Stainkamp, 94 AD2d 825, 827, affd on op below, 61 NY2d 958; Matter of Miracle Mile Assocs. v. Yudelton, 68 AD2d 176, 181-182).

"Against this backdrop, we conclude that the complaint follow-up reports contain substantial factual information available pursuant to the provisions of FOIL. Sections of the report are devoted to such purely factual data as: the names, addresses, and physical descriptions of crime victims, witnesses, and perpetrators; a checklist that indicates whether the victims and witnesses have been interviewed and shown photos, whether crime scenes have been photographed and dusted for fingerprints, and whether neighborhood residents have been canvassed for information; and a blank space denominated 'details' in which the officer records the particulars of any action taken in connection with the investigation.

"However, the Police Department argues that any witness statements contained in the reports, in particular, are not 'factual' because there is no assurance of the statements' accuracy and reliability. We decline to read such a reliability requirement into the phrase 'factual data', as the dissent would have us do, and conclude that a witness statement constitutes factual data insofar as it embodies a factual account of the witness's observations. Such a statement, moreover, is far removed from the type of internal government exchange sought to be protected by the intra-agency exemption (see, Matter of Ingram v. Axelrod, 90 AD2d 568, 569 [ambulance records, list of interviews, and reports of interviews available under FOIL as 'factual data']). By contrast, any impressions, recommendations, or opinions recorded in the complaint follow-up report would not constitute factual data and would be exempt from disclosure. The holding herein is only that these reports are not categorically exempt as intra-agency material. Indeed, the Police Department is entitled to withhold complaint follow-up reports, or specific portions thereof, under any other applicable exemption, such as the law-enforcement exemption or the public-safety exemption, as long as the requisite particularized showing is made" [Gould, Scott and DeFelice v. New York City Police Department, 89 NY2d 267, 276-277 (1996); emphasis added by the Court].

Based on the foregoing, the agency could not claim that the complaint reports can be withheld in their entirety on the ground that they constitute intra-agency materials. However, the Court was careful to point out that other grounds for denial might apply in consideration of those records, as well as others that you requested.

For instance, of potential significance is §87(2)(b) of the Freedom of Information Law, which permits an agency to withhold records or portions thereof when disclosure would constitute "an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy". That provision might be applicable relative to the deletion of identifying details in a variety of situations, i.e., where a record identifies a confidential source or a witness, for example.

Often the most relevant provision concerning access to records maintained by law enforcement agencies is §87(2)(e), which permits an agency to withhold records that:

"are compiled for law enforcement purposes and which, if disclosed, would:

- i. interfere with law enforcement investigations or judicial proceedings;
- ii. deprive a person of a right to a fair trial or impartial adjudication;
- iii. identify a confidential source or disclose confidential information relating to a criminal investigation; or
- iv. reveal criminal investigative techniques or procedures, except routine techniques and procedures."

In my view, the foregoing indicates that records compiled for law enforcement purposes can only be withheld to the extent that disclosure would result in the harmful effects described in sub- paragraphs (i) through (iv) of §87(2)(e).

Another possible ground for denial is §87(2)(f), which permits withholding to the extent that disclosure "would endanger the life or safety of any person". The capacity to withhold on that basis is dependent upon the facts and circumstances concerning an event.

Also relevant is the first ground for denial, §87(2)(a), which pertains to records that "are specifically exempted from disclosure by state or federal statute". One such statute, §190.25(4) of the Criminal Procedure Law deals with grand jury proceedings and provides in relevant part that:

"Grand jury proceedings are secret, and no grand juror, or other person specified in subdivision three of this section or section 215.70 of the penal law, may, except in the lawful discharge of his duties or upon written order of the court, disclose the nature or substance of any grand jury testimony, evidence, or any decision, result or other matter attending a grand jury proceeding."

As such, grand jury related records would be outside the scope of rights conferred by the Freedom of Information Law. Any disclosure of those records would be based upon a court order or perhaps a vehicle authorizing or requiring disclosure that is separate and distinct from the Freedom of Information Law.

It is also noted that in a decision concerning a request for records maintained by the office of a district attorney that would ordinarily be exempted from disclosure under the Freedom of Information Law, it was held that "once the statements have been used in open court, they have lost their cloak of confidentiality and are available for inspection by a member of the public" [see Moore v. Santucci, 151 AD 2d 677, 679 (1989)]. Based upon that decision, it appears that records introduced into evidence or disclosed during a public judicial proceeding should be available. However, in the same decision, it was also found that:

"...if the petitioner or his attorney previously received a copy of the agency record pursuant to an alternative discovery device and currently possesses the copy, a court may uphold an agency's denial of the petitioner's request under the FOIL for a duplicate copy as academic. However, the burden of proof rests with the agency to demonstrate that the petitioner's specific requests are moot. The respondent's burden would be satisfied upon proof that a copy of the requested record was previously furnished to the petitioner or his counsel in the absence of any allegation, in evidentiary form, that the copy was no longer in existence. In the event the petitioner's request for a copy of a specific record is not moot, the agency must furnish another copy upon payment of the appropriate fee...unless the requested record falls squarely within the ambit of 1 of the 8 statutory exemptions" (id., 678).

The Court in Moore also specified that an agency "is not required to make available for inspection or copying any suppression hearing or trial transcripts of a witness' testimony in its possession, because the transcripts are court records, not agency records" (id. at 680).

With regard to other elements of the request, a key issue in my opinion involves the extent to which the request "reasonably describes" the records sought as required by §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law. I point out that it has been held by the Court of Appeals that to deny a request on the ground that it fails to reasonably describe the records, an agency must establish that "the descriptions were insufficient for purposes of locating and identifying the documents sought" [Konigsberg v. Coughlin, 68 NY 2d 245, 249 (1986)].

The Court in Konigsberg found that the agency could not reject the request due to its breadth and also stated that:

"respondents have failed to supply any proof whatsoever as to the nature - or even the existence - of their indexing system: whether the Department's files were indexed in a manner that would enable the identification and location of documents in their possession (cf. National Cable Tel. Assn. v Federal Communications Commn., 479 F2d 183, 192 [Bazelon, J.] [plausible claim of nonidentifiability under Federal Freedom of Information Act, 5 USC section 552 (a) (3), may be presented where agency's indexing system was such that 'the requested documents could not be identified by retracing a path already trodden. It would have required a wholly new enterprise, potentially requiring a search of every file in the possession of the agency']" (id. at 250).

In my view, whether a request reasonably describes the records sought, as suggested by the Court of Appeals, may be dependent upon the terms of a request, as well as the nature of an agency's filing or record-keeping system. In Konigsberg, it appears that the agency was able to locate the records on the basis of an inmate's name and identification number.

While I am unfamiliar with the recordkeeping systems of the Department, to extent that the records sought can be located with reasonable effort, I believe that the request would have met the requirement of reasonably describing the records. On the other hand, if the records are not maintained in a manner that permits their retrieval except by reviewing perhaps hundreds or even thousands of records individually in an effort to locate those falling within the scope of the request, to that extent, the request would not in my opinion meet the standard of reasonably describing the records. Further, in the context of the request, a real question involves, very simply, where Department officials might begin to look for records. It is possible that records falling within the scope of the request may be maintained in several locations by a variety of units within Department, and that those units maintain their records by means of different filing and retrieval methods. If an office maintains all of its records in a single file, it may be a simple task to locate the records. If, however, records are maintained in a different manner, locating the records might involve a search, in essence, for the needle in the haystack. Based on the holding by the State's highest court, an agency is not required to engage in that kind of effort.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Dear Mr. Jones:

I have received your letter of February 15. You referred to an opinion addressed to you on February 3 and your ensuing "revised request" in which you sought "a listing of all violent felony offenders that have appeared each month, at Wallkill Correctional Facility, between the years of January, 1995 to December of 1998 and have been placed on hold-status--effectively denying parole."

In this regard, I reiterate the point offered in the earlier opinion: the Freedom of Information Law pertains to existing records, and §89(3) of that statute indicates that an agency is not required to prepare a record in response to a request.

If the facility to which your request was made maintains a "listing" containing the information sought, it would be obliged to disclose its contents to the extent required by the Freedom of Information Law. If no such listing exists, there would be no obligations to create such a list on your behalf.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Dear Ms. Pratt:

As you are aware, your letter of February 2 addressed to the Attorney General has been forwarded to the Committee on Open Government. The Committee, a unit of the Department of State, is authorized to provide advice concerning the Freedom of Information Law. In brief, you complained that your requests for records sent to Region 2 of the Department of Environmental Conservation have been ignored.

In this regard, the Freedom of Information Law provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies must respond to requests. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

"Each entity subject to the provisions of this article, within five business days of the receipt of a written request for a record reasonably described, shall make such record available to the person requesting it, deny such request in writing or furnish a written acknowledgement of the receipt of such request and a statement of the approximate date when such request will be granted or denied..."

If neither a response to a request nor an acknowledgement of the receipt of a request is given within five business days, or if an agency delays responding for an unreasonable time after it acknowledges that a request has been received, a request may, in my opinion, be considered to have been constructively denied. In such a circumstance, I believe that the denial may be appealed in accordance with §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law. That provision states in relevant part that:

Ms. Dolly Pratt
February 26, 1999

"...any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive, or governing body, who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

In addition, it has been held that when an appeal is made but a determination is not rendered within ten business days of the receipt of the appeal as required under §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, the appellant has exhausted his or her administrative remedies and may initiate a challenge to a constructive denial of access under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Rules [Floyd v. McGuire, 87 AD 2d 388, appeal dismissed 57 NY 2d 774 (1982)].

For your information, the person designated to determine appeals at the Department of Environmental Conservation is Counsel to the Department.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Dear Mr. Fornal:

I have received your letter of February 11. You referred to the opinion addressed to you on January 29 and indicated that your comment concerning free speech "was not about speaking out at public meetings. But, rather, the protected right for one to whisper in their friend's ear during a public meeting." You have asked whether the ability to whisper in one's ear is a "protected right."

From my perspective, the issue does not involve the Open Meetings Law but rather the authority of a public body to govern its proceedings by means of the rules that it adopts. I note that it has been held that rules involving conduct at meetings must be reasonable [see e.g., People v. Ystueta, 99 Misc. 2d 1105, 418 NYS 2d 508 (1979), Mitchell v. Board of Education of the Garden City Union Free School District, 113 AD2d 924 91985), and Peloquin v. Arsenault, 616 NYS2d 716 (1994)].

Ms. Brenda Shepard

[REDACTED]

Dear Ms. Shepard:

I have received your letter of February 17. You have questioned the propriety of "restrictions" on your ability to gain access to records of the Barker Central School District.

Having reviewed the "restrictions" set forth in a letter addressed to you by the District's attorney, I do not believe that they are inconsistent with the Freedom of Information Law or the procedural regulations promulgated by the Committee on Open Government (21 NYCRR part 1401).

I note, however, that the attorney indicated that you could review the records only for a period of one hour during a particular day. In this regard, §1401.4 of the Committee's regulations, entitled "Hours for public inspection", states that:

"(a) Each agency shall accept requests for public access to records and produce records during all hours they are regularly open for business."

Relevant to your inquiry and the foregoing is a decision rendered by the Appellate Division. Among the issues was the validity of a similar limitation regarding the time permitted to inspect records established by a village pursuant to regulation. The Court held that the village was required to enable the public to inspect records during its regular business hours, stating that:

"...to the extent that Regulation 6 has been interpreted as permitting the Village Clerk to limit the hours during which public documents can be inspected to a period of time less than the business hours of the Clerk's office, it is violative of the Freedom of Information Law..."
[Murtha v. Leonard, 620 NYS 2d 101 (1994), 210 AD 2d 411].

Ms. Brenda Shepard

Lastly, having reviewed your request as published in a news article, I point out that the title of the Freedom of Information Law may be somewhat misleading, for it is not a vehicle that requires the disclosure of information per se; rather, it is a vehicle that pertains to rights of access to existing records. Further, §89(3) states in part that agency need not create a record in response to a request. Similarly, while that statute may require an agency to disclose records, it does not require that an agency provide answers in response to questions. In the future, rather than seeking information by asking questions, it is suggested that you request existing records. For instance, instead of asking what the rate of pay might be for a person or a law firm, I recommend that you request records indicating the rate of pay. In several instances, you requested "lists" or "totals." In short, if no list or total is maintained, the District would not be obliged to prepare new records on your behalf.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Ms. Joan Eustace-Reeverts

[REDACTED]

Dear Ms. Eustace-Reeverts:

I have received your letter of February 16 in which you raised a series of questions concerning the disclosure of information by Erie Community College.

The initial area of inquiry involves your efforts in obtaining notes of interviews pertaining to you. In this regard, in view of the delays that you have encountered, I point out that the Freedom of Information Law provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies must respond to requests. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

"Each entity subject to the provisions of this article, within five business days of the receipt of a written request for a record reasonably described, shall make such record available to the person requesting it, deny such request in writing or furnish a written acknowledgement of the receipt of such request and a statement of the approximate date when such request will be granted or denied..."

If neither a response to a request nor an acknowledgement of the receipt of a request is given within five business days, or if an agency delays responding for an unreasonable time after it acknowledges that a request has been received, a request may, in my opinion, be considered to have been constructively denied. In such a circumstance, I believe that the denial may be appealed in accordance with §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law. That provision states in relevant part that:

"...any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive, or governing body, who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

In addition, it has been held that when an appeal is made but a determination is not rendered within ten business days of the receipt of the appeal as required under §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, the appellant has exhausted his or her administrative remedies and may initiate a challenge to a constructive denial of access under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Rules [Floyd v. McGuire, 87 AD 2d 388, appeal dismissed 57 NY 2d 774 (1982)].

As a general matter, the Freedom of Information is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law.

Relevant with respect to access to the notes is §87 (2)(g), which states that an agency may withhold records that:

"are inter-agency or intra-agency materials which are not:

- i. statistical or factual tabulations or data;
- ii. instructions to staff that affect the public;
- iii. final agency policy or determinations; or
- iv. external audits, including but not limited to audits performed by the comptroller and the federal government..."

It is noted that the language quoted above contains what in effect is a double negative. While inter-agency or intra-agency materials may be withheld, portions of such materials consisting of statistical or factual information, instructions to staff that affect the public, final agency policy or determinations or external audits must be made available, unless a different ground for denial could appropriately be asserted. Concurrently, those portions of inter-agency or intra-agency materials that are reflective of opinion, advice, recommendation and the like could in my view be withheld.

In short, insofar as the notes consist of factual information, I believe that they must be disclosed; insofar as they include the interviewer's opinions or recommendations, I believe they may be withheld.

A second area of inquiry pertains to the contents of minutes of meetings of the Executive Committee of the Board of Trustees. In this regard, §106(1) of the Open Meetings Law provides direction concerning the contents of minutes of open meetings and states that:

"Minutes shall be taken at all open meetings of a public body which shall consist of a record or summary of all motions, proposals, resolutions and any other matter formally voted upon and the vote thereon."

In a decision that may be pertinent to the matter, Mitzner v. Goshen Central School District Board of Education [Supreme Court, Orange County, April 15, 1993], the case involved a series of complaints that were reviewed by the School Board president, and the minutes of the Board meeting merely stated that "the Board hereby ratifies the action of the President in signing and issuing eight Determinations in regard to complaints received from Mr. Bernard Mitzner." The court held that "these bare-bones resolutions do not qualify as a record or summary of the final determination as required" by §106 of the Open Meetings Law. As such, the court found that the failure to indicate the nature of the determination of the complaints was inadequate. In the context of your inquiry, I believe that, in order to comply with the Open Meetings Law and to be consistent with the thrust of the holding in Mitzner, minutes must indicate in some manner the precise nature of the Board's action.

With respect to minutes of executive sessions, the remainder of §106 of the Open Meetings Law provides that :

“2. Minutes shall be taken at executive sessions of any action that is taken by formal vote which shall consist of a record or summary of the final determination of such action, and the date and vote thereon; provided, however, that such summary need not include any matter which is not required to be made public by the freedom of information law as added by article six of this chapter.

3. Minutes of meetings of all public bodies shall be available to the public in accordance with the provisions of the freedom of information law within two weeks from the date of such meetings except that minutes taken pursuant to subdivision two hereof shall be available to the public within one week from the date of the executive session."

I point out that, as a general rule, a public body may take action during a properly convened executive session [see Open Meetings Law, §105(1)]. If action is taken during an executive session, minutes reflective of the action, the date and the vote must be recorded in minutes pursuant to §106(2) of the Law. If no action is taken, there is no requirement that minutes of the executive session be prepared.

It is noted that minutes of executive sessions need not include information that may be withheld under the Freedom of Information Law. From my perspective, even when a public body makes a final determination during an executive session, that determination will, in most instances, be public. For example, although a discussion to hire or fire a particular employee could clearly be discussed during an executive session [see Open Meetings Law, §105(1)(f), a determination to hire or fire that person would be recorded in minutes and would be available to the public under the Freedom of Information Law. On other hand, if a public body votes to initiate a disciplinary proceeding against a public employee, minutes reflective of its action would not have include reference to or identify the person, for the Freedom of Information Law authorizes an agency to withhold records to the extent that disclosure would result in an unwarranted personal privacy [see Freedom of Information Law, §87(2)(b)].

With regard to information detailing how each member voted, I direct your attention to the Freedom of Information Law. Section 87(3)(a) provides that:

"Each agency shall maintain:

(a) a record of the final vote of each member in every agency proceeding in which the member votes..."

Based upon the foregoing, when a final vote is taken by an "agency", which is defined to include a state or municipal board [see §86(3)], a record must be prepared that indicates the manner in which each member who voted cast his or her vote. Ordinarily, records of votes will appear in minutes.

In terms of the rationale of §87(3)(a), it appears that the State Legislature in precluding secret ballot voting sought to ensure that the public has the right to know how its representatives may have voted individually with respect to particular issues. Although the Open Meetings Law does not refer specifically to the manner in which votes are taken or recorded, I believe that the thrust of §87(3)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law is consistent with the Legislative Declaration that appears at the beginning of the Open Meetings Law and states that:

"it is essential to the maintenance of a democratic society that the public business be performed in an open and public manner and that the citizens of this state be fully aware of and able to observe the performance of public officials and attend and listen to the deliberations and decisions that go into the making of public policy. The people must be able to remain informed if they are to retain control over those who are their public servants."

Moreover, in an Appellate Division decision that was affirmed by the Court of Appeals, it was found that "The use of a secret ballot for voting purposes was improper." In so holding, the Court stated that: "When action is taken by formal vote at open or executive sessions, the Freedom of Information Law and the Open Meetings Law both require open voting and a record of the manner in which each member voted [Public Officers Law §87(3)(a); §106(1), (2)]" Smithson v. Ilion Housing Authority, 130 AD 2d 965, 967 (1987); aff'd 72 NY 2d 1034 (1988).

Lastly, you expressed an understanding that :

"if an employee is going to be discussed in 'executive session' that the employee must be given 48 hours advance notice, and the employee has the right to move it to an 'open session' and that the decision is strictly up to the employee not the employer, and the employee has a right to counsel."

I believe that your understanding is inaccurate. There is nothing in the open Meetings Law that requires that an employee be given notice that he or she will be discussed during an executive session. Further, the subject of the discussion has no control over whether the discussion is held in public or in private based on the provision of the Open Meetings Law.

Ms. Joan Eustace-Reeverts

Dear Ms. Svolos:

I have received your letter of February 12 in which you sought an advisory opinion concerning what you characterized as "certain abuses of open government" in the City of Peekskill.

You referred initially to a situation in which an individual "was denied access to the City Council's working meeting, and when he pressed his right to attend, the meeting went into executive session." In this regard, there is no legal distinction between a "working meeting" and a formal or official meeting. By way of background, it is noted that the definition of "meeting" has been broadly interpreted by the courts. In a landmark decision rendered in 1978, the Court of Appeals, the state's highest court, found that any gathering of a quorum of a public body for the purpose of conducting public business is a "meeting" that must be convened open to the public, whether or not there is an intent to take action and regardless of the manner in which a gathering may be characterized [see Orange County Publications v. Council of the City of Newburgh, 60 AD 2d 409, aff'd 45 NY 2d 947 (1978)].

I point out that the decision rendered by the Court of Appeals was precipitated by contentions made by public bodies that so-called "work sessions" and similar gatherings held for the purpose of discussion, but without an intent to take action, fell outside the scope of the Open Meetings Law. In discussing the issue, the Appellate Division, whose determination was unanimously affirmed by the Court of Appeals, stated that: document. Every step of the decision-making process, including the decision itself, is a necessary preliminary to formal action. Formal acts have always been matters of public record and the public has always been made aware of how its officials have voted on an issue. There would be no need for this law if this was all the Legislature intended. Obviously, every thought, as well as every affirmative act of a public official as it relates to and is within the scope of one's official duties is a matter of public concern. It is the entire decision-making process that the Legislature intended to affect by the enactment of this statute" (60 AD 2d 409, 415).

"We believe that the Legislature intended to include more than the mere formal act of voting or the formal execution of an official

The court also dealt with the characterization of meetings as "informal," stating that:

"The word 'formal' is defined merely as 'following or according with established form, custom, or rule' (Webster's Third New Int. Dictionary). We believe that it was inserted to safeguard the rights of members of a public body to engage in ordinary social transactions, but not to permit the use of this safeguard as a vehicle by which it precludes the application of the law to gatherings which have as their true purpose the discussion of the business of a public body" (id.).

Based upon the direction given by the courts, if a majority of a public body gathers to discuss public business, any such gathering, in my opinion, would ordinarily constitute a "meeting" subject to the Open Meetings Law that must be preceded by notice given in accordance with §104 of the Law.

Further, a public body cannot conduct an executive session to discuss the subject of its choice; §105(1) of the Open Meetings Law specifies and limits the subjects that may properly be considered during an executive session.

Next, you referred to situations in which you sought to attend a "scheduled work session meeting" but "found that it had been held at an earlier time." Since a "working meeting" is subject to the Open Meetings Law, it must be preceded by notice. Section 104 of that statute provides that:

"1. Public notice of the time and place of a meeting scheduled at least one week prior thereto shall be given to the news media and shall be conspicuously posted in one or more designated public locations at least seventy-two hours before each meeting.

2. Public notice of the time and place of every other meeting shall be given, to the extent practicable, to the news media and shall be conspicuously posted in one or more designated public locations at a reasonable time prior thereto.

3. The public notice provided for by this section shall not be construed to require publication as a legal notice."

Stated differently, if a meeting is scheduled at least a week in advance, notice of the time and place must be given to the news media and to the public by means of posting in one or more designated public locations, not less than seventy-two hours prior to the meeting. If a meeting is scheduled less than a week in advance, again, notice of the time and place must be given to the news media and posted in the same manner as described above, "to the extent practicable", at a reasonable time prior to the meeting. Although, the Open Meetings Law does not make reference to "unscheduled", "special" or "emergency" meetings, if, for example, there is a need to convene quickly, the notice requirements can generally be met by telephoning the local news media and by posting notice in one or more designated locations.

I note the judicial interpretation of the Open Meetings Law suggests that the propriety of scheduling a meeting less than a week in advance is dependent upon the actual need to do so. As stated in Previdi v. Hirsch:

"Whether abbreviated notice is 'practicable' or 'reasonable' in a given case depends on the necessity for same. Here, respondents virtually concede a lack of urgency: They deny petitioner's characterization of the session as an 'emergency' and maintain nothing of substance was transacted at the meeting except to discuss the status of litigation and to authorize, pro forma, their insurance carrier's involvement in negotiations. It is manifest then that the executive session could easily have been scheduled for another date with only minimum delay. In that event respondents could even have provided the more extensive notice required by POL §104(1). Only respondent's choice in scheduling prevented this result.

"Moreover, given the short notice provided by respondents, it should have been apparent that the posting of a single notice in the School District offices would hardly serve to apprise the public that an executive session was being called...

"In White v. Battaglia, 79 A.D. 2d 880, 881, 434 N.Y.S.2d 637, lv. to app. den. 53 N.Y.2d 603, 439 N.Y.S.2d 1027, 421 N.E.2d 854, the Court condemned an almost identical method of notice as one at bar:

"Fay Powell, then president of the board, began contacting board members at 4:00 p.m. on June 27 to ask them to attend a meeting at 7:30 that evening at the central office, which was not the usual meeting date or place. The only notice given to the public was one typewritten announcement posted on the central office bulletin board...Special Term could find on this record that appellants violated the...Public Officers Law...in that notice was not given 'to the extent practicable, to the news media' nor was it 'conspicuously posted in one or more designated public locations' at a reasonable time 'prior thereto' (emphasis added)" [524 NYS 2d 643, 645 (1988)].

Based upon the foregoing, absent an emergency or urgency, the Court in Previdi suggested that it would be unreasonable to conduct meetings on short notice, unless there is some necessity to do so.

You indicated that you have also experienced difficulty in obtaining records, particularly crime statistics and those relating to the renovation of a named facility. Specifically, you wrote that:

"We have been trying for three months to obtain via the filing of an FOI, the original application from the Peekskill Housing Authority for money from HUD for installation of surveillance cameras. We have been sent from the Housing Authority to City Hall and from City Hall back to the Housing Authority with detours to the Police Department, with no visible result."

In my view, both the City and the Authority are required to comply with the Freedom of Information Law, and each has an obligation to respond to requests for records in their custody. I point out by way of background that the Freedom of Information Law is applicable to agency records and that §86(3) of the Law defines the term "agency" to include:

"any state or municipal department, board, bureau, division, commission, committee, public authority, public corporation, council, office of other governmental entity performing a governmental or proprietary function for the state or any one or more municipalities thereof, except the judiciary or the state legislature."

The Kiley Center is operated by the City of Peekskill Civic Center Authority, which, according to §2073 of the Public Authorities Law, is a public benefit corporation. Since a public benefit corporation is an "agency" subject to the Freedom of Information Law, it would be required to comply with that statute.

It is also noted that the Freedom of Information Law provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies must respond to requests. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

Ms. Georgia Svolos

If neither a response to a request nor an acknowledgement of the receipt of a request is given within five business days, or if an agency delays responding for an unreasonable time after it acknowledges that a request has been received, a request may, in my opinion, be considered to have been constructively denied. In such a circumstance, I believe that the denial may be appealed in accordance with §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law. That provision states in relevant part that:

"...any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive, or governing body, who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

In addition, it has been held that when an appeal is made but a determination is not rendered within ten business days of the receipt of the appeal as required under §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, the appellant has exhausted his or her administrative remedies and may initiate a challenge to a constructive denial of access under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Rules [Floyd v. McGuire, 87 AD 2d 388, appeal dismissed 57 NY 2d 774 (1982)].

Lastly, you complained concerning "the continual refusal on the part of City government to place items on its agenda that [you] have asked them to consider..." In short, I know of no law that would require the City to place items on its agenda or to consider issues pursuant to your request that it do so.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Robert J. Freeman

Dear Mr. Wright:

I have received your letter of February 14. You have questioned the status of the Legal Aid Society under the Freedom of Information Law.

In this regard, the Freedom of Information Law pertains to records maintained by agencies, and §86(3) of that statute defines the term "agency" to mean:

"any state or municipal department, board, bureau, division, commission, committee, public authority, public corporation, council, office or other governmental entity performing a governmental or proprietary function for the state or any one or more municipalities thereof, except the judiciary or the state legislature."

Therefore, in general, the Freedom of Information Law is applicable to entities of state and local government.

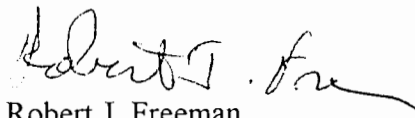

It is my understanding that there are a variety of entities within New York that use the name "Legal Aid Society". Some are a part of the federal Legal Services Corporation, some may be private not-for profit corporations, and some may be parts of units of local government. While legal aid societies which are agencies of local government may be subject to the Freedom of Information Law, most are not "agencies" as that term is defined in the Freedom of Information Law and, as such, are not subject to that statute.

Mr. Charles Wright

If you are referring to the Legal Aid Society in New York City, I am not fully familiar with its status. However, I believe that it is a corporate entity separate and distinct from government, and that it is not an "agency" subject to the Freedom of Information Law.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Hon. Robert Cunningham
Supervisor
Town of Deerpark
Drawer A
Huguenot, NY 12746

Dear Supervisor Cunningham:

I have received your letter of February 17 and the correspondence attached to it, a letter addressed to you by the Orange County Commissioner of Personnel. The Town Board has informed you that the letter is "confidential" and should not be released.

The first paragraph of the letter states as follows:

"It has been discovered that Mr. Romanino Colandrea fails to meet the minimally required qualifications for service in the title of Police Chief (A). As such, he must vacate the position for which was nominated by the Town of Deerpark, and must do so forthwith."

The basis for the conclusion involves a recitation in the next paragraph consisting largely of a review of positions previously held by Mr. Colandrea with other municipalities and the periods of time in which those positions were held.

From my perspective, the letter in question is accessible to the public under the Freedom of Information Law. In this regard I offer the following comments.

In brief, the Freedom of Information is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law.

Pertinent to the matter is §87 (2)(g). While that provision potentially serves as a basis for a denial of access, due to its structure, it often requires disclosure. Specifically, the cited provision enables an agency to withhold records that:

"are inter-agency or intra-agency materials which are not:

- i. statistical or factual tabulations or data;
- ii. instructions to staff that affect the public;
- iii. final agency policy or determinations; or
- iv. external audits, including but not limited to audits performed by the comptroller and the federal government..."

It is noted that the language quoted above contains what in effect is a double negative. While inter-agency or intra-agency materials may be withheld, portions of such materials consisting of statistical or factual information, instructions to staff that affect the public, final agency policy or determinations or external audits must be made available, unless a different ground for denial could appropriately be asserted. Concurrently, those portions of inter-agency or intra-agency materials that are reflective of opinion, advice, recommendation and the like could in my view be withheld.

The first paragraph in my view clearly indicates that the letter serves as a final determination that would be available under §87 (2)(g)(iii). The second paragraph indicating positions held and dates of employment consists of factual information available under §87 (2)(g)(i).

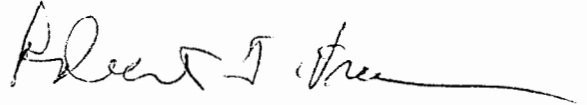

Also pertinent is which authorizes agencies to withhold records insofar as disclosure would constitute "an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy." While the standard concerning privacy is flexible and may be subject to conflicting interpretations, the courts have provided substantial direction regarding the privacy of public officers employees. It is clear that public officers and employees enjoy a lesser degree of privacy than others, for it has been found in various contexts that public officers and employees are required to be more accountable than others. Further, with regard to records pertaining to public officers and employees, the courts have found that, as a general rule, records that are relevant to the performance of a their official duties are available, for disclosure in such instances would result in a permissible rather than an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy [see e.g., Farrell v. Village Board of Trustees, 372 NYS 2d 905 (1975); Gannett Co. v. County of Monroe, 59 AD 2d 309 (1977), aff'd 45 NY 2d 954 (1978); Sinicropi v. County of Nassau, 76 AD 2d 838 (1980); Geneva Printing Co. and Donald C. Hadley v. Village of Lyons, Sup. Ct., Wayne Cty., March 25, 1981; Montes v. State, 406 NYS 2d 664 (Court of Claims, 1978); Powhida v. City of Albany, 147 AD 2d 236 (1989); Scaccia v. NYS Division of State Police, 530 NYS 2d 309, 138 AD 2d 50 (1988); Steinmetz v. Board of Education, East Moriches, Sup. Ct., Suffolk Cty., NYLJ, Oct. 30, 1980); Capital Newspapers v. Burns, 67 NY 2d 562 (1986)].

A determination involving the employment or termination of employment be a governmental entity would be relevant to that person's duties, as well as those of the municipality. Additionally, the fact of one's public employment, that person's title, salary and dates of attendance are, based on the language of the Freedom of Information Law and its judicial interpretation, accessible to the public [see Freedom of Information Law, §87(3)(b); also see Capital Newspapers, supra].

Dear Mr. Milling:

I have received your undated letter, which reached this office on February 19. You have asked how you might obtain statistics from the Division of Parole.

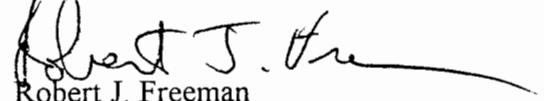

In this regard, a request for records made under the Freedom of Information Law should be addressed to the "records access officer" at the agency that maintains the records of your interest. The records access officer has the duty of coordinating an agency's response to requests. To seek records from the Division of Parole, a request may be directed to David Molik, Records Access Officer, NYS Division of Parole, 97 Central Avenue, Albany, NY 12206.

It is emphasized that the Freedom of Information Law pertains to existing records and that §89(3) of that statute provides in part that an agency is not required to create a new record in response to a request. Therefore, if the Division of Parole has not created statistics involving the information of your interest, it would not be required to prepare or tabulate new statistical information on your behalf in order to satisfy your request. I have no personal knowledge concerning the nature of any statistics that have been prepared by the Division of Parole concerning inmates released since 1994. It is suggested a request pertain to statistics prepared since 1994 involving the areas of your interest.

Dear Mr. Evans:

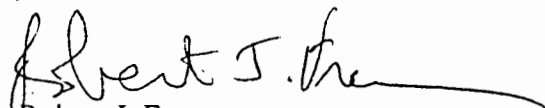

I have received your letter of February 18 in which you appealed a denial of your request for records, which was appealed to Susan Petito, the Records Access Appeals Officer for the New York City Police Department.

In this regard, if an agency has denied an appeal pursuant to §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, there is no additional appeal. I note, too, that the Committee on Open Government is authorized to provide advice concerning that statute; the Committee is not empowered to determine appeals or otherwise compel an agency to grant or deny access to records.

When an agency denies an appeal in writing in accordance with §89(4)(a), the applicant may seek judicial review of the denial within four months by initiating a proceeding under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Law and Rules. Such a proceeding may also be initiated if the agency fails to determine the appeal within ten business days of its receipt of the appeal as required by law [Floyd Matter of v. Ms. Halyna Barannik
Director
West Hurley Public Library
42 Clover Street
West Hurley, NY 12491

Dear Ms. Barannik:

I have received your letter of February 19 in which you sought my views concerning a situation that has arisen in relation to the West Hurley Public Library.

According to your letter, a member of the Library Board of Trustees "removed 85 public surveys from the library when the library was closed and refused to return them when [you] twice recalled them 6 weeks later, claiming that he needed them for a committee on long-range planning." Although he prepared an analysis of the surveys, he continues to retain the original surveys.

From my perspective, the Trustee has no right to maintain the surveys, for they are the property of the Library. In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First, a public library that is a governmental agency is clearly subject to the Freedom of Information Law. That statute pertains to agency records, and §86(4) defines the term "record" expansively to include:

"any information kept, held, filed, produced, reproduced by, with or for an agency or the state legislature, in any physical form whatsoever including, but not limited to, reports, statements, examinations, memoranda, opinions, folders, files, books, manuals, pamphlets, forms, papers, designs, drawings, maps, photos, letters, microfilms, computer tapes or discs, rules, regulations or codes."

In a case in which an agency contended, in essence, that it could choose which documents it considered to be "records" for purposes of the Freedom of Information Law, the state's highest court rejected that claim. As stated by the Court of Appeals:

"...respondents' construction -- permitting an agency to engage in a unilateral prescreening of those documents which it deems to be outside the scope of FOIL -- would be inconsistent with the process set forth in the statute. In enacting FOIL, the Legislature devised a detailed system to insure that although FOIL's scope is broadly defined to include all governmental records, there is a means by which an agency may properly withhold from disclosure records found to be exempt (see, Public Officers Law §87[2]; §89[2],[3]). Thus, FOIL provides that a request for access may be denied by an agency in writing pursuant to Public Officers Law §89(3) to prevent an unwarranted invasion of privacy (see, Public Officers Law §89[2]) or for one of the other enumerated reasons for exemption (see, Public Officers Law §87[2]). A party seeking disclosure may challenge the agency's assertion of an exemption by appealing within the agency pursuant to Public Officers Law §89(4)(a). In the event that the denial of access is upheld on the internal appeal, the statute specifically authorizes a proceeding to obtain judicial review pursuant to CPLR article 78 (see, Public Officers Law §89[4][b]). Respondents' construction, if followed, would allow an agency to bypass this statutory process. An agency could simply remove documents which, in its opinion, were not within the scope of the FOIL, thereby obviating the need to articulate a specific exemption and avoiding review of its action. Thus, respondents' construction would render much of the statutory exemption and review procedure ineffective; to adopt this construction would be contrary to the accepted principle that a statute should be interpreted so as to give effect to all of its provisions...

"...as a practical matter, the procedure permitting an unreviewable prescreening of documents -- which respondents urge us to engraft on the statute -- could be used by an uncooperative and obdurate public official or agency to block an entirely legitimate FOIL request. There would be no way to prevent a custodian of records from removing a public record from FOIL's reach by simply labeling it 'purely private'. Such a construction, which could thwart the entire objective of FOIL by creating an easy means of avoiding compliance, should be rejected" [Capital Newspapers v. Whalen, 69 NY 2d 246, 253-254 (1987)].

The records would not have come into the possession of the Trustee, but for his position as Trustee. That being so, it is my opinion that records in question are subject the Freedom of Information Law. Even though they may be in the physical possession of the Trustee, they are not his personal property; on the contrary, I believe that they are the property of the Library and in the legal custody of the Library and that they must be returned. Moreover, if a member of the public requests the surveys under the Freedom of Information Law, without having possession of those records, the Library would be incapable of complying with law.

Similarly, the "Local Government Records Law", Article 57-A of the Arts and Cultural Affairs Law, deals with the management, custody, retention and disposal of records by local governments. For purposes of those provisions, §57.17(4) of the Arts and Cultural Affairs Law defines "record" to mean:

"...any book, paper, map, photograph, or other information-recording device, regardless of physical form or characteristic, that is made, produced, executed, or received by any local government or officer thereof pursuant to law or in connection with the transaction of public business. Record as used herein shall not be deemed to include library materials, extra copies of documents created only for convenience of reference, and stocks of publications."

As in the case of the Freedom of Information Law, I believe that the materials at issue would constitute "records".

Further, §57.25 of the Arts and Cultural Affairs Law states in relevant part that:

"1. It shall be the responsibility of every local officer to maintain records to adequately document the transaction of public business and the services and programs for which such officer is responsible; to retain and have custody of such records for so long as the records are needed for the conduct of the business of the office; to adequately protect such records; to cooperate with the local government's records management officer on programs for the orderly and efficient management of records including identification and management of inactive records and identification and preservation of records of enduring value; to dispose of records in accordance with legal requirements; and to pass on to his successor records needed for the continuing conduct of business of the office..."

Based on the foregoing, I believe that you, in your capacity as Library Director, have a legal obligation to maintain the custody and integrity of the surveys. That being so, and in order to enable you to perform your legal responsibilities, I believe that the surveys must be returned by the Trustee to the Library.

If the surveys are requested by the public under the Freedom of Information Law, I note that the Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law.

Ms. Halyna Barannik

As I understand the matter, the survey responses include "vociferous" comments by taxpayers concerning a particular issue. In my view, while the substance of the surveys would be accessible, any portion of their contents that would identify those who responded could be deleted pursuant to §87(2)(b), which states that an agency may withhold records to the extent that disclosure would constitute "an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy."

I hope that I have been of assistance. Should any questions arise, please feel free to contact me.

Sincerely,

Dear Mr. Brown:

I have received your letter of February 23, in which you appealed a denial of access to certain court records.

In this regard, the Committee on Open Government is authorized to provide advice concerning the Freedom of Information Law. The Committee is not empowered to determine appeals or otherwise compel an entity to grant or deny access to records.

Further, it is emphasized that the Freedom of Information Law is applicable to agency records, and that §86(3) defines the term "agency" to include:

"any state or municipal department, board, bureau, division, commission, committee, public authority, public corporation, council, office or other governmental entity performing a governmental or proprietary function for the state or any one or more municipalities thereof, except the judiciary or the state legislature."

In turn, §86(1) defines the term "judiciary" to mean:

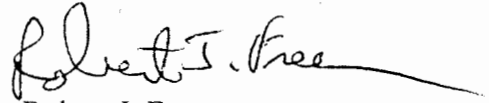

"the courts of the state, including any municipal or district court, whether or not of record."

Based on the provisions quoted above, the courts and court records are not subject to the Freedom of Information Law. This is not to suggest that court records are not generally available to the public, for other provisions of law (see e.g., Judiciary Law, §255) may grant broad public access to those records. Even though other statutes may deal with access to court records, the procedural provisions associated with the Freedom of Information Law (i.e., those involving the designation of a records access officer or the right to appeal a denial) would not ordinarily be applicable.

Dear Mr. Henderson:

I have received your letter of February 14 in which you asked for assistance in obtaining records under the Freedom of Information Law from Abbott House, which apparently is a foster care agency.

In this regard, it is likely that Abbott House is not subject to the Freedom of Information Law. That statute pertains to agency records, and §86(3) defines the term "agency" to mean:

"any state or municipal department, board, bureau, division, commission, committee, public authority, public corporation, council, office or other governmental entity performing a governmental or proprietary function for the state or any one or more municipalities thereof, except the judiciary or the state legislature."

Based on the foregoing, the Freedom of Information Law generally applies to records maintained by entities of state and local government. I would conjecture that Abbott House is not a governmental entity.

Even if it is an agency, the Freedom of Information Law would not govern access to its records, and a different statute generally requires that the kinds of records in which you are interested be kept confidential. Specifically, §372 of the Social Services Law which requires that various records be kept by "every court, and every public board, commission, institution, or officer having powers or charged with duties in relation to abandoned, delinquent, destitute, neglected or dependent children who shall receive, accept or commit any child..." Subdivision (4) of §372 states in relevant part that such records:

"shall be deemed confidential and shall be safeguarded from coming to the knowledge of and from inspection or examination or by any person other than one authorized, by the department, by a judge of the court of claims when such records are required for the trial of a claim or other proceeding in such court or by a justice of the supreme court, or by a judge of the family court when such records are required for the trial of a proceeding in such court, after a notice to all interested persons and a hearing, to receive such knowledge or to make such inspection or examination. No person shall divulge the information thus obtained without authorization so to do by the department, or by such judge or justice."

Based on the foregoing, I do not believe that records maintained by entities having duties relating foster care can be disclosed, unless authorization to disclose is conferred by a court, by the Department of Social Services or, where appropriate, by the Division for Youth (which is now part of the Office of Children and Family Services).

I hope that the foregoing serves to clarify your understanding of the matter and that I have been of assistance.

[Redacted]

Dear Mr. Reiter:

Your letter of February 16 addressed to the Secretary of State has been forwarded to the Committee on Open Government. As you are aware, the Committee, a unit of the Department of State, is authorized to provide guidance concerning public access to government information, primarily under the state's Freedom of Information Law. Your letter pertains to a refusal of your request to request to inspect records of Senior Citizens of Green Island, Inc.

As explained to you in previous correspondence, the entity in question is not governmental in nature and, therefore, is not an "agency" required to comply with the Freedom of Information Law. When an entity seeks to incorporate, it is required to file certain papers with the Department of State. However, after a certificate of incorporation is conferred, and as inferred in the response by the Department of February 17, there are no additional filing requirements with the Department. Further, there is no general law, state or federal, that provides public rights of access to the records of not-for-profit corporations or similar entities.

I hope that the foregoing serves to enhance your understanding of the matter and that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Dear Mr. Lewin:

I have received your undated letter, which reached this office on February 23. You have sought assistance in obtaining records from the Office of the Bronx County District Attorney. According to your letter, following a request made under the Freedom of Information Law, you were informed that you must not communicate with that office directly, and that any communications must be accomplished through your counsel.

Although I am not aware of the context in which that response might have been prepared, I offer the following general comments.

First, pursuant to regulations promulgated by the Committee on Open Government (21 NYCRR Part 1401), each agency is required to designate one or more persons as "records access officer". The records access officer has the duty of coordinating an agency's response to requests, and requests should ordinarily be directed to that person. It is also noted that §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law requires that an applicant must "reasonably describe" the records sought. Therefore, a request should include sufficient detail to enable agency staff to locate and identify the records.

Second, as a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law. Without knowledge of the nature of the records of your interest, I cannot offer specific guidance concerning your rights of access.

Mr. Delroy Lewin

Third, when records are accessible under the Freedom of Information Law, it has been held that they should be made equally available to any person, regardless of one's status, interest or the intended use of the records [see Burke v. Yudelson, 368 NYS 2d 779, aff'd 51 AD 2d 673, 378 NYS 2d 165 (1976)]. Moreover, the Court of Appeals, the State's highest court, has held that:

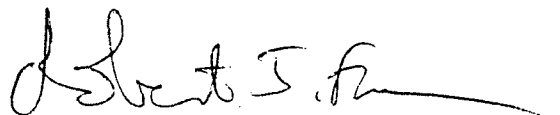

"FOIL does not require that the party requesting records make any showing of need, good faith or legitimate purpose; while its purpose may be to shed light on government decision-making, its ambit is not confined to records actually used in the decision-making process. (Matter of Westchester Rockland Newspapers v. Kimball, 50 NY 2d 575, 581.) Full disclosure by public agencies is, under FOIL, a public right and in the public interest, irrespective of the status or need of the person making the request" [Farbman v. New York City Health and Hospitals Corporation, 62 NY 2d 75, 80 (1984)].

Farbman pertained to a situation in which a person involved in litigation against an agency requested records from that agency under the Freedom of Information Law. In brief, it was found that one's status as a litigant had no effect upon that person's right as a member of the public when using the Freedom of Information Law, irrespective of the intended use of the records. Similarly, unless there is a basis for withholding records in accordance with the grounds for denial appearing in §87(2), the use of the records, in my opinion irrelevant. In short, I know of no reason why you should not be able to communicate directly with the Office of the District Attorney for the purpose of seeking records under the Freedom of Information Law.

As requested, enclosed is a copy of "Your Right to Know", which describes the Freedom of Information Law.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Dear Mr. Porter:

I have received your letter of February 24, in which you appealed a denial of access to certain court records.

In this regard, the Committee on Open Government is authorized to provide advice concerning the Freedom of Information Law. The Committee is not empowered to determine appeals or otherwise compel an entity to grant or deny access to records.

Further, it is emphasized that the Freedom of Information Law is applicable to agency records, and that §86(3) defines the term "agency" to include:

"any state or municipal department, board, bureau, division, commission, committee, public authority, public corporation, council, office or other governmental entity performing a governmental or proprietary function for the state or any one or more municipalities thereof, except the judiciary or the state legislature."

In turn, §86(1) defines the term "judiciary" to mean:

Based on the provisions quoted above, the courts and court records are not subject to the Freedom of Information Law. This is not to suggest that court records are not generally available to the public, for other provisions of law (see e.g., Judiciary Law, §255) may grant broad public access to those records. Stormville, NY 12582-0010

Dear Mr. Moran:

I have received your letter dated February 8, which reached this office on February 23. You referred to a "predicament" relating to your efforts in obtaining records from the Office of the Dutchess County District Attorney.

Although your appeal includes substantial detail to encourage the Office of the District Attorney to disclose the records sought, there is no indication in the correspondence of the specific nature of the records that you requested. Therefore, I cannot offer specific guidance. Nevertheless, I offer the following comments.

First, since it appears that you received no response to a request, I point out that the Freedom of Information Law provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies must respond to requests and appeals. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

"Each entity subject to the provisions of this article, within five business days of the receipt of a written request for a record reasonably described, shall make such record available to the person requesting it, deny such request in writing or furnish a written acknowledgement of the receipt of such request and a statement of the approximate date when such request will be granted or denied..."

If neither a response to a request nor an acknowledgement of the receipt of a request is given within five business days, or if an agency delays responding for an unreasonable time after it acknowledges that a request has been received, a request may, in my opinion, be considered to have been constructively denied. In such a circumstance, I believe that the denial may be appealed in accordance with §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law. That provision states in relevant part that:

Mr. Richard Moran

"...any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive, or governing body, who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

In addition, it has been held that when an appeal is made but a determination is not rendered within ten business days of the receipt of the appeal as required under §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, the appellant has exhausted his or her administrative remedies and may initiate a challenge to a constructive denial of access under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Rules [Floyd v. McGuire, 87 AD 2d 388, appeal dismissed 57 NY 2d 774 (1982)].

Second, as a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law. Since I am not familiar with the nature of the records that you requested, I cannot offer unequivocal guidance. Nevertheless, the following paragraphs will review the provisions that may be significant in determining rights of access to the records relating to a conviction.

Potentially relevant is a decision by the Court of Appeals that you cited concerning records prepared by police officers in which it was held that a blanket denial of access based on their characterization as intra-agency materials would be inappropriate. The provision at issue, §87(2)(g) of the Freedom of Information Law, enables an agency to withhold records that:

"are inter-agency or intra-agency materials which are not:

- i. statistical or factual tabulations or data;
- ii. instructions to staff that affect the public;
- iii. final agency policy or determinations; or
- iv. external audits, including but not limited to audits performed by the comptroller and the federal government..."

It is noted that the language quoted above contains what in effect is a double negative. While inter-agency or intra-agency materials may be withheld, portions of such materials consisting of statistical or factual information, instructions to staff that affect the public, final agency policy or determinations or external audits must be made available, unless a different ground for denial could appropriately be asserted. Concurrently, those portions of inter-agency or intra-agency materials that are reflective of opinion, advice, recommendation and the like could in my view be withheld.

In its analysis of the matter, it was determined that the agency could not claim that the records can be withheld in their entirety on the ground that they constitute intra-agency materials. However, the Court was careful to point out that other grounds for denial might apply in consideration of those records. [Gould, Scott and DeFelice v. New York City Police Department, 89 NY2d 267 (1996)].

For instance, of potential significance is §87(2)(b) of the Freedom of Information Law, which permits an agency to withhold records or portions thereof when disclosure would constitute "an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy". That provision might be applicable relative to the deletion of identifying details in a variety of situations, i.e., where a record identifies a confidential source, a witness, or others interviewed in an investigation.

Often the most relevant provision concerning access to records maintained by law enforcement agencies is §87(2)(e), which permits an agency to withhold records that:

"are compiled for law enforcement purposes and which, if disclosed, would:

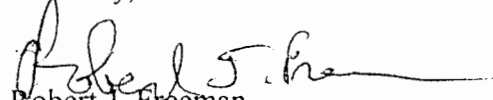

- i. interfere with law enforcement investigations or judicial proceedings;
- ii. deprive a person of a right to a fair trial or impartial adjudication;
- iii. identify a confidential source or disclose confidential information relating to a criminal investigation; or
- iv. reveal criminal investigative techniques or procedures, except routine techniques and procedures."

In my view, the foregoing indicates that records compiled for law enforcement purposes can only be withheld to the extent that disclosure would result in the harmful effects described in sub- paragraphs (i) through (iv) of §87(2)(e).

Another possible ground for denial is §87(2)(f), which permits withholding to the extent that disclosure "would endanger the life or safety of any person". The capacity to withhold on that basis is dependent upon the facts and circumstances concerning an event.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Robert J. Freeman

[REDACTED]
[REDACTED]

Dear Ms. Weale:

As you are aware, your letter of January 22 addressed to the Rochester regional office of the Attorney General was forwarded to the Office of the State Comptroller, which in turn forwarded your letter to the Committee on Open Government. As you may recall, the Committee, a unit of the Department of State, is authorized to provide opinions concerning the Freedom of Information Law.

You referred to your request "to inspect the Gross Wages only portion of the 1998 W-2 forms for Village employees/officials" that was denied by the Village of Addison. You asked whether gross wage information pertaining to public officers and employees must be disclosed. In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First, when a record is available in its entirety under the Freedom of Information Law, any person has the right to inspect the record at no charge. However, there are often situations in which some aspects of a record, but not the entire record, may properly be withheld in accordance with the ground for denial appearing in §87(2). In that event, I do not believe that an applicant would have the right to inspect the record. In order to obtain the accessible information, upon payment of the established fee, I believe that the agency would be obliged to disclose those portions of the records after having made appropriate deletions from a copy of the record.

In this instance, I do not believe that you would have the right to inspect W-2 forms, for they include information that you have no right to see. However, in conjunction with the ensuing analysis, the portions of the forms containing names and gross wages must be disclosed. The Village could in that circumstance seek payment of the requisite fee for photocopies, which would be made available after the deletion of certain details (see Van Ness v. Center for Animal Care and Control and the New York City Department of Health, Supreme Court, New York County, January 28, 1999).

Second, with respect to rights of access, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law.

Pertinent to the matter is §87(2)(b), which permits an agency to withhold record or portions of records when disclosure would result in "an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy." However, payroll information has been found by the courts to be available [see e.g., Miller v. Village of Freeport, 379 NYS 2d 517, 51 AD 2d 765, (1976); Gannett Co. v. County of Monroe, 59 AD 2d 309 (1977), aff'd 45 NYS 2d 954 (1978)]. In addition, this Committee has advised and the courts have upheld the notion that records that are relevant to the performance of the official duties of public employees are generally available, for disclosure in such instances would result in a permissible as opposed to an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy [Gannett, supra; Capital Newspapers v. Burns, 109 AD 2d 292, aff'd 67 NY 2d 562 (1986) ; Steinmetz v. Board of Education, East Moriches, Sup. Ct., Suffolk Cty., NYLJ, October 30, 1980; Farrell v. Village Board of Trustees, 372 NYS 2d 905 (1975) ; and Montes v. State, 406 NYS 664 (Court of Claims 1978)]. As stated prior to the enactment of the Freedom of Information Law, payroll records:

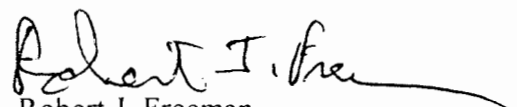

"...represent important fiscal as well as operational information. The identity of the employees and their salaries are vital statistics kept in the proper recordation of departmental functioning and are the primary sources of protection against employment favoritism. They are subject therefore to inspection" Winston v. Mangan, 338 NYS 2d 654, 664 (1972)].

In short, a record identifying agency employees by name, public office address, title and salary must in my view be maintained and made available.

Based upon the direction provided by the Freedom of Information Law and the courts, insofar as W-2 forms of public employees indicate gross wages, they must be disclosed. In conjunction with the previous commentary concerning the ability to protect against unwarranted invasions of personal privacy, I believe that portions of W-2 forms could be withheld, such as social security numbers, home addresses and net pay, for those items are largely irrelevant to the performance of one's duties. However, for reasons discussed earlier, those portions indicating public officers' or employees' names and gross wages must in my view be disclosed. That conclusion has been reached judicially, and the court cited an advisory opinion rendered by this office in so holding (Day v. Town of Milton, Supreme Court, Saratoga County, April 27, 1992).

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Robert J. Freeman

Mr. S.C. Lassiter

Dear Mr. Lassiter:

As you are aware, your letter of February 15 addressed to the Attorney General has been forwarded to the Committee on Open Government. The Committee, a unit of the Department of State, is authorized to provide advice and opinions concerning the state's Freedom of Information Law.

By way of background, an event involving yourself and other patients and members of staff at the Harlem Hospital Center occurred in November of 1975, and you requested from the State Department of Health records indicating "the names of all employees of the house keeping, medical, security and clerical staff that worked in the Emergency Room of the said hospital on the evening shift...during the month and year aforementioned." Your request was apparently made on December 16, 1997, and its receipt was acknowledged on December 11, 1998 by Gene D. Therriault, the Department's Records Access Officer. At that time, he indicated that a determination concerning your request would be made in thirty to sixty days. As of the date of your letter to the Attorney General, you had received no further response.

First, having contacted the Department of Health in an effort to determine the status of your request, I was informed that a response was sent to you recently indicating that it does not maintain the records of your interest. It is noted that the Freedom of Information Law pertains to existing records maintained by an agency, and that the Law imposes no obligation on an agency to create or acquire records on behalf of an applicant.

Second, the Harlem Hospital Center is part of the New York City Health and Hospitals Corporation. Therefore, the records maintained by the Corporation and the facilities within its jurisdiction are subject to the Freedom of Information Law. It is questionable in my view whether either the Corporation or the Hospital Center would continue to maintain attendance records for a particular month in 1975. If the records of your interest no longer exist, the Freedom of Information Law would not be applicable.

Third, to ascertain whether the records in question do exist, it is suggested that a request be directed to the records access officer at the Health and Hospitals Corporation. The records access officer, according to the regulations promulgated by the Committee on Open Government (21 NYCRR Part 1401), has the duty of coordinating an agency's response to requests for records.

Assuming that the records continue to be maintained by the Corporation or the Hospital Center and that they can be located with reasonable effort, I believe that they would be accessible. As a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law. The fact of one's public employment is a matter of public record and is included in payroll records prepared pursuant to §87(3)(b) of the Freedom of Information Law. Further, it has been held that attendance and leave records pertaining to public employees are accessible [see Capital Newspapers v. Burns, 109 AD 2d 92, aff'd 67 NY 2d 562 (1986)].

In sum, the State Department of Health does not maintain the records sought, and if neither the Health and Hospitals Corporation nor the Harlem Hospital Center any longer maintain the records, the Freedom of Information Law would be inapplicable. If, however, the records remain in the possession of the Corporation or the Hospital Center and can be found based on the terms of your request, they would, in my opinion, be accessible under the Freedom of Information Law.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Robert J. Freeman

[REDACTED]

Dear Mr. Pravda:

As you are aware, your correspondence of February 20 addressed to the Attorney General has been forwarded to the Committee on Open Government. The Committee, a unit of the Department of State, is authorized to provide advice and guidance concerning the Freedom of Information Law.

You contended that Saratoga County and the City of Saratoga Springs have not responded to your requests in a manner consistent with the Freedom of Information Law, and you "demanded" that the Attorney General enforce that statute. In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First, there is no state agency that has the authority to enforce the Freedom of Information Law or compel an agency to grant or deny access to records. If a person believes that an agency has failed to comply with that statute, he or she may seek judicial review by initiating a proceeding under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Law and Rules.

Second, based on a review of the correspondence attached to your letter, it appears that both the County and the City have complied with law. In short, the City indicated that it maintained no record concerning the event to which you referred. I point out that the Freedom of Information Law pertains to existing records, and that §89(3) of the Law states in part that an agency is not required to create a record in response to a request. With respect to the County, the Public Access Officer offered to disclose the records relating to the event upon payment of the requisite fee.

The remaining issue involves the portion of requests made to both the County and City for any records pertaining to three individuals named Pravda, "or any other Pravda." As suggested by the County's Public Information Officer, the issue here involves the extent to which the request "reasonably describes" the records sought as required by §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law.

It has been held by the Court of Appeals, the State's highest court, that to deny a request on the ground that it fails to reasonably describe the records, an agency must establish that "the descriptions were insufficient for purposes of locating and identifying the documents sought" [Konigsberg v. Coughlin, 68 NY 2d 245, 249 (1986)].

The Court in Konigsberg found that the agency could not reject the request due to its breadth and also stated that:

"respondents have failed to supply any proof whatsoever as to the nature - or even the existence - of their indexing system: whether the Department's files were indexed in a manner that would enable the identification and location of documents in their possession (cf. National Cable Tel. Assn. v Federal Communications Commn., 479 F2d 183, 192 [Bazelon, J.] [plausible claim of nonidentifiability under Federal Freedom of Information Act, 5 USC section 552 (a) (3), may be presented where agency's indexing system was such that 'the requested documents could not be identified by retracing a path already trodden. It would have required a wholly new enterprise, potentially requiring a search of every file in the possession of the agency']" (id. at 250).

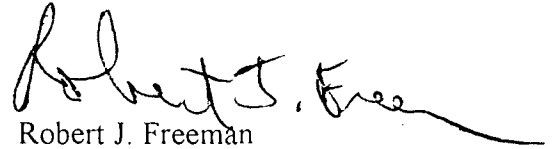

In my view, whether a request reasonably describes the records sought, as suggested by the Court of Appeals, may be dependent upon the terms of a request, as well as the nature of an agency's filing or record-keeping system. In Konigsberg, it appears that the agency was able to locate the records on the basis of an inmate's name and identification number.

While I am unfamiliar with the recordkeeping systems of the County and the City, to the extent that the records sought can be located with reasonable effort, I believe that the request would have met the requirement of reasonably describing the records. On the other hand, if the records are not maintained in a manner that permits their retrieval except by reviewing perhaps hundreds or even thousands of records individually in an effort to locate those falling within the scope of the request, to that extent, the request would not in my opinion meet the standard of reasonably describing the records. Further, in the context of the request, a real question involves, very simply, where agency officials might begin to look for records. It is possible that records falling within the scope of the request may be maintained in several locations by a variety of units within an agency, and that those units maintain their records by means of different filing and retrieval methods. If an office maintains all of its records regarding an individual, since the beginning of its existence, in a single file, it may be a simple task to locate the records. If, however, records are not maintained by name, but rather are kept chronologically, by means of an address, a subject area, etc., locating the records might involve a search, in essence, for the needle in the haystack. Based on the holding by the State's highest court, an agency is not required to engage in that kind of effort.

Ms. Linda Kelly

[REDACTED]

Dear Ms. Kelly:

I have received your letter of February 21. You wrote that you are attempting to obtain information concerning your "employment folder" and "several investigations [you] requested [your] employer to do." In conjunction with the foregoing you requested information pertaining to the Freedom of Information Law and asked for the addresses of agencies that might maintain the information of your interest.

In this regard, it emphasized that the Freedom of Information Law applies to agency records, and that §89(3) of the Law defines the term "agency" to mean:

"any state or municipal department, board, bureau, division, commission, committee, public authority, public corporation, council, office or other governmental entity performing a governmental or proprietary function for the state or any one or more municipalities thereof, except the judiciary or the state legislature."

Based on the definition quoted above, the Freedom of Information Law pertains to records maintained by entities of state and local government; it does not apply to private organizations or businesses. Therefore, if your employer is a unit of government, the Freedom of Information Law would be applicable; if it is not, that statute would not be pertinent.

Assuming that your employer is a government agency, I point out that each agency is required to designate one or more persons as "records access officer" (21 NYCRR Part 1401). The records access officer has the duty of coordinating the agency's response to requests for records, and a request should ordinarily be made to that person. It is also noted that §89(3) of the Law requires that an applicant "reasonably describe" the records sought. Consequently, a request should include sufficient detail to enable agency staff to locate and identify the records.

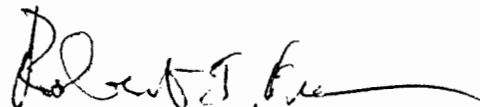

Ms. Linda Kelly

As a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law.

Enclosed, as requested, are copies of the Freedom of the Freedom of Information Law and "Your Right to Know", an explanatory brochure that may be useful to you.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Hon. Michael L. Brown
Alderman
City of Albany Common Council
319 Sheridan Avenue
Albany, NY 12206

Dear Alderman Brown:

I have received your letter of February 23 in which you asked that I "perform an expedited review of actions taken by the ...Comptroller" of the City of Albany in relation to your request for records made under the Freedom of Information Law.

According to the materials attached to your letter, on January 20 you requested "any and all information about late fees and charges which have been submitted to the City of Albany by vendors who provide the city with goods and services" for the period from January 1, 1998 to the present. You specified that you were seeking "actual copies of any and all invoices or bills submitted to the city between January 1, 1998 and the present date which contain any late payment charges or fees."

In response to the request, you were informed that you could review the records "during two specific hours each week", but more importantly in your view, the City has apparently authorized you to inspect "thousands of billing records...and refusing to separate the specific documents that were requested from a mountainous file of information that was never asked for..."

In an effort to learn more of the situation, I contacted the Comptroller. In brief, I was informed that the records in which you are interested are filed by vendor name and that there is no way of locating records indicating late fees or charges, except by reviewing some twenty-five thousand invoices manually, one by one. If that is so, City officials or staff would not have been required, based on a decision by the State's highest court, to review the records individually for the purpose of separating or retrieving the records of your interest.

The issue involves the requirement imposed by §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law that an applicant must "reasonably describe" the records sought. In considering that standard, the State's highest court has found that requested records need not be "specifically designated", that to meet the standard, the terms of a request must be adequate to enable the agency to locate the records, and that an agency must "establish that 'the descriptions were insufficient for purposes of locating and identifying the documents sought'...before denying a FOIL request for reasons of overbreadth" [Konigsberg v. Coughlin, 68 NY 2d 245, 249 (1986)].

Although it was found in the decision cited above that the agency could not reject the request due to its breadth, it was also stated that:

"respondents have failed to supply any proof whatsoever as to the nature - or even the existence - of their indexing system: whether the Department's files were indexed in a manner that would enable the identification and location of documents in their possession (cf. National Cable Tel. Assn. v Federal Communications Commn., 479 F2d 183, 192 [Bazelon, J.] [plausible claim of nonidentifiability under Federal Freedom of Information Act, 5 USC section 552 (a) (3), may be presented where agency's indexing system was such that 'the requested documents could not be identified by retracing a path already trodden. It would have required a wholly new enterprise, potentially requiring a search of every file in the possession of the agency']" (id. at 250).

In my view, whether a request reasonably describes the records sought, as suggested by the Court of Appeals, may be dependent upon the terms of a request, as well as the nature of an agency's filing or record-keeping systems. In Konigsberg, it appears that the agency was able to locate the records on the basis of an inmate's name and identification number.

In the context of your request, as I understand the situation, the City has no means of retrieving the records sought other than reviewing thousands of records, page by page. If that is so, the City, according to Konigsberg, would not be required to engage in that degree of effort to locate or separate the records sought on behalf of an applicant.

If you choose to review the records in order to locate those of your interest, I do not believe that the City can restrict the time of inspection to two hours per week. By way of background, §89(1)(b)(iii) of the Freedom of Information Law requires the Committee on Open Government to promulgate regulations concerning the procedural implementation of the Law (see 21 NYCRR Part 1401). In turn, §87(1) requires agencies to adopt rules and regulations consistent with the Law and the Committee's regulations.

Section 1401.2 of the regulations, provides in relevant part that:

"(a) The governing body of a public corporation and the head of an executive agency or governing body of other agencies shall be responsible for insuring compliance with the regulations herein, and shall designate one or more persons as records access officer by name or by specific job title and business address, who shall have the duty of coordinating agency response to public requests for access to records. The designation of one or more records access officers shall not be construed to prohibit officials who have in the past been authorized to make records or information available to the public from continuing to do so..."

Section 1401.4 of the regulations, entitled "Hours for public inspection", states that:

"(a) Each agency shall accept requests for public access to records and produce records during all hours they are regularly open for business.

(b) In agencies which do not have daily regular business hours, a written procedure shall be established by which a person may arrange an appointment to inspect and copy records. Such procedure shall include the name, position, address and phone number of the party to be contacted for the purpose of making an appointment."

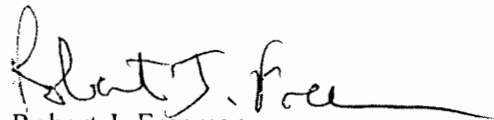

Relevant to your inquiry and the foregoing is a decision rendered by the Appellate Division. Among the issues was the validity of a similar limitation regarding the time permitted to inspect records established by a village pursuant to regulation. The Court held that the village was required to enable the public to inspect records during its regular business hours, stating that:

"...to the extent that Regulation 6 has been interpreted as permitting the Village Clerk to limit the hours during which public documents can be inspected to a period of time less than the business hours of the Clerk's office, it is violative of the Freedom of Information Law..."
[Murtha v. Leonard, 620 NYS 2d 101 (1994), 210 AD 2d 411].

Based on the foregoing, unless the records are in use by City employees in the performance of their duties, you should have the right to review the records during regular business hours.

I hope that the foregoing serves to clarify your understanding of the matter and that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Robert J. Freeman

95-A-2525
Green Haven Correctional Facility
665 State Route 216/Drawer B
Stormville, NY 12582-0010

Dear Mr. Washington:

I have received your letter dated March 1. You referred to a "predicament" relating to your efforts in obtaining records from the Office of the Albany County District Attorney.

Although your appeal includes substantial detail to encourage the Office of the District Attorney to disclose the records sought, there is no indication in the correspondence of the specific nature of the records that you requested. Therefore, I cannot offer specific guidance. Nevertheless, I offer the following comments.

First, since it appears that you received no response to a request, I point out that the Freedom of Information Law provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies must respond to requests and appeals. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

"Each entity subject to the provisions of this article, within five business days of the receipt of a written request for a record reasonably described, shall make such record available to the person requesting it, deny such request in writing or furnish a written acknowledgement of the receipt of such request and a statement of the approximate date when such request will be granted or denied..."

If neither a response to a request nor an acknowledgement of the receipt of a request is given within five business days, or if an agency delays responding for an unreasonable time after it acknowledges that a request has been received, a request may, in my opinion, be considered to have been constructively denied. In such a circumstance, I believe that the denial may be appealed in accordance with §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law. That provision states in relevant part that:

Mr. John Washington

"...any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive, or governing body, who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

In addition, it has been held that when an appeal is made but a determination is not rendered within ten business days of the receipt of the appeal as required under §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, the appellant has exhausted his or her administrative remedies and may initiate a challenge to a constructive denial of access under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Rules [Floyd v. McGuire, 87 AD 2d 388, appeal dismissed 57 NY 2d 774 (1982)].

Second, as a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law. Since I am not familiar with the nature of the records that you requested, I cannot offer unequivocal guidance. Nevertheless, the following paragraphs will review the provisions that may be significant in determining rights of access to the records relating to a conviction.

Potentially relevant is a decision by the Court of Appeals that you cited concerning records prepared by police officers in which it was held that a blanket denial of access based on their characterization as intra-agency materials would be inappropriate. The provision at issue, §87(2)(g) of the Freedom of Information Law, enables an agency to withhold records that:

"are inter-agency or intra-agency materials which are not:

- i. statistical or factual tabulations or data;
- ii. instructions to staff that affect the public;
- iii. final agency policy or determinations; or
- iv. external audits, including but not limited to audits performed by the comptroller and the federal government..."

It is noted that the language quoted above contains what in effect is a double negative. While inter-agency or intra-agency materials may be withheld, portions of such materials consisting of statistical or factual information, instructions to staff that affect the public, final agency policy or determinations or external audits must be made available, unless a different ground for denial could appropriately be asserted. Concurrently, those portions of inter-agency or intra-agency materials that are reflective of opinion, advice, recommendation and the like could in my view be withheld.

Mr. John Washington

In its analysis of the matter, it was determined that the agency could not claim that the records can be withheld in their entirety on the ground that they constitute intra-agency materials. However, the Court was careful to point out that other grounds for denial might apply in consideration of those records. [Gould, Scott and DeFelice v. New York City Police Department, 89 NY2d 267 (1996)].

For instance, of potential significance is §87(2)(b) of the Freedom of Information Law, which permits an agency to withhold records or portions thereof when disclosure would constitute "an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy". That provision might be applicable relative to the deletion of identifying details in a variety of situations, i.e., where a record identifies a confidential source, a witness, or others interviewed in an investigation.

Often the most relevant provision concerning access to records maintained by law enforcement agencies is §87(2)(e), which permits an agency to withhold records that:

"are compiled for law enforcement purposes and which, if disclosed, would:

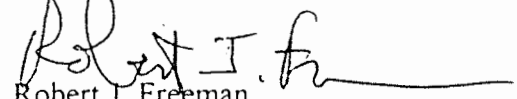

- i. interfere with law enforcement investigations or judicial proceedings;
- ii. deprive a person of a right to a fair trial or impartial adjudication;
- iii. identify a confidential source or disclose confidential information relating to a criminal investigation; or
- iv. reveal criminal investigative techniques or procedures, except routine techniques and procedures."

In my view, the foregoing indicates that records compiled for law enforcement purposes can only be withheld to the extent that disclosure would result in the harmful effects described in sub- paragraphs (i) through (iv) of §87(2)(e).

Another possible ground for denial is §87(2)(f), which permits withholding to the extent that disclosure "would endanger the life or safety of any person". The capacity to withhold on that basis is dependent upon the facts and circumstances concerning an event.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Robert J. Freeman

Mr. Kenneth R. Dash Sr.

Dear Mr. Dash:

I have received your letter of February 3, which reached this office on February 24. Please note that the Committee's address has changed.

In your letter, you wrote: "here we are the crossroads where the County Attorney has failed to answer a Freedom of Information request." Attached is your letter to the County Attorney indicating that you wrote to him the previous week "inquiring whether the County is self insured against shortage and overage in the collection of revenue by cashiers."

Although you did not transmit a copy of your letter seeking the information, it is emphasized that the title of the Freedom of Information Law is somewhat misleading, for it is not a vehicle that requires agency officials to provide information by answering questions; rather, it is a statute that requires the disclosure of records in accordance with its provisions. It is also noted that the Freedom of Information Law pertains to existing records, and that §89(3) of the Law states in part that an agency is not required to create a record in response to a request for information. Therefore, if there is no record that contains the information sought, the Freedom of Information Law would not apply.

In the future, instead of seeking information by raising questions, it is suggested that you request existing records.

On the basis of the foregoing, it is unclear whether you sought an answer to a question or requested records under the Freedom of Information Law or, therefore, whether the County Attorney "failed" to comply with law.

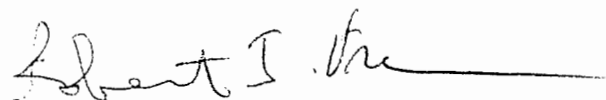

Mr. Kenneth R. Dash Sr.

Gustave J. DeTraglia, Jr., Esq.
Attorney and Counselor at Law
1425 Genesee Street
Utica, NY 13501

Dear Mr. DeTraglia:

I have received your letter of February 22 in which you sought guidance concerning the Freedom of Information Law.

The matter involves requests for records in possession of the New Hartford Town Supervisor pertaining to Consumer Square/Benderson Corporation, which, according to your letter, "is the name of a project that is pending to be developed." You added that the "file is dozens, if not hundreds of pages thick and [you] feel that the FOIL is over broad."

From my perspective, the issue involves the extent to which the requests met the standard of "reasonably describing" the records as required by §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law. I point out that it has been held by the Court of Appeals that to deny a request on the ground that it fails to reasonably describe the records, an agency must establish that "the descriptions were insufficient for purposes of locating and identifying the documents sought" [Konigsberg v. Coughlin, 68 NY 2d 245, 249 (1986)].

Konigsberg involved a situation in which an inmate at a state correctional facility essentially requested all records that could be found by means of his name or identification number. Based upon the request, the facility was able to locate approximately 2,300 pages of records. When staff asked which among those records were the subject of his request, the inmate indicated that he wanted all of them. Although the agency contended that the request did not reasonably describe the records sought, the Court of Appeals disagreed and found that the agency could not reject the request due to its breadth.

Notwithstanding the foregoing, the Court found that:

Gustave J. DeTraglia, Jr.

"respondents have failed to supply any proof whatsoever as to the nature - or even the existence - of their indexing system: whether the Department's files were indexed in a manner that would enable the identification and location of documents in their possession (cf. National Cable Tel. Assn. v Federal Communications Commn., 479 F2d 183, 192 [Bazelon, J.] [plausible claim of nonidentifiability under Federal Freedom of Information Act, 5 USC section 552 (a) (3), may be presented where agency's indexing system was such that 'the requested documents could not be identified by retracing a path already trodden. It would have required a wholly new enterprise, potentially requiring a search of every file in the possession of the agency'])" (id. at 250).

In my view, whether a request reasonably describes the records sought, as suggested by the Court of Appeals, may be dependent upon the terms of a request, as well as the nature of an agency's filing or record-keeping system. In Konigsberg, the agency was able to locate the records on the basis of an inmate's name and identification number.

While I am unfamiliar with the recordkeeping systems of the Town, to the extent that the records sought can be located with reasonable effort, I believe that the requests would meet the requirement of reasonably describing the records. Therefore, if, for example, the hundreds of pages falling within the scope of the request are kept in a single file drawer or even in a series of locations where they can be retrieved based upon the description provided in the requests, the applicants for the records, in my opinion, would have met the requirement that they reasonably describe the records.

On the other hand, if the records are not maintained in a manner that permits their retrieval except by reviewing hundreds or perhaps thousands of records individually in an effort to locate those falling within the scope of the request, to that extent, the request would not in my opinion meet the standard of reasonably describing the records. It is possible that records falling within the scope of the request may be maintained in several locations by a variety of units within Town, and that those units maintain their records by means of different filing and retrieval methods. If, for example, records are not maintained by subject, but rather are kept chronologically, locating the records might involve a search, in essence, for the needle in the haystack. Based on the holding by the State's highest court, an agency is not required to engage in that kind of effort.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Dear Mr. Dee:

I have received your letter of February 23 in which you sought an advisory opinion concerning the Open Meetings and Freedom of Information Laws.

According to your letter, at a recent meeting held to elect officers, the Board of the Tonawanda Housing Authority voted by secret ballot. You wrote that the public was not given the opportunity to review the ballots, and that "[n]o record exists as to how individual members voted."

In this regard, as you may be aware, I was contacted by phone concerning the issue that you have presented, and I believe that the matter has been resolved. However, for purposes of clarity, I offer the following comments.

First, the Tonawanda Housing Authority was created pursuant to §412 of the Public Housing Law and, as a public authority constituting "a body corporate and politic", I believe that it is an "agency" and a "public body" for purposes of the Freedom of Information and Open Meetings Laws [see respectively, Public Officers Law, §§86(3) and 102(2)].

With regard to the members' votes, I direct your attention initially to the Freedom of Information Law. Section 87(3)(a) provides that:

"Each agency shall maintain:

(a) a record of the final vote of each member in every agency proceeding in which the member votes..."

Mr. James M. Dee

Based upon the foregoing, when a final vote is taken by an "agency", a record must be prepared that indicates the manner in which each member who voted cast his or her vote. Ordinarily, records of votes will appear in minutes.

In terms of the rationale of §87(3)(a), it appears that the State Legislature in precluding secret ballot voting sought to ensure that the public has the right to know how its representatives may have voted individually with respect to particular issues.

Although the Open Meetings Law does not refer specifically to the manner in which votes are taken or recorded, I believe that the thrust of §87(3)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law is consistent with the Legislative Declaration that appears at the beginning of the Open Meetings Law and states that:

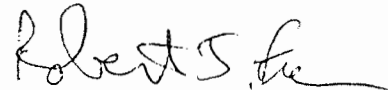

"it is essential to the maintenance of a democratic society that the public business be performed in an open and public manner and that the citizens of this state be fully aware of and able to observe the performance of public officials and attend and listen to the deliberations and decisions that go into the making of public policy. The people must be able to remain informed if they are to retain control over those who are their public servants."

Further, in an Appellate Division decision, it was found that "The use of a secret ballot for voting purposes was improper." In so holding, the Court stated that: "When action is taken by formal vote at open or executive sessions, the Freedom of Information Law and the Open Meetings Law both require open voting and a record of the manner in which each member voted [Public Officers Law §87(3)(a); §106(1), (2)]" Smithson v. Ilion Housing Authority, 130 AD 2d 965, 967 (1987).

Based on a discussion with Ms. Meadows, the Board's attorney, the matter has been rectified, and I believe that a record of votes likely now appears in minutes of the meeting.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Robert J. Freeman

Dear Mr. Smith:

I have received your letter of February 22 in which you described a series of delays in your attempts in obtaining records from the Office of the Kings County District Attorney. You added that you are in the process of initiating an Article 78 proceeding.

In this regard, it is noted that the Freedom of Information Law provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies must respond to requests. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

"Each entity subject to the provisions of this article, within five business days of the receipt of a written request for a record reasonably described, shall make such record available to the person requesting it, deny such request in writing or furnish a written acknowledgement of the receipt of such request and a statement of the approximate date when such request will be granted or denied..."

If neither a response to a request nor an acknowledgement of the receipt of a request is given within five business days, or if an agency delays responding for an unreasonable time after it acknowledges that a request has been received, a request may, in my opinion, be considered to have been constructively denied. In such a circumstance, I believe that the denial may be appealed in accordance with §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law. That provision states in relevant part that:

Mr. Kevin Smith

"...any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive, or governing body, who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

In addition, it has been held that when an appeal is made but a determination is not rendered within ten business days of the receipt of the appeal as required under §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, the appellant has exhausted his or her administrative remedies and may initiate a challenge to a constructive denial of access under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Rules [Floyd v. McGuire, 87 AD 2d 388, appeal dismissed 57 NY 2d 774 (1982)].

I note that although an agency must grant access to records, deny access or acknowledge the receipt of a request within five business days, when such acknowledgement is given, there is no precise time period within which an agency must grant or deny access to records. The time needed to do so may be dependent upon the volume of a request, the possibility that other requests have been made, the necessity to conduct legal research, the search and retrieval techniques used to locate the records and the like. In short, when an agency acknowledges the receipt of a request because more than five business days may be needed to grant or deny a request, so long as it provides an approximate date indicating when the request will be granted or denied, and that date is reasonable in view of the attendant circumstances, I believe that the agency would be acting in compliance with law.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

The staff of the Committee on Open Government is authorized to issue advisory opinions. The ensuing staff advisory opinion is based solely upon the information presented in your correspondence.

Dear Mr. Ayala:

I have received your letter of February 22 in which you sought assistance concerning your efforts in obtaining court records.

In this regard, it is emphasized that the statute within the advisory jurisdiction of the Committee on Open Government, the Freedom of Information Law, is applicable to agency records, and that §86(3) defines the term "agency" to include:

"any state or municipal department, board, bureau, division, commission, committee, public authority, public corporation, council, office or other governmental entity performing a governmental or proprietary function for the state or any one or more municipalities thereof, except the judiciary or the state legislature."

In turn, §86(1) defines the term "judiciary" to mean:

"the courts of the state, including any municipal or district court, whether or not of record."

Based on the provisions quoted above, the courts and court records are not subject to the Freedom of Information Law. This is not to suggest that court records are not generally available to the public, for other provisions of law (see e.g., Judiciary Law, §255) may grant broad public access to those records. Even though other statutes may deal with access to court records, the procedural provisions associated with the Freedom of Information Law (i.e., those involving the designation of a records access officer or the right to appeal a denial) would not ordinarily be applicable.

It is suggested that any request for court records be directed to the clerk of the appropriate court, citing an applicable provision of law as the basis for the request.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Marlboro Free Library

Dear Ms. Manion:

I have received your letter of February 25 and the article attached to it. You indicated that you are "confused" for you "always believed that any discussion was considered confidential if discussed in Executive Session. (e.g., salary negotiations/personnel issues)."

In this regard, both the Open Meetings Law and the Freedom of Information Law are permissive. While the Open Meetings Law authorizes public bodies to conduct executive sessions in circumstances described in paragraphs (a) through (h) of §105(1), there is no requirement that an executive session be held even though a public body has right to do so. Further, the introductory language of §105(1), which prescribes a procedure that must be accomplished before an executive session may be held, clearly indicates that a public body "may" conduct an executive session only after having completed that procedure. If, for example, a motion is made to conduct an executive session for a valid reason, and the motion is not carried, the public body could either discuss the issue in public, or table the matter for discussion in the future. Similarly, although the Freedom of Information Law permits an agency to withhold records in accordance with the grounds for denial, it has been held by the Court of Appeals that the exceptions are permissive rather than mandatory, and that an agency may choose to disclose records even though the authority to withhold exists [Capital Newspapers v. Burns], 67 NY 2d 562, 567 (1986)].

In general, I am unaware of any statute that would prohibit a member of a library board of trustees from disclosing the kinds of information to which you referred. Further, even when information might have been obtained during an executive session properly held or from records marked "confidential", I note that the term "confidential" in my view has a narrow and precise technical meaning. For records or information to be validly characterized as confidential, I believe that such a claim must be based upon a statute that specifically confers or requires confidentiality.

Ms. Elizabeth S. Manion

For instance, if a discussion by a library board concerns a record pertaining to a particular user of the library, the discussion would have to occur in private and the record would have to be withheld insofar as public discussion or disclosure would identify that person. As you may be aware, §4509 of the Civil Practice Law and Rules prohibits a library from disclosing records identifiable to users of its services. In the context of the Open Meetings Law, a discussion concerning a user of the library would constitute a matter made confidential by federal law and would be exempted from the coverage of that statute [see Open Meetings Law, §108(3)]. In the context of the Freedom of Information Law, a record identifiable to a user would be specifically exempted from disclosure by statute in accordance with §87(2)(a). In both contexts, I believe that a library board of trustees and its employees would be prohibited from disclosing because a statute requires confidentiality. Again, however, no statute of which I am aware would confer or require confidentiality with respect to the matters described in your letter.

In a case in which the issue was whether discussions occurring during an executive session held by a school board could be considered "privileged", it was held that "there is no statutory provision that describes the matter dealt with at such a session as confidential or which in any way restricts the participants from disclosing what took place" (Runyon v. Board of Education, West Hempstead Union Free School District No. 27, Supreme Court, Nassau County, January 29, 1987).

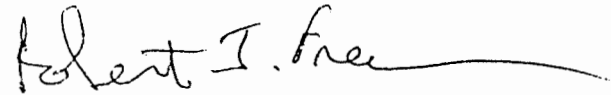

While there may be no prohibition against disclosure of the information acquired during executive sessions or records that could be withheld, the foregoing is not intended to suggest such disclosures would be uniformly appropriate or ethical. Obviously, the purpose of an executive session is to enable members of public bodies to deliberate, to speak freely and to develop strategies in situations in which some degree of secrecy is permitted. Similarly, the grounds for withholding records under the Freedom of Information Law relate in most instances to the ability to prevent some sort of harm. In both cases, inappropriate disclosures could work against the interests of a public body as a whole and the public generally. Further, a unilateral disclosure by a member of a public body might serve to defeat or circumvent the principles under which those bodies are intended to operate.

Historically, I believe that public bodies were created to order to reach collective determinations, determinations that better reflect various points of view within a community than a single decision maker could reach alone. Members of boards should not in my opinion be unanimous in every instance; on the contrary, they should represent disparate points of view which, when conveyed as part of a deliberative process, lead to fair and representative decision making. Nevertheless, notwithstanding distinctions in points of view, the decision or consensus by the majority of a public body should in my opinion be recognized and honored by those members who may dissent. Disclosure made contrary to or in the absence of consent by the majority could result in unwarranted invasions of personal privacy, impairment of collective bargaining negotiations or even interference with criminal or other investigations. In those kinds of situations, even though there may be no statute that prohibits disclosure, release of information could be damaging to individuals and the functioning of government.

Dear Mr. Rose:

I have received your letter of February 28. According to your letter, you requested "parole violation papers" prepared in 1995 and a "pre-parole summary" prepared in 1994. The request was denied because you "do not appear before the Parole Board until 4/2000."

From my perspective, the time of your appearance before the Parole Board is irrelevant to your right to gain access to the records in question. In this regard, when records are accessible under the Freedom of Information Law, it has been held that they should be made equally available to any person, regardless of one's status, interest or the intended use of the records [see Burke v. Yudelson, 368 NYS 2d 779, aff'd 51 AD 2d 673, 378 NYS 2d 165 (1976)]. Moreover, the Court of Appeals, the State's highest court, has held that:

"FOIL does not require that the party requesting records make any showing of need, good faith or legitimate purpose; while its purpose may be to shed light on government decision-making, its ambit is not confined to records actually used in the decision-making process. (Matter of Westchester Rockland Newspapers v. Kimball, 50 NY 2d 575, 581.) Full disclosure by public agencies is, under FOIL, a public right and in the public interest, irrespective of the status or need of the person making the request" [Farbman v. New York City Health and Hospitals Corporation, 62 NY 2d 75, 80 (1984)].

Based on the foregoing, unless there is a basis for withholding records in accordance with the ground for denial appearing in §87(2) of the Freedom of Information Law, agency must records must be made available, irrespective of one's status, interest or intended of the records.

While I am unfamiliar with the contents of the records sought, it is noted that the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law.

It is suggested that you renew your request and direct it to the Division of Parole's records access officer. That person has the duty of coordinating the agency's response to requests for records. The address of the Division of Parole is 97 Central Avenue, Albany, NY 12206.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Mr. George W. van der Ploeg

Dear Mr. van der Ploeg:

I have received your letter of February 26, as well as the materials related to it. You have complained with respect to the treatment of requests for records of the Katonah-Lewisboro School District.

In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First, the Freedom of Information Law provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies must respond to requests. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

"Each entity subject to the provisions of this article, within five business days of the receipt of a written request for a record reasonably described, shall make such record available to the person requesting it, deny such request in writing or furnish a written acknowledgement of the receipt of such request and a statement of the approximate date when such request will be granted or denied..."

If neither a response to a request nor an acknowledgement of the receipt of a request is given within five business days, or if an agency delays responding for an unreasonable time after it acknowledges that a request has been received, a request may, in my opinion, be considered to have been constructively denied. In such a circumstance, I believe that the denial may be appealed in accordance with §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law. That provision states in relevant part that:

Mr. George W. van der Ploeg

explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

In addition, it has been held that when an appeal is made but a determination is not rendered within ten business days of the receipt of the appeal as required under §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, the appellant has exhausted his or her administrative remedies and may initiate a challenge to a constructive denial of access under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Rules [Floyd v. McGuire, 87 AD 2d 388, appeal dismissed 57 NY 2d 774 (1982)].

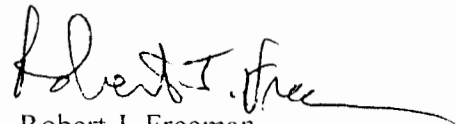

Second, it is emphasized that the Freedom of Information Law pertains to existing records, and that §89(3) of the Law states in part that an agency is not required to create a record in response to a request. For instance, if there is no record indicating the "current number of students from Michelle Estates" living on certain streets, or if there is no summary of compensation paid to a construction manager "broken down between Basic Services, Additional Services and Reimbursable Services", the District would not be required to prepare new records containing the information sought.

It is suggested that you contact the District's records access officer to discuss the request and the manner in which the District maintains records. While there may be no breakdowns prepared in accordance with the parameters that you described, there may be other or similar records that include the information in which you are interested. I note that under the regulations promulgated by the Committee on Open Government (21 NYCRR Part 1401), each agency must designate one or more persons as records access officer, and that person has the duty of coordinating an agency's response to requests for records.

Lastly, as it pertains to existing records, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law. From my perspective, the kinds of records that you requested, insofar as they exist, would be available, for none of the grounds for denial would be applicable.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

In this regard, as a general matter, under §87(1)(b)(iii) of the Freedom of Information Law, when a record is available, it may be inspected free of charge. However, if the applicant for the record seeks a copy, that provision authorizes an agency to charge up to twenty-five cents per photocopy. Further, it has been held that an agency may charge its established fee, even when a request is made by an indigent inmate [see Whitehead v. Morgenthau, 552 NYS2d 518 (1990)].

Dear Mr. Lopez:

I have received your letter of February 28. You wrote that you attempted to obtain your birth certificate from the New York City Department of Health, but that you were informed that you could not do so because your mother's last name is unknown to you. As such, you asked how you may obtain your mother's last name through the Freedom of Information Law.

From my perspective, you would likely need additional information pertaining to your mother to obtain her last name. In this regard, I point out that §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law requires that an applicant must "reasonably describe" the records sought. Therefore, a request should include sufficient detail (i.e., names, identification numbers, dates, addresses, etc.) to enable the staff of an agency to locate and identify the records.

Additionally, a request made under the Freedom of Information Law should be sent to the agency that maintains the records of interest to the applicant. Unless there is an indication of which agency possesses records containing the information that you are seeking, it may be impossible to submit an appropriate request on the basis of the Freedom of Information Law.

I hope that I have been of assistance and regret that I could not offer more effective guidance.

I have received your letter of March 1 in which you questioned a certain practice of the Town Clerk of the Town of Henderson.

According to your letter, having asked to review the file on a proposed zoning change, you were informed that must indicate "exactly what document [you] wanted to see from the file." From my perspective, the requirement imposed by the Clerk is inconsistent with the language of the Freedom of Information Law and its judicial interpretation.

When that statute was initially enacted in 1974, it required that an applicant request "identifiable" records. Therefore, if an applicant could not name the record sought or "identify" it with particularity, that person could not meet the standard of requesting identifiable records. In an effort to enhance its purposes, when the Freedom of Information Law was revised, the standard for requesting records was altered. Since 1978, §89(3) has stated that an applicant must merely "reasonably describe" the records sought.

Based upon that standard, it has been held by the Court of Appeals, the state's highest court, that to deny a request on the ground that it fails to reasonably describe the records, an agency must establish that "the descriptions were insufficient for purposes of locating and identifying the documents sought" [Konigsberg v. Coughlin, 68 NY 2d 245, 249 (1986)].

Konigsberg involved a situation in which an inmate at a state correctional facility essentially requested all records that could be found by means of his name or identification number. Based upon the request, the facility was able to locate approximately 2,300 pages of records. When staff asked which among those records were the subject of his request, the inmate indicated that he wanted all of them. Although the agency contended that the request did not reasonably describe the records sought, the Court of Appeals disagreed and found that the agency could not reject the request due to its breadth.

Ms. Julie West

Notwithstanding the foregoing, the Court found that:

“respondents have failed to supply any proof whatsoever as to the nature - or even the existence - of their indexing system: whether the Department’s files were indexed in a manner that would enable the identification and location of documents in their possession (cf. National Cable Tel. Assn. v. Federal Communications Commn., 479 F2d 183, 192 [Bazelon, J.] [plausible claim of nonidentifiability under Federal Freedom of Information Act, 5 USC section 552 (a) (3), may be presented where agency’s indexing system was such that ‘the requested documents could not be identified by retracing a path already trodden. It would have required a wholly new enterprise, potentially requiring a search of every file in the possession of the agency’]) (id. At 250).

In my view, whether a request reasonably describes the records sought, as suggested by the Court of Appeals, may be dependent upon the terms of a request, as well as the nature of an agency’s filing or record-keeping system. In Konigsberg, the agency was able to locate the records on the basis of an inmate’s name and identification number.

While I am unfamiliar with the record keeping systems of the Town, to the extent that the records sought can be located with reasonable effort, I believe that the requests would meet the requirement of reasonably describing the records. Therefore, if, for example, all of the records concerning the proposed zoning change are kept in a particular file, or in a series of locations where they can be retrieved based upon the description provided in your request, in my opinion, you would have met the requirement that the request reasonably describe the records.

In an effort to enhance compliance with and understanding of the Freedom of Information Law, a copy of this opinion will be forwarded to the Town Clerk.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Robert J. Freeman

[REDACTED]

Dear Mr. Dobson:

I have received your letter of February 26 concerning a denial of access to records indicating the "monies spent on lawyers for lawsuit against Crucible Specialty Metals Company" apparently by the Town of Geddes for the years 1990 through 1995.

In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First, the Freedom of Information Law pertains to existing records. Therefore, if, for example, the Town no longer maintains records of payments to attorneys made prior to a certain date because it has disposed of the records, the Freedom of Information Law would not apply. In a related vein, §89(3) of that statute states that an agency is not required to create a record in response to a request. Therefore, if records concerning payments to attorneys are general and do not indicate monies paid in relation to a particular lawsuit, the Town would not be obliged to prepare new records on your behalf pertaining to monies paid involving that suit.

Second, a potential issue involves the extent to which the request "reasonably describes" the records sought as required by §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law. I point out that it has been held by the Court of Appeals, the state's highest court, that to deny a request on the ground that it fails to reasonably describe the records, an agency must establish that "the descriptions were insufficient for purposes of locating and identifying the documents sought" [Konigsberg v. Coughlin, 68 NY 2d 245, 249 (1986)].

The Court in Konigsberg found that the agency could not reject the request due to its breadth and also stated that:

Mr. Joseph M. Dobson

"respondents have failed to supply any proof whatsoever as to the nature - or even the existence - of their indexing system: whether the Department's files were indexed in a manner that would enable the identification and location of documents in their possession (cf. National Cable Tel. Assn. v Federal Communications Commn., 479 F2d 183, 192 [Bazelon, J.] [plausible claim of nonidentifiability under Federal Freedom of Information Act, 5 USC section 552 (a) (3), may be presented where agency's indexing system was such that 'the requested documents could not be identified by retracing a path already trodden. It would have required a wholly new enterprise, potentially requiring a search of every file in the possession of the agency'])" (id. at 250).

In my view, whether a request reasonably describes the records sought, as suggested by the Court of Appeals, may be dependent upon the terms of a request, as well as the nature of an agency's filing or record-keeping system. In Konigsberg, it appears that the agency was able to locate the records on the basis of an inmate's name and identification number.

While I am unfamiliar with the recordkeeping systems of the Town, to the extent that the records sought can be located with reasonable effort, I believe that the request would have met the requirement of reasonably describing the records. On the other hand, if the records are not maintained in a manner that permits their retrieval except by reviewing perhaps hundreds or even thousands of records individually in an effort to locate those falling within the scope of the request, to that extent, the request would not in my opinion meet the standard of reasonably describing the records.

Third, insofar as the records sought continue to exist and can be found with reasonable effort, I believe that the information in which you are interested should be disclosed. As a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law.

In my opinion, bills, vouchers, contracts, receipts and similar records reflective of payments made or expenses incurred by an agency or payments made to an agency's staff or agents are generally available, for none of the grounds for denial would be applicable in most instances.

With specific respect to payments to attorneys, I point out that, while the communications between an attorney and client are often privileged, it has been established in case law that records of the monies paid and received by an attorney or a law firm for services rendered to a client are not privileged [see e.g., People v. Cook, 372 NYS 2d 10 (1975)]. If, however, portions of time sheets, bills or related records contain information that is confidential under the attorney-client privilege, those portions could in my view be withheld under §87(2)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, which permits an agency to withhold records or portions thereof that are "specifically exempted from disclosure by state or federal statute" (see Civil Practice Law and Rules, §4503). Therefore, while some identifying details or descriptions of services rendered found in the records sought might justifiably be withheld, numbers indicating the amounts expended and other details to be discussed further are in my view accessible under the Freedom of Information Law.

In a decision dealing with similar records, Knapp v. Board of Education, Canisteo Central School District (Supreme Court, Steuben County, November 23, 1990), the case involved an applicant ("petitioner") who sought billing statements for legal services provided to the Board ("respondents") by a law firm. Since the statements made available included "only the time period covered and the total amount owed for services and disbursements", petitioner contended that "she is entitled to that billing information which would detail the fee, the type of matter for which the legal services were rendered and the names of the parties to any current litigation". In its discussion of the issue, the court found that:

"The difficulty of defining the limits of the attorney client privilege has been recognized by the New York State Court of Appeals. (Matter of Priest v. Hennessy, 51 NY2d 62, 68.) Nevertheless, the Court has ruled that this privilege is not limitless and generally does not extend to the fee arrangements between an attorney and client. (Matter of Priest v. Hennessy, supra.) As a communication regarding a fee has no direct relevance to the legal advice actually given, the fee arrangement is not privileged. (Matter of Priest v. Hennessy, supra. at 69.)

"There appear to be no New York cases which specifically address how much of a fee arrangement must be revealed beyond the name of the client, the amount billed and the terms of the agreement. However, the United States Court of Appeals, in interpreting federal law, has found that questions pertaining to the date and general nature of legal services performed were not violative of client confidentiality. (Cotton v. United States, 306 F.2d 633.) In that Court's analysis such information did not involve the substance of the matters was not privileged...

"...Respondents have not justified their refusal to obliterate any and all information which would reveal the date, general nature of service rendered and time spent. While the Court can understand that in a few limited instances the substance of a legal communication might be revealed in a billing statement, Respondents have failed to come forward with proof that such information is contained in each and every document so as to justify a blanket denial of disclosure. Conclusory characterizations are insufficient to support a claim of privilege. (Church of Scientology v. State of New York, 46 NY 2d 906, 908.)...Therefore, Petitioner's request for disclosure of the fee, type of matter and names of parties to pending litigation on each billing statement must be granted."

In my view, disclosure of information analogous to that described in Knapp would be required [see also Orange County Publications v. County of Orange, 637 NYS2d 596 (1995)].

Lastly, the function of an advisory opinion is to educate and persuade, and you may use the opinion as you see fit. In addition, a copy will be sent to the Town Supervisor.

[REDACTED]

Dear Ms. Vecchio:

I have received your letter of March 4 in which you requested an advisory opinion concerning the East Islip School District and "a delay in [y]our request for the teacher's salary list [you] have obtained at this time of the year for past several years without any problem." You indicated that you requested "W-2 and contract salaries for all teachers and administrators".

In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First, as a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law.

Second, with certain exceptions, the Freedom of Information Law does not require an agency to create records. Section 89(3) of the Law states in relevant part that:

"Nothing in this article [the Freedom of Information Law] shall be construed to require any entity to prepare any record not in possession or maintained by such entity except the records specified in subdivision three of section eighty-seven..."

However, a payroll list of employees is included among the records required to be kept pursuant to "subdivision three of section eighty-seven" of the Law. Specifically, that provision states in relevant part that:

"Each agency shall maintain..."

Ms. Andrea Vecchio
March 15, 1999

(b) a record setting forth the name, public office address, title and salary of every officer or employee of the agency... "

As such, a payroll record that identifies all officers or employees by name, public office address, title and salary must be "maintained" on a continual basis.

With respect to rights of access, of primary relevance is §87(2)(b), which permits an agency to withhold record or portions of records when disclosure would result in "an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy." However, payroll information has been found by the courts to be available [see e.g., Miller v. Village of Freeport, 379 NYS 2d 517, 51 AD 2d 765, (1976); Gannett Co. v. County of Monroe, 59 AD 2d 309 (1977), aff'd 45 NYS 2d 954 (1978)]. In addition, this Committee has advised and the courts have upheld the notion that records that are relevant to the performance of the official duties of public employees are generally available, for disclosure in such instances would result in a permissible as opposed to an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy [Gannett, supra; Capital Newspapers v. Burns, 109 AD 2d 292, aff'd 67 NY 2d 562 (1986); Steinmetz v. Board of Education, East Moriches, Sup. Ct., Suffolk Cty., NYLJ, October 30, 1980; Farrell v. Village Board of Trustees, 372 NYS 2d 905 (1975); and Montes v. State, 406 NYS 664 (Court of Claims 1978)]. As stated prior to the enactment of the Freedom of Information Law, payroll records:

"...represent important fiscal as well as operational information. The identity of the employees and their salaries are vital statistics kept in the proper recordation of departmental functioning and are the primary sources of protection against employment favoritism. They are subject therefore to inspection" Winston v. Mangan, 338 NYS 2d 654, 664 (1972)].

In short, a record identifying agency employees by name, public office address, title and salary must in my view be maintained and made available.

Based upon the direction provided by the Freedom of Information Law and the courts, other records reflective of payments made to public employees are available. For instance, insofar as W-2 forms of public employees indicate gross wages, they must be disclosed. In conjunction with the previous commentary concerning the ability to protect against unwarranted invasions of personal privacy, I believe that portions of W-2 forms could be withheld, such as social security numbers, home addresses and net pay, for those items are largely irrelevant to the performance of one's duties. However, for reasons discussed earlier, those portions indicating public officers' or employees' names and gross wages must in my view be disclosed. That conclusion has been reached judicially, and the court cited an advisory opinion rendered by this office in so holding (Day v. Town of Milton, Supreme Court, Saratoga County, April 27, 1992).

Lastly, I believe that the payroll list should be made available without delay, and in addition, it is noted that the Freedom of Information Law provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies must respond to requests. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

Ms. Andrea Vecchio

While an agency must grant access to records, deny access or acknowledge the receipt of a request within five business days, when such acknowledgment is given, there is no precise time period within which an agency must grant or deny access to records. The time needed to do so may be dependent upon the volume of a request, the possibility that other requests have been made, the necessity to conduct legal research, the search and retrieval techniques used to locate the records and the like. In short, when an agency acknowledges the receipt of a request because more than five business days may be needed to grant or deny a request, so long as it provides an approximate date indicating when the request will be granted or denied, and that date is reasonable in view of the attendant circumstances, I believe that the agency would be acting in compliance with law.

Notwithstanding the foregoing, in my view, every law must be implemented in a manner that gives reasonable effect to its intent, and I point out that in its statement of legislative intent, §84 of the Freedom of Information Law states that "it is incumbent upon the state and its localities to extend public accountability wherever and whenever feasible." Therefore, if records are clearly available to the public under the Freedom of Information Law, or if they are readily retrievable, there may be no basis for a lengthy delay in disclosure. As the Court of Appeals has asserted:

"...the successful implementation of the policies motivating the enactment of the Freedom of Information Law centers on goals as broad as the achievement of a more informed electorate and a more responsible and responsive officialdom. By their very nature such objectives cannot hope to be attained unless the measures taken to bring them about permeate the body politic to a point where they become the rule rather than the exception. The phrase 'public accountability wherever and whenever feasible' therefore merely punctuates with explicitness what in any event is implicit" [Westchester News v. Kimball, 50 NY 2d 575, 579 (1980)].

If a record or report is clearly public and can be found easily, as in the case of the payroll list required to be "maintained" pursuant to §87 (3)(b), there would appear to be no rational basis for delaying disclosure. In a case in which it was found that an agency's "actions demonstrate an utter disregard for compliance set by FOIL", it was held that "[t]he records finally produced were not so voluminous as to justify any extension of time, much less an extension beyond that allowed by statute, or no response to appeals at all" (Inner City Press/Community on the Move, Inc. v. New York City Department of Housing Preservation and Development, Supreme Court, New York County, November 9, 1993).

Dear Mr. Webb:

I have received your letter of March 10. It appears that you have requested various records from this office pertaining to your case.

In this regard, the Committee on Open Government is authorized to provide advice concerning the Freedom of Information Law. The Committee does not have possession of records generally, and it is not empowered to compel an entity of government to grant or deny access to records. In short, I cannot provide the records that you requested because this office does not possess them.

Some of the documents of your interest would apparently be maintained by the office of a district attorney, and others by a court. In this regard, it is emphasized that the Freedom of Information Law is applicable to agency records, and that §86(3) defines the term "agency" to include:

"any state or municipal department, board, bureau, division, commission, committee, public authority, public corporation, council, office or other governmental entity performing a governmental or proprietary function for the state or any one or more municipalities thereof, except the judiciary or the state legislature."

In turn, §86(1) defines the term "judiciary" to mean:

"the courts of the state, including any municipal or district court, whether or not of record."

Mr. Jacques Webb

Based on the provisions quoted above, the courts and court records are not subject to the Freedom of Information Law. This is not to suggest that court records are not generally available to the public, for other provisions of law (see e.g., Judiciary Law, §255) may grant broad public access to those records. It is suggested that any request for court records be made to the clerk of the appropriate court, citing an applicable provision of law as the basis for the request.

The office of a district attorney or a police department, for example, would clearly constitute an "agency" required to comply with the Freedom of Information Law. I note that the regulations promulgated by the Committee on Open Government require that each agency designate one or more persons as "records access officer" (see 21 NYCRR Part 1401). The records access officer has the duty of coordinating an agency's response to requests for records. As such, if certain of the records in which you are interested are maintained by the office of a district attorney, a request should be made to that agency's records access officer.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Dear Mr. Carty:

I have received your letter of March 1. You have asked whether you can use the Freedom of Information Law to gain access to "one's personal parole records from the local office parolees are assigned." You indicated that you made such a request, but that it has not been answered.

In this regard, the regulations promulgated by the Committee on Open Government (21 NYCRR Part 1401) require that each agency designate one or more persons as "records access officer." The records access officer has the duty of coordinating an agency's response to requests for records, and requests should ordinarily be made to that person.

While I believe that the person in receipt of your request should either have forwarded your request to the records access officer or responded directly to you in a manner consistent with the Freedom of Information Law, it is suggested that you resubmit your request to the records access officer, Mr. David Molik, Division of Parole, 97 Central Avenue, Albany, NY 12206.

For your information, the person designated by the Division of Parole to determine appeals is Mr. Terrence X. Tracy, Counsel to the Division.

Mr. Wallace S. Nolen
94-A-6723
Clinton Correctional Facility
P.O. Box 2001
Dannemora, NY 12929-2001

Dear Mr. Nolen:

I have received your letter of February 28 in which you requested an advisory opinion concerning rights of access to records "which would show or tend to show the number of absences of a particular DOCS' teacher" at your facility.

In this regard, as a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law. Although two of the grounds for denial relate to attendance records involving the use of leave time, based upon the language of the Law and its judicial interpretation, I believe that such records are generally available.

In addition to the provisions dealing with the protection of privacy, also significant to an analysis of rights of access is §87(2)(g), which permits an agency to withhold records that:

"are inter-agency or intra-agency materials which are not:

- i. statistical or factual tabulations or data;
- ii. instructions to staff that affect the public;
- iii. final agency policy or determinations; or
- iv. external audits, including but not limited to audits performed by the comptroller and the federal government..."

It is noted that the language quoted above contains what in effect is a double negative. While inter-agency or intra-agency materials may be withheld, portions of such materials consisting of statistical or factual information, instructions to staff that affect the public, final agency policy or determinations or external audits must be made available, unless a different ground for denial could appropriately be asserted. Concurrently, those portions of inter-agency or intra-agency materials that are reflective of opinion, advice, recommendation and the like could in my view be withheld.

Attendance records could be characterized as "intra-agency materials." However, those portions reflective of dates or figures concerning the use of leave time or absences or the time that employees arrive at or leave work would constitute "statistical or factual" information accessible under §87(2)(g)(i).

Also relevant is §87(2)(b), which permits an agency to withhold record or portions of records when disclosure would result in "an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy." The Committee has advised and the courts have upheld the notion that records that are relevant to the performance of the official duties of public employees are generally available, for disclosure in such instances would result in a permissible as opposed to an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy [Gannett, supra; Capital Newspapers v. Burns, 109 AD 2d 292, aff'd 67 NY 2d 562 (1986) ; Steinmetz v. Board of Education, East Moriches, Sup. Ct., Suffolk Cty., NYLJ, October 30, 1980; Farrell v. Village Board of Trustees, 372 NYS 2d 905 (1975) ; and Montes v. State, 406 NYS 664 (Court of Claims 1978)].

In a decision affirmed by the State's highest court dealing with attendance records, specifically those indicating the days and dates of sick leave claimed by a particular employee, it was found, in essence, that disclosure would result in a permissible rather than an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy. In that case, the Appellate Division found that:

"One of the most basic obligation of any employee is to appear for work when scheduled to do so. Concurrent with this is the rights of an employee to properly use sick leave available to him or her. In the instant case, intervenor had an obligation to report for work when scheduled along with a right to use sick leave in accordance with his collective bargaining agreement. The taxpayers have an interest in such use of sick leave for economic as well as safety reasons. Thus it can hardly be said that disclosure of the dates in February 1983 when intervenor made use of sick leave would constitute an unwarranted invasion of privacy. Further, the motives of petitioners or the means by which they will report the information is not determinative since all records of government agencies are presumptively available for inspection without regard to the status, need, good faith or purpose of the applicant requesting access..." [Capital Newspapers v. Burns, 109 AD 2d 92, 94-95 (1985), aff'd 67 NY 2d 562 (1986)].

Insofar as attendance records or time sheets include reference to reasons for an absence, it has been advised that an explanation of why sick time might have been used, i.e., a description of an illness or medical problem found in records, could be withheld or deleted from a record otherwise available, for disclosure of so personal a detail of a person's life would likely constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy and would not be relevant to the performance of an employee's duties. A number, however, which merely indicates the amount of sick time or vacation time accumulated or used, or the dates and times of attendance or absence, would not in my view represent a personal detail of an individual's life and would be relevant to the performance of one's official duties. Therefore, I do not believe that §87(2)(b) could be asserted to withhold that kind of information contained in an attendance record.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Mr. Merton Simpson

Dear Mr. Simpson:

I have received your letter of August 19 and the materials attached to it.

Among the materials is a record apparently prepared by the Department of Civil Service entitled "Eligible List Scores Distribution by Race and Sex" in relation to a "battery exam." You have asked whether similar records "would have to be produced by Civil Service for all the Battery Exams and simulations of exams [you] have requested through previous FOIL's if they have the capability." In response to an appeal, you were informed that "eligible list scores distribution by race and sex are not available because the Battery Tests do not produce an eligible list" and that "an eligible list scores distribution report which had been released to you should not have been created."

From my perspective, the issue involves whether the Department has the ability to generate the records of your interest based on its existing computer programs. In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First, the Freedom of Information Law pertains to existing records. Section 89(3) of that statute states in relevant part that an agency is not required to create a record in response to a request.

Second, §86(4) of the Freedom of Information Law defines the term "record" expansively to include:

"any information kept, held, filed, produced, reproduced by, with or for an agency or the state legislature, in any physical form whatsoever including, but not limited to, reports, statements, examinations, memoranda, opinions, folders, files, books, manuals, pamphlets, forms, papers, designs, drawings, maps, photos, letters, microfilms, computer tapes or discs, rules, regulations or codes."

In view of the language quoted above, if information is maintained in some physical form, it would in my opinion constitute a "record" subject to rights of access conferred by the Law. Further, the definition of "record" includes specific reference to computer tapes and discs, and it was held soon after the enactment of the current version of the Freedom of Information Law that "[i]nformation is increasingly being stored in computers and access to such data should not be restricted merely because it is not in printed form" [Babigian v. Evans, 427 NYS 2d 688, 691 (1980); aff'd 97 AD 2d 992 (1983); see also, Szikszy v. Buelow, 436 NYS 2d 558 (1981)].

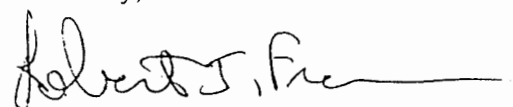

When information is maintained electronically, it has been advised that if the information sought is available under the Freedom of Information Law and may be retrieved by means of existing computer programs, an agency is required to disclose the information. In that kind of situation, the agency in my view would merely be retrieving data that it has the capacity to retrieve. Disclosure may be accomplished either by printing out the data on paper or perhaps by duplicating the data on another storage mechanism, such as a computer tape or disk.

On the other hand, if information sought can be retrieved from a computer or other storage medium only by means of new programming or the alteration of existing programs, those steps would, in my opinion, be the equivalent of creating a new record. Since §89(3) does not require an agency to create a record, I do not believe that an agency would be required to reprogram or develop new programs to retrieve information that would otherwise be available [see Guerrier v. Hernandez-Cuebas, 165 AD 2d 218 (1991)].

Lastly, as a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law. Assuming that the information of your interest can be generated by means of the Department's existing computer programs, I believe that it would be available. In short, insofar as intra-agency materials consist of "statistical or factual tabulations or data", they must be disclosed pursuant to section 87(2)(g)(i), unless a different ground for denial applies. In my view, none of the grounds for denial would be applicable or pertinent.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Robert J. Freeman

Mr. George Dinstber

Dear Mr. Dinstber:

I have received your letter dated February 4 that was transmitted to this office with related materials on March 3. You have questioned the ability of the Suffolk County Police Department to withhold records pertaining to a complaint that you made against a police officer.

In this regard, by way of background, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law.

The first ground for denial, §87(2)(a), pertains to records that "are specifically exempted from disclosure by state or federal statute." One such statute is §50-a of the Civil Rights Law. In brief, that statute provides that personnel records of police and correction officers that are used to evaluate performance toward continued employment or promotion are confidential. The Court of Appeals, the State's highest court, in reviewing the legislative history leading to its enactment, has held that §50-a exempts records from disclosure when a request is made in a context relating to litigation. More specifically, in a case brought by a newspaper, it was found that:

"Given this history, the Appellate Division correctly determined that the legislative intent underlying the enactment of Civil Rights Law section 50-a was narrowly specific, 'to prevent time-consuming and perhaps vexatious investigation into irrelevant collateral matters in the context of a civil or criminal action' (Matter of Capital Newspapers Div. of Hearst Corp. v. Burns, 109 AD 2d 92, 96). In view of the FOIL's presumption of access, our practice of construing FOIL exemptions narrowly, and this legislative history, section 50-a should not be construed to exempt intervenor's 'Lost Time Record' from disclosure by the Police Department in a non-litigation context under Public Officers section 87(2)(a)" [Capital Newspapers v. Burns, 67 NY 2d 562, 569 (1986)].

P.O. Box 1005
Smithtown, NY 11787

It was also found that the exemption from disclosure conferred by §50-a of the Civil Rights Law "was designed to limit access to said personnel records by criminal defense counsel, who used the contents of the records, including unsubstantiated and irrelevant complaints against officers, to embarrass officers during cross-examination" (id. at 568).

In another decision which dealt with unsubstantiated complaints against correction officers, the Court of Appeals held that the purpose of §50-a "was to prevent the release of sensitive personnel records that could be used in litigation for purposes of harassing or embarrassing correction officers" [Prisoners' Legal Services v. NYS Department of Correctional Services, 73 NY 2d 26, 538 NYS 2d 190, 191 (1988)].

From my perspective, based on the contents of the materials that you forwarded, it appears that the records in question would be exempt from disclosure under §50-a of the Civil Rights Law and, therefore, §87(2)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law. I note, however, that records otherwise deniable may be ordered disclosed by a court insofar as they are relevant and material to an action or proceeding. Specifically, subdivisions (2) and (3) of §50-a state that:

"2. Prior to issuing such court order the judge must review all such requests and give interested parties the opportunity to be heard. No such order shall issue without a clear showing of facts sufficient to warrant the judge to request records for review.

3. If, after such hearing, the judge concludes there is a sufficient basis he shall sign an order requiring that the personnel records in question be sealed and sent directly to him. He shall then review the file and make a determination as to whether the records are relevant and material in the action before him. Upon such finding the court shall make those parts of the record found to be relevant and material available to the persons so requesting."

I hope that the foregoing serves to clarify your understanding of the matter and that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Robert J. Freeman

Mr. Joseph W. Spinney

Dear Mr. Spinney:

I have received your undated letter, which reached this office on March 12. As you asked in the letter, I attempted to reach you by phone without success.

You have requested records from this office concerning "first degree homicide crimes committed in the town of Valley Cottage...from 1974 to 1999." In this regard, the Committee on Open Government is authorized to provide advice and guidance concerning the Freedom of Information Law. The Committee does not have custody and control of records generally.

To seek records, a request should be made to the agency or agencies that you believe maintain the records of your interest. I note that the regulations promulgated by the Committee on Open Government (21 NYCRR Part 1401) require that each agency designate one or more persons as "records access officer." The records access officer has the duty of coordinating an agency's response to requests, and requests ordinarily should be made to that person.

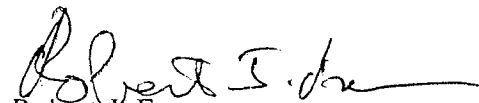

I am unaware of whether Valley Cottage has its own police department or whether police coverage is provided by the county or the state police. It is suggested that any request be made to the law enforcement agency that has jurisdiction with respect to Valley Cottage. It is also noted that §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law requires that an applicant "reasonably describe" the records sought. Therefore, a request should include sufficient detail to enable agency officials to locate and identify the records.

Lastly, unless I am mistaken, I do not believe that there would have been any crime committed in New York that could be characterized as "first degree homicide" from 1974 until the recent reinstatement of the death penalty.

Ms. Ann Nathan

[REDACTED]

Dear Ms. Nathan:

I have received your letter of March 8, as well as the materials attached to it. You have sought assistance in relation to your efforts in obtaining a variety of records from the Katonah-Lewisboro School District.

In brief, it is your belief that your children's medical problems have arisen due to construction and renovation work performed at the school that they were attending, and your requests involve your efforts in attempting to ascertain whether that may be so. Based upon the correspondence, I offer the following comments.

First, the Freedom of Information Law provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies must respond to requests. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

"Each entity subject to the provisions of this article, within five business days of the receipt of a written request for a record reasonably described, shall make such record available to the person requesting it, deny such request in writing or furnish a written acknowledgement of the receipt of such request and a statement of the approximate date when such request will be granted or denied..."

If neither a response to a request nor an acknowledgement of the receipt of a request is given within five business days, or if an agency delays responding for an unreasonable time after it acknowledges that a request has been received, a request may, in my opinion, be considered to have been constructively denied. In such a circumstance, I believe that the denial may be appealed in accordance with §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law. That provision states in relevant part that:

"...any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive, or governing body, who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

In addition, it has been held that when an appeal is made but a determination is not rendered within ten business days of the receipt of the appeal as required under §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, the appellant has exhausted his or her administrative remedies and may initiate a challenge to a constructive denial of access under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Rules [Floyd v. McGuire, 87 AD 2d 388, appeal dismissed 57 NY 2d 774 (1982)].

Second, your status as a litigant or potential litigant has no impact upon your rights under the Freedom of Information Law or the District's duty to disclose under that statute. As stated by the state's highest court, the Court of Appeals, in a case involving a request made under the Freedom of Information Law by a person involved in litigation against an agency: "Access to records of a government agency under the Freedom of Information Law (FOIL) (Public Officers Law, Article 6) is not affected by the fact that there is pending or potential litigation between the person making the request and the agency" [Farbman v. NYC Health and Hospitals Corporation, 62 NY 2d 75, 78 (1984)]. Similarly, in an earlier decision, the Court of Appeals determined that "the standing of one who seeks access to records under the Freedom of Information Law is as a member of the public, and is neither enhanced...nor restricted...because he is also a litigant or potential litigant" [Matter of John P. v. Whalen, 54 NY 2d 89, 99 (1980)]. The Court in Farbman, supra, discussed the distinction between the use of the Freedom of Information Law as opposed to the use of discovery in Article 31 of the Civil Practice Law and Rules (CPLR). Specifically, it was found that:

"FOIL does not require that the party requesting records make any showing of need, good faith or legitimate purpose; while its purpose may be to shed light on governmental decision-making, its ambit is not confined to records actually used in the decision-making process (Matter of Westchester Rockland Newspapers v. Kimball, 50 NY 2d 575, 581.) Full disclosure by public agencies is, under FOIL, a public right and in the public interest, irrespective of the status or need of the person making the request.

"CPLR article 31 proceeds under a different premise, and serves quite different concerns. While speaking also of 'full disclosure' article 31 is plainly more restrictive than FOIL. Access to records under CPLR depends on status and need. With goals of promoting both the ascertainment of truth at trial and the prompt disposition of actions (Allen v. Crowell-Collier Pub. Co., 21 NY 2d 403, 407), discovery is at the outset limited to that which is 'material and necessary in the prosecution or defense of an action'" [see Farbman, supra, at 80].

Based upon the foregoing, the pendency of litigation would not, in my opinion, affect either the rights of the public or a litigant under the Freedom of Information Law.

Third, it is noted that the Freedom of Information Law pertains to existing records, and that §89(3) provides in part that an agency is not required to create a record in response to a request. I am unaware of the means by which the District maintains its records. Nevertheless, insofar as the records sought exist, they would be subject to rights of access. In a related vein, a potential issue involves the extent to which the requests "reasonably described" the records sought as required by §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law. I point out that it has been held by the Court of Appeals that to deny a request on the ground that it fails to reasonably describe the records, an agency must establish that "the descriptions were insufficient for purposes of locating and identifying the documents sought" [Konigsberg v. Coughlin, 68 NY 2d 245, 249 (1986)].

The Court in Konigsberg found that the agency could not reject the request due to its breadth and also stated that:

"respondents have failed to supply any proof whatsoever as to the nature - or even the existence - of their indexing system: whether the Department's files were indexed in a manner that would enable the identification and location of documents in their possession (cf. National Cable Tel. Assn. v Federal Communications Commn., 479 F2d 183, 192 [Bazelon, J.] [plausible claim of nonidentifiability under Federal Freedom of Information Act, 5 USC section 552 (a) (3), may be presented where agency's indexing system was such that 'the requested documents could not be identified by retracing a path already trodden. It would have required a wholly new enterprise, potentially requiring a search of every file in the possession of the agency'])" (id. at 250).

In my view, whether a request reasonably describes the records sought, as suggested by the Court of Appeals, may be dependent upon the terms of a request, as well as the nature of an agency's filing or record-keeping system. In Konigsberg, it appears that the agency was able to locate the records on the basis of an inmate's name and identification number.

While I am unfamiliar with the recordkeeping systems of the District, to the extent that the records sought can be located with reasonable effort, I believe that the request would have met the requirement of reasonably describing the records. On the other hand, if the records are not maintained in a manner that permits their retrieval except by reviewing perhaps hundreds or even thousands of records individually in an effort to locate those falling within the scope of a request, to that extent, the request would not in my opinion meet the standard of reasonably describing the records.

Next, as a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law. It is emphasized that the introductory language of §87(2) refers to the authority to withhold "records or portions thereof" that fall within one or more of the grounds for denial that follow. The phrase quoted in the preceding sentence is based on a recognition that a single record might include both available and deniable information. It also imposes an obligation on an agency to review records sought in their entirety to determine which portions, if any, may justifiably be withheld and to disclose the remainder.

Relevant to the matter insofar as your requests relate to students is the initial ground for denial, §87(2)(a), which pertains to records that are "specifically exempted from disclosure by state or federal statute." In this instance, insofar as disclosure of the records in question would or could identify a student or students, I believe that they must be withheld. A statute that exempts records from disclosure is the Family Education Rights and Privacy Act (20 U.S.C. section 1232g), which is commonly known as "FERPA." In brief, FERPA applies to all educational agencies or institutions that participate in grant programs administered by the United States Department of Education. As such, FERPA includes within its scope virtually all public educational institutions and many private educational institutions. The focal point of the Act is the protection of privacy of students. It provides, in general, that any "education record," a term that is broadly defined, that is personally identifiable to a particular student or students is confidential, unless the parents of students under the age of eighteen waive their right to confidentiality, or unless a student eighteen years or over similarly waives his or her right to confidentiality. Further, the federal regulations promulgated under FERPA define the phrase "personally identifiable information" to include:

- "(a) The student's name;
- (b) The name of the student's parents or other family member;
- (c) The address of the student or student's family;
- (d) A personal identifier, such as the student's social security number or student number;
- (e) A list of personal characteristics that would make the student's identity easily traceable; or
- (f) Other information that would make the student's identity easily traceable" (34 CFR Section 99.3).

Based upon the foregoing, references to students' names or other aspects of records that would make a student's identity easily traceable must in my view be withheld in order to comply with federal law.

In a case dealing with a request for records indicating test scores that were prepared by class in alphabetical order, the school district contended that, even if names of students were deleted, because the lists were maintained alphabetically, the identities of some students might be made known. In determining the issue, the Court ordered that names be deleted from the records and that the records be "scrambled" in order to protect against the possible identification of students [Kryston v. East Ramapo School District, 77 AD 2d 896 (1980)]. In that decision, the district was required to disclose the grades in a manner in which students' identities were protected. Stated differently, the grades were required to be disclosed, but any identifying details pertaining to students were required to have been withheld. In the context of your request, if records are maintained by the District dealing with student's illnesses or absences, based upon FERPA, Kryston and the language of the Freedom of Information Law, I believe that they would be available, following the deletion of any information that would be personally identifiable to a student.

Records indicating sick leave claimed by teachers or other District staff would generally be available. Although two of the grounds for denial relate to attendance records involving the use of leave time, based upon the language of the Law and its judicial interpretation, I believe that such records are generally available.

In addition to the provisions dealing with the protection of privacy, also significant to an analysis of rights of access is §87(2)(g), which permits an agency to withhold records that:

"are inter-agency or intra-agency materials which are not:

- i. statistical or factual tabulations or data;
- ii. instructions to staff that affect the public;
- iii. final agency policy or determinations; or
- iv. external audits, including but not limited to audits performed by the comptroller and the federal government..."

It is noted that the language quoted above contains what in effect is a double negative. While inter-agency or intra-agency materials may be withheld, portions of such materials consisting of statistical or factual information, instructions to staff that affect the public, final agency policy or determinations or external audits must be made available, unless a different ground for denial could appropriately be asserted. Concurrently, those portions of inter-agency or intra-agency materials that are reflective of opinion, advice, recommendation and the like could in my view be withheld.

Attendance records could be characterized as "intra-agency materials." However, those portions reflective of dates or figures concerning the use of leave time or absences or the time that employees arrive at or leave work would constitute "statistical or factual" information accessible under §87(2)(g)(i).

Also relevant is §87(2)(b), which permits an agency to withhold record or portions of records when disclosure would result in "an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy." The Committee has advised and the courts have upheld the notion that records that are relevant to the performance of the official duties of public employees are generally available, for disclosure in such instances would result in a permissible as opposed to an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy [Gannett, supra; Capital Newspapers v. Burns, 109 AD 2d 292, aff'd 67 NY 2d 562 (1986) ; Steinmetz v. Board of Education, East Moriches, Sup. Ct., Suffolk Cty., NYLJ, October 30, 1980; Farrell v. Village Board of Trustees, 372 NYS 2d 905 (1975) ; and Montes v. State, 406 NYS 664 (Court of Claims 1978)].

In a decision affirmed by the State's highest court dealing with attendance records, specifically those indicating the days and dates of sick leave claimed by a particular employee, it was found, in essence, that disclosure would result in a permissible rather than an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy. In that case, the Appellate Division found that:

"One of the most basic obligations of any employee is to appear for work when scheduled to do so. Concurrent with this is the rights of an employee to properly use sick leave available to him or her. In the instant case, intervenor had an obligation to report for work when scheduled along with a right to use sick leave in accordance with his collective bargaining agreement. The taxpayers have an interest in such use of sick leave for economic as well as safety reasons. Thus it can hardly be said that disclosure of the dates in February 1983 when intervenor made use of sick leave would constitute an unwarranted invasion of privacy. Further, the motives of petitioners or the means by which they will report the information is not determinative since all records of government agencies are presumptively available for inspection without regard to the status, need, good faith or purpose of the applicant requesting access..." [Capital Newspapers v. Burns, 109 AD 2d 92, 94-95 (1985), aff'd 67 NY 2d 562 (1986)].

Insofar as attendance records or time sheets include reference to reasons for an absence, it has been advised that an explanation of why sick time might have been used, i.e., a description of an illness or medical problem found in records, could be withheld or deleted from a record otherwise available, for disclosure of so personal a detail of a person's life would likely constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy and would not be relevant to the performance of an employee's duties. Similarly, since a workers' compensation claim relates to a medical problem or injury, I believe that any records relating to such claims may be withheld. A number, however, which merely indicates the amount of sick time or vacation time accumulated or used, or the dates and times of attendance or leave, would not in my view represent a personal detail of an individual's life and would be relevant to the performance of one's official duties. Therefore, I do not believe that §87(2)(b) could be asserted to withhold that kind of information contained in an attendance record.

Other records that you requested, such as "comparative studies" and asbestos test results, would appear to constitute intra-agency materials. Again, insofar as those materials consist of statistical or factual information, they must be disclosed, unless a different basis for denial can be asserted. Pertinent in my view is a decision rendered by the Court of Appeals in which the Court focused on what constitutes "factual data", stating that:

"...Although the term 'factual data' is not defined by statute, the meaning of the term can be discerned from the purpose underlying the intra-agency exemption, which is 'to protect the deliberative process of the government by ensuring that persons in an advisory role [will] be able to express their opinions freely to agency decision makers' (Matter of Xerox Corp. v. Town of Webster, 65 NY2d 131, 132, 490

N.Y.S. 2d 488, 480 N.E.2d 74 [quoting Matter of Sea Crest Constr. Corp. v. Stubing, 82 AD2d 546, 549, 442 N.Y.S.2d 130]). Consistent with this limited aim to safeguard internal government consultations and deliberations, the exemption does not apply when the requested material consists of 'statistical or factual tabulations or data' (Public Officers Law 87[2][g][i]. Factual data, therefore, simply means objective information, in contrast to opinions, ideas, or advice exchanged as part of the consultative or deliberative process of government decision making (see, Matter of Johnson Newspaper Corp. v. Stainkamp, 94 AD2d 825, 827, 463 N.Y.S.2d 122, mod on other grounds, 61 NY2d 958, 475 N.Y.S.2d 272, 463 N.E. 2d 613; Matter of Miracle Mile Assocs. v. Yudelson, 68 AD2d 176, 181-182, 417 N.Y.S.2d 142)" [Gould v. New York City Police Department, 89 NY2d 267, 276, 277 (1996)].

Lastly, one aspect of your request concerns a subpoena served upon the District by a federal court relating to the construction at the elementary school. If indeed the subpoena has been served, in my view, there would be nothing privileged or confidential about it, and it is unlikely that any of the grounds for denial would be applicable.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Mr. George Miller

Dear Mr. Miller:

I have received your letter of March 3 in which you sought an opinion concerning a denial of access to records by the Orange County Department of Personnel. Since you did not indicate the nature of the records sought, I cannot provide clear guidance. However, on the basis of the letter denying your request, I offer the following comments.

First, with respect to certain aspects of your request, the response indicates that you sought information rather than records, and that the records were not reasonably described. Again, while I am unfamiliar with your request, I point out that the Freedom of Information Law pertains to existing records, and that §89(3) states in part that an agency is not required to create a record in response to a request. Therefore, insofar as you sought information, rather than records, and the information sought does not exist in the form of a record, the County would not be obliged to prepare new records on your behalf.

Section 89(3) also provides that an applicant must "reasonably describe" the records sought. Consequently, a request should contain sufficient detail to enable an agency to locate and identify the records. It is noted that the state's highest court, the Court of Appeals, has held that whether or the extent to which a request reasonably describes requested records may be dependent on the nature of an agency's filing or recordkeeping systems [Konigsberg v. Coughlin, 68 NY2d 245 (1986)]. By means of example, if an individual wants records identifying persons in the phone book whose last name is "Miller", those items can be easily located, for listings appear alphabetically, by last name, and a request of that nature would reasonably describe the records. On the other hand, if a request is made for the entries of persons whose first name is "George", locating those entries would require a review of each and every entry. Because the entries appear on the basis of last names rather than first names, such a request would not meet the standard of reasonably describing the records.

Mr. George Miller

Second, with respect to grounds for denial of access cited in the response, as a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law.

Since the records appear to relate to a police officer, the first ground for denial, §87(2)(a), may be relevant. That provision pertains to records that "are specifically exempted from disclosure by state or federal statute", and one such statute is §50-a of the Civil Rights Law. In brief, that statute provides that personnel records of police and correction officers that are used to evaluate performance toward continued employment or promotion are confidential. The Court of Appeals, in reviewing the legislative history leading to its enactment, has held that §50-a exempts records from disclosure when a request is made in a context relating to litigation. More specifically, in a case brought by a newspaper, it was found that:

"Given this history, the Appellate Division correctly determined that the legislative intent underlying the enactment of Civil Rights Law section 50-a was narrowly specific, 'to prevent time-consuming and perhaps vexatious investigation into irrelevant collateral matters in the context of a civil or criminal action' (Matter of Capital Newspapers Div. of Hearst Corp. v. Burns, 109 AD 2d 92, 96). In view of the FOIL's presumption of access, our practice of construing FOIL exemptions narrowly, and this legislative history, section 50-a should not be construed to exempt intervenor's 'Lost Time Record' from disclosure by the Police Department in a non-litigation context under Public Officers section 87(2)(a)" [Capital Newspapers v. Burns, 67 NY 2d 562, 569 (1986)].

It was also found that the exemption from disclosure conferred by §50-a of the Civil Rights Law "was designed to limit access to said personnel records by criminal defense counsel, who used the contents of the records, including unsubstantiated and irrelevant complaints against officers, to embarrass officers during cross-examination" (id. at 568).

In another decision which dealt with unsubstantiated complaints against correction officers, the Court of Appeals held that the purpose of §50-a "was to prevent the release of sensitive personnel records that could be used in litigation for purposes of harassing or embarrassing correction officers" [Prisoners' Legal Services v. NYS Department of Correctional Services, 73 NY 2d 26, 538 NYS 2d 190, 191 (1988)].

The response also refers to §87(2)(g), which authorizes an agency to withhold records that:

"are inter-agency or intra-agency materials which are not:

- i. statistical or factual tabulations or data;
- ii. instructions to staff that affect the public;

Mr. George Miller

Page - 3 -

- iii. final agency policy or determinations; or
- iv. external audits, including but not limited to audits performed by the comptroller and the federal government..."

It is noted that the language quoted above contains what in effect is a double negative. While inter-agency or intra-agency materials may be withheld, portions of such materials consisting of statistical or factual information, instructions to staff that affect the public, final agency policy or determinations or external audits must be made available, unless a different ground for denial could appropriately be asserted. Concurrently, those portions of inter-agency or intra-agency materials that are reflective of opinion, advice, recommendation and the like could in my view be withheld.

Finally, reference is made to unwarranted invasions of personal privacy in relation to §89(2) of the Freedom of Information Law and §96 of the Personal Privacy Protection Law. Here I note that the Personal Privacy Protection Law is applicable only to state agencies. For purposes of that statute, §92(1) defines the term "agency" to mean:

"any state board, bureau, committee, commission, council, department, public authority, public benefit corporation, division, office or any other governmental entity performing a governmental or proprietary function for the state of New York, except the judiciary or the state legislature or any unit of local government and shall not include offices of district attorneys."

Based on the foregoing, the Personal Privacy Protection Law excludes from its coverage "any unit of local government", such as a county. Consequently, the Personal Privacy Protection Law would not be applicable or serve as a barrier to disclosure of records maintained by a unit of local government.

Notwithstanding the foregoing, the cited provision of the Freedom of Information Law authorizes an agency to deny access to records to the extent that disclosure would constitute "an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy." Since your request appears to involve records pertaining to a public employee, I point out that the courts have provided substantial direction regarding the privacy of public officers and employees. It is clear that public officers and employees enjoy a lesser degree of privacy than others, for it has been found in various contexts that public officers and employees are required to be more accountable than others. Further, with regard to records pertaining to public officers and employees, the courts have found that, as a general rule, records that are relevant to the performance of a their official duties are available, for disclosure in such instances would result in a permissible rather than an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy [see e.g., Farrell v. Village Board of Trustees, 372 NYS 2d 905 (1975); Gannett Co. v. County of Monroe, 59 AD 2d 309 (1977), aff'd 45 NY 2d 954 (1978); Sinicropi v. County of Nassau, 76 AD 2d 838 (1980); Geneva Printing Co. and Donald C. Hadley v. Village of Lyons, Sup. Ct., Wayne Cty., March 25, 1981; Montes v. State, 406 NYS 2d 664 (Court of Claims, 1978); Powhida v. City of Albany, 147 AD 2d 236 (1989); Scaccia v. NYS Division of State Police, 530 NYS 2d 309, 138 AD 2d 50 (1988); Steinmetz v. Board of Education, East Moriches, Sup. Ct., Suffolk Cty., NYLJ, Oct. 30, 1980);

Capital Newspapers v. Burns, 67 NY 2d 562 (1986)]--Conversely, to the extent that records are irrelevant to the performance of one's official duties, it has been found that disclosure would indeed constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy (see e.g., Matter of Wool, Sup. Ct., Nassau Cty., NYLJ, Nov. 22, 1977).

I hope that the preceding commentary serves to enhance your understanding of the matter and that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Dear Mr. Bretti:

I have received your letter of March 3 in which you wrote that you are "getting shuffled around" in relation to your request for records, and you asked where and to whom you may appeal a denial of access.

In this regard, the Freedom of Information Law provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies must respond to requests and appeals. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

If neither a response to a request nor an acknowledgment of the receipt of a request is given within five business days, or if an agency delays responding for an unreasonable time after it acknowledges that a request has been received, a request may, in my opinion, be considered to have been constructively denied. In such a circumstance, I believe that the denial may be appealed in accordance with §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law. That provision states in relevant part that:

Mr. Dominic Brett

who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

In addition, it has been held that when an appeal is made but a determination is not rendered within ten business days of the receipt of the appeal as required under §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, the appellant has exhausted his or her administrative remedies and may initiate a challenge to a constructive denial of access under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Rules [Floyd v. McGuire, 87 AD 2d 388, appeal dismissed 57 NY 2d 774 (1982)].

For your information, the person designated by the Department of Correctional Services to determine appeals is Anthony J. Annucci, Counsel to the Department.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Mr. Rafael Robles
88-A-8275
Great Meadows Correctional Facility
P.O. Box 51
Comstock, NY 12821

Dear Mr. Robles:

I have received your letter of March 8 in which you sought assistance concerning your ability to gain access to certain records. You asked whether you can obtain police reports prepared in 1987 involving an event unrelated to yourself, as well as those pertaining an injury sustained by a police officer in the line of duty.

In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First, it is emphasized that the Freedom of Information Law pertains to existing records [see §89(3)]. I am unaware of whether records or reports prepared in 1987 continue to exist. If they have been destroyed, the Freedom of Information Law would not apply.

Second, insofar as the police reports in which you are interested continue to be maintained, I note as a general matter that the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law. Since I am unaware of the contents of all of the records in which you are interested, or the effects of their disclosure, I cannot offer specific guidance. Nevertheless, the following paragraphs will review the provisions that may be significant in determining rights of access to the records in question.

In considering the records falling within the scope of your request, relevant is a decision by the Court of Appeals concerning "complaint follow up reports", also known as "DD5's", prepared by police officers in which it was held that a denial of access based on their characterization as intra-agency materials would be inappropriate.

The provision at issue, §87(2)(g) of the Freedom of Information Law, enables an agency to withhold records that:

"are inter-agency or intra-agency materials which are not:

- i. statistical or factual tabulations or data;
- ii. instructions to staff that affect the public;
- iii. final agency policy or determinations; or
- iv. external audits, including but not limited to audits performed by the comptroller and the federal government..."

It is noted that the language quoted above contains what in effect is a double negative. While inter-agency or intra-agency materials may be withheld, portions of such materials consisting of statistical or factual information, instructions to staff that affect the public, final agency policy or determinations or external audits must be made available, unless a different ground for denial could appropriately be asserted. Concurrently, those portions of inter-agency or intra-agency materials that are reflective of opinion, advice, recommendation and the like could in my view be withheld.

In its analysis of the matter, the decision states that:

549]). Consistent with this limited aim to safeguard internal government consultations and deliberations, the exemption does not apply when the requested material consists of 'statistical or factual tabulations or data' (Public Officers Law 87[2][g][i]. Factual data, therefore, simply means objective information, in contrast to opinions, ideas, or advice exchanged as part of the consultative or deliberative process of government decision making (see, Matter of Johnson Newspaper Corp. v. Stainkamp, 94 AD2d 825, 827, affd on op below, 61 NY2d 958; Matter of Miracle Mile Assocs. v. Yudelson, 68 AD2d 176, 181-182).

"Against this backdrop, we conclude that the complaint follow-up reports contain substantial factual information available pursuant to the provisions of FOIL. Sections of the report are devoted to such purely factual data as: the names, addresses, and physical descriptions of crime victims, witnesses, and perpetrators; a checklist that indicates whether the victims and witnesses have been interviewed and shown photos, whether crime scenes have been photographed and dusted for fingerprints, and whether neighborhood residents have been canvassed for information; and a blank space denominated 'details' in which the officer records the particulars of any action taken in connection with the investigation.

"However, the Police Department argues that any witness statements contained in the reports, in particular, are not 'factual' because there is no assurance of the statements' accuracy and reliability. We decline to read such a reliability requirement into the phrase 'factual data', as the dissent would have us do, and conclude that a witness statement constitutes factual data insofar as it embodies a factual account of the witness's observations. Such a statement, moreover, is far removed from the type of internal government exchange sought to be protected by the intra-agency exemption (see, Matter of Ingram v. Axelrod, 90 AD2d 568, 569 [ambulance records, list of interviews, and reports of interviews available under FOIL as 'factual data']). By contrast, any impressions, recommendations, or opinions recorded in the complaint follow-up report would not constitute factual data and would be exempt from disclosure. The holding herein is only that these reports are not categorically exempt as intra-agency material. Indeed, the Police Department is entitled to withhold complaint follow-up reports, or specific portions thereof, under any other applicable exemption, such as the law-enforcement exemption or the public-safety exemption, as long as the requisite particularized showing is made" [Gould, Scott and DeFelice v. New York City Police Department, 89 NY2d 267, 276-277 (1996); emphasis added by the Court].

Based on the foregoing, the agency could not claim that the complaint reports can be withheld in their entirety on the ground that they constitute intra-agency materials. However, the Court was careful to point out that other grounds for denial might apply in consideration of those records, as well as others that you requested.

For instance, of potential significance is §87(2)(b) of the Freedom of Information Law, which permits an agency to withhold records or portions thereof when disclosure would constitute "an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy". That provision might be applicable relative to the deletion of identifying details in a variety of situations, i.e., where a record identifies a victim, a suspect, a confidential source or a witness, for example.

Often the most relevant provision concerning access to records maintained by law enforcement agencies is §87(2)(e), which permits an agency to withhold records that:

"are compiled for law enforcement purposes and which, if disclosed, would:

- i. interfere with law enforcement investigations or judicial proceedings;
- ii. deprive a person of a right to a fair trial or impartial adjudication;
- iii. identify a confidential source or disclose confidential information relating to a criminal investigation; or
- iv. reveal criminal investigative techniques or procedures, except routine techniques and procedures."

In my view, the foregoing indicates that records compiled for law enforcement purposes can only be withheld to the extent that disclosure would result in the harmful effects described in sub- paragraphs (i) through (iv) of §87(2)(e).

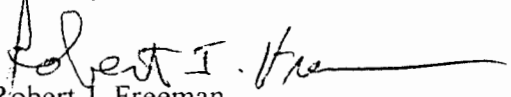

Another possible ground for denial is §87(2)(f), which permits withholding to the extent that disclosure "would endanger the life or safety of any person". The capacity to withhold on that basis is dependent upon the facts and circumstances concerning an event.

With respect to records concerning an injury sustained by a police officer, as indicated earlier, §87(2)(b) authorizes an agency to withhold records to the extent that disclosure would result in an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy. In addition, §89(2)(b) provides a series of examples of unwarranted invasions of personal privacy, two of which relate to medical information. From my perspective, insofar as records include medical information or descriptions concerning the medical nature of an injury, treatment and the like, they may be withheld on the ground that disclosure would constitute an unwarranted invasion of privacy.

Mr. Jerry Brixner

Dear Mr. Brixner:

I have been asked by Assemblywoman John to offer guidance concerning your request for her advice in relation to your unsuccessful efforts in obtaining records from the Chili Town Supervisor. In your letter to the Assemblywoman, you asked: "To what ends would it be for me to initiate a law suit if Supervisor Kelly continues to ignore my December 15 request." You also referred to a provision in the Freedom of Information Law that authorizes a court to award attorney's fees certain limited circumstances in a suit brought under that statute.

While the meaning of your question is not entirely clear, I offer the following comments.

First, the Freedom of Information Law provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies must respond to requests. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

If neither a response to a request nor an acknowledgment of the receipt of a request is given within five business days, or if an agency delays responding for an unreasonable time after it acknowledges that a request has been received, a request may, in my opinion, be considered to have been constructively denied. In such a circumstance, I believe that the denial may be appealed in accordance with §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law. That provision states in relevant part that:

In addition, it has been held that when an appeal is made but a determination is not rendered within ten business days of the receipt of the appeal as required under §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, the appellant has exhausted his or her administrative remedies and may initiate a challenge to a constructive denial of access under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Rules [Floyd v. McGuire, 87 AD 2d 388, appeal dismissed 57 NY 2d 774 (1982)].

Second, I note that Assemblywoman John has co-sponsored legislation that would provide a court with broader authority to award attorney's fees when a member of the public substantially prevails in a proceeding brought under the Freedom of Information Law to gain access to records (see attached, A. 1111). The legislation is based on a recommendation offered to the Governor and the State Legislature by the Committee on Open Government in several of its annual reports.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Robert J. Freeman

Ms. Pauline Aldridge
Special Projects
R.A.M.S.
8789 San Jose Blvd., Suite 104
Jacksonville, Florida 32217

Dear Ms. Aldridge:

I have received your letter of March 10 in which you questioned the propriety of a denial of access to a list of names and addresses of substance abuse counselors by the Office of Alcoholism and Substance Abuse Services (OASAS).

Having spoken with Richard Chady, the Public Information Officer for OASAS, the list of substance abuse counselors maintained by that agency includes the home addresses of those individuals. For that reason, I believe that the denial of your request was consistent with law. In this regard, I offer the following comments.

As a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law.

Also pertinent under the circumstances is the Personal Privacy Protection Law, which deals in part with the disclosure of records or personal information by state agencies concerning data subjects. A "data subject" is "any natural person about whom personal information has been collected by an agency" [Personal Privacy Protection Law, §92(3)]. "Personal information" is defined to mean "any information concerning a data subject which, because of name, number, symbol, mark or other identifier, can be used to identify that data subject" [§92(7)]. For purposes of that statute, the term "record" is defined to mean "any item, collection or grouping of personal information about a data subject which is maintained and is retrievable by use of the name or other identifier of the data subject" [§92(9)].

Ms. Pauline Aldridge

With respect to disclosure, §96(1) of the Personal Privacy Protection Law states that "No agency may disclose any record or personal information", except in conjunction with a series of exceptions that follow. One of those exceptions involves a situation in which a record is "subject to article six of this chapter [the Freedom of Information Law], unless disclosure of such information would constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy as defined in paragraph (a) of subdivision two of section eighty-nine of this chapter." Section 89(2-a) of the Freedom of Information Law states that "Nothing in this article shall permit disclosure which constitutes an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy as defined in subdivision two of this section if such disclosure is prohibited under section ninety-six of this chapter." Therefore, if a state agency cannot disclose records pursuant to §96 of the Personal Protection Law, it is precluded from disclosing under the Freedom of Information Law.

In situations in which lists identify licensees or public employees by their business addresses, the lists are accessible. The inclusion of the business address relates to the performance of one's professional or governmental duties, and there is nothing "personal" about that item. However, the Freedom of Information Law specifies that home addresses pertaining to public employees need not be disclosed [see §89(7)]. Further, it has been held that the home addresses of others, persons who are not public employees, may be withheld on the ground that disclosure would constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy [see American Broadcasting Companies, Inc. v. Siebert, 442 NYS 2d 855 (1981), Empire Realty Corp. v. NYS Division of the Lottery, 657 NYS 2d 504, 230 AD 2d 270 (1997), Joint Industry Board of Electrical Industry v. Nolan, 159 AD 2d 241 (1990)].

It is noted that Mr. Chady indicated that a list of providers would be made available on request, and that such a list would potentially reach a larger audience for your purposes than a list of substance abuse counselors.

I hope that the foregoing serves to enhance your understanding of the matter and that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Robert J. Freeman

Certified Public Accountant
24 West Avenue, Suite 5
Spencerport, NY 14559

Dear Ms. Black:

I have received your letter of March 9 in which you sought assistance in obtaining payroll records from the Hilton Central School District. According to your letter, you have encountered a series of delays in your attempts to gain access to the records.

In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First, as a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law.

Second, with certain exceptions, the Freedom of Information Law does not require an agency to create records. Section 89(3) of the Law states in relevant part that:

"Nothing in this article [the Freedom of Information Law] shall be construed to require any entity to prepare any record not in possession or maintained by such entity except the records specified in subdivision three of section eighty-seven..."

However, a payroll list of employees is included among the records required to be kept pursuant to "subdivision three of section eighty-seven" of the Law. Specifically, that provision states in relevant part that:

"Each agency shall maintain..."

(b)-a record setting forth the name, public office address, title and salary of every officer or employee of the agency... "

As such, a payroll record that identifies all officers or employees by name, public office address, title and salary must be "maintained" on a continual basis.

With respect to rights of access, of primary relevance is §87(2)(b), which permits an agency to withhold record or portions of records when disclosure would result in "an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy." However, payroll information has been found by the courts to be available [see e.g., Miller v. Village of Freeport, 379 NYS 2d 517, 51 AD 2d 765, (1976); Gannett Co. v. County of Monroe, 59 AD 2d 309 (1977), aff'd 45 NYS 2d 954 (1978)]. In addition, this Committee has advised and the courts have upheld the notion that records that are relevant to the performance of the official duties of public employees are generally available, for disclosure in such instances would result in a permissible as opposed to an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy [Gannett, supra; Capital Newspapers v. Burns, 109 AD 2d 292, aff'd 67 NY 2d 562 (1986); Steinmetz v. Board of Education, East Moriches, Sup. Ct., Suffolk Cty., NYLJ, October 30, 1980; Farrell v. Village Board of Trustees, 372 NYS 2d 905 (1975); and Montes v. State, 406 NYS 664 (Court of Claims 1978)]. As stated prior to the enactment of the Freedom of Information Law, payroll records:

"...represent important fiscal as well as operational information. The identity of the employees and their salaries are vital statistics kept in the proper recordation of departmental functioning and are the primary sources of protection against employment favoritism. They are subject therefore to inspection" Winston v. Mangan, 338 NYS 2d 654, 664 (1972)].

In short, a record identifying agency employees by name, public office address, title and salary must in my view be maintained and made available.

Lastly, I believe that the payroll list should be made available without delay, and in addition, it is noted that the Freedom of Information Law provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies must respond to requests. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

While an agency must grant access to records, deny access or acknowledge the receipt of a request within five business days, when such acknowledgment is given, there is no precise time period within which an agency must grant or deny access to records. The time needed to do so may be dependent upon the volume of a request, the possibility that other requests have been made, the necessity to conduct legal research, the search and retrieval techniques used to locate the records and the like. In short, when an agency acknowledges the receipt of a request because more than five business days may be needed to grant or deny a request, so long as it provides an approximate date indicating when the request will be granted or denied, and that date is reasonable in view of the attendant circumstances, I believe that the agency would be acting in compliance with law.

Notwithstanding the foregoing, in my view, every law must be implemented in a manner that gives reasonable effect to its intent, and I point out that in its statement of legislative intent, §84 of the Freedom of Information Law states that "it is incumbent upon the state and its localities to extend public accountability wherever and whenever feasible." Therefore, if records are clearly available to the public under the Freedom of Information Law, or if they are readily retrievable, there may be no basis for a lengthy delay in disclosure. As the Court of Appeals has asserted:

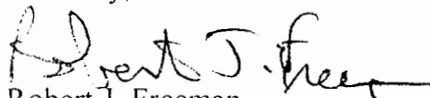

"...the successful implementation of the policies motivating the enactment of the Freedom of Information Law centers on goals as broad as the achievement of a more informed electorate and a more responsible and responsive officialdom. By their very nature such objectives cannot hope to be attained unless the measures taken to bring them about permeate the body politic to a point where they become the rule rather than the exception. The phrase 'public accountability wherever and whenever feasible' therefore merely punctuates with explicitness what in any event is implicit" [Westchester News v. Kimball, 50 NY 2d 575, 579 (1980)].

If a record or report is clearly public and can be found easily, as in the case of the payroll list required to be "maintained" pursuant to §87 (3)(b), there would appear to be no rational basis for delaying disclosure. In a case in which it was found that an agency's "actions demonstrate an utter disregard for compliance set by FOIL", it was held that "[t]he records finally produced were not so voluminous as to justify any extension of time, much less an extension beyond that allowed by statute, or no response to appeals at all" (Inner City Press/Community on the Move, Inc. v. New York City Department of Housing Preservation and Development, Supreme Court, New York County, November 9, 1993).

In an effort to enhance compliance with and understanding of the Freedom of Information Law, copies of this opinion will be forwarded to District officials.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Robert J. Freeman

Dear Mr. Davis:

I have received your letter of February 4, which reached this office on March 11. Please note the change in the Committee's address.

According to your letter and the correspondence attached to it, you requested a variety of records regarding an alleged arson that occurred in the Town of Woodbury in 1980. Although the Town of Woodbury Police Department acknowledged the receipt of your request, which was made on January 17, 1996, when called by an attorney, you wrote that no written response has ever been received. You have sought assistance in the matter.

In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First, your request cites provisions of federal law, specifically, the federal Freedom of Information and Privacy Acts. Those provisions pertain only to records maintained by federal agencies. The statute that governs rights of access to records maintained by entities of state and local government in New York is this state's Freedom of Information Law.

Second, in view of the lapse of time since the submission of your request, more than three years, I would conjecture that the request may have been lost or that the failure to respond is based on an oversight. Consequently, it is suggested that you resubmit your request in accordance with the state Freedom of Information Law.

Third, it is emphasized that the Freedom of Information Law pertains to existing records [see §89(3)]. Since the event that is the subject of your request occurred nearly twenty years ago, it is questionable whether all of the records relating to the matter continue to exist. Insofar as the records have been disposed of or destroyed, the Freedom of Information Law would not apply.

Fourth, to the extent that the records in question exist, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law. Since I am unaware of the contents of all of the records in which you are interested, or the effects of their disclosure, I cannot offer specific guidance. Nevertheless, the following paragraphs will review the provisions that may be significant in determining rights of access to the records in question.

In considering the records falling within the scope of your request, relevant is a decision by the Court of Appeals concerning "complaint follow up reports" prepared by police officers and police officers' memo books in which it was held that a denial of access based on their characterization as intra-agency materials would be inappropriate.

The provision at issue, §87(2)(g) of the Freedom of Information Law, enables an agency to withhold records that:

"are inter-agency or intra-agency materials which are not:

- i. statistical or factual tabulations or data;
- ii. instructions to staff that affect the public;
- iii. final agency policy or determinations; or
- iv. external audits, including but not limited to audits performed by the comptroller and the federal government..."

It is noted that the language quoted above contains what in effect is a double negative. While inter-agency or intra-agency materials may be withheld, portions of such materials consisting of statistical or factual information, instructions to staff that affect the public, final agency policy or determinations or external audits must be made available, unless a different ground for denial could appropriately be asserted. Concurrently, those portions of inter-agency or intra-agency materials that are reflective of opinion, advice, recommendation and the like could in my view be withheld.

In its analysis of the matter, the decision states that:

"...we note that one court has suggested that complaint follow-up reports are exempt from disclosure because they constitute nonfinal intra-agency material, irrespective of whether the information contained in the reports is 'factual data' (see, Matter of Scott v. Chief Medical Examiner, 179 AD2d 443, 444, supra [citing Public Officers Law §87(2)(g)[111]). However, under a plain reading of §87(2)(g), the exemption for intra-agency material does not apply as long as the material falls within any one of the provision's four enumerated exceptions. Thus, intra-agency documents that contain 'statistical or factual tabulations or data' are subject to FOIL disclosure, whether or not embodied in a final agency policy or determination (see, Matter of Farbman & Sons v. New York City Health & Hosp. Corp., 62 NY2d 75, 83, supra; Matter of MacRae v. Dolce, 130 AD2d 577)...

"...Although the term 'factual data' is not defined by statute, the meaning of the term can be discerned from the purpose underlying the intra-agency exemption, which is 'to protect the deliberative process of the government by ensuring that persons in an advisory role [will] be able to express their opinions freely to agency decision makers' (Matter of Xerox Corp. v. Town of Webster, 65 NY2d 131, 132 [quoting Matter of Sea Crest Constr. Corp. v. Stubing, 82 AD2d 546, 549]). Consistent with this limited aim to safeguard internal government consultations and deliberations, the exemption does not apply when the requested material consists of 'statistical or factual tabulations or data' (Public Officers Law 87(2)(g)(i). Factual data, therefore, simply means objective information, in contrast to opinions, ideas, or advice exchanged as part of the consultative or deliberative process of government decision making (see, Matter of Johnson Newspaper Corp. v. Stainkamp, 94 AD2d 825, 827, affd on op below, 61 NY2d 958; Matter of Miracle Mile Assocs. v. Yudelson, 68 AD2d 176, 181-182).

"Against this backdrop, we conclude that the complaint follow-up reports contain substantial factual information available pursuant to the provisions of FOIL. Sections of the report are devoted to such purely factual data as: the names, addresses, and physical descriptions of crime victims, witnesses, and perpetrators; a checklist that indicates whether the victims and witnesses have been interviewed and shown photos, whether crime scenes have been photographed and dusted for fingerprints, and whether neighborhood residents have been canvassed for information; and a blank space denominated 'details' in which the officer records the particulars of any action taken in connection with the investigation.

"However, the Police Department argues that any witness statements contained in the reports, in particular, are not 'factual' because there is no assurance of the statements' accuracy and reliability. We decline to read such a reliability requirement into the phrase 'factual data', as the dissent would have us do, and conclude that a witness statement constitutes factual data insofar as it embodies a factual account of the witness's observations. Such a statement, moreover, is far removed from the type of internal government exchange sought to be protected by the intra-agency exemption (see, Matter of Ingram v. Axelrod, 90 AD2d 568, 569 [ambulance records, list of interviews, and reports of interviews available under FOIL as 'factual data']). By contrast, any impressions, recommendations, or opinions recorded in the complaint follow-up report would not constitute factual data and would be exempt from disclosure. The holding herein is only that these reports are not categorically exempt as intra-agency material. Indeed, the Police Department is entitled to withhold complaint follow-up reports, or specific portions thereof, under any other applicable exemption, such as the law-enforcement exemption or the public-safety exemption, as long as the requisite particularized showing is made" [Gould, Scott and DeFelice v. New York City Police Department, 89 NY2d 267, 276-277 (1996); emphasis added by the Court].

Based on the foregoing, the agency could not claim that the complaint reports can be withheld in their entirety on the ground that they constitute intra-agency materials. However, the Court was careful to point out that other grounds for denial might apply in consideration of those records, as well as others that you requested.

For instance, of potential significance is §87(2)(b) of the Freedom of Information Law, which permits an agency to withhold records or portions thereof when disclosure would constitute "an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy". That provision might be applicable relative to the deletion of identifying details in a variety of situations, i.e., where a record identifies a suspect, a confidential source or a witness, for example.

Often the most relevant provision concerning access to records maintained by law enforcement agencies is §87(2)(e), which permits an agency to withhold records that:

"are compiled for law enforcement purposes and which, if disclosed, would:

- i. interfere with law enforcement investigations or judicial proceedings;
- ii. deprive a person of a right to a fair trial or impartial adjudication;
- iii. identify a confidential source or disclose confidential information relating to a criminal investigation; or
- iv. reveal criminal investigative techniques or procedures, except routine techniques and procedures."

Mr. Joel D. Davis

In my view, the foregoing indicates that records compiled for law enforcement purposes can only be withheld to the extent that disclosure would result in the harmful effects described in sub- paragraphs (i) through (iv) of §87(2)(e).

Another possible ground for denial is §87(2)(f), which permits withholding to the extent that disclosure "would endanger the life or safety of any person". The capacity to withhold on that basis is dependent upon the facts and circumstances concerning an event.

Next, since you referred in your request to a "Vaughn Index", I point out that there is nothing in the Freedom of Information Law or judicial decision that would require that a denial at the agency level identify every record withheld or include a description of the reason for withholding each document. Such a requirement has been imposed under the federal Freedom of Information Act, which may involve the preparation of a so-called "Vaughn index" [see Vaughn v. Rosen, 484 F.2D 820 (1973)]. Such an index provides an analysis of documents withheld by an agency as a means of justifying a denial and insuring that the burden of proof remains on the agency. Again, I am unaware of any decision involving the New York Freedom of Information Law that requires the preparation of a similar index. Further, one decision suggests the preparation of that kind of analysis might in some instances subvert the purpose for which exemptions are claimed. In that decision, an inmate requested records referring to him as a member of organized crime or an escape risk. In affirming a denial by a lower court, the Appellate Division found that:

"All of these documents were inter-agency or intra-agency materials exempted under Public Officers Law section 87(2)(g) and some were materials the disclosure of which could endanger the lives or safety of certain individuals, and thus were exempted under Public Officers Law section 87(2)(f). The failure of the respondents and the Supreme Court, Westchester County, to disclose the underlying facts contained in these documents so as to establish that they did not fall 'squarely within the ambit of [the] statutory exemptions' (Matter of Farbman & Sons v. New York City Health and Hosps. Corp., 62 NY 2d 75, 83; Matter of Fink v. Lefkowitz, 47 NY 2d 567, 571), did not constitute error. To make such disclosure would effectively subvert the purpose of these statutory exemptions which is to preserve the confidentiality of this information" [Nalo v. Sullivan, 125 AD 2d 311, 312 (1987)].

Lastly, the Freedom of Information Law provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies must respond to requests. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

Mr. Joel D. Davis

If neither a response to a request nor an acknowledgement of the receipt of a request is given within five business days, or if an agency delays responding for an unreasonable time after it acknowledges that a request has been received, a request may, in my opinion, be considered to have been constructively denied. In such a circumstance, I believe that the denial may be appealed in accordance with §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law. That provision states in relevant part that:

"...any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive, or governing body, who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

In addition, it has been held that when an appeal is made but a determination is not rendered within ten business days of the receipt of the appeal as required under §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, the appellant has exhausted his or her administrative remedies and may initiate a challenge to a constructive denial of access under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Rules [Floyd v. McGuire, 87 AD 2d 388, appeal dismissed 57 NY 2d 774 (1982)].

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Robert J. Freeman

Mr. Anthony G. Szkutak

[REDACTED]

Dear Mr. Szkutak:

I have received copies your correspondence with the Town of Hampton and would like to offer the following comments for the purpose of clarification.

First, since you referred to executive sessions held to discuss "potential litigation", I note that the Open Meetings Law requires that a procedure be accomplished, during an open meeting, before a public body may enter into an executive session. Specifically, §105(1) states in relevant part that:

"Upon a majority vote of its total membership, taken in an open meeting pursuant to a motion identifying the general area or areas of the subject or subjects to be considered, a public body may conduct an executive session for the below enumerated purposes only..."

As such, a motion to conduct an executive session must include reference to the subject or subjects to be discussed, and the motion must be carried by majority vote of a public body's membership before such a session may validly be held. The ensuing provisions of §105(1) specify and limit the subjects that may appropriately be considered during an executive session.

The provision that deals with litigation is §105(1)(d), which permits a public body to enter into an executive session to discuss "proposed, pending or current litigation". In construing the language quoted above, it has been held that:

"The purpose of paragraph d is "to enable is to enable a public body to discuss pending litigation privately, without baring its strategy to its adversary through mandatory public meetings' (Matter of Concerned Citizens to Review Jefferson Val. Mall v. Town Bd. Of Town of Yorktown, 83 AD 2d 612, 613, 441 NYS 2d 292). The belief of the town's attorney that a decision adverse to petitioner 'would almost certainly lead to litigation' does not justify the conducting of this public business in an executive session. To accept this argument would be to accept the view that any public body could bar the public from its meetings simply by expressing the fear that litigation may result from actions taken therein. Such a view would be contrary to both the letter and the spirit of the exception" [Weatherwax v. Town of Stony Point, 97 AD 2d 840, 841 (1983)].

Based upon the foregoing, I believe that the exception is intended to permit a public body to discuss its litigation strategy behind closed doors, rather than issues that might eventually result in litigation.

With regard to the sufficiency of a motion to discuss litigation, it has been held that:

"It is insufficient to merely regurgitate the statutory language; to wit, 'discussions regarding proposed, pending or current litigation'. This boilerplate recitation does not comply with the intent of the statute. To validly convene an executive session for discussion of proposed, pending or current litigation, the public body must identify with particularity the pending, proposed or current litigation to be discussed during the executive session" [Daily Gazette Co., Inc. v. Town Board, Town of Cobleskill, 44 NYS 2d 44, 46 (1981), emphasis added by court].

As such, a proper motion might be: "I move to enter into executive session to discuss our litigation strategy in the case of the XYZ Company v. the Town of Hampton."

Second, you wrote that the "personnel" exception for entry into executive session "pertains only to employees of the municipality and not to appointed or elected officials." In short, based on the language of the Open Meetings Law, I disagree. That provision, §105(1)(f), permits a public body to conduct an executive session to discuss:

"the medical, financial, credit or employment history of a particular person or corporation, or matters leading to the appointment, employment, promotion, demotion, discipline, suspension, dismissal or removal of a particular person or corporation."

The language quoted above is not restricted to employees and may be applied in appropriate circumstances to deal with others. For example, while members of planning boards or zoning boards of appeals are not employees, the Town Board could validly enter into executive sessions to discuss the strengths and weaknesses of specific individuals under consideration for service on those boards. Further, there may be instances in which the issue relates to a business entity and the Board considers the financial history of particular corporation before determining to contract or do business with that firm. In those and other situations, §105 (1)(f) could be cited to discuss matters that do not relate to employees.

It has been advised that a motion describing the subject to be discussed as "personnel" is inadequate, and that the motion should be based upon the specific language of §105(1)(f). For instance, a proper motion might be: "I move to enter into an executive session to discuss the employment history of a particular person (or persons)". Such a motion would not in my opinion have to identify the person or persons who may be the subject of a discussion. By means of the kind of motion suggested above, members of a public body and others in attendance would have the ability to know that there is a proper basis for entry into an executive session. Absent such detail, neither the members nor others may be able to determine whether the subject may properly be considered behind closed doors.

It is noted that the Appellate Division confirmed the advice rendered by this office. In discussing §105(1)(f) in relation to a matter involving the establishment and functions of a position, the Court stated that:

"...the public body must identify the subject matter to be discussed (See, Public Officers Law § 105 [1]), and it is apparent that this must be accomplished with some degree of particularity, i.e., merely reciting the statutory language is insufficient (see, Daily Gazette Co. v Town Bd., Town of Cobleskill, 111 Misc 2d 303, 304-305). Additionally, the topics discussed during the executive session must remain within the exceptions enumerated in the statute (see generally, Matter of Plattsburgh Publ. Co., Div. of Ottaway Newspapers v City of Plattsburgh, 185 AD2d §18), and these exceptions, in turn, 'must be narrowly scrutinized, lest the article's clear mandate be thwarted by thinly veiled references to the areas delineated thereunder' (Weatherwax v Town of Stony Point, 97 AD2d 840, 841, quoting Daily Gazette Co. v Town Bd., Town of Cobleskill, supra, at 304; see, Matter of Orange County Publs., Div. of Ottaway Newspapers v County of Orange, 120 AD2d 596, lv dismissed 68 NY 2d 807).

"Applying these principles to the matter before us, it is apparent that the Board's stated purpose for entering into executive session, to wit, the discussion of a 'personnel issue', does not satisfy the requirements of Public Officers Law § 105 (1) (f). The statute itself requires, with respect to personnel matters, that the discussion involve the 'employment history of a particular person' (id. [emphasis supplied]). Although this does not mandate that the individual in question be identified by name, it does require that any motion to enter into executive session describe with some detail the nature of the proposed discussion (see, State Comm on Open Govt Adv Opn dated Apr. 6, 1993), and we reject respondents' assertion that the Board's reference to a 'personnel issue' is the functional equivalent of identifying 'a particular person" [Gordon v. Village of Monticello, 620 NY 2d 573, 575; 207 AD 2d 55 (1994)].

Based on the foregoing, a proper motion might be: "I move to enter into an executive session to discuss the employment history of a particular person (or persons)". Such a motion would not in my opinion have to identify the person or persons who may be the subject of a discussion [see Doolittle v. Board of Education, Supreme Court, Chemung County, July 21, 1981; also Becker v. Town of Roxbury, Supreme Court, Chemung County, April 1, 1983]. By means of the kind of motion suggested above, members of a public body and others in attendance would have the ability to know that there is a proper basis for entry into an executive session. Absent such detail, neither the members nor others may be able to determine whether the subject may properly be considered behind closed doors.

Third, in one item of correspondence, you asked that the Town's Freedom of Information Law Appeals Officer "provide by reference the section of the 'OML' that excludes the public from contesting the accuracy of the minutes prior to the minutes being accepted." There is no such provision of law, but I point out there is similarly no provision of law that gives the public the right to contest the contents of minutes. In fact, while I believe that minutes must be accurate, there is nothing in the Open Meetings Law or any other statute of which I am aware that requires that minutes be approved.

I note, too, that the Open Meetings Law provides what might be characterized as minimum requirements concerning the contents of minutes. Section 106 of that statute states that:

"1. Minutes shall be taken at all open meetings of a public body which shall consist of a record or summary of all motions, proposals, resolutions and any other matter formally voted upon and the vote thereon.

2. Minutes shall be taken at executive sessions of any action that is taken by formal vote which shall consist of a record or summary of the final determination of such action, and the date and vote thereon; provided, however, that such summary need not include any matter which is not required to be made public by the freedom of information law as added by article six of this chapter.

3. Minutes of meetings of all public bodies shall be available to the public in accordance with the provisions of the freedom of information law within two weeks from the date of such meetings except that minutes taken pursuant to subdivision two hereof shall be available to the public within one week from the date of the executive session."

Based on the foregoing, it is clear that minutes need not consist of verbatim account of statements made at a meeting or that they include reference to all who might have spoken.

As a matter of practice or policy, many public bodies approve minutes of their meetings. In the event that minutes have been approved, to comply with the Open Meetings Law, it has consistently been advised that minutes be prepared and made available within two weeks, and that if the minutes have not been approved, they may be marked "unapproved", "draft" or "non-final", for example. By so doing within the requisite time limitations, the public can generally know what transpired at a meeting; concurrently, the public is effectively notified that the minutes are subject to change. If minutes have been prepared within less than two weeks, I believe that those unapproved minutes would be available as soon as they exist, and that they may be marked in the manner described above.

Lastly, in a letter to the Town's Appeals Officer, you sought descriptions and explanations of certain actions or activities of the Town Board. In this regard, it is emphasized that the Freedom of Information Law pertains to existing records, and that §89(3) of that statute provides in part that an agency is not required to create a record in response to a request. In the context of your request, if the minutes include the information required by §106 of the Open Meetings Law, I do not believe that the Town would be obligated to prepare new records containing descriptions or explanations of its actions.

I hope that the foregoing serves to clarify your understanding of the Open Meetings and Freedom of Information Laws and that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Robert J. Freeman

Dear Mr. Stone:

I have received the materials that you deposited with the Committee on Open Government. The nature of the services that you seek from this office is unclear. Nevertheless, I offer the following comments.

The package includes correspondence with several agencies from which you are apparently seeking records. However, in most instances, there is no clear indication of which records you are seeking. In this regard, it is emphasized that §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law requires that an applicant must "reasonably describe" the records sought. Therefore, when making a request, you should include sufficient detail to enable agency staff to locate and identify the records of your interest. From my perspective, in most instances, your requests are so vague or broad that they do not meet the standard of reasonably describing the records.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Ms. Venetia Owen

Dear Mr. and Ms. Owen:

As you are aware, your letter of March 8 addressed to the Attorney General has been forwarded to the Committee on Open Government. The Committee, a unit of the Department of State, is authorized to provide advice and opinions concerning the Freedom of Information Law.

In brief, you complained that you are frustrated in your efforts in obtaining information from the Office of Mental Retardation and Developmental Disabilities (OMRDD) pertaining to "consumers at the Sunmount, Tupper Lake, CIT unit." In order to elicit the information, you prepared a form to be completed with respect to each consumer.

In this regard, in an effort to learn more of the status of your request, I contacted Eileen Zibell, OMRDD's records access officer. She informed me yesterday, Thursday, March 25, that she would likely send a response to you either today or during the beginning of next week. She indicated that OMRDD would provide some of the information sought.

I emphasize that the title of the Freedom of Information Law may be somewhat misleading, for it is not a statute that deals with information per se; rather, it is a vehicle that pertains to existing records. Further, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that an agency is not required to create a record in response to a request for information. In the context of your correspondence, OMRDD is not, in my opinion, required to complete the form that you supplied or prepare new records in order to satisfy your request for information. It is my understanding, however, that OMRDD will supply existing records in its possession that are responsive to your request.

I hope that the foregoing serves to clarify your understanding of the matter and that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Robert J. Freeman

Mr. Alvaro A. Sanchez

Drawer B
Stormville, NY 12582

Dear Mr. Sanchez:

I have received your letter of March 9.

Based on my response to you regarding denials of requests by the Office of the Queens County District Attorney, you questioned whether this office had inadvertently overlooked equivalent records that might have been sent to this office between May and September. Having searched the records again, there was no oversight; you received all of the records that fell within the scope of your request. In addition, since your initial request involved records transmitted to this office through December, staff also searched for any that might have been filed since that time; there are none.

You asked where you would complain about "illegal practices" relating to the Freedom of Information Law. In short, anyone can transmit a complaint concerning the Freedom of Information Law to this office. The major function of the Committee on Open Government involves providing advice and guidance concerning public access to government information, primarily under the Freedom of Information Law. I note, however, that the Committee has no authority to enforce the Freedom of Information Law or compel an agency to grant or deny access to records. Enforcement of the Law can be sought through the initiation of a judicial proceeding.

Lastly, you asked whether a "records management/retention protocol" must be disclosed under the Freedom of Information Law. In my opinion, such a record would be accessible.

As a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law. Pertinent is §87(2)(g), which permits an agency to withhold records that:

Page -2-

"are inter-agency or intra-agency materials which are not:

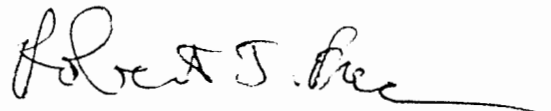

- i. statistical or factual tabulations or data;
- ii. instructions to staff that affect the public;
- iii. final agency policy or determinations; or
- iv. external audits, including but not limited to audits performed by the comptroller and the federal government..."

It is noted that the language quoted above contains what in effect is a double negative. While inter-agency or intra-agency materials may be withheld, portions of such materials consisting of statistical or factual information, instructions to staff that affect the public, final agency policy or determinations or external audits must be made available, unless a different ground for denial could appropriately be asserted. Concurrently, those portions of inter-agency or intra-agency materials that are reflective of opinion, advice, recommendation and the like could in my view be withheld.

From my perspective, the kind of record that you described would serve as an agency's policy and, therefore, would be available under §87(2)(g)(iii).

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Robert J. Freeman

Ms. Teri Weaver
Staff Writer
Syracuse Newspapers
315 Fayette Street
Manlius, NY 13104

Dear Ms. Weaver:

I have received your letter of March 16 in which you sought an opinion concerning "the DeWitt Police Department withholding names of defendants who are 16, 17, 18 and 19 and who are charged with misdemeanor crimes."

From my perspective, until a court takes action to seal the records containing the names of those defendants pursuant to §720.15 of the Criminal Procedure Law, the names would be available under the Freedom of Information Law. In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First, as a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law.

Second, the initial ground for denial, §87(2)(a), pertains to records that "are specifically exempted from disclosure by state or federal statute." While records concerning "apparently eligible youths" might at some point fall within a statutory exemption from disclosure, that point is reached, in my view, only when or after a court orders that the records be sealed.

As suggested above, pertinent to the issue in my view is §720.15 of the Criminal Procedure Law, which provides that:

Ms. Teri Weaver

"1. --When an accusatory instrument against an apparently eligible youth is filed with a court, the court, with the defendant's consent, must order that it be filed as a sealed instrument, though only with respect to the public.

2. When a youth is initially arraigned upon an accusatory instrument, such arraignment and all proceedings in the action thereafter may, in the discretion of the court and which the defendant's consent, be conducted in private.

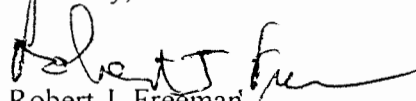

3. The provisions of subdivisions one and two of this section requiring or authorizing the accusatory instrument filed against a youth to be sealed, and the arraignment and all proceedings in the action be conducted in private shall not apply in connection with a pending charge of committing any felony offense as defined in the penal law."

Based upon the foregoing, it is clear in my opinion that only a court has the authority to seal an accusatory instrument that identifies "an apparently eligible youth", irrespective of whether that person is charged with a misdemeanor or a felony.

Lastly, although arrest records are not specifically mentioned in the current Freedom of Information Law, the original Law granted access to "police blotters and booking records" [see original Law, §88(1)(f)]. In my opinion, even though reference to those records is not made in the current statute, I believe that such records continue to be available, for the present law was clearly intended to broaden rather than restrict rights of access. Moreover, it was held by the state's highest court, the Court of Appeals, several years ago that, unless sealed under §160.50 of the Criminal Procedure Law, or, in this context, under §720.15 of the Criminal Procedure Law, records of the arresting agency identifying those arrested must be disclosed [see Johnson Newspapers v. Stinkamp, 61 NY 2d 958 (1984)].

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Mr. Jorge Rivera
141-98-27978
1818 Hazen Street
East Elmhurst, NY 11370

Dear Mr. Rivera:

I have received your letter of March 12 in which you sought assistance in obtaining certain records. Although you submitted requests to Riker's Island and an office of the Division of Parole in Brooklyn, you had not received any response. The records requested involve "a list of phone calls" that you made to the Division of Parole on a certain date.

In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First, I point out that the regulations promulgated by the Committee on Open Government (21 NYCRR Part 1401) require that each agency designate one or more persons as "records access officer." The records access officer has the duty of coordinating an agency's response to requests, and requests should generally be made to that person. While I believe that those in receipt of your requests should have answered in a manner consistent with the Freedom of Information Law or forwarded the requests to the appropriate persons, it is suggested that you resubmit your requests, directing them to the records access officers at the agencies in question.

For your information, since Riker's Island is operated by the New York City Department of Correction, a request may be sent to Mr. Thomas Antenen, Records Access Officer, New York City Department of Correction, 60 Hudson Street, 6th Floor, New York, NY 10013. The records access officer for New York State Division of Parole is David Molik, whose office is located at 97 Central Avenue, Albany, NY 12206.

Next, I point out that the Freedom of Information Law provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies must respond to requests. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

If neither a response to a request nor an acknowledgement of the receipt of a request is given within five business days, or if an agency delays responding for an unreasonable time after it acknowledges that a request has been received, a request may, in my opinion, be considered to have been constructively denied. In such a circumstance, I believe that the denial may be appealed in accordance with §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law. That provision states in relevant part that:

"...any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive, or governing body, who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

In addition, it has been held that when an appeal is made but a determination is not rendered within ten business days of the receipt of the appeal as required under §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, the appellant has exhausted his or her administrative remedies and may initiate a challenge to a constructive denial of access under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Rules [Floyd v. McGuire, 87 AD 2d 388, appeal dismissed 57 NY 2d 774 (1982)].

Third, I am unaware of the nature of the records that might be kept by an agency regarding phone calls. Here I note that §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law requires that an applicant must "reasonably describe" the records sought. In many instances, whether a request reasonably describes records may be dependent upon the nature of an agency's filing or recordkeeping system. If the items of your interest can be located with reasonable effort based on the terms of your request, the request would in my opinion meet the standard imposed by the law. On the other hand, however, if agency staff would be required to engage in a search of hundreds or thousands of records in an effort to locate the items of your interest, the request in my opinion would not meet that standard.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Robert J. Freeman

Mr. Bennett Weiss

Dear Mr. Weiss:

I have received your letter of March 16 and the materials relating to it. You have sought guidance concerning the time taken by the Newburgh Enlarged City School District to respond to a request for records.

In this regard, the Freedom of Information Law provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies must respond to requests. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

"Each entity subject to the provisions of this article, within five business days of the receipt of a written request for a record reasonably described, shall make such record available to the person requesting it, deny such request in writing or furnish a written acknowledgement of the receipt of such request and a statement of the approximate date when such request will be granted or denied..."

If neither a response to a request nor an acknowledgment of the receipt of a request is given within five business days, or if an agency delays responding for an unreasonable time after it acknowledges that a request has been received, a request may, in my opinion, be considered to have been constructively denied. In such a circumstance, I believe that the denial may be appealed in accordance with §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law. That provision states in relevant part that:

"...any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive, or governing body, who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

Mr. Bennett Weiss

In addition, it has been held that when an appeal is made but a determination is not rendered within ten business days of the receipt of the appeal as required under §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, the appellant has exhausted his or her administrative remedies and may initiate a challenge to a constructive denial of access under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Rules [Floyd v. McGuire, 87 AD 2d 388, appeal dismissed 57 NY 2d 774 (1982)].

I note that although an agency must grant access to records, deny access or acknowledge the receipt of a request within five business days, when such acknowledgment is given, there is no precise time period within which an agency must grant or deny access to records. The time needed to do so may be dependent upon the volume of a request, the possibility that other requests have been made, the necessity to conduct legal research, the search and retrieval techniques used to locate the records and the like. In short, when an agency acknowledges the receipt of a request because more than five business days may be needed to grant or deny a request, so long as it provides an approximate date indicating when the request will be granted or denied, and that date is reasonable in view of the attendant circumstances, I believe that the agency would be acting in compliance with law.

Notwithstanding the foregoing, in my view, every law must be implemented in a manner that gives reasonable effect to its intent, and I point out that in its statement of legislative intent, §84 of the Freedom of Information Law states that "it is incumbent upon the state and its localities to extend public accountability wherever and whenever feasible." Therefore, if records are clearly available to the public under the Freedom of Information Law, or if they are readily retrievable, there may be no basis for a lengthy delay in disclosure. As the Court of Appeals has asserted:

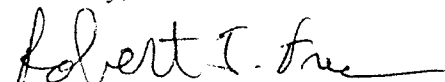

"...the successful implementation of the policies motivating the enactment of the Freedom of Information Law centers on goals as broad as the achievement of a more informed electorate and a more responsible and responsive officialdom. By their very nature such objectives cannot hope to be attained unless the measures taken to bring them about permeate the body politic to a point where they become the rule rather than the exception. The phrase 'public accountability wherever and whenever feasible' therefore merely punctuates with explicitness what in any event is implicit" [Westchester News v. Kimball, 50 NY 2d 575, 579 (1980)].

If, as a matter of practice or policy, an agency acknowledges the receipt of requests and indicates in every instance that it will determine to grant or deny access to records within a particular period following the date of acknowledgment, such a practice or policy would be contrary to the thrust of the Freedom of Information Law. If a request is voluminous and a significant amount of time is needed to locate records and review them to determine rights of access, a delay beyond five business days, in view of those and perhaps the other kinds of factors mentioned earlier, might be reasonable. On the other hand, if a record or report is clearly public and can be found easily, there would appear to be no rational basis for delaying disclosure.

Subject: SEEKING INFO FROM A PRO -Reply

Dear Mr. Rosenberg:

In brief, I believe that government agencies subject to the Freedom of Information Law are required to respond to requests for records. However, in this instance, the information of your interest appears to be confidential.

The first ground for denial in the Freedom of Information Law pertains to records that "are specifically exempted from disclosure by state or federal statute." One such statute is the federal Family Educational Rights and Privacy Act (FERPA). FERPA pertains to records identifiable to students who attend any educational institution that participates in a federal funding or loan program. Therefore, it includes virtually every public educational institution and many private institutions within its coverage.

In short, FERPA prohibits those institutions from disclosing personally identifiable information pertaining to students without the consent of parents of students under the age of eighteen or the students themselves when they have reached that age.

Consequently, as I understand your inquiry, while a CUNY institution would be required to respond, it would have the authority to deny access to the information sought.

To obtain more information on the subject, we have a website that includes the text of opinions prepared by this office. The address is:

www.dos.state.ny.us/coog/coogwww/html

You will see reference to advisory opinions issued under the Freedom of Information Law. From there, click on to "F" and scroll down to "FERPA"; also click on to "T" and scroll to "Time Limits for Response."

Dear Mr. Lathrop:

I have received your correspondence concerning a request for records directed to the Village of Marcellus. You asked whether the Village had transmitted materials to this office as required by §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law.

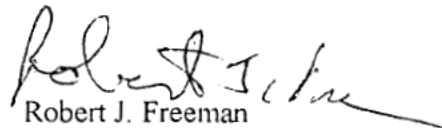

In this regard, having searched our files based upon the new information that you provided, it appears that the Village did not transmit the materials as required by law. As you are likely aware, §89(4)(a) states that:

"any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive or governing body of the entity, or the person thereof designated by such head, chief executive, or governing body, who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought. In addition, each agency shall immediately forward to the committee on open government a copy of such appeal and the ensuing determination thereon."

In an effort to enhance compliance with the Freedom of Information Law, copies of this response will be forwarded to Village officials.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

TO: Josh Rosenberg - Hello There <congov@usa.net>

FROM: Robert Freeman

Dear Mr. Rosenberg:

I have received your latest e-mail in which you questioned what action might be taken if an agency ignores appeals following denials of access.

In this regard, §89(4)(a) states that:

I note that it has been held that when an appeal is made but a determination is not rendered within ten business days of the receipt of the appeal as required under §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, the appellant has exhausted his or her administrative remedies and may initiate a challenge to a constructive denial of access under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Rules [Floyd v. McGuire, 87 AD 2d 388, appeal dismissed 57 NY 2d 774 (1982)].

I point out that the authority of the Committee on Open Government is solely advisory; the Committee is not empowered to compel an agency to grant or deny access to records or otherwise comply with law. When the agency involved in a controversy is identified, copies of advisory opinions are sent to agency officials in an effort to educate, persuade and enhance compliance with law.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Mr. Bruce Estes
Managing Editor
The Ithaca Journal
123 W. State Street
Ithaca, NY 14850

Dear Mr. Estes:

I have received your letter of March 16. You wrote that the new Tompkins County Sheriff "decided that the sheriff's blotter was a 'management document' and would not be accessible to [y]our reporters." You added that the blotter, which has been made available in the past, "contains brief notations on arrests, the nature of the offense, the location of the arrest, the name of the arrested person and the name of the arresting officer."

From my perspective, the records in question must be made available in great measure, if not in their entirety. In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First, the Freedom of Information Law pertains to all agency records, and §86(4) of the Law defines the term "record" expansively to mean:

"any information kept, held, filed, produced, reproduced by, with or for an agency or the state legislature, in any physical form whatsoever including, but not limited to, reports, statements, examinations, memoranda, opinions, folders, files, books, manuals, pamphlets, forms, papers, designs, drawings, maps, photos, letters, microfilms, computer tapes or discs, rules, regulations or codes."

Based on the foregoing, irrespective of the manner in which a document is characterized or whether it is maintained on paper or electronically, I believe that it would constitute a "record" subject to rights of access conferred by the Freedom of Information Law.

Mr. Bruce Estes

Second, as a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law.

I point out that the introductory language of §87(2) refers to the authority to withhold "records or portions thereof" that fall within the scope of one or more of the grounds for denial that follow. Based on the quoted language, I believe that there may be situations in which a single record might be both available or deniable in part. Further, the same language, in my opinion, imposes an obligation on an agency to review records sought in their entirety to determine which portions, if any, may justifiably be withheld. As such, even though some aspects of a police blotter or other record might properly be denied, the remainder might nonetheless be available and would have to be disclosed.

Third, I note that the Court of Appeals, the State's highest court, has stressed that the Freedom of Information Law should be construed expansively. Most recently, in Gould v. New York City Police Department [87 NY 2d 267 (1996)], the Court reiterated its general view of the intent of the Freedom of Information Law, stating that:

"To ensure maximum access to government records, the 'exemptions are to be narrowly construed, with the burden resting on the agency to demonstrate that the requested material indeed qualifies for exemption' (Matter of Hanig v. State of New York Dept. of Motor Vehicles, 79 N.Y.2d 106, 109, 580 N.Y.S.2d 715, 588 N.E.2d 750 see, Public Officers Law § 89[4][b]). As this Court has stated, '[o]nly where the material requested falls squarely within the ambit of one of these statutory exemptions may disclosure be withheld' (Matter of Fink v. Lefkowitz, 47 N.Y.2d, 567, 571, 419 N.Y.S.2d 467, 393 N.E.2d 463)" (id., 275).

Just as significant, the Court in Gould repeatedly specified that a categorical denial of access to records is inconsistent with the requirements of the Freedom of Information Law. In that case, the Police Department contended that "complaint follow up reports" could be withheld in their entirety on the ground that they fall within the exception regarding intra-agency materials, §87(2)(g), an exception separate from that cited in response to your request. The Court, however, wrote that: "Petitioners contend that because the complaint follow-up reports contain factual data, the exemption does not justify complete nondisclosure of the reports. We agree" (id., 276), and stated as a general principle that "blanket exemptions for particular types of documents are inimical to FOIL's policy of open government" (id., 275). The Court also offered guidance to agencies and lower courts in determining rights of access and referred to several decisions it had previously rendered, stating that:

"...to invoke one of the exemptions of section 87(2), the agency must articulate 'particularized and specific justification' for not disclosing requested documents (Matter of Fink v. Lefkowitz, supra, 47 N.Y.2d, at 571, 419 N.Y.S.2d 467, 393 N.E.2d 463). If the court is unable to determine whether withheld documents fall entirely within the scope of the asserted exemption, it should conduct an in camera inspection of representative documents and order disclosure of all nonexempt, appropriately redacted material (see, Matter of Xerox Corp. v. Town of Webster, 65 N.Y.2d 131, 133, 490 N.Y.S. 2d, 488, 480 N.E.2d 74; Matter of Farbman & Sons v. New York City Health & Hosps. Corp., supra, 62 N.Y.2d, at 83, 476 N.Y.S.2d 69, 464 N.E.2d 437)" (id.).

As you may be aware, the phrase "police blotter" is not specifically defined in any statute. It is my understanding that it is a term that has been used, more than anything else, based upon custom and usage. Further, the contents of what might be characterized as a police blotter may vary from one police department to another and often police departments use different terms for records or reports analogous to police blotters. In Sheehan v. City of Binghamton [59 AD 2d 808 (1977)], it was determined that, based on custom and usage, a police blotter is a log or diary in which any event reported by or to a police department is recorded. The decision specified that a traditional police blotter contains no investigative information, but rather merely a summary of events or occurrences and that, therefore, it is accessible under the Freedom of Information Law. When a police blotter or other record is analogous to that described in Sheehan in terms of its contents, I believe that the public would have the right to review it.

If the police blotter includes additional information, i.e., names of suspects or investigative information, it is possible that those portions might properly be deleted. Pertinent in that situation would be §87(2)(e), which enables an agency to withhold records compiled for law enforcement purposes to the extent that disclosure would interfere with an investigation, for example. In that circumstance, portions of the records might be withheld, but the remainder would be available.

Lastly, although arrest records are not specifically mentioned in the current Freedom of Information Law, the original Law granted access to "police blotters and booking records" [see original Law, §88(1)(f)]. In my opinion, even though reference to those records is not made in the current statute, I believe that such records continue to be available, for the present law was clearly intended to broaden rather than restrict rights of access. Moreover, it has been held by the Court of Appeals that unless sealed under §160.50 of the Criminal Procedure Law, records of the arresting agency identifying those arrested must be disclosed [see Johnson Newspapers v. Stainkamp, 61 NY 2d 958 (1984)].

In sum, the determination by the Sheriff to withhold the blotter in its entirety is in my opinion inconsistent with law. For the reasons described above, I believe that the blotter is presumptively available and must be disclosed, except to the extent that portions of the records fall within a ground for denial specified in the Law.

In an effort to enhance compliance with and understanding of the Freedom of Information Law, a copy of this opinion will be forwarded to the Sheriff.

Mr. Jack McAndrew

Dear Mr. McAndrew:

I have received your letter of March 15. You wrote that you are employed by the Port Jervis Public School District and that you have been involved in various proceedings with that agency. Having recently requested a transcript of a hearing in which you were a party, the request was denied on the ground that the District is "not in possession" of the record in question. It is your belief that that the transcript and similar or related records are kept by the District's attorneys.

If your contention is accurate, the materials at issue would, in my view, constitute District records subject to rights conferred by the Freedom of Information Law. In this regard, I offer the following comments.

It is emphasized that the Freedom of Information Law pertains to all agency records, such as those involving school districts, and that §86(4) of that statute defines the term "record" expansively to include:

"any information kept, held, filed, produced, reproduced by, with or for an agency or the state legislature, in any physical form whatsoever including, but not limited to, reports, statements, examinations, memoranda, opinions, folders, files, books, manuals, pamphlets, forms, papers, designs, drawings, maps, photos, letters, microfilms, computer tapes or discs, rules, regulations or codes."

Based upon the language quoted above, documents need not be in the physical possession of an agency to constitute agency records; so long as they are produced, kept or filed for an agency, the courts have held they constitute "agency records", even if they are maintained apart from an agency's premises.

Mr. Jack McAndrew

For instance, it has been found that records maintained by an attorney retained by an industrial development agency were subject to the Freedom of Information Law, even though an agency did not possess the records and the attorney's fees were paid by applicants before the agency. The Court determined that the fees were generated in his capacity as counsel to the agency, that the agency was his client, that "he comes under the authority of the Industrial Development Agency" and that, therefore, records of payment in his possession were subject to rights of access conferred by the Freedom of Information Law (see C.B. Smith v. County of Rensselaer, Supreme Court, Rensselaer County, May 13, 1993).

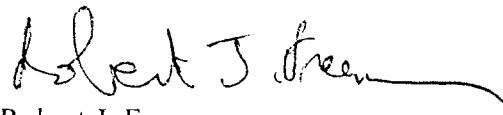

Additionally, in a decision rendered by the Court of Appeals, the state's highest court, it was found that materials received by a corporation providing services for a branch of the State University that were kept on behalf of the University constituted "records" falling within the coverage of the Freedom of Information Law. I point out that the Court rejected "SUNY's contention that disclosure turns on whether the requested information is in the physical possession of the agency", for such a view "ignores the plain language of the FOIL definition of 'records' as information kept or held 'by, with or for an agency'" [see Encore College Bookstores, Inc. v. Auxiliary Services Corporation of the State University of New York at Farmingdale, 87 NY 2d 410, 417 (1995)].

In sum, insofar as the records sought are maintained for the District, I believe that the District is required to direct the custodian of the records to disclose them in accordance with the Freedom of Information Law, or obtain them in order to disclose them to you to the extent required by law.

In an effort to enhance compliance with and understanding of the Freedom of Information Law, copies of this opinion will be sent to District officials.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Mr. Barry Sanders
94-A-8283 C-4-15
Clinton Correctional Facility
P.O. Box 2000
Dannemora, NY 12929

Dear Mr. Sanders:

I have received your letter of March 15 and the materials attached to it. As I understand their contents, you have encountered a series of delays and denials of access to records that you have requested over the course of several years from the New York City Police Department and the State Department of Correctional Services.

Since I do not fully understand your commentary, I cannot offer specific guidance. However, I offer the following remarks.

First, the Committee on Open Government is authorized to provide advice and opinions concerning the Freedom of Information Law. The Committee is not empowered to acquire records on behalf of an applicant or compel an agency to grant or deny access to records.

Second, the Freedom of Information Law provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies must respond to requests and appeals. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

"Each entity subject to the provisions of this article, within five business days of the receipt of a written request for a record reasonably described, shall make such record available to the person requesting it, deny such request in writing or furnish a written acknowledgement of the receipt of such request and a statement of the approximate date when such request will be granted or denied..."

Mr. Barry Sanders

If neither a response to a request nor an acknowledgement of the receipt of a request is given within five business days, or if an agency delays responding for an unreasonable time after it acknowledges that a request has been received, a request may, in my opinion, be considered to have been constructively denied. In such a circumstance, I believe that the denial may be appealed in accordance with §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law. That provision states in relevant part that:

"...any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive, or governing body, who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

In addition, it has been held that when an appeal is made but a determination is not rendered within ten business days of the receipt of the appeal as required under §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, the appellant has exhausted his or her administrative remedies and may initiate a challenge to a constructive denial of access under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Rules [Floyd v. McGuire, 87 AD 2d 388, appeal dismissed 57 NY 2d 774 (1982)].

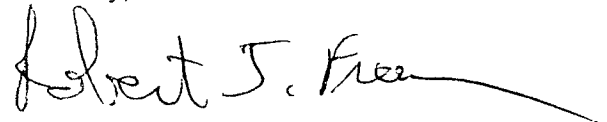

Third, in several instances concerning the appeal process, it appears that you are relying upon provisions contained in §89(5). Those provisions are not applicable; they deal only with situations in which commercial enterprises have sought confidentiality of records that they have submitted to state agencies.

Lastly, in the future, if you have a question concerning the Freedom of Information Law, it is suggested that you express it briefly and directly. If you do so, I might be able to offer more effective guidance.

As you requested, I am returning the materials that you sent to this office.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Robert J. Freeman

Ms. Penny Wells LaValle
Director
County of Suffolk Real Property Tax Service Agency
300 Center Drive
Riverhead, NY 11901-3398

Dear Ms. LaValle:

I have received your transmittal of April 2 and the materials related to it. Among the correspondence is a letter addressed to me on December 28 in which you sought an advisory opinion concerning the Freedom of Information Law. As indicated by phone, and based upon a review of our log of incoming correspondence, that letter, for reasons unknown, did not reach this office. I hope that you will accept my apologies for the delay in response.

At issue is the fee that may be charged by Suffolk County for the disclosure of compact disks containing GIS information. The Counsel to the County Legislature referred to sections of the Suffolk County Code authorizing a flat "one time fee" for the duplication of a database, and a similar fee for a set of books. He suggested that "...the GIS CD-ROM fell within these pre-packaged database type items being provided to the public as distinguished from the photocopying of individual records." He added that:

"The common law principle against municipal profit making imposes a restriction on costs even for such packages in that the charge cannot exceed the County cost for providing the package or the item. In this case, given the tens of millions of dollars that were spent on prepared the GIS system, a modest fee did not seem to come even close to violating the common law principle."

Ms. Penny Wells LaValle

An Assistant County Attorney contended, however, that "the County is not permitted to charge for a data disk anymore than the cost of the materials to produce the disk."

From my perspective, the view of the Assistant County Attorney is essentially consistent with the Freedom of Information Law. In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First, as you may be aware, the Freedom of Information Law pertains to agency records and that §86(4) of the Freedom of Information Law defines the term "record" expansively to include:

"any information kept, held, filed, produced, reproduced by, with or for an agency or the state legislature, in any physical form whatsoever including, but not limited to, reports, statements, examinations, memoranda, opinions, folders, files, books, manuals, pamphlets, forms, papers, designs, drawings, maps, photos, letters, microfilms, computer tapes or discs, rules, regulations or codes."

Based upon the language quoted above, if information is maintained in some physical form, it would in my opinion constitute a "record" subject to rights of access conferred by the Law. Further, the definition of "record" includes specific reference to computer tapes and discs, and it was held nearly twenty years ago that "[i]nformation is increasingly being stored in computers and access to such data should not be restricted merely because it is not in printed form" [Babigian v. Evans, 427 NYS 2d 688, 691 (1980); aff'd 97 AD 2d 992 (1983); see also, Szikszay v. Buelow, 436 NYS 2d 558 (1981)].

Second, by way of background with respect to fees, §87(1)(b)(iii) of the Freedom of Information Law stated until October 15, 1982, that an agency could charge up to twenty-five cents per photocopy or the actual cost of reproduction unless a different fee was prescribed by "law". Chapter 73 of the Laws of 1982 replaced the word "law" with the term "statute". As described in the Committee's fourth annual report to the Governor and the Legislature of the Freedom of Information Law, which was submitted in December of 1981 and which recommended the amendment that is now law:

"The problem is that the term 'law' may include regulations, local laws, or ordinances, for example. As such, state agencies by means of regulation or municipalities by means of local law may and in some instances have established fees in excess of twenty-five cents per photocopy, thereby resulting in constructive denials of access. To remove this problem, the word 'law' should be replaced by 'statute', thereby enabling an agency to charge more than twenty-five cents only in situations in which an act of the State Legislature, a statute, so specifies."

Therefore, prior to October 15, 1982, a local law, an ordinance, or a regulation for instance, establishing a search fee or a fee in excess of twenty-five cents per photocopy or higher than the actual cost of reproduction was valid. However, under the amendment, only an act of the State Legislature, a statute, would in my view permit the assessment of a fee higher than twenty-five cents per photocopy, a fee that exceeds the actual cost of reproducing records that cannot be photocopied, (i.e., electronic information), or any other fee, such as a fee for search or overhead costs. In addition, it was confirmed judicially more than a decade ago that fees inconsistent with the Freedom of Information Law may be validly charged only when the authority to do so is conferred by a statute [see Sheehan v. City of Syracuse, 521 NYS 2d 207 (1987)]. The most recent decision on the matter involved a provision in the Suffolk County Code that established a fee of twenty dollars for photocopies of police reports [Gandin, Schotsky & Rappaport v. Suffolk County, 640 NYS2d 214, 226 AD2d 339 (1996)]. The Appellate Division unanimously determined that the provision in the County Code was invalid. In short, it was determined an enactment of a municipal body is not a statute, and the County was restricted to charging a fee of twenty-five cents per photocopy for the records at issue.

In my view, while a compact disk might be likened to a database, the fee that could be assessed for reproducing either must be based upon the actual cost of reproduction. If the County Code authorizes a "one time fee" for the duplication of a database, or if a similar fee is established relative to a compact disk, unless the fee is reflective of the actual cost of reproduction, I believe that it would be invalid.

Based upon the foregoing, a fee for reproducing electronic information generally would involve the cost of computer time, plus the cost of an information storage medium (i.e., a computer tape or compact disk) to which data is transferred. If the duplication of the data involves a transfer of data from one disk to another, computer time may be minimal, perhaps a matter of seconds. If that is so, the actual cost may involve only the cost of a disk.

Lastly, the suggestion by the Counsel to the County Legislature that actual cost involves money expended in developing an information system is in my view inaccurate. Based upon the terms of the Freedom of Information Law and its judicial interpretation, actual cost involves only reproduction of a record, not the monies expended in development of an information system or the purchase of hardware or software. I note, too, that although compliance with the Freedom of Information Law involves the use of public employees' time and other costs, the Court of Appeals has found that the Law is not intended to be given effect "on a cost-accounting basis", but rather that "Meeting the public's legitimate right of access to information concerning government is fulfillment of a governmental obligation, not the gift of, or waste of, public funds" [Doolan v. BOCES, 48 NY 2d 341, 347 (1979)].

I hope that I have been of assistance. Should any questions arise, please feel free to contact me.

Sincerely,

Robert J. Freeman

Mr. Charles Myrtetus
74-C-0316
Orleans Correctional Facility
3531 Gaines Basin Road
Albion, NY 14411-9199

Dear Mr. Myrtetus:

I have received your letter of March 14. You wrote that you are attempting to obtain records indicating payment made to an attorney by the assigned counsel program. You indicated that the "Onondaga County Assigned Counsel Program of Onondaga County Bar Association" has refused to honor your request.

In this regard, it is noted at the outset that the Freedom of Information Law pertains to agency records. Section 86(3) of that statute defines the term "agency" to mean:

"any state or municipal department, board, bureau, division, commission, committee, public authority, public corporation, council, office or other governmental entity performing a governmental or proprietary function for the state or any one or more municipalities thereof, except the judiciary or the state legislature."

As such, the Freedom of Information Law generally applies to records maintained by state and local government; it would not apply to a private organization.

The program to which you referred involves assignments under "Article 18-B", which encompasses §§722 to 722-f of the County Law. Under §722, the governing body of a county and the City Council in New York City are required to adopt plans for providing counsel to persons "who are financially unable to obtain counsel." Those plans may involve providing representation by a public defender, by a legal aid organization, through a bar association, or by means of a combination of the foregoing.

While I believe that the records of the governmental entity required to adopt a plan under Article 18-B are subject to the Freedom of Information Law, the records of an individual attorney or private organization performing services under Article 18-B may or may not be subject to the Freedom of Information Law, depending upon the nature of the plan. For instance, if a plan involves the services of a public defender, I believe that the records maintained by an office of public defender would fall within the scope of the Freedom of Information Law (see County Law, §716), for that office in my view would constitute an "agency" as defined in §86(3) of the Freedom of Information Law. However, if it involves services rendered by private attorneys or associations, those persons or entities would not in my view constitute agencies subject to the Freedom of Information Law.

The Onondaga County Bar Association is not, in my opinion, an "agency" subject to the Freedom of Information Law. However, if the County maintains the records of your interest, those records would fall within the scope of that statute.

Further, if a bar association, for example, maintains records for a county, I believe that they would constitute county records. The Freedom of Information Law pertains to all agency records, and §86(4) of that statute defines the term "record" expansively to include:

"any information kept, held, filed, produced, reproduced by, with or for an agency or the state legislature, in any physical form whatsoever including, but not limited to, reports, statements, examinations, memoranda, opinions, folders, files, books, manuals, pamphlets, forms, papers, designs, drawings, maps, photos, letters, microfilms, computer tapes or discs, rules, regulations or codes."

Based upon the language quoted above, documents need not be in the physical possession of an agency to constitute agency records; so long as they are produced, kept or filed for an agency, the courts have held they constitute "agency records", even if they are maintained apart from an agency's premises.

For instance, it has been found that records maintained by an attorney retained by an industrial development agency were subject to the Freedom of Information Law, even though an agency did not possess the records and the attorney's fees were paid by applicants before the agency. The Court determined that the fees were generated in his capacity as counsel to the agency, that the agency was his client, that "he comes under the authority of the Industrial Development Agency" and that, therefore, records of payment in his possession were subject to rights of access conferred by the Freedom of Information Law (see C.B. Smith v. County of Rensselaer, Supreme Court, Rensselaer County, May 13, 1993).

Additionally, in a decision rendered by the Court of Appeals, the state's highest court, it was found that materials received by a corporation providing services for a branch of the State University that were kept on behalf of the University constituted "records" falling within the coverage of the Freedom of Information Law. I point out that the Court rejected "SUNY's contention that disclosure turns on whether the requested information is in the physical possession of the agency", for such a view "ignores the plain language of the FOIL definition of 'records' as information kept or held 'by, with or for an agency" [see Encore College Bookstores, Inc. v. Auxiliary Services Corporation of the State University of New York at Farmingdale, 87 NY 2d 410, 417 (1995)].

In sum, insofar as the records sought are maintained for the County, I believe that the County would be required to direct the custodian of the records to disclose them in accordance with the Freedom of Information Law, or obtain them in order to disclose them to you to the extent required by law. Rather than seeking the records from the Bar Association, it suggested that you direct a request to Onondaga County and its records access officer.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Mr. Bernard Aunchman
96-A-1930
Woodbourne Correctional Facility
Pouch #1
Woodbourne, NY 12788

Dear Mr. Aunchman:

I have received your letter of March 17 in which you sought assistance in obtaining records pertaining to your case from the City of Schenectady Police Department and the Office of the Schenectady County District Attorney.

In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First, the Freedom of Information Law provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies must respond to requests. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

"Each entity subject to the provisions of this article, within five business days of the receipt of a written request for a record reasonably described, shall make such record available to the person requesting it, deny such request in writing or furnish a written acknowledgement of the receipt of such request and a statement of the approximate date when such request will be granted or denied..."

If neither a response to a request nor an acknowledgement of the receipt of a request is given within five business days, or if an agency delays responding for an unreasonable time after it acknowledges that a request has been received, a request may, in my opinion, be considered to have been constructively denied. In such a circumstance, I believe that the denial may be appealed in accordance with §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law. That provision states in relevant part that:

Mr. Bernard Aunchman

"...any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive, or governing body, who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

In addition, it has been held that when an appeal is made but a determination is not rendered within ten business days of the receipt of the appeal as required under §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, the appellant has exhausted his or her administrative remedies and may initiate a challenge to a constructive denial of access under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Rules [Floyd v. McGuire, 87 AD 2d 388, appeal dismissed 57 NY 2d 774 (1982)].

Second, as a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law. Since I am unaware of the contents of all of the records in which you are interested, or the effects of their disclosure, I cannot offer specific guidance. Nevertheless, the following paragraphs will review the provisions that may be significant in determining rights of access to the records in question.

In considering the records falling within the scope of your request, relevant is a decision by the Court of Appeals concerning "complaint follow up reports" prepared by police officers in which it was held that a denial of access based on their characterization as intra-agency materials would be inappropriate.

The provision at issue, §87(2)(g) of the Freedom of Information Law, enables an agency to withhold records that:

"are inter-agency or intra-agency materials which are not:

- i. statistical or factual tabulations or data;
- ii. instructions to staff that affect the public;
- iii. final agency policy or determinations; or
- iv. external audits, including but not limited to audits performed by the comptroller and the federal government..."

It is noted that the language quoted above contains what in effect is a double negative. While inter-agency or intra-agency materials may be withheld, portions of such materials consisting of statistical or factual information, instructions to staff that affect the public, final agency policy or determinations or external audits must be made available, unless a different ground for denial could appropriately be asserted. Concurrently, those portions of inter-agency or intra-agency materials that are reflective of opinion, advice, recommendation and the like could in my view be withheld.

In its analysis of the matter, the decision states that:

"...we note that one court has suggested that complaint follow-up reports are exempt from disclosure because they constitute nonfinal intra-agency material, irrespective of whether the information contained in the reports is 'factual data' (see, Matter of Scott v. Chief Medical Examiner, 179 AD2d 443, 444, supra citing Public Officers Law §87(2)(g)). However, under a plain reading of §87(2)(g), the exemption for intra-agency material does not apply as long as the material falls within any one of the provision's four enumerated exceptions. Thus, intra-agency documents that contain 'statistical or factual tabulations or data' are subject to FOIL disclosure, whether or not embodied in a final agency policy or determination (see, Matter of Farbman & Sons v. New York City Health & Hosp. Corp., 62 NY2d 75, 83, supra; Matter of MacRae v. Dolce, 130 AD2d 577)...

"...Although the term 'factual data' is not defined by statute, the meaning of the term can be discerned from the purpose underlying the intra-agency exemption, which is 'to protect the deliberative process of the government by ensuring that persons in an advisory role [will] be able to express their opinions freely to agency decision makers' (Matter of Xerox Corp. v. Town of Webster, 65 NY2d 131, 132 [quoting Matter of Sea Crest Constr. Corp. v. Stubing, 82 AD2d 546, 549]). Consistent with this limited aim to safeguard internal government consultations and deliberations, the exemption does not apply when the requested material consists of 'statistical or factual tabulations or data' (Public Officers Law 87(2)(g)(i)). Factual data, therefore, simply means objective information, in contrast to opinions, ideas, or advice exchanged as part of the consultative or deliberative process of government decision making (see, Matter of Johnson Newspaper Corp. v. Stainkamp, 94 AD2d 825, 827, affd on op below, 61 NY2d 958; Matter of Miracle Mile Assocs. v. Yudelson, 68 AD2d 176, 181-182).

"Against this backdrop, we conclude that the complaint follow-up reports contain substantial factual information available pursuant to the provisions of FOIL. Sections of the report are devoted to such purely factual data as: the names, addresses, and physical descriptions of crime victims, witnesses, and perpetrators; a checklist that indicates whether the victims and witnesses have been interviewed and shown photos, whether crime scenes have been photographed and dusted for fingerprints, and whether neighborhood residents have been canvassed for information; and a blank space denominated 'details' in which the officer records the particulars of any action taken in connection with the investigation.

Mr. Bernard Aunchman

"However, the Police Department argues that any witness statements contained in the reports, in particular, are not 'factual' because there is no assurance of the statements' accuracy and reliability. We decline to read such a reliability requirement into the phrase 'factual data', as the dissent would have us do, and conclude that a witness statement constitutes factual data insofar as it embodies a factual account of the witness's observations. Such a statement, moreover, is far removed from the type of internal government exchange sought to be protected by the intra-agency exemption (see, Matter of Ingram v. Axelrod, 90 AD2d 568, 569 [ambulance records, list of interviews, and reports of interviews available under FOIL as 'factual data']). By contrast, any impressions, recommendations, or opinions recorded in the complaint follow-up report would not constitute factual data and would be exempt from disclosure. The holding herein is only that these reports are not categorically exempt as intra-agency material. Indeed, the Police Department is entitled to withhold complaint follow-up reports, or specific portions thereof, under any other applicable exemption, such as the law-enforcement exemption or the public-safety exemption, as long as the requisite particularized showing is made" [Gould, Scott and DeFelice v. New York City Police Department, 89 NY2d 267, 276-277 (1996); emphasis added by the Court].

Based on the foregoing, the agency could not claim that the complaint reports can be withheld in their entirety on the ground that they constitute intra-agency materials. However, the Court was careful to point out that other grounds for denial might apply in consideration of those records, as well as others that you requested.

For instance, of potential significance is §87(2)(b) of the Freedom of Information Law, which permits an agency to withhold records or portions thereof when disclosure would constitute "an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy". That provision might be applicable relative to the deletion of identifying details in a variety of situations, i.e., where a record identifies a confidential source or a witness, for example.

Often the most relevant provision concerning access to records maintained by law enforcement agencies is §87(2)(e), which permits an agency to withhold records that:

"are compiled for law enforcement purposes and which, if disclosed, would:

- i. interfere with law enforcement investigations or judicial proceedings;
- ii. deprive a person of a right to a fair trial or impartial adjudication;

Mr. Bernard Aunchman

April 5, 1999

iii. identify a confidential source or disclose confidential information relating to a criminal investigation; or

iv. reveal criminal investigative techniques or procedures, except routine techniques and procedures."

In my view, the foregoing indicates that records compiled for law enforcement purposes can only be withheld to the extent that disclosure would result in the harmful effects described in sub- paragraphs (i) through (iv) of §87(2)(e).

Another possible ground for denial is §87(2)(f), which permits withholding to the extent that disclosure "would endanger the life or safety of any person". The capacity to withhold on that basis is dependent upon the facts and circumstances concerning an event.

Lastly, in a decision concerning a request for records maintained by the office of a district attorney that would ordinarily be exempted from disclosure under the Freedom of Information Law, it was held that "once the statements have been used in open court, they have lost their cloak of confidentiality and are available for inspection by a member of the public" [see Moore v. Santucci, 151 AD 2d 677, 679 (1989)]. Based upon that decision, it appears that records introduced into evidence or disclosed during a public judicial proceeding should be available. However, in the same decision, it was also found that:

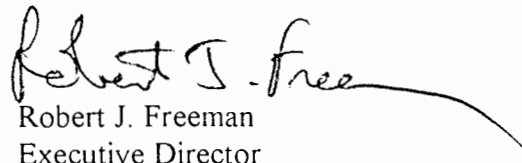

"...if the petitioner or his attorney previously received a copy of the agency record pursuant to an alternative discovery device and currently possesses the copy, a court may uphold an agency's denial of the petitioner's request under the FOIL for a duplicate copy as academic. However, the burden of proof rests with the agency to demonstrate that the petitioner's specific requests are moot. The respondent's burden would be satisfied upon proof that a copy of the requested record was previously furnished to the petitioner or his counsel in the absence of any allegation, in evidentiary form, that the copy was no longer in existence. In the event the petitioner's request for a copy of a specific record is not moot, the agency must furnish another copy upon payment of the appropriate fee...unless the requested record falls squarely within the ambit of 1 of the 8 statutory exemptions" (id., 678).

The Court in Moore also specified that an agency "is not required to make available for inspection or copying any suppression hearing or trial transcripts of a witness' testimony in its possession, because the transcripts are court records, not agency records" (id. at 680).

Dear Ms. Szalasny:

I have received your letter of March 17. You asked whether the subject matter list required to be maintained pursuant to the Freedom of Information Law is "the same thing as MU-1 RECORDS RETENTION AND DISPOSITION SCHEDULE."

In this regard, although the statutory requirements imposed by the Freedom of Information Law are separate from those relating to the retention and disposal of records, it has been advised that municipalities, by resolution, may adopt the retention schedule as their subject matter list. From my perspective, the retention schedules are more detailed than a subject matter list must be, and since they are quite complete in their references to records maintained by municipalities, they serve as a valid substitute for or equivalent of the subject matter list.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Ms. Krista Bradford

[REDACTED]

Dear Ms. Bradford:

I have received your correspondence of March 22, as well as the materials relating to it. You have sought guidance concerning a request made in July of 1998 for records relating to the selection of students for participation in the Anderson Program for gifted children in the New York City public schools.

The focus of your request involves gaining the ability, without personally identifying details, to know of the students who applied to the Program, which were accepted or rejected, the areas by zip code in which they reside, race, and IQ. All of that data is included in the materials submitted in the application process. In addition, you requested guidelines, criteria, policies, rules and similar documentation relating to the selection process, as well the qualifications of employees involved in that process. While you received some materials in response to your request, they minimally describe the program and the selection process; no documentation pertaining to students who applied was apparently provided; only brief information relating to employees who participated in the selection process was made available.

In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First, as a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law. It is emphasized that the introductory language of §87(2) refers to the authority to withhold "records or portions thereof" that fall within one or more of the grounds for denial that follow. The phrase quoted in the preceding sentence is based on a recognition that a single record might include both available and deniable information. It also imposes an obligation on an agency to review records sought in their entirety to determine which portions, if any, may justifiably be withheld and to disclose the remainder.

Relevant to the matter as it relates to records identifiable to students is the initial ground for denial, §87(2)(a), which pertains to records that are "specifically exempted from disclosure by state or federal statute." In this instance, insofar as disclosure of the records in question would or could identify a student or students, I believe that they must be withheld. A statute that exempts records from disclosure is the Family Education Rights and Privacy Act (20 U.S.C. section 1232g), which is commonly known as "FERPA." In brief, FERPA applies to all educational agencies or institutions that participate in grant programs administered by the United States Department of Education. As such, FERPA includes within its scope virtually all public educational institutions and many private educational institutions. The focal point of the Act is the protection of privacy of students. It provides, in general, that any "education record," a term that is broadly defined, that is personally identifiable to a particular student or students is confidential, unless the parents of students under the age of eighteen waive their right to confidentiality, or unless a student eighteen years or over similarly waives his or her right to confidentiality. Further, the federal regulations promulgated under FERPA define the phrase "personally identifiable information" to include:

- "(a) The student's name;
- (b) The name of the student's parents or other family member;
- (c) The address of the student or student's family;
- (d) A personal identifier, such as the student's social security number or student number;
- (e) A list of personal characteristics that would make the student's identity easily traceable; or
- (f) Other information that would make the student's identity easily traceable" (34 CFR Section 99.3).

Based upon the foregoing, references to students' names or other aspects of records that would make a student's identity easily traceable must in my view be withheld in order to comply with federal law.

In a case that required disclosure following certain actions taken to ensure the privacy of students, an applicant sought records of test scores that were prepared by class in alphabetical order. The school district contended that, even if names of students were deleted, because the lists were maintained alphabetically, the identities of some students might be made known. In determining the issue, the Court ordered that names be deleted from the records and that the records be "scrambled" in order to protect against the possible identification of students [Kryston v. East Ramapo School District, 77 AD 2d 896 (1980)]. In that decision, the district was required to disclose the grades in a manner in which students' identities were protected. Stated differently, the grades were required to be disclosed, but any identifying details pertaining to students were required to have been withheld. In the context of your request, based upon FERPA, Kryston and the language of the Freedom of Information Law, I believe that the records concerning students, including zip codes of residence, race, IQ and other details, would be available, following the deletion of any information that would be personally identifiable to a student.

Ms. Krista Bradford

Page -3-

Second, assuming that there are guidelines, policies, procedures and similar documentation concerning the selection process in addition to or more detailed than the materials that you received, I believe that they would be available. Pertinent is §87(2)(g). Although that provision potentially serves as a basis for denial, due to its structure, it frequently requires substantial disclosure. That provision enables an agency to withhold records that:

"are inter-agency or intra-agency materials which are not:

- i. statistical or factual tabulations or data;
- ii. instructions to staff that affect the public;
- iii. final agency policy or determinations; or
- iv. external audits, including but not limited to audits performed by the comptroller and the federal government..."

It is noted that the language quoted above contains what in effect is a double negative. While inter-agency or intra-agency materials may be withheld, portions of such materials consisting of statistical or factual information, instructions to staff that affect the public, final agency policy or determinations or external audits must be made available, unless a different ground for denial could appropriately be asserted. Concurrently, those portions of inter-agency or intra-agency materials that are reflective of opinion, advice, recommendation and the like could in my view be withheld.

One of the contentions offered by the New York City Police Department in a decision rendered by the Court of Appeals, the State's highest court, was that certain reports could be withheld because they are not final and because they relate to incidents for which no final determination had been made. The Court of Appeals rejected that finding and stated that:

"...we note that one court has suggested that complaint follow-up reports are exempt from disclosure because they constitute nonfinal intra-agency material, irrespective of whether the information contained in the reports is 'factual data' (see, Matter of Scott v. Chief Medical Examiner, 179 AD2d 443, 444, supra [citing Public Officers Law §87[2][g][111]). However, under a plain reading of §87(2)(g), the exemption for intra-agency material does not apply as long as the material falls within any one of the provision's four enumerated exceptions. Thus, intra-agency documents that contain 'statistical or factual tabulations or data' are subject to FOIL disclosure, whether or not embodied in a final agency policy or determination (see, Matter of Farbman & Sons v. New York City Health & Hosp. Corp., 62 NY2d 75, 83, supra; Matter of MacRae v. Dolce, 130 AD2d 577)..." [Gould et al. v. New York City Police Department, 87 NY2d 267, 276 (1996)].

Ms. Krista Bradford

April 5, 1999

In short, that a record is "predecisional" or "non-final" would not represent an end of an analysis of rights of access or an agency's obligation to review the contents of a record.

The Court also dealt with the issue of what constitutes "factual data" that must be disclosed under §87(2)(g)(i). In its consideration of the matter, the Court found that:

"...Although the term 'factual data' is not defined by statute, the meaning of the term can be discerned from the purpose underlying the intra-agency exemption, which is 'to protect the deliberative process of the government by ensuring that persons in an advisory role [will] be able to express their opinions freely to agency decision makers' (Matter of Xerox Corp. v. Town of Webster, 65 NY2d 131, 132 [quoting Matter of Sea Crest Constr. Corp. v. Stubing, 82 AD2d 546, 549]). Consistent with this limited aim to safeguard internal government consultations and deliberations, the exemption does not apply when the requested material consists of 'statistical or factual tabulations or data' (Public Officers Law 87[2][g][i]. Factual data, therefore, simply means objective information, in contrast to opinions, ideas, or advice exchanged as part of the consultative or deliberative process of government decision making (see, Matter of Johnson Newspaper Corp. v. Stainkamp, 94 AD2d 825, 827, affd on op below, 61 NY2d 958; Matter of Miracle Mile Assocs. v. Yudelson, 68 AD2d 176, 181-182) id., 276-277).]

In my view, insofar as the agency maintains records falling within the scope of your request that consist of statistical or factual information, policy, procedures, rules or guidelines upon which it relies in implementing the selection process, they must be disclosed.

I note, too, that when an agency indicates that it does not maintain or cannot locate a record, an applicant for the record may seek a certification to that effect. Section 89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law provides in part that, in such a situation, on request, an agency "shall certify that it does not have possession of such record or that such record cannot be found after diligent search." If you consider it worthwhile to do so, you could seek such a certification.

I point out that in Key v. Hynes [613 NYS 2d 926, 205 AD 2d 779 (1994)], it was found that a court could not validly accept conclusory allegations as a substitute for proof that an agency could not locate a record after having made a "diligent search". However, in another decision, such an allegation was found to be sufficient when "the employee who conducted the actual search for the documents in question submitted an affidavit which provided an adequate basis upon which to conclude that a 'diligent search' for the documents had been made" [Thomas v. Records Access Officer, 613 NYS 2d 929, 205 AD 2d 786 (1994)].

Lastly, insofar as your request involves the qualifications of employees involved in the program, relevant is §87(2)(b), which states that an agency may withhold records to the extent that disclosure would constitute "an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy."

Ms. Krista Bradford

Based on the judicial interpretation of the Freedom of Information Law, it is clear that public officers and employees enjoy a lesser degree of privacy than others, for it has been found in various contexts that those individuals are required to be more accountable than others. The courts have found that, as a general rule, records that are relevant to the performance of the official duties of a public officer or employee are available, for disclosure in such instances would result in a permissible rather than an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy [see e.g., Farrell v. Village Board of Trustees, 372 NYS 2d 905 (1975); Gannett Co. v. County of Monroe, 59 AD 2d 309 (1977), aff'd 45 NY 2d 954 (1978); Sinicropi v. County of Nassau, 76 AD 2d 838 (1980); Geneva Printing Co. and Donald C. Hadley v. Village of Lyons, Sup. Ct., Wayne Cty., March 25, 1981; Montes v. State, 406 NYS 2d 664 (Court of Claims, 1978); Powhida v. City of Albany, 147 AD 2d 236 (1989); Scaccia v. NYS Division of State Police, 530 NYS 2d 309, 138 AD 2d 50 (1988); Steinmetz v. Board of Education, East Moriches, Sup. Ct., Suffolk Cty., NYLJ, Oct. 30, 1980); Capital Newspapers v. Burns, 67 NY 2d 562 (1986)]. Conversely, to the extent that items relating to public officers or employees are irrelevant to the performance of their official duties, it has been found that disclosure would indeed constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy [see e.g., Matter of Wool, Sup. Ct., Nassau Cty., NYLJ, Nov. 22, 1977, dealing with membership in a union; Minerva v. Village of Valley Stream, Sup. Ct., Nassau Cty., May 20, 1981, involving the back of a check payable to a municipal attorney that could indicate how that person spends his/her money; Selig v. Sielaff, 200 AD 2d 298 (1994), concerning disclosure of social security numbers].

I point out that §89(2)(b) of the Freedom of Information Law contains a series of examples of unwarranted invasions of personal privacy, the first of which pertains to "disclosure of employment, medical or credit histories or personal references of applicants for employment." Based on that provision, those portions of the records sought that include "references" may in my view be withheld. Similarly, portions of the records that pertain to individuals' private employment outside of government may be withheld. However, in a recent judicial decision, Kwasnik v. City of New York (Supreme Court, New York County, September 26, 1997), the court quoted from and relied upon an opinion rendered by this office and held that portions of resumes consisting of information detailing one's public employment must be disclosed. The Committee's opinion stated that:

"If, for example, an individual must have certain types of experience, educational accomplishments or certifications as a condition precedent to serving in [a] particular position, those aspects of a resume or application would in my view be relevant to the performance of the official duties of not only the individual to whom the record pertains, but also the appointing agency or officers ... to the extent that records sought contain information pertaining to the requirements that must have been met to hold the position, they should be disclosed, for I believe that disclosure of those aspects of documents would result in a permissible rather than an unwarranted invasion [of] personal privacy. Disclosure represents the only means by which the public can be aware of whether the incumbent of the position has met the requisite criteria for serving in that position.

"The Opinion further stated that:

Ms. Krista Bradford

April 5, 1999

"Although some aspects of one's employment history may be withheld, the fact of a person's public employment is a matter of public record, for records identifying public employees, their titles and salaries must be prepared and made available under the Freedom of Information Law [see §87(3)(b)]."

If resumes include reference to memberships in professional organizations associated with the performance of one's official duties or of professional exhibitions, speeches and the like, those items would not in my view be "personal" or intimate in nature; rather, they would relate to activities known to great numbers of people. Consequently, if they appear in the records, I believe that they would be available.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Mr. Tony C. Zappia

Dear Mr. Zappia:

I have received your letter of March 22 in which you sought "input" concerning a delay in response to a request for records of the New York Power Authority. Because the matter in which you are involved is "time sensitive", you asked whether you have "the right to insist upon immediate action".

From my perspective, there is no right to require "immediate action." However, I note that the Freedom of Information Law provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies must respond to requests. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

"Each entity subject to the provisions of this article, within five business days of the receipt of a written request for a record reasonably described, shall make such record available to the person requesting it, deny such request in writing or furnish a written acknowledgement of the receipt of such request and a statement of the approximate date when such request will be granted or denied..."

If neither a response to a request nor an acknowledgement of the receipt of a request is given within five business days, or if an agency delays responding for an unreasonable time after it acknowledges that a request has been received, a request may, in my opinion, be considered to have been constructively denied. In such a circumstance, I believe that the denial may be appealed in accordance with §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law. That provision states in relevant part that:

Mr. Tony C. Zappia

April 5, 1999

who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

In addition, it has been held that when an appeal is made but a determination is not rendered within ten business days of the receipt of the appeal as required under §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, the appellant has exhausted his or her administrative remedies and may then initiate a challenge to a constructive denial of access under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Rules [Floyd v. McGuire, 87 AD 2d 388, appeal dismissed 57 NY 2d 774 (1982)].

I hope that I have been of assistance.

[REDACTED]

The staff of the Committee on Open Government is authorized to issue advisory opinions. The ensuing staff advisory opinion is based solely upon the information presented in your correspondence.

Dear Mr. Elentuck:

I have received your note of March 18. You focused on a document referenced in a grievance decision and questioned whether that document would be available under the Freedom of Information Law.

In this regard, I would conjecture that the document in question is what has been characterized as a "Holt" letter. A Holt letter is in the nature of a warning rather than a determination indicating guilt or misconduct.

As I understand the Education Law as it pertains to tenured persons, a reprimand cannot be placed into a teacher's file unless the teacher has been charged and found to have engaged in misconduct in accordance with §3020-a of the Education Law. In contrast, a teacher may be evaluated at anytime relative to any performance of any nature, and a letter of evaluation may be placed in the teacher's file. This distinction was addressed by the Court of Appeals in Holt v. Board of Education of Webutuck Central School District (52 NY2d 625). As stated in Holt:

"The critical evaluations in issue fall within this permissible range of administrative evaluation. While the language of the administrators' letters may appear to some to be in the nature of a 'reprimand' within the literal meaning of that word, it falls far short of the sort of formal reprimand contemplated by the statute. Although the sharply critical content of the letters is unmistakable, the purpose of such communications - to call to the teacher's attention a relatively minor breach of school policy and to encourage compliance with that policy in the future - is also clear. The purpose is to warn, and hopefully to instruct - not punish. Further, the documents in question are issued by a single administrator. While the inclusion of such letter in the teacher's permanent file may have some effect on his future advancement or potential employability elsewhere, it is by no means as damaging as a formal reprimand issued by the board of education as a result of a determination of misconduct made by an impartial hearing panel. Each letter represents one administrator's view, not a formal finding of misconduct.

Mr. Harvey M. Elentuck

In my opinion, notwithstanding its title or characterization, a document consisting of a "warning" or an administrator's opinion regarding a teacher's conduct, rather than a formal finding of misconduct, could be withheld pursuant to §87(2)(g) of the Freedom of Information Law. Such a document would not in my view represent a "final agency determination", which I believe would be accessible pursuant to §87(2)(g)(iii).

Your remaining comments deal with lesson observation reports. As indicated in previous correspondence, I will not address that issue again.

Sincerely,

Dear Ms. Richmond:

I have received your letter of March 18 in which you referred to an opinion rendered by this office on March 15 at the request of Ms. Julie West. The opinion focused on the requirement that an applicant must "reasonably describe" the records sought.

You enclosed a copy of Ms. West's request, and based upon a review of the materials that she requested, I agree that the item that you highlighted is inconsistent with the Freedom of Information Law. The request involves five items, the first four of which involve particular records, i.e., "standards", a proposed local law, a site plan and exhibits, and similarly described documents. The fifth involves "a copy of any document that supports the Town's position in the local law that states that Snowshoe Road in its present condition is adequate to handle the increase in traffic resulting from the Association Island Project."

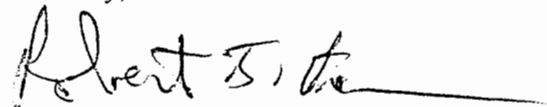

From my perspective, that aspect of the request involves the making of a judgment concerning the contents of records; it requires a reviewer of a record to opine concerning the content of records and to reach a conclusion that a particular record is for or against a particular proposed action. In my view, that is not a request for a record as envisioned by the Freedom of Information Law; on the contrary, it is a request that town staff read every record within a voluminous file in an effort to make judgments regarding their contents. I do not believe that the Town is required to partake in that kind of review to comply with the Freedom of Information Law.

In short, since item five of the request, unlike the remainder of the request, does not involve discrete documents, but rather reaching opinions concerning the contents of numerous documents, again, I do not believe that the Town would be obliged to engage in a review of that nature.

Mr. Richard Becker

Dear Mr. Becker:

I have received your letter of March 1, which reached this office on March 22. Although I could not decipher every aspect of your letter, it appears that you have asked what the State can do to enforce the Freedom of Information Law in Nassau County.

In this regard, there is no state agency that enforces that statute. While the Committee on Open Government is authorized to provide advice and opinions concerning the Freedom of Information Law, it is not empowered to compel an agency to grant or deny access to records.

I note that if a request for records is denied, the applicant has the right to appeal the denial pursuant to §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law. That provision states in relevant part that:

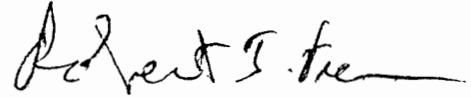

"any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive or governing body of the entity, or the person thereof designated by such head, chief executive, or governing body, who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

Further, if an appeal is denied, the applicant has the right to seek judicial review of the agency's determination by initiating a proceeding under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Law and Rules.

Mr. Benjamin Stephens, Jr.
83-B-0072
Clinton Correctional Facility
P.O. Box 2001
Dannemora, NY 12929-2001

Dear Mr. Stephens:

Your letter of March 16 addressed to Secretary of State Treadwell has been forwarded to the Committee on Open Government. The Committee, a unit of the Department of State upon which the Secretary serves, provides advice and opinions concerning the Freedom of Information Law. As indicated above, the staff of the Committee is authorized to respond on behalf of its members.

In brief, it is your contention that Anthony J. Annucci, Deputy Commissioner and Counsel at the Department of Correctional Services, "has not performed a fair and impartial review and determination" of appeals that you submitted in November and December of last year. In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First, there is no provision in the Freedom of Information Law that provides a right to a reconsideration of an appeal. If an appeal is denied, §89(4)(b) of that statute states that the person denied access has the right to seek judicial review of the agency's determination by initiating a proceeding under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Law and Rules. In short, I do not believe that Commissioner Annucci is obliged to reconsider your appeals.

Second, the initial appeal involved §87(2)(g), which permits an agency to withhold records that:

"are inter-agency or intra-agency materials which are not:

- i. statistical or factual tabulations or data;
- ii. instructions to staff that affect the public;

Mr. Benjamin Stephens, Jr.

April 6, 1999

Page -2-

- iii. final agency policy or determinations; or
- iv. external audits, including but not limited to audits performed by the comptroller and the federal government..."

It is noted that the language quoted above contains what in effect is a double negative. While inter-agency or intra-agency materials may be withheld, portions of such materials consisting of statistical or factual information, instructions to staff that affect the public, final agency policy or determinations or external audits must be made available, unless a different ground for denial could appropriately be asserted. Concurrently, those portions of inter-agency or intra-agency materials that are reflective of opinion, advice, recommendation and the like could in my view be withheld. Without knowledge of the specific contents of the records at issue, I could not conjecture as to rights of access.

The other appeal related to "employee misconduct complaints." As you may be aware, the first ground of denial in the Freedom of Information Law, §87(2)(a), pertains to records that "are specifically exempted from disclosure by state or federal statute." One such statute is §50-a of the Civil Rights Law. In brief, that statute provides that personnel records of police and correction officers that are used to evaluate performance toward continued employment or promotion are confidential. The Court of Appeals, the State's highest court, in reviewing the legislative history leading to its enactment, has held that §50-a exempts records from disclosure when a request is made in a context relating to litigation. More specifically, in a case brought by a newspaper, it was found that:

"Given this history, the Appellate Division correctly determined that the legislative intent underlying the enactment of Civil Rights Law section 50-a was narrowly specific, 'to prevent time-consuming and perhaps vexatious investigation into irrelevant collateral matters in the context of a civil or criminal action' (Matter of Capital Newspapers Div. of Hearst Corp. v. Burns, 109 AD 2d 92, 96). In view of the FOIL's presumption of access, our practice of construing FOIL exemptions narrowly, and this legislative history, section 50-a should not be construed to exempt intervenor's 'Lost Time Record' from disclosure by the Police Department in a non-litigation context under Public Officers section 87(2)(a)" [Capital Newspapers v. Burns, 67 NY 2d 562, 569 (1986)].

It was also found that the exemption from disclosure conferred by §50-a of the Civil Rights Law "was designed to limit access to said personnel records by criminal defense counsel, who used the contents of the records, including unsubstantiated and irrelevant complaints against officers, to embarrass officers during cross-examination" (id. at 568).

In another decision which dealt with unsubstantiated complaints against correction officers, the Court of Appeals held that the purpose of §50-a "was to prevent the release of sensitive personnel records that could be used in litigation for purposes of harassing or embarrassing correction officers"

Mr. Benjamin Stephens, Jr.

[Prisoners' Legal Services v. NYS Department of Correctional Services, 73 NY 2d 26, 538 NYS 2d 190, 191 (1988)].

It appears that the records sought could justifiably have been withheld pursuant to §50-a of the Civil Rights Law and, therefore, §87(2)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law.

I hope that the foregoing serves to clarify your understanding of the Freedom of Information Law and that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Patricia A. Hennessey, Superintendent
Southold Union Free School District
P.O. Box 470
Southold, NY 11971

Dear Ms. Hennessey:

As you are aware, I have received your correspondence of March 22. You have sought my views concerning a policy proposed by a member of the Board of Education of the Southold School District.

The proposal is based on the principle that the Superintendent "has an obligation to keep the Board of Education informed about the progress and conditions of district schools", and that the Board may "require special reports from the Superintendent on special issues or to monitor the effectiveness with which the school system is being administered." In conjunction with the foregoing and the adoption of a "Standard Incident Report Form", the proposed policy states that:

"It will be mandatory for Every District Employee to generate a report upon witnessing or participating in an incident. It is also mandatory that the form be generated for every Detention, Suspension, Referral or Parent/Teacher Conference."

The report would be completed and forwarded to an immediate supervisor who could comment upon or add to its contents. Thereafter, the report with any such additions would be sent to the Superintendent, who would "then include in writing any action, recommendations, or observations taken on his/her part." Finally, the policy would require that the completed form "be sent to all Board of Education Members."

While I am willing to offer an opinion, since the matter does not deal directly with the statutes within the advisory jurisdiction of the Committee on Government, it is suggested that you also seek the views of the agency that oversees the pertinent statute, the Family Educational Rights and Privacy

Act ("FERPA", 20 USC §1232g). Specifically, within the United States Department of Education is the Family Policy Compliance Office, which is located at 400 Maryland Avenue, SW, Washington, DC 20202-4605 and can be reached by phone at (202)260-3887.

In brief, FERPA applies to all educational agencies or institutions that participate in grant programs administered by the United States Department of Education. As such, FERPA includes within its scope virtually all public and many private educational institutions.

The focal point of FERPA is the protection of privacy of students. It provides, in general, that any "education record," a term that is broadly defined, that is personally identifiable to a particular student or students is confidential, unless the parents of students under the age of eighteen waive their right to confidentiality, or unless a student eighteen years or over similarly waives his or her right to confidentiality. Further, the federal regulations promulgated under FERPA define the phrase "personally identifiable information" to include:

- "(a) The student's name;
- (b) The name of the student's parents or other family member;
- (c) The address of the student or student's family;
- (d) A personal identifier, such as the student's social security number or student number;
- (e) A list of personal characteristics that would make the student's identity easily traceable; or
- (f) Other information that would make the student's identity easily traceable" (34 CFR Section 99.3).

In view of the language quoted above, references to students' names, parents' names, or other aspects of records that would make a student's identity easily traceable must ordinarily be withheld in order to comply with federal law.

The circumstances in which prior consent to disclose information personally identifiable to a student is not required are detailed in §99.31 of the regulations. Pertinent to the matter is subdivision (1), which authorizes the release of such information when:

"The disclosure is to other school officials, including teachers, within the agency or institution whom the agency or institution has determined to have legitimate educational interests."

Based on the foregoing, in order to justify disclosure of information identifiable to a student, there must be a "legitimate educational interest" on the part of the recipient of the information.

From my perspective, there are some incidents, those of a serious or unusual nature, that might properly be reported to a supervisor, the Superintendent and to the Board of Education. For instance, if there is an act of violence, or if a student is found to have a weapon or drugs, such matters might appropriately be reported to all of those indicated in the proposal; each would have a duty relative to the conditions within a school and/or the effectiveness of the system's administration.

Patricia A. Hennessey, Superintendent

Nevertheless, there are other "incidents" which in my view are so minor or routine that the extensive disclosure required by the proposal would conflict with the basic intent of the FERPA: to protect the privacy of students by preventing all but necessary disclosures. If a student is given detention for chewing gum or being two minutes late to class, that kind of incident in my opinion would not merit being reported to the array of individuals indicated in the proposal. Similarly, reports would be required to be prepared and disseminated with respect events which are not defined. A "referral" would require the preparation and distribution of a report. The proposal, however, does not define the kind of referral intended to be reported. In the same vein, every parent/teacher conference would have reported on a form and distributed to those identified in the proposal. Is the intent to include even the most routine parent/teacher conference held with every parent of every child throughout elementary school as a reportable incident?

The kinds of events or "incidents" described above do not in my view involve the "legitimate educational interests" envisioned by the federal regulations. For that reason, I believe that the proposed policy is inappropriate and inconsistent with federal law. Again, however, it is suggested that you confer with a representative of the Family Policy Compliance Office for the purpose of obtaining the opinion of the agency that oversees FERPA.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Mr. Bornallah Wright
94-A-2919
P.O. Box 3600
Marcy, N Y 13403

Dear Mr. Wright:

I have received your letter of March 21. You raised a variety of issues in relation to one or more requests for records of the office of a district attorney.

First, you referred to a situation in which you were informed that a request involved a certain number of photocopies. Although you remitted the appropriate fee for that number of copies, there was one less than you paid for. In this regard, it is suggested that you contact the agency, explain the situation, and ask either for a refund in the proper amount or for a copy of the missing page.

In a related vein, you asked whether an agency can send you a "darkened" copy of a record. In my view, copies of records made available by agencies under the Freedom of Information Law must be legible. If the copy cannot be read, I suggest that you return it to the agency and request a readable copy. In that circumstance, I do not believe that the agency could justifiably charge a second photocopying fee.

Second, if an agency deletes material from a record, it is required to indicate that a portion of the record has been withheld, stating the reason and informing the applicant of the right to appeal (see regulations of the Committee on Open Government, 21 NYCRR Part 1401). I do not believe, however, that an agency is required to provide an explanation of its denial of access with the degree of specificity that you described.

I am unaware of any provision of the Freedom of Information Law or judicial decision that would require that a denial at the agency level identify every record withheld or include a separate statement of the reason for withholding each document. Such a requirement has been imposed under the federal Freedom of Information Act, which may involve the preparation of a so-called "Vaughn index" [see Vaughn v. Rosen, 484 F.2D 820 (1973)]. Such an index provides an analysis of documents withheld by an agency as a means of justifying a denial and insuring that the burden of proof remains on the agency. Again, I am unaware of any decision involving the New York Freedom of Information Law that requires the preparation of a similar index. Further, one decision suggests the preparation of that kind of analysis might in some instances subvert the purpose for which exemptions are claimed. In that decision, an inmate requested records referring to him as a member of organized crime or an escape risk. In affirming a denial by a lower court, the Appellate Division found that:

"All of these documents were inter-agency or intra-agency materials exempted under Public Officers Law section 87(2)(g) and some were materials the disclosure of which could endanger the lives or safety of certain individuals, and thus were exempted under Public Officers Law section 87(2)(f). The failure of the respondents and the Supreme Court, Westchester County, to disclose the underlying facts contained in these documents so as to establish that they did not fall 'squarely within the ambit of [the] statutory exemptions' (Matter of Farbman & Sons v. New York City Health and Hosps. Corp., 62 NY 2d 75, 83; Matter of Fink v. Lefkowitz, 47 NY 2d 567, 571), did not constitute error. To make such disclosure would effectively subvert the purpose of these statutory exemptions which is to preserve the confidentiality of this information" [Nalo v. Sullivan, 125 AD 2d 311, 312 (1987)].

Lastly, you inquired as to the length of time that may be taken to respond to a request. In this regard, the Freedom of Information Law provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies must respond to requests. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

"Each entity subject to the provisions of this article, within five business days of the receipt of a written request for a record reasonably described, shall make such record available to the person requesting it, deny such request in writing or furnish a written acknowledgement of the receipt of such request and a statement of the approximate date when such request will be granted or denied..."

If neither a response to a request nor an acknowledgement of the receipt of a request is given within five business days, or if an agency delays responding for an unreasonable time after it acknowledges that a request has been received, a request may, in my opinion, be considered to have been constructively denied. In such a circumstance, I believe that the denial may be appealed in accordance with §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law. That provision states in relevant part that:

"...any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive, or governing body, who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully

Mr. Bornallah Wright

April 7, 1999

explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

In addition, it has been held that when an appeal is made but a determination is not rendered within ten business days of the receipt of the appeal as required under §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, the appellant has exhausted his or her administrative remedies and may initiate a challenge to a constructive denial of access under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Rules [Floyd v. McGuire, 87 AD 2d 388, appeal dismissed 57 NY 2d 774 (1982)].

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

94-A-6723
Clinton Correctional Facility
P.O. Box 2001
Dannemora, NY 12929-2001

Dear Mr. Nolen:

I have received your letter of March 18 in which you requested an advisory opinion concerning rights of access to "directives" prepared by the Department of Correctional Services. You have contended that a blanket denial of access to certain of the directives is inconsistent with law.

In this regard, I offer the following comments.

As a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more of the grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law. From my perspective, three of the grounds for denial are relevant to an analysis of rights of access.

Specifically, §87(2)(g) states that an agency may withhold records that:

"are inter-agency or intra-agency materials which are not:

- i. statistical or factual tabulations or data;
- ii. instructions to staff that affect the public;
- iii. final agency policy or determinations; or
- iv. external audits, including but not limited to audits performed by the comptroller and the federal government..."

Mr. Wallace S. Nolen

April 7, 1999

Page -2-

It is noted that the language quoted above contains what in effect is a double negative. While inter-agency or intra-agency materials may be withheld, portions of such materials consisting of statistical or factual information, instructions to staff that affect the public, final agency policy or determinations or external audits must be made available, unless a different basis for denial is applicable. Concurrently, those portions of inter-agency or intra-agency materials that are reflective of opinion, advice, recommendation and the like could in my view be withheld. It would appear that the records sought would consist of instructions to staff that affect the public or Department policy. Therefore, I believe that they would be available, unless a different basis for denial could be asserted.

The second provision of potential significance is §87(2)(e), which permits an agency to withhold records that:

"are compiled for law enforcement purposes and which, if disclosed, would:

- i. interfere with law enforcement investigations of judicial proceedings...
- ii. deprive a person of a right to a fair trial or impartial adjudication;
- iii. identify a confidential source or disclose confidential information relating to a criminal investigation; or
- iv. reveal criminal investigative techniques or procedures, except routine techniques and procedures."

Under the circumstances, most relevant is §87(2)(e)(iv). The leading decision concerning that provision is Fink v. Lefkowitz, which involved access to a manual prepared by a special prosecutor that investigated nursing homes, in which the Court of Appeals held that:

"The purpose of this exemption is obvious. Effective law enforcement demands that violators of the law not be apprised the nonroutine procedures by which an agency obtains its information (see Frankel v. Securities & Exch. Comm., 460 F2d 813, 817, cert den 409 US 889). However beneficial its thrust, the purpose of the Freedom of Information Law is not to enable persons to use agency records to frustrate pending or threatened investigations nor to use that information to construct a defense to impede a prosecution.

"To be distinguished from agency records compiled for law enforcement purposes which illustrate investigative techniques, are those which articulate the agency's understanding of the rules and regulations it is empowered to enforce. Records drafted by the body charged with enforcement of a statute which merely clarify procedural or substantive law must be disclosed. Such information in the hands of the public does not impede effective law enforcement. On the contrary, such knowledge actually encourages voluntary compliance with the law by detailing the standards with which a person is expected to comply, thus allowing him to conform his conduct to those requirements (see Stokes v. Brennan, 476 F2d 699, 702; Hawkes v. Internal Revenue Serv., 467 F2d 787, 794-795; Davis, Administrative Law [1970 Supp], section 3A, p 114).

April 7, 1999

"Indicative, but not necessarily dispositive of whether investigative techniques are nonroutine is whether disclosure of those procedures would give rise to a substantial likelihood that violators could evade detection by deliberately tailoring their conduct in anticipation of avenues of inquiry to be pursued by agency personnel (see Cox v. United States Dept. of Justice, 576 F2d 1302, 1307-1308; City of Concord v. Ambrose, 333 F Supp 958). It is no secret that numbers on a balance sheet can be made to do magical things by scrupulous nursing home operators the path that an audit is likely to take and alerting them to items to which investigators are instructed to pay particular attention, does not encourage observance of the law. Rather, release of such information actually countenances fraud by enabling miscreants to alter their books and activities to minimize the possibility of being brought to task for criminal activities. In such a case, the procedures contained in an administrative manual are, in a very real sense, compilations of investigative techniques exempt from disclosure. The Freedom of Information Law was not enacted to furnish the safecracker with the combination to the safe" (id. at 572-573).

In applying those criteria to specific portions of the manual, which was compiled for law enforcement purposes, the Court found that:

"Chapter V of the Special Prosecutor's Manual provides a graphic illustration of the confidential techniques used in a successful nursing home prosecution. None of those procedures are 'routine' in the sense of fingerprinting or ballistic tests (see Senate Report No. 93-1200, 93 Cong 2d Sess [1974]). Rather, they constitute detailed, specialized methods of conducting an investigation into the activities of a specialized industry in which voluntary compliance with the law has been less than exemplary.

"Disclosure of the techniques enumerated in those pages would enable an operator to tailor his activities in such a way as to significantly diminish the likelihood of a successful prosecution. The information detailed on pages 481 and 482 of the manual, on the other hand, is merely a recitation of the obvious: that auditors should pay particular attention to requests by nursing homes for Medicaid reimbursement rate increases based upon projected increase in cost. As this is simply a routine technique that would be used in any audit, there is no reason why these pages should not be disclosed" (id. at 573).

Mr. Wallace S. Nolen
April 7, 1999

While I am unfamiliar with the records in question, it would appear that those portions which, if disclosed, would enable individuals to evade effective law enforcement or detection could likely be withheld. It is noted that in another decision which dealt with a request for certain regulations of the State Police, the Court of Appeals found that some aspects of the regulations were non-routine, and that disclosure could "allow miscreants to tailor their activities to evade detection" [De Zimm v. Connelie, 64 NY 2d 860 (1985)]. Nevertheless, other portions of the records might be "routine" and might not if disclosed preclude employees from carrying out their duties effectively.

The remaining ground for denial of possible relevance is §87(2)(f). That provision permits an agency to withhold records when disclosure "would endanger the life of safety of any person." To the extent that disclosure would endanger the life of safety of correction officers or others, it appears that §87(2)(f) would be applicable.

In sum, while some aspects of the records might be deniable, others must in my opinion be disclosed in conjunction with the preceding commentary.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Robert J. Freeman

Ms. Lindy Hatzmann

Dear Ms. Hatzmann:

I have received your letter of March 21 and the materials attached to it.

In brief, you sought records from the City of Peekskill concerning the City's application for a grant awarded by the United States Department of Justice. You indicated that a condition required to gain the award involved holding a public hearing, which occurred on February 8. In an effort to be prepared for the hearing and to offer intelligent comments, you and others requested copies of the grant application. Despite those requests, you wrote that a copy of the application was made available for your inspection only after the hearing had been held. When you sought a copy, you encountered an additional delay in disclosure. A copy of the grant application was finally made available to you on March 10. However, your request for "copies of memos corresponding to that application and approval" were withheld pursuant to §87(2)(g) of the Freedom of Information Law.

You have sought my views on the matter. In this regard, I offer the following remarks.

First, as you may be aware, the Freedom of Information Law provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies must respond to requests. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

"Each entity subject to the provisions of this article, within five business days of the receipt of a written request for a record reasonably described, shall make such record available to the person requesting it, deny such request in writing or furnish a written acknowledgement of the receipt of such request and a statement of the approximate date when such request will be granted or denied..."

Ms. Lindy Hatzmann

If neither a response to a request nor an acknowledgement of the receipt of a request is given within five business days, or if an agency delays responding for an unreasonable time after it acknowledges that a request has been received, a request may, in my opinion, be considered to have been constructively denied. In such a circumstance, I believe that the denial may be appealed in accordance with §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law. That provision states in relevant part that:

"...any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive, or governing body, who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

In addition, it has been held that when an appeal is made but a determination is not rendered within ten business days of the receipt of the appeal as required under §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, the appellant has exhausted his or her administrative remedies and may initiate a challenge to a constructive denial of access under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Rules [Floyd v. McGuire, 87 AD 2d 388, appeal dismissed 57 NY 2d 774 (1982)].

I note that although an agency must grant access to records, deny access or acknowledge the receipt of a request within five business days, when such acknowledgement is given, there is no precise time period within which an agency must grant or deny access to records. The time needed to do so may be dependent upon the volume of a request, the possibility that other requests have been made, the necessity to conduct legal research, the search and retrieval techniques used to locate the records and the like. In short, when an agency acknowledges the receipt of a request because more than five business days may be needed to grant or deny a request, so long as it provides an approximate date indicating when the request will be granted or denied, and that date is reasonable in view of the attendant circumstances, I believe that the agency would be acting in compliance with law.

Notwithstanding the foregoing, in my view, every law must be implemented in a manner that gives reasonable effect to its intent, and I point out that in its statement of legislative intent, §84 of the Freedom of Information Law states that "it is incumbent upon the state and its localities to extend public accountability wherever and whenever feasible." Therefore, if records are clearly available to the public under the Freedom of Information Law, or if they are readily retrievable, there may be no basis for a lengthy delay in disclosure. As the Court of Appeals has asserted:

"...the successful implementation of the policies motivating the enactment of the Freedom of Information Law centers on goals as broad as the achievement of a more informed electorate and a more responsible and responsive officialdom. By their very nature such objectives cannot hope to be attained unless the measures taken to bring them about permeate the body politic to a point where they become the rule rather than the exception. The phrase 'public accountability wherever and whenever feasible' therefore merely punctuates with explicitness what in any event is implicit" [Westchester News v. Kimball, 50 NY 2d 575, 579 (1980)].

April 7, 1999

Further, in my opinion, if, as a matter of practice or policy, an agency acknowledges the receipt of requests and indicates in every instance that it will determine to grant or deny access to records within a particular period following the date of acknowledgement, such a practice or policy would be contrary to the thrust of the Freedom of Information Law. If a request is voluminous and a significant amount of time is needed to locate records and review them to determine rights of access, a delay beyond five business days, in view of those and perhaps the other kinds of factors mentioned earlier, might be reasonable. On the other hand, if a record or report is clearly public and can be found easily, there would appear to be no rational basis for delaying disclosure. In a case in which it was found that an agency's "actions demonstrate an utter disregard for compliance set by FOIL", it was held that "[t]he records finally produced were not so voluminous as to justify any extension of time, much less an extension beyond that allowed by statute, or no response to appeals at all" (Inner City Press/Community on the Move, Inc. v. New York City Department of Housing Preservation and Development, Supreme Court, New York County, November 9, 1993).

Second, as a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law.

Although §87(2)(g) of the Freedom of Information Law permits the withholding of inter-agency or intra-agency materials depending upon the contents of those materials, I do not believe that §87(2)(g) could be cited to withhold communications between the City of Peekskill and a federal agency. Section 86(3) of the Freedom of Information Law defines "agency" to include:

"any state or municipal department, board, bureau, division, commission, committee, public authority, public corporation, council, office or other governmental entity performing a governmental or proprietary function for the state or any one or more municipalities thereof, except the judiciary or the state legislature."

The language quoted above indicates that an "agency" is an entity of state or local government in New York. Since the definition of "agency" does not include a federal agency, §87(2)(g) could not be cited as a means of withholding communications with a federal entity. I note that there is case law involving the assertion of §87(2)(g) in relation to communications between agencies and entities other than New York state or municipal governments. In those instances, it was held that the assertion of §87(2)(g) was erroneous [see e.g., Community Board 7 of Borough of Manhattan v. Schaeffer, 570 NYS 2d 769; affirmed, 83 AD2d 422; reversed on other grounds, 84 NY2d 148 (1994); also Leeds v. Burns, 613 NYS 2d 46, 205 AD2d 540 (1994)].

Insofar as the memos or other documentation involve communications between the City and the federal government, §87(2)(g) would not, in my view, authorize a denial of access. Insofar as the request involves internal memoranda transmitted between or among City officials, as suggested earlier, the contents of those materials would serve as the basis for determining rights of access. The cited provision permits an agency to withhold records that:

April 7, 1999

- "are inter-agency or intra-agency materials which are not:
- i. statistical or factual tabulations or data;
 - ii. instructions to staff that affect the public;
 - iii. final agency policy or determinations; or
 - iv. external audits, including but not limited to audits performed by the comptroller and the federal government..."

It is noted that the language quoted above contains what in effect is a double negative. While inter-agency or intra-agency materials may be withheld, portions of such materials consisting of statistical or factual information, instructions to staff that affect the public, final agency policy or determinations or external audits must be made available, unless a different ground for denial could appropriately be asserted. Concurrently, those portions of inter-agency or intra-agency materials that are reflective of opinion, advice, recommendation and the like could in my view be withheld.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Robert J. Freeman

Dear Mr. Chira:

I have received your memorandum of March 29 concerning requests for records directed to the Village of Port Chester. You have asked whether the Village has sent documentation to the Committee on Open Government as required by the Freedom of Information Law.

Having searched our files concerning appeals, it does not appear that the Village has forwarded the documentation as required by law. I note that §89(4)(a), which pertains to the right to appeal a denial of access to records provides as follows:

"any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive or governing body of the entity, or the person thereof designated by such head, chief executive, or governing body, who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought. In addition, each agency shall immediately forward to the committee on open government a copy of such appeal and the ensuing determination thereon."

Enclosed is a copy of an advisory opinion concerning delays in response to requests for records that may be useful to you.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Mr. Vernon M. Allen

Dear Mr. Allen

I have received your letter of March 20. You indicated that you requested records a year ago under the Freedom of Information Law from the Village of Clayton. Although the Village has acknowledged that the information sought is a matter of public record, you wrote that you have not yet obtained the information. You questioned whether you have the right to have copies of records containing the information of your interest.

In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First, pursuant to the regulations promulgated by the Committee on Open Government (21 NYCRR Part 1401), each agency is required to designate one or more persons as "records access officer." The records access officer has the duty of coordinating an agency's response to requests, and requests should ordinarily be made to that person.

In most villages, the clerk is the records access officer. It is suggested that you phone the clerk to attempt to ascertain the status of your request. If you do not receive a satisfactory response, in view of the passage of time since the submission of your request, it is recommended that you resubmit a request to the records access officer.

Second, the Freedom of Information Law provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies must respond to requests. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that: acknowledgement of the receipt of such request and a statement of the approximate date when such request will be granted or denied..."

If neither a response to a request nor an acknowledgement of the receipt of a request is given within five business days, or if an agency delays responding for an unreasonable time after it acknowledges that a request has been received, a request may, in my opinion, be considered to have been constructively denied. In such a circumstance, I believe that the denial may be appealed in accordance with §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law. That provision states in relevant part that:

"...any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive, or governing body, who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

In addition, it has been held that when an appeal is made but a determination is not rendered within ten business days of the receipt of the appeal as required under §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, the appellant has exhausted his or her administrative remedies and may initiate a challenge to a constructive denial of access under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Rules [Floyd v. McGuire, 87 AD 2d 388, appeal dismissed 57 NY 2d 774 (1982)].

Lastly, when records are accessible under the Freedom of Information Law, they must be made available for inspection and copying. Further, if an applicant wants photocopies, they must be made available upon payment of the appropriate fee, which generally cannot exceed twenty-five cents per photocopy.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Mr. Damian C. Rossney
89-B-0346
Woodbourne Correctional Facility
Pouch #1
Woodbourne, NY 12788

Dear Mr. Rossney:

I have received your letter of March 21 and the correspondence attached to it. Based on the decision rendered in Gould v. New York City Police Department [89 NY2d 267 (1996)], it is your belief that the Department must disclose certain records to you, particularly witness statements and DD5's.

While the decision rendered in Gould indicated that witness statements did not fall within the exception concerning "intra-agency materials", it was not determined that the records that you have requested must be disclosed in their entirety; rather, I believe that they are accessible or deniable, in whole or in part, based on their contents and the effects of disclosure.

In this regard, I offer the following comments.

As a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law. Since I am unaware of the contents of all of the records in which you are interested, or the effects of their disclosure, I cannot offer specific guidance. Nevertheless, the following paragraphs will review the provisions that may be significant in determining rights of access to the records in question.

The provision at issue in Gould, §87(2)(g) of the Freedom of Information Law, enables an agency to withhold records that:

"are inter-agency or intra-agency materials which are not:

- i. statistical or factual tabulations or data;
- ii. instructions to staff that affect the public;
- iii. final agency policy or determinations; or
- iv. external audits, including but not limited to audits performed by the comptroller and the federal government..."

It is noted that the language quoted above contains what in effect is a double negative. While inter-agency or intra-agency materials may be withheld, portions of such materials consisting of statistical or factual information, instructions to staff that affect the public, final agency policy or determinations or external audits must be made available, unless a different ground for denial could appropriately be asserted. Concurrently, those portions of inter-agency or intra-agency materials that are reflective of opinion, advice, recommendation and the like could in my view be withheld.

In its analysis of the matter, the decision states that:

"...we note that one court has suggested that complaint follow-up reports are exempt from disclosure because they constitute nonfinal intra-agency material, irrespective of whether the information contained in the reports is 'factual data' (see, Matter of Scott v. Chief Medical Examiner, 179 AD2d 443, 444, supra citing Public Officers Law §87(2)(g)). However, under a plain reading of §87(2)(g), the exemption for intra-agency material does not apply as long as the material falls within any one of the provision's four enumerated exceptions. Thus, intra-agency documents that contain 'statistical or factual tabulations or data' are subject to FOIL disclosure, whether or not embodied in a final agency policy or determination (see, Matter of Farbman & Sons v. New York City Health & Hosp. Corp., 62 NY2d 75, 83, supra; Matter of MacRae v. Dolce, 130 AD2d 577)..."

"...Although the term 'factual data' is not defined by statute, the meaning of the term can be discerned from the purpose underlying the intra-agency exemption, which is 'to protect the deliberative process of the government by ensuring that persons in an advisory role [will] be able to express their opinions freely to agency decision makers' (Matter of Xerox Corp. v. Town of Webster, 65 NY2d 131, 132 [quoting Matter of Sea Crest Constr. Corp. v. Stubing, 82 AD2d 546, 549]). Consistent with this limited aim to safeguard internal government consultations and deliberations, the exemption does not apply when the requested material consists of 'statistical or factual tabulations or data' (Public Officers Law 87(2)(g)(i). Factual data,

therefore, simply means objective information, in contrast to opinions, ideas, or advice exchanged as part of the consultative or deliberative process of government decision making (see, Matter of Johnson Newspaper Corp. v. Stainkamp, 94 AD2d 825, 827, affd on op below, 61 NY2d 958; Matter of Miracle Mile Assocs. v. Yudelson, 68 AD2d 176, 181-182).

"Against this backdrop, we conclude that the complaint follow-up reports contain substantial factual information available pursuant to the provisions of FOIL. Sections of the report are devoted to such purely factual data as: the names, addresses, and physical descriptions of crime victims, witnesses, and perpetrators; a checklist that indicates whether the victims and witnesses have been interviewed and shown photos, whether crime scenes have been photographed and dusted for fingerprints, and whether neighborhood residents have been canvassed for information; and a blank space denominated 'details' in which the officer records the particulars of any action taken in connection with the investigation.

"However, the Police Department argues that any witness statements contained in the reports, in particular, are not 'factual' because there is no assurance of the statements' accuracy and reliability. We decline to read such a reliability requirement into the phrase 'factual data', as the dissent would have us do, and conclude that a witness statement constitutes factual data insofar as it embodies a factual account of the witness's observations. Such a statement, moreover, is far removed from the type of internal government exchange sought to be protected by the intra-agency exemption (see, Matter of Ingram v. Axelrod, 90 AD2d 568, 569 [ambulance records, list of interviews, and reports of interviews available under FOIL as 'factual data']). By contrast, any impressions, recommendations, or opinions recorded in the complaint follow-up report would not constitute factual data and would be exempt from disclosure. The holding herein is only that these reports are not categorically exempt as intra-agency material. Indeed, the Police Department is entitled to withhold complaint follow-up reports, or specific portions thereof, under any other applicable exemption, such as the law-enforcement exemption or the public-safety exemption, as long as the requisite particularized showing is made" [Gould, Scott and DeFelice v. New York City Police Department, 89 NY2d 267, 276-277 (1996); emphasis added by the Court].

Based on the foregoing, the agency could not claim that the DD5's can be withheld in their entirety on the ground that they constitute intra-agency materials. Further, witness statements were found not to be the kind of communications that fell with §87(2)(g). However, the Court was careful to point out that other grounds for denial might apply in consideration of those records, as well as others that you requested.

For instance, 87(2)(b) permits an agency to withhold records to the extent that disclosure would constitute "an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy". From my perspective, the propriety of a denial of access would be dependent upon the nature of statements by witnesses or the contents of those or other records have already been disclosed. If disclosure of the records in question would not serve to infringe upon witnesses' privacy in view of prior disclosures, §87(2)(b) might not justifiably serve as a basis for denial. However, if the statements in question include substantially different information, that provision may be applicable.

Often the most relevant provision concerning access to records maintained by law enforcement agencies is §87(2)(e), which permits an agency to withhold records that:

"are compiled for law enforcement purposes and which, if disclosed, would:

- i. interfere with law enforcement investigations or judicial proceedings;
- ii. deprive a person of a right to a fair trial or impartial adjudication;
- iii. identify a confidential source or disclose confidential information relating to a criminal investigation; or
- iv. reveal criminal investigative techniques or procedures, except routine techniques and procedures."

In my view, the foregoing indicates that records compiled for law enforcement purposes can only be withheld to the extent that disclosure would result in the harmful effects described in sub- paragraphs (i) through (iv) of §87(2)(e).

Another possible ground for denial is §87(2)(f), which permits withholding to the extent that disclosure "would endanger the life or safety of any person". The capacity to withhold on that basis is dependent upon the facts and circumstances concerning an event.

Lastly, in a decision concerning a request for records maintained by the office of a district attorney that would ordinarily be exempted from disclosure under the Freedom of Information Law, it was held that "once the statements have been used in open court, they have lost their cloak of confidentiality and are available for inspection by a member of the public" [see Moore v. Santucci, 151 AD 2d 677, 679 (1989)]. Based upon that decision, it appears that records introduced into evidence or disclosed during a public judicial proceeding should be available. However, in the same decision, it was also found that:

Mr. Damian C. Rossney

"...if the petitioner or his attorney previously received a copy of the agency record pursuant to an alternative discovery device and currently possesses the copy, a court may uphold an agency's denial of the petitioner's request under the FOIL for a duplicate copy as academic. However, the burden of proof rests with the agency to demonstrate that the petitioner's specific requests are moot. The respondent's burden would be satisfied upon proof that a copy of the requested record was previously furnished to the petitioner or his counsel in the absence of any allegation, in evidentiary form, that the copy was no longer in existence. In the event the petitioner's request for a copy of a specific record is not moot, the agency must furnish another copy upon payment of the appropriate fee...unless the requested record falls squarely within the ambit of 1 of the 8 statutory exemptions" (id., 678).

The Court in Moore also specified that an agency "is not required to make available for inspection or copying any suppression hearing or trial transcripts of a witness' testimony in its possession, because the transcripts are court records, not agency records" (id. at 680).

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Ms. Lori Fox

[REDACTED]

Dear Ms. Kowaleski, Ms. Koss and Ms. Fox:

I have received your letter of March 19 in which you sought my opinion concerning a variety of practices of the Board of Education of the Akron School District and a subcommittee of the Board in relation to both the Freedom of Information Law and the Open Meetings Law.

The initial area of inquiry involves a meeting of the Board of Education held on January 20 in which a portion of the discussion related to the District's homework policy. The Board President said that the Board would consider the concerns expressed by parents and at the end of the meeting, at which time the Board entered into executive session without indicating a reason. A week later, the subcommittee of the Board also considered the homework policy. You wrote that there was no meeting of the Board in the time between the Board and subcommittee meetings and asked whether the School Board should "have charged the subcommittee to look at this homework policy during executive session."

You also referred to a survey distributed to parents, teachers and children concerning the homework policy and asked whether those surveys, which did not seek names of those who responded, are considered "school district records." Due to a discrepancy in the numbers of surveys reportedly returned to the District, you asked whether you can "ask to count them."

Reference was made to other meetings during which executive sessions were held with no disclosure of the reason. Further, you questioned the ability to discuss certain issues that were not specified in agendas. You added that at one of the meetings, the Superintendent "insisted" that he

Ms. Stacey Kowaleski
Ms. Debra Koss
Ms. Lori Fox

needed the names of those who attended, and you asked whether that kind of request is "customary and appropriate."

In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First, as a general matter, the Open Meetings Law is based upon a presumption of openness. Stated differently, meetings of public bodies must be conducted open to the public, unless there is a basis for entry into executive session. Moreover, the Law requires that a procedure be accomplished, during an open meeting, before a public body may enter into an executive session. Specifically, §105(1) states in relevant part that:

"Upon a majority vote of its total membership, taken in an open meeting pursuant to a motion identifying the general area or areas of the subject or subjects to be considered, a public body may conduct an executive session for the below enumerated purposes only..."

As such, a motion to conduct an executive session must include reference to the subject or subjects to be discussed, and the motion must be carried by majority vote of a public body's total membership before such a session may validly be held. The ensuing provisions of §105(1) specify and limit the subjects that may appropriately be considered during an executive session.

Second, although it is used frequently, the term "personnel" appears nowhere in the Open Meetings Law. Although one of the grounds for entry into executive session often relates to personnel matters, from my perspective, the term is overused and is frequently cited in a manner that is misleading or causes unnecessary confusion. To be sure, some issues involving "personnel" may be properly considered in an executive session; others, in my view, cannot. Further, certain matters that have nothing to do with personnel may be discussed in private under the provision that is ordinarily cited to discuss personnel.

The language of the so-called "personnel" exception, §105(1)(f) of the Open Meetings Law, is limited and precise. In terms of legislative history, as originally enacted, the provision in question permitted a public body to enter into an executive session to discuss:

"...the medical, financial, credit or employment history of any person or corporation, or matters leading to the appointment, employment, promotion, demotion, discipline, suspension, dismissal or removal of any person or corporation..."

Under the language quoted above, public bodies often convened executive sessions to discuss matters that dealt with "personnel" generally, tangentially, or in relation to policy concerns. However, the Committee consistently advised that the provision was intended largely to protect privacy and not to shield matters of policy under the guise of privacy.

Ms. Stacey Kowaleski
Ms. Debra Koss
Ms. Lori Fox
April 13, 1999
Page -3-

To attempt to clarify the Law, the Committee recommended a series of amendments to the Open Meetings Law, several of which became effective on October 1, 1979. The recommendation made by the Committee regarding §105(1)(f) was enacted and states that a public body may enter into an executive session to discuss:

"...the medical, financial, credit or employment history of a particular person or corporation, or matters leading to the appointment, employment, promotion, demotion, discipline, suspension, dismissal or removal of a particular person or corporation..." (emphasis added).

Due to the insertion of the term "particular" in §105(1)(f), I believe that a discussion of "personnel" may be considered in an executive session only when the subject involves a particular person or persons, and only when at least one of the topics listed in §105(1)(f) is considered.

In the context of the issues that you described, insofar as the discussions involved a particular person in relation to one or more of the subjects described in §105(1)(f), the executive sessions would have been justifiably held. On the other hand, to the extent that they involved consideration or review of matters of policy, or the functions of an office or certain positions, irrespective of who might hold those positions, I do not believe that there would have been a basis for discussion in executive session. Similarly, "scolding" a member of the Board would likely not have involved a matter that could properly have been considered in executive session. Even though those kinds of subjects might be reflective of "specific personnel" issues, unless they focused on a particular person in relation to the subjects listed in §105(1)(f), there would have been no basis for holding an executive session.

It has been advised that a motion describing the subject to be discussed as "personnel" or "specific personnel matters" is inadequate, and that the motion should be based upon the specific language of §105(1)(f). For instance, a proper motion might be: "I move to enter into an executive session to discuss the employment history of a particular person (or persons)". Such a motion would not in my opinion have to identify the person or persons who may be the subject of a discussion. By means of the kind of motion suggested above, members of a public body and others in attendance would have the ability to know that there is a proper basis for entry into an executive session. Absent such detail, neither the members nor others may be able to determine whether the subject may properly be considered behind closed doors.

It is noted that the Appellate Division confirmed the advice rendered by this office. In discussing §105(1)(f) in relation to a matter involving the establishment and functions of a position, the Court stated that:

"...the public body must identify the subject matter to be discussed (See, Public Officers Law § 105 [1]), and it is apparent that this must be accomplished with some degree of particularity, i.e., merely reciting the statutory language is insufficient (see, Daily Gazette Co. v. Town Bd., Town of Cobleskill, 111 Misc 2d 303, 304-305).

Ms. Stacey Kowaleski
Ms. Debra Koss
Ms. Lori Fox
April 13, 1999

Additionally, the topics discussed during the executive session must remain within the exceptions enumerated in the statute (see generally, Matter of Plattsburgh Publ. Co., Div. of Ottaway Newspapers v City of Plattsburgh, 185 AD2d §18), and these exceptions, in turn, 'must be narrowly scrutinized, lest the article's clear mandate be thwarted by thinly veiled references to the areas delineated thereunder' (Weatherwax v Town of Stony Point, 97 AD2d 840, 841, quoting Daily Gazette Co. v Town Bd., Town of Cobleskill, supra, at 304; see, Matter of Orange County Publs., Div. of Ottaway Newspapers v County of Orange, 120 AD2d 596, lv dismissed 68 NY 2d 807).

"Applying these principles to the matter before us, it is apparent that the Board's stated purpose for entering into executive session, to wit, the discussion of a 'personnel issue', does not satisfy the requirements of Public Officers Law § 105 (1) (f). The statute itself requires, with respect to personnel matters, that the discussion involve the 'employment history of a particular person' (id. [emphasis supplied]). Although this does not mandate that the individual in question be identified by name, it does require that any motion to enter into executive session describe with some detail the nature of the proposed discussion (see, State Comm on Open Govt Adv Opn dated Apr. 6, 1993), and we reject respondents' assertion that the Board's reference to a 'personnel issue' is the functional equivalent of identifying 'a particular person'" [Gordon v. Village of Monticello, 620 NY 2d 573, 575; 207 AD 2d 55 (1994)].

In short, the grounds for entry into executive session are limited. While it is unclear whether those topics were in fact discussed during executive sessions, insofar as the Board or its subcommittee considered the homework policy, directed the subcommittee to study the issue of homework policy or prepared or reviewed the survey, I do not believe that executive sessions would validly have been held.

Next, with respect to agendas, there is nothing in the Open Meetings Law or any other statute that pertains specifically to agendas. Unless a public body has established a rule to the contrary, there is no requirement that an agenda be followed. Similarly, there would be no prohibition against discussing issues that do not appear on an agenda.

You questioned why members of the Board of Education who are not members of the subcommittee but who attended the subcommittee's meeting could not attend an executive session. In this regard, §105(2) of the Open Meetings Law states that the only persons who have the right to attend an executive session are the members of the public body conducting an executive session. Since a subcommittee is a public body separate and distinct from the Board of Education [see definition of "public body", Open Meetings Law, §102(2)], the members of the Board who do not

Ms. Stacey Kowaleski
Ms. Debra Koss
Ms. Lori Fox

serve on the subcommittee would not have had the right to attend an executive session of the subcommittee. I point out that §105(2) also states that a public body may authorize others to attend. Therefore, while the subcommittee could have permitted the attendance of others, it would not have been required to do so. The foregoing is based, of course, on an executive session being validly held. For reasons discussed earlier, it is questionable whether the subcommittee appropriately held an executive session. If the matter did not fall within any of the grounds for entry into executive session, any person would have had the right to have been present.

Next, §103 of the Open Meetings Law states that meetings of public bodies are open to the general public. In my opinion, the right to attend a meeting can in no way be conditioned upon an individual's status, interest or residence. For that reason, I do not believe that a public body or a superintendent can require those attending a meeting to identify themselves or indicate their residence.

Lastly, based on the language of the Freedom of Information Law and its judicial interpretation, the surveys would, in my opinion, clearly fall within its scope. That statute pertains to agency records and defines the term "record" expansively to include:

"any information kept, held, filed, produced, reproduced by, with or for an agency or the state legislature, in any physical form whatsoever including, but not limited to, reports, statements, examinations, memoranda, opinions, folders, files, books, manuals, pamphlets, forms, papers, designs, drawings, maps, photos, letters, microfilms, computer tapes or discs, rules, regulations or codes."

The Court of Appeals, the State's highest court, has construed the definition as broadly as its specific language suggests. The first such decision that dealt squarely with the scope of the term "record" involved documents pertaining to a lottery sponsored by a fire department. Although the agency contended that the documents did not pertain to the performance of its official duties, i.e., fighting fires, but rather to a "nongovernmental" activity, the Court rejected the claim of a "governmental versus nongovernmental dichotomy" [see Westchester Rockland Newspapers v. Kimball, 50 NY 2d 575, 581 (1980)] and found that the documents constituted "records" subject to rights of access granted by the Law. Moreover, the Court determined that:

"The statutory definition of 'record' makes nothing turn on the purpose for which it relates. This conclusion accords with the spirit as well as the letter of the statute. For not only are the expanding boundaries of governmental activity increasingly difficult to draw, but in perception, if not in actuality, there is bound to be considerable crossover between governmental and nongovernmental activities, especially where both are carried on by the same person or persons" (id.).

Ms. Stacey Kowaleski
Ms. Debra Koss
Ms. Lori Fox
April 13, 1999

In another decision rendered by the Court of Appeals, the Court focused on an agency claim that it could "engage in unilateral prescreening of those documents which it deems to be outside of the scope of FOIL" and found that such activity "would be inconsistent with the process set forth in the statute" [Capital Newspapers v. Whalen, 69 NY 2d 246, 253 (1987)]. The Court determined that:

"...the procedure permitting an unreviewable prescreening of documents - which respondents urge us to engraft on the statute - could be used by an uncooperative and obdurate public official or agency to block an entirely legitimate request. There would be no way to prevent a custodian of records from removing a public record from FOIL's reach by simply labeling it 'purely private.' Such a construction, which would thwart the entire objective of FOIL by creating an easy means of avoiding compliance, should be rejected" (id., 254).

In brief, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law.

Of potential relevance is the Family Education Rights and Privacy Act (20 U.S.C. §1232g), which is commonly known as "FERPA". In brief, FERPA applies to all educational agencies or institutions that participate in funding, loan or grant programs administered by the United States Department of Education. As such, FERPA includes within its scope virtually all public educational institutions and many private educational institutions. The focal point of the Act is the protection of privacy of students. It provides, in general, that any "education record," a term that is broadly defined, that is personally identifiable to a particular student or students is confidential, unless the parents of students under the age of eighteen waive their right to confidentiality, or unless a student eighteen years or over similarly waives his or her right to confidentiality. The federal regulations promulgated under FERPA define the phrase "personally identifiable information" to include:

- "(a) The student's name;
- (b) The name of the student's parents or other family member;
- (c) The address of the student or student's family;
- (d) A personal identifier, such as the student's social security number or student number;
- (e) A list of personal characteristics that would make the student's identity easily traceable; or
- (f) Other information that would make the student's identity easily traceable" (34 CFR Section 99.3).

Ms. Stacey Kowaleski
Ms. Debra Koss
Ms. Lori Fox
April 13, 1999

Based upon the foregoing, references to students' names or other aspects of records that would make a student's identity easily traceable must in my view be withheld from the public in order to comply with federal law.

If the survey did not include names, I would conjecture that most would not have contained information personally identifiable to a student. In those situations, I believe that the survey responses would be available in their entirety and could be inspected pursuant to the Freedom of Information Law by any person.

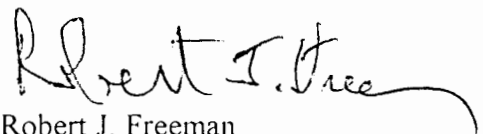

In the rare instances in which a survey response contains information that is personally identifiable to a student, the District, in my opinion, would be required to delete those portions, while disclosing the remainder. In that situation, since you would not have the right to inspect the survey responses, the District could charge a fee of up to twenty-five cents per photocopy, and photocopies could be made available after having deleted those portions identifiable to students.

I note that the Freedom of Information Law pertains to existing records and that §89(3) states in part that an agency is not required to create a record in response to a request. Therefore, if no total or figure has been tabulated by the District regarding the number of survey responses, it would not be required to prepare a total on your behalf. Nevertheless, in conjunction with the preceding commentary, I believe that you would have the ability to review each survey response in whole or in part and that you could, based upon such a review, prepare your own total.

In an effort to enhance compliance with and understanding of applicable law, copies of this opinion will be forwarded to School District officials.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

The staff of the Committee on Open Government is authorized to issue advisory opinions. The ensuing staff advisory opinion is based solely upon the information presented in your correspondence.

Dear Ms. Shepard:

As you are aware, I have received a variety of correspondence concerning your efforts in gaining access to records of the Office of the President of the Borough of Queens. You have sought guidance concerning delays in granting access to records.

In this regard, the Freedom of Information Law provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies must respond to requests. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

"Each entity subject to the provisions of this article, within five business days of the receipt of a written request for a record reasonably described, shall make such record available to the person requesting it, deny such request in writing or furnish a written acknowledgement of the receipt of such request and a statement of the approximate date when such request will be granted or denied..."

If neither a response to a request nor an acknowledgement of the receipt of a request is given within five business days, or if an agency delays responding for an unreasonable time after it acknowledges that a request has been received, a request may, in my opinion, be considered to have been constructively denied. In such a circumstance, I believe that the denial may be appealed in accordance with §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law. That provision states in relevant part that:

"...any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive, or governing body,

Ms. Joyce Shepard
April 14, 1999

who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

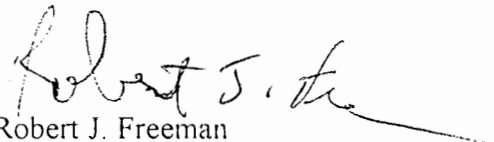

In addition, it has been held that when an appeal is made but a determination is not rendered within ten business days of the receipt of the appeal as required under §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, the appellant has exhausted his or her administrative remedies and may initiate a challenge to a constructive denial of access under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Rules [Floyd v. McGuire, 87 AD 2d 388, appeal dismissed 57 NY 2d 774 (1982)].

I note that although an agency must grant access to records, deny access or acknowledge the receipt of a request within five business days, when such acknowledgement is given, there is no precise time period within which an agency must grant or deny access to records. The time needed to do so may be dependent upon the volume of a request, the possibility that other requests have been made, the necessity to conduct legal research, the search and retrieval techniques used to locate the records and the like. In short, when an agency acknowledges the receipt of a request because more than five business days may be needed to grant or deny a request, so long as it provides an approximate date indicating when the request will be granted or denied, and that date is reasonable in view of the attendant circumstances, I believe that the agency would be acting in compliance with law.

In my view, every law must be implemented in a manner that gives reasonable effect to its intent, and I point out that in its statement of legislative intent, §84 of the Freedom of Information Law states that "it is incumbent upon the state and its localities to extend public accountability wherever and whenever feasible." Therefore, if records are clearly available to the public under the Freedom of Information Law, or if they are readily retrievable, there may be no basis for a lengthy delay in disclosure.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Robert J. Freeman

[REDACTED]

Dear Ms. Peyraud:

I have received your undated letter, which reached this office on March 29. You indicated that you are an employee of the Chappaqua Public Library, a school district library, and that the Library Director has refused to release salary information to you and others. You added that the Director believes that "he is well within his rights to do so and says that the Library Board of Directors fully supports him in his refusal." You have asked that I describe the operation of the Freedom of Information Law concerning the issue to the Director and the Board of Trustees.

In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First, the Freedom of Information Law pertains to agency records, and §86(3) of that statute defines the term "agency" to mean:

"any state or municipal department, board, bureau, division, commission, committee, public authority, public corporation, council, office or other governmental entity performing a governmental or proprietary function for the state or any one or more municipalities thereof, except the judiciary or the state legislature."

Based on the foregoing, a school district public library is clearly a governmental entity constituting an "agency" required to comply with the Freedom of Information Law.

Second, as a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law.

Of significance is §87(2)(g), which permits an agency to withhold records that:

"are inter-agency or intra-agency materials which are not:

- i. statistical or factual tabulations or data;
- ii. instructions to staff that affect the public;
- iii. final agency policy or determinations; or
- iv. external audits, including but not limited to audits performed by the comptroller and the federal government..."

It is noted that the language quoted above contains what in effect is a double negative. While inter-agency or intra-agency materials may be withheld, portions of such materials consisting of statistical or factual information, instructions to staff that affect the public, final agency policy or determinations or external audits must be made available, unless a different ground for denial could appropriately be asserted. Concurrently, those portions of inter-agency or intra-agency materials that are reflective of opinion, advice, recommendation and the like could in my view be withheld.

The information of your interest, the names, titles and salaries of employees, is factual in nature and, therefore, accessible under §87(2)(g)(i), unless a different exception may be asserted. For reasons to be discussed later, no such exception exists.

Third, although somewhat tangential to the matter, I point out that, with certain exceptions, the Freedom of Information Law does not require an agency to create records. Section 89(3) of the Law states in relevant part that:

"Nothing in this article [the Freedom of Information Law] shall be construed to require any entity to prepare any record not in possession or maintained by such entity except the records specified in subdivision three of section eighty-seven..."

Next and perhaps most significantly, a payroll list of employees is included among the records required to be kept pursuant to "subdivision three of section eighty-seven" of the Law. Specifically, that provision states in relevant part that:

"Each agency shall maintain...

(b) a record setting forth the name, public office address, title and salary of every officer or employee of the agency... "

As such, a payroll record that identifies all officers or employees by name, public office address, title and salary must be prepared to comply with the Freedom of Information Law. Moreover, I believe that the payroll record and other related records identifying employees and their salaries, as well as attendance records, must be disclosed.

Ms. Elizabeth Peyraud
April 15, 1999

Of relevance is §87(2)(b), which permits an agency to withhold record or portions of records when disclosure would result in "an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy." However, payroll information has been found by the courts to be available [see e.g., Miller v. Village of Freeport, 379 NYS 2d 517, 51 AD 2d 765, (1976); Gannett Co. v. County of Monroe, 59 AD 2d 309 (1977), aff'd 45 NYS 2d 954 (1978)]. In Gannett, supra, the Court of Appeals held that the identities of former employees laid off due to budget cuts, as well as current employees, should be made available. In addition, this Committee has advised and the courts have upheld the notion that records that are relevant to the performance of the official duties of public employees are generally available, for disclosure in such instances would result in a permissible as opposed to an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy [Gannett, supra; Capital Newspapers v. Burns, 109 AD 2d 292, aff'd 67 NY 2d 562 (1986); Steinmetz v. Board of Education, East Moriches, Sup. Ct., Suffolk Cty., NYLJ, October 30, 1980; Farrell v. Village Board of Trustees, 372 NYS 2d 905 (1975); and Montes v. State, 406 NYS 664 (Court of Claims 1978)]. As stated prior to the enactment of the Freedom of Information Law, payroll records:

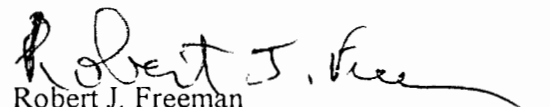

"...represent important fiscal as well as operational information. The identity of the employees and their salaries are vital statistics kept in the proper recordation of departmental functioning and are the primary sources of protection against employment favoritism. They are subject therefore to inspection" Winston v. Mangan, 338 NYS 2d 654, 664 (1972)].

In short, it is clear in my opinion that a record identifying agency employees by name, public office address, title and salary must be maintained and made available.

As you requested, copies of this response will be forwarded to those identified in your correspondence.

I hope that the foregoing serves to enhance compliance with and understanding of the Freedom of Information Law and that I have been of assistance.

Dear Mrs. Goodwin:

I have received your letter of March 25 and the materials attached to it. You have sought guidance in relation to your efforts in obtaining information from the Town of Chili.

Based on a review of your request, it appears that you misunderstand the Freedom of Information Law, and I note that the title of that statute may be somewhat misleading. In short, it is not a vehicle that requires the disclosure of information per se; rather, it is a vehicle that pertains to rights of access to existing records. Similarly, while the Freedom of Information Law may require an agency to disclose records, it does not require that an agency provide information or answers in response to questions.

In the future, rather than seeking answers to questions as in the case of your request of January 13, it is suggested that you seek existing records.

I hope that the foregoing serves to clarify your understanding of the Freedom of Information Law and that I have been of assistance.

Subject: Employment records pertaining to a deceased parent

Dear Ms. Sutton:

I have received your communication in which you questioned your right to obtain records concerning rights of the son or daughter of a deceased to obtain the deceased's employment records from a public school district in New York.

In this regard, as you may be aware, the Freedom of Information Law pertains to agency records. A school district is clearly an agency, and any information in any physical form that it maintains would constitute an "agency record."

As a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based on a presumption of access; all records are available, except to the extent that one or more grounds for denial appearing in section 87(2) of the law may be asserted. Some aspects of employment or personnel records are accessible to the general public; others might justifiably be withheld. To obtain additional information on the subject through our website, you can review opinions referenced in the FOI Advisory Opinion Index under the headings of "Personnel records" and "Privacy, public employee."

Some elements of employee records may ordinarily be withheld on the ground that disclosure would result in an "unwarranted invasion of personal privacy" pursuant to section 87(2)(b). For instance, an employee's social security number or, in the context of your inquiry, date of birth, could be withheld under that provision. However, if, you can demonstrate that you are the next of kin of the legal representative of the estate of the deceased, you would have the same rights of access as the subject of the records when he or she was alive.

If you would like to discuss the matter, you can call me at (518)474-2518.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

TO: Mayor D'Angelis, Village of Elmsford

SUBJECT: Access to Applications for Absentee Ballots

Based on our recent discussion, you indicated that a question has arisen concerning the disclosure of those portions of applications for absentee ballots that specify the reasons for applying.

In this regard, it has been advised that those aspects of the applications may be withheld in appropriate circumstances on the ground that disclosure would result in "an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy" [see Freedom of Information Law, §87(2)(b)] or because disclosure could endanger a person's life or safety [see §87(2)(f)].

For example, if the reason for applying for an absentee ballot involves a medical condition that would preclude a person from voting on the day of the election, I believe that the indication of a medical problem or condition could be withheld as an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy. Similarly, if, for instance, a person seeks an absentee ballot each year due to a vacation schedule or annual family commitment, it has been suggested that disclosure could endanger life or safety, for it could become known that a residence may be unprotected and, therefore, potentially subject to criminal activity.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

P.O. Box 2001
Dannemora, NY 12929-2001

Dear Mr. Nolen:

I have received your letter of March 23 in which you questioned the propriety of a response to your request by the Town of East Hampton.

In brief, having sought records pertaining to the case of Simpson v. Town of East Hampton, you wrote that the receipt of your request was acknowledged and that the Town would grant or deny the request by a certain "March deadline." Nevertheless, in a letter dated March 19, it was stated that:

"This letter will inform you that your request for the above-referenced information has been granted. However, the materials covering your request are fairly voluminous. These materials will have to be vetted by the Town Attorney's office and the office of the Town Clerk for division into privileged and non-privileged information. Once this process is complete, the Town will be able to provide you with the non-privileged information and a better estimate of copying and associated charges for which you will be responsible."

It is your view that the Town has delayed disclosure in a manner inconsistent with law and that the statement that the request had been granted, but only after appropriate redactions, represents a contradiction.

In this regard, I offer the following comments.

Mr. Wallace S. Nolen

April 19, 1999

First, the Freedom of Information Law provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies must respond to requests for records. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

"Each entity subject to the provisions of this article, within five business days of the receipt of a written request for a record reasonably described, shall make such record available to the person requesting it, deny such request in writing or furnish a written acknowledgement of the receipt of such request and a statement of the approximate date when such request will be granted or denied..."

If neither a response to a request nor an acknowledgement of the receipt of a request is given within five business days, or if an agency delays responding for an unreasonable time after it acknowledges that a request has been received, a request may, in my opinion, be considered to have been constructively denied. In such a circumstance, I believe that the denial may be appealed in accordance with §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law. That provision states in relevant part that:

"...any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive, or governing body, who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

In addition, it has been held that when an appeal is made but a determination is not rendered within ten business days of the receipt of the appeal as required under §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, the appellant has exhausted his or her administrative remedies and may initiate a challenge to a constructive denial of access under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Rules [Floyd v. McGuire, 87 AD 2d 388, appeal dismissed 57 NY 2d 774 (1982)].

Second, as you are aware, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law. The first ground for denial, §87(2)(a), pertains to records that "are specifically exempted from disclosure by state or federal statute." From my perspective, although §3101(c) and (d) of the CPLR authorize confidentiality regarding, respectively, the work product of an attorney and material prepared for litigation, those kinds of records remain confidential in my opinion only so long as they are not disclosed to an adversary or a filed with a court, for example. I do not believe that materials that are served upon or shared with an adversary could be characterized as confidential or exempt from disclosure.

Section 3101 pertains disclosure in a context related to litigation, and subdivision (a) reflects the general principle that "[t]here shall be full disclosure of all matter material and necessary in the prosecution or defense of an action..." The Advisory Committee Notes pertaining to §3101 state that the intent is "to facilitate disclosure before trial of the facts bearing on a case while limiting the possibilities of abuse." The prevention of "abuse" is considered in the remaining provisions of §3101, which describe narrow limitations on disclosure. One of those limitations, §3101(c), states that "[t]he work product of an attorney shall not be obtainable." The other provision at issue pertains to material prepared for litigation, and §3101(d)(2) states in relevant part that:

"materials otherwise discoverable under subdivision (a) of this section and prepared in anticipation of litigation or for trial by or for another party, or by or for the other party's representative (including an attorney, consultant, surety, indemnitor, insurer or agent), may be obtained only upon a showing that the party seeking discovery has substantial need of the materials in the preparation of the case and is unable without undue hardship to obtain the substantial equivalent of the materials by other means. In ordering discovery of the materials when the required showing has been made, the court shall protect against disclosure of the mental impressions, conclusions, opinions or legal theories of an attorney or other representative of a party concerning the litigation."

Both of those provisions are intended to shield from an adversary records that would result in a strategic advantage or disadvantage, as the case may be. Reliance on both in the context of a request made under the Freedom of Information Law is in my view dependent upon a finding that the records have not been disclosed, particularly to an adversary. In a decision in which it was determined that records could justifiably be withheld as attorney work product, the "disputed documents" were "clearly work product documents which contain the opinions, reflections and thought process of partners and associates" of a law firm "which have not been communicated or shown to individuals outside of that law firm" [Estate of Johnson, 538 NYS 2d 173 (1989)].

In another decision, the relationship between the attorney-privilege as codified in §4503 of the CPLR and the ability to withhold the work product of an attorney was discussed, and it was found that:

"The attorney-client privilege requires some showing that the subject information was disclosed in a confidential communication to an attorney for the purpose of obtaining legal advice (Matter of Priest v. Hennessy, 51 N.Y.2d 62, 68-69, 431 N.Y.S.2d 511, 409 N.E.2d 983). The work-product privilege requires an attorney affidavit showing that the information was generated by an attorney for the purpose of litigation (see, Warren v. New York City Tr. Auth., 34 A.D.2d 749, 310 N.Y.S.2d 277). The burden of satisfying each element of the privilege falls on the party asserting it (Priest v. Hennessy, supra, 51 N.Y.2d at 69, 431 N.Y.S. 2d 511, 409 N.E.2d 983), and conclusory assertions will not suffice (Witt v. Triangle Steel Prods. Corp., 103 A.D.2d 742, 477 N.Y.S.2d 210)" [Coastal Oil New York, Inc. v. Peck, [184 AD 2d 241 (1992)].

Mr. Wallace S. Nolen
April 19, 1999

In a discussion of the parameters of the attorney-client relationship and the conditions precedent to its initiation, it has been held that:

"In general, 'the privilege applies only if (1) the asserted holder of the privilege is or sought to become a client; (2) the person to whom the communication was made (a) is a member of the bar of a court, or his subordinate and (b) in connection with this communication relates to a fact of which the attorney was informed (a) by his client (b) without the presence of strangers (c) for the purpose of securing primarily either (i) an opinion on law or (ii) legal services (iii) assistance in some legal proceeding, and not (d) for the purpose of committing a crime or tort; and (4) the privilege has been (a) claimed and (b) not waived by the client'" [People v. Belge, 59 AD 2d 307, 399 NYS 2d 539, 540 (1977)].

In my view, insofar as the records in question have been communicated between the Town and its adversary or have been filed with a court, any claim of privilege or its equivalent would be effectively waived. Once records otherwise subject to the attorney-client privilege or in the nature of attorney work product or material prepared for litigation are transmitted to an adversary, i.e., from the Town to its adversary and vice versa, I believe that the capacity to claim exemptions from disclosure under §3101(c) or (d) or §4503 of the CPLR or, therefore, §87(2)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, ends.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Dear Mr. Brixner:

I have received your letter of March 24 and the correspondence attached to it. Your comments focus on the response to your request by the Assembly Public Information Officer, Ms. Sharon Walsh.

In this regard, it appears that you may misunderstand the Freedom of Information Law as it pertains to the State Legislature. As suggested in my letter to you of February 9, a separate section of that statute governs rights of access to records of the State Legislature. Based on Ms. Walsh's response, the kinds of records that might fall within the scope of your request would consist of constituent correspondence. If that is so, in view of the provisions of §88(2) of the Freedom of Information Law, I believe that your request would properly have been denied.

Additionally, it is noted that the Freedom of Information Law requires entities to grant or deny access to records that they maintain. If, for example, the Assembly does not maintain the records of your interest, it would not be required to acquire them on your behalf. Similarly, §89(3) provides in part that the Freedom of Information Law pertains to existing records and that an agency need not create or prepare a record in response to a request.

I hope that the foregoing serves to clarify your understanding of the matter and that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Subject: FOIL Question -Reply

Good Morning --

There are differences of opinion on the subject, but our view generally has been FOI requests, including the names of requesters, are generally public. Exceptions would involve situations in which the content of a request when coupled with a name would, if disclosed, result in an unwarranted invasion of privacy. For instance, if I am a recipient of public assistance and write to a dept. of social services indicating that I am a welfare recipient and I want the records that the dept. has about me, disclosure would tell the world that I'm poor. In my view, that is nobody's business. On the other hand, if I ask for the minutes of the last city council meeting, the request doesn't disclose anything intimate or personal about me. I think that would be available, for disclosure would not rise to the level of an unwarranted invasion of privacy.

Also, if a request is made by an entity, such as a business, or a person acting on behalf of an entity, i.e., a reporter, I don't see any issue involving personal privacy.

I hope that this helps. If not, please feel free to call or email.

Dear Mr. Sorrentino:

I have received your letter of March 29 in which you requested assistance in obtaining a subject matter list from the Office of the Richmond County District Attorney.

In this regard, the subject matter list represents one of the few instances in the Freedom of Information Law in which an agency is required to create a particular record. Specifically, §87(3) of that statute provides that:

"Each agency shall maintain....

(c) a reasonably detailed current list by subject matter, of all records in the possession of the agency, whether or not available under this article."

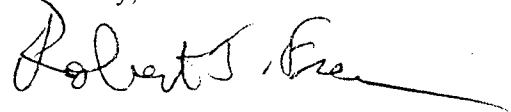

The subject matter list is not, in my opinion, required to identify each and every record of an agency; rather I believe that it must refer, by category and in reasonable detail, to the kinds of records maintained by an agency. Further, although a subject matter list is not prepared with respect to records pertaining to a single individual, such a list should be sufficiently detailed to enable an individual to identify a file category of the record or records in which that person may be interested.

In an effort to enhance compliance with and understanding of the Freedom of Information Law, a copy of this response will be forwarded to the Office of the District Attorney.

Ms. Anita Rubin

[REDACTED]

Dear Ms. Rubin:

I have received your letter of March 29 in which you sought guidance concerning your rights in relation to a request made under the Freedom of Information Law to the Village of Fleischmanns. The records sought pertain to a Village election and focus on a challenge of your vote, as well as challenges to other voters.

In a first response to your request, which was made on March 19 and acknowledged that day, the Mayor wrote that "[n]ormally, FOIL requests can be granted within thirty days" of their receipt and added that you would be contacted if fees for copies are due. In a second response dated March 23, the Village Clerk indicated that some of the information sought would be available upon payment of a fee for copies, and that the remaining information "will take time to compile."

In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First, the Freedom of Information Law provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies must respond to requests. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

"Each entity subject to the provisions of this article, within five business days of the receipt of a written request for a record reasonably described, shall make such record available to the person requesting it, deny such request in writing or furnish a written acknowledgement of the receipt of such request and a statement of the approximate date when such request will be granted or denied..."

If neither a response to a request nor an acknowledgement of the receipt of a request is given within five business days, or if an agency delays responding for an unreasonable time after it acknowledges that a request has been received, a request may, in my opinion, be considered to have been constructively denied. In such a circumstance, I believe that the denial may be appealed in accordance with §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law. That provision states in relevant part that:

"...any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive, or governing body, who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

In addition, it has been held that when an appeal is made but a determination is not rendered within ten business days of the receipt of the appeal as required under §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, the appellant has exhausted his or her administrative remedies and may initiate a challenge to a constructive denial of access under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Rules [Floyd v. McGuire, 87 AD 2d 388, appeal dismissed 57 NY 2d 774 (1982)].

I note that although an agency must grant access to records, deny access or acknowledge the receipt of a request within five business days, when such acknowledgement is given, there is no precise time period within which an agency must grant or deny access to records. The time needed to do so may be dependent upon the volume of a request, the possibility that other requests have been made, the necessity to conduct legal research, the search and retrieval techniques used to locate the records and the like. In short, when an agency acknowledges the receipt of a request because more than five business days may be needed to grant or deny a request, so long as it provides an approximate date indicating when the request will be granted or denied, and that date is reasonable in view of the attendant circumstances, I believe that the agency would be acting in compliance with law.

Notwithstanding the foregoing, in my view, every law must be implemented in a manner that gives reasonable effect to its intent, and I point out that in its statement of legislative intent, §84 of the Freedom of Information Law states that "it is incumbent upon the state and its localities to extend public accountability wherever and whenever feasible." Therefore, if records are clearly available to the public under the Freedom of Information Law, or if they are readily retrievable, there may be no basis for a lengthy delay in disclosure. As the Court of Appeals has asserted:

"...the successful implementation of the policies motivating the enactment of the Freedom of Information Law centers on goals as broad as the achievement of a more informed electorate and a more responsible and responsive officialdom. By their very nature such objectives cannot hope to be attained unless the measures taken to bring them about permeate the body politic to a point where they become the rule rather than the exception. The phrase 'public accountability wherever and whenever feasible' therefore merely punctuates with explicitness what in any event is implicit" [Westchester News v. Kimball], 50 NY 2d 575, 579 (1980)].

Ms. Anita Rubin
April 29, 1999

Further, in my opinion, if, as a matter of practice or policy, an agency acknowledges the receipt of requests and indicates in every instance that it will determine to grant or deny access to records within a particular period following the date of acknowledgement, such a practice or policy would be contrary to the thrust of the Freedom of Information Law. If a request is voluminous and a significant amount of time is needed to locate records and review them to determine rights of access, a delay beyond five business days, in view of those and perhaps the other kinds of factors mentioned earlier, might be reasonable. On the other hand, if a record or report is clearly public and can be found easily, there would appear to be no rational basis for delaying disclosure. In a case in which it was found that an agency's "actions demonstrate an utter disregard for compliance set by FOIL", it was held that "[t]he records finally produced were not so voluminous as to justify any extension of time, much less an extension beyond that allowed by statute, or no response to appeals at all" (Inner City Press/Community on the Move, Inc. v. New York City Department of Housing Preservation and Development, Supreme Court, New York County, November 9, 1993).

Second, I point out that the Freedom of Information Law pertains to existing records, and that §89(3) provides in part that an agency is not required to create a record in response to a request. Several aspects of your request involve "lists" containing certain information. Insofar as lists have been prepared, I believe that they would constitute records subject to rights of access. However, if there are no lists containing the information sought, the Village, in my opinion, would not be required to prepare new records or lists on your behalf.

Lastly, as it pertains to existing records, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Robert J. Freeman

Mr. Warren D. Cuddeback

Dear Mr. Cuddeback:

I have received your letter of March 30 concerning rights of access to a letter sent by the Orange County Department of Personnel to the Supervisor of the Town of Deerpark pertaining to the qualifications of a particular individual to serve as the Town's Chief of Police.

The letter was the subject of an advisory opinion that I prepared at the request of the Supervisor on February 26 in which it was advised that the letter, based on its specific contents, should be disclosed. Notwithstanding that the opinion, the County denied your request, citing §96 of the "Personal Privacy Protection Act" [sic]. In addition, it was contended that my opinion "fails to take into consideration the express statutory exemption for personnel records of a police officer under the Civil Rights Law, Section 50-a."

You have asked that I review the issue and indicate whether I continue to believe that the record in question should be disclosed. I do.

First, the County's reliance on the Personal Privacy Protection Law is misplaced, for that enactment is applicable only to state agencies. For purposes of that statute, §92(1) defines the term "agency" to mean:

"any state board, bureau, committee, commission, council, department, public authority, public benefit corporation, division, office or any other governmental entity performing a governmental or proprietary function for the state of New York, except the judiciary or the state legislature or any unit of local government and shall not include offices of district attorneys."

Mr. William D. Cuddeback

Based on the foregoing, the Personal Privacy Protection Law excludes from its coverage "any unit of local government", such as a county. Consequently, the Personal Privacy Protection Law would not be applicable or serve as a barrier to disclosure of records maintained by a unit of local government [see Seelig v. Sielaff, 201, AD2d 298 (1994)]. Further, for reasons discussed in the opinion of February 26, I continue to believe that disclosure would constitute a permissible rather than an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy. To reiterate, the personal information contained in the letter consists largely of a recitation of positions previously held by the individual in question and the periods of time that he held those positions. Those kinds of items are in my view, clearly public.

Second, I am mindful of §50-a of the Civil Rights Law, which requires that an agency keep confidential those personnel records pertaining to a police officer that are "used to evaluate performance toward continued employment or promotion..." From my perspective, there is nothing in the letter that involves an evaluation of performance. In a recent decision, the Court of Appeals, the state's highest court, sustained a denial of access to reprimands of police officers. However, the Court emphasized that:

"...when access to an officer's personnel records relevant to promotion or continued employment is sought under FOIL, nondisclosure will be limited to the extent reasonably necessary to effectuate the purposes of Civil Rights Law § 50-a - - to prevent the potential use of information in the records in litigation to degrade, embarrass, harass or impeach the integrity of the officer. We said as much in Matter of Prisoners' Legal Services (supra), when after describing the legislative purpose of section 50-a, we expressly stipulated that 'records having remote or not potential use, like those sought in Capital Newspapers, fall outside the scope of the statute' (73 NY2d, at 33 [emphasis supplied]). Thus, in Capital Newspapers v. Burns, we upheld FOIL disclosure of a single police officer's record of absences from duty for a specific month. By itself, the information was neutral and did not contain any invidious implications capable facially of harassment or degradation of the officer in a courtroom. The remoteness of any potential use of that officer's attendance record for abusive exploitation freed the courts from the policy constraints of Civil Rights Law § 50-a, enabling judicial enforcement of the FOIL legislative objectives in that case" [Daily Gazette v. City of Schenectady, ___ NY2d ___, April 6, 1999].

Because the contents of the letter do not evaluate performance, and because a recitations of positions held is "neutral", §50-a of the Civil Rights Law would not in my opinion serve to authorize the County to deny access to the letter.

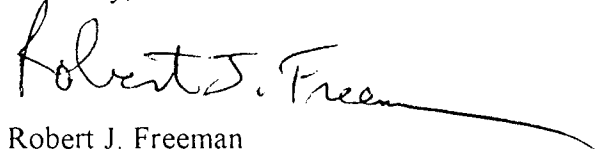

For the reasons expressed above and in the earlier opinion, I believe that the letter of your interest must be disclosed.

Mr. William D. Cuddeback

Dear Mr. Chorba:

As you are aware, I have received your letter of March 25 and the form attached to it.

In brief, you sought access to a database maintained by the State Education Department known as the "Statewide Clearinghouse for Teacher Recruitment." You indicated that your firm "employs teachers in New York State funded schools" and that you "have schools waiting for teachers", including "underserved handicapped children." Upon your firm's request for the database as a recruiter of teachers, you wrote that you were informed that the database is available for use only by public school districts.

It is my understanding that persons identified in the database must complete an "Application for Certificate" in which they include their social security numbers, addresses, dates of birth, and a variety of additional information. The application contains the following statement:

"Please indicate your willingness to have your name, address and certificate title provided to a statewide clearinghouse for teacher recruitment and local school districts who may be interested in recruiting school professionals in your certificate title. This information will be made available on the Internet for persons with approved access."

Following the statement quoted above, an individual checks a "yes" or a "no" box.

The statement indicates that the clearinghouse is to be used "for teacher recruitment and local school districts"; nothing on the form specifies that the data will be provided only to public school districts. Further, those who completed the form and took the affirmative step of marking the "yes" box have in my view consented to have their names, addresses and certificate title made available for teacher recruitment generally, and not only to school districts.

If the form had contained clear language indicating that the information sought would be made available only to school districts, I would agree that the information could be withheld on the ground that disclosure would constitute "an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy" [see Freedom of Information Law, §87(2)(b)]. Nevertheless, unless the language on the form is altered, I believe that the Department would be obliged to disclose the information in question relating to those who expressed a "willingness" to have the information disclosed by marking the appropriate box to any entity that recruits teachers.

Should the Department alter the form to specify that the information is available only to school districts, the items of your interest submitted following the alteration could in my view be withheld. However, the information contained in the database regarding those who have consented to disclosure "for teacher recruitment and local school districts" would in my view remain available to a bona fide recruitment firm or a school district.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Mr. Gavin Hinckson
96-R-4194
Clinton Correctional Facility
P.O. Box 2001
Dannemora, NY 12929

Dear Mr. Hinckson:

I have received your letter of March 28 in which you sought an opinion concerning a denial of your request for "all verbatim transcripts made in connection with an investigation conducted by the Inspector General's office" concerning you and an incident that occurred at a correctional facility.

The records access officer for the Department of Correctional Services denied the request on the basis of §87(2)(e)(iv) of the Freedom of Information Law. You appealed the denial on March 8, and as of the date of your letter to this office, you had not received a determination. You contend that the reports must be disclosed because they "contain factual claims" and because the Department "is not a law enforcement agency and does not conduct criminal investigations" and, therefore, cannot rely upon the provision referenced in the denial of your request.

In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First, I believe that many of the functions carried out by the Department of Correctional Services, including some of those performed by its Inspector General, involve law enforcement. Consequently, the Department may, in my view, rely upon §87(2)(e) of the Freedom of Information Law, which pertains to records "compiled for law enforcement purposes", in appropriate circumstances.

Second, as you are likely aware, §87(2)(e)(iv) indicates that an agency may withhold records compiled for law enforcement purposes when disclosure would "reveal criminal investigative techniques or procedures, except routine techniques or procedures." The leading decision concerning that provision is Fink v. Lefkowitz, which involved access to a manual prepared by a special prosecutor that investigated nursing homes, in which the Court of Appeals held that:

"The purpose of this exemption is obvious. Effective law enforcement demands that violators of the law not be apprised the nonroutine procedures by which an agency obtains its information (see Frankel v. Securities & Exch. Comm., 460 F2d 813, 817, cert den 409 US 889). However beneficial its thrust, the purpose of the Freedom of Information Law is not to enable persons to use agency records to frustrate pending or threatened investigations nor to use that information to construct a defense to impede a prosecution..."

In applying the foregoing to specific portions of the manual, which was compiled for law enforcement purposes, the Court found that:

"Chapter V of the Special Prosecutor's Manual provides a graphic illustration of the confidential techniques used in a successful nursing home prosecution. None of those procedures are 'routine' in the sense of fingerprinting or ballistic tests (see Senate Report No. 93-1200, 93 Cong 2d Sess [1974]). Rather, they constitute detailed, specialized methods of conducting an investigation into the activities of a specialized industry in which voluntary compliance with the law has been less than exemplary.

"Disclosure of the techniques enumerated in those pages would enable an operator to tailor his activities in such a way as to significantly diminish the likelihood of a successful prosecution. The information detailed on pages 481 and 482 of the manual, on the other hand, is merely a recitation of the obvious: that auditors should pay particular attention to requests by nursing homes for Medicaid reimbursement rate increases based upon projected increase in cost. As this is simply a routine technique that would be used in any audit, there is no reason why these pages should not be disclosed" (id. at 573).

While I am unfamiliar with the records in question, it would appear that those portions which, if disclosed, would enable individuals to evade detection or engage in courses of action or conduct that would interfere with or frustrate law enforcement functions could likely be withheld. It is noted that in another decision which dealt with a request for certain regulations of the State Police, the Court of Appeals found that some aspects of the regulations were non-routine, and that disclosure could "allow miscreants to tailor their activities to evade detection" [De Zimm v. Connelie, 64 NY 2d 860 (1985)].

Other grounds for denial of may also be relevant. For instance, §87(2)(f) permits an agency to withhold records when disclosure "would endanger the life of safety of any person." To the extent that disclosure would endanger the life of inmates, staff or others, §87(2)(f) would be applicable. Similarly, §87(2)(b) authorizes an agency to withhold records insofar as disclosure would result in

April 29, 1999
Page -3-

"unwarranted invasion of personal privacy." The nature and content of the records would determine the extent to which that exception, as well as the others, would be pertinent or applicable.

Lastly, §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law states in relevant part that:

"...any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive, or governing body, who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

In this regard, I note that it has been held that when an appeal is made but a determination is not rendered within ten business days of the receipt of the appeal as required under §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, the appellant has exhausted his or her administrative remedies and may initiate a challenge to a constructive denial of access under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Rules [Floyd v. McGuire, 87 AD 2d 388, appeal dismissed 57 NY 2d 774 (1982)].

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

[REDACTED]

Dear Ms. Bright-Neeper:

I have received your letter of April 1. You wrote that you requested from the Orleans County Cornell Cooperative Extension its 1998 annual report, its Form 990, the names of the members of its board of directors, and minutes of meetings. Based on your commentary, there appears to be some question as to whether the entity at issue is subject to the Freedom of Information Law.

From my perspective, it is required to comply with the Freedom of Information Law, as well as the Open Meetings Law, which provides direction concerning minutes of meetings. In this regard, I offer the following remarks.

First, the Freedom of Information Law pertains to agency records, and that §86(3) of that statute defines the term "agency" to mean:

"any state or municipal department, board, bureau, division, commission, committee, public authority, public corporation, council, office or other governmental entity performing a governmental or proprietary function for the state or any one or more municipalities thereof, except the judiciary or the state legislature."

According to §224(8)(b) of the County Law, a county extension service association is a "subordinate governmental agency" whose organization and administration are "approved by Cornell University as agent for the state." As such, I believe that the Cooperative Extension is an "agency" required to comply with the Freedom of Information Law, for it performs a governmental function for the State and, in this instance, Orleans County.

I note, too, that in a unanimous decision rendered by the Appellate Division, it was held that the records of Cornell University pertaining to its four "statutory colleges", arms of the State University of New York, are subject to the State's Freedom of Information Law [Stoll v. New York State College of Veterinary Medicine at Cornell University, 664 NYS2d 851, __ AD2d __ (1997)]. The provision of the County Law cited above refers specifically to the extension service and the "educational programs of the New York State College of Agriculture and Life Sciences and the New York State College of Human Ecology at Cornell University", both of which are statutory colleges.

Similarly, I believe that the board of a county cooperative extension agency is subject to the Open Meetings Law. That statute pertains to meetings of public bodies, and §102(2) defines the phrase "public body" to mean:

"...any entity for which a quorum is required in order to conduct public business and which consists of two or more members, performing a governmental function for the state or for an agency or department thereof, or for a public corporation as defined in section sixty-six of the general construction law, or committee or subcommittee or other similar body of such public body."

Again, due to the direction provided by §224(8)(b) of the County Law, the board of a cooperative extension agency performs a governmental function for the state and a public corporation, Orleans County.

As a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law.

If the annual report that you requested is typical of similar reports, it is likely that it would be accessible under the law. A Form 990, according to IRS rules, must be made available by the entity that prepared it. Consequently, that document would clearly be available under the Freedom of Information Law.

Lastly, the Open Meetings Law includes direction concerning the minimum contents of minutes and the time within which they must be prepared. Specifically, §106 states that:

"1. Minutes shall be taken at all open meetings of a public body which shall consist of a record or summary of all motions, proposals, resolutions and any other matter formally voted upon and the vote thereon.

2. Minutes shall be taken at executive sessions of any action that is taken by formal vote which shall consist of a record or summary of the final determination of such action, and the date and vote thereon; provided, however, that such summary need not include any matter

Ms. Shirley G. Bright-Neeper
April 29, 1999

which is not required to be made public by the freedom of information law as added by article six of this chapter.

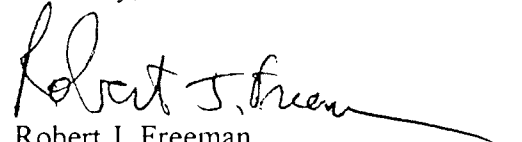

3. Minutes of meetings of all public bodies shall be available to the public in accordance with the provisions of the freedom of information law within two weeks from the date of such meetings except that minutes taken pursuant to subdivision two hereof shall be available to the public within one week from the date of the executive session."

Based upon the foregoing, it is clear that minutes must be prepared and made available within two weeks.

As you requested, copies of this response will be forwarded to those identified in your letter.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Robert J. Freeman

Mr. Ed Piazza
91-B-0099
Drawer B
Stormville, NY 12582

Dear Mr. Piazza:

I have received your letter of March 30 and the materials attached to it. You have sought advice concerning a request for records of the Office of the Onondaga County District Attorney pertaining to your conviction, as well as those relating to your attorney in the matter, who apparently was convicted of tax evasion and suspended from the practice of law.

In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First, as I understand the situation, your request for records of the District Attorney was denied on the ground that the records had previously been disclosed. In Moore v. Santucci [151 AD 2d 677 (1989)] it was found that an agency need not make available records that had been previously disclosed to the applicant or that person's attorney, unless there is an assertion "in evidentiary form, that the copy was no longer in existence." In my view, if you can "in evidentiary form" demonstrate that neither you nor your attorney maintains records that had previously been disclosed, the agency would be required to respond to a request for the same records. I also point out, however, that the decision in Moore specified that the respondent office of a district attorney was "not required to make available for inspection or copying any suppression hearing or trial transcripts of a witness' testimony in its possession, because the transcripts are court records, not agency records" (id. at 680).

Assuming that you can offer such an assertion, the Freedom of Information Law would govern rights of access to the records pertaining to the investigation. I note that some of the items that you requested, such as DDS's and UF-61's, are forms used only by the New York City Police Department.

As a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law. Since I am unaware of the contents of all of the records in which you are interested, or the effects of their disclosure, I cannot offer specific guidance. Nevertheless, the following paragraphs will review the provisions that may be significant in determining rights of access to the records in question.

In considering the records falling within the scope of your request, relevant is a decision by the Court of Appeals concerning "complaint follow up reports" prepared by police officers and police officers' memo books in which it was held that a denial of access based on their characterization as intra-agency materials would be inappropriate.

The provision at issue, §87(2)(g) of the Freedom of Information Law, enables an agency to withhold records that:

"are inter-agency or intra-agency materials which are not:

- i. statistical or factual tabulations or data;
- ii. instructions to staff that affect the public;
- iii. final agency policy or determinations; or
- iv. external audits, including but not limited to audits performed by the comptroller and the federal government..."

It is noted that the language quoted above contains what in effect is a double negative. While inter-agency or intra-agency materials may be withheld, portions of such materials consisting of statistical or factual information, instructions to staff that affect the public, final agency policy or determinations or external audits must be made available, unless a different ground for denial could appropriately be asserted. Concurrently, those portions of inter-agency or intra-agency materials that are reflective of opinion, advice, recommendation and the like could in my view be withheld.

In its analysis of the matter, the decision states that:

"...we note that one court has suggested that complaint follow-up reports are exempt from disclosure because they constitute nonfinal intra-agency material, irrespective of whether the information contained in the reports is 'factual data' (see, Matter of Scott v. Chief Medical Examiner, 179 AD2d 443, 444, supra [citing Public Officers Law §87(2)(g)]). However, under a plain reading of §87(2)(g), the exemption for intra-agency material does not apply as long as the material falls within any one of the provision's four enumerated exceptions. Thus, intra-agency documents that contain 'statistical or factual tabulations or data' are subject to FOIL disclosure, whether or not embodied in a final agency policy or determination (see, Matter of Farbman & Sons v. New York City Health & Hosp. Corp., 62 NY2d 75, 83, supra; Matter of MacRae v. Dolce, 130 AD2d 577)...

"...Although the term 'factual data' is not defined by statute, the meaning of the term can be discerned from the purpose underlying the intra-agency exemption, which is 'to protect the deliberative process of the government by ensuring that persons in an advisory role [will] be able to express their opinions freely to agency decision makers' (Matter of Xerox Corp. v. Town of Webster, 65 NY2d 131, 132 [quoting Matter of Sea Crest Constr. Corp. v. Stubing, 82 AD2d 546, 549]). Consistent with this limited aim to safeguard internal government consultations and deliberations, the exemption does not apply when the requested material consists of 'statistical or factual tabulations or data' (Public Officers Law 87[2][g][i]. Factual data, therefore, simply means objective information, in contrast to opinions, ideas, or advice exchanged as part of the consultative or deliberative process of government decision making (see, Matter of Johnson Newspaper Corp. v. Stainkamp, 94 AD2d 825, 827, affd on op below, 61 NY2d 958; Matter of Miracle Mile Assocs. v. Yudelton, 68 AD2d 176, 181-182).

"However, the Police Department argues that any witness statements contained in the reports, in particular, are not 'factual' because there is no assurance of the statements' accuracy and reliability. We decline to read such a reliability requirement into the phrase 'factual data', as the dissent would have us do, and conclude that a witness statement constitutes factual data insofar as it embodies a factual account of the witness's observations. Such a statement, moreover, is far removed from the type of internal government exchange sought to be protected by the intra-agency exemption (see, Matter of Ingram v. Axelrod, 90 AD2d 568, 569 [ambulance records, list of interviews, and reports of interviews available under FOIL as 'factual data']). By contrast, any impressions, recommendations, or opinions recorded in the complaint follow-up report would not constitute factual data and would be exempt from disclosure. The holding herein is only that these reports are not categorically exempt as intra-agency material. Indeed, the Police Department is entitled to withhold complaint follow-up reports, or specific portions thereof, under any other applicable exemption, such as the law-enforcement exemption or the public-safety exemption, as long as the requisite particularized showing is made" [Gould, Scott and DeFelice v. New York City Police Department, 89 NY2d 267, 276-277 (1996); emphasis added by the Court].

Based on the foregoing, the agency could not claim that the complaint reports can be withheld in their entirety on the ground that they constitute intra-agency materials. However, the Court was careful to point out that other grounds for denial might apply in consideration of those records, as well as others that you requested.

For instance, of potential significance is §87(2)(b) of the Freedom of Information Law, which permits an agency to withhold records or portions thereof when disclosure would constitute "an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy". That provision might be applicable relative to the deletion of identifying details in a variety of situations, i.e., where a record identifies a confidential source or a witness, for example.

Often the most relevant provision concerning access to records maintained by law enforcement agencies is §87(2)(e), which permits an agency to withhold records that:

"are compiled for law enforcement purposes and which, if disclosed, would:

- i. interfere with law enforcement investigations or judicial proceedings;
- ii. deprive a person of a right to a fair trial or impartial adjudication;
- iii. identify a confidential source or disclose confidential information relating to a criminal investigation; or
- iv. reveal criminal investigative techniques or procedures, except routine techniques and procedures."

In my view, the foregoing indicates that records compiled for law enforcement purposes can only be withheld to the extent that disclosure would result in the harmful effects described in sub- paragraphs (i) through (iv) of §87(2)(e).

Mr. Ed Piazza
April 30, 1999

Another possible ground for denial is §87(2)(f), which permits withholding to the extent that disclosure "would endanger the life or safety of any person". The capacity to withhold on that basis is dependent upon the facts and circumstances concerning an event.

In a decision cited earlier concerning a request for records maintained by the office of a district attorney that would ordinarily be exempted from disclosure under the Freedom of Information Law, it was held that "once the statements have been used in open court, they have lost their cloak of confidentiality and are available for inspection by a member of the public" (Moore, supra). Based upon that decision, it appears that records introduced into evidence or disclosed during a public judicial proceeding should be available.

Lastly, with respect to the records relating to your attorney, if indeed there was a conviction, records submitted into evidence in the proceeding would likely be accessible from the court in which the conviction occurred. Additionally, if the attorney was suspended, the records used in a disciplinary proceeding in which there is a finding of misconduct are available pursuant to §90(10) of the Judiciary Law from the Appellate Division that conducted the proceeding.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Ms. Noreen Jacobs

Dear Ms. Jacobs:

I have received your letter of April 3 and the materials attached to it. You have sought an advisory opinion concerning a request for records maintained by the Division of State Police that you made on behalf of and with a consent to release personal information pertaining to a particular individual who appears to have been convicted of a crime. One aspect of the request involves records sought under the Freedom of Information and Personal Privacy Protection Laws for records relating to the investigation; the other involves disciplinary action that may have been taken with respect to State Police personnel.

In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First, the Personal Privacy Protection Law generally grants rights of access to records to a person to whom the records pertain, §95(7) provides that rights of access conferred by that statute "shall not apply to public safety agency records". The phrase "public safety agency record" is defined by §92(8) to mean:

"a record of the commission of corrections, the temporary state commission of investigation, the department of correctional services, the division for youth, the division of probation or the division of state police or of any agency of component thereof whose primary function is the enforcement of civil or criminal statutes if such record pertains to investigation, law enforcement, confinement of persons in correctional facilities or supervision of persons pursuant to criminal conviction or court order, and any records maintained by the division of criminal justice services pursuant to sections eight hundred thirty-seven, eight hundred thirty seven-a, eight hundred thirty-seven-c, eight hundred thirty-eight, eight hundred thirty-nine, eight hundred forty-five, and eight hundred forty-five-a of the executive law."

Therefore, rights of access granted by the Personal Privacy Protection Law do not extend to records of agencies or units within agencies whose primary functions involve investigation, law enforcement or the confinement of persons in correctional facilities. Under the circumstances, I do not believe that you would have any rights of access under the Personal Privacy Protection Law.

Second, in my view, the Freedom of Information Law would govern rights of access to the records relating to the investigation. As a general matter, that statute is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law. Since I am unaware of the contents of the records in which you are interested, or the effects of their disclosure, I cannot offer specific guidance. Nevertheless, the following paragraphs will review the provisions that may be significant in determining rights of access to the records in question.

In considering the records falling within the scope of your request, relevant is a decision by the Court of Appeals concerning "complaint follow up reports" prepared by police officers and police officers' memo books in which it was held that a denial of access based on their characterization as intra-agency materials would be inappropriate.

The provision at issue, §87(2)(g) of the Freedom of Information Law, enables an agency to withhold records that:

"are inter-agency or intra-agency materials which are not:

- i. statistical or factual tabulations or data;
- ii. instructions to staff that affect the public;
- iii. final agency policy or determinations; or
- iv. external audits, including but not limited to audits performed by the comptroller and the federal government..."

It is noted that the language quoted above contains what in effect is a double negative. While inter-agency or intra-agency materials may be withheld, portions of such materials consisting of statistical or factual information, instructions to staff that affect the public, final agency policy or determinations or external audits must be made available, unless a different ground for denial could appropriately be asserted. Concurrently, those portions of inter-agency or intra-agency materials that are reflective of opinion, advice, recommendation and the like could in my view be withheld.

In its analysis of the matter, the decision states that:

"...we note that one court has suggested that complaint follow-up reports are exempt from disclosure because they constitute nonfinal intra-agency material, irrespective of whether the information contained in the reports is 'factual data' (see, Matter of Scott v. Chief Medical Examiner, 179 AD2d 443, 444, supra citing Public Officers Law §87(2)(g)). However, under a plain reading of §87(2)(g), the exemption for intra-agency material does not apply as long as the material falls within any one of the provision's four enumerated exceptions. Thus, intra-agency documents that contain 'statistical or factual tabulations or data' are subject to FOIL disclosure, whether or not embodied in a final agency policy or determination (see, Matter of Farbman & Sons v. New York City Health & Hosp. Corp., 62 NY2d 75, 83, supra; Matter of MacRae v. Dolce, 130 AD2d 577)...

"...Although the term 'factual data' is not defined by statute, the meaning of the term can be discerned from the purpose underlying the intra-agency exemption, which is 'to protect the deliberative process of the government by ensuring that persons in an advisory role [will] be able to express their opinions freely to agency decision makers' (Matter of Xerox Corp. v. Town of Webster, 65 NY2d 131, 132 [quoting Matter of Sea Crest Constr. Corp. v. Stubing, 82 AD2d 546, 549]). Consistent with this limited aim to safeguard internal government consultations and deliberations, the exemption does not apply when the requested material consists of 'statistical or factual tabulations or data' (Public Officers Law 87(2)(g)(i)). Factual data, therefore, simply means objective information, in contrast to opinions, ideas, or advice exchanged as part of the consultative or deliberative process of government decision making (see, Matter of Johnson Newspaper Corp. v. Stainkamp, 94 AD2d 825, 827, affd on op below, 61 NY2d 958; Matter of Miracle Mile Assocs. v. Yudelson, 68 AD2d 176, 181-182).

"Against this backdrop, we conclude that the complaint follow-up reports contain substantial factual information available pursuant to the provisions of FOIL. Sections of the report are devoted to such purely factual data as: the names, addresses, and physical descriptions of crime victims, witnesses, and perpetrators; a checklist that indicates whether the victims and witnesses have been interviewed and shown photos, whether crime scenes have been photographed and dusted for fingerprints, and whether neighborhood residents have been canvassed for information; and a blank space denominated 'details' in which the officer records the particulars of any action taken in connection with the investigation.

"However, the Police Department argues that any witness statements contained in the reports, in particular, are not 'factual' because there is no assurance of the statements' accuracy and reliability. We decline to read such a reliability requirement into the phrase 'factual data', as the dissent would have us do, and conclude that a witness statement constitutes factual data insofar as it embodies a factual account of the witness's observations. Such a statement, moreover, is far removed from the type of internal government exchange sought to be protected by the intra-agency exemption (see, Matter of Ingram v. Axelrod, 90 AD2d 568, 569 [ambulance records, list of interviews, and reports of interviews available under FOIL as 'factual data']). By contrast, any impressions, recommendations, or opinions recorded in the complaint follow-up report would not constitute factual data and would be exempt from disclosure. The holding herein is only that these reports are not categorically exempt as intra-agency material. Indeed, the Police Department is entitled to withhold complaint follow-up reports, or specific portions thereof, under any other applicable exemption, such as the law-enforcement exemption or the public-safety exemption, as long as the requisite particularized showing is made" [Gould, Scott and DeFelice v. New York City Police Department, 89 NY2d 267, 276-277 (1996); emphasis added by the Court].

Based on the foregoing, the agency could not claim that the complaint reports can be withheld in their entirety on the ground that they constitute intra-agency materials. However, the Court was careful to point out that other grounds for denial might apply in consideration of those records, as well as others that you requested.

For instance, of potential significance is §87(2)(b) of the Freedom of Information Law, which permits an agency to withhold records or portions thereof when disclosure would constitute "an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy". That provision might be applicable relative to the deletion of identifying details in a variety of situations, i.e., where a record identifies a confidential source or a witness, for example.

Often the most relevant provision concerning access to records maintained by law enforcement agencies is §87(2)(e), which permits an agency to withhold records that:

"are compiled for law enforcement purposes and which, if disclosed, would:

- i. interfere with law enforcement investigations or judicial proceedings;
- ii. deprive a person of a right to a fair trial or impartial adjudication;

- iii. identify a confidential source or disclose confidential information relating to a criminal investigation; or
- iv. reveal criminal investigative techniques or procedures, except routine techniques and procedures."

In my view, the foregoing indicates that records compiled for law enforcement purposes can only be withheld to the extent that disclosure would result in the harmful effects described in sub- paragraphs (i) through (iv) of §87(2)(e).

Another possible ground for denial is §87(2)(f), which permits withholding to the extent that disclosure "would endanger the life or safety of any person". The capacity to withhold on that basis is dependent upon the facts and circumstances concerning an event.

I note that in a decision concerning a request for records maintained by the office of a district attorney that would ordinarily be exempted from disclosure under the Freedom of Information Law, it was held that "once the statements have been used in open court, they have lost their cloak of confidentiality and are available for inspection by a member of the public" [see Moore v. Santucci, 151 AD 2d 677, 679 (1989)]. Based upon that decision, it appears that records introduced into evidence or disclosed during a public judicial proceeding should be available. However, in the same decision, it was also found that:

"...if the petitioner or his attorney previously received a copy of the agency record pursuant to an alternative discovery device and currently possesses the copy, a court may uphold an agency's denial of the petitioner's request under the FOIL for a duplicate copy as academic. However, the burden of proof rests with the agency to demonstrate that the petitioner's specific requests are moot. The respondent's burden would be satisfied upon proof that a copy of the requested record was previously furnished to the petitioner or his counsel in the absence of any allegation, in evidentiary form, that the copy was no longer in existence. In the event the petitioner's request for a copy of a specific record is not moot, the agency must furnish another copy upon payment of the appropriate fee...unless the requested record falls squarely within the ambit of 1 of the 8 statutory exemptions" (id., 678).

The Court in Moore also specified that an agency "is not required to make available for inspection or copying any suppression hearing or trial transcripts of a witness' testimony in its possession, because the transcripts are court records, not agency records" (id. at 680).

Lastly, with respect to records regarding the discipline of police personnel, relevant is the first ground for denial, §87(2)(a), which pertains to records that "are specifically exempted from disclosure by state or federal statute." One such statute is §50-a of the Civil Rights Law. In brief, that statute provides that personnel records of police and correction officers that are used to evaluate performance toward continued employment or promotion are confidential. The Court of Appeals, the State's highest court, in reviewing the legislative history leading to its enactment, has held that §50-a "was designed to limit access to said personnel records by criminal defense counsel, who used the contents of the records, including unsubstantiated and irrelevant complaints against officers, to embarrass officers during cross-examination" [Capital Newspapers v. Burns, 67 NY 2d 562, 568 (1986)].

In another decision which dealt with unsubstantiated complaints against correction officers, the Court of Appeals held that the purpose of §50-a "was to prevent the release of sensitive personnel records that could be used in litigation for purposes of harassing or embarrassing correction officers" [Prisoners' Legal Services v. NYS Department of Correctional Services, 73 NY 2d 26, 538 NYS 2d 190, 191 (1988)].

Most recently, in Daily Gazette v. City of Schenectady (___ NY2d ___, April 6, 1999), the state's highest court sustained a denial of access to reprimands of police officers, which were final determinations indicating misconduct. In so holding, it was concluded that:

"...the subject of petitioners' request itself demonstrates the risk of its use to embarrass or humiliate the officers involved. Petitioners seek comprehensive access to all records of the disciplinary action taken against the 18 police officers, including their identities and individual punishments, for possibly very serious misconduct. It Matter of Prisoners' Legal Services (supra), we held that '[d]ocuments pertaining to misconduct or rules of violations by correction officers * * * are the very sort of record which, the legislative history reveals, was intended to be kept confidential' (73 NY2d, at 31 [emphasis supplied]). This holding in Prisoners' Legal Services is thus controlling here in favor of confidentiality under Civil Rights Law § 50-a."

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Dear Mr. David:

I have received your letter of March 30, which reached this office on April 5. Enclosed are copies of the advisory opinions that you requested. Please note that several were prepared many years ago and may be out of date.

You wrote that you are involved in research "on the widespread public interest and concern relating to the disproportionate number of stops of minority's [sic] on the highway" and asked how you might seek an advisory opinion from this office.

In this regard, any person may seek an opinion by writing to the Committee, describing a situation (real or hypothetical) relating to a request for records under the Freedom of Information Law, enclosing copies of whatever documentation may be pertinent, and asking for an opinion. As you may be aware, the opinions are not binding. It is our goal, however, that they be educational and persuasive.

In view of the area of your interest, I note that the Freedom of Information Law pertains to existing records, and that §89(3) of the Law states in relevant part that an agency is not required to create a new record in response to a request. If statistics exist that contain the kind of information that you are seeking, I believe that they would be available under the Freedom of Information Law [see §87(2)(g)(i)]. On the other hand, if no such statistics have been prepared, the Division of State Police would not be required to create new records or prepare totals or tabulations on your behalf in order to satisfy a request.

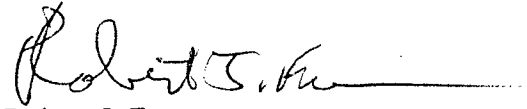

Mr. Charles C. David Jr.

[REDACTED]

Dear Mr. Welka:

I have received your correspondence of April 3.

You have raised the following question: "Is the School District's Grievance File open for inspection regardless whether [sic] the school district or the employee's union filing the grievance pertaining to personnel or the contract."

If I understand the question, the nature and content of records relating to grievances would determine the extent to which they must be disclosed. As a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law. From my perspective, the ground for denial of most significance would be §87(2)(b). That provision enables an agency to withhold records insofar as disclosure would constitute "an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy."

If, for example, a grievance relates to an issue involving a public employee in the nature of a health or medical problem, I believe that identifying details pertaining to the employee could justifiably be withheld. On the other hand, if the grievance does not focus on a particular employee but rather deals with a practice or policy of the District, for example, privacy would not be an issue, and the records in question would likely in my view be available in their entirety.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

P.O. Box 1187
Alden, NY 14004-1187

Dear Mr. Anastasia:

I have received your letter of April 1 in which you complained once again with respect to the treatment of requests for records.

Based on your comments, it appears that your right to gain access to the records, those relating to a hearing, is not the issue, for Counsel to the Department of Correctional Services has confirmed that they should be disclosed. Rather, the issue appears to involve delays in disclosure of the records.

In this regard, the Freedom of Information Law provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies must respond to requests. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

"Each entity subject to the provisions of this article, within five business days of the receipt of a written request for a record reasonably described, shall make such record available to the person requesting it, deny such request in writing or furnish a written acknowledgement of the receipt of such request and a statement of the approximate date when such request will be granted or denied..."

If neither a response to a request nor an acknowledgement of the receipt of a request is given within five business days, or if an agency delays responding for an unreasonable time after it acknowledges that a request has been received, a request may, in my opinion, be considered to have been constructively denied. In such a circumstance, I believe that the denial may be appealed in accordance with §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law. That provision states in relevant part that:

Mr. John Anastasia

May 3, 1999

Page -2-

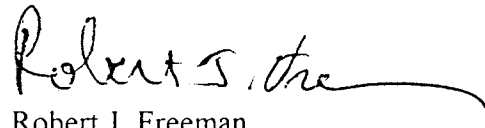

"...any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive, or governing body, who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

In addition, it has been held that when an appeal is made but a determination is not rendered within ten business days of the receipt of the appeal as required under §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, the appellant has exhausted his or her administrative remedies and may initiate a challenge to a constructive denial of access under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Rules [Floyd v. McGuire, 87 AD 2d 388, appeal dismissed 57 NY 2d 774 (1982)].

In an effort to enhance compliance with and understanding of the Freedom of Information Law, a copy of this opinion will be forwarded to the Inmate Records Coordinator.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Mr. William E. Waters

Wallkill Correctional Facility

Wallkill, NY 12589-0286

Dear Mr. Waters:

I have received your letter of April 1 in which you requested an advisory opinion. The issue involves a request made to the Office of the Kings County District Attorney for copies of any "recommendation letters to the Division of Parole regarding whether or not [you] should be paroled."

In my view, either agency that is a party to the communication, the office of a district attorney or the Division of Parole, would have the authority to deny access to the kind of records that you described.

As a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law.

Pertinent is §87(2)(g), which permits an agency to withhold records that:

"are inter-agency or intra-agency materials which are not:

- i. statistical or factual tabulations or data;
- ii. instructions to staff that affect the public;
- iii. final agency policy or determinations; or
- iv. external audits, including but not limited to audits performed by the comptroller and the federal government..."

Mr. William E. Waters

Page -2-

It is noted that the language quoted above contains what in effect is a double negative. While inter-agency or intra-agency materials may be withheld, portions of such materials consisting of statistical or factual information, instructions to staff that affect the public, final agency policy or determinations or external audits must be made available, unless a different ground for denial could appropriately be asserted. Concurrently, those portions of inter-agency or intra-agency materials that are reflective of opinion, advice, recommendation and the like could in my view be withheld.

In short, I believe that a recommendation communicated by one agency to another could be withheld under the provision cited above.

I hope that the foregoing serves to clarify your understanding of the matter and that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Mr. Norman I. Siegel
County Attorney
County of Oneida County Court House
Utica, NY 13503

Dear Mr. Siegel:

I have anonymously received a copy of an article published by the Rome Sentinel on March 22 in which you criticized my comments concerning a rule adopted by Oneida County that would, in the words of the article, "rule out the use of letters for people requesting documents under the state's Freedom of Information Law." The article indicated that those seeking records must "use a form provided by the County Clerk's office", and that "[i]f people send a letter, they will get the form back in the mail. They must fill that out and send it in."

In this regard, as you may be aware, the Committee on Open Government was created by the enactment of the Freedom of Information Law in 1974. In brief, pursuant to §89(1) of that statute, the Committee is charged with the responsibility of offering advice and opinions pertaining to the Freedom of Information Law to any person or agency. While the opinions are not binding, it our goal that they be educational and persuasive, and that they serve to enhance compliance with and understanding of the law.

With respect to the issue referenced in the article, by way of background, §89(1) of the Freedom of Information Law requires the Committee on Open Government to promulgate regulations concerning the procedural implementation of that statute (21 NYCRR Part 1401). In turn, §87(1) requires the governing body of a public corporation to adopt rules and regulations consistent those promulgated by the Committee and with the Freedom of Information Law. Further, §1401.2 of the regulations provides in part that:

"(a) The governing body of a public corporation and the head of an executive agency or governing body of other agencies shall be responsible for insuring compliance with the regulations herein, and shall designate one or more persons as records access officer by name or by specific job title and business address, who shall have the duty of coordinating agency response to public requests for access to records.”

May 3, 1999

In my view, an agency cannot require that a request be made on a prescribed form. The Freedom of Information Law, §89(3), as well as the regulations promulgated by the Committee (§1401.5), require that an agency respond to a request that reasonably describes the record sought within five business days of the receipt of a request. Further, the regulations indicate that "an agency may require that a request be made in writing or may make records available upon oral request" [§1401.5(a)]. As such, neither the Law nor the regulations refer to, require or authorize the use of standard forms. Accordingly, it has consistently been advised that any written request that reasonably describes the records sought should suffice.

It has also been advised that a failure to complete a form prescribed by an agency cannot serve to delay a response or deny a request for records. A delay due to a failure to use a prescribed form might result in an inconsistency with the time limitations imposed by the Freedom of Information Law. For example, assume that an individual requests a record in writing from an agency and that the agency responds by directing that a standard form must be submitted. By the time the individual submits the form, and the agency processes and responds to the request, it is probable that more than five business days would have elapsed, particularly if a form is sent by mail and returned to the agency by mail. Therefore, to the extent that an agency's response granting, denying or acknowledging the receipt of a request is given more than five business days following the initial receipt of the written request, the agency, in my opinion, would have failed to comply with the provisions of the Freedom of Information Law.

While the Law does not preclude an agency from developing a standard form, as suggested earlier, I do not believe that a failure to use such a form can be used to delay a response to a written request for records reasonably described beyond the statutory period. However, a standard form may, in my opinion, be utilized so long as it does not prolong the time limitations discussed above. For instance, a standard form could be completed by a requester while his or her written request is timely processed by the agency. In addition, an individual who appears at a government office and makes an oral request for records could be asked to complete the standard form as his or her written request.

In sum, it is my opinion that the use of standard forms is inappropriate to the extent that is unnecessarily serves to delay a response to or deny a request for records.

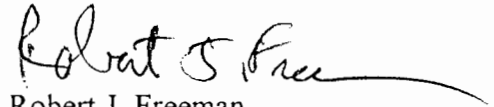

Enclosed are copies of the regulations promulgated by the Committee, as well as model regulations that enable agencies to adopt appropriate regulations by filling in the blanks.

If you would like to discuss the matter, please feel free to contact me.

Mr. Joseph Santos Goncalves, Jr.

P.O. Box 149
Attica, NY 14011-0149

Dear Mr. Goncalves:

I have received your letter of April 3 and the materials attached to it. You have complained that the Superintendent at your facility failed to respond to your request for certain records in a timely manner. The records sought include a medical report of your injuries allegedly incurred due to an assault by a corrections officer, photographs of your injuries, and the officer's "record denying the above allegations."

In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First, the Freedom of Information Law provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies must respond to requests. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

"Each entity subject to the provisions of this article, within five business days of the receipt of a written request for a record reasonably described, shall make such record available to the person requesting it, deny such request in writing or furnish a written acknowledgement of the receipt of such request and a statement of the approximate date when such request will be granted or denied..."

If neither a response to a request nor an acknowledgement of the receipt of a request is given within five business days, or if an agency delays responding for an unreasonable time after it acknowledges that a request has been received, a request may, in my opinion, be considered to have been constructively denied. In such a circumstance, I believe that the denial may be appealed in accordance with §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law. That provision states in relevant part that:

Mr. Joseph Santos Goncalves

May 3, 1999

Page -2-

"...any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive, or governing body, who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

In addition, it has been held that when an appeal is made but a determination is not rendered within ten business days of the receipt of the appeal as required under §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, the appellant has exhausted his or her administrative remedies and may initiate a challenge to a constructive denial of access under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Rules [Floyd v. McGuire, 87 AD 2d 388, appeal dismissed 57 NY 2d 774 (1982)].

For your information, the person designated by the Department of Correctional Services to determine appeals is Anthony J. Annucci, Counsel to the Department.

Second, as a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law. From my perspective, the medical report and photographs indicating your condition or injuries would be available, for none of the grounds for denial would be applicable.

With respect to a record in which the correction officer accused of assault denied the allegations, it appears that a statute other than the Freedom of Information Law would be pertinent. Section 87(2)(a) pertains to records that "are specifically exempted from disclosure by state or federal statute." One such statute is §50-a of the Civil Rights Law. In brief, that statute provides that personnel records of police and correction officers that are used to evaluate performance toward continued employment or promotion are confidential. The Court of Appeals, the state's highest court, in reviewing the legislative history leading to its enactment, has held that §50-a "was designed to limit access to said personnel records by criminal defense counsel, who used the contents of the records, including unsubstantiated and irrelevant complaints against officers, to embarrass officers during cross-examination" (id. at 568).

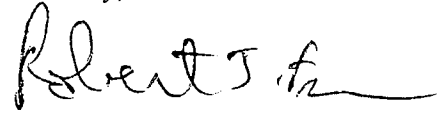

In another decision, which dealt with unsubstantiated complaints against correction officers, the Court of Appeals held that the purpose of §50-a "was designed to limit access to said personnel records by criminal defense counsel, who used the contents of the records, including unsubstantiated and irrelevant complaints against officers, to embarrass officers during cross-examination" (id. at 568). In another decision, which dealt with unsubstantiated complaints against correction officers, the Court of Appeals held that the purpose of §50-a "was to prevent the release of sensitive personnel records that could be used in litigation for purposes of harassing or embarrassing correction officers" [Prisoners' Legal Services v. NYS Department of Correctional Services, 73 NY 2d 26, 538 NYS 2d 190, 191 (1988)].

In short, if my interpretation of the facts is accurate, the record in which the officer denied allegations against him would be exempt from disclosure.

Ms. Karen Rowell

Dear Ms. Rowell:

I have received your letter of March 19, which reached this office on April 8. You have sought an advisory opinion concerning a request for invoices for legal services provided to the East Syracuse-Minoa Central School District during a certain period. You were informed initially that you would be required to submit your request on a prescribed form. Further, in response to the request, you were provided with gross figures, rather than the invoices themselves. It is your view that the invoices should have been disclosed, perhaps following redactions.

From my perspective, the District could not have validly required that you seek records on its form. Moreover, for reasons to be discussed in detail, the invoices should have been disclosed following deletions when appropriate. In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First, by way of background, §89(1) of the Freedom of Information Law requires the Committee on Open Government to promulgate regulations concerning the procedural implementation of that statute (21 NYCRR Part 1401). In turn, §87(1) requires the governing body of a public corporation to adopt rules and regulations consistent those promulgated by the Committee and with the Freedom of Information Law. The Law, §89(3), and the regulations, §1401.5, require that an agency respond to a request that reasonably describes the record sought within five business days of the receipt of a request. The regulations indicate that "an agency may require that a request be made in writing or may make records available upon oral request" [§1401.5(a)]. Neither the Law nor the regulations refer to, require or authorize the use of standard forms. Accordingly, it has consistently been advised that any written request that reasonably describes the records sought should suffice.

It has consistently been advised that a failure to complete a form prescribed by an agency cannot serve to delay a response or deny a request for records. A delay due to a failure to use a prescribed form might result in an inconsistency with the time limitations imposed by the Freedom of Information Law. For example, assume that an individual requests a record in writing from an agency and that the agency responds by directing that a standard form must be submitted. By the time the individual submits the form, and the agency processes and responds to the request, it is probable that more than five business days would have elapsed, particularly if a form is sent by mail and returned to the agency by mail. Therefore, to the extent that an agency's response granting, denying or acknowledging the receipt of a request is given more than five business days following the initial receipt of the written request, the agency, in my opinion, would have failed to comply with the provisions of the Freedom of Information Law.

While the Law does not preclude an agency from developing a standard form, as suggested earlier, I do not believe that a failure to use such a form can be used to delay a response to a written request for records reasonably described beyond the statutory period. However, a standard form may, in my opinion, be utilized so long as it does not prolong the time limitations discussed above. For instance, a standard form could be completed by a requester while his or her written request is timely processed by the agency. In addition, an individual who appears at a government office and makes an oral request for records could be asked to complete the standard form as his or her written request.

In sum, it is my opinion that the use of standard forms is inappropriate to the extent that it unnecessarily serves to delay a response to or deny a request for records.

Second, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law. It is emphasized that the introductory language of §87(2) refers to the authority to withhold "records or portions thereof" that fall within the scope of the exceptions that follow. In my view, the phrase quoted in the preceding sentence evidences a recognition on the part of the Legislature that a single record or report, for example, might include portions that are available under the statute, as well as portions that might justifiably be withheld. That being so, I believe that it also imposes an obligation on an agency to review records sought, in their entirety, to determine which portions, if any, might properly be withheld or deleted prior to disclosing the remainder.

The Court of Appeals, the State's highest court, expressed its general view of the intent of the Freedom of Information Law most recently in Gould v. New York City Police Department [87 NY 2d 267 (1996)], stating that:

"To ensure maximum access to government records, the 'exemptions are to be narrowly construed, with the burden resting on the agency to demonstrate that the requested material indeed qualifies for exemption' (Matter of Hanig v. State of New York Dept. of Motor Vehicles, 79 N.Y.2d 106, 109, 580 N.Y.S.2d 715, 588 N.E.2d 750 see, Public Officers Law § 89[4][b]). As this Court has stated, '[o]nly where the material requested falls squarely within the ambit of one of these statutory exemptions may disclosure be withheld' (Matter of Fink v. Lefkowitz, 47 N.Y.2d, 567, 571, 419 N.Y.S.2d 467, 393 N.E.2d 463)" (id., 275).

Just as significant, the Court in Gould repeatedly specified that a categorical denial of access to records is inconsistent with the requirements of the Freedom of Information Law. In that case, the agency contended that complaint follow up reports, also known as "DD5's", could be withheld in their entirety on the ground that they fall within the exception regarding intra-agency materials, §87(2)(g). The Court, however, wrote that: "Petitioners contend that because the complaint follow-up reports contain factual data, the exemption does not justify complete nondisclosure of the reports. We agree" (id., 276). The Court then stated as a general principle that "blanket exemptions for particular types of documents are inimical to FOIL's policy of open government" (id., 275). The Court also offered guidance to agencies and lower courts in determining rights of access and referred to several decisions it had previously rendered, directing that:

"...to invoke one of the exemptions of section 87(2), the agency must articulate 'particularized and specific justification' for not disclosing requested documents (Matter of Fink v. Lefkowitz, supra, 47 N.Y.2d, at 571, 419 N.Y.S.2d 467, 393 N.E.2d 463). If the court is unable to determine whether withheld documents fall entirely within the scope of the asserted exemption, it should conduct an in camera inspection of representative documents and order disclosure of all nonexempt, appropriately redacted material (see, Matter of Xerox Corp. v. Town of Webster, 65 N.Y.2d 131, 133, 490 N.Y.S. 2d, 488, 480 N.E.2d 74; Matter of Farbman & Sons v. New York City Health & Hosps. Corp., supra, 62 N.Y.2d, at 83, 476 N.Y.S.2d 69, 464 N.E.2d 437)" (id.).

Pertinent with respect to the records that you requested is a decision, Orange County Publications v. County of Orange [637 NYS2d 596 (1995)], that involved a request for the amount of money paid in 1994 to a particular law firm for legal services rendered in representing the County in a landfill expansion suit, as well as "copies of invoices, bills, vouchers submitted to the county from the law firm justifying and itemizing the expenses for 1994" [Orange County Publications v. County of Orange, 637 NYS2d 596, 599 (1995)]. Although monthly bills indicating amounts charged by the firm were disclosed, the agency redacted "'the daily descriptions of the specific tasks' (the description material) 'including descriptions of issues researched, meetings and conversations between attorney and client'" (id.). The County offered several rationales for the redactions; nevertheless, the court rejected all of them, in some instances fully, in others in part.

The first contention was that the descriptive material is specifically exempted from disclosure by statute in conjunction with §87(2)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law and the assertion of the attorney-client privilege pursuant to §4503 of the Civil Practice Law and Rules (CPLR). The court found that the mere communication between the law firm and the County as its client does not necessarily involve a privileged communication; rather, the court stressed that it is the content of the communications that determine the extent to which the privilege applies. Further, the court distinguished between actual communications between attorney and client and descriptions of the legal services provided, stating that:

"Thus, respondent's position can be sustained only if such descriptions rise to the level of protected communications.

"In this regard, the Court recognizes that not all communications between attorney and client are privileged. Matter of Priest v. Hennessy, supra, 51 N.Y.2d 68, 69, 409 N.E.2d 983, 431, N.Y.S.2d 511. In particular, 'fee arrangements between attorney and client do not ordinarily constitute a confidential communication and, thus, are not privileged in the usual case' (Ibid.). Indeed, '[a] communication concerning the fee to be paid has no direct relevance to the legal advice to be given', but rather "[i]s a collateral matter which, unlike communications which relate to the subject matter of the attorney's professional employment, is not privileged' Matter of Priest v. Hennessy, supra, 51 N.Y.2d at 69, 409 N.E.2d 983, 431 N.Y.S.2d 511.

"Consequently, while billing statements which 'are detailed in showing services, conversations, and conferences between counsel and others' are protected by the attorney-client privilege (Licensing Corporation of America v. National Hockey League Players Association, 153 Misc.2d 126, 127-128, 580 N.Y.S.2d 128 [Sup. Ct. N.Y.Co. 1992]; see, De La Roche v. De La Roche, 209 A.D.2d 157, 158-159 [1st Dept. 1994]), no such privilege attaches to fee statements which do not provide 'detailed accounts' of the legal services provided by counsel..." (id., 602).

It was also contended that the records could be withheld on the ground that they constituted attorney work product or material prepared for litigation that are exempted from disclosure by statute [see CPLR, §3101(c) and (d)]. In dealing with that claim, it was stated by the court that:

"Respondent's denial of the FOIL request cannot be upheld unless the descriptive material is uniquely the product of the professional skills of respondent's outside counsel. The preparation and submission of a bill for fees due and owing, not at all dependent on legal expertise, education or training, cannot be 'attribute[d]...to the unique skills of an attorney' (Brandman v. Cross & Brown Co., 125 Misc.2d 185, 188 479 N.Y.S.2d 435 [Sup. Ct. Kings Ct. 1984]). Therefore, the attorney work product privilege does not serve as an absolute bar to disclosure of the descriptive material. (See, id.).

"Nevertheless, depending upon how much information is set forth in the descriptive material, a limited portion of that information may be protected from disclosure, either under the work product privilege, or the privilege for materials prepared for litigation, as codified in CPLR 3101(d)...

"While the Court has not been presented with any of the billing records sought, the Court understands that they may contain specific references to: legal issues researched, which bears upon the law firm's theories of the landfill action; conferences with witnesses not yet identified and interviewed by respondent's adversary in that lawsuit; and other legal services which were provided as part of counsel's representation of respondent in that ongoing legal action...Certainly, any such references to interviews, conversations or correspondence with particular individuals, prospective pleadings or motions, legal theories, or similar matters, may be protected either as work product or material prepared for litigation, or both" (emphasis added by the court) (id., 604).

Finally, it was contended that the records consisted of intra-agency materials that could be withheld under §87(2)(g) of the Freedom of Information Law. That provision permits an agency to withhold records that:

"are inter-agency or intra-agency materials which are not:

- i. statistical or factual tabulations or data;
- ii. instructions to staff that affect the public;
- iii. final agency policy or determinations; or
- iv. external audits, including but not limited to audits performed by the comptroller and the federal government..."

It is noted that the language quoted above contains what in effect is a double negative. While inter-agency or intra-agency materials may be withheld, portions of such materials consisting of statistical or factual information, instructions to staff that affect the public, final agency policy or determinations or external audits must be made available, unless a different ground for denial could appropriately be asserted. Concurrently, those portions of inter-agency or intra-agency materials that are reflective of opinion, advice, recommendation and the like could in my view be withheld.

The court found that much of the information would likely consist of factual information available under §87(2)(g)(i) and stated that:

"...the Court concludes that respondent has failed to establish that petitioner should be denied access to the descriptive material as a whole. While it is possible that some of the descriptive material may fall within the exempted category of expressions of opinion, respondent has failed to identify with any particularity those portions which are not subject to disclosure under Public Officers Law §87(2)(g). See, Matter of Dunlea v. Goldmark, supra, 54 A.D.2d 449, 389 N.Y.S.2d 423. Certainly, any information which merely reports an event or factual occurrence, such as a conference, telephone call, research, court appearance, or similar description of legal work, and which does not disclose opinions, recommendations or statements of legal strategy will not be barred from disclosure under this exemption. See, Ingram v. Axelrod, supra (id., 605-606).

In short, although it was found that some aspects of the records in question might properly be withheld based on their specific contents, a blanket denial of access was clearly inconsistent with law, and substantial portions of the records were found to be accessible.

In the context of a school district's duties, insofar as the records identify or could identify particular students, I believe that they must be withheld. Another statute that exempts records from disclosure is the Family Education Rights and Privacy Act ("FERPA", 20 U.S.C. §1232g). In brief, FERPA applies to all educational agencies or institutions that participate in grant programs administered by the United States Department of Education. As such, FERPA includes within its scope virtually all public educational institutions and many private educational institutions. The focal point of the Act is the protection of privacy of students. It provides, in general, that any "education record," a term that is broadly defined, that is personally identifiable to a particular student or students is confidential, unless the parents of students under the age of eighteen waive their right to confidentiality, or unless a student eighteen years or over similarly waives his or her right to confidentiality. Further, the federal regulations promulgated under FERPA define the phrase "personally identifiable information" to include:

- "(a) The student's name;
- (b) The name of the student's parents or other family member;
- (c) The address of the student or student's family;
- (d) A personal identifier, such as the student's social security number or student number;
- (e) A list of personal characteristics that would make the student's identity easily traceable; or
- (f) Other information that would make the student's identity easily traceable" (34 CFR Section 99.3).

Based upon the foregoing, references to students' names or other aspects of records that would make a student's identity easily traceable must in my view be withheld in order to comply with federal law. Similarly, references to employees involved in disciplinary proceedings when such proceedings have not resulted in any final determination reflective of misconduct could be withheld on the ground that disclosure would constitute "an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy" [see Herald Company v. School District of the City of Syracuse, 430 NY 2d 460 (1980)].

In a decision dealing specifically with bills involving services rendered by attorneys for a school district, that matter involved an applicant ("petitioner") who sought billing statements for legal services provided to the Board ("respondents") by a law firm. Since the statements made available included "only the time period covered and the total amount owed for services and disbursements", petitioner contended that "she is entitled to that billing information which would detail the fee, the type of matter for which the legal services were rendered and the names of the parties to any current litigation". In its discussion of the issue, the court found that:

"The difficulty of defining the limits of the attorney client privilege has been recognized by the New York State Court of Appeals. (Matter of Priest v. Hennessy, 51 NY2d 62, 68.) Nevertheless, the Court has ruled that this privilege is not limitless and generally does not extend to the fee arrangements between an attorney and client. (Matter of Priest v. Hennessy, supra.) As a communication regarding a fee has no direct relevance to the legal advice actually given, the fee arrangement is not privileged. (Matter of Priest v. Hennessy, supra. at 69.)

"There appear to be no New York cases which specifically address how much of a fee arrangement must be revealed beyond the name of the client, the amount billed and the terms of the agreement. However, the United States Court of Appeals, in interpreting federal law, has found that questions pertaining to the date and general nature of legal services performed were not violative of client confidentiality. (Cotton v. United States, 306 F.2d 633.) In that Court's analysis such information did not involve the substance of the matters was not privileged...

"...Respondents have not justified their refusal to obliterate any and all information which would reveal the date, general nature of service rendered and time spent. While the Court can understand that in a few limited instances the substance of a legal communication might be revealed in a billing statement, Respondents have failed to come forward with proof that such information is contained in each and every document so as to justify a blanket denial of disclosure. Conclusory characterizations are insufficient to support a claim of privilege. (Church of Scientology v. State of New York, 46 NY 2d 906, 908.)...Therefore, Petitioner's request for disclosure of the fee, type of matter and names of parties to pending litigation on each billing statement must be granted" (Knapp v. Board of Education, Supreme Court, Steuben County, November 13, 1990).

In sum, as you suggested, the blanket denial of access by the District was inconsistent with the language of the Freedom of Information Law and judicial interpretations of that statute.

In an effort to enhance compliance with and understanding of the Freedom of Information Law, copies of this opinion will be forwarded to District officials.

Mr. Bennett Weiss

[REDACTED]

Dear Mr. Weiss:

I have received your letter of April 8 and the correspondence attached to it.

You have questioned the propriety of a fee sought to be charged by the Newburgh Enlarged City School District for copies of videotapes. You indicated that the District has in the past made copies after you have provided blank cassette tapes. The records access officer, however, wrote that "pro-rated costs for the staff person in the Instructional Television Office to procure a videotape and audiotapes, as well as the replication time required to reproduce the tapes you have requested."

In this regard, §87(1)(b)(iii) of the Freedom of Information Law stated until October 15, 1982, that an agency could charge up to twenty-five cents per photocopy or the actual cost of reproduction unless a different fee was prescribed by "law". Chapter 73 of the Laws of 1982 replaced the word "law" with the term "statute". As described in the Committee's fourth annual report to the Governor and the Legislature of the Freedom of Information Law, which was submitted in December of 1981 and which recommended the amendment that is now law:

"The problem is that the term 'law' may include regulations, local laws, or ordinances, for example. As such, state agencies by means of regulation or municipalities by means of local law may and in some instances have established fees in excess of twenty-five cents per photocopy, thereby resulting in constructive denials of access. To remove this problem, the word 'law' should be replaced by 'statute', thereby enabling an agency to charge more than twenty-five cents only in situations in which an act of the State Legislature, a statute, so specifies."

Mr. Bennett Weiss

Therefore, prior to October 15, 1982, a local law, an ordinance, or a regulation for instance, establishing a search fee or a fee in excess of twenty-five cents per photocopy or higher than the actual cost of reproduction was valid. However, under the amendment, only an act of the State Legislature, a statute, would in my view permit the assessment of a fee higher than twenty-five cents per photocopy, a fee that exceeds the actual cost of reproducing records that cannot be photocopied, (i.e., electronic information), or any other fee, such as a fee for search, employee or clerical time, or overhead costs. In addition, it has been confirmed judicially that fees inconsistent with the Freedom of Information Law may be validly charged only when the authority to do so is conferred by a statute [see Gandin, Schotsky & Rappaport v. Suffolk County, 640 NYS 2d 214, 226 AD 2d 339 (1996); Sheehan v. City of Syracuse, 521 NYS 2d 207 (1987)].

Further, the specific language of the Freedom of Information Law and the regulations promulgated by the Committee on Open Government indicate that, absent statutory authority, an agency may charge fees only for the reproduction of records. Section 87(1)(b) of the Freedom of Information Law states:

"Each agency shall promulgate rules and regulations in conformance with this article...and pursuant to such general rules and regulations as may be promulgated by the committee on open government in conformity with the provisions of this article, pertaining to the availability of records and procedures to be followed, including, but not limited to...

(iii) the fees for copies of records which shall not exceed twenty-five cents per photocopy not in excess of nine by fourteen inches, or the actual cost of reproducing any other record, except when a different fee is otherwise prescribed by statute."

The regulations promulgated by the Committee state in relevant part that:

"Except when a different fee is otherwise prescribed by statute:

(a) There shall be no fee charged for the following:

- (1) inspection of records;
- (2) search for records; or
- (3) any certification pursuant to this Part" (21 NYCRR 1401.8)."

Based upon the foregoing, it is likely that a fee for reproducing an audiotape or videotape would involve the cost of electricity (if that can be determined), plus the cost of an information storage medium, i.e., a cassette.

I note that although compliance with the Freedom of Information Law involves the use of public employees' time and perhaps other costs, the Court of Appeals has found that the Law is not intended to be given effect "on a cost-accounting basis", but rather that "Meeting the public's legitimate right of access to information concerning government is fulfillment of a governmental obligation, not the gift of, or waste of, public funds" [Doolan v. BOCES, 48 NY 2d 341, 347 (1979)].

Dear Mr. Hunt:

I have received your letter of April 6. In brief, you asked whether there is any provision of law that would enable you to "make [an agency] give [you] the documents and pay the fee a little at a time."

In short, there is no such provision in the New York Freedom of Information Law. It is noted that while the federal Freedom of Information Act, which applies to federal agencies, includes provisions authorizing fee waivers, there is no equivalent provision in the New York statute. Further, it has been held that an agency subject to the New York Freedom of Information Law may charge its established fee, even when a request is made by an indigent inmate [see Whitehead v. Morgenthau, 552 NYS2d 518 (1990)].

I hope that the foregoing serves to clarify your understanding of the matter and that I have been of assistance.

Mr. Harvey M. Elentuck

Dear Mr. Elentuck:

I have received your correspondence of April 6. For reasons expressed on several occasions in the past, I will not prepare a new opinion concerning access to observation reports. However, I agree with your inference that the requirements relating to the right to appeal a denial of access to records imposed by Community School District 3 are, in your words, "more restrictive" than the law.

Cirino T. Lombard, Special Assistant to the Superintendent, wrote that "an applicant denied access to records may file an appeal by delivering a copy of the original request, the specific grounds for your appeal and the denial letter to the Chancellor..."

The requirements concerning the ability to appeal a denial of access to records are found in the regulations promulgated by the Committee on Open Government (21 NYCRR Part 1401), which govern the procedural aspects of the Freedom of Information Law and have the force and effect of law. Specifically, §1401.7(e) of the regulations states that:

"The time for deciding an appeal by the individual or body designated to hear appeals shall commence upon receipt of written appeal identifying:

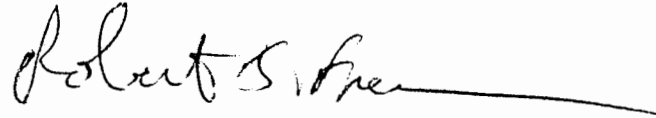

- (1) the date and location of requests for records;
- (2) the records that were denied; and
- (3) the name and return address of the appellant."

In short, there is no obligation to include a copy of an original request when appealing, nor is there a requirement that "specific grounds for your appeal" be expressed. While an appellant may offer reasons in an effort to convince an appeals person or body to overturn an initial denial of access, there is no requirement to do so.

Dear Mr. Winfield:

I have received your correspondence of April 4. You referred to an appeal made under the Freedom of Information Law that had not been answered and expressed the belief that you cannot seek "judicial intervention" because your administrative remedies have not been exhausted.

In this regard, the provision pertaining to the right to appeal a denial of access to records, §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, states in relevant part that:

"...any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive, or governing body, who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

With respect to the issue that you raised, I note that it has been held that when an appeal is made but a determination is not rendered within ten business days of the receipt of the appeal as required under §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, the appellant has exhausted his or her administrative remedies and may initiate a challenge to a constructive denial of access under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Rules [Floyd v. McGuire, 87 AD 2d 388, appeal dismissed 57 NY 2d 774 (1982)].

Ms. Susan Ferraro

Dear Ms. Ferraro:

I have received your letter of April 5, as well as the correspondence attached to it. You have sought an advisory opinion concerning a request made under the Freedom of Information Law to the Village of Fleischmanns.

By way of background, you wrote to the Village Clerk on March 19 and sought a variety of information relating to a Village election conducted on the preceding day. The receipt of the request was acknowledged on March 25, and the Mayor indicated at that time that "[n]ormally, FOIL requests can be granted or denied within 30 days of the above date." On April 1, you were informed that some of the records sought would be made available upon payment of a fee for copies; that others did not exist; that some would be available but "will take some time to compile"; and that in other cases, the village would engage in "researching" requests to determine rights of access.

In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First, it is emphasized at the outset that the Freedom of Information Law pertains to existing records, and that §89(3) of that statute provides in part that an agency is not required to create a record in response to a request. Several aspects of your request involve "lists" of various items. If no lists containing the information sought exist, the Village would not be obliged to prepare new records on your behalf. In the future, unless it is clear that a list has been prepared, it is suggested that you request existing records, i.e., records identifying voters who were challenged.

In a related vein, in order to avoid unnecessary delays in disclosure, when requesting records, I recommend that you specify whether you want to inspect them or have copies. An agency cannot charge for the inspection of accessible records. If you want copies, you might offer to pay a fee of up to a certain amount and to be informed prior to making copies only if the total exceeds that amount.

Second, as a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law. I point out, however, that other statutes may be pertinent with respect to the records that you requested, and that §89(6) of the Freedom of Information Law states that if records are available under some other provision of law, they remain available, notwithstanding an apparent ability to deny access under the Freedom of Information Law.

By means of example, there are many instances in which home addresses may be withheld under §87(2)(b), which permits an agency to deny access to records to the extent that disclosure would constitute "an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy." Nevertheless, in a statute dealing with absentee ballot applications, Election Law, §8-402, subdivision (7) states that:

"The board shall keep a record of applications for absentee ballots as they are received, showing the names and residences of the applicants, and their party enrollment in the case of primary elections, and, as soon as practicable shall, when requested, give to the chairman of each political party or independent body in the county, and shall make available for inspection to any qualified voter upon request, a complete list of all applicants to whom absentee voters' ballots have been delivered or mailed, containing their names and places of residence as they appear on the registration record, including the election district and ward, if any..."

Similarly, §3-220(1) of the Election Law states in part that: "All registration records, certificates, lists and inventories referred to in, or required by, this chapter shall be public records..."

Based on the foregoing, it is clear in my view that absentee ballot applications, for instance, and voter registration lists identifying those who voted, should be readily available.

Lastly, the Freedom of Information Law provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies must respond to requests. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

"Each entity subject to the provisions of this article, within five business days of the receipt of a written request for a record reasonably described, shall make such record available to the person requesting it, deny such request in writing or furnish a written acknowledgement of the receipt of such request and a statement of the approximate date when such request will be granted or denied..."

I note that although an agency must grant access to records, deny access or acknowledge the receipt of a request within five business days, when such acknowledgement is given, there is no precise time period within which an agency must grant or deny access to records. The time needed to do so may be dependent upon the volume of a request, the possibility that other requests have been made, the necessity to conduct legal research, the search and retrieval techniques used to locate the records and the like. In short, when an agency acknowledges the receipt of a request because more than five business days may be needed to grant or deny a request, so long as it provides an approximate date indicating when the request will be granted or denied, and that date is reasonable in view of the attendant circumstances, I believe that the agency would be acting in compliance with law.

Notwithstanding the foregoing, in my view, every law must be implemented in a manner that gives reasonable effect to its intent, and I point out that in its statement of legislative intent, §84 of the Freedom of Information Law states that "it is incumbent upon the state and its localities to extend public accountability wherever and whenever feasible." Therefore, if records are clearly available to the public under the Freedom of Information Law, or if they are readily retrievable, there may be no basis for a lengthy delay in disclosure. As the Court of Appeals has asserted:

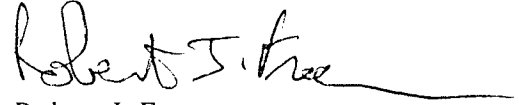

"...the successful implementation of the policies motivating the enactment of the Freedom of Information Law centers on goals as broad as the achievement of a more informed electorate and a more responsible and responsive officialdom. By their very nature such objectives cannot hope to be attained unless the measures taken to bring them about permeate the body politic to a point where they become the rule rather than the exception. The phrase 'public accountability wherever and whenever feasible' therefore merely punctuates with explicitness what in any event is implicit" [Westchester News v. Kimball, 50 NY 2d 575, 579 (1980)].

Further, in my opinion, if, as a matter of practice or policy, an agency acknowledges the receipt of requests and indicates in every instance that it will determine to grant or deny access to records within a particular period following the date of acknowledgement, such a practice or policy would be contrary to the thrust of the Freedom of Information Law. Having reviewed other requests involving the Village of Fleischmanns, it appears that every request, irrespective of its nature, is acknowledged with the same statement. If a request is voluminous and a significant amount of time is needed to locate records and review them to determine rights of access, a delay beyond five business days, in view of those and perhaps the other kinds of factors mentioned earlier, might be reasonable. On the other hand, if a record or report is clearly public and can be found easily, there would appear to be no rational basis for delaying disclosure. In a case in which it was found that an agency's "actions demonstrate an utter disregard for compliance set by FOIL", it was held that "[t]he records finally produced were not so voluminous as to justify any extension of time, much less an extension beyond that allowed by statute, or no response to appeals at all" (Inner City Press/Community on the Move, Inc. v. New York City Department of Housing Preservation and Development, Supreme Court, New York County, November 9, 1993).

Ms. Marcie Haskell
Chair
Trojans for Troy
131 Euclid Avenue
Troy, NY 12180

Dear Ms. Haskell:

I have received your letter of April 14 in which you wrote that you were "surprised" to read my comment that a member of the Troy City Council "acting alone, would have no more authority than a member of the public" when seeking records from the City. You then referred to Section 2.08.1 of the City Charter, which states that: "Any officer of the city is required to furnish reports, information or estimates to any councillor or the City of Troy."

In this regard, I must admit to having been unaware of the City Charter provision at the time my comment was offered. I am also unaware, however, of the intent or legislative history of that provision, and I do not know how broadly it is intended to be construed. Further, while it is the duty of the Committee on Government to offer advice and interpretations relating to the Freedom of Information Law, I do not believe that I can appropriately interpret Section 2.08 of the City Charter.

I note that if the language of that provision is construed literally, the results would likely conflict with law or be unreasonable. "Information" maintained by the City of Troy would include matters involving records that are sealed, others that are confidential by statute, and others, particularly those pertaining to criminal law enforcement or containing intimate personal information, that may be protected for a series of valid reasons. For instance, personnel records relating to employees include their social security numbers; health insurance records may include reference to medical conditions or diseases. I question whether under the City Charter provision, any member of the City Council has the right to obtain all social security numbers or personally identifiable information, perhaps based on curiosity, regarding medical conditions or diseases of City employees and their family members.

When members of governing bodies have requested records, it has generally been advised that if the request is reasonable, that person should not generally be required to resort to the Freedom of Information Law in order to seek or obtain records. However, viewing the matter from a more technical perspective, one of the functions of a public body involves acting collectively, as an entity.

Ms. Marcie Haskell

A governing body of a public corporation acts by means of motions carried by an affirmative vote of a majority of its total membership (see General Construction Law, §41). In my view, in most instances, a member of a governing body acting unilaterally, without the consent or approval of a majority of the total membership of the board, has the same rights as those accorded to a member of the public. In such a case, a member seeking records could presumably be treated in the same manner as the public generally.

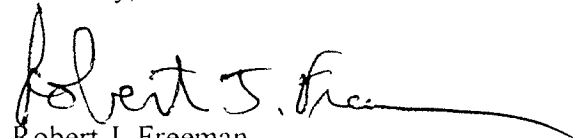

I note that Section 15.07 of the City Charter was also marked. That provision states that: "All books and records of any department in the city shall be public records." In judicial decisions construing similar local enactments, the courts have chosen not to engage in literal constructions of those provisions. For instance, §51 of the General Municipal Law states in general that records of a municipality are available. However, in responding to a contention that §51 requires that all records of a municipality be made available, regardless of their contents, the state's highest court, the Court of Appeals, held in 1985 that:

"Such a result would nullify the FOIL exemptions, which the Legislature - presumably aware of General Municipal Law §51 at the time it enacted FOIL - could not have intended. To give effect to both statutes, the FOIL exemptions must be read as having engrafted, as a matter of public policy, certain limitations on the disclosure of otherwise accessible records" [Xerox Corporation v. Town of Webster, 65 NY 131, 490 NYS 2d 488, 489 (1985)].

Provisions of the New York City Charter reenacted in 1989, §§1058 and 1059, refer to public access to any books and records of City agencies and offices of the borough presidents. Despite the fact that they were enacted following the passage of the Freedom of Information Law, the Appellate Division unanimously determined, citing Xerox, that the exceptions appearing in the Freedom of Information Law were deemed to have been "engrafted" on those provisions [Turner v. Department of Finance of the City of New York, 242 AD2d 146 (1998)].

In short, it is reiterated that I do not believe that I have the authority to interpret the provision of the City Charter at issue.

Sincerely,

Robert J. Freeman

Dear Mr. Wright:

I have received your letter of April 9 in which you raised a variety of issues relating to your requests for records directed to the office of a district attorney.

In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First, 5 USC §552 is the federal Freedom of Information Act. That statute pertains only to federal agencies, and it has no application to records maintained by an office of a district attorney or any other entity of state or local government. If you find a decision rendered under the federal Act that you consider pertinent, certainly you may cite it in an effort to express a point of view or to offer guidance. Nevertheless, the decision would not be binding in New York; the courts would not be bound by the decision when dealing with access to state or local government records. The governing statute in the context of your inquiry is the New York Freedom of Information Law. Although it is similar in structure to the federal Act, the language of the two statutes differs, and the judicial interpretation of the two statutes has been different as well. In short, as indicated in the opinion of April 7, there is nothing in the state law or in any judicial decision involving that statute that would require the preparation of the equivalent of a Vaughn index.

Second, if a response by the office of the district attorney contains errors, if pages are missing, or if there may have been a misunderstanding, rather than considering initiating an Article 78 proceeding, it is suggested that you write to that office and briefly explain the difficulty.

Mr. Bornallah Wright

Third, at the end of the opinion sent to you last month, it was explained that the Freedom of Information Law provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies must respond to requests and appeals, as well as the steps that can be taken if an agency fails to respond to a request or an appeal. It is recommended that you review that portion of the response.

Lastly, I am unaware of the particular records that are maintained by office of district attorneys. However, if you are unsure of the entity that maintains the records of your interest, it is suggested that you seek them from any of the entities that might maintain them. For instance, in addition to the district attorney, a request might be made to a police department. Even though the courts are not subject to the Freedom of Information Law, court records are generally available under other statutes (see e.g., Judiciary Law, §255), and a request might be made to the clerk of the appropriate court.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Mr. P.N. Prentice

[REDACTED]

Dear Mr. Prentice:

I have received your letter of April 10 in which you raised issues in relation to a request made under the Freedom of Information Law to the Hyde Park Central School District.

In a letter of March 11, you requested "a list of the number and use of the classrooms in each school district building as well as any other information which could illuminate the question of alleged overcrowding." As of the date of your letter, you had not yet received a response. Further, you wrote that the Superintendent indicated that "the Law states that the District respond in ten (10) days with either the information and/or an approximation of when the information can presented, providing it is a legitimate request." You questioned the accuracy of that statement.

In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First, the Freedom of Information Law provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies must respond to requests. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

"Each entity subject to the provisions of this article, within five business days of the receipt of a written request for a record reasonably described, shall make such record available to the person requesting it, deny such request in writing or furnish a written acknowledgement of the receipt of such request and a statement of the approximate date when such request will be granted or denied..."

If neither a response to a request nor an acknowledgement of the receipt of a request is given within five business days, or if an agency delays responding for an unreasonable time after it acknowledges that a request has been received, a request may, in my opinion, be considered to have been constructively denied. In such a circumstance, I believe that the denial may be appealed in accordance with §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law. That provision states in relevant part that:

"...any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive, or governing body, who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

In addition, it has been held that when an appeal is made but a determination is not rendered within ten business days of the receipt of the appeal as required under §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, the appellant has exhausted his or her administrative remedies and may initiate a challenge to a constructive denial of access under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Rules [Floyd v. McGuire, 87 AD 2d 388, appeal dismissed 57 NY 2d 774 (1982)].

I note that although an agency must grant access to records, deny access or acknowledge the receipt of a request within five business days, when such acknowledgement is given, there is no precise time period within which an agency must grant or deny access to records. The time needed to do so may be dependent upon the volume of a request, the possibility that other requests have been made, the necessity to conduct legal research, the search and retrieval techniques used to locate the records and the like. In short, when an agency acknowledges the receipt of a request because more than five business days may be needed to grant or deny a request, so long as it provides an approximate date indicating when the request will be granted or denied, and that date is reasonable in view of the attendant circumstances, I believe that the agency would be acting in compliance with law.

Notwithstanding the foregoing, in my view, every law must be implemented in a manner that gives reasonable effect to its intent, and I point out that in its statement of legislative intent, §84 of the Freedom of Information Law states that "it is incumbent upon the state and its localities to extend public accountability wherever and whenever feasible." Therefore, if records are clearly available to the public under the Freedom of Information Law, or if they are readily retrievable, there may be no basis for a lengthy delay in disclosure. As the Court of Appeals has asserted:

"...the successful implementation of the policies motivating the enactment of the Freedom of Information Law centers on goals as broad as the achievement of a more informed electorate and a more responsible and responsive officialdom. By their very nature such objectives cannot hope to be attained unless the measures taken to bring them about permeate the body politic to a point where they become the rule rather than the exception. The phrase 'public accountability wherever and whenever feasible' therefore merely punctuates with explicitness what in any event is implicit" [Westchester News v. Kimball, 50 NY 2d 575, 579 (1980)].

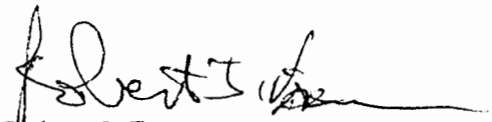

Mr. P.N. Prentice

Further, in my opinion, if, as a matter of practice or policy, an agency acknowledges the receipt of requests and indicates in every instance that it will determine to grant or deny access to records within a particular period following the date of acknowledgement, such a practice or policy would be contrary to the thrust of the Freedom of Information Law. If a request is voluminous and a significant amount of time is needed to locate records and review them to determine rights of access, a delay beyond five business days, in view of those and perhaps the other kinds of factors mentioned earlier, might be reasonable. On the other hand, if a record or report is clearly public and can be found easily, there would appear to be no rational basis for delaying disclosure. In a case in which it was found that an agency's "actions demonstrate an utter disregard for compliance set by FOIL", it was held that "[t]he records finally produced were not so voluminous as to justify any extension of time, much less an extension beyond that allowed by statute, or no response to appeals at all" (Inner City Press/Community on the Move, Inc. v. New York City Department of Housing Preservation and Development, Supreme Court, New York County, November 9, 1993).

Second, it is emphasized that the Freedom of Information Law pertains to existing records, and that §89(3) of the statute provides in part that an agency is not required to create a record in response to a request. Therefore, if there is no "list" containing the information sought, the District would not be obliged to prepare a list that includes those items on your behalf. In the future, rather than seeking a list, it is suggested that you request existing records, i.e., records indicating the number and use of classrooms in each school building.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Robert J. Freeman

The staff of the Committee on Open Government is authorized to issue advisory opinions. The ensuing staff advisory opinion is based solely upon the information presented in your correspondence.

Dear Mr. Capobianco:

I have received your letter of April 12. You have sought guidance concerning delays in response to your requests by the freedom of information officer at your facility.

In this regard, the Freedom of Information Law provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies must respond to requests. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

"Each entity subject to the provisions of this article, within five business days of the receipt of a written request for a record reasonably described, shall make such record available to the person requesting it, deny such request in writing or furnish a written acknowledgement of the receipt of such request and a statement of the approximate date when such request will be granted or denied..."

If neither a response to a request nor an acknowledgement of the receipt of a request is given within five business days, or if an agency delays responding for an unreasonable time after it acknowledges that a request has been received, a request may, in my opinion, be considered to have been constructively denied. In such a circumstance, I believe that the denial may be appealed in accordance with §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law. That provision states in relevant part that:

"...any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive, or governing body,

Mr. Norris Capobianco
May 5, 1999

who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

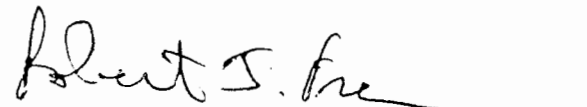

In addition, it has been held that when an appeal is made but a determination is not rendered within ten business days of the receipt of the appeal as required under §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, the appellant has exhausted his or her administrative remedies and may initiate a challenge to a constructive denial of access under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Rules [Floyd v. McGuire, 87 AD 2d 388, appeal dismissed 57 NY 2d 774 (1982)].

For your information, the person designated by the Department of Correctional Services to determine appeals is Anthony J. Annucci, Counsel to the Department.

In an effort to enhance compliance with and understanding of the Freedom of Information Law, a copy of this response will be sent to the freedom of information officer.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Mr. Richard Jannaccio
President
West Flushing Civic Association, Inc.
P.O. Box 7770
Flushing, NY 11352

Dear Mr. Jannaccio:

I have received your letter of April 13 in which you raised a series of issues concerning the implementation of the Freedom of Information and Open Meetings Laws by Community Board 7 in Queens.

According to your letter, until recently, one could "walk into" the offices of Community Board 7 "during business hours, request specific public information and be given it right away." You wrote, however, that the practice has been changed, that individuals are now required to seek records in writing, and that access has been delayed. Further, you indicated that the "the decision to stifle the flow of information was made unilaterally by CB7's Executive Board on March 8, when they usurped authority and shut out the rank and file Board members from voting on the proposed rule change", and that "because the decision was made in a backroom meeting closed to the public, the Executive Board was also in violation of the City Charter, Chapter 70, Sec. 2800, d(3): 'Each community board shall take action only at a meeting open to the public.'" At the end of your letter, you made a series of allegations and accusations concerning the activities and character of Claire Shulman, the Borough President, and you asked that this office "investigate this matter immediately, and take the appropriate enforcement action in order to preserve and protect open government."

In this regard, it is noted at the outset that the Committee on Open Government has neither the authority nor the resources to conduct an investigation. While the Committee has the ability to offer advice and opinions pertaining to open government laws, it is not empowered to enforce those statutes. Additionally, the ensuing remarks focus on the activities of the Community Board, not the Borough President. Her office and her duties are, in my view, separate from those of the Community Board in the context of the issues that you presented.

Mr. Richard Jannaccio

First, notwithstanding past practice, it is clear that an agency, such as a community board, has the authority to require that requests for records be made in writing, and that there is no obligation that an agency respond instantly to a request. While agencies frequently waive the requirement that requests be made in writing and make records available immediately on request, under the terms of the Freedom of Information Law, they are not required to do so. Specifically, §89(3) of that statute states in part that:

Although an agency must grant access to records, deny access or acknowledge the receipt of a request within five business days, when such acknowledgement is given, there is no precise time period within which an agency must grant or deny access to records. The time needed to do so may be dependent upon the volume of a request, the possibility that other requests have been made, the necessity to conduct legal research, the search and retrieval techniques used to locate the records and the like. In short, when an agency acknowledges the receipt of a request because more than five business days may be needed to grant or deny a request, so long as it provides an approximate date indicating when the request will be granted or denied, and that date is reasonable in view of the attendant circumstances, I believe that the agency would be acting in compliance with law.

Notwithstanding the foregoing, in my view, every law must be implemented in a manner that gives reasonable effect to its intent, and I point out that in its statement of legislative intent, §84 of the Freedom of Information Law states that "it is incumbent upon the state and its localities to extend public accountability wherever and whenever feasible." Therefore, if records are clearly available to the public under the Freedom of Information Law, or if they are readily retrievable, there may be no basis for a lengthy delay in disclosure. As the Court of Appeals has asserted:

"...the successful implementation of the policies motivating the enactment of the Freedom of Information Law centers on goals as broad as the achievement of a more informed electorate and a more responsible and responsive officialdom. By their very nature such objectives cannot hope to be attained unless the measures taken to bring them about permeate the body politic to a point where they become the rule rather than the exception. The phrase 'public accountability wherever and whenever feasible' therefore merely punctuates with explicitness what in any event is implicit" [Westchester News v. Kimball, 50 NY 2d 575, 579 (1980)].

If a request is voluminous and a significant amount of time is needed to locate records and review them to determine rights of access, a delay in disclosure, in view of those and perhaps the other kinds of factors mentioned earlier, might be reasonable. On the other hand, if a record or report is clearly public and can be found easily, there would appear to be no rational basis for delaying disclosure.

Second, in my opinion, the Executive Board is subject to the Open Meetings Law, and that entity could not have validly adopted a new policy.

By way of background, prior to its passage, the bill that became the Open Meetings Law was debated on the floor of the Assembly and questions were raised regarding the status of "committees, subcommittees and other subgroups." In response to those questions, the sponsor stated that it was his intent that such entities be included within the scope of the definition of "public body" (see Transcript of Assembly proceedings, May 20, 1976, pp. 6268-6270).

Due to a determination rendered soon after its enactment in which it was held that committees of a board of education were not subject to the Open Meetings Law [see Daily Gazette Co., Inc. v. North Colonie Board of Education, [67 AD2d 803 (1978)]], a series of amendments to the Open Meetings Law was enacted in 1979 to ensure that those entities fall within its coverage. Among the changes was a redefinition of the term "public body", which has since been defined in §102(2) to include:

"...any entity for which a quorum is required in order to conduct public business and which consists of two or more members, performing a governmental function for the state or for an agency or department thereof, or for a public corporation as defined in section sixty-six of the general construction law, or committee or subcommittee or other similar body of such public body."

Although the original definition made reference to entities that "transact" public business, the current definition makes reference to entities that "conduct" public business. Moreover, the definition makes specific reference to "committees, subcommittees and similar bodies" of a public body.

In view of the amendments to the definition of "public body", I believe that any entity consisting of two or more members of a public body, such as a committee or subcommittee consisting of members of a community board, would fall within the requirements of the Open Meetings Law [see Syracuse United Neighbors v. City of Syracuse, 80 AD 2d 984 (1981)]. Further, as a general matter, a quorum consists of a majority of the total membership of a body (see e.g., General Construction Law, §41). Therefore, if, for example, a community board consists of 51, its quorum would be 26; in the case of a committee consisting of nine, a quorum would be five.

When a committee is subject to the Open Meetings Law, it has the same obligations regarding notice and openness, for example, as well as the same authority to conduct executive sessions, as a governing body [see Glens Falls Newspapers, Inc. v. Solid Waste and Recycling Committee of the Warren County Board of Supervisors, 195 AD 2d 898 (1993)].

Mr. Richard Jannaccio

Third, the Executive Board would not have had the authority, in my opinion, to have considered a change in or the adoption of policy regarding the treatment of requests for records in private.

I point out that every meeting of a public body must be convened as an open meeting, and that §102(3) of the Open Meetings Law defines the phrase "executive session" to mean a portion of an open meeting during which the public may be excluded. As such, it is clear that an executive session is not separate and distinct from an open meeting, but rather that it is a part of an open meeting. Moreover, the Open Meetings Law requires that a procedure be accomplished, during an open meeting, before a public body may enter into an executive session. Specifically, §105(1) states in relevant part that:

"Upon a majority vote of its total membership, taken in an open meeting pursuant to a motion identifying the general area or areas of the subject or subjects to be considered, a public body may conduct an executive session for the below enumerated purposes only..."

As such, a motion to conduct an executive session must include reference to the subject or subjects to be discussed and it must be carried by majority vote of a public body's membership before such a session may validly be held.

The ensuing provisions of §105(1) specify and limit the subjects that may appropriately be considered during an executive session. Therefore, a public body may not conduct an executive session to discuss the subject of its choice.

Consideration of policy in relation to requests for records would not have fallen within any of the grounds for entry into executive session, and any person would have had the right to attend a meeting of a public body held to discuss that issue.

Lastly, in my opinion, only the Community Board itself, at meeting during which a quorum is present, and only by means of an affirmative vote of a majority of its total member, would have the authority to alter or adopt policy; the Executive Board in my view does not have had the authority to do so.

Reference was made earlier to §41 of the General Construction Law, and a key element in the implementation of the Open Meetings Law is its relationship to that statute. That provision states that:

"Whenever three or more public officers are given any power or authority, or three or more persons are charged with any public duty to be performed or exercised by them jointly or as a board or similar body, a majority of the whole number of such persons or officers, at a meeting duly held at a time fixed by law, or by any by-law duly adopted by such board of body, or at any duly adjourned meeting of such meeting, or at any meeting duly held upon reasonable notice to all of them, shall constitute a quorum and not less than a majority of the whole number may perform and exercise such power, authority or dy. For the purpose of this provision the words 'whole number' shall be construed to mean the total number which the board, commission, body or other group of persons or officers would have were there no vacancies and were one of the persons or officers disqualified from acting."

Based upon the foregoing, a quorum is a majority of the total membership of a public body, notwithstanding absences or vacancies, for example. Further, in order to carry a motion or take action, there must be an affirmative vote of a majority of the total membership of a public body. In construing §41 of the General Construction Law, it has consistently been found that action may be taken only by means of an affirmative vote of the majority of the total membership of a public body [see e.g., Rockland Woods, Inc. v. Suffern, 40 AD 2d 385 (1973); Walt Whitman Game Room, Inc. v. Zoning Board of Appeals, 54 AD 2d 764 (1975); Guiliano v. Entress, 4 Misc. 2d 546 (1957); and Downing v. Gaynor, 47 Misc. 2d 535 (1965); also Ops Atty Gen 88-87 (informal)]. While a committee of a public body is itself a public body, a committee generally cannot take final action that is binding on the larger body, i.e., a community board. Only the latter could do so.

In an effort to enhance compliance with and understanding of Open Government laws, copies of this opinion will be forwarded to the Community Board and others.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Robert J. Freeman

Mr. Richard Washington

Dear Mr. Washington:

I have received your letter of April 10 in which you asked that I contact the Superintendent of the Woodbourne Correctional Facility to "remind him" of his duty to respond to your request for records made under the Freedom of Information Law. I will do so by sending him a copy of this response.

With regard to the issue, the Freedom of Information Law provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies must respond to requests. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

"Each entity subject to the provisions of this article, within five business days of the receipt of a written request for a record reasonably described, shall make such record available to the person requesting it, deny such request in writing or furnish a written acknowledgement of the receipt of such request and a statement of the approximate date when such request will be granted or denied..."

If neither a response to a request nor an acknowledgement of the receipt of a request is given within five business days, or if an agency delays responding for an unreasonable time after it acknowledges that a request has been received, a request may, in my opinion, be considered to have been constructively denied. In such a circumstance, I believe that the denial may be appealed in accordance with §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law. That provision states in relevant part that:

"...any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive, or governing body,

Mr. Richard Washington

May 6, 1999

who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

In addition, it has been held that when an appeal is made but a determination is not rendered within ten business days of the receipt of the appeal as required under §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, the appellant has exhausted his or her administrative remedies and may initiate a challenge to a constructive denial of access under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Rules [Floyd v. McGuire, 87 AD 2d 388, appeal dismissed 57 NY 2d 774 (1982)].

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Mr. Edmund Galke

Dear Mr. Galke:

I have received your letter of April 15 in which you complained with respect to what you characterized as "the commission of a criminal act by a contractor performing work for the NYSDOT." You indicated that your requests for records directed to that agency and the State University Construction Fund kept at regional offices and job sites have been denied.

You have sought guidance in the matter, and I offer the following comments.

First, it is unclear where or to whom you requested records. In this regard, the regulations promulgated by the Committee on Open Government (21 NYCRR Part 1401) require that each agency designate one or more persons as "records access officer." That person has the duty of coordinating an agency's response to requests. If you have not done so already, it is suggested that you direct requests to the agencies that you believe maintain the records of your interest.

Second, in a related vein, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law requires that an applicant "reasonably describe" the records sought. Therefore, a request should contain sufficient detail to enable agency staff to locate and identify the records.

Third, if a request is denied, the applicant has the right to appeal pursuant to §89(4)(a), which states in relevant part that:

the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

Next, while I am unfamiliar with the records of your interest, I point out that the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law.

Lastly, if you believe that criminal acts have been committed, it is suggested that you contact the appropriate law enforcement agency or perhaps the Office of the State Inspector General.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Ms. Joan McCune

[REDACTED]

The staff of the Committee on Open Government is authorized to issue advisory opinions. The ensuing staff advisory opinion is based solely upon the information presented in your correspondence, unless otherwise indicated.

Dear Ms. McCune:

I have received your letter of April 8 and the materials relating to it. You have questioned the propriety of the deletion of portions of a record made available to you under the Freedom of Information Law by the Office of Mental Retardation and Developmental Disabilities (OMRDD).

In this regard, in an effort to attempt to ascertain whether the deletions were made in a manner consistent with law, I discussed the matter with an attorney at OMRDD. She informed me that all of the deletions involve personally identifying information. If that is so, I believe that the deletions would have been appropriate.

As you may be aware, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law. In my view, either of the two of the grounds for denial may be relevant in the context of the issue presented.

The first ground for denial, §87(2)(a), pertains to records that "are specifically exempted from disclosure by state or federal statute." One such statute is §33.13 of the Mental Hygiene Law, which in subdivision (a) states in relevant part that:

"A clinical record for each patient or client shall be maintained at each facility licensed or operated by the office of mental health or the office of mental retardation and developmental disabilities, hereinafter referred to as the offices. The record shall contain information on all matters relating to the admission, legal status, care and treatment of the patient or client and shall include all pertinent documents relating to the patient or client."

May 6, 1999

Further, subdivision (c) provides that information "about patients or clients reported" to the Office of Mental Health or OMRDD "and clinical records or clinical information tending to identify patients or clients, at office facilities shall not be a public record and shall not be released by the office or its facilities to any person or agency", except in specified circumstances. In my opinion, none of those circumstances would apply in relation to your request.

The other provision of significance, §87(2)(b), authorizes an agency to withhold records insofar as disclosure would constitute "an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy." Additionally, §89(2) states that "an agency may delete identifying details when it makes records available" and includes examples of unwarranted invasions of personal privacy. The second such example pertains to "disclosure of items involving the medical or personal records of a client or patient in a medical facility."

From my perspective, assuming that the deletions involve personally identifying details, they could justifiably have been made under either of the grounds for denial described in the preceding commentary.

I hope that the foregoing serves to enhance your understanding of the matter and that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Ms. Ellen Zimkin

[REDACTED]

Dear Mr. Lucido and Ms. Zimkin:

I have received correspondence from both of you pertaining to requests for records relating to an election in the Village of Elmsford. In brief, you have sought an advisory opinion concerning rights of access to "absentee ballots, absentee ballot requests and copies of signed envelopes."

In this regard, it is noted at the outset that the Freedom of Information Law deals generally with rights of access to government records. In some instances, other statutes deal with particular records and include specific direction concerning disclosure or perhaps the ability to withhold those records. In those latter cases, the statute providing specific direction with respect to the disclosure of particular records prevails over the Freedom of Information Law.

The Freedom of Information Law, in brief, is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law.

As I understand the Election Law, absentee ballots and ballot envelopes are beyond the coverage of the Freedom of Information Law and may be examined only pursuant to court order. Relevant with regard to those records are §87(2)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law and §3-222(3) of the Election Law. The former pertains to records that are "specifically exempted from disclosure by state or federal statute." The latter is such a statute, for it and provides in relevant part that:

Mr. Bart Lucido
Ms. Ellen Gallagher Zimkin
May 6, 1999

“Except as hereinafter provided, packages of protested, void and wholly blank ballots, packages of unused ballots and all absentee and military, special federal, special presidential and emergency ballots and ballot envelopes, if any, opened or unopened, shall be preserved for two years after the election. Except as hereinafter provided, boxes contained voted paper ballots shall be preserved inviolate for four months after the election, or until one month before the next election occurring within five months after a preceding election if such boxes are needed for use at such next election and if the officer or board in charge of such voted paper ballots is required by law to furnish ballot boxes therefor. Provided, however, that such ballot boxes and such packages may be opened, and their contents and the absentee and military, special federal, special presidential and emergency ballots and ballot envelopes may be examined, upon the order of any court or justice of competent jurisdiction” (emphasis added).

Based on the foregoing, absentee ballots and ballot envelopes must be "preserved inviolate", unless a court order is issued authorizing their examination.

There are many instances in which home addresses may be withheld under §87(2)(b) of the Freedom of Information Law, which permits an agency to deny access to records to the extent that disclosure would constitute "an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy." Nevertheless, in a statute dealing with absentee ballot applications, Election Law, §8-402, subdivision (7) states that:

“The board shall keep a record of applications for absentee ballots as they are received, showing the names and residences of the applicants, and their party enrollment in the case of primary elections, and, as soon as practicable shall, when requested, give to the chairman of each political party or independent body in the county, and shall make available for inspection to any qualified voter upon request, a complete list of all applicants to whom absentee voters’ ballots have been delivered or mailed, containing their names and places of residence as they appear on the registration record, including the election district and ward, if any...”

Similarly, §3-220(1) of the Election Law states in part that: "All registration records, certificates, lists and inventories referred to in, or required by, this chapter shall be public records..." Registration records including voters’ residence addresses.

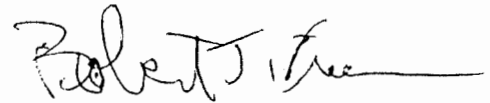

Based on the foregoing, it is clear in my view that the names and address of applicants for absentee ballots and voter registration lists identifying those who voted should be readily available. I recognize that the provisions referenced above involve county boards of elections. However, I am unaware of any provision of the Election Law, Article 15, which pertains to villages elections, that would provide direction to the contrary.

With respect to the content of the applications, I believe that the Freedom of Information Law would govern in determining rights of access. As indicated in a memorandum addressed to Mayor DeAngelis on April 19, portions of those documents might justifiably be withheld. For example, if the applicant includes reference to a medical condition or disability, that portion of the record could in my opinion clearly be withheld as an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Ms. Eleni Hailazopoulos

Dear Ms. Hailazopoulos:

I have received your letter of April 9 and the materials relating to it. You have sought assistance in your efforts in obtaining records from the New York City Police Department, the New York City Department of Parks and Recreation, and the Office of the Queens County District Attorney.

Having reviewed the materials, I offer the following comments.

First, reference is repeatedly made in the materials to the FOIA, the Electronic FOIA and the Privacy Act. Those statutes are federal enactments that pertain only to federal agencies; they are not applicable to the agencies from which you have requested records. While the New York Freedom of Information Law, which is applicable, includes electronic records within its coverage, the requirements imposed by the federal acts to which you referred are not pertinent in the context of your requests.

I note, too, that while the federal Freedom of Information Act includes provisions concerning fee waivers, there is no similar provision in the New York counterpart. Moreover, it has been held that an agency may charge its established fee, even if the applicant for records is indigent [see Whitehead v. Morgenthau, 518 NYS2d 552 (1990)].

The issue of fees may be significant, for you have sought numerous and varied records. In this regard, as you may be aware, as a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law. There often situations in which some aspects of a record, but not the entire record, may properly be withheld in accordance with the grounds for denial appearing in §87(2). In that event, I do not believe that an applicant would have the right to inspect the record.

In order to obtain the accessible information, upon payment of the established fee, I believe that the agency would be obliged to disclose those portions of the records after having made appropriate deletions from a copy of the record. In that circumstance, an agency could seek payment of the requisite fee for photocopies, which would be made available after the deletion of certain details (see Van Ness v. Center for Animal Care and Control and the New York City Department of Health, Supreme Court, New York County, January 28, 1999).

Second, several points were made concerning the ability to obtain information in an electronic form, such as a computer tape or disk. In this regard, as you are aware, §86(4) of the Freedom of Information Law defines the term "record" expansively to include:

"any information kept, held, filed, produced, reproduced by, with or for an agency or the state legislature, in any physical form whatsoever including, but not limited to, reports, statements, examinations, memoranda, opinions, folders, files, books, manuals, pamphlets, forms, papers, designs, drawings, maps, photos, letters, microfilms, computer tapes or discs, rules, regulations or codes."

In view of the language quoted above, if information is maintained in some physical form, it would in my opinion constitute a "record" subject to rights of access conferred by the Law. Further, the definition of "record" includes specific reference to computer tapes and discs, and it was held more than ten years ago that "[i]nformation is increasingly being stored in computers and access to such data should not be restricted merely because it is not in printed form" [Babigian v. Evans, 427 NYS 2d 688, 691 (1980); aff'd 97 AD 2d 992 (1983); see also, Szikszy v. Buelow, 436 NYS 2d 558 (1981)].

When information is maintained electronically, it has been advised that if the information sought is available under the Freedom of Information Law and may be retrieved by means of existing computer programs, an agency is required to disclose the information. In that kind of situation, the agency in my view would merely be retrieving data that it has the capacity to retrieve. Disclosure may be accomplished either by printing out the data on paper or perhaps by duplicating the data on another storage mechanism, such as a computer tape or disk. On the other hand, if information sought can be retrieved from a computer or other storage medium only by means of new programming or the alteration of existing programs, those steps would, in my opinion, be the equivalent of creating a new record. Since §89(3) does not require an agency to create a record, I do not believe that an agency would be required to reprogram or develop new programs to retrieve information that would otherwise be available [see Guerrier v. Hernandez-Cuebas, 165 AD 2d 218 (1991)]. Similarly, while an agency may be able to locate a particular record, such as an incident report, that is stored electronically, it does not necessarily follow that there is a database consisting of incident reports. An individual report might be retrievable on the basis of a name or other identifier, and that may be the only means of locating a particular report that is maintained electronically.

Third, I would conjecture that many of the records that you have requested would be accessible or deniable in part based on their contents. For instance, it is likely that several of the grounds for denial would be pertinent in determining rights of access to incident report, complaint reports or witness statements.

Potentially relevant is a decision by the Court of Appeals concerning records prepared by police officers in which it was held that a blanket denial of access based on their characterization as intra-agency materials would be inappropriate. The provision at issue, §87(2)(g) of the Freedom of Information Law, enables an agency to withhold records that:

"are inter-agency or intra-agency materials which are not:

- i. statistical or factual tabulations or data;
- ii. instructions to staff that affect the public;
- iii. final agency policy or determinations; or
- iv. external audits, including but not limited to audits performed by the comptroller and the federal government..."

It is noted that the language quoted above contains what in effect is a double negative. While inter-agency or intra-agency materials may be withheld, portions of such materials consisting of statistical or factual information, instructions to staff that affect the public, final agency policy or determinations or external audits must be made available, unless a different ground for denial could appropriately be asserted. Concurrently, those portions of inter-agency or intra-agency materials that are reflective of opinion, advice, recommendation and the like could in my view be withheld.

In its analysis of the matter, it was determined that the agency could not claim that the records can be withheld in their entirety on the ground that they constitute intra-agency materials. However, the Court was careful to point out that other grounds for denial might apply in consideration of those records. [Gould, Scott and DeFelice v. New York City Police Department, 89 NY2d 267 (1996)].

For instance, of potential significance is §87(2)(b) of the Freedom of Information Law, which permits an agency to withhold records or portions thereof when disclosure would constitute "an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy". That provision might be applicable relative to the deletion of identifying details in a variety of situations, i.e., where a record identifies a confidential source, a witness, or others interviewed in an investigation.

Often the most relevant provision concerning access to records maintained by law enforcement agencies is §87(2)(e), which permits an agency to withhold records that:

"are compiled for law enforcement purposes and which, if disclosed, would:

- i. interfere with law enforcement investigations or judicial proceedings;

- ii. deprive a person of a right to a fair trial or impartial adjudication;
- iii. identify a confidential source or disclose confidential information relating to a criminal investigation; or
- iv. reveal criminal investigative techniques or procedures, except routine techniques and procedures."

In my view, the foregoing indicates that records compiled for law enforcement purposes can only be withheld to the extent that disclosure would result in the harmful effects described in sub- paragraphs (i) through (iv) of §87(2)(e).

Another possible ground for denial is §87(2)(f), which permits withholding to the extent that disclosure "would endanger the life or safety of any person". The capacity to withhold on that basis is dependent upon the facts and circumstances concerning an event.

Another issue may be the extent to which your requests "reasonably describe" the records sought as required by §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law. For instance, one element of a request involved "all incident/complaint reports generated by parks enforcement patrol from the county of Queens throughout the period of 1/95 up to and including 12/98." In the leading decision concerning the standard imposed by the law, the Court of Appeals in Konigsberg v. Coughlin [68 NY 2d 245, 249 (1986)] found that the agency could not reject the request due to its breadth and also stated that:

"respondents have failed to supply any proof whatsoever as to the nature - or even the existence - of their indexing system: whether the Department's files were indexed in a manner that would enable the identification and location of documents in their possession (cf. National Cable Tel. Assn. v Federal Communications Commn., 479 F2d 183, 192 [Bazelon, J.] [plausible claim of nonidentifiability under Federal Freedom of Information Act, 5 USC section 552 (a) (3), may be presented where agency's indexing system was such that 'the requested documents could not be identified by retracing a path already trodden. It would have required a wholly new enterprise, potentially requiring a search of every file in the possession of the agency'])" (id. at 250).

In my view, whether a request reasonably describes the records sought, as suggested by the Court of Appeals, may be dependent upon the terms of a request, as well as the nature of an agency's filing or record-keeping system. In Konigsberg, it appears that the agency was able to locate the records on the basis of an inmate's name and identification number.

While I am unfamiliar with the recordkeeping systems of the Police Department, to extent that the records sought can be located with reasonable effort, I believe that the request would have met the requirement of reasonably describing the records. On the other hand, if the records are not maintained in a manner that permits their retrieval except by reviewing perhaps hundreds or even thousands of records individually in an effort to locate those falling within the scope of the request, to that extent, the request would not in my opinion meet the standard of reasonably describing the records.

Lastly, since you questioned whether copies of records were accurate, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in relevant part that, in response to a request for a record, "the entity shall provide a copy of such record and certify to the correctness of such copy if so requested..." From my perspective, the certification required by the Freedom of Information Law does not involve an assertion that the contents of a record are accurate, but rather that a copy of a record made available in response to a request is a true copy. In essence, the certification is supposed to signify that the applicant received an actual copy of a record maintained by an agency, irrespective of the accuracy or the "factuality" of the contents of the record.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Chairperson
Save Our Services
115 East State Street
Gloversville, NY 12078

Dear Ms. Faville:

I have received your letter of April 14 concerning a request by your organization, Save Our Services-Gloversville, for records relating to an application by the Nathan Littauer Hospital for bonds from the Fulton County Industrial Development Agency (IDA) to construct a new outpatient surgery center. Although much of the application was disclosed, various schedules containing financial information were withheld in their entirety.

It is your view that the documentation in question is "important for the community, to help [you] evaluate whether the hospital should receive bonds and/or Mortgage Recording Tax Exemptions for their new expansion project", and because the decision by the IDA will affect all Fulton County taxpayers. You also contended that "the IDA has erred by simply granting Nathan Littauer a blanket exemption from disclosure of this financial information."

From my perspective, it is likely that the "blanket exemption" to which you referred is inconsistent with the language of the Freedom of Information Law and its judicial interpretation. In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law. It is emphasized that the introductory language of §87(2) refers to the authority to withhold "records or portions thereof" that fall within the scope of the exceptions that follow. In my view, the phrase quoted in the preceding sentence evidences a recognition on the part of the Legislature that a single record or report, for example, might include portions that are available under the statute, as well as portions that might justifiably be withheld. That being so, I believe that it also imposes an obligation on an agency to review records sought, in their entirety, to determine which portions, if any, might properly be withheld or deleted prior to disclosing the remainder.

The Court of Appeals, the state's highest court, most recently expressed its general view of the intent of the Freedom of Information Law in Gould v. New York City Police Department [87 NY2d 267 (1996)], stating that:

"To ensure maximum access to government records, the 'exemptions are to be narrowly construed, with the burden resting on the agency to demonstrate that the requested material indeed qualifies for exemption' (Matter of Hanig v. State of New York Dept. of Motor Vehicles, 79 N.Y.2d 106, 109, 580 N.Y.S.2d 715, 588 N.E.2d 750 see, Public Officers Law § 89[4][b]). As this Court has stated, '[o]nly where the material requested falls squarely within the ambit of one of these statutory exemptions may disclosure be withheld' (Matter of Fink v. Lefkowitz, 47 N.Y.2d, 567, 571, 419 N.Y.S.2d 467, 393 N.E.2d 463)" (id., 275).

Just as significant, the Court in Gould repeatedly specified that a categorical denial of access to records is inconsistent with the requirements of the Freedom of Information Law. In that case, the Police Department contended that complaint follow up reports could be withheld in their entirety on the ground that they fall within the exception regarding intra-agency materials, §87(2)(g), an exception separate from those cited in response to your request. The Court, however, wrote that: "Petitioners contend that because the complaint follow-up reports contain factual data, the exemption does not justify complete nondisclosure of the reports. We agree" (id., 276), and stated as a general principle that "blanket exemptions for particular types of documents are inimical to FOIL's policy of open government" (id., 275). The Court also offered guidance to agencies and lower courts in determining rights of access and referred to several decisions it had previously rendered, stating that:

"...to invoke one of the exemptions of section 87(2), the agency must articulate 'particularized and specific justification' for not disclosing requested documents (Matter of Fink vl. Lefkowitz, supra, 47 N.Y.2d, at 571, 419 N.Y.S.2d 467, 393 N.E.2d 463). If the court is unable to determine whether withheld documents fall entirely within the scope of the asserted exemption, it should conduct an in camera inspection of representative documents and order disclosure of all nonexempt, appropriately redacted material (see, Matter of Xerox Corp. v. Town of Webster, 65 N.Y.2d 131, 133, 490 N.Y.S. 2d, 488, 480 N.E.2d 74; Matter of Farbman & Sons v. New York City Health & Hosps. Corp., supra, 62 N.Y.2d, at 83, 476 N.Y.S.2d 69, 464 N.E.2d 437)" (id.).

Second, as I understand the matter, the only exception that would be pertinent is §87(2)(d), and the extent to which it would serve as a valid basis for denial is questionable. That provision permits an agency to withhold records or portions thereof that:

"are trade secrets or are submitted to an agency by a commercial enterprise or derived from information obtained from a commercial enterprise and which if disclosed would cause substantial injury to the competitive position of the subject enterprise..."

In my opinion, the question under §87(2)(d) involves the extent, if any, to which disclosure would "cause substantial injury to the competitive position" of a commercial entity.

The concept and parameters of what might constitute a "trade secret" were discussed in Kewanee Oil Co. v. Bicron Corp., which was decided by the United States Supreme Court in 1973 (416 U.S. 470). Central to the issue was a definition of "trade secret" upon which reliance is often based. Specifically, the Court cited the Restatement of Torts, section 757, comment b (1939), which states that:

"[a] trade secret may consist of any formula, pattern, device or compilation of information which is used in one's business, and which gives him an opportunity to obtain an advantage over competitors who do not know or use it. It may be a formula for a chemical compound, a process of manufacturing, treating or preserving materials, a pattern for a machine or other device, or a list of customers" (id. at 474, 475).

In its review of the definition, the court stated that "[T]he subject of a trade secret must be secret, and must not be of public knowledge or of a general knowledge in the trade or business" (id.). The phrase "trade secret" is more extensively defined in 104 NY Jur 2d 234 to mean:

"...a formula, process, device or compilation of information used in one's business which confers a competitive advantage over those in similar businesses who do not know it or use it. A trade secret, like any other secret, is something known to only one or a few and kept from the general public, and not susceptible to general knowledge. Six factors are to be considered in determining whether a trade secret exists: (1) the extent to which the information is known outside the business; (2) the extent to which it is known by a business' employees and others involved in the business; (3) the extent of measures taken by a business to guard the secrecy of the information; (4) the value of the information to a business and to its competitors; (5) the amount of effort or money expended by a business in developing the information; and (6) the ease or difficulty with which the information could be properly acquired or duplicated by others. If there has been a voluntary disclosure by the plaintiff, or if the facts pertaining to the matter are a subject of general knowledge in the trade, then any property right has evaporated."

From my perspective, the nature of record, the area of commerce in which a commercial entity is involved and the presence of the conditions described above that must be found to characterize records as trade secrets would be the factors used to determine the extent to which disclosure would "cause substantial injury to the competitive position" of a commercial enterprise. Therefore, the proper assertion of §87(2)(d) would be dependent upon the facts and, again, the effect of disclosure upon the competitive position of the entity to which the records relate.

Relevant to the analysis is a decision rendered by the Court of Appeals, which, for the first time, considered the phrase "substantial competitive injury" [Encore College Bookstores, Inc. v. Auxiliary Service Corporation of the State University of New York at Farmingdale, 87 NY2d 410 (1995)]. In that decision, the Court reviewed the legislative history of the Freedom of Information Law as it pertains to §87(2)(d), and due to the analogous nature of equivalent exception in the federal Freedom of Information Act (5 U.S.C. §552), it relied in part upon federal judicial precedent.

In its discussion of the issue, the Court stated that:

"FOIL fails to define substantial competitive injury. Nor has this Court previously interpreted the statutory phrase. FOIA, however, contains a similar exemption for 'commercial or financial information obtained from a person and privileged or confidential' (see, 5 USC § 552[b][4]). Commercial information, moreover, is 'confidential' if it would impair the government's ability to obtain necessary information in the future or cause 'substantial harm to the competitive position' of the person from whom the information was obtained...

"As established in Worthington Compressors v Costle (662 F2d 45, 51 [DC Cir]), whether 'substantial competitive harm' exists for purposes of FOIA's exemption for commercial information turns on the commercial value of the requested information to competitors and the cost of acquiring it through other means. Because the submitting business can suffer competitive harm only if the desired material has commercial value to its competitors, courts must consider how valuable the information will be to the competing business, as well as the resultant damage to the submitting enterprise. Where FOIA disclosure is the sole means by which competitors can obtain the requested information, the inquiry ends here.

"Where, however, the material is available from other sources at little or no cost, its disclosure is unlikely to cause competitive damage to the submitting commercial enterprise. On the other hand, as explained in Worthington:

Because competition in business turns on the relative costs and opportunities faced by members of the same industry, there is a potential windfall for competitors to whom valuable information is released under FOIA. If those competitors are charged only minimal FOIA retrieval costs for the information, rather than the considerable costs of private reproduction, they may be getting quite a bargain. Such bargains could easily have competitive consequences not contemplated as part of FOIA's principal aim of promoting openness in government (id., 419-420).

The Court also observed that the reasoning underlying these considerations is consistent with the policy behind §87(2)(d) to protect businesses from the deleterious consequences of disclosing confidential commercial information so as to further the state's economic development efforts and attract business to New York (id.). In applying those considerations to Encore's request, the Court concluded that the submitting enterprise was not required to establish actual competitive harm; rather, it was required, in the words of Gulf and Western Industries v. United States, 615 F.2d 527, 530 (D.C. Cir., 1979) to show "actual competition and the likelihood of substantial competitive injury" (id., at 421).

In the context of your inquiry, impairment of the government's ability to acquire the records at issue or similar materials in the future should not, in my opinion, be a consideration; the entity is seeking a benefit from government. Similarly, attracting a business or industry to the County does not appear to be pertinent, for the funding involves the expansion of an existing facility. It is also likely that substantial amounts of financial information relating to the Hospital are maintained by and accessible from the State Department of Health. Insofar as the financial information sought is duplicative of or analogous to that sought, §87(2)(d) would be inapplicable. Further and perhaps most importantly, the characterization of the documentation as financial information would not alone be adequate to justify a denial of access. Only to the extent that disclosure would "cause substantial injury" to the Hospital's competitive position would a denial of access be appropriate.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Robert J. Freeman

The staff of the Committee on Open Government is authorized to issue advisory opinions. The ensuing staff advisory opinion is based solely upon the information presented in your correspondence, unless otherwise indicated.

Dear Ms. Hatzmann:

I have received your letter of April 12 in which you asked that I address a point made a conversation in which it was advised that if records are shown to you, an agency waives its capacity to withhold those records.

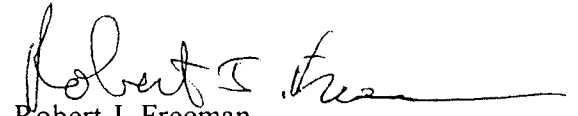

As I suggested at the public forum last night (and I really did not recall the specifics of your letter, which I found near the top of the stack of requests for opinions when I returned to the office this morning), in general, when records are available for inspection under the Freedom of Information Law, I believe that they are available for copying and that an agency must provide copies upon payment of the requisite fee [see Freedom of Information Law, §89(3)]. Therefore, assuming that a disclosure was not inadvertent and was made "intelligently and voluntarily" [see McGraw-Edison v. Williams, 509 NYS 2d 285, 287 (1986)], it would appear that an agency would have waived its right to prohibit a person who inspected a record from copying a record that was previously disclosed for the purpose of inspection.

In the case cited in the preceding paragraph, among the records inspected was a document that the agency believed was exempted from disclosure and which should have been withheld. It was held that an inadvertent disclosure of an exempt records did not create a right to copy the record (McGraw-Edison Co. v. Williams, supra). If indeed records may justifiably be withheld, but they were inadvertently made available for inspection, an agency, based on McGraw-Edison, could properly deny a request that the records be copied.

Mr. Moses L. Green Jr.

[REDACTED]

Dear Mr. Green:

I have received your letter of April 12 and the materials attached to it. According to the correspondence, you requested from the New York City Police Department a list of the names, addresses and telephone numbers of "former DOT agents that were terminated under (NYCPD)." You faced a series of delays and were informed that the Police Department does not maintain the information sought. You asked "where do [you] go from here."

In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First, it is emphasized that the Freedom of Information Law pertains to existing agency records and that §89(3) of that statute states in part that an agency is not required to create a record in response to a request. Therefore, if the Police Department does not maintain a "list" of those terminated or does not maintain records identifying persons employed by a different agency who were terminated, the Department would not be required to prepare or acquire records on your behalf in an effort to satisfy your request.

I note that when an agency indicates that it does not maintain or cannot locate a record, an applicant for the record may seek a certification to that effect. Section 89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law provides in part that, in such a situation, on request, an agency "shall certify that it does not have possession of such record or that such record cannot be found after diligent search." If you consider it worthwhile to do so, you could seek such a certification.

It is recommended that you follow the course of action suggested by Sergeant Evangelista, that you seek records from the Department of Transportation identifying the employees of your interest who may have been terminated within a certain period.

Second, as a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law. While I believe an agency must disclose a portion of a record identifying a public employee who was terminated, §89(7) of the Law provides that the home addresses of present and former public employees need not be disclosed. Similarly, I believe that home telephone numbers of those persons may be withheld as an "unwarranted invasion of personal privacy" [see §87(2)(b)].

Mr. Moses L. Green Jr.

Lastly, the Freedom of Information Law provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies must respond to requests. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

"Each entity subject to the provisions of this article, within five business days of the receipt of a written request for a record reasonably described, shall make such record available to the person requesting it, deny such request in writing or furnish a written acknowledgement of the receipt of such request and a statement of the approximate date when such request will be granted or denied..."

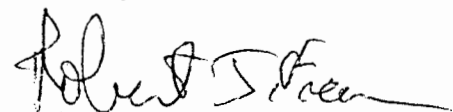

If neither a response to a request nor an acknowledgement of the receipt of a request is given within five business days, or if an agency delays responding for an unreasonable time after it acknowledges that a request has been received, a request may, in my opinion, be considered to have been constructively denied. In such a circumstance, I believe that the denial may be appealed in accordance with §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law. That provision states in relevant part that:

"...any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive, or governing body, who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

In addition, it has been held that when an appeal is made but a determination is not rendered within ten business days of the receipt of the appeal as required under §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, the appellant has exhausted his or her administrative remedies and may initiate a challenge to a constructive denial of access under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Rules [Floyd v. McGuire, 87 AD 2d 388, appeal dismissed 57 NY 2d 774 (1982)].

I hope that the foregoing serves to clarify your understanding of the matter and that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Mr. Richard Winkler
81-B-2146
Sing Sing Correctional Facility
354 Hunter Street
Ossining, NY 10562-5442

Dear Mr. Winkler:

I have received your letter of April 13 in which you requested an advisory opinion concerning your right to obtain the "arrest report" of a witness who testified at your trial, as well as statements made by that person and related records. You also indicated that recent requests for the records had not been answered.

In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First, it is assumed that your reference to arrest reports and arrest records involves the criminal history of the witness. If that is so, I note that the general repository of criminal history records is the Division of Criminal Justice Services. While the subject of a criminal history record may obtain such record from the Division, it has been held that criminal history records maintained by that agency are exempt from public disclosure pursuant to §87(2)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law [Capital Newspapers v. Poklemba, Supreme Court, Albany County, April 6, 1989]. Nevertheless, if, for example, criminal conviction records were used in conjunction with a criminal proceeding by a district attorney, it has been held that the district attorney must disclose those records [see Thompson v. Weinstein, 150 AD 2d 782 (1989)].

It is noted that in a decision rendered by the Appellate Division, Second Department, the Court reconfirmed its position that criminal history records are, in general, exempt from disclosure (Woods v. Kings County District Attorney's Office, ___ AD 2d ___, NYLJ, December 31, 1996). In Woods, the Court upheld a denial of a request for the rap sheets "of numerous individuals who were not witnesses at [the petitioner's] trial." However, it distinguished its determination from the holding in Thompson, supra, in which it was found that a rap sheet must be disclosed when the request is "limited to the criminal convictions and any pending criminal actions against an individual called by the People as a witness in the petitioner's criminal trial." Therefore, insofar as your request involves records analogous to those found to be available in Thompson, I believe that the District Attorney or perhaps a police department in possession of the records would be required to disclose.

It is also noted that while records relating to convictions may be available from the courts or other sources, when charges are dismissed in favor of an accused, records relating to arrests that did not result in convictions are generally sealed pursuant to §160.50 of the Criminal Procedure Law.

Second, relevant to the matter is the decision rendered in Moore v. Santucci [151 AD 2d 677 (1989)], in which it was held that if records have been disclosed during a public proceeding, they are generally available under the Freedom of Information Law. In that decision, it was also found, however, that an agency need not make available records that had been previously disclosed to the applicant or that person's attorney, unless there is an allegation "in evidentiary form, that the copy was no longer in existence." In my view, if you can "in evidentiary form" demonstrate that neither you nor your attorney maintain records that had previously been disclosed, the agency would be required to respond to a request for the same records. I also point out, however, that the decision in Moore specified that the respondent office of a district attorney was "not required to make available for inspection or copying any suppression hearing or trial transcripts of a witness' testimony in its possession, because the transcripts are court records, not agency records" (id. at 680).

Third, assuming that the records sought involving witnesses have not been previously disclosed, I believe that the Freedom of Information Law would determine rights of access. As a general matter, that statute is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law. In my view, several of the grounds for denial could be pertinent.

Section 87(2)(b) permits an agency to withhold records to the extent that disclosure would constitute "an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy". From my perspective, the propriety of a denial of access would, under the circumstances, be dependent upon the nature of statements by witnesses or the contents of other records have already been disclosed. If disclosure of the records in question would not serve to infringe upon witnesses' privacy in view of prior disclosures, §87(2)(b) might not justifiably serve as a basis for denial. However, if the statements in question include substantially different information, that provision may be applicable.

Also potentially relevant is §87(2)(e), which permits an agency to withhold records that:

"are compiled for law enforcement purposes and which, if disclosed, would:

- i. interfere with law enforcement investigations or judicial proceedings;
- ii. deprive a person of a right to a fair trial or impartial adjudication;

Mr. Richard Winkler

Page -3-

- iii. identify a confidential source or disclose confidential information relating to a criminal investigation; or
- iv. reveal criminal investigative techniques or procedures, except routine techniques and procedures."

In my view, the foregoing indicates that records compiled for law enforcement purposes can be withheld to the extent that disclosure would result in the harmful effects described in subparagraphs (i) through (iv) of §87(2)(e).

Section 87(2)(f) permits an agency to withhold records to the extent that disclosure would "endanger the life or safety of any person." Without knowledge of the facts and circumstances of your case, I could not conjecture as to the relevance of that provision.

Fourth, §87(2)(g) authorizes an agency to withhold records that:

"are inter-agency or intra-agency materials which are not:

- i. statistical or factual tabulations or data;
- ii. instructions to staff that affect the public;
- iii. final agency policy or determinations; or
- iv. external audits, including but not limited to audits performed by the comptroller and the federal government..."

It is noted that the language quoted above contains what in effect is a double negative. While inter-agency or intra-agency materials may be withheld, portions of such materials consisting of statistical or factual information, instructions to staff that affect the public, final agency policy or determinations or external audits must be made available, unless a different ground for denial could appropriately be asserted. Concurrently, those portions of inter-agency or intra-agency materials that are reflective of opinion, advice, recommendation and the like could in my view be withheld.

Lastly, the Freedom of Information Law provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies must respond to requests. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

"Each entity subject to the provisions of this article, within five business days of the receipt of a written request for a record reasonably described, shall make such record available to the person requesting it, deny such request in writing or furnish a written acknowledgement of the receipt of such request and a statement of the approximate date when such request will be granted or denied..."

Mr. Richard Winkler

Page -4-

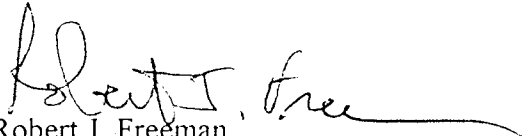

If neither a response to a request nor an acknowledgement of the receipt of a request is given within five business days, or if an agency delays responding for an unreasonable time after it acknowledges that a request has been received, a request may, in my opinion, be considered to have been constructively denied. In such a circumstance, I believe that the denial may be appealed in accordance with §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law. That provision states in relevant part that:

"...any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive, or governing body, who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

In addition, it has been held that when an appeal is made but a determination is not rendered within ten business days of the receipt of the appeal as required under §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, the appellant has exhausted his or her administrative remedies and may initiate a challenge to a constructive denial of access under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Rules [Floyd v. McGuire, 87 AD 2d 388, appeal dismissed 57 NY 2d 774 (1982)].

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Dear Mr. Roddy:

I have received your letter of April 16 in which you sought assistance in obtaining various court records under the Freedom of Information Law.

In this regard, it is emphasized that the Freedom of Information Law is applicable to agency records, and that §86(3) defines the term "agency" to include:

"any state or municipal department, board, bureau, division, commission, committee, public authority, public corporation, council, office or other governmental entity performing a governmental or proprietary function for the state or any one or more municipalities thereof, except the judiciary or the state legislature."

In turn, §86(1) defines the term "judiciary" to mean:

"the courts of the state, including any municipal or district court, whether or not of record."

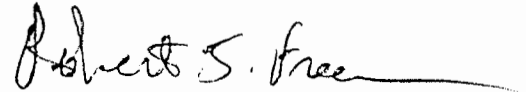

Based on the provisions quoted above, the courts and court records are not subject to the Freedom of Information Law. This is not to suggest that court records are not generally available to the public, for other provisions of law (see e.g., Judiciary Law, §255) may grant broad public access to those records. Even though other statutes may deal with access to court records, the procedural provisions associated with the Freedom of Information Law (i.e., those involving the designation of a records access officer or the right to appeal a denial) would not ordinarily be applicable.

Mr. Mark Roddy
May 12, 1999

It is suggested that you resubmit your request to the clerk of the court, citing an applicable provision of law as the basis for your request.

I hope that the foregoing serves to clarify your understanding of the matter and that I have been of assistance.

Mr. Keith Rhames
90-T-3317
Auburn Correctional Facility
P.O. Box 618
Auburn, NY 13024

Dear Mr. Rhames:

I have received your letter of April 14 in which you sought assistance in obtaining records pertaining to your case from the New York City Police Department.

In this regard, first, I point out that every agency must designate one or more persons as "records access officer" pursuant to regulations promulgated by the Committee on Open Government (21 NYCRR Part 1401). The records access officer has the duty of coordinating an agency's response to requests for records, and a request should ordinarily be sent to that person. It is suggested that a request be made in this instance to Sgt. Richard Evangelista, Records Access Officer, New York City Police Department, Room 110C, One Police Plaza, New York, NY 10038.

Second, the Freedom of Information Law provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies must respond to requests. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

"Each entity subject to the provisions of this article, within five business days of the receipt of a written request for a record reasonably described, shall make such record available to the person requesting it, deny such request in writing or furnish a written acknowledgement of the receipt of such request and a statement of the approximate date when such request will be granted or denied..."

If neither a response to a request nor an acknowledgement of the receipt of a request is given within five business days, or if an agency delays responding for an unreasonable time after it acknowledges that a request has been received, a request may, in my opinion, be considered to have been constructively denied. In such a circumstance, I believe that the denial may be appealed in accordance with §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law. That provision states in relevant part that:

"...any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive, or governing body, who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

In addition, it has been held that when an appeal is made but a determination is not rendered within ten business days of the receipt of the appeal as required under §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, the appellant has exhausted his or her administrative remedies and may initiate a challenge to a constructive denial of access under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Rules [Floyd v. McGuire, 87 AD 2d 388, appeal dismissed 57 NY 2d 774 (1982)].

For your information, the person designated by the Department to determine appeals is Susan Petito, Special Counsel.

Third, as a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law. Since I am unaware of the contents of all of the records in which you are interested, or the effects of their disclosure, I cannot offer specific guidance. Nevertheless, the following paragraphs will review the provisions that may be significant in determining rights of access to the records in question.

In considering the records falling within the scope of your request, relevant is a decision rendered by the Court of Appeals concerning "DD5's", also known as "complaint follow up reports" prepared by police officers, and police officers' memo books, in which it was held that a denial of access based on their characterization as intra-agency materials would be inappropriate.

The provision at issue, §87(2)(g) of the Freedom of Information Law, enables an agency to withhold records that:

"are inter-agency or intra-agency materials which are not:

- i. statistical or factual tabulations or data;
- ii. instructions to staff that affect the public;
- iii. final agency policy or determinations; or
- iv. external audits, including but not limited to audits performed by the comptroller and the federal government..."

It is noted that the language quoted above contains what in effect is a double negative. While inter-agency or intra-agency materials may be withheld, portions of such materials consisting of statistical or factual information, instructions to staff that affect the public, final agency policy or determinations or external audits must be made available, unless a different ground for denial could appropriately be asserted. Concurrently, those portions of inter-agency or intra-agency materials that are reflective of opinion, advice, recommendation and the like could in my view be withheld.

In its analysis of the matter, the decision states that:

"...we note that one court has suggested that complaint follow-up reports are exempt from disclosure because they constitute nonfinal intra-agency material, irrespective of whether the information contained in the reports is 'factual data' (see, Matter of Scott v. Chief Medical Examiner, 179 AD2d 443, 444, supra citing Public Officers Law §87(2)(g)). However, under a plain reading of §87(2)(g), the exemption for intra-agency material does not apply as long as the material falls within any one of the provision's four enumerated exceptions. Thus, intra-agency documents that contain 'statistical or factual tabulations or data' are subject to FOIL disclosure, whether or not embodied in a final agency policy or determination (see, Matter of Farbman & Sons v. New York City Health & Hosp. Corp., 62 NY2d 75, 83, supra; Matter of MacRae v. Dolce, 130 AD2d 577)...

"...Although the term 'factual data' is not defined by statute, the meaning of the term can be discerned from the purpose underlying the intra-agency exemption, which is 'to protect the deliberative process of the government by ensuring that persons in an advisory role [will] be able to express their opinions freely to agency decision makers' (Matter of Xerox Corp. v. Town of Webster, 65 NY2d 131, 132 [quoting Matter of Sea Crest Constr. Corp. v. Stubing, 82 AD2d 546, 549]). Consistent with this limited aim to safeguard internal government consultations and deliberations, the exemption does not apply when the requested material consists of 'statistical or factual tabulations or data' (Public Officers Law 87(2)(g)(i). Factual data, therefore, simply means objective information, in contrast to opinions, ideas, or advice exchanged as part of the consultative or deliberative process of government decision making (see, Matter of Johnson Newspaper Corp. v. Stainkamp, 94 AD2d 825, 827, affd on op below, 61 NY2d 958; Matter of Miracle Mile Assocs. v. Yudelton, 68 AD2d 176, 181-182).

"Against this backdrop, we conclude that the complaint follow-up reports contain substantial factual information available pursuant to the provisions of FOIL. Sections of the report are devoted to such purely factual data as: the names, addresses, and physical descriptions of crime victims, witnesses, and perpetrators; a checklist that indicates whether the victims and witnesses have been interviewed and shown photos, whether crime scenes have been photographed and dusted for fingerprints, and whether neighborhood residents have been canvassed for information; and a blank space denominated 'details' in which the officer records the particulars of any action taken in connection with the investigation.

"However, the Police Department argues that any witness statements contained in the reports, in particular, are not 'factual' because there is no assurance of the statements' accuracy and reliability. We decline to read such a reliability requirement into the phrase 'factual data', as the dissent would have us do, and conclude that a witness statement constitutes factual data insofar as it embodies a factual account of the witness's observations. Such a statement, moreover, is far removed from the type of internal government exchange sought to be protected by the intra-agency exemption (see, Matter of Ingram v. Axelrod, 90 AD2d 568, 569 [ambulance records, list of interviews, and reports of interviews available under FOIL as 'factual data']). By contrast, any impressions, recommendations, or opinions recorded in the complaint follow-up report would not constitute factual data and would be exempt from disclosure. The holding herein is only that these reports are not categorically exempt as intra-agency material. Indeed, the Police Department is entitled to withhold complaint follow-up reports, or specific portions thereof, under any other applicable exemption, such as the law-enforcement exemption or the public-safety exemption, as long as the requisite particularized showing is made" [Gould, Scott and DeFelice v. New York City Police Department, 89 NY2d 267, 276-277 (1996); emphasis added by the Court].

Based on the foregoing, the agency could not claim that the complaint reports can be withheld in their entirety on the ground that they constitute intra-agency materials. However, the Court was careful to point out that other grounds for denial might apply in consideration of those records, as well as others that you requested.

For instance, of potential significance is §87(2)(b) of the Freedom of Information Law, which permits an agency to withhold records or portions thereof when disclosure would constitute "an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy". That provision might be applicable relative to the deletion of identifying details in a variety of situations, i.e., where a record identifies a confidential source or a witness, for example.

Often the most relevant provision concerning access to records maintained by law enforcement agencies is §87(2)(e), which permits an agency to withhold records that:

"are compiled for law enforcement purposes and which, if disclosed, would:

- i. interfere with law enforcement investigations or judicial proceedings;
- ii. deprive a person of a right to a fair trial or impartial adjudication;
- iii. identify a confidential source or disclose confidential information relating to a criminal investigation; or
- iv. reveal criminal investigative techniques or procedures, except routine techniques and procedures."

In my view, the foregoing indicates that records compiled for law enforcement purposes can only be withheld to the extent that disclosure would result in the harmful effects described in sub- paragraphs (i) through (iv) of §87(2)(e).

Another possible ground for denial is §87(2)(f), which permits withholding to the extent that disclosure "would endanger the life or safety of any person". The capacity to withhold on that basis is dependent upon the facts and circumstances concerning an event.

Lastly, in a decision concerning a request for records maintained by the office of a district attorney that would ordinarily be exempted from disclosure under the Freedom of Information Law, it was held that "once the statements have been used in open court, they have lost their cloak of confidentiality and are available for inspection by a member of the public" [see Moore v. Santucci, 151 AD 2d 677, 679 (1989)]. Based upon that decision, it appears that records introduced into evidence or disclosed during a public judicial proceeding should be available. However, in the same decision, it was also found that:

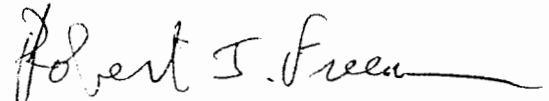

"...if the petitioner or his attorney previously received a copy of the agency record pursuant to an alternative discovery device and currently possesses the copy, a court may uphold an agency's denial of the petitioner's request under the FOIL for a duplicate copy as academic. However, the burden of proof rests with the agency to demonstrate that the petitioner's specific requests are moot. The respondent's burden would be satisfied upon proof that a copy of the requested record was previously furnished to the petitioner or his counsel in the absence of any allegation, in evidentiary form, that the copy was no longer in existence. In the event the petitioner's request for a copy of a specific record is not moot, the agency must furnish another copy upon payment of the appropriate fee...unless the requested record falls squarely within the ambit of 1 of the 8 statutory exemptions" (id., 678).

Mr. Keith Rhames
Page -6-

The Court in Moore also specified that an agency "is not required to make available for inspection or copying any suppression hearing or trial transcripts of a witness' testimony in its possession, because the transcripts are court records, not agency records" (id. at 680).

I hope that I have been of assistance.

[REDACTED]

Dear Mr. Cavalluzzi:

I have received your letter of April 19, as well as the correspondence attached to it. In brief, beginning in December of 1998, you requested various records from the City of Mount Vernon Board of Education relating to your position and its abolition. However, as of the date of your letter to this office, you had received no response.

In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First, pursuant to the regulations promulgated by the Committee on Open Government (21 NYCRR Part 1401), each agency is required to designate one or more persons as "records access officer." The records access officer has the duty of coordinating the agency's response to requests for records. While I believe that the person in receipt of your requests should have responded in a manner consistent with the Freedom of Information Law or forwarded the requests to the appropriate person, it is suggested that you renew your request and direct it to the records access officer. It is also suggested that you contact the District Clerk or the Superintendent in order to ascertain the identity of the person designated as records access officer.

Second, the Freedom of Information Law provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies must respond to requests. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

"Each entity subject to the provisions of this article, within five business days of the receipt of a written request for a record reasonably described, shall make such record available to the person requesting it, deny such request in writing or furnish a written acknowledgement of the receipt of such request and a statement of the approximate date when such request will be granted or denied..."

Mr. Ignazio Vito Cavalluzzi

Page -2-

If neither a response to a request nor an acknowledgement of the receipt of a request is given within five business days, or if an agency delays responding for an unreasonable time after it acknowledges that a request has been received, a request may, in my opinion, be considered to have been constructively denied. In such a circumstance, I believe that the denial may be appealed in accordance with §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law. That provision states in relevant part that:

"...any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive, or governing body, who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

In addition, it has been held that when an appeal is made but a determination is not rendered within ten business days of the receipt of the appeal as required under §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, the appellant has exhausted his or her administrative remedies and may initiate a challenge to a constructive denial of access under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Rules [Floyd v. McGuire, 87 AD 2d 388, appeal dismissed 57 NY 2d 774 (1982)].

Third, as a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law.

Since much of the documentation that you requested pertains to yourself, I note that §87(2)(b) permits an agency to withhold records to the extent that disclosure would constitute "an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy." Because you cannot invade your own privacy, insofar as the records pertain to you, that provision would not serve as a basis for a denial of access. The only other person who would apparently be identified in the records, other than minutes of meetings, is an employee that you named. You requested records relating to her hiring, her title and her salary.

Here I point out that §87(3)(b) of the Freedom of Information Law specifies that each agency is required to maintain a payroll record that identifies every officer or employee by name, public office address, title and salary. As such, the title and salary of the person named would clearly be accessible under the law.

With respect to the other materials relating to that person, based on the judicial interpretation of the Freedom of Information Law, it is clear that public officers and employees enjoy a lesser degree of privacy than others, for it has been found in various contexts that those individuals are required to be more accountable than others. The courts have found that, as a general rule, records that are relevant to the performance of the official duties of a public officer or employee are available, for disclosure in such instances would result in a permissible rather than an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy [see e.g., Farrell v. Village Board of Trustees, 372 NYS 2d 905 (1975); Gannett Co. v. County of Monroe, 59 AD 2d 309 (1977), aff'd 45 NY 2d 954 (1978); Sinicropi v. County of Nassau, 76 AD 2d 838 (1980); Geneva Printing Co. and Donald C. Hadley v. Village of Lyons, Sup. Ct., Wayne Cty., March 25, 1981; Montes v. State, 406 NYS 2d 664 (Court of Claims, 1978);

Mr. Ignazio Vito Cavalluzzi

Powhida v. City of Albany, 147 AD 2d 236 (1989); Scaccia v. NYS Division of State Police, 530 NYS 2d 309, 138 AD 2d 50 (1988); Steinmetz v. Board of Education, East Moriches, Sup. Ct., Suffolk Cty., NYLJ, Oct. 30, 1980); Capital Newspapers v. Burns, 67 NY 2d 562 (1986)]. Conversely, to the extent that items relating to public officers or employees are irrelevant to the performance of their official duties, it has been found that disclosure would indeed constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy [see e.g., Matter of Wool, Sup. Ct., Nassau Cty., NYLJ, Nov. 22, 1977, dealing with membership in a union; Minerva v. Village of Valley Stream, Sup. Ct., Nassau Cty., May 20, 1981, involving the back of a check payable to a municipal attorney that could indicate how that person spends his/her money; Seelig v. Sielaff, 200 AD 2d 298 (1994), concerning disclosure of social security numbers].

I note, too, that it has been held that disclosure of a public employee's educational background would not constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy and must be disclosed [see Ruberti, Girvin & Ferlazzo v. NYS Division of State Police, 641 NYS 2d 411, 218 AD 2d 494 (1996)].

Additionally, in a judicial decision, Kwasnik v. City of New York (Supreme Court, New York County, September 26, 1997), the court quoted from and relied upon an opinion rendered by this office and held that those portions of resumes, including information detailing one's public employment, must be disclosed. The Committee's opinion stated that:

"If, for example, an individual must have certain types of experience, educational accomplishments or certifications as a condition precedent to serving in [a] particular position, those aspects of a resume or application would in my view be relevant to the performance of the official duties of not only the individual to whom the record pertains, but also the appointing agency or officers ... to the extent that records sought contain information pertaining to the requirements that must have been met to hold the position, they should be disclosed, for I believe that disclosure of those aspects of documents would result in a permissible rather than an unwarranted invasion [of] personal privacy. Disclosure represents the only means by which the public can be aware of whether the incumbent of the position has met the requisite criteria for serving in that position.

"The Opinion further stated that:

"Although some aspects of one's employment history may be withheld, the fact of a person's public employment is a matter of public record, for records identifying public employees, their titles and salaries must be prepared and made available under the Freedom of Information Law [see §87(3)(b)]."

The other provision of significance is §87(2)(g), which permits an agency to withhold records that:

"are inter-agency or intra-agency materials which are not:

- i. statistical or factual tabulations or data;
- ii. instructions to staff that affect the public;
- iii. final agency policy or determinations; or
- iv. external audits, including but not limited to audits performed by the comptroller and the federal government..."

It is noted that the language quoted above contains what in effect is a double negative. While inter-agency or intra-agency materials may be withheld, portions of such materials consisting of statistical or factual information, instructions to staff that affect the public, final agency policy or determinations or external audits must be made available, unless a different ground for denial could appropriately be asserted. Concurrently, those portions of inter-agency or intra-agency materials that are reflective of opinion, advice, recommendation and the like could in my view be withheld.

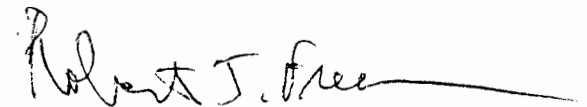

While the documentation at issue consists of "intra-agency material", much of it would be factual in nature and be available, therefore, under §87(2)(g)(i); other elements of the documentation would reflect an agency's policy (i.e., a job description) or a final agency determination (i.e., records indicating that a position was abolished or that a person was hired). It would appear that the only aspects of the records that could be withheld under §87(2)(g) would be predecisional materials consisting of advice, opinions, recommendations and the like.

Lastly, minutes of meetings of public bodies are clearly available (see Open Meetings Law, §106), and it has been held that tape recordings of open meetings are accessible under the Freedom of Information Law (see Zaleski v. Hicksville Union Free School District, Board of Education of Hicksville Union Free School, Sup. Ct., Nassau Cty., NYLJ, Dec. 27, 1978).

In an effort to enhance compliance with and understanding of the Freedom of Information Law, copies of this opinion will be forwarded to School District officials.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Dear Ms. Oliver:

I have received your email inquiry. The short answer to your question is that the fee for reproducing records other than photocopies is based on the "actual cost of reproduction". If information is transferred onto a disk, the fee would be based on computer time and the cost of the disk; if information is printed out from a disk, the fee would be based on computer time and the cost of paper; if a paper record is photocopied, the fee could be up to 25 cents per photocopy up to 9 by 14 inches.

If you need additional information, please call at (518) 474-2518 (I will be here for the rest of the day but out of the office on Thursday and Friday). If you want a more expansive written opinion, please let me know. That kind of opinion could be prepared within approximately three weeks based on our current backlog.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Dear Mr. Shankman:

I have received your letter of April 22 and the materials attached to it. As I understand the matter, the documentation relates to a request for records made to the Department of Public Service for records pertaining to settlement negotiations involving the Department and the parties to a proceeding cited as Case 98-C-1079.

While some of the records sought were disclosed, others underwent substantial redaction pursuant to §87(2)(g) of the Freedom of Information Law. With respect to the remaining records that were withheld, Mr. Steven Blow, the Department's Records Access Officer, wrote that:

“they are excepted from disclosure pursuant to a specific State statute - namely, §3101(c) of the Civil Practice Law and Rules, which sets forth the attorney work product privilege. Please be advised as well that the Department has in its possession more than 100 documents that are excepted from disclosure pursuant to POL §87(2)(a) in that they are ‘confident information’ [sic] within the meaning of §15 of the Public Service Law, which prohibits employees and agents of the Department from divulging such information. I find that such ‘confidential information’ includes ‘discussions, admissions, concessions and offers to settle,’ within the meaning of 16 NYCRR §3.9(d).”

In this regard, I offer the following comments.

As a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law.

Insofar as the request involved intra-agency materials, §87(2)(g) authorizes an agency to withhold records that:

"are inter-agency or intra-agency materials which are not:

- i. statistical or factual tabulations or data;
- ii. instructions to staff that affect the public;
- iii. final agency policy or determinations; or
- iv. external audits, including but not limited to audits performed by the comptroller and the federal government..."

It is noted that the language quoted above contains what in effect is a double negative. While inter-agency or intra-agency materials may be withheld, portions of such materials consisting of statistical or factual information, instructions to staff that affect the public, final agency policy or determinations or external audits must be made available, unless a different ground for denial could appropriately be asserted. Concurrently, those portions of inter-agency or intra-agency materials that are reflective of opinion, advice, recommendation and the like could in my view be withheld.

If the deletions from intra-agency materials do not consist of the kinds of information described in subparagraphs (i) through (iv) of §87(2)(g), I believe that they would have properly been made.

With respect to the remainder of the records at issue, the analysis is more complex, for it involves several provisions of law. Among them is §15 of the Public Service Law, which states in relevant part that:

"Any employee or agent of the department who divulges any confidential information which may come to his knowledge during the course of any inspection or examination of property, accounts, records or memoranda of any person, corporation or municipality subject to the jurisdiction of the commission, except insofar as he may be directed by the commission, or by a court or judge, or authorized by law, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor."

Another is 16 NYCRR §3.9(d), which is entitled "Confidentiality of settlement discussions" and states that:

Mr. Jeffrey Shankman

"No discussion, admission, concession or offer to stipulate or settle, whether oral or written, made during any negotiation session concerning a stipulation or settlement shall be subject to discovery, or admissible in any evidentiary hearing against any participant who objects to its admission. Participating parties, their representatives and other persons attending settlement negotiations shall hold confidential such discussions, admissions, concessions, and offers to settle and shall not disclose them outside the negotiations except to their principals, who shall also be bound by the confidentiality requirement, without the consent of the parties participating in the negotiations. The Administrative Law Judge assigned to the case, or the director of the appropriate division if no judge has been assigned, may impose appropriate sanctions for the violation of this subdivision which may include exclusion from the settlement process."

Based on Mr. Blow's response, it appears that the basis for the promulgation of §3.9(d) is the authority to withhold "confidential information" pursuant to §15 of the Public Service Law. From my perspective, the term "confidential" is unclear, and the extent to which the Department may claim confidentiality under that statute is equally unclear. In my view, it may be contended that §15 merely permits the Department to confer confidentiality with respect to those records that may be withheld under the Freedom of Information Law.

I note that §15 was initially enacted in 1910, as was §16. Subdivision (1) of the latter states that "All proceedings of the commission and all documents and records in its possession shall be public records." If construed literally, all records of the Public Service Commission, without exception, would be accessible to any person. However, in considering language in a statute that was enacted prior to the Freedom of Information Law that is as broad as §16, the Court of Appeals found, in essence, that such a result would be anomalous. In brief, §51 of the General Municipal Law states that all records of a municipality are public. Nevertheless, in responding to a contention that §51 requires that all records of a municipality be made available, regardless of their contents, the Court of Appeals held in 1985 that:

"Such a result would nullify the FOIL exemptions, which the Legislature - presumably aware of General Municipal Law §51 at the time it enacted FOIL - could not have intended. To give effect to both statutes, the FOIL exemptions must be read as having engrafted, as a matter of public policy, certain limitations on the disclosure of otherwise accessible records" [Xerox Corporation v. Town of Webster, 65 NY 131, 490 NYS 2d 488, 489 (1985)].

In my view, despite the breadth of the language ostensibly granting access to records of the Department of Public Service pursuant to §16, the exceptions in the Freedom of Information Law, as in the case of §51 of the General Municipal Law, should be considered to have been "engrafted" onto §16.

While there is no judicial decision on the matter of which I am aware, it is likely in my opinion that the same principle would apply with respect to the ability to claim that records are confidential under §15 of the Public Service Law. Because that statute was enacted long prior to the Freedom of Information Law, and because it does not refer to particular records, but rather to a non-specific capacity to claim confidentiality, a court, as in Xerox, may consider that confidentiality may be claimed only in conjunction with the exceptions to rights of access appearing in §87(2) of the Freedom of Information Law.

If that conclusion may be reached, and if §3.9(d) of the regulations is based on the authority to withhold records conferred by §15, the regulations would authorize the Department to deny access to its records only to the extent authorized by the Freedom of Information Law. Similarly, if there is no statutory basis for the confidentiality provisions contained in the regulation in question, the same conclusion would be reached, that the Department could not withhold records unless a statute so permits, i.e., the Freedom of Information Law. I note that it has been held by several courts, including the Court of Appeals, that an agency's regulations or the provisions of a local enactment, such as an administrative code, local law, charter or ordinance, for example, do not constitute a "statute" [see e.g., Morris v. Martin, Chairman of the State Board of Equalization and Assessment, 440 NYS 2d 365, 82 Ad 2d 965, reversed 55 NY 2d 1026 (1982); Zuckerman v. NYS Board of Parole, 385 NYS 2d 811, 53 AD 2d 405 (1976); Sheehan v. City of Syracuse, 521 NYS 2d 207 (1987)]. Therefore, for purposes of §87(2)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law concerning records that "are specifically exempted from disclosure by state or federal statute", an agency's regulations would not constitute a statute that could diminish rights of access otherwise conferred by law.

In conjunction with the foregoing, if the Freedom of Information Law governs rights of access, the claims of confidentiality with respect to documents prepared in relation to settlement discussions would in my opinion be questionable.

Mr. Blow's response cited §3101(c) of the Civil Practice Law and Rules (CPLR), which exempts attorney work product from disclosure. Insofar as that provision may validly be asserted, I believe that the records would be exempt from the Freedom of Information Law in accordance with §87(2)(a). From my perspective, although §3101(c) of the CPLR authorizes confidentiality regarding the work product of an attorney, those records remain confidential in my opinion only so long as they are not disclosed to a third party or an adversary or a filed with a court, for example. I do not believe that materials that are served upon or shared with an adversary could be characterized as confidential or exempt from disclosure.

As you may be aware, §3101 pertains disclosure in a context related to litigation, and subdivision (a) reflects the general principle that "[t]here shall be full disclosure of all matter material and necessary in the prosecution or defense of an action..." The Advisory Committee Notes pertaining to §3101 state that the intent is "to facilitate disclosure before trial of the facts bearing on a case while limiting the possibilities of abuse." The prevention of "abuse" is considered in the remaining provisions of §3101, which describe narrow limitations on disclosure. One of those limitations, §3101(c), states that "[t]he work product of an attorney shall not be obtainable." Another provision that may be at issue pertains to material prepared for litigation, and §3101(d)(2) states in relevant part that:

"materials otherwise discoverable under subdivision (a) of this section and prepared in anticipation of litigation or for trial by or for another party, or by or for the other party's representative (including an attorney, consultant, surety, indemnitor, insurer or agent), may be obtained only upon a showing that the party seeking discovery has substantial need of the materials in the preparation of the case and is unable without undue hardship to obtain the substantial equivalent of the materials by other means. In ordering discovery of the materials when the required showing has been made, the court shall protect against disclosure of the mental impressions, conclusions, opinions or legal theories of an attorney or other representative of a party concerning the litigation."

Both of those provisions are intended to shield from an adversary records that would result in a strategic advantage or disadvantage, as the case may be. Reliance on both in the context of a request made under the Freedom of Information Law is in my view dependent upon a finding that the records have not been disclosed, particularly to an adversary. In a decision in which it was determined that records could justifiably be withheld as attorney work product, the "disputed documents" were "clearly work product documents which contain the opinions, reflections and thought process of partners and associates" of a law firm "which have not been communicated or shown to individuals outside of that law firm" [Estate of Johnson, 538 NYS 2d 173 (1989)]. In another decision, the relationship between the attorney-privilege and the ability to withhold the work product of an attorney was discussed, and it was found that:

"The attorney-client privilege requires some showing that the subject information was disclosed in a confidential communication to an attorney for the purpose of obtaining legal advice (Matter of Priest v. Hennessy, 51 N.Y.2d 62, 68-69, 431 N.Y.S.2d 511, 409 N.E.2d 983). The work-product privilege requires an attorney affidavit showing that the information was generated by an attorney for the purpose of litigation (see, Warren v. New York City Tr. Auth., 34 A.D.2d 749, 310 N.Y.S.2d 277). The burden of satisfying each element of the privilege falls on the party asserting it (Priest v. Hennessy, supra, 51 N.Y.2d at 69, 431 N.Y.S. 2d 511, 409 N.E.2d 983), and conclusory assertions will not suffice (Witt v. Triangle Steel Prods. Corp., 103 A.D.2d 742, 477 N.Y.S.2d 210)" [Coastal Oil New York, Inc. v. Peck, [184 AD 2d 241 (1992)].

In a discussion of the parameters of the attorney-client relationship and the conditions precedent to its initiation, it has been held that:

Mr. Jeffrey Shankman

"In general, 'the privilege applies only if (1) the asserted holder of the privilege is or sought to become a client; (2) the person to whom the communication was made (a) is a member of the bar of a court, or his subordinate and (b) in connection with this communication relates to a fact of which the attorney was informed (a) by his client (b) without the presence of strangers (c) for the purpose of securing primarily either (i) an opinion on law or (ii) legal services (iii) assistance in some legal proceeding, and not (d) for the purpose of committing a crime or tort; and (4) the privilege has been (a) claimed and (b) not waived by the client'" [People v. Belge, 59 AD 2d 307, 399 NYS 2d 539, 540 (1977)].

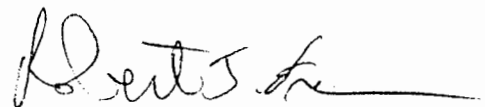

The thrust of case law concerning material prepared for litigation is consistent with the preceding analysis, in that §3101(d) may properly be asserted as a means of shielding such material from an adversary.

In my view, insofar as the records in question have been communicated between or among the Department and the parties, any claim of privilege or its equivalent would be effectively waived. Once records in the nature of attorney work product or material prepared for litigation are transmitted to a third party, I believe that the capacity to claim exemptions from disclosure under §3101(c) or (d) of the CPLR or, therefore, §87(2)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, ends.

If the preceding analysis is accurate, the extent to which the records sought may be withheld would be limited.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Robert J. Freeman

Dear Mr. Conrad:

I have received your e-mail communication in which you referred to a memo that you had inspected but was withheld when you asked for a copy. The agency indicated that the record in question is an "intra-agency document, and that it is not subject to FOIL." You have questioned the propriety of a refusal to make a copy of a record that had already been disclosed for your inspection.

In this regard, as a general matter, when records are available for inspection under the Freedom of Information Law, I believe that they are available for copying and that an agency must provide copies upon payment of the requisite fee [see Freedom of Information Law, §89(3)]. Therefore, assuming that a disclosure was not inadvertent and was made "intelligently and voluntarily" [see McGraw-Edison v. Williams, 509 NYS 2d 285, 287 (1986)], it would appear that an agency would have waived its right to prohibit a person who inspected a record from copying a record that was previously disclosed for the purpose of inspection.

In the case cited in the preceding paragraph, among the records inspected was a document that the agency believed was exempted from disclosure and which should have been withheld. It was held that an inadvertent disclosure of an exempt record did not create a right to copy the record (McGraw-Edison Co. v. Williams, supra). If indeed records may justifiably be withheld, but they were inadvertently made available for inspection, it would appear that an agency could properly deny a request that the records be copied.

The provision upon which the denial was based, §87(2)(g), permits an agency to withhold records that:

Mr. John A. Conrad
May 17, 1999
Page -2-

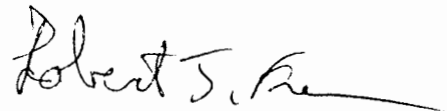

"are inter-agency or intra-agency materials which are not:

- i. statistical or factual tabulations or data;
- ii. instructions to staff that affect the public;
- iii. final agency policy or determinations; or
- iv. external audits, including but not limited to audits performed by the comptroller and the federal government..."

It is noted that the language quoted above contains what in effect is a double negative. While inter-agency or intra-agency materials may be withheld, portions of such materials consisting of statistical or factual information, instructions to staff that affect the public, final agency policy or determinations or external audits must be made available, unless a different ground for denial could appropriately be asserted. Concurrently, those portions of inter-agency or intra-agency materials that are reflective of opinion, advice, recommendation and the like could in my view be withheld.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Robert J. Freeman

Dear Mr. Garcia:

I have received your letter of May 10 in which you requested records from this office pertaining to criminal charges concerning yourself.

In this regard, the Committee on Open Government is authorized to provide advice concerning the Freedom of Information Law. The Committee does not maintain records generally and it does not possess the records of your interest.

If you are seeking records maintained by a unit of state or local government in New York, a request may be made to the agency's designated records access officer. The records access officer has the duty of coordinating an agency's response to requests. I note, too, that §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law requires that an applicant must "reasonably describe" the records sought. Therefore, a request should include sufficient detail to enable agency staff to locate and identify the records.

Lastly, the statute that you cited is the federal Freedom of Information Act, which applies only to federal agencies. While that Act authorizes an agency to waive fees in certain circumstances, there is no similar provision in the New York Freedom of Information Law. Therefore, an agency subject to the New York Freedom of Information Law may charge its established fees, even if a request is made by an indigent inmate (see Whitehead v. Morgenthau, 552 NYS2d 518 (1990)).

I hope that I have been of assistance.

In this regard, the regulations promulgated by the Department of Environmental Conservation require disclosure of the kinds of records at issue. Specifically, 6 NYCRR §617.12(b)(3) states that:

“All SEQR documents and notices, including but not limited to, EAF’s, negative declarations, positive declarations, scopes, notices of completion of an EIS, EISs, notices of hearing and findings must be maintained in files that are readily accessible to the public and made available on request.”

Dear Mr. Hynard:

I have received your letter of April 23 and the materials attached to it. As I understand the matter, you have sought assistance in obtaining records from Suffolk County concerning an incident involving correction officers and your medical treatment.

If my interpretation of the matter is accurate, the records relating to the correction officers would properly have been withheld; the medical records should have been disclosed. In this regard, I offer the following comments.

By way of background, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law.

The first ground for denial, §87(2)(a), pertains to records that "are specifically exempted from disclosure by state or federal statute." One such statute is §50-a of the Civil Rights Law. In brief, that statute provides that personnel records of police and correction officers that are used to evaluate performance toward continued employment or promotion are confidential. The Court of Appeals, the State's highest court, in reviewing the legislative history leading to its enactment, has held that the exemption from disclosure conferred by §50-a of the Civil Rights Law "was designed to limit access to said personnel records by criminal defense counsel, who used the contents of the records, including unsubstantiated and irrelevant complaints against officers, to embarrass officers during cross-examination" [Capital Newspapers v. Burns, 67 NY2d 562, 568 (1986)]. In another decision which dealt with unsubstantiated complaints against correction officers, the Court of Appeals held that the purpose of §50-a "was to prevent the release of sensitive personnel records that could be used in litigation for purposes of harassing or embarrassing correction officers" [Prisoners' Legal Services v. NYS Department of Correctional Services, 73 NY 2d 26, 538 NYS 2d 190, 191 (1988)]. The Court in an opinion rendered last month reiterated its view of §50-a, citing that decision and stating that:

Mr. Paul Hynard

"...we recognized that the decisive factor in determining whether an officer's personnel record was exempted from FOIL disclosure under Civil Rights Law § 50-a was the potential use of the information contained therein, not the specific purpose of the particular individual requesting access, nor whether the request was actually made in contemplation of litigation.

'Documents pertaining to misconduct or rules violations by corrections officers – which could well be used in various ways against the officers – are the very sort of record which  was intended to be kept confidential.  The legislative purpose underlying section 50-a  was  to protect the officers from the use of records  as a means for harassment and reprisals and for the purpose of cross-examination' (73 NY2d, at 31 [emphasis supplied])" (Daily Gazette v. City of Schenectady, ___ NY2d ___, April 6, 1999).

In short, the records of your interest that pertain to correction officers would appear to be exempt from disclosure.

With regard to medical records, the Freedom of Information Law, in my view, likely permits that some of those records may be withheld in whole or in part, depending upon their contents. For instance, medical records prepared by Hospital personnel could be characterized as "intra-agency materials" that fall within the scope of §87(2)(g) of the Freedom of Information Law. To the extent that such materials consist of advice, opinion, recommendation and the like, I believe that the Freedom of Information Law would permit a denial.

Nevertheless, a different statute, §18 of the Public Health Law, generally grants rights of access to medical records to the subjects of the records. As such, that statute may provide greater access to medical records than the Freedom of Information Law. It is suggested that you resubmit your request and make specific reference to §18 of the Public Health Law when seeking medical records.

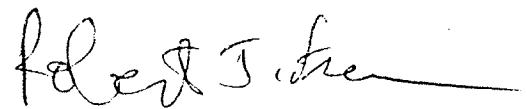

To obtain additional information concerning access to medical records and the fees that may be charged for searching and copying those records, you may write to:

Dear Mr. Hynard:

I have received your letter of April 20 and the correspondence attached to it. You have sought assistance in obtaining a report that you gave to the New York City Police Department. You indicated that you have requested the report but that you received no response.

In this regard, I point out that the regulations promulgated by the Committee on Open Government (21 NYCRR Part 1401) require that each agency designate one or more persons as "records access officer." The records access officer has the duty of coordinating an agency's response to requests, and requests should ordinarily be sent to that person. It is suggested that you renew your request and send it to Sgt. Richard Evangelista, Records Access Officer, New York City Police Department, One Police Plaza, New York, NY 10038.

Next, the Freedom of Information Law provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies must respond to requests. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

"Each entity subject to the provisions of this article, within five business days of the receipt of a written request for a record reasonably described, shall make such record available to the person requesting it, deny such request in writing or furnish a written acknowledgement of the receipt of such request and a statement of the approximate date when such request will be granted or denied..."

Mr. Paul Hynard
Page -2-

If neither a response to a request nor an acknowledgement of the receipt of a request is given within five business days, or if an agency delays responding for an unreasonable time after it acknowledges that a request has been received, a request may, in my opinion, be considered to have been constructively denied. In such a circumstance, I believe that the denial may be appealed in accordance with §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law. That provision states in relevant part that:

"...any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive, or governing body, who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

In addition, it has been held that when an appeal is made but a determination is not rendered within ten business days of the receipt of the appeal as required under §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, the appellant has exhausted his or her administrative remedies and may initiate a challenge to a constructive denial of access under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Rules [Floyd v. McGuire, 87 AD 2d 388, appeal dismissed 57 NY 2d 774 (1982)].

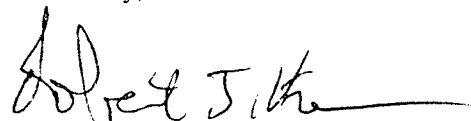

For your information, the person designated by the Police Department to determine appeals is Susan Petito, Special Counsel.

As you may be aware, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law. If the record sought consists of information that you provided, it is unlikely that any of the grounds for denial would be pertinent.

Lastly, you cited the federal Freedom of Information Act and asked for a waiver of fees. That statute pertains only to federal agencies. Further, although the federal Act includes provisions concerning fee waivers, there is no similar provision in the New York Freedom of Information Law. I note, too, that it has been held that an agency subject to the New York law may charge its established fee, even if the request is made by an indigent inmate [see Whitehead v. Morgenthau, 518 NYS2d 552 (1990)].

Dear Mr. Hodges:

I have received your letter of April 20. You have sought assistance in obtaining hospital records pertaining to yourself that you contend are maintained by the Department of Corrections' Archives. You indicated that the Department's Records Access Officer, Thomas Antenen, has refused to obtain them from the Archives.

In this regard, it is unclear on the basis of your letter whether the records in question remain in the legal custody of the Department of Correction. If they continue to be in the custody of that agency, I believe that it would be required to respond to your request in a manner consistent with law. Assuming that you can provide sufficient detail to enable Department staff to locate and identify the records at issue, you would meet the standard of "reasonably describing" the records imposed by §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law.

On the other hand, it is possible that the records, due to their age, might have been transferred to the New York Municipal Archives and that they are now in the legal custody of that entity, which is part of the New York City Department of Records and Information Services. It is suggested that you write directly to the Municipal Archives at 31 Chamber Street, Suite 103, New York, NY 10007 and that you seek the records from that agency. Again, any such request should include sufficient detail to enable agency staff to locate and identify the records.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Dear Mr. Kolokotronis:

I have received your recent letter in which you asked whether there is a "hardship clause in the FOIA that allows citizen requested documents without paying copying fees."

In this regard, the federal Freedom of Information Act, which applies to federal agencies only, includes provisions regarding fee waivers. The New York Freedom of Information Law, which applies to records maintained by state and local government, does not contain any similar provision. I note, too, that it has been held that an agency may charge its established fee, even if the applicant is indigent [see Whitehead v. Morgenthau, 552 NYS 2d 518 (1990)].

If a record is available in its entirety under the New York Freedom of Information Law, an applicant may inspect it at no charge. If copies are requested, §87(1)(b)(iii) states that the fee for copies generally cannot exceed twenty-five cents per photocopy; in the case of records that cannot be photocopied, i.e., tape recordings, computer disks, etc., the fee would be based upon the actual cost of reproduction.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

E-mail

TO: Lila Martin

FROM: Robert J. Freeman, Executive Director

RJF

Dear Ms. Martin:

I received your e-mail message dated April 28 yesterday. Please note that the e-mail address that you used was inaccurate, and that that resulted in the delay in response.

You wrote that your request to inspect Cornwall High School yearbooks was denied by the principal, and you questioned the propriety of her response.

From my perspective, there is no basis for prohibiting you from looking at the yearbooks. In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First, the Freedom of Information Law pertains to agency records. A school district clearly is an "agency" [see Freedom of Information Law, §86(3)], and §86(4) of that statute defines the term "record" to mean:

"any information kept, held, filed, produced, reproduced by, with or for an agency or the state legislature, in any physical form whatsoever including, but not limited to, reports, statements, examinations, memoranda, opinions, folders, files, books, manuals, pamphlets, forms, papers, designs, drawings, maps, photos, letters, microfilms, computer tapes or discs, rules, regulations or codes."

Based on the foregoing, assuming that the District or the High School maintains a copy of a yearbook, I believe that the yearbook would constitute a "record" that falls within the scope of rights conferred by the Freedom of Information Law.

Ms. Lila Martin

Second, that statute is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law. In my view, none of the grounds for denial could justifiably be asserted to withhold a yearbook.

While records identifiable to students ordinarily may be withheld pursuant to the federal Family Educational Rights and Privacy Act (20 USC §1232g), in the case of a yearbook, by its nature, those identified have consented to disclosure. Moreover, any purchaser of a yearbook has acquired personally identifying details concerning students that appear throughout the yearbook, i.e., through photographs of individuals, classes, teams, clubs, etc. Because those details have been and could be made known to any purchaser of a yearbook and any others with whom the contents of the yearbook have been shared, I do not believe that the District would have any basis for denying access to a yearbook. Moreover, frequently yearbooks are kept and made available to the public at public libraries. If you cannot view the yearbooks at a public library, again, it is my view that the District must make them available for inspection.

I note, too, that as a matter of routine, newspapers throughout the state frequently print special supplements involving student athlete or similar awards that include not only the photographs of students and the schools that they attend, but also their grade point average, class rank, SAT scores, academic honors and athletic achievements. In short, the disclosure or publication of the kind of record requested from the Cornwall Central School District is not uncommon. Again, to suggest that information derived from a yearbook that could have been purchased by anyone could justifiably be withheld would, in my view, be inconsistent with law.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Ms. Judy Manzer
Utica Observer- Dispatch
221 Oriskany Plaza
Utica, NY 13501

Dear Ms. Manzer:

As you are aware, I have received your correspondence of February 8 and May 20. As indicated to you by phone, based upon previous conversations, it was my belief that you did not seek a written advisory opinion relative to your letter of February 8. Based upon the receipt of the more recent correspondence, you indicated that you are seeking an opinion from this office.

In brief, some time ago you requested records relating to the investigation of Gary Evans, including his activities, his escape and his death. The Division of State Police denied the request pursuant to §160.50 of the Criminal Procedure Law.

Section 160.50 pertains to situations in which a criminal action or proceeding against a person is terminated in favor of that person. In those situations, the records pertaining to the event relating to the arrest are typically sealed. It is my understanding that the intent of §160.50 is to preclude the disclosure of information regarding an arrest that did not result in a conviction in order that the fact of the arrest and related details are not made known later to the detriment of the individual against whom the charges were terminated. Since Mr. Evans died, it does not appear that the intent or thrust of §160.50 would be pertinent. Moreover, as I understand that provision, it would not be applicable. Subdivision (3) describes the instances in which a criminal action or proceeding against a person is considered terminated in favor of such person. From my perspective, none of those circumstances would be pertinent. I note that paragraph (j) of subdivision (3) refers to the sealing of records following the arrest of an individual but prior to the filing of an accusatory instrument. Since Mr. Evans had been indicted and arraigned, paragraph (j) would not apply. In short, if my interpretation of §160.50 is accurate, it would not serve as a basis for a denial of access.

Ms. Judy Manzer

In that event, the Freedom of Information Law would govern rights of access. As a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law.

I note that the Court of Appeals, the State's highest court, has stressed that the Freedom of Information Law should be construed expansively. Most recently, in Gould v. New York City Police Department [87 NY 2d 267 (1996)], the Court reiterated its general view of the intent of the Freedom of Information Law, stating that:

"To ensure maximum access to government records, the 'exemptions are to be narrowly construed, with the burden resting on the agency to demonstrate that the requested material indeed qualifies for exemption' (Matter of Hanig v. State of New York Dept. of Motor Vehicles, 79 N.Y.2d 106, 109, 580 N.Y.S.2d 715, 588 N.E.2d 750 see, Public Officers Law § 89[4][b]). As this Court has stated, '[o]nly where the material requested falls squarely within the ambit of one of these statutory exemptions may disclosure be withheld' (Matter of Fink v. Lefkowitz, 47 N.Y.2d, 567, 571, 419 N.Y.S.2d 467, 393 N.E.2d 463)" (id., 275).

Just as significant, the Court in Gould repeatedly specified that a categorical denial of access to records is inconsistent with the requirements of the Freedom of Information Law. In that case, the Police Department contended that "complaint follow up reports" could be withheld in their entirety on the ground that they fall within the exception regarding intra-agency materials, §87(2)(g), an exception separate from that cited in response to your request. The Court, however, wrote that: "Petitioners contend that because the complaint follow-up reports contain factual data, the exemption does not justify complete nondisclosure of the reports. We agree" (id., 276), and stated as a general principle that "blanket exemptions for particular types of documents are inimical to FOIL's policy of open government" (id., 275). The Court also offered guidance to agencies and lower courts in determining rights of access and referred to several decisions it had previously rendered, stating that:

"...to invoke one of the exemptions of section 87(2), the agency must articulate 'particularized and specific justification' for not disclosing requested documents (Matter of Fink vl. Lefkowitz, supra, 47 N.Y.2d, at 571, 419 N.Y.S.2d 467, 393 N.E.2d 463). If the court is unable to determine whether withheld documents fall entirely within the scope of the asserted exemption, it should conduct an in camera inspection of representative documents and order disclosure of all nonexempt, appropriately redacted material (see, Matter of Xerox Corp. v. Town of Webster, 65 N.Y.2d 131, 133, 490 N.Y.S. 2d, 488, 480 N.E.2d 74; Matter of Farbman & Sons v. New York City Health & Hosps. Corp., supra, 62 N.Y.2d, at 83, 476 N.Y.S.2d 69, 464 N.E.2d 437)" (id.).

Ms. Judy Manzer

In the context of your request, I am not suggesting that all of the records sought must be disclosed. Nevertheless, based on the direction given by the Court of Appeals, I believe that the records must be reviewed individually by the agency for the purpose of determining the extent to which their contents fall within the scope of one or more of the grounds for denial of access.

I hope that I have been of assistance. Should any further questions arise, please feel free to contact me.

Sincerely,

Warwick, NY 10990-0900

Dear Mr. Vasquez:

I have received your letter of April 19. You have asked if I "can make the Bronx Criminal Court Clerk, under the Freedom of Information Law, send [you] a copy of [a certain] bench warrant..."

In this regard, the Committee on Open Government is authorized to provide advice concerning the Freedom of Information Law. The Committee is not empowered to enforce that statute or compel an entity of government to grant or deny access to records.

Moreover, I point out that the Freedom of Information Law pertains to agency records, and that §86(3) of that statute defines the term "agency" to include:

"any state or municipal department, board, bureau, division, commission, committee, public authority, public corporation, council, office or other governmental entity performing a governmental or proprietary function for the state or any one or more municipalities thereof, except the judiciary or the state legislature."

In turn, §86(1) defines the term "judiciary" to mean:

"the courts of the state, including any municipal or district court, whether or not of record."

Mr. Angel Vasquez

Based on the provisions quoted above, the courts and court records are not subject to the Freedom of Information Law. This is not to suggest that court records are not generally available to the public, for other provisions of law (see e.g., Judiciary Law, §255) may grant broad public access to those records. It is recommended that a request for court records be directed to the clerk of the appropriate court, citing an applicable provision of law as the basis for the request.

I hope that the foregoing serves to clarify your understanding of the matter and that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Ms. Christine A. Wills

Dear Ms. Wills:

I have received your letters of April 19 and May 10, as well as related materials. As in the case of previous correspondence, you have sought an opinion concerning your right to obtain records from the Office of the Rensselaer County District Attorney pertaining to a drug raid in the City of Troy in 1992. The request was initially denied, and the denial was affirmed in a determination of your appeal on May 7.

From my perspective, while some of the records sought could justifiably have been withheld, others would appear to be available, perhaps in part. In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First and most importantly, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law. It is emphasized that the introductory language of §87(2) refers to the authority to withhold "records or portions thereof" that fall within the scope of the exceptions that follow. In my view, the phrase quoted in the preceding sentence evidences a recognition on the part of the Legislature that a single record or report, for example, might include portions that are available under the statute, as well as portions that might justifiably be withheld. That being so, I believe that it also imposes an obligation on an agency to review records sought, in their entirety, to determine which portions, if any, might properly be withheld or deleted prior to disclosing the remainder.

The Court of Appeals, the state's highest court, expressed its general view of the intent of the Freedom of Information Law most recently in Gould v. New York City Police Department [87 NY 2d 267 (1996)], stating that:

Ms. Christine A. Wills

"To ensure maximum access to government records, the 'exemptions are to be narrowly construed, with the burden resting on the agency to demonstrate that the requested material indeed qualifies for exemption' (Matter of Hanig v. State of New York Dept. of Motor Vehicles, 79 N.Y.2d 106, 109, 580 N.Y.S.2d 715, 588 N.E.2d 750 see, Public Officers Law § 89[4][b]). As this Court has stated, '[o]nly where the material requested falls squarely within the ambit of one of these statutory exemptions may disclosure be withheld' (Matter of Fink v. Lefkowitz, 47 N.Y.2d, 567, 571, 419 N.Y.S.2d 467, 393 N.E.2d 463)" (id., 275).

Just as significant, the Court in Gould repeatedly specified that a categorical denial of access to records is inconsistent with the requirements of the Freedom of Information Law. In that case, the agency contended that complaint follow up reports, also known as "DDS's", could be withheld in their entirety on the ground that they fall within the exception regarding intra-agency materials, §87(2)(g), an exception separate from those cited in response to your request. The Court, however, wrote that: "Petitioners contend that because the complaint follow-up reports contain factual data, the exemption does not justify complete nondisclosure of the reports. We agree" (id., 276). The Court then stated as a general principle that "blanket exemptions for particular types of documents are inimical to FOIL's policy of open government" (id., 275). The Court also offered guidance to agencies and lower courts in determining rights of access and referred to several decisions it had previously rendered, directing that:

"...to invoke one of the exemptions of section 87(2), the agency must articulate 'particularized and specific justification' for not disclosing requested documents (Matter of Fink v. Lefkowitz, supra, 47 N.Y.2d, at 571, 419 N.Y.S.2d 467, 393 N.E.2d 463). If the court is unable to determine whether withheld documents fall entirely within the scope of the asserted exemption, it should conduct an in camera inspection of representative documents and order disclosure of all nonexempt, appropriately redacted material (see, Matter of Xerox Corp. v. Town of Webster, 65 N.Y.2d 131, 133, 490 N.Y.S. 2d, 488, 480 N.E.2d 74; Matter of Farbman & Sons v. New York City Health & Hosps. Corp., supra, 62 N.Y.2d, at 83, 476 N.Y.S.2d 69, 464 N.E.2d 437)" (id.).

In the context of your request, it appears that a variety of records have been withheld in their entirety. While I am not suggesting that the records sought must necessarily be disclosed in full, based on the direction given by the Court of Appeals in several decisions, I believe that the records must be reviewed for the purpose of identifying those portions that fall within the scope of one or more of the grounds for denial of access. As the Court stated later in the decision: "Indeed, the Police Department is entitled to withhold complaint follow-up reports, or specific portions thereof, under any other applicable exemption, such as the law-enforcement exemption or the public-safety exemption, as long as the requisite particularized showing is made" (id., 277; emphasis added).

Ms. Christine A. Wills

Page -3-

One aspect of the request involved the "exact dates and approximate times said surveillance were conducted, and by what officers." The records were withheld under §87(2)(e)(i) and (iv). Those provisions state that an agency may withheld records compiled for law enforcement purposes when disclosure would:

"i. interfere with law enforcement investigations or judicial proceedings...

iv. reveal criminal investigative techniques or procedures, except routine techniques and procedures."

Since the event occurred seven years ago, it is difficult to envision how disclosure now would interfere with an investigation or, therefore, justify reliance on §87(2)(e)(i)..

The leading decision concerning §87(2)(e)(iv) is Fink v. Lefkowitz, which involved access to a manual prepared by a special prosecutor that investigated nursing homes, in which the Court of Appeals held that:

"The purpose of this exemption is obvious. Effective law enforcement demands that violators of the law not be apprised the nonroutine procedures by which an agency obtains its information (see Frankel v. Securities & Exch. Comm., 460 F2d 813, 817, cert den 409 US 889). However beneficial its thrust, the purpose of the Freedom of Information Law is not to enable persons to use agency records to frustrate pending or threatened investigations nor to use that information to construct a defense to impede a prosecution...

"Indicative, but not necessarily dispositive of whether investigative techniques are nonroutine is whether disclosure of those procedures would give rise to a substantial likelihood that violators could evade detection by deliberately tailoring their conduct in anticipation of avenues of inquiry to be pursued by agency personnel (see Cox v. United States Dept. of Justice, 576 F2d 1302, 1307-1308; City of Concord v. Ambrose, 333 F Supp 958)."

As the Court of Appeals has suggested, to the extent that the records in question include descriptions of investigative techniques which if disclosed would enable potential lawbreakers to evade detection or endanger the lives or safety of law enforcement personnel or others [see also, Freedom of Information Law, §87(2)(f)], a denial of access would be appropriate. The request, however, does not involve the nature of the surveillance, but merely the dates and times. As such, it is questionable in my view whether or the extent to which that exception would be pertinent or applicable.

Ms. Christine A. Wills

The names of the officers would, in my view, be public. In short, they would have been involved in the performance of their official duties. Further, again, the event to which the records relate occurred nearly seven years ago.

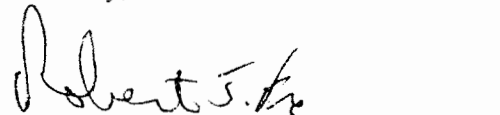

Another aspect of the request concerns the "exact date and approximate time said neighborhood complaints were lodged..." The request was denied on the basis of §87(2)(e)(iii) "as it would identify a confidential source or disclose confidential information relating to a criminal investigation." Additionally, §87(2)(f), which enables an agency to withhold records insofar as disclosure "would endanger the life or safety of any person", was cited. In the case of both exceptions, if there were few people living in the neighborhood at the time of the event, and if the deletion of personally identifying details would not serve to preclude you or others from ascertaining the identity of confidential informants or residents, the denial would likely have been proper. However, if numerous people lived or were present in the neighborhood at the time of the event, it is doubtful, in my opinion, that the identities of individuals could be ascertained after names or other personal details are deleted. If that is so, I believe that portions of the records indicating the date and approximate time that complaints were made would be accessible.

One element of the request apparently involved a tape recorded conversation between a confidential informant and a person later named as a defendant. If indeed the recording includes the voice of an informant, on the basis of §87(2)(e)(iii), I would agree with the District Attorney's denial of access. Similarly, if a $20 dollar bill was marked, and disclosure of the bill "would permit the public to potentially determine the method said $20 bill is 'marked' to ensure its authenticity", a denial of access would appear to be appropriate, for disclosure might enable potential lawbreakers to evade detection with that knowledge. Moreover, currency, in my view, would constitute evidentiary material rather than a "record" as defined by §86(4) of the Freedom of Information Law [see Allen v. Strojnowski, 129 AD2d 200, motion for leave to appeal denied, 70 NY 2d 871 (1989)]. If that is so, the Freedom of Information Law would not apply.

In sum, while some aspects of your request appear to have been properly denied, others likely should have been granted.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Robert J. Freeman

Dear Ms. George:

I have received your letter of April 22 and the correspondence attached to it. The materials pertain to a request made under the Freedom of Information Law for records of the Family Medicine Service Group in Syracuse.

In this regard, the Freedom of Information Law applies to agency records, and §86(3) of that statute defines the term "agency" to mean:

"any state or municipal department, board, bureau, division, commission, committee, public authority, public corporation, council, office or other governmental entity performing a governmental or proprietary function for the state or any one or more municipalities thereof, except the judiciary or the state legislature."

Based on the foregoing, in general, the Freedom of Information Law applies to entities of state and local government. If the Family Medicine Service Group is not a governmental entity, that statute would not be applicable.

The correspondence makes reference to a contract between the entity of your interest and the New York State Department of Health. If that is so, it is assumed that the Department of Health would have a copy of the contract and that, therefore, you could request and obtain that record from the Department, which is clearly subject to the requirements of the Freedom of Information Law. Similarly, if the Family Medicine Service Group has relationships with other units of government, while the Group would not be obliged to disclose its records, records maintained by those units of government concerning their relationship with the Group would fall within the coverage of the Freedom of Information Law. In that event, requests for records could be made to those units of government.

I hope that the foregoing serves to clarify your understanding of the matter and that I have been of assistance.

Dear Mr. Hernandez:

I have received your letter of April 22. You have sought an opinion concerning rights of access to records relating to an internal investigation of a police officer. It is likely in my view that the records of your interest may be withheld. In this regard, I offer the following comments.

By way of background, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law.

The first ground for denial, §87(2)(a), pertains to records that "are specifically exempted from disclosure by state or federal statute." One such statute is §50-a of the Civil Rights Law. In brief, that statute provides that personnel records of police and correction officers that are used to evaluate performance toward continued employment or promotion are confidential. The Court of Appeals, the State's highest court, in reviewing the legislative history leading to its enactment, has held that the exemption from disclosure conferred by §50-a of the Civil Rights Law "was designed to limit access to said personnel records by criminal defense counsel, who used the contents of the records, including unsubstantiated and irrelevant complaints against officers, to embarrass officers during cross-examination" [Capital Newspapers v. Burns, 67 NY2d 562, 568 (1986)]. In another decision which dealt with unsubstantiated complaints against correction officers, the Court of Appeals held that the purpose of §50-a "was to prevent the release of sensitive personnel records that could be used in litigation for purposes of harassing or embarrassing correction officers" [Prisoners' Legal Services v. NYS Department of Correctional Services, 73 NY 2d 26, 538 NYS 2d 190, 191 (1988)]. The Court in an opinion rendered last month reiterated its view of §50-a, citing that decision and stating that:

Mr. Andrews Hernandez

"...we recognized that the decisive factor in determining whether an officer's personnel record was exempted from FOIL disclosure under Civil Rights Law § 50-a was the potential use of the information contained therein, not the specific purpose of the particular individual requesting access, nor whether the request was actually made in contemplation of litigation.

'Documents pertaining to misconduct or rules violations by corrections officers – which could well be used in various ways against the officers – are the very sort of record which  was intended to be kept confidential.  The legislative purpose underlying section 50-a  was  to protect the officers from the use of records  as a means for harassment and reprisals and for the purpose of cross-examination' (73 NY2d, at 31 [emphasis supplied])" (Daily Gazette v. City of Schenectady, ___ NY2d ___, April 6, 1999).

In short, records pertaining to a police officer that are used to evaluate performance toward continued employment or promotion and which could be used in a litigation context are, according to judicial decisions, exempt from disclosure under §50-a of the Civil Rights Law and, therefore, §87(2)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law.

I hope that the foregoing serves to clarify your understanding of the matter and that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Mr. Ken Dufty

Ms. Sandra Woodward

[REDACTED]

Dear Mr. Dufty and Ms. Woodward:

I have received your letter of April 23 and the correspondence attached to it. You have sought guidance concerning difficulty in obtaining copies of certain records from the City of Rensselaer. Based on the information provided in your letter, I offer the following comments.

First, the City's Building Inspector permitted you to inspect a file relating to your property, which apparently consisted of approximately one hundred pages. When you asked for a copy of the file, he indicated that you must submit a request under the Freedom of Information Law and that "he would not release it until the 10-day FOIL waiting period had expired."

In this regard, the Freedom of Information Law contains no "10-day waiting period." On the contrary, §89(3) of that statute states in relevant part that:

"Each entity subject to the provisions of this article, within five business days of the receipt of a written request for a record reasonably described, shall make such record available to the person requesting it, deny such request in writing or furnish a written acknowledgement of the receipt of such request and a statement of the approximate date when such request will be granted or denied..."

While an agency must grant access to records, deny access or acknowledge the receipt of a request within five business days, when such acknowledgement is given, there is no precise time period within which an agency must grant or deny access to records. The time needed to do so may be dependent upon the volume of a request, the possibility that other requests have been made, the necessity to conduct legal research, the search and retrieval techniques used to locate the records and the like.

Mr. Ken Dufty
Ms. Sandra Woodward
May 25, 1999

Notwithstanding the foregoing, in my view, every law must be implemented in a manner that gives reasonable effect to its intent, and I point out that in its statement of legislative intent, §84 of the Freedom of Information Law states that "it is incumbent upon the state and its localities to extend public accountability wherever and whenever feasible." Therefore, if records are clearly available to the public under the Freedom of Information Law, or if they are readily retrievable, there may be no basis for a lengthy delay in disclosure. As the Court of Appeals has asserted:

"...the successful implementation of the policies motivating the enactment of the Freedom of Information Law centers on goals as broad as the achievement of a more informed electorate and a more responsible and responsive officialdom. By their very nature such objectives cannot hope to be attained unless the measures taken to bring them about permeate the body politic to a point where they become the rule rather than the exception. The phrase 'public accountability wherever and whenever feasible' therefore merely punctuates with explicitness what in any event is implicit" [Westchester News v. Kimball, 50 NY 2d 575, 579 (1980)].

Further, in my opinion, if, as a matter of practice or policy, an agency indicates in every instance that it will determine to grant or deny access to records following a certain "waiting period" or other particular period, such a practice or policy would be contrary to the thrust of the Freedom of Information Law.

Second, in a related vein, the regulations promulgated by the Committee on Open Government (21 NYCRR Part 1401) require that each agency designate one or more persons as "records access officer". The records access officer has the duty of coordinating the agency's response to requests. It is unclear whether the City's records access officer, who I believe is the City Clerk, had any knowledge of the situation described. If the Building Inspector is not a records access officer, the response to your request should, in my opinion, have been coordinated by the records access officer.

Third, you wrote that you were informed in response to your request for copies that there were different and far fewer records in the file than you had inspected. Here I point out that the Freedom of Information Law pertains to all agency records, and that §86(4) of the Law defines the term "record" expansively to include:

"any information kept, held, filed, produced, reproduced by, with or for an agency or the state legislature, in any physical form whatsoever including, but not limited to, reports, statements, examinations, memoranda, opinions, folders, files, books, manuals, pamphlets, forms, papers, designs, drawings, maps, photos, letters, microfilms, computer tapes or discs, rules, regulations or codes."

Mr. Ken Dufty
Ms. Sandra Woodward
May 25, 1999

Based on the foregoing, the documentation that you inspected, as well as the new materials in the file, would constitute City "records" that fall within the coverage of the Freedom of Information Law.

Further, since the contents of the file were made available to you for inspection by the Building Inspector, the same records must be made available for copying. In short, when records are available under the Freedom of Information Law, they must be made available for inspection and copying [see §§87(2) and 89(3)].

Next, if an agency indicates that it does not maintain or cannot locate a record, an applicant for the record may seek a certification to that effect. Section 89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law provides in part that, in such a situation, on request, an agency "shall certify that it does not have possession of such record or that such record cannot be found after diligent search." If you consider it worthwhile to do so, you could seek such a certification.

I point out that in Key v. Hynes [613 NYS 2d 926, 205 AD 2d 779 (1994)], it was found that a court could not validly accept conclusory allegations as a substitute for proof that an agency could not locate a record after having made a "diligent search". However, in another decision, such an allegation was found to be sufficient when "the employee who conducted the actual search for the documents in question submitted an affidavit which provided an adequate basis upon which to conclude that a 'diligent search' for the documents had been made" [Thomas v. Records Access Officer, 613 NYS 2d 929, 205 AD 2d 786 (1994)].

Lastly, while I am not suggesting that it applies, I point out that §89(8) of the Freedom of Information Law states that:

"Any person who, with intent to prevent public inspection of a record pursuant to this article, willfully conceals or destroys any such record shall be guilty of a violation.

Additionally, §240.65 of the Penal Law states that:

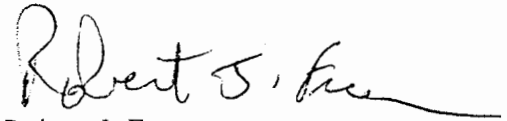

"A person is guilty of unlawful prevention of public access to records when, with intent to prevent the public inspection of a record pursuant to article six of the public officers law, he willfully conceals or destroys any such record."

From my perspective, the preceding may be applicable in two circumstances: first, when an agency employee receives a request for a record and indicates that the agency does not maintain the record even though he or she knows that the agency does maintain the record; or second, when an agency employee destroys a record following a request for that record in order to prevent public disclosure of the record.

Elmira, NY 14902-0500

Dear Mr. Byers:

I have received your letter of April 20. You have questioned your right to obtain the rap sheet of a witness who testified at your trial.

In this regard, as a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law.

With respect to rap sheets or criminal history records, the general repository of those records is the Division of Criminal Justice Services. While the subject of a criminal history record may obtain such record from the Division, it has been held that criminal history records maintained by that agency are exempted from public disclosure pursuant to §87(2)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law [Capital Newspapers v. Poklemba, Supreme Court, Albany County, April 6, 1989]. Nevertheless, if, for example, criminal conviction records were used in conjunction with a criminal proceeding by a district attorney, it has been held that the district attorney must disclose those records [see Thompson v. Weinstein, 150 AD 2d 782 (1989)].

It is noted that in a decision rendered by the Appellate Division, the Court reconfirmed its position that criminal history records are, in general, exempt from disclosure (Woods v. Kings County District Attorney's Office, ___ AD 2d ___, NYLJ, December 31, 1996). In Woods, the Court upheld a denial of a request for the rap sheets "of numerous individuals who were not witnesses at [the petitioner's] trial." However, it distinguished its determination from the holding in Thompson, supra, in which it was found that a rap sheet must be disclosed when the request is "limited to the criminal convictions and any pending criminal actions against an individual called by the People as a witness in the petitioner's criminal trial." Therefore, insofar as your inquiry involves a situation analogous to that present in Thompson, I believe that the District Attorney would be required to disclose.

Finally, it is also noted that while records relating to convictions may be available from the courts or other sources, when charges are dismissed in favor of an accused, records relating to arrests that did not result in convictions are generally sealed pursuant to §160.50 of the Criminal Procedure Law.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Ms. Eleanor Kapsiak

Dear Ms. Kapsiak:

I have received your letter of April 26, as well as the materials attached to it. You have sought assistance in obtaining records from the Kenmore-Town of Tonawanda Union Free School District.

According to the materials, you requested a report given to the Board of Education at a meeting which "shows class sizes and staffing at all of our 13 schools" and "figures for 1999-2000 and 1998 and 1999." The District Clerk denied the request on the ground that the report is "an internal government communication describing options for discussion purposes only..."

From my perspective, while some aspects of the report might justifiably be withheld, others must be disclosed. In this regard, I offer the following comments.

As a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law.

The only ground for denial of apparent relevance, §87(2)(g), permits an agency to withhold records that:

"are inter-agency or intra-agency materials which are not:

- i. statistical or factual tabulations or data;
- ii. instructions to staff that affect the public;

Ms. Eleanor Kapsiak

May 26, 1999

Page -2-

- iii. final agency policy or determinations; or
- iv. external audits, including but not limited to audits performed by the comptroller and the federal government..."

It is noted that the language quoted above contains what in effect is a double negative. While inter-agency or intra-agency materials may be withheld, portions of such materials consisting of statistical or factual information, instructions to staff that affect the public, final agency policy or determinations or external audits must be made available, unless a different ground for denial could appropriately be asserted. Concurrently, those portions of inter-agency or intra-agency materials that are reflective of opinion, advice, recommendation and the like could in my view be withheld.

In a case involving "budget worksheets", it was held that numerical figures, including estimates and projections of proposed expenditures, are accessible, even though they may have been advisory and subject to change. In that case, I believe that the records at issue contained three columns of numbers related to certain areas of expenditures. One column consisted of a breakdown of expenditures for the current fiscal year; the second consisted of a breakdown of proposed expenditures recommended by a state agency; the third consisted of a breakdown of proposed expenditures recommended by a budget examiner for the Division of the Budget. Although the latter two columns were merely estimates and subject to modification, they were found to be "statistical tabulations" accessible under the Freedom of Information Law as originally enacted [see Dunlea v. Goldmark, 380 NYS 2d 496, aff'd 54 AD 2d 446, aff'd 43 NY 2d 754 (1977)]. At that time, the Freedom of Information Law granted access to "statistical or factual tabulations" [see original Law, §88(1)(d)]. Currently, §87(2)(g)(i) requires the disclosure of "statistical or factual tabulations or data". As stated by the Appellate Division in Dunlea:

"[I]t is readily apparent that the language statistical or factual tabulation was meant to be something other than an expression of opinion or naked argument for or against a certain position. The present record contains the form used for work sheets and it apparently was designed to accomplish a statistical or factual presentation of data primarily in tabulation form. In view of the broad policy of public access expressed in §85 the work sheets have been shown by the appellants as being not a record made available in §88" (54 Ad 2d 446, 448)."

The Court was also aware of the fact that the records were used in the deliberative process, stating that:

"The mere fact that the document is a part of the deliberative process is irrelevant in New York State because §88 clearly makes the back-up factual or statistical information to a final decision available to the public. This necessarily means that the deliberative process is to be a subject of examination although limited to tabulations. In particular, there is no statutory requirement that such data be limited to 'objective' information and there no apparent necessity for such a limitation" (id. at 449).

Based upon the language of the determination quoted above, which was affirmed by the Court of Appeals, the state's highest court, it is my view that the records in question, to the extent that they consist of "statistical or factual tabulations or data", are accessible, unless a provision other than §87(2)(g) could be asserted as a basis for denial.

Another decision highlighted that the contents of materials falling within the scope of section 87(2)(g) represent the factors in determining the extent to which inter-agency or intra-agency materials must be disclosed or may be withheld. For example, in Ingram v. Axelrod, the Appellate Division held that:

"Respondent, while admitting that the report contains factual data, contends that such data is so intertwined with subject analysis and opinion as to make the entire report exempt. After reviewing the report in camera and applying to it the above statutory and regulatory criteria, we find that Special Term correctly held pages 3-5 ('Chronology of Events' and 'Analysis of the Records') to be disclosable. These pages are clearly a 'collection of statements of objective information logically arranged and reflecting objective reality'. (10 NYCRR 50.2[b]). Additionally, pages 7-11 (ambulance records, list of interviews) should be disclosed as 'factual data'. They also contain factual information upon which the agency relies (Matter of Miracle Mile Assoc. v Yudelson, 68 AD2d 176, 181 mot for lve to app den 48 NY2d 706). Respondents erroneously claim that an agency record necessarily is exempt if both factual data and opinion are intertwined in it; we have held that '[t]he mere fact that some of the data might be an estimate or a recommendation does not convert it into an expression of opinion' (Matter of Polansky v Regan, 81 AD2d 102, 104; emphasis added). Regardless, in the instant situation, we find these pages to be strictly factual and thus clearly disclosable" [90 AD 2d 568, 569 (1982)].

Similarly, the Court of Appeals has specified that the contents of intra-agency materials determine the extent to which they may be available or withheld, for it was held that:

"While the reports in principle may be exempt from disclosure, on this record - which contains only the barest description of them - we cannot determine whether the documents in fact fall wholly within the scope of FOIL's exemption for 'intra-agency materials,' as claimed by respondents. To the extent the reports contain 'statistical or factual tabulations or data' (Public Officers Law section 87[2][g][i], or other material subject to production, they should be redacted and made available to the appellant" (id. at 133).

Most recently, in response to a contention offered by the New York City Police Department that certain reports could be withheld because they are not final and because they relate to incidents for which no final determination had been made, the Court of Appeals rejected that finding and stated that:

"...we note that one court has suggested that complaint follow-up reports are exempt from disclosure because they constitute nonfinal intra-agency material, irrespective of whether the information contained in the reports is 'factual data' (see, Matter of Scott v. Chief Medical Examiner, 179 AD2d 443, 444, supra citing Public Officers Law §87(2)(g)). However, under a plain reading of §87(2)(g), the exemption for intra-agency material does not apply as long as the material falls within any one of the provision's four enumerated exceptions. Thus, intra-agency documents that contain 'statistical or factual tabulations or data' are subject to FOIL disclosure, whether or not embodied in a final agency policy or determination (see, Matter of Farbman & Sons v. New York City Health & Hosp. Corp., 62 NY2d 75, 83, supra; Matter of MacRae v. Dolce, 130 AD2d 577)... " [Gould et al. v. New York City Police Department, 87 NY2d 267, 276 (1996)].

In short, that a record is "internal" would not represent an end of an analysis of rights of access or an agency's obligation to review the contents of a record.

The Court also dealt with the issue of what constitutes "factual data" that must be disclosed under §87(2)(g)(i). In its consideration of the matter, the Court found that:

"...Although the term 'factual data' is not defined by statute, the meaning of the term can be discerned from the purpose underlying the intra-agency exemption, which is 'to protect the deliberative process of the government by ensuring that persons in an advisory role [will] be able to express their opinions freely to agency decision makers' (Matter of Xerox Corp. v. Town of Webster, 65 NY2d 131, 132 [quoting Matter of Sea Crest Constr. Corp. v. Stubing, 82 AD2d 546, 549]). Consistent with this limited aim to safeguard internal government consultations and deliberations, the exemption does not apply when the requested material consists of 'statistical or factual tabulations or data' (Public Officers Law 87(2)(g)(i). Factual data, therefore, simply means objective information, in contrast to opinions, ideas, or advice exchanged as part of the consultative or deliberative process of government decision making (see, Matter of Johnson Newspaper Corp. v. Stainkamp, 94 AD2d 825, 827, affd on op below, 61 NY2d 958; Matter of Miracle Mile Assocs. v. Yudelson, 68 AD2d 176, 181-182) id., 276-277).]

Ms. Eleanor Kapsiak

In my view, insofar as the records at issue consist of recommendations, advice or opinions, for example, they may be withheld; insofar as they consist of statistical or factual information, I believe that they must be disclosed.

In an effort to enhance compliance with and understanding of the Freedom of Information Law, copies of this opinion will be forwarded to District officials.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

The staff of the Committee on Open Government is authorized to issue advisory opinions. The ensuing staff advisory opinion is based solely upon the information presented in your correspondence.

Dear Mr. Johnson:

I have received your letter of April 26 in which you sought assistance in relation to your unanswered requests for records sought from the Internal Affairs Division of the Nassau County Correctional Center.

In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First, pursuant to the regulations promulgated by the Committee on Open Government (21 NYCRR Part 1401), each agency is required to designate one or more persons as "records access officer." The records access officer has the duty of coordinating an agency's response to requests, and requests should ordinarily be made to that person. While I believe that the person in receipt of your request should have responded in a manner consistent with law or forwarded the request to the records access officer, it is suggest that you resubmit your request and address it to the records access officer.

Second, while the nature of the records sought is unclear, I point out that §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law requires that an applicant "reasonably describe" the records requested. Therefore, a request should include sufficient detail to enable agency staff to locate and identify the records.

Lastly, the Freedom of Information Law provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies must respond to requests. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

Mr. Edward B. Johnson

Page -2-

"Each entity subject to the provisions of this article, within five business days of the receipt of a written request for a record reasonably described, shall make such record available to the person requesting it, deny such request in writing or furnish a written acknowledgement of the receipt of such request and a statement of the approximate date when such request will be granted or denied..."

If neither a response to a request nor an acknowledgement of the receipt of a request is given within five business days, or if an agency delays responding for an unreasonable time after it acknowledges that a request has been received, a request may, in my opinion, be considered to have been constructively denied. In such a circumstance, I believe that the denial may be appealed in accordance with §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law. That provision states in relevant part that:

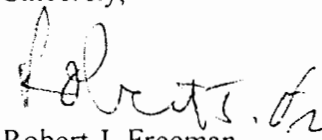

"...any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive, or governing body, who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

In addition, it has been held that when an appeal is made but a determination is not rendered within ten business days of the receipt of the appeal as required under §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, the appellant has exhausted his or her administrative remedies and may initiate a challenge to a constructive denial of access under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Rules [Floyd v. McGuire, 87 AD 2d 388, appeal dismissed 57 NY 2d 774 (1982)].

I believe that the person designated to determine appeals under the Freedom of Information Law is the Nassau County Attorney.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Dear Mr. Safoschnik:

I have received your letter of April 24 in which you sought assistance in relation to your requests for records of the New York City Police Department that had not been answered.

In this regard, the Freedom of Information Law provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies must respond to requests. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

Dear Mr. Hynard:

I have received your letter of April 24 and the materials attached to it. You complained that your requests for certain records maintained at the Arthur Kill Correctional Facility had not been answered.

In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First, several aspects of your correspondence refer to provisions of the federal Freedom of Information Act, 5 USC §552. That statute applies only to records of federal agencies; the governing statute in this instance is the New York Freedom of Information Law.

Second, the Committee on Open Government is authorized to provide advice and opinions concerning the Freedom of Information Law. The Committee is not empowered to enforce that law or otherwise compel an agency to grant or deny access to records.

Third, the regulations promulgated by the Department of Correctional Services indicate that a request for records kept at a correctional facility should be made to the Superintendent or his designee. While I believe that the person in receipt of your request should have responded in a manner consistent with law or forwarded the request to the appropriate person, it is suggest that you resubmit the request in accordance with the Department's regulations.

Lastly, the Freedom of Information Law provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies must respond to requests. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

Subject: Form of request

Dear Mr. Kinney:

I have received your inquiry in which you asked whether there is "a specific format for writing a request for a freedom of information release to a city police department."

There is no particular form or format that must be used when seeking records from an agency. Under section 89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law, an agency may require that an applicant request records in writing, and the applicant must "reasonably describe" the records sought. Therefore, a request should contain sufficient detail to enable agency staff to locate and identify the records.

A sample letter of request is included in our publication "Your Right to Know", which is available via our website at the following address:

Mr. John Beatty

[REDACTED]

Dear Mr. Beatty:

I have received your letter of April 30, as well as the materials related to it.

As I understand the matter, you requested and obtained a variety of personnel records pertaining to yourself from the New York City Health and Hospitals Corporation in 1995. You have complained now, however, that certain attachments referenced in a memorandum should have been made available. The attachments consist of evaluations of your performance and materials involving "derogatory comments against...co-workers (Attached) which are prohibited by HHC, Local, State and Federal policies." You wrote that you are interested in obtaining the attachments, including "a particularization" of the policies to which reference was made.

If you believed at the time that the records in question had been denied, as indicated by the Corporation's records access officer, you could have appealed within thirty days. It is unclear on the basis of your letter whether you appealed or whether the documents of your interest were requested or withheld.

Under the circumstances, it is suggested that you submit a new request to the Corporation's records access officer, supplying sufficient detail to enable staff to locate and identify the records sought.

I note that the Freedom of Information Law pertains to existing records, and that §89(3) of that statute states in part that an agency is not required to create a record in response to a request. If, for example, the materials regarding derogatory remarks do not include a "particularization" of policies allegedly violated, the Corporation in my view would not be required to prepare a new record containing the information sought.

Mr. John Beatty

Page -2-

Insofar as the records sought exist, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law.

Potentially relevant in determining rights of access is §87(2)(g), which permits an agency to deny access to records that:

"are inter-agency or intra-agency materials which are not:

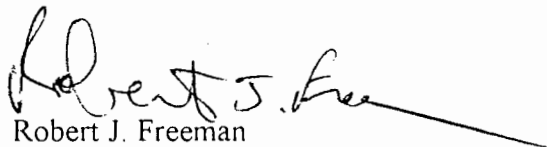

- i. statistical or factual tabulations or data;
- ii. instructions to staff that affect the public;
- iii. final agency policy or determinations; or
- iv. external audits, including but not limited to audits performed by the comptroller and the federal government..."

It is noted that the language quoted above contains what in effect is a double negative. While inter-agency or intra-agency materials may be withheld, portions of such materials consisting of statistical or factual information, instructions to staff that affect the public, final agency policy or determinations or external audits must be made available, unless a different ground for denial could appropriately be asserted. Concurrently, those portions of inter-agency or intra-agency materials that are reflective of opinion, advice, recommendation and the like could in my view be withheld.

While I am not familiar with the contents of the records, also of possible significance is §87(2)(b), which authorizes an agency to withhold records to the extent that disclosure would constitute "an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy." If portions of the records identify or pertain to persons other than yourself, that provision might, depending on the nature of the information, be relevant.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Robert J. Freeman

Dear Mr. Carpenter:

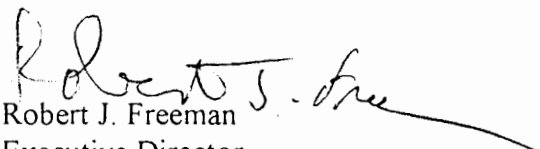

I have received your letter of May 26, as well as the correspondence attached to it. You have sought advice concerning the obligation of the Office of the New York County District Attorney to produce an "itemized listing" of records maintained by that agency in connection with your case file.

In this regard, it is emphasized that the Freedom of Information Law pertains to existing records. Moreover, §89(3) of that statute states in part that an agency is not required to create or prepare a record in response to a request.

In short, if the Office of the District Attorney does not maintain an itemized list of the documents contained in your case file, it would not be obliged by the Freedom of Information Law to prepare such a list on your behalf.

I hope that the foregoing serves to clarify your understanding of the matter and that I have been of assistance.

Albion, NY 14411-9199

Dear Mr. Corbett:

I have received your letter of April 25. You wrote that requests for records of Schenectady Police Department needed in your defense have been "disregarded." In conjunction with that claim and your remaining remarks, I offer the following comments.

First, pursuant to the regulations promulgated by the Committee on Open Government (21 NYCRR Part 1401), each agency is required to designate one or more persons as "records access officer." The records access officer has the duty of coordinating an agency's response to requests, and requests should ordinarily be made to that person. While I believe that the person in receipt of your request should have responded in a manner consistent with law or forwarded the request to the records access officer, it is suggest that you resubmit your request and address it to the records access officer.

Second, the Freedom of Information Law provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies must respond to requests. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

"Each entity subject to the provisions of this article, within five business days of the receipt of a written request for a record reasonably described, shall make such record available to the person requesting it, deny such request in writing or furnish a written acknowledgement of the receipt of such request and a statement of the approximate date when such request will be granted or denied..."

Mr. Ross Corbett

Page -2-

If neither a response to a request nor an acknowledgement of the receipt of a request is given within five business days, or if an agency delays responding for an unreasonable time after it acknowledges that a request has been received, a request may, in my opinion, be considered to have been constructively denied. In such a circumstance, I believe that the denial may be appealed in accordance with §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law. That provision states in relevant part that:

"...any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive, or governing body, who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

In addition, it has been held that when an appeal is made but a determination is not rendered within ten business days of the receipt of the appeal as required under §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, the appellant has exhausted his or her administrative remedies and may initiate a challenge to a constructive denial of access under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Rules [Floyd v. McGuire, 87 AD 2d 388, appeal dismissed 57 NY 2d 774 (1982)].

Third, the courts have provided direction concerning the Freedom of Information Law as opposed to the use of discovery under the Civil Practice Law and Rules (CPLR) in civil proceedings, and discovery in criminal proceedings under the CPL. The principle is that the Freedom of Information Law is a vehicle that confers rights of access upon the public generally, while the disclosure provisions of the CPLR or the CPL, for example, are separate vehicles that may require or authorize disclosure of records due to one's status as a litigant or defendant.

As stated by the Court of Appeals in a case involving a request made under the Freedom of Information Law by a person involved in litigation against an agency: "Access to records of a government agency under the Freedom of Information Law (FOIL) (Public Officers Law, Article 6) is not affected by the fact that there is pending or potential litigation between the person making the request and the agency" [Farbman v. NYC Health and Hospitals Corporation, 62 NY 2d 75, 78 (1984)]. Similarly, in an earlier decision, the Court of Appeals determined that "the standing of one who seeks access to records under the Freedom of Information Law is as a member of the public, and is neither enhanced...nor restricted...because he is also a litigant or potential litigant" [Matter of John P. v. Whalen, 54 NY 2d 89, 99 (1980)]. The Court in Farbman, supra, discussed the distinction between the use of the Freedom of Information Law as opposed to the use of discovery in Article 31 of the CPLR. Specifically, it was found that:

"FOIL does not require that the party requesting records make any showing of need, good faith or legitimate purpose; while its purpose may be to shed light on governmental decision-making, its ambit is not confined to records actually used in the decision-making process (Matter of Westchester Rockland Newspapers v. Kimball, 50 NY 2d 575, 581.) Full disclosure by public agencies is, under FOIL, a public right and in the public interest, irrespective of the status or need of the person making the request.

"CPLR article 31 proceeds under a different premise, and serves quite different concerns. While speaking also of 'full disclosure' article 31 is plainly more restrictive than FOIL. Access to records under CPLR depends on status and need. With goals of promoting both the ascertainment of truth at trial and the prompt disposition of actions (Allen v. Crowell-Collier Pub. Co., 21 NY 2d 403, 407), discovery is at the outset limited to that which is 'material and necessary in the prosecution or defense of an action'" [see Farbman, supra, at 80].

Most recently, the Court of Appeals held that the CPL does not limit a defendant's ability to attempt to obtain records under the Freedom of Information Law [Gould v. New York City Police Department, 89 NY 2d 267 (1996)].

In sum, I believe that the Freedom of Information Law imposes a duty to disclose records, as well as the capacity to withhold them, irrespective of the status or interest of the person requesting them. To be distinguished are other provisions of law that may require disclosure based upon one's status, e.g., as a defendant, and the nature of the records or their materiality to a proceeding.

In a related vein, I note that the Freedom of Information Law does not include any provision concerning the waiver of fees for copies of records, and that it has been held that an agency may charge its established fees even when a request is made pursuant to that statute by an indigent inmate [see Whitehead v. Morgenthau, 552 NYS2d 518 (1990)].

Next, as a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law. Since I am unaware of the contents of all of the records in which you are interested, or the effects of their disclosure, I cannot offer specific guidance. Nevertheless, the following paragraphs will review the provisions that may be significant in determining rights of access to the records in question.

In considering the records falling within the scope of your request, relevant is a decision by the Court of Appeals cited earlier concerning "complaint follow up reports" prepared by police officers and police officers' memo books in which it was held that a denial of access based on their characterization as intra-agency materials would be inappropriate.

The provision at issue, §87(2)(g) of the Freedom of Information Law, enables an agency to withhold records that:

"are inter-agency or intra-agency materials which are not:

- i. statistical or factual tabulations or data;
- ii. instructions to staff that affect the public;

- iii. final agency policy or determinations; or
- iv. external audits, including but not limited to audits performed by the comptroller and the federal government..."

It is noted that the language quoted above contains what in effect is a double negative. While inter-agency or intra-agency materials may be withheld, portions of such materials consisting of statistical or factual information, instructions to staff that affect the public, final agency policy or determinations or external audits must be made available, unless a different ground for denial could appropriately be asserted. Concurrently, those portions of inter-agency or intra-agency materials that are reflective of opinion, advice, recommendation and the like could in my view be withheld.

In its analysis of the matter, the decision states that:

"...we note that one court has suggested that complaint follow-up reports are exempt from disclosure because they constitute nonfinal intra-agency material, irrespective of whether the information contained in the reports is 'factual data' (see, Matter of Scott v. Chief Medical Examiner, 179 AD2d 443, 444, supra citing Public Officers Law §87(2)(g)). However, under a plain reading of §87(2)(g), the exemption for intra-agency material does not apply as long as the material falls within any one of the provision's four enumerated exceptions. Thus, intra-agency documents that contain 'statistical or factual tabulations or data' are subject to FOIL disclosure, whether or not embodied in a final agency policy or determination (see, Matter of Farbman & Sons v. New York City Health & Hosp. Corp., 62 NY2d 75, 83, supra; Matter of MacRae v. Dolce, 130 AD2d 577)..."

"...Although the term 'factual data' is not defined by statute, the meaning of the term can be discerned from the purpose underlying the intra-agency exemption, which is 'to protect the deliberative process of the government by ensuring that persons in an advisory role [will] be able to express their opinions freely to agency decision makers' (Matter of Xerox Corp. v. Town of Webster, 65 NY2d 131, 132 [quoting Matter of Sea Crest Constr. Corp. v. Stubing, 82 AD2d 546, 549]). Consistent with this limited aim to safeguard internal government consultations and deliberations, the exemption does not apply when the requested material consists of 'statistical or factual tabulations or data' (Public Officers Law 87(2)(g)(i). Factual data, therefore, simply means objective information, in contrast to opinions, ideas, or advice exchanged as part of the consultative or deliberative process of government decision making (see, Matter of Johnson Newspaper Corp. v. Stainkamp, 94 AD2d 825, 827, affd on op below, 61 NY2d 958; Matter of Miracle Mile Assocs. v. Yudelson, 68 AD2d 176, 181-182).

Mr. Ross Corbett

"Against this backdrop, we conclude that the complaint follow-up reports contain substantial factual information available pursuant to the provisions of FOIL. Sections of the report are devoted to such purely factual data as: the names, addresses, and physical descriptions of crime victims, witnesses, and perpetrators; a checklist that indicates whether the victims and witnesses have been interviewed and shown photos, whether crime scenes have been photographed and dusted for fingerprints, and whether neighborhood residents have been canvassed for information; and a blank space denominated 'details' in which the officer records the particulars of any action taken in connection with the investigation.

"However, the Police Department argues that any witness statements contained in the reports, in particular, are not 'factual' because there is no assurance of the statements' accuracy and reliability. We decline to read such a reliability requirement into the phrase 'factual data', as the dissent would have us do, and conclude that a witness statement constitutes factual data insofar as it embodies a factual account of the witness's observations. Such a statement, moreover, is far removed from the type of internal government exchange sought to be protected by the intra-agency exemption (see, Matter of Ingram v. Axelrod, 90 AD2d 568, 569 [ambulance records, list of interviews, and reports of interviews available under FOIL as 'factual data']). By contrast, any impressions, recommendations, or opinions recorded in the complaint follow-up report would not constitute factual data and would be exempt from disclosure. The holding herein is only that these reports are not categorically exempt as intra-agency material. Indeed, the Police Department is entitled to withhold complaint follow-up reports, or specific portions thereof, under any other applicable exemption, such as the law-enforcement exemption or the public-safety exemption, as long as the requisite particularized showing is made" [Gould, supra; emphasis added by the Court].

Based on the foregoing, the agency could not claim that the complaint reports can be withheld in their entirety on the ground that they constitute intra-agency materials. However, the Court was careful to point out that other grounds for denial might apply in consideration of those records, as well as others that you requested.

For instance, of potential significance is §87(2)(b) of the Freedom of Information Law, which permits an agency to withhold records or portions thereof when disclosure would constitute "an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy". That provision might be applicable relative to the deletion of identifying details in a variety of situations, i.e., where a record identifies a confidential source or a witness, for example.

Often the most relevant provision concerning access to records maintained by law enforcement agencies is §87(2)(e), which permits an agency to withhold records that:

"are compiled for law enforcement purposes and which, if disclosed, would:

- i. interfere with law enforcement investigations or judicial proceedings;
- ii. deprive a person of a right to a fair trial or impartial adjudication;
- iii. identify a confidential source or disclose confidential information relating to a criminal investigation; or
- iv. reveal criminal investigative techniques or procedures, except routine techniques and procedures."

In my view, the foregoing indicates that records compiled for law enforcement purposes can only be withheld to the extent that disclosure would result in the harmful effects described in sub- paragraphs (i) through (iv) of §87(2)(e).

Another possible ground for denial is §87(2)(f), which permits withholding to the extent that disclosure "would endanger the life or safety of any person". The capacity to withhold on that basis is dependent upon the facts and circumstances concerning an event.

Also relevant is the first ground for denial, §87(2)(a), which pertains to records that "are specifically exempted from disclosure by state or federal statute". One such statute, §190.25(4) of the Criminal Procedure Law deals with grand jury proceedings and provides in relevant part that:

"Grand jury proceedings are secret, and no grand juror, or other person specified in subdivision three of this section or section 215.70 of the penal law, may, except in the lawful discharge of his duties or upon written order of the court, disclose the nature or substance of any grand jury testimony, evidence, or any decision, result or other matter attending a grand jury proceeding."

As such, grand jury related records would be outside the scope of rights conferred by the Freedom of Information Law. Any disclosure of those records would be based upon a court order or perhaps a vehicle authorizing or requiring disclosure that is separate and distinct from the Freedom of Information Law.

Lastly, in a decision concerning a request for records maintained by the office of a district attorney that would ordinarily be exempted from disclosure under the Freedom of Information Law, it was held that "once the statements have been used in open court, they have lost their cloak of confidentiality and are available for inspection by a member of the public" [see Moore v. Santucci,

Mr. Ross Corbett

151 AD 2d 677, 679 (1989)]. Based upon that decision, it appears that records introduced into evidence or disclosed during a public judicial proceeding should be available. However, in the same decision, it was also found that:

"...if the petitioner or his attorney previously received a copy of the agency record pursuant to an alternative discovery device and currently possesses the copy, a court may uphold an agency's denial of the petitioner's request under the FOIL for a duplicate copy as academic. However, the burden of proof rests with the agency to demonstrate that the petitioner's specific requests are moot. The respondent's burden would be satisfied upon proof that a copy of the requested record was previously furnished to the petitioner or his counsel in the absence of any allegation, in evidentiary form, that the copy was no longer in existence. In the event the petitioner's request for a copy of a specific record is not moot, the agency must furnish another copy upon payment of the appropriate fee...unless the requested record falls squarely within the ambit of 1 of the 8 statutory exemptions" (id., 678).

The Court in Moore also specified that an agency "is not required to make available for inspection or copying any suppression hearing or trial transcripts of a witness' testimony in its possession, because the transcripts are court records, not agency records" (id. at 680).

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Robert J. Freeman

Dear Mr. Klempka:

I have received your letter of April 27, as well as the materials attached to it. As I understand the matter, you have requested records pertaining to your participation in the DWI program at your facility. The extent to which the records have been made available is unclear and in dispute.

If you believe that you have been denied access to records, you have the right to appeal pursuant to §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law. That provision states in relevant part that:

"any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive or governing body of the entity, or the person thereof designated by such head, chief executive, or governing body, who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

For your information, the person designated by the Department of Correctional Services to determine appeals is Anthony J. Annucci, Counsel to the Department.

I note that the Committee on Open Government is not empowered to grant or deny access to records; the function of this office involves providing advice and opinions concerning public access to government records.

With respect to rights of access, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law.

Of likely relevance in considering rights of access to the records of your interest is §87(2)(g). That provision permits an agency to withhold records that:

"are inter-agency or intra-agency materials which are not:

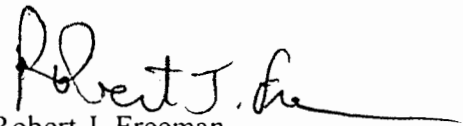

- i. statistical or factual tabulations or data;
- ii. instructions to staff that affect the public;
- iii. final agency policy or determinations; or
- iv. external audits, including but not limited to audits performed by the comptroller and the federal government..."

It is noted that the language quoted above contains what in effect is a double negative. While inter-agency or intra-agency materials may be withheld, portions of such materials consisting of statistical or factual information, instructions to staff that affect the public, final agency policy or determinations or external audits must be made available, unless a different ground for denial could appropriately be asserted. Concurrently, those portions of inter-agency or intra-agency materials that are reflective of opinion, advice, recommendation and the like could in my view be withheld.

Lastly, since your request of April 13 referred to the federal Freedom of Information and Privacy Acts (5 USC §§ 552 and 552a), I point out that those statutes pertain only to federal agencies. Further, while the federal Freedom of Information Act includes provisions regarding fee waivers, the New York Freedom of Information Law contains no similar provision, and it has been held that an agency may charge its established fee for copies, even when a request is made by an indigent inmate [see Whitehead v. Morgenthau, 552 NYS2d 518 (1990)].

I hope that the foregoing serves to clarify your understanding of the Freedom of Information Law and that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Ms. Christine A. Sproat
Gellert & Cutler, P.C.
75 Washington Street
Poughkeepsie, NY 12601

Dear Ms. Sproat:

I have received your letter of April 30 and the materials attached to it. In your capacity as an attorney with the firm that represents the Town of Beekman, you wrote that you "followed up on a letter written to the Attorney General's Office by the outgoing chairperson of the Ethics Board, Eugene Fraher, who asked for an advisory opinion as to whether he had to turn over pending and closed files to the new Chairperson of the Board who wishes to have all Ethics Board files in one secure location." The Attorney General's office advised that you seek the views of this office.

You added that a new chairperson was elected earlier this year and three new members have joined the Board. The outgoing chairperson indicated that "he would not let the new members review any pending files since these complainants did not want the new members of the Board to review their complaints." While you have apparently offered a legal opinion on the matter, Mr. Fraher "has stated that he wants to wait for a response to his from the Attorney General's Office before he turns over any files."

In this regard, as you may be aware, the Committee on Open Government, a unit of the Department of State, is authorized to render opinions concerning the Freedom of Information Law pursuant to §89(1) of that statute. When the Office of the Attorney General receives inquiries pertaining to the Freedom of Information Law, that agency typically forwards them to the Committee, and that has been the practice since the enactment of the Freedom of Information Law in 1974. As such, I believe that this response will serve as a valid alternative to obtaining an opinion from the Office of the Attorney General. Like the opinions of the Attorney General, the opinions of the Committee on Open Government are advisory in nature. While they are not binding, it is our hope that they are educational and persuasive.

With respect to the substance of the matter, I believe that the records at issue are the property of the Town, and that the individual who physically possesses the records has no authority to control their use or dissemination. In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First, from my perspective, irrespective of where records may be kept, they are Town records. It is emphasized that the Freedom of Information Law pertains to agency records and that §86(4) of the Law defines the term "record" expansively to mean:

"any information kept, held, filed, produced, reproduced by, with or for an agency or the state legislature, in any physical form whatsoever including, but not limited to, reports, statements, examinations, memoranda, opinions, folders, files, books, manuals, pamphlets, forms, papers, designs, drawings, maps, photos, letters, microfilms, computer tapes or discs, rules, regulations or codes."

In a case in which an agency contended, in essence, that it could choose which documents it considered to be "records" for purposes of the Freedom of Information Law, the state's highest court rejected that claim. As stated by the Court of Appeals:

"...respondents' construction -- permitting an agency to engage in a unilateral prescreening of those documents which it deems to be outside the scope of FOIL -- would be inconsistent with the process set forth in the statute. In enacting FOIL, the Legislature devised a detailed system to insure that although FOIL's scope is broadly defined to include all governmental records, there is a means by which an agency may properly withhold from disclosure records found to be exempt (see, Public Officers Law §87[2]; §89[2],[3]). Thus, FOIL provides that a request for access may be denied by an agency in writing pursuant to Public Officers Law §89(3) to prevent an unwarranted invasion of privacy (see, Public Officers Law §89[2]) or for one of the other enumerated reasons for exemption (see, Public Officers Law §87[2]). A party seeking disclosure may challenge the agency's assertion of an exemption by appealing within the agency pursuant to Public Officers Law §89(4)(a). In the event that the denial of access is upheld on the internal appeal, the statute specifically authorizes a proceeding to obtain judicial review pursuant to CPLR article 78 (see, Public Officers Law §89[4][b]). Respondents' construction, if followed, would allow an agency to bypass this statutory process. An agency could simply remove documents which, in its opinion, were not within the scope of the FOIL, thereby obviating the need to articulate a specific exemption and avoiding review of its action. Thus, respondents' construction would render much of the statutory exemption and review procedure ineffective; to adopt this construction would be contrary to the accepted principle that a statute should be interpreted so as to give effect to all of its provisions...

"...as a practical matter, the procedure permitting an unreviewable prescreening of documents -- which respondents urge us to engraft on the statute -- could be used by an uncooperative and obdurate public official or agency to block an entirely legitimate FOIL request. There would be no way to prevent a custodian of records from removing a public record from FOIL's reach by simply labeling it 'purely private'. Such a construction, which could thwart the entire objective of FOIL by creating an easy means of avoiding compliance, should be rejected" [Capital Newspapers v. Whalen, 69 NY 2d 246, 253-254 (1987)].

The records at issue would not have come into the possession of the former chairperson of the Ethics Board except in the performance of his duties in that role. That being so, it is my opinion that records involving the performance of those duties clearly fall within the scope of the Freedom of Information Law.

This is not to suggest that the records would be accessible to the public under the Freedom of Information Law; on the contrary, I believe that unsubstantiated complaints and related records typically may be withheld from the public on the ground that disclosure would constitute an "unwarranted invasion of personal privacy" [see §87(2)(b)]. It is reiterated, however, that the materials issue are, in my view, Town records that fall within the coverage of the Freedom of Information Law.

Second, in a related vein, §30 of the Town Law states in part that the town clerk: "Shall have the custody of all the records, books and papers of the town". Therefore, even though a person other than the clerk may have physical possession of the records in question, I believe that the town clerk would have legal custody of the records.

It is noted that §89(1)(b)(iii) of the Freedom of Information Law requires the Committee on Open Government to promulgate regulations concerning the procedural aspects of the Law (see 21 NYCRR Part 1401). In turn, §87(1)(a) of the Law states that:

"the governing body of each public corporation shall promulgate uniform rules and regulations for all agencies in such public corporation pursuant to such general rules and regulations as may be promulgated by the committee on open government in conformity with the provisions of this article, pertaining to the administration of this article."

In this instance, the governing body of a public corporation, the Town Board, is required to promulgate appropriate rules and regulations consistent with those adopted by the Committee on Open Government and with the Freedom of Information Law.

The initial responsibility to deal with requests is borne by an agency's records access officer, and the Committee's regulations provide direction concerning the designation and duties of a records access officer. Specifically, §1401.2 of the regulations provides in relevant part that:

"(a) The governing body of a public corporation and the head of an executive agency or governing body of other agencies shall be responsible for insuring compliance with the regulations herein, and shall designate one or more persons as records access officer by name or by specific job title and business address, who shall have the duty of coordinating agency response to public requests for access to records. The designation of one or more records access officers shall not be construed to prohibit officials who have in the past been authorized to make records or information available to the public from continuing to do so."

As such, the Town Board has the ability to designate "one or more persons as records access officer". Further, §1401.2(b) of the regulations describes the duties of a records access officer, including the duty to coordinate the agency's response to requests. If the town clerk has been designated records access officer, which is so in most towns, I believe that she would have the authority to make initial determinations to grant or deny access to records in response to requests made under the Freedom of Information Law.

Third, and in a related area, the "Local Government Records Law", Article 57-A of the Arts and Cultural Affairs Law, deals with the management, custody, retention and disposal of records by local governments.

With respect to the retention of records, §57.25 of the Arts and Cultural Affairs Law states in relevant part that:

"1. It shall be the responsibility of every local officer to maintain records to adequately document the transaction of public business and the services and programs for which such officer is responsible; to retain and have custody of such records for so long as the records are needed for the conduct of the business of the office; to adequately protect such records; to cooperate with the local government's records management officer on programs for the orderly and efficient management of records including identification and management of inactive records and identification and preservation of records of enduring value; to dispose of records in accordance with legal requirements; and to pass on to his successor records needed for the continuing conduct of business of the office..."

While a person other than the clerk may have physical possession of the records in question, I do not believe that that person has legal custody of them. As indicated earlier, §30 of the Town Law specifies that the town clerk is the custodian of town records. Consistent with that provision is §57.19 of the Arts and Cultural Affairs Law, which states in part that a town clerk is the "records management officer" for a town.

A failure to share records or to inform the clerk of their existence may effectively preclude the clerk from carrying out her duties as records management officer, or as records access officer for purposes of responding to requests under the Freedom of Information Law. If the records access officer does not know of the existence or location of Town records, that person may not have the ability to grant or deny access to records in a manner consistent with the requirements of the Freedom of Information Law. Further, §57.25(a) specifies that it is the responsibility of the former chairperson "to pass on to his successor records needed for the continuing conduct of business of the office."

Lastly, notwithstanding the preceding references to the Freedom of Information Law, as I understand the matter, it does not involve disclosures made under that statute. Rather, it pertains to disclosures to members of the Ethics Board in the performance of their official duties. The former chairperson is one member of the Board. As a general matter, a single member would not have the authority to take action or adopt policy or rules. In my view, the Board, by means of a majority vote of its total membership, has the authority to act or adopt policy or rules, so long as those actions are carried out in a manner consistent with law. It is my understanding that the Ethics Board consists of seven members. Since the former chairperson has one vote, I believe that he is required to accede to the actions that the majority is legally empowered to take.

In sum, while the records at issue may be in the physical possession of the former chairperson of the Ethics Board, I do not believe that he enjoys legal custody or control of the records.

I hope that I have been of assistance. Should any questions arise concerning the foregoing, please feel free to contact me.

Sincerely,

[REDACTED]

Dear Mr. Gesualdi:

I have received your letter of April 27 in which you sought an opinion concerning the propriety of a denial of access to records by the Town of Hempstead.

In your capacity as attorney for a residents association opposed to a proposed construction project in their community, you requested "building permits and/or other applications, plans, drawings" and the like pertaining to the project from the Town. In a response to the request by the First Deputy Commissioner of the Town Department of Buildings, it was stated that "this office does not divulge the information contained in a building permit application as it is subject to change and not a permanent record until a permit is issued."

From my perspective, the response is inconsistent with law, and the building permit application should have been disclosed. In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First, the Freedom of Information Law pertains to all records, irrespective of whether they are preliminary, "subject to change", or other than permanent. It is emphasized that §86(4) of that statute defines the term "record" expansively to mean:

"any information kept, held, filed, produced, reproduced by, with or for an agency or the state legislature, in any physical form whatsoever including, but not limited to, reports, statements, examinations, memoranda, opinions, folders, files, books, manuals, pamphlets, forms, papers, designs, drawings, maps, photos, letters, microfilms, computer tapes or discs, rules, regulations or codes."

James F. Gesualdi, Esq.

Based on the foregoing, once an entity has submitted documents to the Town, those documents constitute "records" that fall within the scope of rights of access conferred by the Freedom of Information Law.

Second, as a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law. In my view, none of the grounds for denial would be pertinent or applicable as a basis for withholding the records sought.

I would conjecture that the denial is based on the rationale that underlies §87(2)(g), which enables an agency to withhold some aspects of "inter-agency and intra-agency materials." In this regard, §86(3) of the Freedom of Information Law defines the term "agency" to mean:

"any state or municipal department, board, bureau, division, commission, committee, public authority, public corporation, council, office or other governmental entity performing a governmental or proprietary function for the state or any one or more municipalities thereof, except the judiciary or the state legislature."

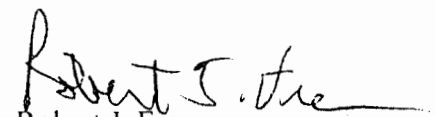

In view of the foregoing, the exception pertains to communications between or among state or local government officials at two or more agencies ("inter-agency materials"), or communications between or among officials at one agency ("intra-agency materials"). Frequently, much of the content of preliminary materials, such as proposals or recommendations, that are transmitted from one government employee or official to another may be withheld under that provision. In this instance, however, the records sought were submitted by an entity that is not governmental in nature and, therefore, is not an "agency" as that term is defined in the Freedom of Information Law. Consequently, the exception that would permit a denial of access in the context of governmental communications would not be applicable in the context of your request.

In sum, that the documentation of your interest is subject to change and not permanent is, in my opinion, irrelevant to rights of access. For the reasons discussed in the preceding commentary, I believe that it must be disclosed, for there is no basis for a denial of access conferred by the Freedom of Information Law.

In an effort to enhance compliance with and understanding of the Freedom of Information Law, copies of this opinion will be forwarded to Town officials.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Subject: Fees for computer generated records

Dear Ms. Beach:

I have received your message, and I believe that there must have been some misunderstanding. While I might have spoken to Chief Deputy Taylor (I do not recall the conversation), I would not have advised that he could charge $3 per copy for a record maintained in a computer. On the contrary, as you are aware, the fee in the circumstance described would be based on the actual cost of reproduction in accordance with section 87(1)(b)(iii) of the Freedom of Information Law. Actual cost would involve computer time, which may be so minimal that it can not be quantified, and the cost of the storage medium, which in this instance would be a sheet of paper.

If you need a written opinion that is more expansive, if you want me to speak with Chief Deputy Taylor or anyone else with the County, please let me know; I would be pleased to oblige and to clarify understanding of the law.

If you would like to obtain information on the subject online, our website address is:

A memorandum, "A Primer on Electronic Information" may be useful. Also, in the index to opinions rendered under the FOIL, click on to "F" and scroll down to "fees - actual cost of reproduction". The higher the number, the more recent is the opinion.

If you would like to discuss the matter, I can be reached at (518)474-2518.

Dear Mr. Belot:

I have received your letter of May 6. You have sought assistance in obtaining records from the City of Poughkeepsie based on your offer pay the requisite fee for copies on an installment basis.

In this regard, it has been held that an agency may require payment in advance of photocopying records sought under the Freedom of Information Law (see Sambucci v. McGuire, Supreme Court, New York County, November 4, 1982). I note, too, that it has been held that an agency may charge its established fee for copies, even though the applicant is an indigent inmate [see Whitehead v. Morgenthau, 552 NYD2d 518 (1990)].

I hope that the foregoing serves to enhance your understanding of the matter and that I have been of assistance.

Dear Mr. Spangenberg:

I have received your letter of May 3 in which you sought an opinion concerning your right to obtain a copy of your pre-sentence report.

In this regard, although the Freedom of Information Law provides broad rights of access to records, the first ground for denial, §87(2)(a), states that an agency may withhold records or portions thereof that "...are specifically exempted from disclosure by state or federal statute..." Relevant under the circumstances is §390.50 of the Criminal Procedure Law, which, in my opinion represents the exclusive procedure concerning access to pre-sentence reports.

Section 390.50(1) of the Criminal Procedure Law states that:

"Any pre-sentence report or memorandum submitted to the court pursuant to this article and any medical, psychiatric or social agency report or other information gathered for the court by a probation department, or submitted directly to the court, in connection with the question of sentence is confidential and may not be made available to any person or public or private agency except where specifically required or permitted by statute or upon specific authorization of the court. For purposes of this section, any report, memorandum or other information forwarded to a probation department within this state is governed by the same rules of confidentiality. Any person, public or private agency receiving such material must retain it under the same conditions of confidentiality as apply to the probation department that made it available."

Mr. E. Spangenberg

June 1, 1999

In addition, subdivision (2) of §390.50 states in part that: "The pre-sentence report shall be made available by the court for examination and copying in connection with any appeal in the case..."

In view of the foregoing, I believe that a pre-sentence report may be made available only upon the order of a court, and only under the circumstances described in §390.50 of the Criminal Procedure Law. It is suggested that you review that statute.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Mr. John Langdon

Dear Mr. Langdon:

I have received your letter of April 30 in which you complained with respect to a delay by the Town of Webster in making records available that you requested under the Freedom of Information Law.

In this regard, the Freedom of Information Law provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies must respond to requests. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

"Each entity subject to the provisions of this article, within five business days of the receipt of a written request for a record reasonably described, shall make such record available to the person requesting it, deny such request in writing or furnish a written acknowledgement of the receipt of such request and a statement of the approximate date when such request will be granted or denied..."

While an agency must grant access to records, deny access or acknowledge the receipt of a request within five business days, when such acknowledgement is given, there is no precise time period within which an agency must grant or deny access to records. The time needed to do so may be dependent upon the volume of a request, the possibility that other requests have been made, the necessity to conduct legal research, the search and retrieval techniques used to locate the records, other duties that must be carried out and the like. In short, when an agency acknowledges the receipt of a request because more than five business days may be needed to grant or deny a request, so long as it provides an approximate date indicating when the request will be granted or denied, and that date is reasonable in view of the attendant circumstances, I believe that the agency would be acting in compliance with law.

Mr. John Langdon

Page -2-

In short, if records are clearly available to the public under the Freedom of Information Law, and they are readily retrievable, there may be no basis for a lengthy delay in disclosure. However, as suggested above, if there is valid basis for extending the time to make records available beyond five business, such a delay would be consistent with law.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Robert J. Freeman

Green Haven Correctional Facility
Drawer B
Stormville, NY 12582

Dear Mr. Carty:

I have received your letter of April 27 in which you complained that the Division of Parole had not responded to your requests for records. You asked whether there is any provision of the Freedom of Information Law that is "more compelling" than §89(3), "one that bites instead of being treated like a Law without teeth."

In this regard, there is no provision other than that cited that offers "teeth." Nevertheless, §89(3) provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies must respond to requests. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

"Each entity subject to the provisions of this article, within five business days of the receipt of a written request for a record reasonably described, shall make such record available to the person requesting it, deny such request in writing or furnish a written acknowledgement of the receipt of such request and a statement of the approximate date when such request will be granted or denied..."

If neither a response to a request nor an acknowledgement of the receipt of a request is given within five business days, or if an agency delays responding for an unreasonable time after it acknowledges that a request has been received, a request may, in my opinion, be considered to have been constructively denied. In such a circumstance, I believe that the denial may be appealed in accordance with §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law. That provision states in relevant part that:

"...any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive, or governing body,

Mr. Anthony Carty
June 1, 1999

who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

In addition, it has been held that when an appeal is made but a determination is not rendered within ten business days of the receipt of the appeal as required under §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, the appellant has exhausted his or her administrative remedies and may initiate a challenge to a constructive denial of access under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Rules [Floyd v. McGuire, 87 AD 2d 388, appeal dismissed 57 NY 2d 774 (1982)].

For your information, the person designated by the Division of Parole to determine appeals is Terrence X. Tracy, Counsel to the Division.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Mr. Edward Magee
98-B-1001
Cayuga Correctional Facility
P.O. Box 1186
Moravia, NY 13118

Dear Mr. Magee:

I have received your letter of April 28 and the correspondence attached to it. You have sought assistance in obtaining information concerning the suspension of an employee of the Southern Tier Regional Crime Laboratory. You wrote that the person in question "was suspended for filing false reports..."

In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First, the Freedom of Information Law pertains to agency records, and §86(3) of that statute defines the term "agency" to mean:

"any state or municipal department, board, bureau, division, commission, committee, public authority, public corporation, council, office or other governmental entity performing a governmental or proprietary function for the state or any one or more municipalities thereof, except the judiciary or the state legislature."

If the Southern Tier Regional Crime Laboratory is a governmental entity of the state or a unit of local government, I believe that it would constitute an "agency" required to comply with the Freedom of Information Law. If it is not a governmental entity, that statute would not apply, and there would be no public right of access to its records.

Mr. Edward Magee

Second, assuming that the Southern Tier Regional Crime Laboratory is an "agency", I note that the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law.

Particularly relevant to an analysis of rights of access is §87(2)(b), which permits an agency to withhold records to the extent that disclosure would constitute "an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy".

While the standard concerning privacy is flexible and may be subject to conflicting interpretations, the courts have provided substantial direction regarding the privacy of public officers employees. It is clear that public officers and employees enjoy a lesser degree of privacy than others, for it has been found in various contexts that public officers and employees are required to be more accountable than others. With regard to records pertaining to public officers and employees, the courts have found that, as a general rule, records that are relevant to the performance of a their official duties are available, for disclosure in such instances would result in a permissible rather than an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy [see e.g., Farrell v. Village Board of Trustees, 372 NYS 2d 905 (1975); Gannett Co. v. County of Monroe, 59 AD 2d 309 (1977), aff'd 45 NY 2d 954 (1978); Sinicropi v. County of Nassau, 76 AD 2d 838 (1980); Geneva Printing Co. and Donald C. Hadley v. Village of Lyons, Sup. Ct., Wayne Cty., March 25, 1981; Montes v. State, 406 NYS 2d 664 (Court of Claims, 1978); Powhida v. City of Albany, 147 AD 2d 236 (1989); Scaccia v. NYS Division of State Police, 530 NYS 2d 309, 138 AD 2d 50 (1988); Steinmetz v. Board of Education, East Moriches, supra; Capital Newspapers v. Burns, 67 NY 2d 562 (1986)]. Conversely, to the extent that records are irrelevant to the performance of one's official duties, it has been found that disclosure would indeed constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy [see e.g., Matter of Wool, Sup. Ct., Nassau Cty., NYLJ, Nov. 22, 1977].

The other ground for denial of significance, §87(2)(g), states that an agency may withhold records that:

"are inter-agency or intra-agency materials which are not:

- i. statistical or factual tabulations or data;
- ii. instructions to staff that affect the public;
- iii. final agency policy or determinations; or
- iv. external audits, including but not limited to audits performed by the comptroller and the federal government..."

It is noted that the language quoted above contains what in effect is a double negative. While inter-agency or intra-agency materials may be withheld, portions of such materials consisting of statistical or factual information, instructions to staff that affect the public, final agency policy or determinations or external audits must be made available, unless a different ground for denial could appropriately be asserted. Concurrently, those portions of inter-agency or intra-agency materials that are reflective of opinion, advice, recommendation and the like could in my view be withheld. Insofar as a request involves a final agency determination, I believe that the determination must be disclosed, again, unless a different ground for denial could be asserted.

In terms of the judicial interpretation of the Freedom of Information Law, it is emphasized that in situations in which allegations or charges have resulted in the issuance of a written reprimand, disciplinary action, or findings that public employees have engaged in misconduct, records reflective of those kinds of determinations have been found to be available, including the names of those who are the subjects of disciplinary action [see Powhida v. City of Albany, 147 AD 2d 236 (1989); also Farrell, Geneva Printing, Scaccia and Sinicropi, supra]. To the extent that such a determination includes reference to unproven charges or unsubstantiated allegations, those portions of the record could in my opinion be withheld on the ground that disclosure would constitute an unwarranted invasion of privacy [see e.g., Herald Company v. School District of the City of Syracuse, 430 NYS2d 460 (1980)].

In sum, based on the decisions cited above, reference to findings of misconduct involving a public employee would be accessible; reference to charges that could not be proven could be withheld.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

President
CACC
18-55 Corporal Kennedy St., Suite L-2
Bayside, NY 11360

Dear Ms. Shepard:

I have received your letter of May 4 in which you raised a variety of issues concerning compliance with the Open Meetings and Freedom of Information Laws by Community Board 7 and its committees.

In view of your questions, it is important in my view to describe the coverage of the Open Meetings Law. That statute pertains to meetings of "public bodies", and §102(2) defines the phrase "public body" to mean:

"...any entity for which a quorum is required in order to conduct public business and which consists of two or more members, performing a governmental function for the state or for an agency or department thereof, or for a public corporation as defined in section sixty-six of the general construction law, or committee or subcommittee or other similar body of such public body."

Based on the foregoing, a governing body, such as a community board, clearly constitutes a "public body" required to comply with the Open Meetings Law. Further, since the definition makes specific reference to a committee or subcommittee of a public body, committees of a Community Board consisting of two or more members of the Board would also constitute public bodies subject to the Open Meetings Law. If, for instance, a community board consists of 51, its quorum would be 26. If the Board designates a committee consisting of 9, the committee would be a public body and a quorum of the committee would be 5.

Ms. Joyce Shepard

When a committee is subject to the Open Meetings Law, it has the same obligations regarding notice and openness, for example, as well as the same authority to conduct executive sessions in appropriate circumstances as a governing body [see e.g., Glens Falls Newspapers, Inc. v. Solid Waste and Recycling Committee of the Warren County Board of Supervisors, 195 AD2d 898 (1993)]. A contention that a committee is not covered by the Open Meetings Law based on Roberts Rules is, in my view, without merit; Roberts Rules are not law.

If members of a public body meet, but there is no quorum present, i.e., if there is not a majority of the total membership, the Open Meetings Law would not apply. Similarly, meetings among public officials generally are not subject to the Open Meetings Law. In short, unless a quorum of a public body has convened for the purpose of conducting public business collectively, as a body, the Open Meetings Law would not apply.

You wrote that the Community Board has refused to accept requests made under the Freedom of Information Law that are transmitted by a fax machine. In this regard, an agency, pursuant to §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law, may require that a request for records be made in writing, and it is my view that an agency must accept requests made via a fax machine, unless the use of the machine adversely impacts on the agency's capacity to carry out its duties. For example, if a law enforcement agency uses a fax machine to carry out essential law enforcement functions, interference with the use of the machine could hamper its ability to perform its duties effectively. In short, in a circumstance in which public use of a fax machine would interfere with an agency's functions, its use for making requests under the Freedom of Information Law might be restricted, so long as requests traditionally made are accepted, i.e., requests made in writing by mail or by personal delivery. On the other hand, if the acceptance of requests made via fax machine would not substantially interfere with an agency's functions, such as protecting public safety, a refusal to accept requests by fax would, in my opinion, be unreasonable and inconsistent with law.

You also wrote that you were informed that you could inspect records "at 4PM only." Further, if you cannot complete your review by the close of business, you were instructed to return the next day at the same time. Based upon the regulations promulgated by the Committee on Open Government and a decision rendered by the Appellate Division, Second Department, the public has the right to inspect the records during regular business hours.

By way of background, §89(1)(b)(iii) of the Freedom of Information Law requires the Committee to promulgate regulations concerning the procedural implementation of the Law (see 21 NYCRR Part 1401). In turn, §87(1) requires agencies to adopt rules and regulations consistent with the Law and the Committee's regulations. Section 1401.2 of the regulations, provides in relevant part that:

"(a) The governing body of a public corporation and the head of an executive agency or governing body of other agencies shall be responsible for insuring compliance with the regulations herein, and shall designate one or more persons as records access officer by name or by specific job title and business address, who shall have the duty of coordinating agency response to public requests for access to records. The designation of one or more records access officers shall not be construed to prohibit officials who have in the past been authorized to make records or information available to the public from continuing to do so..."

June 1, 1999

Section 1401.4 of the regulations, entitled "Hours for public inspection", states that:

"(a) Each agency shall accept requests for public access to records and produce records during all hours they are regularly open for business."

Relevant to your inquiry and the foregoing is the decision to which allusion was made earlier in which one of the issues was the validity of a similar limitation regarding the time permitted to inspect records established by a village pursuant to regulation. The Court held that the village was required to enable the public to inspect records during its regular business hours, stating that:

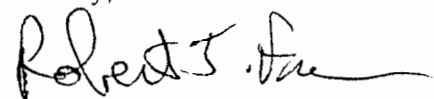

"...to the extent that Regulation 6 has been interpreted as permitting the Village Clerk to limit the hours during which public documents can be inspected to a period of time less than the business hours of the Clerk's office, it is violative of the Freedom of Information Law..."
[Murtha v. Leonard, 620 NYS 2d 101 (1994), 210 AD 2d 411].

Lastly, you asked whether you can review a public employee's schedule. In this regard, as you may be aware, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law.

In a decision concerning access to Mayor Koch's appointment calendar, it was found that such a record must be disclosed (Kerr v. Koch, Supreme Court, New York County, February 1, 1988). Consequently, it has been advised that those entries relating to the performance of one's official duties generally must be disclosed. However, references to personal activities or events, such as birthdays, appointments with doctors, family gatherings and the like could in my opinion be withheld on the ground that disclosure would result in "an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy" [see Freedom of Information Law, §87(2)(b)]

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Robert J. Freeman

Dear Mr. Perry:

I have received your letter of May 3. You have sought an opinion concerning the names of agencies from which you may obtain the hospital admission record of a person other than yourself.

In short, I know of no agency that would be required to disclose the information in question under the Freedom of Information Law. Although that statute provides broad rights of access to government records, §87(2)(b) states that an agency may withhold records or portions thereof that:

"if disclosed would constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy under the provisions of subdivision two of section eighty-nine of this article...."

In addition, §89(2)(b) lists a series of examples of unwarranted invasions of personal privacy, the first two of which pertain to:

- i. disclosure of employment, medical or credit histories or personal references or applicants for employment;
- ii. disclosure of items involving the medical or personal records of a client or patient in a medical facility..."

From my perspective, a record of an admission to a hospital consists in great measure of what might be characterized as a medical record or history relating to the person needing care or service (see

Mr. Ronald Perry

Hanig v. NYS Department of Motor Vehicles, 79 NY 2d 106 (1992)]. Consequently, in my opinion, records identifying those to whom medical services were rendered may be withheld on the ground that disclosure would constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy.

It is also noted that other provisions of law forbid the disclosure of medical records, except in specified circumstances (see e.g., Public Health Law, §§18 and 2803-c).

I hope that the foregoing serves to enhance your understanding of the matter and that I have been of assistance.

Ms. Patricia Pagano

Dear Ms. Pagano:

I have received your letter of May 5. In brief, you complained that the Village of Manorhaven has delayed responding to requests for records and that the Village Board of Trustees has discussed issues during executive sessions in a manner inconsistent with law.

In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First, I point out that the Freedom of Information Law provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies must respond to requests. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

"Each entity subject to the provisions of this article, within five business days of the receipt of a written request for a record reasonably described, shall make such record available to the person requesting it, deny such request in writing or furnish a written acknowledgement of the receipt of such request and a statement of the approximate date when such request will be granted or denied..."

If neither a response to a request nor an acknowledgement of the receipt of a request is given within five business days, or if an agency delays responding for an unreasonable time after it acknowledges that a request has been received, a request may, in my opinion, be considered to have been constructively denied. In such a circumstance, I believe that the denial may be appealed in accordance with §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law. That provision states in relevant part that:

"...any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive, or governing body, who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully

explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

In addition, it has been held that when an appeal is made but a determination is not rendered within ten business days of the receipt of the appeal as required under §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, the appellant has exhausted his or her administrative remedies and may initiate a challenge to a constructive denial of access under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Rules [Floyd v. McGuire, 87 AD 2d 388, appeal dismissed 57 NY 2d 774 (1982)].

I note that although an agency must grant access to records, deny access or acknowledge the receipt of a request within five business days, when such acknowledgement is given, there is no precise time period within which an agency must grant or deny access to records. The time needed to do so may be dependent upon the volume of a request, the possibility that other requests have been made, the necessity to conduct legal research, the search and retrieval techniques used to locate the records and the like. In short, when an agency acknowledges the receipt of a request because more than five business days may be needed to grant or deny a request, so long as it provides an approximate date indicating when the request will be granted or denied, and that date is reasonable in view of the attendant circumstances, I believe that the agency would be acting in compliance with law.

Notwithstanding the foregoing, in my view, every law must be implemented in a manner that gives reasonable effect to its intent, and I point out that in its statement of legislative intent, §84 of the Freedom of Information Law states that "it is incumbent upon the state and its localities to extend public accountability wherever and whenever feasible." Therefore, if records are clearly available to the public under the Freedom of Information Law, or if they are readily retrievable, there may be no basis for a lengthy delay in disclosure. As the Court of Appeals has asserted:

"...the successful implementation of the policies motivating the enactment of the Freedom of Information Law centers on goals as broad as the achievement of a more informed electorate and a more responsible and responsive officialdom. By their very nature such objectives cannot hope to be attained unless the measures taken to bring them about permeate the body politic to a point where they become the rule rather than the exception. The phrase 'public accountability wherever and whenever feasible' therefore merely punctuates with explicitness what in any event is implicit" [Westchester News v. Kimball, 50 NY 2d 575, 579 (1980)].

If a request is voluminous and a significant amount of time is needed to locate records and review them to determine rights of access, a delay beyond five business days, in view of those and perhaps the other kinds of factors mentioned earlier, might be reasonable. On the other hand, if a record or report is clearly public and can be found easily, there would appear to be no rational basis for delaying disclosure.

Ms. Patricia Pagano

Second, the Open Meetings Law is based on a presumption of openness. Stated differently, a public body must conduct its meetings in public, unless there is a basis for entry into executive session. Paragraphs (a) through (h) of §105(1) of the Open Meetings Law specify the subjects that may properly be considered during an executive session. Because the ability to enter into executive session is limited, a public body may not conduct an executive session to discuss the subject of its choice.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Mr. Bill VanAllen

Dear Mr. VanAllen:

I have received your letter of May 6 in which you sought an opinion concerning your right to obtain death records, autopsy reports and related records under the Freedom of Information Law.

In this regard, as you are likely aware, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law. Although that statute provides broad rights of access, the initial ground for denial, §87(2)(a), pertains to records that "are specifically exempted from disclosure by state or federal statute."

One such statute is §677 of the County Law, which refers to autopsy reports and related records. Subdivision (3), paragraph (b) of that provision states that:

"Such records shall be open to inspection by the district attorney of the county. Upon application of the personal representative, spouse or next of kin of the deceased to the coroner or the medical examiner, a copy of the autopsy report, as described in subdivision two of this section shall be furnished to such applicant. Upon proper application of any person who is or may be affected in a civil or criminal action by the contents of the record of any investigation, or upon application of any person having a substantial interest therein, an order may be made by a court of record, or by a justice of the supreme court, that the record of that investigation be made available for his inspection, or that a transcript thereof be furnished to him, or both."

Mr. Bill VanAllen
Page -2-

Based upon the foregoing, the Freedom of Information Law in my opinion is inapplicable as a basis for seeking or obtaining an autopsy report, for the ability to obtain such a report is based solely on §677(3)(b) of the County Law. Unless you are the "next of kin", a court order would be required to obtain such records.

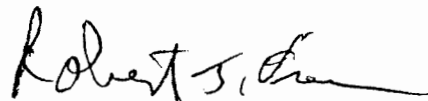

With regard to death records, §4174(1)(a) of the Public Health Law, which pertains to access to death records, states that such records are available:

"(1) when a documented medical need has been demonstrated, (2) when a documented need to establish a legal right or claim has been demonstrated, (3) when needed for medical or scientific research approved by the commissioner, (4) when needed for statistical or epidemiological purposes approved by the commissioner, (5) upon specific request by municipal, state or federal agencies for statistical or official purposes, (6) upon specific request of the spouse, children, or parents of the deceased or the lawful representative of such persons, or (7) pursuant to the order of a court of competent jurisdiction on a showing of necessity; except no certified copy or certified transcript of a death record shall be subject to disclosure under article six of the public officers law..."

Article six of the Public Officers Law is the Freedom of Information Law. As such, based upon the provision quoted above, death records, when accessible, are available only under the circumstances prescribed in the Public Health Law.

I hope that the foregoing serves to clarify your understanding of the matter and that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Robert J. Freeman

Dear Ms. Armeno and Mayor Kearney:

I have received your letters, which are respectively dated May 3 and May 25. In short, Ms. Armeno has complained that Mayor Kearney "has made a regular practice to advise FOIL requests that there will be a normal 30 day period to wait for any information", and advisory opinions have been sent to other residents of the Village of Fleischmanns in which it was suggested that a such a practice is inconsistent with the Freedom of Information Law. In his letter, the Mayor sought an opinion concerning the propriety of an acknowledgement of receipt of a request by the Department of Motor Vehicles (DMV) indicating that "Normally, F.O.I.L. requests can be granted or denied within 30 days" of the date of acknowledgement.

In my view, the situation relating to requests for records of the DMV cannot be compared with or equated to that relating to requests for records of the Village of Fleischmanns. Having conferred with DMV's Records Access Officer, that agency receives thousands of requests per month characterized as "simple" and approximately 100 requests per month characterized as "complex" or "complicated". While I could not locate current figures regarding its population, it is my understanding that the entire population of the Village of Fleischmanns is well under 1,000. Considering the volume of requests and the sizes of the two agencies, again, I do not believe that they can effectively be compared for the purpose of considering their time for responding to requests for records. What may be a reasonable time to respond in one agency may not represent a reasonable time in another. Typically, in a municipality similar in size to the Village of Fleischmanns, the Clerk or other official can locate records within a matter of minutes.

I point out that the notion of reasonableness was stressed in opinions previously rendered at the requests of other residents of the Village. Specifically, it was stated that:

“...although an agency must grant access to records, deny access or acknowledge the receipt of a request within five business days, when such acknowledgement is given, there is no precise time period within which an agency must grant or deny access to records. The time needed to do so may be dependent upon the volume of a request, the possibility that other requests have been made, the necessity to conduct legal research, the search and retrieval techniques used to locate the records and the like. In short, when an agency acknowledges the receipt of a request because more than five business days may be needed to grant or deny a request, so long as it provides an approximate date indicating when the request will be granted or denied, and that date is reasonable in view of the attendant circumstances, I believe that the agency would be acting in compliance with law.”

It was also suggested that:

“...in my view, every law must be implemented in a manner that gives reasonable effect to its intent, and I point out that in its statement of legislative intent, §84 of the Freedom of Information Law states that “it is incumbent upon the state and its localities to extend public accountability wherever and whenever feasible.” Therefore, if records are clearly available to the public under the Freedom of Information Law, or if they are readily retrievable, there may be no basis for a lengthy delay in disclosure. As the Court of Appeals has asserted:

“...the successful implementation of the policies motivating the enactment of the Freedom of Information Law centers on goals as broad as the achievement of a more informed electorate and a more responsible and responsive officialdom. By their very nature such objectives cannot hope to be attained unless the measures taken to bring them about permeate the body politic to a point where they become the rule rather than the exception. any event is implicit" [Westchester News v. Kimball,
50 NY 2d 575, 579 (1980)].

In sum, due to its size and the number of requests received by DMV, its likely that a delay in disclosure of records of approximately a month is reasonable. For the same reasons, the size of the Village of Fleischmanns and the nature of the requests that have been described to me, it seems that the Village, to comply with law, should be granting access to accessible records within five business days of their receipt of the requests.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Mr. Willie Lee Walker

Attica Correctional Facility
Box 149
Attica, NY 14011-0149

Dear Mr. Walker:

I have received your letter of May 30 in which you requested that this office provide copies of certain documents or information concerning where you may be able to obtain them.

In this regard, the Committee on Open Government is authorized to provide advice and opinions concerning rights of access to government records, primarily under the state's Freedom of Information Law. The Committee does not have possession of records generally. In short, I cannot provide the records of your interest because this agency does not maintain them.

To seek the records of your interest, a request should be made to the "records access officer" at the agency or agencies that you believe maintain the records. Pursuant to the regulations promulgated by the Committee on Open Government (21 NYCRR Part 1401), each agency must designate one or more persons as records access officer, and that person has the duty of coordinating an agency's response to requests.

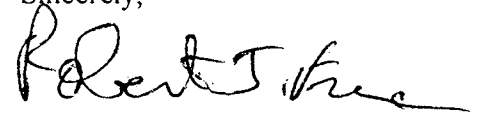

It is also noted that §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law requires that an applicant "reasonably describe" the records sought. Therefore, a request should contain sufficient detail to enable agency staff to locate and identify the records.

Lastly, in brief, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law. Since one of the items of interest is a "complaint log sheet", I point out that several of the grounds for denial may be pertinent and that it is likely that the log would not be available in its entirety.

Dear Mr. Magee:

I have received your letter of May 4, as well as the correspondence attached to it. In brief, you requested certain records from the Division of State Police. The request was denied and you were informed of the right to appeal. You have asked whether there is "somewhere else" where you can appeal.

Assuming that your question involves another source of appealing a denial of access to records under the Freedom of Information Law, there is no other vehicle for appealing. I direct your attention to §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law which deals with the right to appeal a denial of access to records and states that:

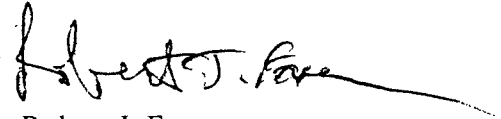

"any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive or governing body of the entity, or the person thereof designated by such head, chief executive, or governing body, who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

I believe that the provision quoted above represents the only means of appealing a denial of access to records.

Gary Fusfield, Esq.

Dear Mr. Fusfield:

I have received your letter of May 7 and the materials attached to it. You have questioned whether a denial of access to records by the Workers' Compensation Board was consistent with law and an opinion previously prepared by this office at your request.

In brief, you requested that you be granted access to "the name, address and business relationships of all persons or entities currently under investigation by the Workers' Compensation Board." The request was denied on the grounds that "disclosure would constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy and the records sought pertain to current investigations." In a reference to an opinion that I wrote on November 20, 1998, you focused on a decision that I cited construing the federal Freedom of Information Act in which it was stated that "The privacy exemption does not apply to information regarding professional or business activities... This information must be disclosed even if a professional reputation may be tarnished [Cohen v. Environmental Protection Agency, 575 F. Supp. 425 (D.C.D.C. 1983)].

The opinion prepared in November involved the legality of a public announcement made by a Compensation Claims Referee that your business practices were under investigation. Following a lengthy analysis of the issue, it was advised that the Personal Privacy Protection Law would not have prohibited the disclosure of that information.

It appears that the Workers' Compensation Board may differ with that analysis. Nevertheless, I believe that a different provision would enable the Board to withhold the records in question.

In its denial of your request, the Board's records access officer wrote that disclosure would constitute an unwarranted invasion of privacy under §87(2)(b) of the Freedom of Information Law, and he also wrote that §95(5)(a) of the Personal Privacy Protection Law "provides that an agency

Gary Fusfield, Esq.

may exempt from disclosure personal information regarding a data subject, 'if such information is compiled for law enforcement purposes and would if disclosed...(1) interfere with law enforcement investigations or judicial proceedings.' In my view, §95(5)(1) would not be applicable, for it involves an exception to rights of access when a person seeks records pertaining to himself or herself. Your request did not involve records about yourself, but rather about others who may be subjects of investigations.

Notwithstanding the foregoing, I believe that §87(2)(e)(i) of the Freedom of Information Law is pertinent and applicable. That provision permits an agency with withhold records compiled for law enforcement purposes when disclosure would "interfere with law enforcement investigations or judicial proceedings." If an individual becomes aware that he or she is the subject or knows of the details of an investigation, he or she could tailor his or her activities so as to evade detection, destroy records or evidentiary material, or engage in other actions designed to frustrate a government agency's investigation.

Irrespective of whether disclosure might constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy, when §87(2)(e)(i) or any other ground for denial, can properly be asserted, I believe that an agency may justifiably withhold records.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

The staff of the Committee on Open Government is authorized to issue advisory opinions. The ensuing staff advisory opinion is based solely upon the information presented in your correspondence.

Dear Mr. Gonzalez:

Your letter addressed to "Information Services" at the Department of State has been forwarded to the Committee on Open Government. The Committee, a unit of the Department, is authorized to provide advice concerning the Freedom of Information Law. In short, you asked how you might obtain any records pertaining to you from any unit of government.

In this regard, there is no central source of government records pertaining to individuals. Further, a request to an agency for records about yourself, without additional information, would not meet the standard imposed by the Freedom of Information Law. Section 89(3) of that statute states in relevant part that an applicant must "reasonably describe" the records sought. Therefore, a request should include sufficient detail (i.e., dates, identification numbers, file designations, etc.) to enable the staff of an agency to locate and identify the records of your interest.

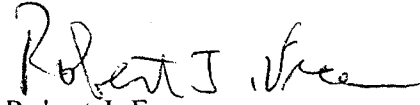

It is noted that the regulations promulgated by the Committee on Open Government (21 NYCRR Part 1401) require that each agency designate one or more persons as "records access officer." That person has the duty of coordinating an agency's response to requests, and requests should be made to the records access officer at the agency or agencies that you believe would maintain records pertaining to you.

Lastly, there is no provision in the Freedom of Information Law concerning fee waivers, and it has been held that an agency may charge its established fee, even if the applicant is an indigent inmate [Whitehead v. Morgenthau, 552 NYS2d 518 (1990)].

Dear Mr. Henderson:

I have received your letter of May 6 in which you sought assistance in obtaining Family Court records.

In this regard, I point out that the statutes that you cited in your request, the federal Freedom of Information and Privacy Acts, pertain only to records maintained by federal agencies; they would not apply to records of a state court. Similarly, the New York Freedom of Information Law pertains to agency records and §86(3) of that statute defines the term "agency" to include:

"any state or municipal department, board, bureau, division, commission, committee, public authority, public corporation, council, office or other governmental entity performing a governmental or proprietary function for the state or any one or more municipalities thereof, except the judiciary or the state legislature."

In turn, §86(1) defines "judiciary" to mean:

"the courts of the state, including any municipal or district court, whether or not of record."

As such, the Freedom of Information Law does not apply to the courts or court records.

Mr. Michael Henderson
June 11, 1999

Relevant to the matter is §166 of the Family Court Act. That statute states that:

"The records of any proceeding in the family court shall not be open to indiscriminate public inspection. However, the court in its discretion in any case may permit the inspection of any papers or records. Any duly authorized agency, association, society or institution to which a child is committed may cause an inspection of the record of investigation to be had and may in the discretion of the court obtain a copy of the whole or part of such record."

In view of the foregoing, it is suggested that you resubmit your request to the clerk of the court, indicating that you are not seeking indiscriminate inspection of or access to the records, but rather that the records are pertinent to a proceeding in which you are involved.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Dear Mr. DiLorenzo:

I have received your letter of May 5 in which you complained that your facility did not provide the information that you sought under the "Patient's Bill of Rights". You sought the "full names of caregivers" who provided services in a certain unit, and you indicated that the agency sought to charge fee for making the information available.

In this regard, I am unaware of any provision that would require that an entity prepare a new record containing the full names of those who provided medical treatment or care to an individual. I note, too, that the Freedom of Information Law pertains to existing records and states in §89(3) that an agency is not required to create a record in response to a request. In short, if no single record exists containing the full names of caregivers, I do not believe that the facility would be required to prepare such a record on your behalf.

With respect to fees, §18 of the Public Health Law permits a provider of medical services to charge up to seventy-five per photocopy when making medical records available to the subject of the records, and the Freedom of Information Law authorizes an agency to charge up to twenty-five cents per photocopy for records made available under that statute.

Dear Ms. Montalvo:

I have received your letter of May 6 and the correspondence attached to it. You have sought assistance in relation to a request for records maintained by the New York City Police Department.

Having reviewed your request, I believe that it is appropriate. The Department's records access officer is located at One Police Plaza, and I believe that the person so designated is Sgt. Richard Evangelista.

For future reference, I point out that the New York Freedom of Information Law provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies must respond to requests. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

"Each entity subject to the provisions of this article, within five business days of the receipt of a written request for a record reasonably described, shall make such record available to the person requesting it, deny such request in writing or furnish a written acknowledgement of the receipt of such request and a statement of the approximate date when such request will be granted or denied..."

If neither a response to a request nor an acknowledgement of the receipt of a request is given within five business days, or if an agency delays responding for an unreasonable time after it acknowledges that a request has been received, a request may, in my opinion, be considered to have been constructively denied. In such a circumstance, I believe that the denial may be appealed in accordance with §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law. That provision states in relevant part that:

Ms. Raquel Montalvo

June 11, 1999

Page -2-

"...any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive, or governing body, who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

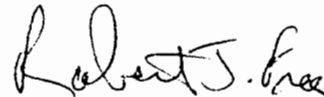

In addition, it has been held that when an appeal is made but a determination is not rendered within ten business days of the receipt of the appeal as required under §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, the appellant has exhausted his or her administrative remedies and may initiate a challenge to a constructive denial of access under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Rules [Floyd v. McGuire, 87 AD 2d 388, appeal dismissed 57 NY 2d 774 (1982)].

For your information, the person designated by the Department to determine appeals is Susan Petito, Special Counsel.

Lastly, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law. Since the records of your interest are statements that you provided, it is unlikely that there would be a basis for a denial of access.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Robert J. Freeman

Coxsackie Correctional Facility
P.O. Box 999
Coxsackie, NY 12051

Dear Mr. Coleman:

I have received your recent undated letter, which reached this office on May 10. You have sought assistance in obtaining the employee manual used by correction officers employed by the Department of Correctional Services.

In this regard, as a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all record of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more of the grounds for denial appearing in section 87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law. I am unfamiliar with the contents of the record in which you are interested. However, from my perspective, three of the grounds for denial may be relevant to your inquiry.

Specifically, section 87(2)(g) states that an agency may withhold records that:

"are inter-agency or intra-agency materials which are not:

- i. statistical or factual tabulations or data;
- ii. instructions to staff that affect the public;
- iii. final agency policy or determinations; or
- iv. external audits, including but not limited to audits performed by the comptroller and the federal government..."

It is noted that the language quoted above contains what in effect is a double negative. While inter-agency or intra-agency materials may be withheld, portions of such materials consisting of statistical or factual information, instructions to staff that affect the public, final agency policy or determinations or external audits must be made available, unless a different basis for denial is applicable. Concurrently, those portions of inter-agency or intra-agency materials that are reflective of opinion, advice, recommendation and the like could in my view be withheld. It would appear that the records in question consist of instructions to staff that affect the public or an agency's policy. Therefore, I believe that rules and regulations would be available, unless a different basis for denial could be asserted.

Mr. Douglas Coleman

A second provision of potential significance is section 87(2)(e), which permits an agency to withhold records that:

"are compiled for law enforcement purposes and which, if disclosed, would:

i. interfere with law enforcement investigations of judicial proceedings...

ii. deprive a person of a right to a fair trial or impartial adjudication;

iii. identify a confidential source or disclose confidential information relating to a criminal investigation; or

iv. reveal criminal investigative techniques or procedures, except routine techniques and procedures."

Under the circumstances, it appears that most relevant is section 87(2)(e)(iv). The leading decision concerning that provision is Fink v. Lefkowitz, which involved access to a manual prepared by a special prosecutor that investigated nursing homes, in which the Court of Appeals held that:

"The purpose of this exemption is obvious. Effective law enforcement demands that violators of the law not be apprised the nonroutine procedures by which an agency obtains its information (see Frankel v. Securities & Exch. Comm., 460 F2d 813, 817, cert den 409 US 889). However beneficial its thrust, the purpose of the Freedom of Information Law is not to enable persons to use agency records to frustrate pending or threatened investigations nor to use that information to construct a defense to impede a prosecution.

"To be distinguished from agency records compiled for law enforcement purposes which illustrate investigative techniques, are those which articulate the agency's understanding of the rules and regulations it is empowered to enforce. Records drafted by the body charged with enforcement of a statute which merely clarify procedural or substantive law must be disclosed. Such information in the hands of the public does not impede effective law enforcement. On the contrary, such knowledge actually encourages voluntary compliance with the law by detailing the standards with which a person is expected to comply, thus allowing him to conform his conduct to those requirements (see Stokes v. Brennan, 476 F2d 699, 702; Hawkes v. Internal Revenue Serv., 467 F2d 787, 794-795; Davis, Administrative Law [1970 Supp], section 3A, p 114).

"Indicative, but not necessarily dispositive of whether investigative techniques are nonroutine is whether disclosure of those procedures would give rise to a substantial likelihood that violators could evade detection by deliberately tailoring their conduct in anticipation of avenues of inquiry to be pursued by agency personnel (see Cox v. United States Dept. of Justice, 576 F2d 1302, 1307-1308; City of Concord v. Ambrose, 333 F Supp 958). It is no secret that numbers on a balance sheet can be made to do magical things by scrupulous nursing home operators the path that an audit is likely to take and alerting them to items to which investigators are instructed to pay particular attention, does not encourage observance of the law. Rather, release of such information actually countenances fraud by enabling miscreants to alter their books and activities to minimize the possibility or being brought to task for criminal activities. In such a case, the procedures contained in an administrative manual are, in a very real sense, compilations of investigative techniques exempt from disclosure. The Freedom of Information Law was not enacted to furnish the safecracker with the combination to the safe" (id. at 572-573).

In applying those criteria to specific portions of the manual, which was compiled for law enforcement purposes, the Court found that:

"Chapter V of the Special Prosecutor's Manual provides a graphic illustration of the confidential techniques used in a successful nursing home prosecution. None of those procedures are 'routine' in the sense of fingerprinting or ballistic tests (see Senate Report No. 93-1200, 93 Cong 2d Sess [1974]). Rather, they constitute detailed, specialized methods of conducting an investigation into the activities of a specialized industry in which voluntary compliance with the law has been less than exemplary.

"Disclosure of the techniques enumerated in those pages would enable an operator to tailor his activities in such a way as to significantly diminish the likelihood of a successful prosecution. The information detailed on pages 481 and 482 of the manual, on the other hand, is merely a recitation of the obvious: that auditors should pay particular attention to requests by nursing homes for Medicaid reimbursement rate increases based upon projected increase in cost. As this is simply a routine technique that would be used in any audit, there is no reason why these pages should not be disclosed" (id. at 573).

June 11, 1999

Again, although I am unfamiliar with the record in question, it would appear that those portions which, if disclosed, would enable individuals to hamper effective law enforcement, adversely affect security or evade detection could likely be withheld. It is noted that in another decision which dealt with a request for certain regulations of the State Police, the Court of Appeals found that some aspects of the regulations were non-routine, and that disclosure could "allow miscreants to tailor their activities to evade detection" [De Zimm v. Connelie, 64 NY 2d 860 (1985)]. Nevertheless, other portions of the records might be "routine" and apparently would not if disclosed preclude correction officers from carrying out their duties effectively.

The remaining ground for denial of possible relevance is section 87(2)(f). That provision permits an agency to withhold records when disclosure "would endanger the life of safety of any person." To the extent that disclosure would endanger the life of safety of correction officers or others, it appears that section 87(2)(f) would be applicable.

In sum, while some aspects of the records might be deniable, others must in my opinion be disclosed in conjunction with the preceding commentary.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Robert J. Freeman

FROM: Robert J. Freeman Executive Director RJF

The staff of the Committee on Open Government is authorized to issue advisory opinions. The ensuing staff advisory opinion is based solely upon the information presented in your correspondence, unless otherwise indicated.

Dear Ms. Beach:

As you are aware, I have received your correspondence concerning the fees charged by the Niagara County Sheriff's Department for copies of information stored in a computer. In addition, as promised, I have discussed the matter with Chief Deputy Taylor.

By way of background, unless a different statute applies, §87(1)(b)(iii) of the Freedom of Information Law authorizes agencies to charge up to twenty-five cents for photocopying records up to nine by fourteen inches, or the actual cost for the reproduction of other records, i.e., those that are not reproduced by means of photocopying, such as information stored in a computer.

In some instances, extracting or generating information stored in a computer may be a relatively easy task that involves typing a few keystrokes and entering brief commands. In that kind of situation, it is likely that the actual cost of reproduction would be minimal, for that cost would reflect computer time and the cost of the medium onto which the information is reproduced, such as paper, a computer tape or disk. In other instances, the task may be more complicated, for it may involve the services of a computer technician and a lengthy series of steps that must be taken to locate, extract and reproduce the information.

Having discussed the matter with Chief Taylor, it appears that the basis of your inquiry relates to the latter kind of situation. He indicated that you have made numerous requests, and that many have resulted in disclosures that could readily be made. With respect to the request at issue, however, Chief Taylor informed me that the records sought are not current and that retrieving them involves substantial effort on the part of persons having technical expertise. In that kind of situation, case law indicates that the actual cost of reproduction may include the personnel time expended in the effort to reproduce the records [see Brownstone Publishers, Inc. v. New York City Department of Buildings, 550 NYS2d 564, affirmed, 166 AD2d 294 (1990)].

Ms. Debbie Beach

Assuming that the fee sought to be charged reasonably represents the actual cost of reproducing the records, I believe that the County would be acting in compliance with law. Conversely, when the fee assessed by an agency for reproducing other than paper records exceeds the actual of reproduction, the agency, in my view, would be acting in a manner inconsistent with law.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Mr. A. Stephen Corina

[REDACTED]

Dear Mr. Corina:

I have received your letter of June 12 in which you sought assistance in obtaining the time cards of an employee of Schenectady County. Based on the Freedom of Information Law and its judicial interpretation, the records in question must, in my view, be disclosed.

In this regard, I offer the following comments.

As a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law.

Although two of the grounds for denial relate to attendance records or time sheets, neither in my opinion would justify a denial of access.

Of significance is §87(2)(g), which permits an agency to withhold records that:

"are inter-agency or intra-agency materials which are not:

- i. statistical or factual tabulations or data;
- ii. instructions to staff that affect the public;
- iii. final agency policy or determinations; or
- iv. external audits, including but not limited to audits performed by the comptroller and the federal government..."

It is noted that the language quoted above contains what in effect is a double negative. While inter-agency or intra-agency materials may be withheld, portions of such materials consisting of statistical or factual information, instructions to staff that affect the public, final agency policy or determinations or external audits must be made available, unless a different ground for denial could appropriately be asserted. Concurrently, those portions of inter-agency or intra-agency materials that are reflective of opinion, advice, recommendation and the like could in my view be withheld.

Attendance records could be characterized as "intra-agency materials." However, those portions reflective of dates or figures concerning the issue of leave time or absences, the times that employees arrive at or leave work, or which identify employees by name would constitute "statistical or factual" information accessible under §87(2)(g)(i).

Also relevant is §87(2)(b), which permits an agency to withhold record or portions of records when disclosure would result in "an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy." This office has advised and the courts have upheld the notion that records that are relevant to the performance of the official duties of public employees are generally available, for disclosure in such instances would result in a permissible as opposed to an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy [Gannett Co. v. County of Monroe, 59 AD2d 309 (1977), aff'd 45 NY2d 954 (1978); Capital Newspapers v. Burns, 109 AD 2d 292, aff'd 67 NY 2d 562 (1986) ; Steinmetz v. Board of Education, East Moriches, Sup. Ct., Suffolk Cty., NYLJ, October 30, 1980; Farrell v. Village Board of Trustees, 372 NYS 2d 905 (1975) ; and Montes v. State, 406 NYS 664 (Court of Claims 1978)].

With regard to time sheets or attendance records, in a decision pertaining to a particular police officer and records indicating the day and dates he claimed as sick leave, which was affirmed by the State's highest court, it was found, in essence, that disclosure would result in a permissible rather than an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy. Specifically, the Appellate Division found that:

"One of the most basic obligations of any employee is to appear for work when scheduled to do so. Concurrent with this is the rights of an employee to properly use sick leave available to him or her. In the instant case, intervenor had an obligation to report for work when scheduled along with a right to use sick leave in accordance with his collective bargaining agreement. The taxpayers have an interest in such use of sick leave for economic as well as safety reasons. Thus it can hardly be said that disclosure of the dates in February 1983 when intervenor made use of sick leave would constitute an unwarranted invasion of privacy. Further, the motives of petitioners or the means by which they will report the information is not determinative since all records of government agencies are presumptively available for inspection without regard to the status, need, good faith or purpose of the applicant requesting access..." (Capital Newspapers v. Burns, supra, 94-95).

Insofar as attendance records or time sheets include reference to reasons for an absence, it has been advised that an explanation of why sick time might have been used, i.e., a description of an illness or medical problem found in records, could be withheld or deleted from a record otherwise available, for disclosure of so personal a detail of a person's life would likely constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy and would not be relevant to the performance of an employee's duties. A number, however, which merely indicates the amount of sick time or vacation time accumulated or used, or the dates and times of attendance or absence, would not in my view represent a personal detail of an individual's life and would be relevant to the performance of one's official duties. Therefore, I do not believe that §87(2)(b) could be asserted to withhold that kind of information contained in an attendance record.

Mr. A. Stephen Corina

In sum, I believe that time sheets, attendance and similar records pertaining to public employees must be disclosed, subject to the qualifications described above.

In an effort to enhance compliance with and understanding of the Freedom of Information Law, copies of this opinion will be sent to County officials.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Robert J. Freeman
Executive Director

Mr. Murray N. Jacobson
Town Attorney
Town of Clarkstown
10 Maple Avenue
New City, NY 10956-5099

Dear Mr. Jacobson:

I appreciate having received a copy of your determination of May 10 in relation to a request made under the Freedom of Information Law by Richard P. Bunyan. Mr. Bunyan requested agreements between the Town of Clarkstown and "all private investigative companies" as well as records concerning payments made to those companies during the past two years.

From my perspective, while many aspects of the records might justifiably have been withheld, it is likely in my view that the denial of access to the records sought in their entirety was inappropriate. In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First and perhaps most importantly, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law. It is emphasized that the introductory language of §87(2) refers to the authority to withhold "records or portions thereof" that fall within the scope of the exceptions that follow. In my view, the phrase quoted in the preceding sentence evidences a recognition on the part of the Legislature that a single record or report, for example, might include portions that are available under the statute, as well as portions that might justifiably be withheld. That being so, I believe that it also imposes an obligation on an agency to review records sought, in their entirety, to determine which portions, if any, might properly be withheld or deleted prior to disclosing the remainder.

The Court of Appeals expressed its general view of the intent of the Freedom of Information Law most recently in Gould v. New York City Police Department [87 NY 2d 267 (1996)], stating that:

"To ensure maximum access to government records, the 'exemptions are to be narrowly construed, with the burden resting on the agency to demonstrate that the requested material indeed qualifies for exemption' (Matter of Hanig v. State of New York Dept. of Motor Vehicles, 79 N.Y.2d 106, 109, 580 N.Y.S.2d 715, 588 N.E.2d 750 see, Public Officers Law § 89[4][b]). As this Court has stated, '[o]nly where the material requested falls squarely within the ambit of one of these statutory exemptions may disclosure be withheld' (Matter of Fink v. Lefkowitz, 47 N.Y.2d, 567, 571, 419 N.Y.S.2d 467, 393 N.E.2d 463)" (id., 275).

Just as significant, the Court in Gould repeatedly specified that a categorical denial of access to records is inconsistent with the requirements of the Freedom of Information Law. In that case, the agency contended that complaint follow up reports, also known as "DD5's", could be withheld in their entirety on the ground that they fall within the exception regarding intra-agency materials, §87(2)(g). The Court, however, wrote that: "Petitioners contend that because the complaint follow-up reports contain factual data, the exemption does not justify complete nondisclosure of the reports. We agree" (id., 276). The Court then stated as a general principle that "blanket exemptions for particular types of documents are inimical to FOIL's policy of open government" (id., 275). The Court also offered guidance to agencies and lower courts in determining rights of access and referred to several decisions it had previously rendered, directing that:

"...to invoke one of the exemptions of section 87(2), the agency must articulate 'particularized and specific justification' for not disclosing requested documents (Matter of Fink v. Lefkowitz, supra, 47 N.Y.2d, at 571, 419 N.Y.S.2d 467, 393 N.E.2d 463). If the court is unable to determine whether withheld documents fall entirely within the scope of the asserted exemption, it should conduct an in camera inspection of representative documents and order disclosure of all nonexempt, appropriately redacted material (see, Matter of Xerox Corp. v. Town of Webster, 65 N.Y.2d 131, 133, 490 N.Y.S. 2d, 488, 480 N.E.2d 74; Matter of Farbman & Sons v. New York City Health & Hosps. Corp., supra, 62 N.Y.2d, at 83, 476 N.Y.S.2d 69, 464 N.E.2d 437)" (id.).

In my view, the situation may be likened to a case in which a request was made for detailed records involving monies paid to a law firm by a county [see Orange County Publications, Inc. v. County of Orange [637 NYS 2d 596 (1995)]]. Specifically, the decision involved a request for "the amount of money paid in 1994 to a particular law firm for legal services rendered in representing the County in a landfill expansion suit, as well as "copies of invoices, bills, vouchers submitted to the county from the law firm justifying and itemizing the expenses for 1994" (id., 599). Although monthly bills indicating amounts charged by the firm were disclosed, the agency redacted "'the daily descriptions of the specific tasks' (the description material) 'including descriptions of issues researched, meetings and conversations between attorney and client'" (id.). The County offered several rationales for the redactions; nevertheless, the court rejected all of them, in some instances fully, in others in part.

Mr. Murray N. Jacobson

Page -3-

The first contention was that the descriptive material is specifically exempted from disclosure by statute in conjunction with §87(2)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law and the assertion of the attorney-client privilege pursuant to §4503 of the Civil Practice Law and Rules (CPLR). The court found that the mere communication between the law firm and the County as its client does not necessarily involve a privileged communication; rather, the court stressed that it is the content of the communications that determine the extent to which the privilege applies. Further, the court distinguished between actual communications between attorney and client and descriptions of the legal services provided, stating that:

"Thus, respondent's position can be sustained only if such descriptions rise to the level of protected communications.

"In this regard, the Court recognizes that not all communications between attorney and client are privileged. Matter of Priest v. Hennessy, supra, 51 N.Y.2d 68, 69, 409 N.E.2d 983, 431, N.Y.S.2d 511. In particular, 'fee arrangements between attorney and client do not ordinarily constitute a confidential communication and, thus, are not privileged in the usual case' (Ibid.). Indeed, '[a] communication concerning the fee to be paid has no direct relevance to the legal advice to be given', but rather "[i]s a collateral matter which, unlike communications which relate to the subject matter of the attorney's professional employment, is not privileged' Matter of Priest v. Hennessy, supra, 51 N.Y.2d at 69, 409 N.E.2d 983, 431 N.Y.S.2d 511.

"Consequently, while billing statements which 'are detailed in showing services, conversations, and conferences between counsel and others' are protected by the attorney-client privilege (Licensing Corporation of America v. National Hockey League Players Association, 153 Misc.2d 126, 127-128, 580 N.Y.S.2d 128 [Sup. Ct. N.Y.Co. 1992]; see, De La Roche v. De La Roche, 209 A.D.2d 157, 158-159 [1st Dept. 1994]), no such privilege attaches to fee statements which do not provide 'detailed accounts' of the legal services provided by counsel..." (id., 602).

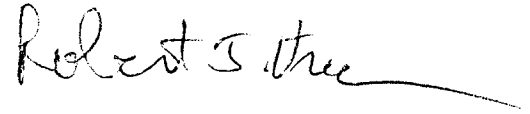

In the context of Mr. Bunyan's request, I would agree that substantial portions of the records may be withheld, for disclosure could, as I understand the situation, interfere with law enforcement investigations, endanger people's lives or safety, or reveal other than routine criminal investigative techniques and procedures. Nevertheless, I would conjecture that disclosure of portions of the records identifying an entity with which the Town has contracted or the amount paid to any such entity would not likely fall within any of the grounds for denial. Those items, if disclosed, would not likely result in the harmful effects of disclosure described in the provision to which you referred.

If you would like to discuss the matter, please feel free to contact me.

Dear Mr. Smith:

I have received your letter of May 9. You wrote that you have requested records from the Office of the Kings County District Attorney and, as I understand your comments, although the receipt of your request has been acknowledged, there has been no indication of when the request would be granted or denied.

In this regard, as stated in my letter to you of March 8, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law provides in relevant part that:

"Each entity subject to the provisions of this article, within five business days of the receipt of a written request for a record reasonably described, shall make such record available to the person requesting it, deny such request in writing or furnish a written acknowledgement of the receipt of such request and a statement of the approximate date when such request will be granted or denied..."

It has been held that agency officials "did not conform to the mandates" of the provision quoted above "when they did not...furnish a written acknowledgement of the receipt of...requests along with a statement of the approximate date when action would be taken" [Newton v. Police Department, 585 NYS2d 5, 8, 183 AD2d 621 (1992), emphasis added].

In a case that described an experience that may be similar to yours, the court cited §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law and wrote that:

"The acknowledgement letters in this proceeding neither granted nor denied petitioner's request nor approximated a determination date. Rather, the letters were open ended as to time as they stated, 'that a period of time would be required to ascertain whether such documents do exist, and if they did, whether they qualify for inspection.

"This court finds that respondent's actions and/or inactions placed petitioner in a "Catch 22" position. The petitioner, relying on the respondent's representation, anticipated a determination to her request...this court finds that this petitioner should not be penalized for respondent's failure to comply with Public Officers Law §89 (3), especially when petitioner was advised by respondent that a decision concerning her application would be forthcoming.

It should also be noted that petitioner did not sit idle during this period but rather made numerous efforts to obtain a decision from respondent including the submission of a follow up letter to the Records Access Officer and submission of various requests for said records with the Department of Transportation" (Bernstein v. City of New York, Supreme Court, Supreme Court, New York County, November 7, 1990).

In Bernstein, the court determined that the agency "is estopped from asserting that this proceeding is improper due to petitioner's failure to appeal the denial of access to records within 30 days to the agency head, as provided in Public Officers Law, §89(4)(a)."

Based on the foregoing, I believe that your request has been constructively denied and that you may appeal the denial pursuant to §89(4)(a). That provision states in relevant part that:

"...any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive or governing body of the entity, or the person therefor designated by such head, chief executive, or governing body, who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reason for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

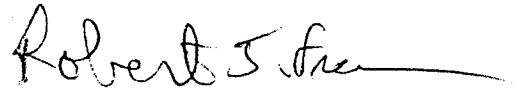

Alternatively, based on the holding in Bernstein, it appears that you could seek judicial review of the denials now. I suggest, however, that you appeal in an effort to avoid the time and cost of litigation.

I believe that person designated by the District Attorney is Jodi Mandel, Assistant District Attorney.

Collins Correctional Facility

Dear Mr. Doyen:

I have received your letter of May 7, as well as the materials attached to it. You have raised a series of questions relating to your requests for records.

First, you asked whether, "as the person charged [and convicted] of a sex offense", you are "entitled to access of records, relative to [your] arrest and conviction, from New York State Agency's under the provision of the New York State Freedom of Information Law and specifically, under the exceptions contained in Section 50-b(2)(a) of the Civil Rights Law."

From my perspective, the Freedom of Information Law does not apply, and §50-b of the Civil Rights Law would not confer rights of access to the records sought, even though you may be the person charged. As I understand §50-b, although an agency may not be prohibited from disclosing records falling within the coverage of that statute to you, it is not obliged to do so, for that statute does not confer a right of access.

Subdivision (1) of §50-b states that:

"The identity of any victim of a sex offense, as defined in article one hundred thirty or §255.25 of the penal law, shall be confidential. No report, paper, picture, photograph, court file or other documents, in the custody or possession of any public officer or employee, which identifies such victim shall be made available for public inspection. No such public officer or employee shall disclose any portion of any police report, court file, or other document, which tends to identify such a victim except as provided in subdivision two of this section."

Mr. Charles Doyen

The initial ground for denial in the Freedom of Information Law, §87(2)(a), pertains to records that "are specifically exempted from disclosure by state or federal statute." Section 50-b of the Civil Rights Law exempts records identifiable to a victim of a sex offense from disclosure. Consequently, the Freedom of Information Law in my view provides no rights of access to those records. Any authority to disclose or obtain the records in question would be based on the direction provided by the ensuing provisions of §50-b.

In this regard, the introductory language of subdivision (2) provides that "[t]he provisions of subdivision one of this section shall not be construed to prohibit disclosure of information to: a. Any person charged with the commission of a sex offense..." While an agency is not forbidden from disclosing records subject to §50-b to a person charged, I do not believe that §50-b creates a right of access on behalf of such person. Further, subdivision (3) states in relevant part that "The court having jurisdiction over the alleged sex offense may order any restrictions upon disclosure authorized in subdivision two of this section..."

In sum, it is my view that issues involving the disclosure of the records in question would be governed by §50-b of the Civil Rights Law, rather than the Freedom of Information Law.

Next, you indicated that requests for records directed to the Ontario County District Attorney and the Supreme Court have not been answered. In this regard, the Freedom of Information Law excludes the courts and court records from its coverage. This is not suggest that court records might not be available, but rather that access is governed by different provisions of law (see e.g., Judiciary Law, §255).

When the Freedom of Information Law is applicable, as in the case of a records of the office of a district attorney, that statute provides direction concerning the time and manner in which an agency must respond to requests. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

"Each entity subject to the provisions of this article, within five business days of the receipt of a written request for a record reasonably described, shall make such record available to the person requesting it, deny such request in writing or furnish a written acknowledgement of the receipt of such request and a statement of the approximate date when such request will be granted or denied..."

If neither a response to a request nor an acknowledgement of the receipt of a request is given within five business days, or if an agency delays responding for an unreasonable time after it acknowledges that a request has been received, a request may, in my opinion, be considered to have been constructively denied. In such a circumstance, I believe that the denial may be appealed in accordance with §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law. That provision states in relevant part that:

"...any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive, or governing body, who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully

Mr. Charles Doyen

June 14, 1999

explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

In addition, it has been held that when an appeal is made but a determination is not rendered within ten business days of the receipt of the appeal as required under §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, the appellant has exhausted his or her administrative remedies and may initiate a challenge to a constructive denial of access under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Rules [Floyd v. McGuire, 87 AD 2d 388, appeal dismissed 57 NY 2d 774 (1982)].

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Mr. Marvin Datz

Dear Mr. Datz:

I have received your letter of May 10 in which you allege that the New York City Police Department and the State Department of Motor Vehicles have failed to comply with the Freedom of Information Law, and in which you asked for assistance and intervention relative to those requests.

In this regard, although the Committee on Open Government is authorized to offer advice and opinions concerning the Freedom of Information Law, this office is not empowered to "intervene" or enforce the law. As such, the following remarks are not binding on an agency and are intended to offer guidance.

First, the Freedom of Information Law provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies must respond to requests. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

"Each entity subject to the provisions of this article, within five business days of the receipt of a written request for a record reasonably described, shall make such record available to the person requesting it, deny such request in writing or furnish a written acknowledgement of the receipt of such request and a statement of the approximate date when such request will be granted or denied..."

If neither a response to a request nor an acknowledgement of the receipt of a request is given within five business days, or if an agency delays responding for an unreasonable time after it acknowledges that a request has been received, a request may, in my opinion, be considered to have been constructively denied. In such a circumstance, I believe that the denial may be appealed in accordance with §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law. That provision states in relevant part that:

Mr. Marvin Datz

Page -2-

"...any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive, or governing body, who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

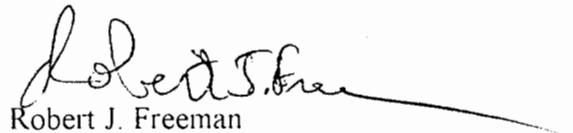

In addition, it has been held that when an appeal is made but a determination is not rendered within ten business days of the receipt of the appeal as required under §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, the appellant has exhausted his or her administrative remedies and may initiate a challenge to a constructive denial of access under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Rules [Floyd v. McGuire, 87 AD 2d 388, appeal dismissed 57 NY 2d 774 (1982)].

Second, in several aspects of your requests, you sought lists containing certain information. Here I point out that the Freedom of Information Law pertains to existing records, and that §89(3) of that statute provides in part that an agency need not create a record in response to a request. If no list exists containing the information sought, an agency would not be required to prepare a list on your behalf.

Lastly, since you requested records involving complaints or investigations concerning a particular police officer, I point out that any such records likely are exempt from disclosure. Section 50-a of the Civil Rights Law states in relevant part that personnel records pertaining to a police officer that are "used to evaluate performance toward continued employment or promotion" are confidential and cannot be disclosed without the consent of the officer.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Ms. Estelle Levy

Dear Ms. Levy:

I have received your letter of May 10 as well as related correspondence. You indicated that neither a request for records of an agency of the City of New York nor your appeal were answered, and you raised issues involving the relationship between the City Parks Foundation and the New York City Department of Parks and Recreation..

In this regard, first, the Freedom of Information Law provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies must respond to requests and appeals. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

"Each entity subject to the provisions of this article, within five business days of the receipt of a written request for a record reasonably described, shall make such record available to the person requesting it, deny such request in writing or furnish a written acknowledgement of the receipt of such request and a statement of the approximate date when such request will be granted or denied..."

If neither a response to a request nor an acknowledgement of the receipt of a request is given within five business days, or if an agency delays responding for an unreasonable time after it acknowledges that a request has been received, a request may, in my opinion, be considered to have been constructively denied. In such a circumstance, I believe that the denial may be appealed in accordance with §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law. That provision states in relevant part that:

"...any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive, or governing body, who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

In addition, it has been held that when an appeal is made but a determination is not rendered within ten business days of the receipt of the appeal as required under §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, the appellant has exhausted his or her administrative remedies and may initiate a challenge to a constructive denial of access under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Rules [Floyd v. McGuire, 87 AD 2d 388, appeal dismissed 57 NY 2d 774 (1982)].

Second, having reviewed your requests, it is emphasized that the Freedom of Information Law pertains to existing records, and that §89(3) of that statute provides that an agency is not required to create a record in response to a request. Therefore, if, for example, there is no record that "substantiates" or describes the "legal basis" for certain actions, an agency would not be required to prepare new records containing the information sought.

Third, while the City Parks Foundation is a not-for-profit corporation whose status under the Freedom of Information Law has not been clearly determined, insofar as it performs functions for an agency of the City of New York, such as the Department of Parks and Recreation, the records maintained by the Foundation concerning those functions would, based on the judicial interpretation of the Freedom of Information Law, constitute Department records that fall within the coverage of that statute, even if the records are not in the physical possession of the Department.

As you are aware, §86(4) of the Freedom of Information Law defines the term "record" expansively to include:

"any information kept, held, filed, produced, reproduced by, with or for an agency or the state legislature, in any physical form whatsoever including, but not limited to, reports, statements, examinations, memoranda, opinions, folders, files, books, manuals, pamphlets, forms, papers, designs, drawings, maps, photos, letters, microfilms, computer tapes or discs, rules, regulations or codes."

Based upon the language quoted above, documents need not be in the physical possession of an agency to constitute agency records; so long as they are produced, kept or filed for an agency, the courts have held they constitute "agency records", even if they are maintained apart from an agency's premises.

In a decision rendered by the Court of Appeals, the state's highest court, it was found that materials maintained by a not-for-profit corporation providing services for a branch of the State University that were kept on behalf of the University constituted "records" falling within the coverage of the Freedom of Information Law. I point out that the Court rejected "SUNY's contention that disclosure turns on whether the requested information is in the physical possession of the agency", for such a view "ignores the plain language of the FOIL definition of 'records' as information kept or held 'by, with or for an agency'" [see Encore College Bookstores, Inc. v. Auxiliary Services Corporation of the State University of New York at Farmingdale, 87 NY 2d 410, 417 (1995)].

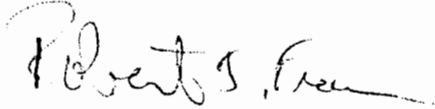

Ms. Estelle Levy

In sum, insofar as records sought are maintained for a city agency, I believe that the agency would be required to direct the custodian of the records to disclose them in accordance with the Freedom of Information Law, or obtain them in order to disclose them to the extent required by law.

Lastly, you questioned whether the City Council could validly provide funding directly to the City Parks Foundation. That issue does not involve a matter within the advisory jurisdiction of the Committee on Open Government. Consequently, I cannot offer an opinion concerning that aspect of your inquiry.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

The staff of the Committee on Open Government is authorized to issue advisory opinions. The ensuing staff advisory opinion is based solely upon the information presented in your correspondence.

Dear Mr. Corbett:

I have received your letter in which you wrote that your requests for records pertaining to your case from Schenectady County Court have been ignored.

In this regard, I point out that the Freedom of Information Law is applicable to agency records, and that §86(3) defines the term "agency" to include:

"any state or municipal department, board, bureau, division, commission, committee, public authority, public corporation, council, office or other governmental entity performing a governmental or proprietary function for the state or any one or more municipalities thereof, except the judiciary or the state legislature."

In turn, §86(1) defines the term "judiciary" to mean:

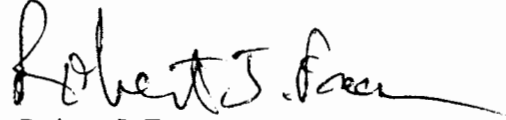

"the courts of the state, including any municipal or district court, whether or not of record."

Based on the provisions quoted above, the courts and court records are not subject to the Freedom of Information Law. This is not to suggest that court records are not generally available to the public, for other provisions of law (see e.g., Judiciary Law, §255) may grant broad public access to those records. Even though other statutes may deal with access to court records, the procedural provisions associated with the Freedom of Information Law (i.e., those involving the designation of a records access officer or the right to appeal a denial) would not ordinarily be applicable.

Mr. K. Williams
95-A-6745
Attica Correctional Facility
P.O. Box 149
Attica, NY 14011

Dear Mr. Williams:

I have received your letter of May 11. You wrote that your requests for records to a police department and a court relating to your arrest have not been answered. In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First, it is noted that the Freedom of Information Law is applicable to agency records, and that §86(3) defines the term "agency" to include:

"any state or municipal department, board, bureau, division, commission, committee, public authority, public corporation, council, office or other governmental entity performing a governmental or proprietary function for the state or any one or more municipalities thereof, except the judiciary or the state legislature."

In turn, §86(1) defines the term "judiciary" to mean:

"the courts of the state, including any municipal or district court, whether or not of record."

Based on the provisions quoted above, the courts and court records are not subject to the Freedom of Information Law. This is not to suggest that court records are not generally available to the public, for other provisions of law (see e.g., Judiciary Law, §255) may grant broad public access to those records. Even though other statutes may deal with access to court records, the procedural provisions associated with the Freedom of Information Law (i.e., those involving the designation of a records access officer or the right to appeal a denial) would not ordinarily be applicable. It is suggested that you direct a request for court records to the clerk of the court, citing an applicable provision of law as the basis for the request.

Mr. K. Williams

Second, as the Freedom of Information Law applies to agencies, that statute provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies must respond to requests. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

"Each entity subject to the provisions of this article, within five business days of the receipt of a written request for a record reasonably described, shall make such record available to the person requesting it, deny such request in writing or furnish a written acknowledgement of the receipt of such request and a statement of the approximate date when such request will be granted or denied..."

If neither a response to a request nor an acknowledgement of the receipt of a request is given within five business days, or if an agency delays responding for an unreasonable time after it acknowledges that a request has been received, a request may, in my opinion, be considered to have been constructively denied. In such a circumstance, I believe that the denial may be appealed in accordance with §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law. That provision states in relevant part that:

"...any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive, or governing body, who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

In addition, it has been held that when an appeal is made but a determination is not rendered within ten business days of the receipt of the appeal as required under §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, the appellant has exhausted his or her administrative remedies and may initiate a challenge to a constructive denial of access under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Rules [Floyd v. McGuire, 87 AD 2d 388, appeal dismissed 57 NY 2d 774 (1982)].

Third, as a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law. Since I am unaware of the contents of all of the records in which you are interested, or the effects of their disclosure, I cannot offer specific guidance. Nevertheless, the following paragraphs will review the provisions that may be significant in determining rights of access to the records in question.

In considering the records falling within the scope of your request, relevant is a decision by the Court of Appeals concerning "complaint follow up reports" prepared by police officers and police officers' memo books in which it was held that a denial of access based on their characterization as intra-agency materials would be inappropriate.

The provision at issue, §87(2)(g) of the Freedom of Information Law, enables an agency to withhold records that:

- "are inter-agency or intra-agency materials which are not:
- i. statistical or factual tabulations or data;
 - ii. instructions to staff that affect the public;
 - iii. final agency policy or determinations; or
 - iv. external audits, including but not limited to audits performed by the comptroller and the federal government..."

It is noted that the language quoted above contains what in effect is a double negative. While inter-agency or intra-agency materials may be withheld, portions of such materials consisting of statistical or factual information, instructions to staff that affect the public, final agency policy or determinations or external audits must be made available, unless a different ground for denial could appropriately be asserted. Concurrently, those portions of inter-agency or intra-agency materials that are reflective of opinion, advice, recommendation and the like could in my view be withheld.

In its analysis of the matter, the decision states that:

"...we note that one court has suggested that complaint follow-up reports are exempt from disclosure because they constitute nonfinal intra-agency material, irrespective of whether the information contained in the reports is 'factual data' (see, Matter of Scott v. Chief Medical Examiner, 179 AD2d 443, 444, supra citing Public Officers Law §87(2)(g)). However, under a plain reading of §87(2)(g), the exemption for intra-agency material does not apply as long as the material falls within any one of the provision's four enumerated exceptions. Thus, intra-agency documents that contain 'statistical or factual tabulations or data' are subject to FOIL disclosure, whether or not embodied in a final agency policy or determination (see, Matter of Farbman & Sons v. New York City Health & Hosp. Corp., 62 NY2d 75, 83, supra; Matter of MacRae v. Dolce, 130 AD2d 577)..."

"...Although the term 'factual data' is not defined by statute, the meaning of the term can be discerned from the purpose underlying the intra-agency exemption, which is 'to protect the deliberative process of the government by ensuring that persons in an advisory role [will] be able to express their opinions freely to agency decision makers' (Matter of Xerox Corp. v. Town of Webster, 65 NY2d 131, 132 [quoting Matter of Sea Crest Constr. Corp. v. Stubing, 82 AD2d 546, 549]). Consistent with this limited aim to safeguard internal government consultations and deliberations, the exemption does not apply when the requested material consists of 'statistical or factual tabulations or data' (Public Officers Law 87[2][g][i]). Factual data, therefore, simply means objective information, in contrast to opinions, ideas, or advice exchanged as part of the consultative or deliberative process of government decision making (see, Matter of Johnson Newspaper Corp. v. Stainkamp, 94 AD2d 825, 827, affd on op below, 61 NY2d 958; Matter of Miracle Mile Assocs. v. Yudelson, 68 AD2d 176, 181-182).

"Against this backdrop, we conclude that the complaint follow-up reports contain substantial factual information available pursuant to the provisions of FOIL. Sections of the report are devoted to such purely factual data as: the names, addresses, and physical descriptions of crime victims, witnesses, and perpetrators; a checklist that indicates whether the victims and witnesses have been interviewed and shown photos, whether crime scenes have been photographed and dusted for fingerprints, and whether neighborhood residents have been canvassed for information; and a blank space denominated 'details' in which the officer records the particulars of any action taken in connection with the investigation.

"However, the Police Department argues that any witness statements contained in the reports, in particular, are not 'factual' because there is no assurance of the statements' accuracy and reliability. We decline to read such a reliability requirement into the phrase 'factual data', as the dissent would have us do, and conclude that a witness statement constitutes factual data insofar as it embodies a factual account of the witness's observations. Such a statement, moreover, is far removed from the type of internal government exchange sought to be protected by the intra-agency exemption (see, Matter of Ingram v. Axelrod, 90 AD2d 568, 569 [ambulance records, list of interviews, and reports of interviews available under FOIL as 'factual data']). By contrast, any impressions, recommendations, or opinions recorded in the complaint follow-up report would not constitute factual data and would be exempt from disclosure. The holding herein is only that these reports are not categorically exempt as intra-agency material. Indeed, the Police Department is entitled to withhold complaint follow-up reports, or specific portions thereof, under any other applicable exemption, such as the law-enforcement exemption or the public-safety exemption, as long as the requisite particularized showing is made" [Gould, Scott and DeFelice v. New York City Police Department, 89 NY2d 267, 276-277 (1996); emphasis added by the Court].

Based on the foregoing, the agency could not claim that the complaint reports can be withheld in their entirety on the ground that they constitute intra-agency materials. However, the Court was careful to point out that other grounds for denial might apply in consideration of those records, as well as others that you requested.

For instance, of potential significance is §87(2)(b) of the Freedom of Information Law, which permits an agency to withhold records or portions thereof when disclosure would constitute "an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy". That provision might be applicable relative to the deletion of identifying details in a variety of situations, i.e., where a record identifies a confidential source or a witness, for example.

Often the most relevant provision concerning access to records maintained by law enforcement agencies is §87(2)(e), which permits an agency to withhold records that:

"are compiled for law enforcement purposes and which, if disclosed, would:

- i. interfere with law enforcement investigations or judicial proceedings;
- ii. deprive a person of a right to a fair trial or impartial adjudication;
- iii. identify a confidential source or disclose confidential information relating to a criminal investigation; or
- iv. reveal criminal investigative techniques or procedures, except routine techniques and procedures."

In my view, the foregoing indicates that records compiled for law enforcement purposes can only be withheld to the extent that disclosure would result in the harmful effects described in sub- paragraphs (i) through (iv) of §87(2)(e).

Another possible ground for denial is §87(2)(f), which permits withholding to the extent that disclosure "would endanger the life or safety of any person". The capacity to withhold on that basis is dependent upon the facts and circumstances concerning an event.

Also potentially relevant is the first ground for denial, §87(2)(a), which pertains to records that "are specifically exempted from disclosure by state or federal statute". One such statute, §190.25(4) of the Criminal Procedure Law deals with grand jury proceedings and provides in relevant part that:

"Grand jury proceedings are secret, and no grand juror, or other person specified in subdivision three of this section or section 215.70 of the penal law, may, except in the lawful discharge of his duties or upon written order of the court, disclose the nature or substance of any grand jury testimony, evidence, or any decision, result or other matter attending a grand jury proceeding."

June 14, 1999

As such, grand jury related records would be outside the scope of rights conferred by the Freedom of Information Law. Any disclosure of those records would be based upon a court order or perhaps a vehicle authorizing or requiring disclosure that is separate and distinct from the Freedom of Information Law.

Lastly, in a decision concerning a request for records maintained by the office of a district attorney that would ordinarily be exempted from disclosure under the Freedom of Information Law, it was held that "once the statements have been used in open court, they have lost their cloak of confidentiality and are available for inspection by a member of the public" [see Moore v. Santucci, 151 AD 2d 677, 679 (1989)]. Based upon that decision, it appears that records introduced into evidence or disclosed during a public judicial proceeding should be available.

However, in the same decision, it was also found that:

"...if the petitioner or his attorney previously received a copy of the agency record pursuant to an alternative discovery device and currently possesses the copy, a court may uphold an agency's denial of the petitioner's request under the FOIL for a duplicate copy as academic. However, the burden of proof rests with the agency to demonstrate that the petitioner's specific requests are moot. The respondent's burden would be satisfied upon proof that a copy of the requested record was previously furnished to the petitioner or his counsel in the absence of any allegation, in evidentiary form, that the copy was no longer in existence. In the event the petitioner's request for a copy of a specific record is not moot, the agency must furnish another copy upon payment of the appropriate fee...unless the requested record falls squarely within the ambit of 1 of the 8 statutory exemptions" (id., 678).

The Court in Moore also specified that an agency "is not required to make available for inspection or copying any suppression hearing or trial transcripts of a witness' testimony in its possession, because the transcripts are court records, not agency records" (id. at 680).

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Robert J. Freeman

Dear Mr. Hooker:

I have received your letter of May 11. As I understand your inquiry, you have asked whether you have the right to gain access to a "cooperation agreement" between a prosecutor and a witness who testified against you. In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First, it is emphasized that the Freedom of Information Law pertains to existing records. If no written record of an agreement was prepared, the Freedom of Information Law would not apply.

Second, if such a record exists, I believe that it likely could be withheld. As a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law. In my view, two of the grounds for denial would be pertinent.

Section 87(2)(e)(iii) authorizes and agency to withhold records compiled for law enforcement purposes when release of such records would "identify a confidential source or disclose confidential information relating to a criminal investigation." Additionally, §87(2)(f) permits an agency to withhold records when disclosure would "endanger the life or safety of any person."

Based on either of the exceptions cited above, it appears that a cooperation agreement, if it exists as a record, might properly be withheld.

Dear Mr. Lathrop:

I have received your letter of May 17. If I understand your questions correctly, you have asked whether an agency in receipt of your request made under the Freedom of Information Law has the right to send the request to another agency. Similarly, you questioned whether a representative of the second agency has the right to offer an opinion concerning your request.

In this regard, there is nothing in the Freedom of Information Law or any other provision of which I am aware that would generally prohibit one agency from transmitting a request for records to another agency. Further, it is common for a representative of the second agency to provide an opinion relating to the request to the first. Frequently, staff of the second agency has expertise in a particular area, or knowledge of facts or the impact of disclosure that may not be known to the first. In short, it is not uncommon or inappropriate in my view for the staff of one agency to confer with the staff of another in order to deal effectively with a request for records. I note, too, that many agencies have sent copies of requests to this office for the purpose of seeking advice and guidance.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Ms. Lynne Nayman

Dear Ms. Nayman:

As you are aware, I have received your letter of May 19. In brief, you questioned certain practices of Child Protective Services, a unit of the New York State Office of Children and Family Services, in relation to the disclosure of records and the collection of certain records, particularly social security cards and birth certificates.

In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First, as a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law pertains to all agency records, and is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law.

Relevant to your commentary is the initial ground for denial, §87(2)(a), which pertains to records that "are specifically exempted from disclosure by state or federal statute." One such statute is §372 of the Social Services Law, which requires that various records be kept by "every court, and every public board, commission, institution, or officer having powers or charged with duties in relation to abandoned, delinquent, destitute, neglected or dependent children who shall receive, accept or commit any child..." Subdivision (4) of §372 states in relevant part that such records:

"shall be deemed confidential and shall be safeguarded from coming to the knowledge of and from inspection or examination or by any person other than one authorized, by the department, by a judge of the court of claims when such records are required for the trial of a claim or other proceeding in such court or by a justice of the supreme court, or by a judge of the family court when such records are required for the trial of a proceeding in such court, after a notice to all interested persons and a hearing, to receive such knowledge or to make such inspection or examination. No person shall divulge the information thus obtained without authorization so to do by the department, or by such judge or justice."

Similarly, §422 of the Social Services Law is a statute which pertains specifically to the statewide central register of child abuse and maltreatment and all reports and records included in the register. Subdivision (4) (A) of §422 states that reports of child abuse as well as information concerning those reports are confidential, and may be disclosed only under specified circumstances listed in that statute.

In short, the Freedom of Information Law does not govern access to the records to which you referred; rather, the ability to gain access and the time within which they may be disclosed is governed by statutes found in the Social Services Law.

Second, with respect to the collection of social security cards or numbers, pertinent is the federal Privacy Act (5 USC §552a). While that Act pertains generally to records maintained by federal agencies, provisions within the Act dealing with social security numbers apply to entities of state and local government as well. Section 7 of the Act states that:

"(a)(1) [I]t shall be unlawful for any Federal, State or local government agency to deny to any individual any right, benefit, or privilege provided by law because of such individual's refusal to disclose his social security number.

(2) the provision of paragraph (a) of this subsection shall not apply with respect to --

(A) any disclosure which is required by Federal Statute, or

(B) the disclosure of a social security number to any Federal, State, or local agency maintaining a system of records in existence and operating before January 1, 1975, if such disclosure was required under statute or regulation adopted prior to such date to verify the identity of an individual

(b) Any Federal, State, or local government agency which requests an individual to disclose his social security account number shall inform that individual whether that disclosure is mandatory or voluntary, by what statutory or other authority such number is solicited, and what uses will be made of it."

The quoted provision places limitations upon the collection and use of social security numbers by government, and unless "grandfathered in" under the Privacy Act, agencies cannot require the submission of social security numbers, except in conjunction with social security or other statutorily authorized purposes.

Ms. Lynne Nayman

June 16, 1999

With regard to the collection of birth records, §94(1)(a) of the Personal Privacy Protection Law states that a state agency that maintains a system of records shall:

“...except when a data subject provides an agency with unsolicited personal information, maintain in its records only such personal information which is relevant and necessary to accomplish a purpose of the agency required to be accomplished by statute or executive order, or to implement a program specifically authorized by law...”

As such, Child Protective Services may require the submission of birth records only if the acquisition of those records is “relevant and necessary” to accomplish a program authorized by law.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Mr. Richard Linen
94-A-2328
Riverview Correctional Facility
P.O. Box 247
Ogdensburg, NY 13669

Dear Mr. Linen:

I have received your letter of May 13. You complained that Brunswick Toxicology, Inc. has failed to respond to your request for a toxicology report that it prepared.

In this regard, I point out that the Freedom of Information Law pertains to agency records, and that §86(3) of that statute defines the term "agency" to mean:

"any state or municipal department, board, bureau, division, commission, committee, public authority, public corporation, council, office or other governmental entity performing a governmental or proprietary function for the state or any one or more municipalities thereof, except the judiciary or the state legislature."

Based on the foregoing, as a general matter, agencies are entities of state or local government. A private corporation would not be an "agency" or required to comply with the Freedom of Information Law.

Nevertheless, if the report was prepared for an agency, such as the Division of Parole or a law enforcement agency, I believe that it would constitute an agency record that falls within the coverage of the Freedom of Information Law. Section 86(4) of that statute defines the term "record" expansively to include:

"any information kept, held, filed, produced, reproduced by, with or for an agency or the state legislature, in any physical form whatsoever including, but not limited to, reports, statements, examinations, including, but not limited to, reports, statements, examinations, memoranda, opinions, folders, files, books, manuals, pamphlets, forms, papers, designs, drawings, maps, photos, letters, microfilms, computer tapes or discs, rules, regulations or codes."

Mr. Richard Linen

Based upon the language quoted above, documents need not be in the physical possession of an agency to constitute agency records; so long as they are produced, kept or filed for an agency, the courts have held they constitute "agency records", even if they are maintained apart from an agency's premises.

In a decision rendered by the Court of Appeals, the state's highest court, it was found that materials maintained by a not-for-profit corporation providing services for a branch of the State University that were kept on behalf of the University constituted "records" falling within the coverage of the Freedom of Information Law. I point out that the Court rejected "SUNY's contention that disclosure turns on whether the requested information is in the physical possession of the agency", for such a view "ignores the plain language of the FOIL definition of 'records' as information kept or held 'by, with or for an agency'" [see Encore College Bookstores, Inc. v. Auxiliary Services Corporation of the State University of New York at Farmingdale, 87 NY 2d 410, 417 (1995)].

In sum, insofar as records sought are maintained for an agency, I believe that the agency would be required to direct the custodian of the records (i.e., Brunswick Toxicology, Inc.) to disclose them in accordance with the Freedom of Information Law, or obtain them in order to disclose them to the extent required by law. It is suggested, therefore, that you direct a request to the records access officer at the agency for which the report was prepared.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Mr. Harry A. Lathrop

Dear Mr. Lathrop:

I have received your correspondence of May 18. For reasons discussed in response to an earlier communication, I do not believe that it was improper for the Village of Marcellus to send a copy of your request for records to the Onondaga County Department of Personnel. However, in addition to that issue, the Village Clerk indicated that the fee for copies would include a charge of $22.30 per hour for labor costs.

From my perspective, unless a statute, an act of the State Legislature, authorizes an agency to charge a fee for labor or personnel time, searching for records or charging more than twenty-five cents per photocopy for records up to nine by fourteen inches, no such fees may be assessed. In this instance, I know of no statute that would authorize the Village to do so.

By way of background, §87(1)(b)(iii) of the Freedom of Information Law stated until October 15, 1982, that an agency could charge up to twenty-five cents per photocopy unless a different fee was prescribed by "law". Chapter 73 of the Laws of 1982 replaced the word "law" with the term "statute". As described in the Committee's fourth annual report to the Governor and the Legislature of the Freedom of Information Law, which was submitted in December of 1981 and which recommended the amendment that is now law:

"The problem is that the term 'law' may include regulations, local laws, or ordinances, for example. As such, state agencies by means of regulation or municipalities by means of local law may and in some instances have established fees in excess of twenty-five cents per photocopy, thereby resulting in constructive denials of access. To remove this problem, the word 'law' should be replaced by 'statute', thereby enabling an agency to charge more than twenty-five cents only in situations in which an act of the State Legislature, a statute, so specifies."

June 16, 1999

As such, prior to October 15, 1982, a local law, an ordinance, or a regulation for instance, establishing a search fee or a fee in excess of twenty-five cents per photocopy or higher than the actual cost of reproduction was valid. However, under the amendment, only an act of the State Legislature, a statute, would in my view permit the assessment of a fee higher than twenty-five cents per photocopy, a fee that exceeds the actual cost of reproducing records that cannot be photocopied, or any other fee, such as a fee for search. In addition, it has been confirmed judicially that fees inconsistent with the Freedom of Information Law may be validly charged only when the authority to do so is conferred by a statute [see Sheehan v. City of Syracuse, 521 NYS 2d 207 (1987)].

The specific language of the Freedom of Information Law and the regulations promulgated by the Committee on Open Government indicate that, absent statutory authority, an agency may charge fees only for the reproduction of records. Section 87(1)(b) of the Freedom of Information Law states:

"Each agency shall promulgate rules and regulations in conformance with this article...and pursuant to such general rules and regulations as may be promulgated by the committee on open government in conformity with the provisions of this article, pertaining to the availability of records and procedures to be followed, including, but not limited to...

(iii) the fees for copies of records which shall not exceed twenty-five cents per photocopy not in excess of nine by fourteen inches, or the actual cost of reproducing any other record, except when a different fee is otherwise prescribed by statute."

The regulations promulgated by the Committee states in relevant part that:

"Except when a different fee is otherwise prescribed by statute:

(a) There shall be no fee charged for the following:

(1) inspection of records;

(2) search for records; or

(3) any certification pursuant to this Part" (21 NYCRR section 1401.8).

As such, the Committee's regulations specify that no fee may be charged for labor or personnel time, for inspection of or search for records, except as otherwise prescribed by statute.

Mr. Harry A. Lathrop

Lastly, although compliance with the Freedom of Information Law involves the use of public employees' time, the Court of Appeals has found that the Law is not intended to be given effect "on a cost-accounting basis", but rather that "Meeting the public's legitimate right of access to information concerning government is fulfillment of a governmental obligation, not the gift of, or waste of, public funds" [Doolan v. BOCES, 48 NY 2d 341, 347 (1979)].

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Dear Mr. Guaba:

I have received your letter of May 16. In brief, you complained with respect to delay in response to your request for a record of the New York City Police Department.

In this regard, the Freedom of Information Law provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies must respond to requests for records. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

If neither a response to a request nor an acknowledgement of the receipt of a request is given within five business days, or if an agency delays responding for an unreasonable time after it acknowledges that a request has been received, a request may, in my opinion, be considered to have been constructively denied. In such a circumstance, I believe that the denial may be appealed in accordance with §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law. That provision states in relevant part that:

"...any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive, or governing body,

Mr. Orlando Guaba
June 16, 1999

who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

In addition, it has been held that when an appeal is made but a determination is not rendered within ten business days of the receipt of the appeal as required under §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, the appellant has exhausted his or her administrative remedies and may initiate a challenge to a constructive denial of access under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Rules [Floyd v. McGuire, 87 AD 2d 388, appeal dismissed 57 NY 2d 774 (1982)].

For your information, the person designated by the Department to determine appeals is Susan Petito, Special Counsel.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Dear Mr. Noto:

I have received your email messages concerning the Freedom of Information Law.

In response to the first question, an agency is not required, in my opinion, to accept a "standing request." Technically, since the law pertains to existing records, an agency can neither grant nor deny access to what doesn't yet exist. If an agency wants to accept a prospective request, it may do so. Nevertheless, again, I do not believe that it would be required to do so. If an agency chooses not to honor an ongoing request, the applicant could simply submit requests periodically.

With respect to the second, the criminal history database is maintained by the Division of Criminal Justice Services, and it has been found judicially to be exempt from disclosure by statute and, therefore, beyond the scope of rights conferred by the Freedom of Information Law. As such, there is no publicly available central source of conviction records in New York.

To obtain more information on the subject, there is a discussion of the issue in the latest annual report of the Committee on Open Government. Also, you might review advisory opinions accessible through the index to FOI opinions under "criminal history records." The higher the number of the opinion, the more recent it is.

Dear Mr. King:

I have received your letter of June 9 in which you requested certain records from this office.

In this regard, the Committee on Open Government is authorized to provide advice concerning the Freedom of Information Law. The Committee does not maintain custody or control of records generally. In short, I cannot provide the records of your interest, because this office does not possess them.

To seek records under the Freedom of Information Law, a request should be directed to the "records access officer" at the agency that maintains the records. The records access officer has the duty of coordinating the agency's response to requests. Since the records sought would appear to be maintained at a correctional facility, I note that the regulations of the Department of Correctional Services indicate that requests for records kept at a facility should be made to the facility superintendent or his designee. I point out, too, that §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law requires that an applicant "reasonably describe" the records sought. Therefore, a request should contain sufficient detail to enable agency staff to locate and identify the records.

As a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law. It is possible that portions of the records of your interest might be withheld pursuant to one or more of the grounds for denial.

Dear Mr. Corbett:

I have received your letter of May 7 in which you indicated that the Public Defender in Schenectady County has "ignored" your requests for records.

In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First, the Freedom of Information Law pertains to agency records, and §86(3) of that statute defines the term "agency" to mean:

"any state or municipal department, board, bureau, division, commission, committee, public authority, public corporation, council, office or other governmental entity performing a governmental or proprietary function for the state or any one or more municipalities thereof, except the judiciary or the state legislature."

Based on the foregoing, the Freedom of Information Law applies, in general, to records of entities of state and local government in New York. It would not apply to a private organization or a private investigator.

Section 716 of the County Law states in part that the "board of supervisors of any county may create an office of public defender, or may authorize a contract between its county and one or more other such counties to create an office of public defender to serve such counties." Therefore, a county office of public defender in my opinion is an agency subject to the Freedom of Information Law that is required to disclose records to the extent required by that statute.

Mr. Ross Corbett

In a case in which an attorney is appointed, while I believe that the records of the governmental entity required to adopt a plan under Article 18-B of the County Law are subject to the Freedom of Information Law, the records of an individual attorney performing services under Article 18-B may or may not be subject to the Freedom of Information Law, depending upon the nature of the plan. For instance, if a plan involves the services of a public defender, for reasons offered earlier, I believe that the records maintained by or for an office of public defender would fall within the scope of the Freedom of Information Law. However, if it involves services rendered by private attorneys or associations, those persons or entities would not in my view constitute agencies subject to the Freedom of Information Law.

Second, if the office in question in question is an agency required to comply with the Freedom of Information Law, I note that that statute provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies must respond to requests. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

"Each entity subject to the provisions of this article, within five business days of the receipt of a written request for a record reasonably described, shall make such record available to the person requesting it, deny such request in writing or furnish a written acknowledgement of the receipt of such request and a statement of the approximate date when such request will be granted or denied..."

If neither a response to a request nor an acknowledgement of the receipt of a request is given within five business days, or if an agency delays responding for an unreasonable time after it acknowledges that a request has been received, a request may, in my opinion, be considered to have been constructively denied. In such a circumstance, I believe that the denial may be appealed in accordance with §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law. That provision states in relevant part that:

"...any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive, or governing body, who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

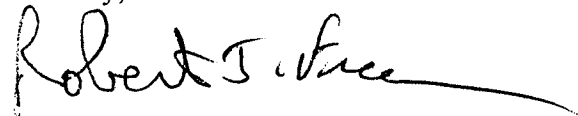

In addition, it has been held that when an appeal is made but a determination is not rendered within ten business days of the receipt of the appeal as required under §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, the appellant has exhausted his or her administrative remedies and may initiate a challenge to a constructive denial of access under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Rules [Floyd v. McGuire, 87 AD 2d 388, appeal dismissed 57 NY 2d 774 (1982)].

Lastly, the Freedom of Information Law is silent with respect to the waiver of fees, and it has been held that an agency may charge its established fees for copies of records, even when the applicant is an indigent inmate [see Whitehead v. Morgenthau, 552 NYS2d 518 (1990)].

Dear Mr. Cesaro:

I have received a copy of your request for a copy of your pre-sentence report from the Mid-State Correctional Facility. For the following reason, I do not believe that the facility would ordinarily be required to disclose that record to you.

In this regard, although the Freedom of Information Law provides broad rights of access to records, the first ground for denial, §87(2)(a), states that an agency may withhold records or portions thereof that "...are specifically exempted from disclosure by state or federal statute..." Relevant under the circumstances is §390.50 of the Criminal Procedure Law, which, in my opinion represents the exclusive procedure concerning access to pre-sentence reports.

Section 390.50(1) of the Criminal Procedure Law states that:

"Any pre-sentence report or memorandum submitted to the court pursuant to this article and any medical, psychiatric or social agency report or other information gathered for the court by a probation department, or submitted directly to the court, in connection with the question of sentence is confidential and may not be made available to any person or public or private agency except where specifically required or permitted by statute or upon specific authorization of the court. For purposes of this section, any report, memorandum or other information forwarded to a probation department within this state is governed by the same rules of confidentiality. Any person, public or private agency receiving such material must retain it under the same conditions of confidentiality as apply to the probation department that made it available."

In addition, subdivision (2) of §390.50 states in part that: "The pre-sentence report shall be made available by the court for examination and copying in connection with any appeal in the case..."

In view of the foregoing, I believe that a pre-sentence report may be made available only upon the order of a court, and only under the circumstances described in §390.50 of the Criminal Procedure Law. It is suggested that you review that statute.

I hope that I have been of some assistance.

Sincerely,

Mr. Laszlo Polyak

Dear Mr. Polyak:

I have received your letter of May 24, as well as the materials related to it. The issue involves the authority of the Village of Ravena to limit the time during which you may inspect Village records.

In this regard, based upon the regulations issued by the Committee on Open Government and an appellate court decision, you have the right to inspect the records during the entirety of the Village's regular business hours, unless the records are being used by Village officers or employees..

In this regard, by way of background, §89(1)(b)(iii) of the Freedom of Information Law requires the Committee to promulgate regulations concerning the procedural implementation of the Law (see 21 NYCRR Part 1401). In turn, §87(1) requires agencies to adopt rules and regulations consistent with the Law and the Committee's regulations.

Section 1401.2 of the regulations, provides in relevant part that:

"(a) The governing body of a public corporation and the head of an executive agency or governing body of other agencies shall be responsible for insuring compliance with the regulations herein, and shall designate one or more persons as records access officer by name or by specific job title and business address, who shall have the duty of coordinating agency response to public requests for access to records. The designation of one or more records access officers shall not be construed to prohibit officials who have in the past been authorized to make records or information available to the public from continuing to do so..."

Mr. Laszlo Polyak
June 21, 1999
Page -2-

Section 1401.4 of the regulations, entitled "Hours for public inspection", states that:

"(a) Each agency shall accept requests for public access to records and produce records during all hours they are regularly open for business."

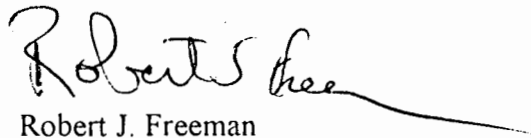

Relevant to your inquiry and the foregoing is a decision rendered by the Appellate Division. Among the issues was the validity of a one hour per day limitation regarding the time permitted to inspect records established by a village pursuant to regulation. The Court held that the village was required to enable the public to inspect records during its regular business hours, stating that:

"...to the extent that Regulation 6 has been interpreted as permitting the Village Clerk to limit the hours during which public documents can be inspected to a period of time less than the business hours of the Clerk's office, it is violative of the Freedom of Information Law..."
[Murtha v. Leonard, 620 NYS 2d 101 (1994), 210 AD 2d 411].

Based on the foregoing, once again, unless records are in use by Village officials, I believe that a member of the public may inspect records during regular business hours.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Robert J. Freeman

Mr. Sam Pratt

[REDACTED]

Dear Mr. Pratt:

I have received your letter of May 25 in which you sought an opinion concerning two matters involving the City of Hudson.

First, it is your contention that the Common Council frequently conducts executive sessions without stating a reason, or by citing "personnel matters" as the basis for excluding the public from a meeting.

In this regard, as a general matter, the Open Meetings Law is based upon a presumption of openness. Stated differently, meetings of public bodies must be conducted open to the public, unless there is a basis for entry into executive session. Moreover, the Law requires that a procedure be accomplished, during an open meeting, before a public body may enter into an executive session. Specifically, §105(1) states in relevant part that:

"Upon a majority vote of its total membership, taken in an open meeting pursuant to a motion identifying the general area or areas of the subject or subjects to be considered, a public body may conduct an executive session for the below enumerated purposes only..."

As such, a motion to conduct an executive session must include reference to the subject or subjects to be discussed, and the motion must be carried by majority vote of a public body's total membership before such a session may validly be held. The ensuing provisions of §105(1) specify and limit the subjects that may appropriately be considered during an executive session.

Although it is used frequently, the term "personnel" appears nowhere in the Open Meetings Law. Although one of the grounds for entry into executive session often relates to personnel matters, from my perspective, the term is overused and is frequently cited in a manner that is misleading or causes unnecessary confusion. To be sure, some issues involving "personnel" may be properly considered in an executive session; others, in my view, cannot. Further, certain matters that have nothing to do with personnel may be discussed in private under the provision that is ordinarily cited to discuss personnel.

The language of the so-called "personnel" exception, §105(1)(f) of the Open Meetings Law, is limited and precise. In terms of legislative history, as originally enacted, the provision in question permitted a public body to enter into an executive session to discuss:

"...the medical, financial, credit or employment history of any person or corporation, or matters leading to the appointment, employment, promotion, demotion, discipline, suspension, dismissal or removal of any person or corporation..."

Under the language quoted above, public bodies often convened executive sessions to discuss matters that dealt with "personnel" generally, tangentially, or in relation to policy concerns. However, the Committee consistently advised that the provision was intended largely to protect privacy and not to shield matters of policy under the guise of privacy.

To attempt to clarify the Law, the Committee recommended a series of amendments to the Open Meetings Law, several of which became effective on October 1, 1979. The recommendation made by the Committee regarding §105(1)(f) was enacted and states that a public body may enter into an executive session to discuss:

"...the medical, financial, credit or employment history of a particular person or corporation, or matters leading to the appointment, employment, promotion, demotion, discipline, suspension, dismissal or removal of a particular person or corporation..." (emphasis added).

Due to the insertion of the term "particular" in §105(1)(f), I believe that a discussion of "personnel" may be considered in an executive session only when the subject involves a particular person or persons, and only when at least one of the topics listed in §105(1)(f) is considered.

It has been advised that a motion describing the subject to be discussed as "personnel" or "specific personnel matters" is inadequate, and that the motion should be based upon the specific language of §105(1)(f). For instance, a proper motion might be: "I move to enter into an executive session to discuss the employment history of a particular person (or persons)". Such a motion would not in my opinion have to identify the person or persons who may be the subject of a discussion. By means of the kind of motion suggested above, members of a public body and others in attendance would have the ability to know that there is a proper basis for entry into an executive session. Absent such detail, neither the members nor others may be able to determine whether the subject may properly be considered behind closed doors.

It is noted that the Appellate Division has confirmed the advice rendered by this office. In discussing §105(1)(f) in relation to a matter involving the establishment and functions of a position, the Court stated that:

"...the public body must identify the subject matter to be discussed (See, Public Officers Law § 105 [1]), and it is apparent that this must be accomplished with some degree of particularity, i.e., merely reciting the statutory language is insufficient (see, Daily Gazette Co. v Town Bd., Town of Cobleskill, 111 Misc 2d 303, 304-305). Additionally, the topics discussed during the executive session must remain within the exceptions enumerated in the statute (see generally, Matter of Plattsburgh Publ. Co., Div. of Ottaway Newspapers v City of Plattsburgh, 185 AD2d §18), and these exceptions, in turn, 'must be narrowly scrutinized, lest the article's clear mandate be thwarted by thinly veiled references to the areas delineated thereunder' (Weatherwax v Town of Stony Point, 97 AD2d 840, 841, quoting Daily Gazette Co. v Town Bd., Town of Cobleskill, supra, at 304; see, Matter of Orange County Publs., Div. of Ottaway Newspapers v County of Orange, 120 AD2d 596, lv dismissed 68 NY 2d 807).

"Applying these principles to the matter before us, it is apparent that the Board's stated purpose for entering into executive session, to wit, the discussion of a 'personnel issue', does not satisfy the requirements of Public Officers Law § 105 (1) (f). The statute itself requires, with respect to personnel matters, that the discussion involve the 'employment history of a particular person' (id. [emphasis supplied]). Although this does not mandate that the individual in question be identified by name, it does require that any motion to enter into executive session describe with some detail the nature of the proposed discussion (see, State Comm on Open Govt Adv Opn dated Apr. 6, 1993), and we reject respondents' assertion that the Board's reference to a 'personnel issue' is the functional equivalent of identifying 'a particular person'" [Gordon v. Village of Monticello, 620 NY 2d 573, 575; 207AD 2d 55, 58 (1994)]

Next, you wrote that when you sought copies of minutes of meetings, reference was made to only one of many motions to enter into executive session, and the City Clerk indicated that "she is not present to keep minutes of the Council's 'informal meetings', explaining that if the Council enters executive session from an informal meeting, no record is made of the motion to do so."

Here I point out that the definition of "meeting" [see Open Meetings Law, §102(1)] has been broadly interpreted by the courts. In a landmark decision rendered in 1978, the Court of Appeals, the state's highest court, found that any gathering of a quorum of a public body for the purpose of conducting public business is a "meeting" that must be convened open to the public, whether or not there is an intent to take action and regardless of the manner in which a gathering may be characterized [see Orange County Publications v. Council of the City of Newburgh, 60 AD 2d 409, aff'd 45 NY 2d 947 (1978)]. It is noted that the decision rendered by the Court of Appeals was precipitated by contentions made by public bodies that so-called "work sessions", "agenda sessions" and similar gatherings held for the purpose of discussion, but without an intent to take action, fell outside the scope of the Open Meetings Law.

With respect to minutes of "informal meetings", as well as other meetings, the Open Meetings Law contains what might be viewed as minimum requirements concerning the contents of minutes. Specifically, §106 of the Open Meetings Law states that:

"1. Minutes shall be taken at all open meetings of a public body which shall consist of a record or summary of all motions, proposals, resolutions and any other matter formally voted upon and the vote thereon.

2. Minutes shall be taken at executive sessions of any action that is taken by formal vote which shall consist of a record or summary of the final determination of such action, and the date and vote thereon; provided, however, that such summary need not include any matter which is not required to be made public by the freedom of information law as added by article six of this chapter.

3. Minutes of meetings of all public bodies shall be available to the public in accordance with the provisions of the freedom of information law within two weeks from the date of such meetings except that minutes taken pursuant to subdivision two hereof shall be available to the public within one week from the date of the executive session."

Based upon the foregoing, it is clear in my view that minutes need not consist of a verbatim account of what was said at a meeting; similarly, there is no requirement that minutes refer to every topic discussed or identify those who may have spoken. Nevertheless, one of the items that must be included in minutes of meetings is a motion, and I believe that motions for entry into executive session, including the votes of the members on those motions, must be recorded. When a public body discusses a matter in executive session but takes no action, there is no requirement that minutes of the executive session be prepared.

Lastly, you wrote that:

"The Mayor of Hudson, Richard Scalera, recently made tape recordings from his home of phone conversations with members of the board of the Hudson Development Corporation, of which he is also a member. These tapes were made without their knowledge. The tapes were played for the Common Council during an executive session; the Council then voted to let the public hear the tapes, though only portions thereof were played. The Mayor has states that he made the tapes 'for personal use.'"

You have asked whether the tapes are "records" that must be made available under the Freedom of Information Law.

As you may be aware, §86(4) of that statute defines the term "record" expansively to include:

"any information kept, held, filed, produced, reproduced by, with or for an agency or the state legislature, in any physical form whatsoever including, but not limited to, reports, statements, examinations, memoranda, opinions, folders, files, books, manuals, pamphlets, forms, papers, designs, drawings, maps, photos, letters, microfilms, computer tapes or discs, rules, regulations or codes."

The Court of Appeals, the State's highest court, has construed the definition as broadly as its specific language suggests. The first such decision that dealt squarely with the scope of the term "record" involved documents pertaining to a lottery sponsored by a fire department. Although the agency contended that the documents did not pertain to the performance of its official duties, i.e., fighting fires, but rather to a "nongovernmental" activity, the Court rejected the claim of a "governmental versus nongovernmental dichotomy" [see Westchester Rockland Newspapers v. Kimball, 50 NY 2d 575, 581 (1980)] and found that the documents constituted "records" subject to rights of access granted by the Law. Moreover, the Court determined that:

"The statutory definition of 'record' makes nothing turn on the purpose for which it relates. This conclusion accords with the spirit as well as the letter of the statute. For not only are the expanding boundaries of governmental activity increasingly difficult to draw, but in perception, if not in actuality, there is bound to be considerable crossover between governmental and nongovernmental activities, especially where both are carried on by the same person or persons" (id.).

In another decision rendered by the Court of Appeals, the Court focused on an agency claim that it could "engage in unilateral prescreening of those documents which it deems to be outside of the scope of FOIL" and found that such activity "would be inconsistent with the process set forth in the statute" [Capital Newspapers v. Whalen, 69 NY 2d 246, 253 (1987)]. The Court determined that:

"...the procedure permitting an unreviewable prescreening of documents - which respondents urge us to engraft on the statute - could be used by an uncooperative and obdurate public official or agency to block an entirely legitimate request. There would be no way to prevent a custodian of records from removing a public record from FOIL's reach by simply labeling it 'purely private.' Such a construction, which would thwart the entire objective of FOIL by creating an easy means of avoiding compliance, should be rejected" (id., 254).

Further, in a case involving notes taken by the Secretary to the Board of Regents that he characterized as "personal" in conjunction with a contention that he took notes in part "as a private person making personal notes of observations...in the course of" meetings. In that decision, the court cited the definition of "record" and determined that the notes did not consist of personal property but rather were records subject to rights conferred by the Freedom of Information Law [Warder v. Board of Regents, 410 NYS 2d 742, 743 (1978)].

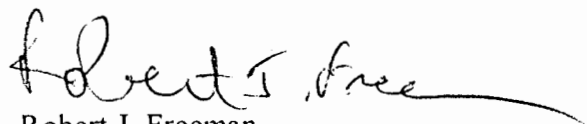

Based on the foregoing, I believe that the tape recordings at issue constitute "records" that fall within the coverage of the Freedom of Information Law.

Without knowledge of the contents of the tapes, I cannot advise as to the extent to which they must be disclosed. I note, however, that the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law.

In an effort to enhance compliance with and understanding of the Open Meetings and Freedom of Information Laws, copies of this opinion will be forwarded to the Common Council.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Robert J. Freeman

Dear Mr. Folsom:

I have received your letter of May 18. You have asked whether the public defender who represented you must disclose a report about you to you under the Freedom of Information Law.

In this regard, the Freedom of Information Law pertains to agency records, and §86(3) of that statute defines the term "agency" to mean:

"any state or municipal department, board, bureau, division, commission, committee, public authority, public corporation, council, office or other governmental entity performing a governmental or proprietary function for the state or any one or more municipalities thereof, except the judiciary or the state legislature."

Based on the foregoing, the Freedom of Information Law applies, in general, to records of entities of state and local government in New York. It would not apply to a private organization or a private investigator.

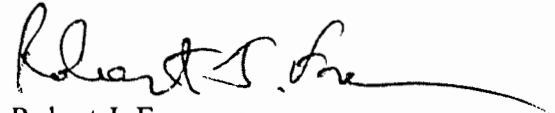

Section 716 of the County Law states in part that the "board of supervisors of any county may create an office of public defender, or may authorize a contract between its county and one or more other such counties to create an office of public defender to serve such counties." Therefore, a county office of public defender in my opinion is an agency subject to the Freedom of Information Law that is required to disclose records to the extent required by that statute.

In a case in which an attorney is appointed, while I believe that the records of the governmental entity required to adopt a plan under Article 18-B of the County Law are subject to the Freedom of Information Law, the records of an individual attorney performing services under Article 18-B may or may not be subject to the Freedom of Information Law, depending upon the nature of the plan. For instance, if a plan involves the services of a public defender, for reasons offered earlier, I believe that the records maintained by or for an office of public defender would fall within the scope of the Freedom of Information Law. However, if it involves services rendered by private attorneys or associations, those persons or entities would not in my view constitute agencies subject to the Freedom of Information Law.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Mr. Robert Gagne

Dear Mr. Gagne:

I have received your letter of May 20. At the top of that correspondence, you referred to "Photos, audio tapes, CD-Roms, computer disks diskettes, tapes, etc." and asked a variety of questions in relation to those information storage media.

You asked initially whether an individual has the "right personally to inspect or listen to the originals of these" (emphasis yours). From my perspective, although an agency may offer an original document to an applicant for inspection and or copying, there may be no obligation to do so. In many instances, there are issues involving the custody, security and integrity of original documents, and in those circumstances, I believe that an agency could provide a copy. In that event, an applicant could seek a certification pursuant to §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law in which the agency asserts that the copy made available is a true copy of the agency's record.

For similar reasons, an applicant may be permitted to make a copy of a record; however, an agency could in many situations determine to make the copy via its own staff or resources. I note that there is a judicial decision involving a request by an applicant to use his own photocopier. Since the agency was a small village with limited space and staff resources, the Court determined that the agency's rule prohibiting the use of photocopiers was reasonable [see Murtha v. Leonard, 620 NYS 2d 101 (1994), 210 Ad 2d 411]. If the facts were different, if the agency has adequate space and resources to permit the use of personal photocopiers, I would contend that a blanket ban on those devices by rule or practice would be unreasonable.

With respect to the use of software such as IBM Via Voice or Dragon Software, I believe that the issue would involve whether the agency has adequate space to an enable an individual to use the software in a way that is not disruptive to others.

Next, you asked whether an applicant has "the right to examine the agency's records showing what analyses, studies, or other writings detailing how it decided how much to charge for copies of the above" (emphasis yours). The only potential ground for denial with respect to the documentation in question would appear to be §87(2)(g). That provision permits an agency to withhold records that:

"are inter-agency or intra-agency materials which are not:

- i. statistical or factual tabulations or data;
- ii. instructions to staff that affect the public;
- iii. final agency policy or determinations; or
- iv. external audits, including but not limited to audits performed by the comptroller and the federal government..."

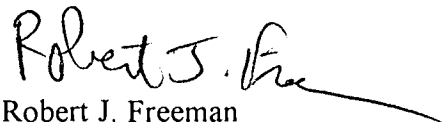

It is noted that the language quoted above contains what in effect is a double negative. While inter-agency or intra-agency materials may be withheld, portions of such materials consisting of statistical or factual information, instructions to staff that affect the public, final agency policy or determinations or external audits must be made available, unless a different ground for denial could appropriately be asserted. Concurrently, those portions of inter-agency or intra-agency materials that are reflective of opinion, advice, recommendation and the like could in my view be withheld. If written documentation used to determine the charge for copies was developed outside a government agency, §87(2)(g) would not apply.

Lastly, while an agency may accept an oral request for a record, pursuant to §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law, I believe that it may require that a request be made in writing, even if the request involves the agency's subject matter list.

I note that agencies generally are subject to schedules indicating minimum retention periods for various classes of records (see e.g., Arts and Cultural Affairs Law, §57.25 pertaining to local governments other than New York City). Since those schedules are generally more expansive than a subject matter list, it has been suggested that agencies adopt the retention schedules as their subject matter lists.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

FROM: Robert J. Freeman, Executive Director

Dear Ms. Keitel:

I have received your e-mail concerning a request that appears to have been sent to numerous libraries in New York and elsewhere. In brief, the request involves complaints about "patrons accessing pornographic or sexually explicit material" on the Internet.

In this regard, while many "public libraries" are subject to the Freedom of Information Law, others so characterized may fall beyond the coverage of that statute.

The Freedom of Information Law is applicable to agency records, and §86(3) of that statute defines the term "agency" to mean:

"any state or municipal department, board, bureau, division, commission, committee, public authority, public corporation, council, office of other governmental entity performing a governmental or proprietary function for the state or any one or more municipalities thereof, except the judiciary or the state legislature."

Based on the foregoing, the Freedom of Information Law generally applies to records maintained by governmental entities.

Based on §253 of the Education Law and the judicial interpretation concerning that and related provisions, I believe that a distinction may be made between a public library and an association or free association library. The former would in my view be subject to the Freedom of Information Law, while the latter would not. Subdivision (2) of §253 states that:

Ms. Susan L. Keitel

June 22, 1999

"The term 'public' library as used in this chapter shall be construed to mean a library, other than professional, technical or public school library, established for free purposes by official action of a municipality or district or the legislature, where the whole interests belong to the public; the term 'association' library shall be construed to mean a library established and controlled, in whole or in part, by a group of private individuals operating as an association, close corporation or as trustees under the provisions of a will or deed of trust; and the term 'free' as applied to a library shall be construed to mean a library maintained for the benefit and free use on equal terms of all the people of the community in which the library is located."

The leading decision concerning the issue was rendered by the Appellate Division, Second Department, in French v. Board of Education, in which the Court stated that:

"In view of the definition of a free association library contained in section 253 of the Education Law, it is clear that although such a library performs a valuable public service, it is nevertheless a private organization, and not a public corporation. (See 6 Opns St Comp, 1950, p 253.) Nor can it be described as a 'subordinate governmental agency' or a 'political subdivision'. (see 1 Opns St Comp, 1945, p 487.) It is a private corporation, chartered by the Board of Regents. (See 1961 Opns Atty Gen 105.) As such, it is not within the purview of section 101 of the General Municipal Law and we hold that under the circumstances it was proper to seek unitary bids for construction of the project as a whole. Cases and authorities cited by petitioner are inapposite, as they plainly refer to public, rather than free association libraries, and hence, in actuality, amplify the clear distinction between the two types of library organizations" [see attached, 72 AD 2d 196, 198-199 (1980); emphasis added by the court].

In my opinion, the language offered by the court clearly provides a basis for distinguishing between an association or free association library as opposed to a public library. For purposes of applying the Freedom of Information Law, I do not believe that an association library, a private non-governmental entity, would be subject to that statute; contrarily, a public library, which is established by government and "belong[s] to the public" [Education Law, §253(2)] would be subject to the Freedom of Information Law.

It is noted that confusion concerning the application of the Freedom of Information Law to association libraries has arisen in several instances, perhaps because its companion statute, the Open

Ms. Susan L. Keitel

Meetings Law, is applicable to meetings of their boards of trustees. The Open Meetings Law, which is codified as Article 7 of the Public Officers Law, is applicable to public and association libraries due to direction provided in the Education Law. Specifically, §260-a of the Education Law states in relevant part that:

"Every meeting, including a special district meeting, of a board of trustees of a public library system, cooperative library system, public library or free association library, including every committee meeting and subcommittee meeting of any such board of trustees in cities having a population of one million or more, shall be open to the general public. Such meetings shall be held in conformity with and in pursuance to the provisions of article seven of the public officers law."

Again, since Article 7 of the Public Officers Law is the Open Meetings Law, meetings of boards of trustees of various libraries, including association libraries, must be conducted in accordance with that statute.

If a library is not subject to the Freedom of Information Law, there would be no obligation to disclose. On the other hand, if a library is "public" and a governmental entity, it would be obligated to respond to a request for records.

As a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law.

Pertinent with respect to materials identifying patrons is §87(2)(a), which relates to records that "are specifically exempted from disclosure by state or federal statute." One such statute is §4509 of the Civil Practice Law and Rules, which states that:

"Library records, which contain names or other personally identifying details regarding the users of public, free association, school, college and university libraries and library systems of this state, including but not limited to records related to the circulation of library materials, computer database searches, interlibrary loan transaction, reference queries, requests for photocopies of library materials, title reserve requests, or the use of audio-visual materials, films or records, shall be confidential and shall not be disclosed except that such records may be disclosed to the extent necessary for the proper operation of such library and shall be disclosed upon request or consent of the user or pursuant to subpoena, court order or where otherwise required by statute."

Based on the foregoing, insofar as library records identifying a user of a library's services, I believe that the record must be withheld.

Ms. Susan L. Keitel

Similarly, in a variety of contexts it has been held that identifying details pertaining to those who transmit complaints to government agencies may be withheld or deleted on the ground that disclosure would constitute "an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy" [see Freedom of Information Law, §87(2)(b)]. When an agency receives a complaint, the identity of the complainant is largely irrelevant to the agency; what is relevant is whether or the extent to which the complaint has merit. Consequently, in most situations, identifying details pertaining to patrons or complainants, for example, would be deleted to protect those persons' privacy, while the substance of the complaints would be available.

Lastly, I point out that the Freedom of Information Law does not distinguish among applicants for records. Whether a person seeking records is a resident of New York or elsewhere is irrelevant to rights of access.

If you would like to discuss the matter, please feel free to contact me.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

[REDACTED]

Dear Ms. Nann:

I have received your letter of May 26, as well as the materials attached to it. You have questioned "the extent to which individual education programs (IEP'S) must be disclosed under FOIL."

As I understand the matter, IEP's are prepared by school districts or BOCES regarding students with disabilities or who have a need for a specialized educational program. To provide information concerning the contents of typical IEP's, you enclosed copies prepared by several educational institutions. In one, the student's name, date of birth, address, telephone number and the name of his or her guardian were deleted; the remainder of the document was disclosed. In others, similar information was deleted, such as the names of the parents of the students. In one of IEP's, virtually all of the information, other than the form prior to being completed, was deleted.

From my perspective, only the personally identifiable information pertaining to a student may justifiably be withheld or deleted. In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First, the Freedom of Information Law pertains to all agency records and defines the term "record" expansively to mean:

"any information kept, held, filed, produced, reproduced by, with or for an agency or the state legislature, in any physical form whatsoever including, but not limited to, reports, statements, examinations, memoranda, opinions, folders, files, books, manuals, pamphlets, forms, papers, designs, drawings, maps, photos, letters, microfilms, computer tapes or discs, rules, regulations or codes."

Based on the foregoing, IEP's and related documentation maintained by a school district or BOCES would clearly constitute agency "records" that fall within the coverage of the Freedom of Information Law.

Second, as a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law. It is emphasized that the introductory language of §87(2) refers to the authority to withhold "records or portions thereof" that fall within one or more of the grounds for denial that follow. The phrase quoted in the preceding sentence is based on a recognition that a single record might include both available and deniable information. It also imposes an obligation on an agency to review records sought in their entirety to determine which portions, if any, may justifiably be withheld and to disclose the remainder.

Relevant to the matter is the initial ground for denial, §87(2)(a), which pertains to records that are "specifically exempted from disclosure by state or federal statute." In the context of your inquiry, insofar as disclosure of the records in question would identify a student, I believe that they must be withheld. A statute that exempts records from disclosure is the Family Education Rights and Privacy Act (20 U.S.C. section 1232g), which is commonly known as "FERPA." In brief, FERPA applies to all educational agencies or institutions that participate in grant programs administered by the United States Department of Education. As such, FERPA includes within its scope virtually all public educational institutions and many private educational institutions. The focal point of the Act is the protection of privacy of students. It provides, in general, that any "education record," a term that is broadly defined, that is personally identifiable to a particular student or students is confidential, unless the parents of students under the age of eighteen waive their right to confidentiality, or unless a student eighteen years or over similarly waives his or her right to confidentiality. Further, the federal regulations promulgated under FERPA define the phrase "personally identifiable information" to include:

- "(a) The student's name;
- (b) The name of the student's parents or other family member;
- (c) The address of the student or student's family;
- (d) A personal identifier, such as the student's social security number or student number;
- (e) A list of personal characteristics that would make the student's identity easily traceable; or
- (f) Other information that would make the student's identity easily traceable" (34 CFR Section 99.3).

Based upon direction provided by FERPA and the regulations that define "personally identifiable information", references to students' names or other aspects of records that would make a student's identity easily traceable must in my view be withheld in order to comply with federal law.

Ms. Polly B. Nann

Having reviewed the samples of IEP's that you enclosed, it is my view that the deletion of unique identifiers, such as the names of students, their parents or guardians, dates of birth, addresses and home telephone numbers would be adequate to protect the students' privacy. I believe that the IEP from which all information, other than printed items on the form itself, was deleted represents a failure to comply with the Freedom of Information Law. In short, following the deletion of the kinds of unique identifiers described above, i.e., "personally identifiable information", the remainder of the completed form must, in my opinion, be disclosed.

I hope that I have been of assistance. Should any further questions arise, please feel free to contact me.

Sincerely,

The staff of the Committee on Open Government is authorized to issue advisory opinions. The ensuing staff advisory opinion is based solely upon the information presented in your correspondence.

Dear Ms. Smith:

As you may be aware, I have received your letter of June 16 and attempted without success to telephone you in an effort to offer clarification.

In brief, as I understand the matter, you and others have attempted to offer support to a teacher in the Liverpool School District who was suspended. You indicated that letters have been sent to the Board of Education with a request that they be read at open meetings. The Board has refused to do so and has failed to honor requests for the letters. Further, at a recent meeting, the Board, according to your letter, "informed the attendees that they, as a board in a public meeting, have the right to refuse to accept public comment during that time or at any time in the future, and also have the right to refuse to read letters specifically requested to be read 'in open session'."

In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First, there is nothing in any law of which I am aware that would require a public body, such as the Board of Education, to read letters aloud at an open meeting, even if the writer asks that a letter be read.

Second, the Open Meetings Law clearly provides the public with the right "to observe the performance of public officials and attend and listen to the deliberations and decisions that go into the making of public policy" (see Open Meetings Law, §100). However, the Law is silent with respect to the issue of public participation. Consequently, by means of example, if a public body does not want to answer questions or permit the public to speak or otherwise participate at its meetings, I do not believe that it would be obliged to do so. On the other hand, a public body may choose to answer questions and permit public participation, and many do so. When a public body does permit the public to speak, I believe that it should do so based upon reasonable rules that treat members of the public equally.

Ms. Robin Smith

While public bodies have the right to adopt rules to govern their own proceedings (see e.g., Education Law, §1709), the courts have found in a variety of contexts that such rules must be reasonable. For example, although a board of education may "adopt by laws and rules for its government and operations", in a case in which a board's rule prohibited the use of tape recorders at its meetings, the Appellate Division found that the rule was unreasonable, stating that the authority to adopt rules "is not unbridled" and that "unreasonable rules will not be sanctioned" [see Mitchell v. Garden City Union Free School District, 113 AD 2d 924, 925 (1985)]. Similarly, if by rule, a public body chose to permit certain citizens to address it for ten minutes while permitting others to address it for three, or not at all, such a rule, in my view, would be unreasonable.

Lastly, with respect to the letters sent to the Board, I direct your attention to the Freedom of Information Law. That statute pertains to agency records, and §86(4) defines the term "record" expansively to mean:

"any information kept, held, filed, produced, reproduced by, with or for an agency or the state legislature, in any physical form whatsoever including, but not limited to, reports, statements, examinations, memoranda, opinions, folders, files, books, manuals, pamphlets, forms, papers, designs, drawings, maps, photos, letters, microfilms, computer tapes or discs, rules, regulations or codes."

In view of the foregoing, records sent to the District clearly constitute "records" that fall within the scope of the Freedom of Information Law.

As a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law.

Ordinarily, I believe that names or other personally identifying details relating to those who send letters to a school district in the kind of situation that you described could be withheld on the ground that disclosure would constitute "an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy" pursuant to §87(2)(b) of the Freedom of Information Law. Similarly, the federal Family Educational Rights and Privacy Act (20 UCS §1232g) prohibits a school district from disclosing information identifiable to a student without the consent of a parent of the student. However, if the author of a letter, whether a parent or otherwise, consents to disclosure or asks that the letter be read or disclosed during a public forum, I do not believe that there would be a basis for withholding the letter when it is sought under the Freedom of Information Law.

Dear Ms. Howe:

I have received your letter of May 22, as well as the materials attached to it. You have sought guidance concerning a request for records of the Town of Brookhaven. Although the receipt of the request was acknowledged on March 31, the Town had neither granted nor denied your request as of the date of your letter to this office.

From my perspective, although the Town acknowledged the receipt of your requests, it did not fully comply with the requirements of the Freedom of Information Law. In this regard, I offer the following comments.

As you are aware, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law provides in relevant part that:

"Each entity subject to the provisions of this article, within five business days of the receipt of a written request for a record reasonably described, shall make such record available to the person requesting it, deny such request in writing or furnish a written acknowledgement of the receipt of such request and a statement of the approximate date when such request will be granted or denied..."

It has been held that agency officials "did not conform to the mandates" of the provision quoted above "when they did not...furnish a written acknowledgement of the receipt of...requests along with a statement of the approximate date when action would be taken" [Newton v. Police Department, 585 NYS2d 5, 8, 183 AD2d 621 (1992), emphasis added]. In the context of your correspondence, the acknowledgement of receipt of your first request did not include an approximate date indicating when access would be granted or denied.

Ms. Mary K. Howe

June 23, 1999

In a case that described an experience similar to yours, the court cited §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law and wrote that:

"The acknowledgement letters in this proceeding neither granted nor denied petitioner's request nor approximated a determination date. Rather, the letters were open ended as to time as they stated, 'that a period of time would be required to ascertain whether such documents do exist, and if they did, whether they qualify for inspection.

"This court finds that respondent's actions and/or inactions placed petitioner in a "Catch 22" position. The petitioner, relying on the respondent's representation, anticipated a determination to her request...this court finds that this petitioner should not be penalized for respondent's failure to comply with Public Officers Law §89 (3), especially when petitioner was advised by respondent that a decision concerning her application would be forthcoming.

It should also be noted that petitioner did not sit idle during this period but rather made numerous efforts to obtain a decision from respondent including the submission of a follow up letter to the Records Access Officer and submission of various requests for said records with the Department of Transportation" (Bernstein v. City of New York, Supreme Court, Supreme Court, New York County, November 7, 1990).

In Bernstein, the court determined that the agency "is estopped from asserting that this proceeding is improper due to petitioner's failure to appeal the denial of access to records within 30 days to the agency head, as provided in Public Officers Law, §89(4)(a)."

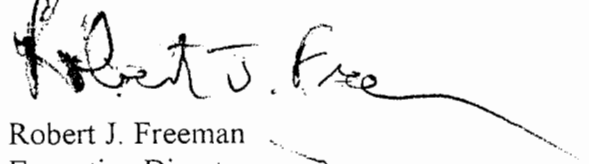

Based on the foregoing, I believe that your requests have been constructively denied and that you may appeal the denial to Stanley Allan pursuant to §89(4)(a). That provision states in relevant part that:

"...any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive or governing body of the entity, or the person therefor designated by such head, chief executive, or governing body, who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reason for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

Dear Mr. Boyer:

I have received your letter of May 24 in which you questioned the propriety of a denial of your request to the Division of Parole for a copy of a recommendation sent to that agency by the Rensselaer County District Attorney.

From my perspective, the denial was proper. In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First, several of the decisions that you cited pertain to the pre-sentence reports and related materials that are subject to §390.50 of the Criminal Procedure Law. Those records are exempted from disclosure to the public [see Freedom of Information Law, §87(2)(a) and can only be made available by the sentencing court.

Second, the principles expressed in the case of Mingo v. NYS Division of Parole [244 AD2d 781 (1997)] are applicable in the context of your request. The letter sent by the District Attorney to the Division of Parole constitutes "inter-agency material" that falls within the coverage of §87(2)(g) of the Freedom of Information Law. That provision permits an agency to withhold records that:

"are inter-agency or intra-agency materials which are not:

- i. statistical or factual tabulations or data;
- ii. instructions to staff that affect the public;
- iii. final agency policy or determinations; or

Mr. Daniel E. Boyer

June 24, 1999

iv. external audits, including but not limited to audits performed by the comptroller and the federal government..."

It is noted that the language quoted above contains what in effect is a double negative. While inter-agency or intra-agency materials may be withheld, portions of such materials consisting of statistical or factual information, instructions to staff that affect the public, final agency policy or determinations or external audits must be made available, unless a different ground for denial could appropriately be asserted. Concurrently, those portions of inter-agency or intra-agency materials that are reflective of opinion, advice, recommendation and the like could in my view be withheld.

In short, a recommendation transmitted by an official of one agency to an official of another falls within the scope of the exception cited above.

I hope that the foregoing serves to clarify your understanding of the matter and that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Subject: Re: Redaction question (police records)

Dear Ms. Hessel:

My guess is that the many of the deletions were inappropriately made. While the identities of witnesses in the kind of situation that you described might generally be withheld as an unwarranted invasion of privacy [see NY Freedom of Information Law, section 87(2)(b)] or because disclosure would endanger life or safety [section 87(2)(f)]. Nevertheless, the event occurred nearly 70 years ago, and the ability of the Department to meet the burden of proof in the event of a judicial challenge would be questionable.

There would be nothing personal about the name of the business owned by the deceased; in my view, that item would clearly be public.

With respect to the name of the garage where he was last seen, arguably, that kind of information might be withheld in relation to a current investigation on the ground that disclosure would interfere with the investigation [see section 87(2)(e)]. Nevertheless, again, I would conjecture that meeting the burden of defending a denial of access 70 years after the fact would be nearly impossible.

Lastly, by law, agencies can destroy or dispose of records based on schedules indicating minimum periods of retention. If the retention period was reached, the records could properly have been destroyed. In New York City, the schedules are developed by the Department of Records and Information Services pursuant to the City Charter.

Mr. Jim Martin

[REDACTED]

Dear Mr. Martin:

I have received your letter of May 26 and the materials attached to it. You have sought assistance in "resolving {a} conflict" relating to your efforts in obtaining information from your employer, Onondaga Community College.

Since you did not include a copy of your original request with the documentation that you forwarded, I am unaware of the exact terms of your request. Nevertheless, for purposes of clarification, it is important to note that the title of the Freedom of Information Law is somewhat misleading, for it does not deal with information per se, but rather with records. Similarly, it does not require that agencies furnish information in response to questions. In short, the Freedom of Information Law pertains to existing records, and §89(3) of the Law specifies that an agency is not required to create a record a record in response to a request.

One aspect of your request involved "how public funds are used", and I do not believe that such an attempt to elicit information would constitute a request made in accordance with the Freedom of Information Law. Rather than essentially asking a question, it is suggested that, in the future, you seek records (i.e., "I request records that include the current salaries of the following employees...").

Another involved "policies and procedures for the temporary appointment, promotion, transfer line, and title change for management positions". If I understand the correspondence correctly, the President of the College indicated on May 24 that no such documents exist. If that is so, there would be no records to which access could be granted or denied, and the Freedom of Information Law would not apply. As indicated in the correspondence, because a community college is a public institution, it must abide by applicable provisions of the Civil Service Law and rules promulgated by the Department of Civil Service. I would conjecture that a review of those provisions would enable you to learn of the procedures followed by and obligations imposed upon the College in relation to the areas of your concern

Lastly, you requested records indicating the "highest academic degree earned" by persons holding certain position. While the extent to which those items were disclosed is not entirely clear, insofar as they appear in records maintained by the College, I believe that they must be made available. In brief, it has been held that portions of records describing an individual's educational background are available, for that information is not so intimate that disclosure would constitute an "unwarranted invasion of personal privacy as envisioned by §87(2)(b) of the Freedom of Information Law [see Ruberti, Girvin & Ferlazzo v. NYS Division of State Police, 218 Ad2d 494 (1996)].

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Mr. John J. Sheehan
J.J. Sheehan Adjusters, Inc.
P.O. Box 604
Binghamton, NY 13902

Dear Mr. Sheehan:

I have received your letter of May 27 and the materials attached to it. You have questioned the validity of a fee of ten dollars established by local law by the Town of Cheektowaga for copies of "computer-generated police and accident reports." The Deputy Town Attorney indicated that the fee in question was adopted because "these documents are 'computer-generated' and not merely photocopies, [and] the Town Board established fees above $0.25 per page for same."

From my perspective, it is likely that the local law authorizing the fee in question is inconsistent with the Freedom of Information Law. In this regard, I offer the following comments.

By way of background, §87(1)(b)(iii) of the Freedom of Information Law stated until October 15, 1982, that an agency could charge up to twenty-five cents per photocopy or the actual cost of reproduction unless a different fee was prescribed by "law". Chapter 73 of the Laws of 1982 replaced the word "law" with the term "statute". As described in the Committee's fourth annual report to the Governor and the Legislature of the Freedom of Information Law, which was submitted in December of 1981 and which recommended the amendment that is now law:

"The problem is that the term 'law' may include regulations, local laws, or ordinances, for example. As such, state agencies by means of regulation or municipalities by means of local law may and in some instances have established fees in excess of twenty-five cents per photocopy, thereby resulting in constructive denials of access. To remove this problem, the word 'law' should be replaced by 'statute', thereby enabling an agency to charge more than twenty-five cents only in situations in which an act of the State Legislature, a statute, so specifies."

Therefore, prior to October 15, 1982, a local law, an ordinance, or a regulation for instance, establishing a search fee or a fee in excess of twenty-five cents per photocopy or higher than the actual cost of reproduction was valid. However, under the amendment, only an act of the State Legislature, a statute, would in my view permit the assessment of a fee higher than twenty-five cents per photocopy, a fee that exceeds the actual cost of reproducing records that cannot be photocopied, (i.e., electronic information), or any other fee, such as a fee for search or overhead costs. In addition, it has been confirmed judicially that fees inconsistent with the Freedom of Information Law may be validly charged only when the authority to do so is conferred by a statute [see Gandin, Schotsky & Rappaport v. Suffolk County, 640 NYS 2d 214, 226 AD2d 339 (1996); Sheehan v. City of Syracuse, 521 NYS 2d 207 (1987)].

Further, the specific language of the Freedom of Information Law and the regulations promulgated by the Committee on Open Government indicate that, absent statutory authority, an agency may charge fees only for the reproduction of records. Section 87(1)(b) of the Freedom of Information Law states:

"Each agency shall promulgate rules and regulations in conformance with this article...and pursuant to such general rules and regulations as may be promulgated by the committee on open government in conformity with the provisions of this article, pertaining to the availability of records and procedures to be followed, including, but not limited to...

(iii) the fees for copies of records which shall not exceed twenty-five cents per photocopy not in excess of nine by fourteen inches, or the actual cost of reproducing any other record, except when a different fee is otherwise prescribed by statute."

The regulations promulgated by the Committee state in relevant part that:

"Except when a different fee is otherwise prescribed by statute:

(a) There shall be no fee charged for the following:

- (1) inspection of records;
- (2) search for records; or
- (3) any certification pursuant to this Part" (21 NYCRR 1401.8)."

Based upon the foregoing, it is likely that a fee for the reports in question would involve the cost of computer time, plus the cost of an information storage medium (i.e., paper, a computer tape or disk) to which data is transferred.

Although compliance with the Freedom of Information Law involves the use of public employees' time and perhaps other costs, the Court of Appeals has found that the Law is not intended to be given effect "on a cost-accounting basis", but rather that "Meeting the public's legitimate right of access to information concerning government is fulfillment of a governmental obligation, not the gift of, or waste of, public funds" [Doolan v. BOCES, 48 NY 2d 341, 347 (1979)].

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Ms. Christine Brown

[REDACTED]

Dear Ms. Brown:

I have received your letter of May 27, as well as a variety of materials relating to the efforts of yourself and others concerning a construction project in the Greece Central School District.

One of the issues involves delays in the disclosure of records. In this regard, the Freedom of Information Law provides direction pertaining to the time and manner in which an agency must respond to requests. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law provides in relevant part that:

"Each entity subject to the provisions of this article, within five business days of the receipt of a written request for a record reasonably described, shall make such record available to the person requesting it, deny such request in writing or furnish a written acknowledgement of the receipt of such request and a statement of the approximate date when such request will be granted or denied..."

It has been held that agency officials "did not conform to the mandates" of the provision quoted above "when they did not...furnish a written acknowledgement of the receipt of...requests along with a statement of the approximate date when action would be taken" [Newton v. Police Department, 585 NYS2d 5, 8, 183 AD2d 621 (1992), emphasis added].

In a case that described an experience that may be somewhat similar to yours, the court cited §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law and wrote that:

Ms. Christine Brown

June 29, 1999

"The acknowledgement letters in this proceeding neither granted nor denied petitioner's request nor approximated a determination date. Rather, the letters were open ended as to time as they stated, 'that a period of time would be required to ascertain whether such documents do exist, and if they did, whether they qualify for inspection.

"This court finds that respondent's actions and/or inactions placed petitioner in a "Catch 22" position. The petitioner, relying on the respondent's representation, anticipated a determination to her request...this court finds that this petitioner should not be penalized for respondent's failure to comply with Public Officers Law §89 (3), especially when petitioner was advised by respondent that a decision concerning her application would be forthcoming.

It should also be noted that petitioner did not sit idle during this period but rather made numerous efforts to obtain a decision from respondent including the submission of a follow up letter to the Records Access Officer and submission of various requests for said records with the Department of Transportation" (Bernstein v. City of New York, Supreme Court, Supreme Court, New York County, November 7, 1990).

In Bernstein, the court determined that the agency "is estopped from asserting that this proceeding is improper due to petitioner's failure to appeal the denial of access to records within 30 days to the agency head, as provided in Public Officers Law, §89(4)(a)."

Based on the foregoing, it appears that some aspects of your request have been constructively denied and that you may appeal the denial pursuant to §89(4)(a). That provision states in relevant part that:

"...any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive or governing body of the entity, or the person therefor designated by such head, chief executive, or governing body, who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reason for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

The second issue involves the contention by the District that certain requests involve the analysis of information and the creation of new records. While I agree with that contention in some instances, it does not appear to be applicable in others. By way of background, as you are likely aware, the Freedom of Information Law pertains to existing records, and §89(3) states in part that an agency is not required to create a record in response to a request for information. Similarly, an agency is not required to provide "information" in response to questions; its obligation is to provide access to existing records to the extent required by law. Therefore, if, for instance, if a request is made for the "total cost" of a certain function or project, and if the District does not maintain a record that contains a "total", it would not be obliged to review its records and compile a series of figures to prepare a total on behalf of an applicant. In one request made to the District, the applicant asked whether "all schools, teachers, and all children have the textbooks they need to meet our educational expectations." In my view, that kind of inquiry would not constitute a request for records under the Freedom of Information Law.

In a request that you made, you sought "Documents containing the cost of renovation thus far to the administrative floor and breakdown including but not limited to carpeting, drywall, painting, windows, ceiling, lights, electric." The District's appeals officer wrote that "[t]o obtain this information would require the district to analyze information, make the necessary calculations and create a new record." In short, I disagree with that response. You requested "documents"; you did not seek information in the nature of a total figure or attempt to elicit information by raising a question. If indeed there are "documents" containing information reflective of certain costs, the District would be required to disclose them; you could prepare totals on your own initiative.

Part of the issue may relate the requirement imposed by §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law that an applicant must "reasonably describe" the records sought. I point out that it has been held by the Court of Appeals, the State's highest court, that to deny a request on the ground that it fails to reasonably describe the records, an agency must establish that "the descriptions were insufficient for purposes of locating and identifying the documents sought" [Konigsberg v. Coughlin, 68 NY 2d 245, 249 (1986)].

The Court in Konigsberg found that the agency could not reject the request due to its breadth and also stated that:

"respondents have failed to supply any proof whatsoever as to the nature - or even the existence - of their indexing system: whether the Department's files were indexed in a manner that would enable the identification and location of documents in their possession (cf. National Cable Tel. Assn. v Federal Communications Commn., 479 F2d 183, 192 [Bazelon, J.] [plausible claim of nonidentifiability under Federal Freedom of Information Act, 5 USC section 552 (a) (3), may be presented where agency's indexing system was such that 'the requested documents could not be identified by retracing a path already trodden. It would have required a wholly new enterprise, potentially requiring a search of every file in the possession of the agency'])" (id. at 250).

In my view, whether a request reasonably describes the records sought, as suggested by the Court of Appeals, may be dependent upon the terms of a request, as well as the nature of an agency's filing or record-keeping system. In Konigsberg, it appears that the agency was able to locate the records on the basis of an inmate's name and identification number.

Ms. Christine Brown

While I am unfamiliar with the recordkeeping systems of the District, to the extent that the records sought can be located with reasonable effort, I believe that the request would have met the requirement of reasonably describing the records. If the construction project is ongoing or recently completed, I would conjecture that one or more contractors were engaged to perform certain tasks, i.e., painting, supplying and installing flooring or windows, electrical work and the like. Assuming that District staff has the ability to locate records reflective of those expenditures, while it would not be required to prepare a total, I believe that it would be required to retrieve and disclose those records. Again, once in receipt of the records you could perform your own analysis or compilations.

In sum, insofar as your requests involve "documents" and District staff has the capacity to locate those records, staff, in my opinion, would be required to do so and disclose them in accordance with rights of access conferred by the Freedom of Information Law.

In an effort to enhance compliance with and understanding of the Freedom of Information Law, copies of this response will be forwarded to District officials.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Dear Mr. Sandino:

I have received your letter of May 27 in which you referred to two requests for records, one to the Office of the Suffolk County District Attorney, and the other to the Suffolk County Police Department. Although the receipt of the former was acknowledged, you were informed that a response "may be delayed appreciably"; no approximate date of response was given. There was no response with respect to the latter.

In this regard, the Freedom of Information Law provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies must respond to requests. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

"Each entity subject to the provisions of this article, within five business days of the receipt of a written request for a record reasonably described, shall make such record available to the person requesting it, deny such request in writing or furnish a written acknowledgement of the receipt of such request and a statement of the approximate date when such request will be granted or denied..."

If neither a response to a request nor an acknowledgement of the receipt of a request is given within five business days, if an agency acknowledged the receipt of a request but failed to approximate when the request will be granted or denied, or if an agency delays responding for an unreasonable time after it acknowledges that a request has been received, a request may, in my opinion, be considered to have been constructively denied. In such a circumstance, I believe that the denial may be appealed in accordance with §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law. That provision states in relevant part that:

Mr. Hernando Sandino

"...any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive, or governing body, who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

In addition, it has been held that when an appeal is made but a determination is not rendered within ten business days of the receipt of the appeal as required under §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, the appellant has exhausted his or her administrative remedies and may initiate a challenge to a constructive denial of access under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Rules [Floyd v. McGuire, 87 AD 2d 388, appeal dismissed 57 NY 2d 774 (1982)].

Green Haven Correctional Facility
Drawer B
Stormville, NY 12582

Dear Mr. McCoy:

I have received your letter of May 26. You have sought assistance in obtaining records relating to your representation under the assigned counsel program.

In this regard, it is noted at the outset that the Freedom of Information Law pertains to agency records. Section 86(3) of that statute defines the term "agency" to mean:

"any state or municipal department, board, bureau, division, commission, committee, public authority, public corporation, council, office or other governmental entity performing a governmental or proprietary function for the state or any one or more municipalities thereof, except the judiciary or the state legislature."

As such, the Freedom of Information Law generally applies to records maintained by state and local government; it would not apply to a private organization.

The program to which you referred involves assignments under "Article 18-B", which encompasses §§722 to 722-f of the County Law. Under §722, the governing body of a county and the City Council in New York City are required to adopt plans for providing counsel to persons "who are financially unable to obtain counsel." Those plans may involve providing representation by a public defender, by a legal aid organization, through a bar association, or by means of a combination of the foregoing.

Mr. James McCoy

While I believe that the records of the governmental entity required to adopt a plan under Article 18-B are subject to the Freedom of Information Law, the records of an individual attorney or private organization performing services under Article 18-B may or may not be subject to the Freedom of Information Law, depending upon the nature of the plan. For instance, if a plan involves the services of a public defender, I believe that the records maintained by an office of public defender would fall within the scope of the Freedom of Information Law (see County Law, §716), for that office in my view would constitute an "agency" as defined in §86(3) of the Freedom of Information Law. However, if it involves services rendered by private attorneys or associations, those persons or entities would not in my view constitute agencies subject to the Freedom of Information Law.

A county bar association is not, in my opinion, an "agency" subject to the Freedom of Information Law. However, if, for example, a bar association maintains records for a county, I believe that they would constitute county records. The Freedom of Information Law pertains to all agency records, and §86(4) of that statute defines the term "record" expansively to include:

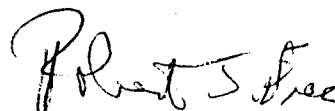

"any information kept, held, filed, produced, reproduced by, with or for an agency or the state legislature, in any physical form whatsoever including, but not limited to, reports, statements, examinations, memoranda, opinions, folders, files, books, manuals, pamphlets, forms, papers, designs, drawings, maps, photos, letters, microfilms, computer tapes or discs, rules, regulations or codes."

Based upon the language quoted above, documents need not be in the physical possession of an agency to constitute agency records; so long as they are produced, kept or filed for an agency, the courts have held they constitute "agency records", even if they are maintained apart from an agency's premises.

In sum, insofar as the records sought are maintained for an agency, I believe that the agency would be required to direct the custodian of the records to disclose them in accordance with the Freedom of Information Law, or obtain them in order to disclose them to you to the extent required by law.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Mr. Jim Martin

[REDACTED]

Dear Mr. Martin:

I have received your letter of May 26 and the materials attached to it. You have sought assistance in "resolving {a} conflict" relating to your efforts in obtaining information from your employer, Onondaga Community College.

Since you did not include a copy of your original request with the documentation that you forwarded, I am unaware of the exact terms of your request. Nevertheless, for purposes of clarification, it is important to note that the title of the Freedom of Information Law is somewhat misleading, for it does not deal with information per se, but rather with records. Similarly, it does not require that agencies furnish information in response to questions. In short, the Freedom of Information Law pertains to existing records, and §89(3) of the Law specifies that an agency is not required to create a record a record in response to a request.

One aspect of your request involved "how public funds are used", and I do not believe that such an attempt to elicit information would constitute a request made in accordance with the Freedom of Information Law. Rather than essentially asking a question, it is suggested that, in the future, you seek records (i.e., "I request records that include the current salaries of the following employees...").

Another involved "policies and procedures for the temporary appointment, promotion, transfer line, and title change for management positions". If I understand the correspondence correctly, the President of the College indicated on May 24 that no such documents exist. If that is so, there would be no records to which access could be granted or denied, and the Freedom of Information Law would not apply. As indicated in the correspondence, because a community college is a public institution, it must abide by applicable provisions of the Civil Service Law and rules promulgated by the Department of Civil Service. I would conjecture that a review of those provisions would enable you to learn of the procedures followed by and obligations imposed upon the College in relation to the areas of your concern

Lastly, you requested records indicating the "highest academic degree earned" by persons holding certain position. While the extent to which those items were disclosed is not entirely clear, insofar as they appear in records maintained by the College, I believe that they must be made available. In brief, it has been held that portions of records describing an individual's educational background are available, for that information is not so intimate that disclosure would constitute an "unwarranted invasion of personal privacy as envisioned by §87(2)(b) of the Freedom of Information Law [see Ruberti, Girvin & Ferlazzo v. NYS Division of State Police, 218 Ad2d 494 (1996)].

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Mr. John J. Sheehan
J.J. Sheehan Adjusters, Inc.
P.O. Box 604
Binghamton, NY 13902

Dear Mr. Sheehan:

I have received your letter of May 27 and the materials attached to it. You have questioned the validity of a fee of ten dollars established by local law by the Town of Cheektowaga for copies of "computer-generated police and accident reports." The Deputy Town Attorney indicated that the fee in question was adopted because "these documents are 'computer-generated' and not merely photocopies, [and] the Town Board established fees above $0.25 per page for same."

From my perspective, it is likely that the local law authorizing the fee in question is inconsistent with the Freedom of Information Law. In this regard, I offer the following comments.

By way of background, §87(1)(b)(iii) of the Freedom of Information Law stated until October 15, 1982, that an agency could charge up to twenty-five cents per photocopy or the actual cost of reproduction unless a different fee was prescribed by "law". Chapter 73 of the Laws of 1982 replaced the word "law" with the term "statute". As described in the Committee's fourth annual report to the Governor and the Legislature of the Freedom of Information Law, which was submitted in December of 1981 and which recommended the amendment that is now law:

"The problem is that the term 'law' may include regulations, local laws, or ordinances, for example. As such, state agencies by means of regulation or municipalities by means of local law may and in some instances have established fees in excess of twenty-five cents per photocopy, thereby resulting in constructive denials of access. To remove this problem, the word 'law' should be replaced by 'statute', thereby enabling an agency to charge more than twenty-five cents only in situations in which an act of the State Legislature, a statute, so specifies."

Therefore, prior to October 15, 1982, a local law, an ordinance, or a regulation for instance, establishing a search fee or a fee in excess of twenty-five cents per photocopy or higher than the actual cost of reproduction was valid. However, under the amendment, only an act of the State Legislature, a statute, would in my view permit the assessment of a fee higher than twenty-five cents per photocopy, a fee that exceeds the actual cost of reproducing records that cannot be photocopied, (i.e., electronic information), or any other fee, such as a fee for search or overhead costs. In addition, it has been confirmed judicially that fees inconsistent with the Freedom of Information Law may be validly charged only when the authority to do so is conferred by a statute [see Gandin, Schotsky & Rappaport v. Suffolk County, 640 NYS 2d 214, 226 AD2d 339 (1996); Sheehan v. City of Syracuse, 521 NYS 2d 207 (1987)].

Further, the specific language of the Freedom of Information Law and the regulations promulgated by the Committee on Open Government indicate that, absent statutory authority, an agency may charge fees only for the reproduction of records. Section 87(1)(b) of the Freedom of Information Law states:

"Each agency shall promulgate rules and regulations in conformance with this article...and pursuant to such general rules and regulations as may be promulgated by the committee on open government in conformity with the provisions of this article, pertaining to the availability of records and procedures to be followed, including, but not limited to...

(iii) the fees for copies of records which shall not exceed twenty-five cents per photocopy not in excess of nine by fourteen inches, or the actual cost of reproducing any other record, except when a different fee is otherwise prescribed by statute."

The regulations promulgated by the Committee state in relevant part that:

"Except when a different fee is otherwise prescribed by statute:

(a) There shall be no fee charged for the following:

- (1) inspection of records;
- (2) search for records; or
- (3) any certification pursuant to this Part" (21 NYCRR 1401.8)."

Based upon the foregoing, it is likely that a fee for the reports in question would involve the cost of computer time, plus the cost of an information storage medium (i.e., paper, a computer tape or disk) to which data is transferred.

Although compliance with the Freedom of Information Law involves the use of public employees' time and perhaps other costs, the Court of Appeals has found that the Law is not intended to be given effect "on a cost-accounting basis", but rather that "Meeting the public's legitimate right of access to information concerning government is fulfillment of a governmental obligation, not the gift of, or waste of, public funds" [Doolan v. BOCES, 48 NY 2d 341, 347 (1979)].

I hope that I have been of assistance.

[Redacted]

The staff of the Committee on Open Government is authorized to issue advisory opinions. The ensuing staff advisory opinion is based solely upon the information presented in your correspondence unless otherwise indicated.

Dear Ms. Brown:

I have received your letter of May 27, as well as a variety of materials relating to the efforts of yourself and others concerning a construction project in the Greece Central School District.

One of the issues involves delays in the disclosure of records. In this regard, the Freedom of Information Law provides direction pertaining to the time and manner in which an agency must respond to requests. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law provides in relevant part that:

"Each entity subject to the provisions of this article, within five business days of the receipt of a written request for a record reasonably described, shall make such record available to the person requesting it, deny such request in writing or furnish a written acknowledgement of the receipt of such request and a statement of the approximate date when such request will be granted or denied..."

It has been held that agency officials "did not conform to the mandates" of the provision quoted above "when they did not...furnish a written acknowledgement of the receipt of...requests along with a statement of the approximate date when action would be taken" [Newton v. Police Department, 585 NYS2d 5, 8, 183 AD2d 621 (1992), emphasis added].

In a case that described an experience that may be somewhat similar to yours, the court cited §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law and wrote that:

Ms. Christine Brown

June 29, 1999

"The acknowledgement letters in this proceeding neither granted nor denied petitioner's request nor approximated a determination date. Rather, the letters were open ended as to time as they stated, 'that a period of time would be required to ascertain whether such documents do exist, and if they did, whether they qualify for inspection.

"This court finds that respondent's actions and/or inactions placed petitioner in a "Catch 22" position. The petitioner, relying on the respondent's representation, anticipated a determination to her request...this court finds that this petitioner should not be penalized for respondent's failure to comply with Public Officers Law §89 (3), especially when petitioner was advised by respondent that a decision concerning her application would be forthcoming.

It should also be noted that petitioner did not sit idle during this period but rather made numerous efforts to obtain a decision from respondent including the submission of a follow up letter to the Records Access Officer and submission of various requests for said records with the Department of Transportation" (Bernstein v. City of New York, Supreme Court, Supreme Court, New York County, November 7, 1990).

In Bernstein, the court determined that the agency "is estopped from asserting that this proceeding is improper due to petitioner's failure to appeal the denial of access to records within 30 days to the agency head, as provided in Public Officers Law, §89(4)(a)."

Based on the foregoing, it appears that some aspects of your request have been constructively denied and that you may appeal the denial pursuant to §89(4)(a). That provision states in relevant part that:

"...any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive or governing body of the entity, or the person therefor designated by such head, chief executive, or governing body, who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reason for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

The second issue involves the contention by the District that certain requests involve the analysis of information and the creation of new records. While I agree with that contention in some instances, it does not appear to be applicable in others. By way of background, as you are likely aware, the Freedom of Information Law pertains to existing records, and §89(3) states in part that an agency is not required to create a record in response to a request for information. Similarly, an agency is not required to provide "information" in response to questions; its obligation is to provide access to existing records to the extent required by law. Therefore, if, for instance, if a request is made for the "total cost" of a certain function or project, and if the District does not maintain a record that contains a "total", it would not be obliged to review its records and compile a series of figures to prepare a total on behalf of an applicant. In one request made to the District, the applicant asked whether "all schools, teachers, and all children have the textbooks they need to meet our educational expectations." In my view, that kind of inquiry would not constitute a request for records under the Freedom of Information Law.

In a request that you made, you sought "Documents containing the cost of renovation thus far to the administrative floor and breakdown including but not limited to carpeting, drywall, painting, windows, ceiling, lights, electric." The District's appeals officer wrote that "[t]o obtain this information would require the district to analyze information, make the necessary calculations and create a new record." In short, I disagree with that response. You requested "documents"; you did not seek information in the nature of a total figure or attempt to elicit information by raising a question. If indeed there are "documents" containing information reflective of certain costs, the District would be required to disclose them; you could prepare totals on your own initiative.

Part of the issue may relate the requirement imposed by §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law that an applicant must "reasonably describe" the records sought. I point out that it has been held by the Court of Appeals, the State's highest court, that to deny a request on the ground that it fails to reasonably describe the records, an agency must establish that "the descriptions were insufficient for purposes of locating and identifying the documents sought" [Konigsberg v. Coughlin, 68 NY 2d 245, 249 (1986)].

The Court in Konigsberg found that the agency could not reject the request due to its breadth and also stated that:

"respondents have failed to supply any proof whatsoever as to the nature - or even the existence - of their indexing system: whether the Department's files were indexed in a manner that would enable the identification and location of documents in their possession (cf. National Cable Tel. Assn. v Federal Communications Commn., 479 F2d 183, 192 [Bazelon, J.] [plausible claim of nonidentifiability under Federal Freedom of Information Act, 5 USC section 552 (a) (3), may be presented where agency's indexing system was such that 'the requested documents could not be identified by retracing a path already trodden. It would have required a wholly new enterprise, potentially requiring a search of every file in the possession of the agency'])" (id. at 250).

In my view, whether a request reasonably describes the records sought, as suggested by the Court of Appeals, may be dependent upon the terms of a request, as well as the nature of an agency's filing or record-keeping system. In Konigsberg, it appears that the agency was able to locate the records on the basis of an inmate's name and identification number.

Ms. Christine Brown

While I am unfamiliar with the recordkeeping systems of the District, to the extent that the records sought can be located with reasonable effort, I believe that the request would have met the requirement of reasonably describing the records. If the construction project is ongoing or recently completed, I would conjecture that one or more contractors were engaged to perform certain tasks, i.e., painting, supplying and installing flooring or windows, electrical work and the like. Assuming that District staff has the ability to locate records reflective of those expenditures, while it would not be required to prepare a total, I believe that it would be required to retrieve and disclose those records. Again, once in receipt of the records you could perform your own analysis or compilations.

In sum, insofar as your requests involve "documents" and District staff has the capacity to locate those records, staff, in my opinion, would be required to do so and disclose them in accordance with rights of access conferred by the Freedom of Information Law.

In an effort to enhance compliance with and understanding of the Freedom of Information Law, copies of this response will be forwarded to District officials.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Dear Mr. Sandino:

I have received your letter of May 27 in which you referred to two requests for records, one to the Office of the Suffolk County District Attorney, and the other to the Suffolk County Police Department. Although the receipt of the former was acknowledged, you were informed that a response "may be delayed appreciably"; no approximate date of response was given. There was no response with respect to the latter.

In this regard, the Freedom of Information Law provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies must respond to requests. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

"Each entity subject to the provisions of this article, within five business days of the receipt of a written request for a record reasonably described, shall make such record available to the person requesting it, deny such request in writing or furnish a written acknowledgement of the receipt of such request and a statement of the approximate date when such request will be granted or denied..."

If neither a response to a request nor an acknowledgement of the receipt of a request is given within five business days, if an agency acknowledged the receipt of a request but failed to approximate when the request will be granted or denied, or if an agency delays responding for an unreasonable time after it acknowledges that a request has been received, a request may, in my opinion, be considered to have been constructively denied. In such a circumstance, I believe that the denial may be appealed in accordance with §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law. That provision states in relevant part that:

Mr. Hernando Sandino

"...any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive, or governing body, who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

In addition, it has been held that when an appeal is made but a determination is not rendered within ten business days of the receipt of the appeal as required under §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, the appellant has exhausted his or her administrative remedies and may initiate a challenge to a constructive denial of access under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Rules [Floyd v. McGuire, 87 AD 2d 388, appeal dismissed 57 NY 2d 774 (1982)].

Dear Mr. Pitt:

I have received your letter June 17, which reached this office on June 29. Please note that the address of this office has changed. You have appealed a denial of access to a record by the Division of Parole.

In this regard, the Committee on Open Government is authorized to provide advice and opinions concerning the Freedom of Information Law. The Committee is not empowered to determine appeals or compel an agency to grant or deny access to records. The provision pertaining to the right to appeal is §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, which states in relevant part that:

"any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive or governing body of the entity, or the person thereof designated by such head, chief executive, or governing body, who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

For your information, the person designated by the Division to determine appeals is Terrence X. Tracy, Counsel to the Division.

Mr. James McCoy

Green Haven Correctional Facility
Drawer B
Stormville, NY 12582

Dear Mr. McCoy:

I have received your letter of May 26. You have sought assistance in obtaining records relating to your representation under the assigned counsel program.

In this regard, it is noted at the outset that the Freedom of Information Law pertains to agency records. Section 86(3) of that statute defines the term "agency" to mean:

"any state or municipal department, board, bureau, division, commission, committee, public authority, public corporation, council, office or other governmental entity performing a governmental or proprietary function for the state or any one or more municipalities thereof, except the judiciary or the state legislature."

As such, the Freedom of Information Law generally applies to records maintained by state and local government; it would not apply to a private organization.

The program to which you referred involves assignments under "Article 18-B", which encompasses §§722 to 722-f of the County Law. Under §722, the governing body of a county and the City Council in New York City are required to adopt plans for providing counsel to persons "who are financially unable to obtain counsel." Those plans may involve providing representation by a public defender, by a legal aid organization, through a bar association, or by means of a combination of the foregoing.

Mr. James McCoy

While I believe that the records of the governmental entity required to adopt a plan under Article 18-B are subject to the Freedom of Information Law, the records of an individual attorney or private organization performing services under Article 18-B may or may not be subject to the Freedom of Information Law, depending upon the nature of the plan. For instance, if a plan involves the services of a public defender, I believe that the records maintained by an office of public defender would fall within the scope of the Freedom of Information Law (see County Law, §716), for that office in my view would constitute an "agency" as defined in §86(3) of the Freedom of Information Law. However, if it involves services rendered by private attorneys or associations, those persons or entities would not in my view constitute agencies subject to the Freedom of Information Law.

A county bar association is not, in my opinion, an "agency" subject to the Freedom of Information Law. However, if, for example, a bar association maintains records for a county, I believe that they would constitute county records. The Freedom of Information Law pertains to all agency records, and §86(4) of that statute defines the term "record" expansively to include:

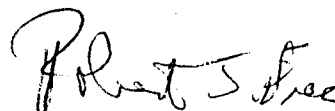

"any information kept, held, filed, produced, reproduced by, with or for an agency or the state legislature, in any physical form whatsoever including, but not limited to, reports, statements, examinations, memoranda, opinions, folders, files, books, manuals, pamphlets, forms, papers, designs, drawings, maps, photos, letters, microfilms, computer tapes or discs, rules, regulations or codes."

Based upon the language quoted above, documents need not be in the physical possession of an agency to constitute agency records; so long as they are produced, kept or filed for an agency, the courts have held they constitute "agency records", even if they are maintained apart from an agency's premises.

In sum, insofar as the records sought are maintained for an agency, I believe that the agency would be required to direct the custodian of the records to disclose them in accordance with the Freedom of Information Law, or obtain them in order to disclose them to you to the extent required by law.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Robert J. Freeman

The staff of the Committee on Open Government is authorized to issue advisory opinions. The ensuing staff advisory opinion is based solely upon the information presented in your correspondence.

Dear Mr. Cruz:

I have received your letter of May 27 in which you raised questions relating to the Freedom of Information Law.

You asked first whether "the Federal FOIA/PA [can] be used for State Agency, if the documentation in their possession is Federal in nature." In my view, the federal Freedom of Information and Privacy Acts pertain only to records maintained by federal agencies; records maintained by entities of state and local government in New York are subject to the New York Freedom of Information Law, irrespective of their origin and even if they are maintained pursuant to federal law [see Citizens for Alternatives to Animal Labs, Inc. v. Board of Trustees of the State University of New York, 92 NY2d 357 (1998)].

Second, unlike the federal Freedom of Information Act, there is no provision in the New York equivalent that pertains to fee waivers. Further, it has been held that an agency may charge its established fees, even when a request is made by indigent inmate [Whitehead v. Morgenthau, 552 NYS2d 518 (1990)].

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Mr. Melvin Bailey
93-A-2736
Greene Correctional Facility
P.O. Box 975
Coxsackie, NY 12051

Dear Mr. Bailey:

I have received your letter of June 1 in which you asked that this office "compel" the Rockland County District Attorney to provide you with free copies of various records that you consider to be germane to a federal court proceeding. It is your belief that the decision rendered by the Court of Appeals in Gould v. New York City Police Department [89 NY2d 267 (1996)] requires the disclosure of the records in question.

In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First, the Committee on Open Government is authorized to provide advice and opinions concerning the Freedom of Information Law. The Committee is not empowered to enforce that statute or to "compel" an agency to grant or deny access to records.

Second, the Freedom of Information Law is silent with respect to the waiver or reduction of fees for copies of records. It has been held that when records are requested under that statute, an agency may charge its established fees, even when a request is made by an indigent inmate [see Whitehead v. Morgenthau, 552 NYS2d 518 (1990)].

Next, while the decision to which you referred rejected the contention by the New York City Police Department that certain records, "DD5's", which are also known as "complaint follow up reports", could be withheld in their entirety on the ground that they consist of "intra-agency" materials pursuant to §87(2)(g) of the Freedom of Information Law.

thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law. Since I am unaware of the contents of all of the records in which you are interested, or the effects of their disclosure, I cannot offer specific guidance. Nevertheless, the following paragraphs will review the provisions that may be significant in determining rights of access to the records in question.

The Court in Gould focused on the ground for denial cited by the Police Department. That provision enables an agency to withhold records that:

"are inter-agency or intra-agency materials which are not:

- i. statistical or factual tabulations or data;
- ii. instructions to staff that affect the public;
- iii. final agency policy or determinations; or
- iv. external audits, including but not limited to audits performed by the comptroller and the federal government..."

It is noted that the language quoted above contains what in effect is a double negative. While inter-agency or intra-agency materials may be withheld, portions of such materials consisting of statistical or factual information, instructions to staff that affect the public, final agency policy or determinations or external audits must be made available, unless a different ground for denial could appropriately be asserted. Concurrently, those portions of inter-agency or intra-agency materials that are reflective of opinion, advice, recommendation and the like could in my view be withheld.

In its analysis of the matter, the decision states that:

"...we note that one court has suggested that complaint follow-up reports are exempt from disclosure because they constitute nonfinal intra-agency material, irrespective of whether the information contained in the reports is 'factual data' (see, Matter of Scott v. Chief Medical Examiner, 179 AD2d 443, 444, supra [citing Public Officers Law §87(2)(g)]. However, under a plain reading of §87(2)(g), the exemption for intra-agency material does not apply as long as the material falls within any one of the provision's four enumerated exceptions. Thus, intra-agency documents that contain 'statistical or factual tabulations or data' are subject to FOIL disclosure, whether or not embodied in a final agency policy or determination (see, Matter of Farbman & Sons v. New York City Health & Hosp. Corp., 62 NY2d 75, 83, supra; Matter of MacRae v. Dolce, 130 AD2d 577)..."

"Against this backdrop, we conclude that the complaint follow-up reports contain substantial factual information available pursuant to the provisions of FOIL. Sections of the report are devoted to such purely factual data as: the names, addresses, and physical descriptions of crime victims, witnesses, and perpetrators; a checklist that indicates whether the victims and witnesses have been interviewed and shown photos, whether crime scenes have been photographed and dusted for fingerprints, and whether neighborhood residents have been canvassed for information; and a blank space denominated 'details' in which the officer records the particulars of any action taken in connection with the investigation.

"However, the Police Department argues that any witness statements contained in the reports, in particular, are not 'factual' because there is no assurance of the statements' accuracy and reliability. We decline to read such a reliability requirement into the phrase 'factual data', as the dissent would have us do, and conclude that a witness statement constitutes factual data insofar as it embodies a factual account of the witness's observations. Such a statement, moreover, is far removed from the type of internal government exchange sought to be protected by the intra-agency exemption (see, Matter of Ingram v. Axelrod, 90 AD2d 568, 569 [ambulance records, list of interviews, and reports of interviews available under FOIL as 'factual data']). By contrast, any impressions, recommendations, or opinions recorded in the complaint follow-up report would not constitute factual data and would be exempt from disclosure. The holding herein is only that these reports are not categorically exempt as intra-agency material. Indeed, the Police Department is entitled to withhold complaint follow-up reports, or specific portions thereof, under any other applicable exemption, such as the law-enforcement exemption or the public-safety exemption, as long as the requisite particularized showing is made" [id., 276-277 (1996); emphasis added by the Court].

Based on the foregoing, the agency could not claim that the complaint reports can be withheld in their entirety on the ground that they constitute intra-agency materials. However, the Court was careful to point out that other grounds for denial might apply in consideration of those records, as well as others that you requested.

For instance, of potential significance is §87(2)(b) of the Freedom of Information Law, which permits an agency to withhold records or portions thereof when disclosure would constitute "an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy". That provision might be applicable relative to the deletion of identifying details in a variety of situations, i.e., where a record identifies a confidential source or a witness, for example.

Often the most relevant provision concerning access to records maintained by law enforcement agencies is §87(2)(e), which permits an agency to withhold records that:

"are compiled for law enforcement purposes and which, if disclosed, would:

- i. interfere with law enforcement investigations or judicial proceedings;
- ii. deprive a person of a right to a fair trial or impartial adjudication;
- iii. identify a confidential source or disclose confidential information relating to a criminal investigation; or
- iv. reveal criminal investigative techniques or procedures, except routine techniques and procedures."

In my view, the foregoing indicates that records compiled for law enforcement purposes can only be withheld to the extent that disclosure would result in the harmful effects described in sub- paragraphs (i) through (iv) of §87(2)(e).

Another possible ground for denial is §87(2)(f), which permits withholding to the extent that disclosure "would endanger the life or safety of any person". The capacity to withhold on that basis is dependent upon the facts and circumstances concerning an event.

Also relevant is the first ground for denial, §87(2)(a), which pertains to records that "are specifically exempted from disclosure by state or federal statute". One such statute, §190.25(4) of the Criminal Procedure Law deals with grand jury proceedings and provides in relevant part that:

"Grand jury proceedings are secret, and no grand juror, or other person specified in subdivision three of this section or section 215.70 of the penal law, may, except in the lawful discharge of his duties or upon written order of the court, disclose the nature or substance of any grand jury testimony, evidence, or any decision, result or other matter attending a grand jury proceeding."

As such, grand jury related records would be outside the scope of rights conferred by the Freedom of Information Law. Any disclosure of those records would be based upon a court order or perhaps a vehicle authorizing or requiring disclosure that is separate and distinct from the Freedom of Information Law.

Lastly, in a decision concerning a request for records maintained by the office of a district attorney that would ordinarily be exempted from disclosure under the Freedom of Information Law, it was held that "once the statements have been used in open court, they have lost their cloak of confidentiality and are available for inspection by a member of the public" [see Moore v. Santucci, 151 AD 2d 677, 679 (1989)]. Based upon that decision, it appears that records introduced into evidence or disclosed during a public judicial proceeding should be available.

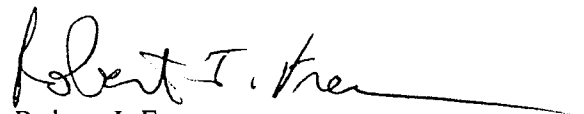

However, in the same decision, it was also found that:

"...if the petitioner or his attorney previously received a copy of the agency record pursuant to an alternative discovery device and currently possesses the copy, a court may uphold an agency's denial of the petitioner's request under the FOIL for a duplicate copy as academic. However, the burden of proof rests with the agency to demonstrate that the petitioner's specific requests are moot. The respondent's burden would be satisfied upon proof that a copy of the requested record was previously furnished to the petitioner or his counsel in the absence of any allegation, in evidentiary form, that the copy was no longer in existence. In the event the petitioner's request for a copy of a specific record is not moot, the agency must furnish another copy upon payment of the appropriate fee...unless the requested record falls squarely within the ambit of 1 of the 8 statutory exemptions" (id., 678).

The Court in Moore also specified that an agency "is not required to make available for inspection or copying any suppression hearing or trial transcripts of a witness' testimony in its possession, because the transcripts are court records, not agency records" (id. at 680).

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Robert J. Freeman

Dear Mr. Romer:

I have received your letter of May 28 in which you questioned the propriety of a response to a request for records of the Office of the New York County District Attorney. The request involves communications transmitted by employees of that agency to the New York State Department of Correctional Services, the Division of Parole or the Board of Parole.

While I am unaware of the contents of the records sought, the provision cited by the Records Access Officer for the District Attorney is pertinent. In this regard, I offer the following comments.

As a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law.

The provision cited in the denial of your request, §87(2)(g), involves communications between agencies, such as the Office of the District Attorney and the state agencies to which you referred. That provision permits an agency to withhold records that:

"are inter-agency or intra-agency materials which are not:

- i. statistical or factual tabulations or data;
- ii. instructions to staff that affect the public;
- iii. final agency policy or determinations; or

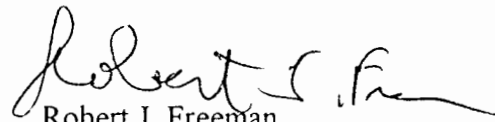

Mr. Steven J. Romer

iv. external audits, including but not limited to audits performed by the comptroller and the federal government..."

It is noted that the language quoted above contains what in effect is a double negative. While inter-agency or intra-agency materials may be withheld, portions of such materials consisting of statistical or factual information, instructions to staff that affect the public, final agency policy or determinations or external audits must be made available, unless a different ground for denial could appropriately be asserted. Concurrently, those portions of inter-agency or intra-agency materials that are reflective of opinion, advice, recommendation and the like could in my view be withheld.

I hope that the foregoing serves to enhance your understanding of the matter and that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

The staff of the Committee on Open Government is authorized to issue advisory opinions. The ensuing staff advisory opinion is based solely upon the information presented in your correspondence.

Dear Mr. Braxton:

I have received your letter of May 29 in which you sought guidance "on how [you] may obtain information contained, without discrimination, on 'The Five Percenters' within the Department of Correctional System, etc."

In this regard, it is unclear whether your interest involves obtaining records pertaining to particular individuals or those pertaining to the Five Percenters as a group. Nevertheless, in an effort to assist you I offer the following comments.

First, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law requires that an applicant "reasonably describe" the records sought. Therefore, a request should contain sufficient detail to enable agency staff to locate and identify the records.

Second, the regulations promulgated by the Department of Correctional Services indicate that a request for records kept at a facility should be made to the facility superintendent or his designee. A request for records maintained at the Department's central offices in Albany may be directed to Mr. Mark Shepard, Records Access Officer.

Third, in brief, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law.

If you are seeking records concerning specific individuals, it is likely that such a request could be denied on the ground that disclosure would result in "an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy" in accordance with §87(2)(b) of the Freedom of Information Law.

If you are seeking records concerning the Five Percenters generally, several provisions may be relevant.

Section 87(2)(g) pertains to communications between and among government officials and enables an agency to deny access to records that:

"are inter-agency or intra-agency materials which are not:

- i. statistical or factual tabulations or data;
- ii. instructions to staff that affect the public;
- iii. final agency policy or determinations; or
- iv. external audits, including but not limited to audits performed by the comptroller and the federal government..."

It is noted that the language quoted above contains what in effect is a double negative. While inter-agency or intra-agency materials may be withheld, portions of such materials consisting of statistical or factual information, instructions to staff that affect the public, final agency policy or determinations or external audits must be made available, unless a different ground for denial could appropriately be asserted. Concurrently, those portions of inter-agency or intra-agency materials that are reflective of opinion, advice, recommendation and the like could in my view be withheld.

Of possible significance is §87(2)(e), which authorizes an agency to withhold records that:

"are compiled for law enforcement purposes and which, if disclosed, would:

- i. interfere with law enforcement investigations or judicial proceedings;
- ii. deprive a person of a right to a fair trial or impartial adjudication;
- iii. identify a confidential source or disclose confidential information relating to a criminal investigation; or
- iv. reveal criminal investigative techniques or procedures, except routine techniques and procedures."

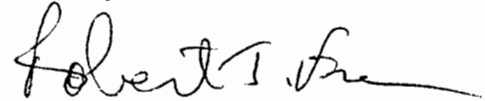

Only to the extent that the harmful effects of disclosure described in paragraphs in (i) through (iv) could §87(2)(e) properly be asserted.

Also potentially relevant is §87(2)(f), which permits an agency to withhold records insofar as disclosure "would endanger the life or safety of any person."

P.O. Box 1000
Lewisburg, PA 17837

Dear Mr. Cruz:

I have received your undated letter, which reached this office on June 3. You referred to an unanswered request for records maintained at the Rikers Island Correctional Facility and asked that this office obtain them for you.

In this regard, first, the Committee on Open Government is authorized to offer advice and opinions concerning the Freedom of Information Law. The Committee is not empowered to obtain records on behalf of an individual or to compel an agency to grant or deny access to records.

Second, I note that each agency is required to designate one or more persons as "records access officer." The records access officer has the duty of coordinating an agency's response to requests, and requests should generally be made to that person. While I believe that the person in receipt of your request should have responded in a manner consistent with law or forwarded the request to the records access officer, it is suggested that you resubmit your request to Thomas Antenen, Records Access Officer, Department of Correction, 60 Hudson Street, 6th Floor, New York, NY 10013.

For future reference, I point out that the Freedom of Information Law provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies must respond to requests. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

Mr. James Cruz

July 2, 1999

requesting it, deny such request in writing or furnish a written acknowledgement of the receipt of such request and a statement of the approximate date when such request will be granted or denied..."

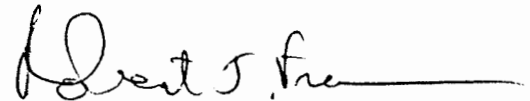

If neither a response to a request nor an acknowledgement of the receipt of a request is given within five business days, or if an agency delays responding for an unreasonable time after it acknowledges that a request has been received, a request may, in my opinion, be considered to have been constructively denied. In such a circumstance, I believe that the denial may be appealed in accordance with §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law. That provision states in relevant part that:

"...any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive, or governing body, who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

In addition, it has been held that when an appeal is made but a determination is not rendered within ten business days of the receipt of the appeal as required under §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, the appellant has exhausted his or her administrative remedies and may initiate a challenge to a constructive denial of access under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Rules [Floyd v. McGuire, 87 AD 2d 388, appeal dismissed 57 NY 2d 774 (1982)].

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Dear Mr. Vallen:

I have received your letter of May 28 in which you raised a series of questions concerning the Freedom of Information Law and access to certain records.

First, you asked whether New York is a "class A state", and whether a failure by an agency to respond to a request would enable you "take them to court of claims in A tort action." I am unfamiliar with the term "class A state." However, a failure to respond to a request would not give you the ability to initiate an action in the Court of Claims. However, I note that the Freedom of Information Law provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies must respond to requests for records. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

"Each entity subject to the provisions of this article, within five business days of the receipt of a written request for a record reasonably described, shall make such record available to the person requesting it, deny such request in writing or furnish a written acknowledgement of the receipt of such request and a statement of the approximate date when such request will be granted or denied..."

If neither a response to a request nor an acknowledgement of the receipt of a request is given within five business days, or if an agency delays responding for an unreasonable time after it acknowledges that a request has been received, a request may, in my opinion, be considered to have been constructively denied. In such a circumstance, I believe that the denial may be appealed in accordance with §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law. That provision states in relevant part that:

"...any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive, or governing body, who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

In addition, it has been held that when an appeal is made but a determination is not rendered within ten business days of the receipt of the appeal as required under §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, the appellant has exhausted his or her administrative remedies and may initiate a challenge to a constructive denial of access under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Rules [Floyd v. McGuire, 87 AD 2d 388, appeal dismissed 57 NY 2d 774 (1982)].

Second, you asked whether newspapers are "exempt from FOIA". The Freedom of Information Law pertains to agencies, and §86(3) of that statute defines the term "agency" to mean:

"any state or municipal department, board, bureau, division, commission, committee, public authority, public corporation, council, office or other governmental entity performing a governmental or proprietary function for the state or any one or more municipalities thereof, except the judiciary or the state legislature."

Based on the foregoing, the Freedom of Information Law generally applies to records maintained by entities of state and local government. Newspapers are not part of the government and are not subject to the Freedom of Information Law.

Lastly, with respect to mental health records, although the Freedom of Information Law provides broad rights of access, the first ground for denial, §87(2)(a), pertains to records that are "specifically exempted from disclosure by state or federal statute." One such statute is §33.13 of the Mental Hygiene Law, which generally requires that clinical records pertaining to persons receiving treatment in a mental hygiene facility be kept confidential.

However, §33.16 of the Mental Hygiene Law pertains specifically to access to mental health records by the subjects of the records. Under that statute, a patient may direct a request for inspection or copies of his or her mental health records to the "facility", as that term is defined in the Mental Hygiene Law, which maintains the records.

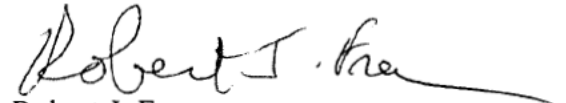

It is my understanding that mental health "satellite units" that operate within state correctional facilities are such "facilities" and are operated by the New York State Office of Mental Health. Further, I have been advised that requests by inmates for records of such "satellite units" pertaining to themselves may be directed to the Director of Sentenced Services, Bureau of Forensic Services, Office of Mental Health, 44 Holland Avenue, Albany, NY 12229. It is noted that under §33.16, there are certain limitations on rights of access.

Dear Mr. Hynard:

I have received your letter of May 29. You referred to a response of May 18 to your earlier inquiry and suggested that my interpretation of the matter was inaccurate and indicated that the records of your interest do not involve the conduct of correction officers. Rather, you wrote that you would like to gain access to an incident or similar report detailing injuries that you incurred when you were assaulted by inmates on separate occasions in 1996.

If your description of the records is accurate, two provisions of the Freedom of Information Law would appear to be pertinent.

As you may be aware, in brief, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law.

A report prepared by an agency employee would fall within §87(2)(g), which permits an agency to withhold records that:

"are inter-agency or intra-agency materials which are not:

- i. statistical or factual tabulations or data;
- ii. instructions to staff that affect the public;

Mr. Paul Hynard

July 2, 1999

Page -2-

- iii. final agency policy or determinations; or
- iv. external audits, including but not limited to audits performed by the comptroller and the federal government..."

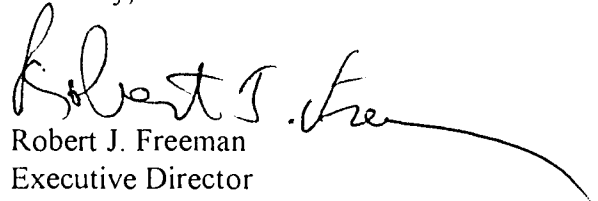

It is noted that the language quoted above contains what in effect is a double negative. While inter-agency or intra-agency materials may be withheld, portions of such materials consisting of statistical or factual information, instructions to staff that affect the public, final agency policy or determinations or external audits must be made available, unless a different ground for denial could appropriately be asserted. Concurrently, those portions of inter-agency or intra-agency materials that are reflective of opinion, advice, recommendation and the like could in my view be withheld.

In short, opinions or recommendations made by an agency employee could be withheld, but factual information contained within any such report would be available, unless a different ground for denial could be invoked.

The other ground for denial of possible significance, §87(2)(b), authorizes an agency to withhold records insofar as disclosure would constitute "an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy." While those portions of a report pertaining to you could not be withheld on that basis, details pertaining to persons other than yourself, such as medical information, might justifiably be denied.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

c/o Orangetown
26 Orangeburg road
Orangeburg, NY 10962

Dear Ms. Krumm:

I have received your letter of June 3 in which you questioned the "legality of charging fees for copies of documents pursuant to FOIL which is discriminatory." You wrote that the Town of Orangetown "does not charge fees for certain individuals and there is no written policy or resolution exempting anyone from paying the fee."

In this regard, as a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law does not distinguish among applicants for records, and it has been held that when records are accessible under the Freedom of Information Law, they should be made equally available to any person, without regard to one's status or interest [see Burke v. Yudelson, 51 AD2d 673 (1976)]. Therefore, I do not believe that an agency may ordinarily charge different fees to different people for copies of records sought under the Freedom of Information Law.

Notwithstanding the foregoing, I believe that it would be reasonable in some instances to essentially waive the fee for copying. For example, if a member of the news media is given a copy of a record for the purpose of disseminating information in a newspaper to the public, it may be in the public interest make the record available to that person in order to enhance the ability of the public to be informed. In that kind of situation, providing a copy of a record may be beneficial to the municipality and its residents.

Having discussed the matter with the Town Clerk, I was informed that records may be made available at no charge to the news media, not pursuant to or in conjunction with a request made under the Freedom of Information Law, but rather for the purpose of disseminating information to the public in a quick and efficient manner. In my view, making records available at no charge in that kind of context is reasonable.

Ms. Elena Ruth Sassower
Center for Judicial Accountability, Inc.
P.O. Box 69
Gedney Station
White Plains, NY 10605-0069

Dear Ms. Sassower:

I have received a copy of your letter of June 2 addressed to the Commission on Judicial Conduct in which you raised issues concerning the extent to which the Commission must comply with the Freedom of Information Law, particularly with respect to the preparation of a "subject matter list" pursuant to 87(3)(c) of that statute. At the end of that letter, you indicated that a copy was being sent to me in which you asked that this office:

"...ensure that the Commission's current 'subject matter list', as well as its promulgated rules, 22 NYCRR §7001.1 et seq., are in conformity with Article 6 of the Public Officers Law and its own Rule 1401.6 and, additionally, that the Committee render an advisory opinion as to whether the aforementioned 'records', to the extent they are maintained by the Commission, should, as [you] believe, be categorized by it in a 'subject matter list' conforming to the requirements of Article 6 and Rule 1401.6."

In this regard, first, the Committee on Open Government is authorized to advise with respect to the Freedom of Information Law; the Committee has no power to "ensure" that an agency complies with law.

Second, as you are aware, §87(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in relevant part that:

"Each agency shall maintain...

c. a reasonably detailed current list by subject matter, of all records in the possession of the agency, whether or not available under this article."

The "subject matter list" required to be maintained under §87(3)(c) is not, in my opinion, required to identify each and every record of an agency; rather I believe that it must refer, by category and in reasonable detail, to the kinds of records maintained by an agency. Further, the regulations promulgated by the Committee on Open Government state that such a list should be sufficiently detailed to enable an individual to identify a file category of the record or records in which that person may be interested [21 NYCRR 1401.6(b)]. I emphasize that §87(3)(c) does not require that an agency ascertain which among its records must be made available or may be withheld. Again, the Law states that the subject matter list must refer, in reasonable detail, to the kinds of records maintained by an agency, whether or not they are available.

Since the receipt of your correspondence, I have received a copies of a letter addressed to you on June 8 by Gerald Stern, Administrator and Counsel to the Commission on Judicial Conduct, and the Commission's "Index of Files". Based on my understanding of the Commissions's functions, the Index of Files appears to serve as an adequate subject matter list that fulfills the requirements of §87(3) of the Freedom of Information Law.

While Mr. Stern, acting on behalf of the Commission, appears to have taken action in a manner consistent with the spirit of the Freedom of Information Law, I emphasize that rights of access conferred by that statute do not, in my opinion, extend to records of the Commission. As suggested in an opinion addressed to you on May 24, 1995, pertinent to the Commission's records is §87(2)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law concerning records that "are specifically exempted from disclosure by state or federal statute." Section 45 of the Judiciary Law pertains to the Commission on Judicial Conduct and provides in relevant part that "...all complaints, correspondence, commission proceedings and transcripts thereof, other papers and data and records of the Commission shall be confidential and shall not be made available to any person except pursuant to article forty-four of this article." Due to the breadth of the language of §45, any rights of access to the Commission's records would be conferred by §44 of the Judiciary Law rather than the Freedom of Information Law. As such, although Mr. Stern has prepared a subject matter list in a manner consistent with the Freedom of Information Law, determining the extent to which the Commission's records must be disclosed involves the interpretation of §44 of the Judiciary Law and is outside the jurisdiction of this office.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Dear Ms. Meadows:

I have received your letter of June 5 in which you sought assistance in attempting to engage in "genealogical research" concerning your grandfather, who died in Brooklyn in 1968. You indicated that your grandfather's family is now deceased, with the exception of your mother and her children.

In this regard, although the Freedom of Information Law generally governs rights of access to government records, in this instance, a different statute determines those rights. Specifically, §4174(1)(a) of the Public Health Law, which pertains to access to death records, states that such records are available:

"(1) when a documented medical need has been demonstrated, (2) when a documented need to establish a legal right or claim has been demonstrated, (3) when needed for medical or scientific research approved by the commissioner, (4) when needed for statistical or epidemiological purposes approved by the commissioner, (5) upon specific request by municipal, state or federal agencies for statistical or official purposes, (6) upon specific request of the spouse, children, or parents of the deceased or the lawful representative of such persons, or (7) pursuant to the order of a court of competent jurisdiction on a showing of necessity; except no certified copy or certified transcript of a death record shall be subject to disclosure under article six of the public officers law..."

Article six of the Public Officers Law is the Freedom of Information Law. As such, based upon the provision quoted above, death records, when accessible, are available only under the circumstances prescribed in the Public Health Law. One of those circumstances pertains to a specific request by the children of a deceased. As such, I believe that your mother, the child of the deceased, would have the right to gain access to the death record at issue.

Ms. Margaret L. Meadows

Since Brooklyn is part of New York City, a request for the record of your interest should be directed to the Bureau of Vital Records, New York City Health Department, 125 Worth Street, New York, NY 10013. Any such request should include proof of the relationship with the deceased. In addition, having contacted that office on your behalf, I was informed that the fee for a copy is fifteen dollars.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Ms. Mary Ann Durantini

Dear Ms. Durantini:

I have received your letter of June 2, as well as the materials attached to it. You have sought an opinion concerning various events and practices relating to the implementation of the Open Meetings Law by the Board of Education and Superintendent of the East Syracuse-Minoa Central School District.

You referred initially to "an unposted meeting [held] solely to go into Executive Session and discuss the case of a Board member accused of threatening a coach." In this regard, even if the only topic to be considered could validly have been discussed during an executive session, I believe that the Board was required to provide notice in accordance with §104 of the Open Meetings Law. That provision states that:

- "1. Public notice of the time and place of a meeting scheduled at least one week prior thereto shall be given to the news media and shall be conspicuously posted in one or more designated public locations at least seventy-two hours before each meeting.
2. Public notice of the time and place of every other meeting shall be given, to the extent practicable, to the news media and shall be conspicuously posted in one or more designated public locations at a reasonable time prior thereto.
3. The public notice provided for by this section shall not be construed to require publication as a legal notice."

Stated differently, if a meeting is scheduled at least a week in advance, notice of the time and place must be given to the news media and to the public by means of posting in one or more designated public locations, not less than seventy-two hours prior to the meeting. If a meeting is scheduled less than a week in advance, again, notice of the time and place must be given to the news media and posted in the same manner as described above, "to the extent practicable", at a reasonable time prior to the meeting. Although the Open Meetings Law does not make reference to "special" or "emergency" meetings, if, for example, there is a need to convene quickly, the notice requirements can generally be met by telephoning the local news media and by posting notice in one or more designated locations.

It is unclear on the basis of the materials whether the Board voted during the executive session referenced above. Here I point out that, as general rule, a public body may take action during a properly convened executive session [see Open Meetings Law, §105(1)]. In the case of most public bodies, if action is taken during an executive session, minutes reflective of the action, the date and the vote must be recorded in minutes pursuant to §106(2) of the Law. If no action is taken, there is no requirement that minutes of the executive session be prepared. Various interpretations of the Education Law, §1708(3), however, indicate that, except in situations in which action during a closed session is permitted or required by statute, a school board cannot take action during an executive session [see United Teachers of Northport v. Northport Union Free School District, 50 AD 2d 897 (1975); Kursch et al. v. Board of Education, Union Free School District #1, Town of North Hempstead, Nassau County, 7 AD 2d 922 (1959); Sanna v. Lindenhurst, 107 Misc. 2d 267, modified 85 AD 2d 157, aff'd 58 NY 2d 626 (1982)]. Stated differently, based upon judicial interpretations of the Education Law, a school board generally cannot vote during an executive session, except in rare circumstances in which a statute permits or requires such a vote. In my view, based on its nature, the action should have been taken in public.

I note that in an "administrative memorandum" including agenda items for a meeting, an executive session was scheduled to discuss "personnel." As you may be aware, the phrase "executive session" is defined in §102(3) of the Open Meetings Law to mean a portion of an open meeting during which the public may be excluded. As such, an executive session is not separate and distinct from a meeting, but rather is a portion of an open meeting. The Law also contains a procedure that must be accomplished during an open meeting before an executive session may be held. Specifically, §105(1) states in relevant part that:

"Upon a majority vote of its total membership, taken in an open meeting pursuant to a motion identifying the general area or areas of the subject or subjects to be considered, a public body may conduct an executive session for the below enumerated purposes only..."

Based on the foregoing, it has been consistently advised that a public body, in a technical sense, cannot schedule or conduct an executive session in advance of a meeting, because a vote to enter into an executive session must be taken at an open meeting during which the executive session is held. In a decision involving the propriety of scheduling executive sessions prior to meetings, it was held that:

"The respondent Board prepared an agenda for each of the five designated regularly scheduled meetings in advance of the time that those meetings were to be held. Each agenda listed 'executive session' as an item of business to be undertaken at the meeting. The petitioner claims that this procedure violates the Open Meetings Law because under the provisions of Public Officers Law section 100[1] provides that a public body cannot schedule an executive session in advance of the open meeting. Section 100[1] provides that a public body may conduct an executive session only for certain enumerated purposes after a majority vote of the total membership taken at an open meeting has approved a motion to enter into such a session. Based upon this, it is apparent that petitioner is technically correct in asserting that the respondent cannot decide to enter into an executive session or schedule such a session in advance of a proper vote for the same at an open meeting" [Doolittle, Matter of v. Board of Education, Sup. Cty., Chemung Cty., July 21, 1981; note: the Open Meetings Law has been renumbered and §100 is now §105].

For the reasons expressed in the preceding commentary, a public body cannot in my view schedule an executive session in advance of a meeting. In short, because a vote to enter into an executive session must be made and carried by a majority vote of the total membership during an open meeting, technically, it cannot be known in advance of that vote that the motion will indeed be approved. However, as an alternative method of achieving the desired result that would comply with the letter of the law, rather than scheduling an executive session, the Superintendent or the Board on its agenda or notice of a meeting could refer to or schedule a motion to enter into executive session to discuss certain subjects.

Further, throughout the materials and your comments, the term "personnel" is used or cited frequently. In this regard, the term "personnel" does not appear in the Open Meetings Law, and that law does not forbid a public body from discussing personnel issues in public. Moreover, there are many personnel related issues that must be discussed in public. In short, I believe that the term is overused and misleading.

By way of background, the language of the so-called "personnel" exception, §105(1)(f) of the Open Meetings Law, is limited and precise. In terms of legislative history, as originally enacted, the provision in question permitted a public body to enter into an executive session to discuss:

"...the medical, financial, credit or employment history of any person or corporation, or matters leading to the appointment, employment, promotion, demotion, discipline, suspension, dismissal or removal of any person or corporation..."

Under the language quoted above, public bodies often convened executive sessions to discuss matters that dealt with "personnel" generally, tangentially, or in relation to policy concerns. However, the Committee consistently advised that the provision was intended largely to protect privacy and not to shield matters of policy under the guise of privacy.

To attempt to clarify the Law, the Committee recommended a series of amendments to the Open Meetings Law, several of which became effective on October 1, 1979. The recommendation made by the Committee regarding §105(1)(f) was enacted and states that a public body may enter into an executive session to discuss:

"...the medical, financial, credit or employment history of a particular person or corporation, or matters leading to the appointment, employment, promotion, demotion, discipline, suspension, dismissal or removal of a particular person or corporation..." (emphasis added).

Due to the insertion of the term "particular" in §105(1)(f), I believe that a discussion of "personnel" may be considered in an executive session only when the subject involves a particular person or persons, and only when at least one of the topics listed in §105(1)(f) is considered.

When issues involve the budget, it is possible that "personnel" may be impacted. However, those issues typically involve resources, needs and the allocation of public monies, rather than the performance of a particular employee. When that is so, even though the issue might involve personnel, there would be no basis for entry into executive session. If the issue pertains to the creation, retention or elimination of a position, again, the matter should be discussed in public, for it would not involve a particular person in terms of his or her performance, but rather the need or ability to carry out a certain function or meet a certain need.

Similarly, discussions regarding the election of officers generally do not fall within any of the grounds for entry into executive session. Although the discussion and election of officers involves consideration of particular individuals, it is unlikely that any of the specific subjects included within §105(1)(f) would be applicable in conjunction with deliberations involving the selection of school board officers. In short, while "matters leading to" certain actions relating to specific persons may be discussed during executive sessions, matters leading to the election of officers is not ordinarily among them.

Because the use of the term "personnel" is imprecise, it has been advised that a motion describing the subject to be discussed as "personnel" or "specific personnel matters" is inadequate, and that the motion should be based upon the specific language of §105(1)(f). For instance, a proper motion might be: "I move to enter into an executive session to discuss the employment history of a particular person (or persons)". Such a motion would not in my opinion have to identify the person or persons who may be the subject of a discussion. By means of the kind of motion suggested above, members of a public body and others in attendance would have the ability to know that there is a proper basis for entry into an executive session. Absent such detail, neither the members nor others may be able to determine whether the subject may properly be considered behind closed doors.

Further, the Appellate Division has confirmed the advice rendered by this office. In discussing §105(1)(f) in relation to a matter involving the establishment and functions of a position, the Court stated that:

"...the public body must identify the subject matter to be discussed (See, Public Officers Law § 105 [1]), and it is apparent that this must be accomplished with some degree of particularity, i.e., merely reciting the statutory language is insufficient (see, Daily Gazette Co. v Town Bd., Town of Cobleskill, 111 Misc 2d 303, 304-305). Additionally, the topics discussed during the executive session must remain within the exceptions enumerated in the statute (see generally, Matter of Plattsburgh Publ. Co., Div. of Ottaway Newspapers v City of Plattsburgh, 185 AD2d §18), and these exceptions, in turn, 'must be narrowly scrutinized, lest the article's clear mandate be thwarted by thinly veiled references to the areas delineated thereunder' (Weatherwax v Town of Stony Point, 97 AD2d 840, 841, quoting Daily Gazette Co. v Town Bd., Town of Cobleskill, supra, at 304; see, Matter of Orange County Publs., Div. of Ottaway Newspapers v County of Orange, 120 AD2d 596, lv dismissed 68 NY 2d 807).

"Applying these principles to the matter before us, it is apparent that the Board's stated purpose for entering into executive session, to wit, the discussion of a 'personnel issue', does not satisfy the requirements of Public Officers Law § 105 (1) (f). The statute itself requires, with respect to personnel matters, that the discussion involve the 'employment history of a particular person' (id. [emphasis supplied]). Although this does not mandate that the individual in question be identified by name, it does require that any motion to enter into executive session describe with some detail the nature of the proposed discussion (see, State Comm on Open Govt Adv Opn dated Apr. 6, 1993), and we reject respondents' assertion that the Board's reference to a 'personnel issue' is the functional equivalent of identifying 'a particular person'" [Gordon v. Village of Monticello, 620 NY 2d 573, 575; 207AD 2d 55, 58 (1994)]

It is emphasized that there is no provision of law that generally requires personnel records be kept confidential or that discussions involving personnel be considered only in executive session or kept private. Both the Open Meetings Law and the Freedom of Information Law are permissive. While the Open Meetings Law authorizes public bodies to conduct executive sessions in circumstances described in paragraphs (a) through (h) of §105(1), there is no requirement that an executive session be held even though a public body has right to do so. Further, the introductory language of §105(1), which prescribes a procedure that must be accomplished before an executive session may be held, clearly indicates that a public body "may" conduct an executive session only after having completed that procedure. If, for example, a motion is made to conduct an executive session for a valid reason, and the motion is not carried, the public body could either discuss the issue in public, or table the matter for discussion in the future. Similarly, although the Freedom of Information Law permits an agency to withhold records in accordance with the grounds for denial, it has been held by the Court of Appeals, the state's highest court, that the exceptions are permissive rather than mandatory, and that an agency may choose to disclose records even though the authority to withhold exists [Capital Newspapers v. Burns], 67 NY 2d 562, 567 (1986)].

Even when information might have been obtained during an executive session properly held or from records marked "confidential", I note that the term "confidential" in my view has a narrow and precise technical meaning. For records or information to be validly characterized as confidential, I believe that such a claim must be based upon a statute that specifically confers or requires confidentiality.

For instance, if a discussion by a board of education concerns a record pertaining to a particular student (i.e., in the case of consideration of disciplinary action, an educational program, an award, etc.), the discussion would have to occur in private and the record would have to be withheld insofar as public discussion or disclosure would identify the student. As you may be aware, the Family Educational Rights and Privacy Act (20 USC §1232g) generally prohibits an educational agency from disclosing education records or information derived from those records that are identifiable to a student, unless the parents of the student consent to disclosure. In the context of the Open Meetings Law, a discussion concerning a student would constitute a matter made confidential by federal law and would be exempted from the coverage of that statute [see Open Meetings Law, §108(3)]. In the context of the Freedom of Information Law, an education record would be specifically exempted from disclosure by statute in accordance with §87(2)(a). In both contexts, I believe that a board of education, its members and school district employees would be prohibited from disclosing, because a statute requires confidentiality. Again, however, no statute of which I am aware would confer or require confidentiality with respect to the matters described in your correspondence.

In a case in which the issue was whether discussions occurring during an executive session held by a school board could be considered "privileged", it was held that "there is no statutory provision that describes the matter dealt with at such a session as confidential or which in any way restricts the participants from disclosing what took place" (Runyon v. Board of Education, West Hempstead Union Free School District No. 27, Supreme Court, Nassau County, January 29, 1987).

While there may be no prohibition against disclosure of the information acquired during executive sessions or records that could be withheld, the foregoing is not intended to suggest such disclosures would be uniformly appropriate or ethical. Obviously, the purpose of an executive session is to enable members of public bodies to deliberate, to speak freely and to develop strategies in situations in which some degree of secrecy is permitted. Similarly, the grounds for withholding records under the Freedom of Information Law relate in most instances to the ability to prevent some sort of harm. In both cases, inappropriate disclosures could work against the interests of a public body as a whole and the public generally.

Also on the subject of "personnel", you wrote that the Superintendent:

"...refused to let residents speak or ask questions regarding the recent budget vote and Board member election. He, however, stood up to defend a Board member by name who sent out re-election campaign material to the parents of Special Education students in the district (see enclosed). Following the completion of the Board's regular business, the Board went into executive session to discuss 'personnel' issues that only certain Board members were previously informed of. During the executive session, Dr. Afton made Board members leave the session if any of the topics discussed involved that particular Board member or a spouse. This pertained to three Board members that night and the members have not been informed of what took place or was decided in their absence."

In conjunction with the foregoing, first, §105(2) of the Open Meetings Law states that:

"Attendance at an executive session shall be permitted to any member of the public body and any other persons authorized by the public body."

Based on the foregoing, the Superintendent would have had no authority to have "made Board members leave the session"; on the contrary, every member of the Board has the right to attend every executive session.

Second, while the Open Meetings Law clearly provides the public with the right "to observe the performance of public officials and attend and listen to the deliberations and decisions that go into the making of public policy" (see Open Meetings Law, §100), the Law is silent with respect to public participation. Consequently, by means of example, if a public body does not want to answer questions or permit the public to speak or otherwise participate at its meetings, I do not believe that it would be obliged to do so. On the other hand, a public body may choose to answer questions and permit public participation, and many do so. When a public body does permit the public to speak, I believe that it should do so based upon reasonable rules that treat members of the public equally.

Although public bodies have the right to adopt rules to govern their own proceedings (see e.g., Education Law, §1709), the courts have found in a variety of contexts that such rules must be reasonable. For example, although a board of education may "adopt by laws and rules for its government and operations", in a case in which a board's rule prohibited the use of tape recorders at its meetings, the Appellate Division found that the rule was unreasonable, stating that the authority to adopt rules "is not unbridled" and that "unreasonable rules will not be sanctioned" [see Mitchell v. Garden City Union Free School District, 113 AD 2d 924, 925 (1985)]. Similarly, if by rule, a public body chose to permit certain citizens to address it for ten minutes while permitting others to address it for three, or not at all, such a rule, in my view, would be unreasonable.

With regard to the information that you offered, there are federal court decisions indicating that if commentary is permitted within a certain subject area, negative commentary in the same area cannot be prohibited.

It has been held by the United States Supreme Court that a school board meeting in which the public may speak is a "limited" public forum, and that limited public fora involve "public property which the State has opened for use by the public as a place for expressive activity" [Perry Education Association v. Perry Local Educators' Association, 460 US 37, 103. S.Ct. 954 (1939); also see Baca v. Moreno Valley Unified School District, 936 F. Supp. 719 (1996)]. In Baca, a federal court invalidated a bylaw that "allows expression of two points of view (laudatory and neutral) while prohibiting a different point of view (negatively critical) on a particular subject matter (District employees' conduct or performance)" (id., 730). That prohibition "engenders discussion artificially geared toward praising (and maintaining) the status quo, thereby foreclosing meaningful public dialogue and ultimately, dynamic political change" [Leventhal v. Vista Unified School District, 973 F.Supp. 951, 960 (1997)]. In a decision rendered by the United States District Court, Eastern District of New York (1997 WL588876 E.D.N.Y.), Schuloff, v. Murphy, it was stated that:

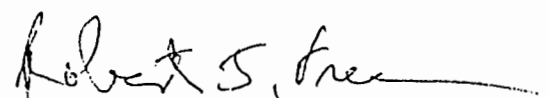

"In a traditional public forum, like a street or park, the government may enforce a content-based exclusion only if it is necessary to serve a compelling state interest and is narrowly drawn to achieve that end. Perry Educ. Ass'n., 460 U.S. at 45. A designated or 'limited' public forum is public property 'that the state has opened for use by the public as a place for expressive activity.' Id. So long as the government retains the facility open for speech, it is bound by the same standards that apply to a traditional public forum. Thus, any content-based prohibition must be narrowly drawn to effectuate a compelling state interest. Id. at 46."

The court in Schuloff determined that a "compelling state interest" involved the ability to protect students' privacy in an effort to comply with the Family Educational Rights Privacy Act, and that expressions of opinions concerning "the shortcomings" of a law school professor could not be restrained.

In short, if the Superintendent "defends" a Board member or employee during an open meeting, based on the decisions cited above, I do not believe that there can be a valid restriction on comments, whether neutral, positive or negative, regarding the same or other Board members or employees.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Robert J. Freeman

[REDACTED]

Dear Mr. Kackmeister:

I have received your letter of June 7 and the materials attached to it. You have sought guidance concerning your efforts in obtaining information from the Greece Central School District.

Having reviewed your requests, it appears that you misunderstand the Freedom of Information Law. I point out that the title of that statute may be somewhat misleading, for it is not a vehicle that requires agencies to provide information per se; rather, it requires agencies to disclose records to the extent provided by law. As such, while agency officials may choose to answer questions or to provide information by responding to questions, those steps would represent actions beyond the scope of the requirements of the Freedom of Information Law. Moreover, the Freedom of Information pertains to existing records. Section 89(3) of that statute states in part that an agency need not create a record in response to a request.

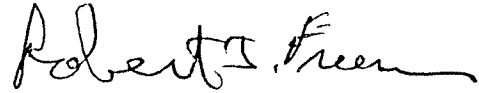

Therefore, District officials in my view would not be obliged to provide the information sought by answering questions or preparing new records in an effort to be responsive. For example, instead of asking "What's the total cost to renovate the board room", because there may be no record indicating a total cost, you might request records reflective of expenses incurred to renovate the board room.

In short, in the future, rather than seeking information or raising questions, it is suggested that you request existing records.

Ms. Victoria Szerko

[REDACTED]

Dear Ms. Szerko:

I have received your letter of June 9 in which you sought guidance concerning resistance on the part of the Village of Fleischmanns in making records available to you for inspection and copying.

The record at issue is the book containing assessment information, and you expressed interest in having copies of several pages. The Mayor indicated that you could not use the copy machine that is available to the Village, "because it does not take large pages." When you indicated that you "could copy each page in sections and then tape them together", the Mayor prohibited you from doing so, because, in your words, he said that you "might drop and tear the book in the process." You wrote further that "if [you] wanted a photocopy of the book then [you] could pay the village $375 to have the book sent out via bonded messenger to a facility that had photocopy equipment for copying large pages." You indicated that you would not pay that amount, but it was agreed that you could photograph the records. Nevertheless, you expressed concern that the Village would limit the use of photographic equipment and frustrate your efforts.

From my perspective, the Village is required to make photocopies on the machine that it generally uses and permit you to tape them together. In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First, the Freedom of Information Law includes a broad statement of legislative intent (§84) in which the State Legislature declared that "it is incumbent upon the state and its localities to extend public accountability wherever and whenever feasible." Access to the assessment roll is critical to many citizens, for review of its contents enables them to attempt to ascertain whether a government agency has treated them fairly in relationship to the value, and therefore, the taxation of their real property. Consequently, an agency is obliged by the Freedom of Information Law to make the contents of the assessment book readily accessible.

Second, §87(2) of the Freedom of Information Law requires that records accessible to the public as of right must be made available for inspection and copying, and §89(3) requires that an agency make copies of those records upon payment of the requisite fee. In my view, since the Village enjoys the use of a photocopier, if you ask that the book be copied in a manner that enables you to tape the pages together, the Village would be required to do so upon payment of the appropriate fee, which cannot exceed twenty-five cents per photocopy [see §87(1)(b)(iii)].

I note that the Freedom of Information Law, based on its language, its intent and its judicial interpretation, has been construed to require agencies to produce accessible information in the format of the applicant's choice, so long as the agency is able to do so and the applicant pays the requisite fee.

Illustrative of that principle is a case in which an applicant sought a database in a particular format, and even though the agency had the ability to generate the information in that format, it refused to make the database available in the format requested and offered to make available a printout. In holding that the agency was required to make the data available in the format requested and upon payment of a fee in accordance with §87(1)(b)(iii), the Court in Brownstone Publishers, Inc. v. New York City Department of Buildings unanimously held that:

"Public Officers Law [section] 87(2) provides that, 'Each agency shall...make available for public inspection and copying all records...' Section 86(4) includes in its definition of 'record', computer tapes or discs. The policy underlying the FOIL is 'to insure maximum public access to government records' (Matter of Scott, Sardano & Pomerantz v. Records Access Officer, 65 N.Y.2d 294, 296-297, 491 N.Y.S.2d 289, 480 N.E.2d 1071). Under the circumstances presented herein, it is clear that both the statute and its underlying policy require that the DOB comply with Brownstone's reasonable request to have the information, presently maintained in computer language, transferred onto computer tapes" [166 Ad 2d, 294, 295 (1990)].

In short, assuming that the records sought are available under the Freedom of Information Law, that they can be made available in the format in which an applicant requests it, and that the applicant is willing to pay the proper fee, I believe that an agency would be obliged to do so. In this instance, the issue does not involve advanced technology, but rather the capacity of the Village to make the records available by making more than one photocopy of a large sheet. Since it has the ability to do so, I believe that it is required to do so under the conditions specified in the preceding commentary.

In an effort to enhance compliance with and understanding of the Freedom of Information Law, copies of this opinion will be sent to Village officials.

Mr. Robert McKeown
96-R-7281
Collins Correctional Facility
P.O. Box 340
Collins, NY 14034-0340

Dear Mr. McKeown:

I have received your letter of July 6 in which you requested a variety of information relating to drug and alcohol treatment programs from this office pursuant to 5 USC 552.

In this regard, first, the statute to which you referred is the federal Freedom of Information Act, which applies only to records of federal agencies. The statute that generally governs rights of access to records of units of state and local government in New York is the Freedom of Information Law.

Second, the Committee on Open Government is authorized to provide advice concerning the Freedom of Information Law. The Committee does not have possession or control of records generally. In this instance, I cannot make the information of your interest available, because this office does not maintain it.

Third, and perhaps most importantly, the Freedom of Information Law pertains to existing records, and §89(3) of the Law states in part that an agency is not required to create a record in response to a request for information. Similarly, that statute does not require that agencies engage in legal research. By requesting the titles of federal acts that authorized grants of federal funds, you did not seek records, but rather asked that judgements be made concerning the applicability of certain laws to a particular issue. In my view, that would not be a request for records as envisioned by the Freedom of Information Law. Similarly, since you requested "totals" of federal funds granted to New York during certain fiscal years, if no totals exist, an agency would not be required to prepare new records containing totals on your behalf.

In the future, it is suggested that you request existing records in a manner consistent with the Freedom of Information Law. I note, too, that §89(3) of the Law also states that an applicant must "reasonably describe" the records sought. Therefore, a request should include sufficient detail to enable agency staff to locate and identify the records.

Mr. Robert McKeown

Gouverneur Correctional Facility
P. O. Box 480
Gouverneur, NY 13642

Dear Mr. Crosland:

I have received your letter of June 6, as well as the materials attached to it. As I understand the matter, the Division of Criminal Justice Services reviewed its records and determined that records pertaining to a certain indictment relating to you had been improperly sealed. As such, you were informed that the information associated with the indictment was unsealed by the court. You have questioned the constitutionality of the unsealing of the records at issue and sought assistance in obtaining the court order to unseal the records from the Division of Criminal Justice Services and the Office of the Kings County District Attorney.

In this regard, the Committee on Open Government is authorized to offer advice concerning public rights of access to records under the Freedom of Information Law. As such, this office has neither the jurisdiction nor the expertise to comment with respect to the constitutionality of the activities that you described, and my remarks will be limited to the issue of access to the court order.

In short, if either the Division of Criminal Justice Services or the Office of the District Attorney maintains a copy of the court order to unseal the records associated with the indictment, I believe that either, assuming that the record can be found, would be available. As general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law. From my perspective, none of the grounds for denial would serve to enable either agency to deny access to a copy of the order.

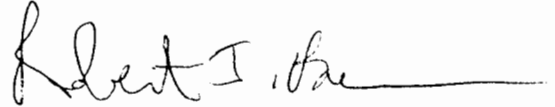

Mr. Shelton Crosland

It is possible, however, that either or both of the agencies might have received information or documentation indicating that an order had been issued to unseal the record, but not the order itself. In that event, the record sought would not be maintained by an agency, and the agency would not be obliged to obtain the record on your behalf.

Lastly, although the Freedom of Information Law excludes the courts from its coverage, clerks of courts are generally required by other provisions of law to make available records in their possession (see e.g., Judiciary Law, §255). Consequently, it is suggested that you seek a copy of the order from the clerk of the court in which the order was issued, citing an applicable provision of law as the basis for your request.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Ms. Evelyn Cris

[REDACTED]

Dear Ms. Cris:

I have received your letter of June 2 and the materials attached to it. You have raised questions concerning a petition seeking the dissolution of the Village of New Hyde Park and a request for a copy of a judicial decision rejected by the Village Clerk on the ground that "the document you request is not a public document on file in this office."

In this regard, the Committee on Open Government is authorized to provide advice and opinions concerning public access to government records, primarily under the Freedom of Information Law. Consequently, the following comments will be limited to matters involving access to the record that you requested.

First, it is emphasized that the Freedom of Information Law pertains to all agency records and that §86(4) of that statute defines the term "record" expansively to include:

"any information kept, held, filed, produced, reproduced by, with or for an agency or the state legislature, in any physical form whatsoever including, but not limited to, reports, statements, examinations, memoranda, opinions, folders, files, books, manuals, pamphlets, forms, papers, designs, drawings, maps, photos, letters, microfilms, computer tapes or discs, rules, regulations or codes."

Based upon the language quoted above, documents need not be in the physical possession of an agency to constitute agency records; so long as they are produced, kept or filed for an agency, the courts have held they constitute "agency records", even if they are maintained apart from an agency's premises.

Ms. Evelyn Cris

For instance, it has been found that records maintained by an attorney retained by an industrial development agency were subject to the Freedom of Information Law, even though an agency did not possess the records and the attorney's fees were paid by applicants before the agency. The Court determined that the fees were generated in his capacity as counsel to the agency, that the agency was his client, that "he comes under the authority of the Industrial Development Agency" and that, therefore, records of payment in his possession were subject to rights of access conferred by the Freedom of Information Law (see C.B. Smith v. County of Rensselaer, Supreme Court, Rensselaer County, May 13, 1993).

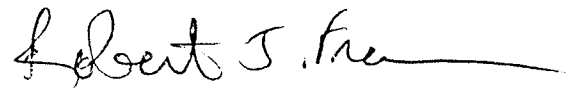

Additionally, in a decision rendered by the Court of Appeals, the state's highest court, it was found that materials received by a corporation providing services for a branch of the State University that were kept on behalf of the University constituted "records" falling within the coverage of the Freedom of Information Law. I point out that the Court rejected "SUNY's contention that disclosure turns on whether the requested information is in the physical possession of the agency", for such a view "ignores the plain language of the FOIL definition of 'records' as information kept or held 'by, with or for an agency'" [see Encore College Bookstores, Inc. v. Auxiliary Services Corporation of the State University of New York at Farmingdale, 87 NY 2d 410, 417 (1995)].

In sum, insofar as the records sought are maintained for the Village, by its attorney, for example, at his offices, I believe that the Village is required to direct the custodian of the records to disclose them in accordance with the Freedom of Information Law, or obtain them in order to disclose them to you to the extent required by law.

Second, in the alternative, although the Freedom of Information Law excludes the courts from its coverage, you may request the record in question from the clerk of the court pursuant to §255 of the Judiciary Law. That statute generally requires that clerks of courts search for and make available records in their possession.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Ms. CherylAnn Armeno, Secretary

P.O. Box 354
Fleischmanns, NY 12430

Dear Ms. Armeno:

I have received your letter of June 7 in which you referred to a suggestion by the Mayor of the Village of Fleischmanns that a policy could be adopted "limiting [y]our requests to two or three documents at a time and [you] would have to make multiple requests to get all the information that is needed."

In this regard, there is nothing in the Freedom of Information Law that enables an agency to limit the volume of a valid request for records. To make a valid request, an applicant may be required to seek records in writing and "reasonably describe" the records sought in accordance with §89(3) of the Law. In considering that standard, the State's highest court has found that requested records need not be "specifically designated", that to meet the standard, the terms of a request must be adequate to enable the agency to locate the records, and that an agency must "establish that 'the descriptions were insufficient for purposes of locating and identifying the documents sought'...before denying a FOIL request for reasons of overbreadth" [Konigsberg v. Coughlin, 68 NY 2d 245, 249 (1986)]. In Konigsberg, the request involved some 2,300 pages of material.

Similarly, in a case in which the court invalidated a rule established by a village, the matter involved the validity of a limitation regarding the time permitted to inspect records established pursuant to regulation. The Court held that the village was required to enable the public to inspect records during its regular business hours, stating that:

"...to the extent that Regulation 6 has been interpreted as permitting the Village Clerk to limit the hours during which public documents can be inspected to a period of time less than the business hours of the Clerk's office, it is violative of the Freedom of Information Law..."

[Murtha v. Leonard, 620 NYS 2d 101 (1994), 210 AD 2d 411].

In short, while a unit of government has the ability to adopt rules and procedures, they must be reasonable and consistent with law. As indicated in other correspondence with the Village, the Freedom of Information Law includes a broad statement of legislative intent, which indicates in part that agencies are required to make records available "wherever and whenever feasible" (see §84). In my view, limiting the ability of the public to a small number of records that could be requested at any one time would be unreasonable and inconsistent with the language of the Freedom of Information Law and its judicial interpretation.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Mr. Steven Marshall
95-a-8248
Coxsackie Correctional Facility
P.O. Box 999
Coxsackie, NY 12051-0999

Dear Mr. Marshall:

I have received your letter of June 2 in which you sought an advisory opinion concerning the applicability of the Freedom of Information Law to "agencys [sic] such as the Legal Aid Society, Criminal Defense Division."

In this regard, the Freedom of Information Law pertains to agency records, and §86(3) of that statute defines the term "agency" to mean:

"any state or municipal department, board, bureau, division, commission, committee, public authority, public corporation, council, office or other governmental entity performing a governmental or proprietary function for the state or any one or more municipalities thereof, except the judiciary or the state legislature."

Therefore, in general, the Freedom of Information Law is applicable to entities of state and local government.

It is my understanding the there are a variety of entities within New York that use the name "Legal Aid Society". Some are a part of the federal Legal Services Corporation, some may be private not-for profit corporations, and some may be parts of units of local government. While legal aid societies which are agencies of local government may be subject to the Freedom of Information Law, most are not "agencies" as that term is defined in the Freedom of Information Law and, as such, are not subject to that statute.

Mr. Steven Marshall

Page - 2 -

I am not fully familiar with the specific status of the Legal Aid Society in question. However, I believe that if it is a corporate entity separate and distinct from government, it would not be an "agency" subject to the Freedom of Information Law. It is suggested, however, that you attempt to ascertain whether the entity in question is private or governmental in nature.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

Mr. Carlos Davila
88-A-0096
Collins Correctional Facility
P.O. Box 340
Collins, NY 14034

Dear Mr. Davila:

I have received your letter of June 7 in which you asked that I review your requests for records and advise as to their adequacy.

In this regard, first, two of the statutes that you cited throughout the correspondence, 5 USC 552 and 552a, are, respectively, the federal Freedom of Information and Privacy Acts. Both apply only to federal agencies; neither would apply to the agencies to which your requests were directed.

It is also noted that while the federal Freedom of Information Act includes provisions concerning fee waivers, there are no similar provisions in the New York Freedom of Information Law. Moreover, it has been held that an agency may charge its established fee even if the applicant is an indigent inmate [see Whitehead v. Morgenthau, 552 NYS2d 518 (1990)].

Second, as you may be aware, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law.

Relevant to one of your requests is §87(2)(a), which provides that an agency may deny access to records or portions thereof that:

"are specifically exempted from disclosure by state or federal statute..."

Section 422 of the Social Services Law is a statute which pertains specifically to the statewide central register of child abuse and maltreatment and all reports and records included in the register. Subdivision (4)(A) of §422 states that reports of child abuse as well as information concerning those reports are confidential, and may be disclosed only under specified circumstances listed in that statute. Further, subdivision (7) of §422 states that:

"At any time, a subject of a report and other persons named in the report may receive, upon request, a copy of all information contained in the central register; provided, however, that the commissioner is authorized to prohibit the release of data that would identify the person who made the report or who cooperated in a subsequent investigation, or the agency, institution, organization, program or other entity where such person is employed or with which he is associated, which he reasonably finds will be detrimental to the safety or interests of such person."

Based on the foregoing, I believe that rights of access to the information contained in the child abuse register are governed by §422 of the Social Services Law rather than the Freedom of Information Law. Further, based upon §422(7), the Commissioner of the Department of Social Services or its successor agency may prohibit the disclosure of information that would identify a person who alleged that child abuse had occurred.

Third, it is noted that the Freedom of Information Law pertains to existing records, and that §89(3) of that statute provides in part that an agency is not required to create or prepare a record in response to a request. If, for example, there is no "list of agencies" that requested certain information, the Office of Children and Family Services would not be obliged to prepare a list on your behalf to comply with the Freedom of Information Law.

Lastly, the Freedom of Information Law provides direction concerning the time and manner in which agencies must respond to requests. Specifically, §89(3) of the Freedom of Information Law states in part that:

"Each entity subject to the provisions of this article, within five business days of the receipt of a written request for a record reasonably described, shall make such record available to the person requesting it, deny such request in writing or furnish a written acknowledgement of the receipt of such request and a statement of the approximate date when such request will be granted or denied..."

If neither a response to a request nor an acknowledgement of the receipt of a request is given within five business days, or if an agency delays responding for an unreasonable time after it acknowledges that a request has been received, a request may, in my opinion, be considered to have been constructively denied. In such a circumstance, I believe that the denial may be appealed in accordance with §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law. That provision states in relevant part that:

Mr. Carlos Davila

Page -3-

"...any person denied access to a record may within thirty days appeal in writing such denial to the head, chief executive, or governing body, who shall within ten business days of the receipt of such appeal fully explain in writing to the person requesting the record the reasons for further denial, or provide access to the record sought."

In addition, it has been held that when an appeal is made but a determination is not rendered within ten business days of the receipt of the appeal as required under §89(4)(a) of the Freedom of Information Law, the appellant has exhausted his or her administrative remedies and may initiate a challenge to a constructive denial of access under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Rules [Floyd v. McGuire, 87 AD 2d 388, appeal dismissed 57 NY 2d 774 (1982)].

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Sincerely,

The staff of the Committee on Open Government is authorized to issue advisory opinions. The ensuing staff advisory opinion is based solely upon the information presented in your correspondence.

Dear Mr. Jones:

I have received your letter of June 9. As I understand the situation, you have sought assistance in relation to your conviction in 1998 involving a matter that was dismissed in 1991.

In this regard, the Committee on Open Government is authorized to provide advice concerning public access to government records. The Committee cannot investigate, obtain records on behalf of an individual or represent that person in a proceeding. Nevertheless, I offer the following comments.

It appears that you may want to obtain the records relating to the 1991 dismissal in order to demonstrate that the conviction in 1998 may have been inconsistent with law. If that is so, the Freedom of Information Law would not govern your right to gain access to the records, and I believe that you would need a court order.

By way of background, as a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law.

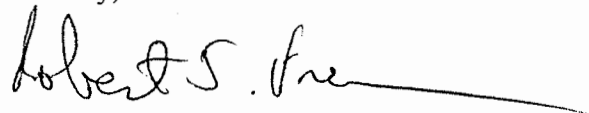

Relevant to the matter is the first ground for denial, §87(2)(a), which pertains to records that "are specifically exempted from disclosure by state or federal statute." One such statute is §160.50 of the Criminal Procedure Law. In brief, under that provision, when charges against an accused are dismissed in his favor, an order is made to seal the records. While you may have the ability to gain access to those records under subdivision (1)(d) of §160.50, I believe that you would need a court order to unseal the records. Under the circumstances, it is suggested that you confer with your attorney.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Dear Mr. Sydnor:

I have received your letter of June 3, and a later undated letter that reached this office on July 6. Both deal with unanswered requests made under the Freedom of Information Law to the court clerk in Orange County.

In this regard, it is emphasized that the Freedom of Information Law is applicable to agency records, and that §86(3) defines the term "agency" to include:

"any state or municipal department, board, bureau, division, commission, committee, public authority, public corporation, council, office or other governmental entity performing a governmental or proprietary function for the state or any one or more municipalities thereof, except the judiciary or the state legislature."

In turn, §86(1) defines the term "judiciary" to mean:

"the courts of the state, including any municipal or district court, whether or not of record."

Based on the provisions quoted above, the courts and court records are not subject to the Freedom of Information Law. This is not to suggest that court records are not generally available to the public, for other provisions of law (see e.g., Judiciary Law, §255) may grant broad public access to those records. Even though other statutes may deal with access to court records, the procedural provisions associated with the Freedom of Information Law (i.e., those involving the designation of a records access officer or the right to appeal a denial) would not ordinarily be applicable.

It is suggested that you resubmit your request to clerk of the court that maintains that records of your interest, citing an applicable provision of law as the basis for the request.

I hope that I have been of assistance.

Dear Messrs: Kemble and Lambert:

I have received your letter of June 4, as well as the materials attached to it. You have sought an advisory opinion "on whether the Griffiss Local Development Corporation is required to conform with the Open Meetings and Freedom of Information laws." You wrote that the issue has arisen due to "the contention by GLDC Executive Director Steve DiMeo and GLDC board Chairman Ralph Eannace, who is also Oneida County Executive, that the board is not subject to the law because is a not-for-profit corporation."

By way of background, according to its Certificate of Incorporation, the Griffiss Local Development Corporation (hereafter "GLDC"):

"...is a not-for-profit local development corporation organized under Section 1411 of the Not-for-Profit Corporation Law and operated exclusively for the charitable and public/quasi-public purposes of participating in the development and implementation of a comprehensive strategy to maintain, strengthen and expand the uses and viability of the former Griffiss Air Force Base..."

Mr. William J. Kemble
Mr. Thomas Lambert
July 14, 1999
Page -2-

You indicated that the Board of the GLDC consists of fifteen members, five of whom are appointed by the Governor, three by the Oneida County Legislature, three by the Mayor of the City of Rome, two by the Speaker of the Assembly and two by the Senate Majority Leader. In short, all of the members of the Board are designated by officials of state or local government.

In this regard, while I know of no judicial decision concerning the status of a local development corporation under the Open Meetings Law, the State's highest court has considered the matter under the Freedom of Information Law.

The Freedom of Information Law pertains to agencies, and §86(3) of that statute defines the term "agency" to mean:

"any state or municipal department, board, bureau, division, commission, committee, public authority, public corporation, council, office of other governmental entity performing a governmental or proprietary function for the state or any one or more municipalities thereof, except the judiciary or the state legislature" [§86(3)].

Specific reference is found in §1411 of the Not-for-Profit Corporation Law to local development corporations. The cited provision describes the purpose of those corporations and states in part that:

"it is hereby found, determined and declared that in carrying out said purposes and in exercising the powers conferred by paragraph (b) such corporations will be performing an essential governmental function."

Therefore, due to their status as not-for-profit corporations, it is not clear in every instance that every local development corporation is a governmental entity; however, it is clear that such a corporation performs a governmental function.

Relevant to your inquiry is a decision rendered by the Court of Appeals in which it was held that a particular not-for-profit local development corporation is an "agency" required to comply with the Freedom of Information Law [Buffalo News v. Buffalo Enterprise Development Corporation, 84 NY 2d 488 (1994)]. In so holding, the Court found that:

"The BEDC seeks to squeeze itself out of that broad multipurposed definition by relying principally on Federal precedents interpreting FOIL's counterpart, the Freedom of Information Act (5 U.S.C. §552). The BEDC principally pegs its argument for nondisclosure on the feature that an entity qualifies as an 'agency' only if there is substantial governmental control over its daily operations...The Buffalo News counters by arguing that the City of Buffalo is 'inextricably involved in the core planning and execution of the agency's [BEDC] program';

Mr. William J. Kemble
Mr. Thomas Lambert
July 14, 1999

thus the BEDC is a 'governmental entity' performing a governmental function of the City of Buffalo, within the statutory definition.

"The BEDC's purpose is undeniably governmental. It was created exclusively by and for the City of Buffalo to attract investment and stimulate growth in Buffalo's downtown and neighborhoods. As a city development agency, it is required to publicly disclose its annual budget. The budget is subject to a public hearing and is submitted with its annual audited financial statements to the City of Buffalo for review. Moreover, the BEDC describes itself in its financial reports and public brochure as an 'agent' of the City of Buffalo. In sum, the constricted construction urged by appellant BEDC would contradict the expansive public policy dictates underpinning FOIL. Thus, we reject appellant's arguments" (id., 492-493).

Since the entire membership of the GLDC Board is designated by government officials, it is clear in my view that there is "substantial governmental control" over GLDC's operations and, based on the decision rendered by the Court of Appeals, that it is an "agency" required to comply with the Freedom of Information Law.

If the GLDC is an agency that falls within the scope of the Freedom of Information Law, I believe that its board would also constitute a "public body" for purposes of the Open Meetings Law. Section 102(2) defines that phrase to mean:

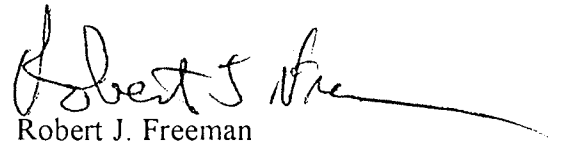

"...any entity for which a quorum is required in order to conduct public business and which consists of two or more members, performing a governmental function for the state or for an agency or department thereof, or for a public corporation as defined in section sixty-six of the general construction law, or committee or subcommittee or other similar body of such public body."

By breaking the definition into its components, I believe that each condition necessary to a finding that the board of the GLDC is a "public body" may be met. It is an entity for which a quorum is required pursuant to the provisions of the Not-for-Profit Corporation Law. It consists of more than two members. Further, based upon the language of § 1411(a) of the Not-for-Profit Corporation Law, which was quoted in part earlier, and the degree of governmental control exercised over the GLDC, I believe that it conducts public business and performs a governmental function for the state and several public corporations, in this instance, i.e., Oneida County, the Cities of Rome and Utica, and the Oneida County Industrial Development Agency.

Dear

As you are aware, I have received a variety of materials concerning a finding by the Committee on Professional Standards of the Third Judicial Department that you “failed to personally review documents compiled by another in order to respond to a FOIL request”, and that “[t]he steps taken by you were not adequate under the circumstances considering the sensitive nature of the information which could have been released.” The finding is part of a “formal letter of caution” issued pursuant to the rules of the Appellate Division, Third Department, and “constitutes an official finding of misconduct.” In conjunction with your right to seek reconsideration of the determination, you have sought my views on the matter.

By way of background, an inmate at the Clinton Correctional Facility submitted a request to an agency pursuant to the Freedom of Information Law for copies of records “which would show or tend to show the full names, titles, and salaries of each and every employee of your agency who is assigned to work at the Clinton Correctional Facility”, as well as “any licenses, certificates, registrations and/or other similar documents relating to each of the employees employed at the Clinton Correctional Facility.” When your opinion was sought concerning the duty to disclose the information sought, you advised, and properly so in my view, that it must be disclosed. However, soon thereafter, you were informed by a staff person at the facility that “some of the licenses and certificates (i.e., physician, nurse, social worker, psychologist) had the home addresses of the registrants”, and it was suggested that disclosure of the home addresses could “endanger the life and safety of staff.” Since you were unaware that the materials included home addresses, you asked that they be sent to you for review prior to any disclosure. Later, a representative of a public employee union contacted you and suggested that disclosure of the information in question, particularly home addresses, would constitute “a breach of confidentiality.” Following your examination of the records, you “preliminarily determined that it was appropriate to resolve any doubts in favor of denying access to certain information which could be used to identify staff (i.e., names, home addresses, certificate/license numbers, etc.)...” You then wrote to the applicant that “titles held by unnamed individuals” and an “indication of the licensure held and educational and professional training received by these unidentified persons” would be forwarded to him upon payment of the requisite fee. The applicant has apparently never responded, and no disclosure of any of the materials has been made.

From my perspective, much of the information sought would be accessible under the Freedom of Information Law to any person, and disclosure would not have represented a “breach of confidentiality", for there would have been no statutory bar to disclosure. Moreover, based upon the description of the records given to you, there would have been no need to personally inspect the records. Only after additional information was supplied would there have been any indication that the records would not be accessible in their entirety. In this regard, I offer the following comments.

First, as a general matter, the Freedom of Information Law is based upon a presumption of access. Stated differently, all records of an agency are available, except to the extent that records or portions thereof fall within one or more grounds for denial appearing in §87(2)(a) through (i) of the Law.

It is emphasized that the courts have consistently interpreted the Freedom of Information Law in a manner that fosters maximum access. As stated by the Court of Appeals twenty years ago:
