This is how Trump looks out for the people who voted for him

Trump says he will renegotiate NAFTA
BY JAMES HOHMANN
with Breanne Deppisch

THE BIG IDEA: Donald Trump said yesterday morning that his phone calls with the president of Mexico and the prime minister of Canada persuaded him to not withdraw from NAFTA. In fact, he had already made up his mind to stick with the agreement before either conversation.

It wasn't pleas from foreign leaders or CEOs that prompted the president to change his mind. It was a map of the United States that apparently proved decisive in the tug-of-war between the populists and the globalists inside the administration.

Newly-sworn-in Agriculture Secretary Sonny Perdue brought to the Oval Office an illustration of the areas that would be hardest hit if the U.S. pulled out of the compact, particularly in agriculture and manufacturing. It highlighted that many of those who would suffer from a trade war – especially exporters – live in “Trump country,” the counties that voted most overwhelmingly for him last November.

“It shows that I do have a very big farmer base, which is good,” Trump recalled in an interview with The Washington Post last night. “They like Trump, but I like them, and I’m going to help them.”

This was a master stroke by the former governor of Georgia, who clearly understands his new boss’s love for visuals.

“I was all set to terminate,” Trump explained in the Oval Office. “I looked forward to terminating. I was going to do it.” He turned to Jared Kushner, who was standing near his desk, and asked, “Was I ready to terminate NAFTA?” “Yeah,” his son-in-law replied.

That is one of many great details in The Post's story about Trump's sudden shift on the issue by Ashley Parker, Philip Rucker, Damian Paletta and Karen DeYoung. (Read the whole thing here.)

Trump had planned to make the dramatic announcement of his intention to withdraw during a prime-time rally on Saturday night in Harrisburg, Pennsylvania – on his 100th day in office, at the heart of a Rust Belt state that delivered him the White House and during the White House Correspondent's Dinner. His populist advisers had urged him to follow through on what was a central promise of his campaign. Chief strategist Stephen K. Bannon has had the words "NAFTA" and "April 29" written on a white board in his office.

But Trump's view changed once he thought about the politics differently. This is part of a pattern that has emerged clearly since January. In another interview yesterday, Trump dismissed questions about the split inside his White House between the nationalists and the globalists. "Hey, I'm a nationalist and a globalist," the president told the Wall Street Journal. "I'm both. And I'm the only one who makes the decision, believe me."

The first 100 days

-- Six months after his unexpected victory over Hillary Clinton, the president still brings up the election constantly in public and private settings.

Midway through a third interview yesterday, with Reuters, Trump was talking about Chinese President Xi Jinping when he paused to hand out copies of what he described as the latest figures from the 2016 electoral map. "Here, you can take that, that's the final map of the numbers," the Republican said from behind his desk. "It's pretty good, right? The red is obviously us." Trump had copies for each of the three Reuters reporters in the room.

The elites told Trump he could never win the presidency. He proved them all wrong. That created a false sense of confidence about his readiness to be commander-in-chief. He thought the people who said he couldn't change Washington were the same ones who said he couldn't win the election. He genuinely believed governing would be a lot like campaigning and that he could prove the haters wrong again.

"I thought it would be easier," Trump admitted to Reuters. "I loved my previous life. I had so many things going. This is more work than in my previous life."

The president has been refreshingly candid about his political education during various sit-downs with reporters in the run-up to Day 100.

"Making business decisions and buying buildings don't involve heart," Trump told Politico for a piece that posted yesterday. "This involves heart. These are heavy decisions." An unnamed White House official was quoted in the same piece saying, "I kind of pooh-poohed the experience stuff when I first got here. But this sh*t is hard."

-- As Trump tires to find his footing for the next chapter of his presidency, he is increasingly trying to show some deliverables for the coalition that elected him. He wants to reward his base for sticking with him even as his approval rating slipped into the low 40s. Sometimes, in the case of NAFTA, that might require breaking a promise.

One of the most persuasive arguments advisers can make to Trump is that something will benefit his voters. There's something deeply tribal about it.

Consider one element of the tax reform proposal he rolled out this week. Ending the deduction for state and local taxes, which allows individuals to subtract their home-state levies from their federal taxable income, would disproportionately hurt people who live in blue states and not make much difference for his voters in red states. "That move was a major shift for Mr. Trump, who (as a New Yorker) previously had called for capping deductions but not killing the break," the Wall Street Journal's Richard Rubin reports. "It would shift the tax burden from low-tax states such as Texas and Florida to high-tax states such as New York and New Jersey. ... Democrats mobilizing to defend the deduction are in the awkward position of standing up for a tax measure that helps some of the highest-income Americans—the same people they typically say don't pay enough in taxes."

This reflects a slight shift in the administration's posture since the failure of the health care bill last month. Trump was stung by all the stories about how the GOP's proposal would disproportionately hurt people in counties that backed him. He found himself on the defensive in a Fox News interview in mid-March when Tucker Carlson asked about it. "I know that, I know," Trump lamented. "It's very preliminary."

We also saw this dynamic at play with Trump's demand for money to construct the border wall. As I wrote in Tuesday's Big Idea, Trump knew he was very unlikely to get what he wanted but he made a show of threatening to shut down the federal government to reassure his core supporters that he's trying to follow through on what they elected him to do. As he told the Associated Press last Friday, "My base definitely wants the border wall. You've been to many of the rallies? The thing they want more than anything is the wall."

Trump addresses last year's NRA meeting in Louisville. (John Sommers II/Reuters)

-- Trump's speech this afternoon at the National Rifle Association's annual meeting in Atlanta is another illustration of how he's looking to reward his core supporters. He will be the first sitting president to address the convention since Ronald Reagan did more than three decades ago. "The NRA has been a muscular force in American politics for decades. But last year it spent more for Trump than any outside group and began its efforts earlier than in any other presidential cycle," Tom Hamburger, John Wagner and Rosalind S. Helderman report. "A comparison ... of ad spending between 2012 and 2016 found that the gun rights organization spent more than three times as much money to assist Trump as it spent backing ... Mitt Romney in 2012, airing 4.5 times as many individual ads." A very strong case can be made that the president wouldn't have carried Pennsylvania without NRA air cover.

The group's big bet paid off. It already got more than its money's worth when Trump put Neil Gorsuch on the Supreme Court. "The organization also got an early win when Trump signed legislation repealing an Obama administration regulation that sought to block gun purchases by certain people who are unable to administer their own financial affairs," Tom, John and Ros note. "In the months ahead, the NRA will be looking for Trump to put his weight behind a bill in Congress that would make concealed-carry permits valid in states other than those in which they were issued. Trump endorsed the concept during the campaign, likening it to the portability of driver's licenses. Also high on the NRA's agenda is the Hearing Protection Act, which would remove federal registration and identification requirements for those seeking gun silencers. That measure has been touted by the president's son, Donald Trump Jr., an avid hunter."

WHILE YOU WERE SLEEPING:

-- America's gross domestic product, a broad measure of economic growth, grew by just 0.7 percent in the first three months of the year, according to government data issued this morning, an estimate economists say is more likely due to measurement error than Trump's performance as president. "Most economists had been expecting a lackluster growth report for the first quarter, with analysts surveyed by Reuters predicting the figure would be around 1.2 percent," Ana Swanson and Max Ehrenfreund report. "But some expected more disappointing results, like the Atlanta Federal Reserve, which projected growth of just 0.2 percent. Consumers spent more in the first quarter, according to the report, but reduced spending at all levels of government brought down the official estimate. So did a strong dollar, which reduced exports and increased imports."

-- House Republicans delayed a vote to rewrite parts of the Affordable Care Act, denying the Trump administration a critical victory after a late push to act on health care threatened the bipartisan deal to fund the government. Kelsey Snell and Paul Kane report: "The failure of Republicans to unite behind the new health-care measure was a blow to White House officials, who were eager to see a vote ahead of [Trump's] 100-day mark. Congressional leaders were more focused this week on securing a spending agreement ... It was also evidence of just how divided Republicans are about how to overhaul Obamacare, despite seven years of GOP promises to repeal and replace the 2010 law. Conservatives and moderates have repeatedly clashed over the contours of such a revamp, most sharply over bringing down insurance premiums in exchange for limiting the kind of coverage that is required to be offered." As many as 15 or so House Republicans publicly said they will not support the latest proposal; crafted among the White House, the House Freedom Caucus, and a leading moderate lawmaker. That leaves Paul Ryan and the Trump administration with an incredibly narrow path for passage. Ryan is only able to lose 22 Republicans on the vote.

-- Arkansas executed a death-row inmate late last night with the state's fourth lethal injection in eight days, concluding a frenetic schedule that authorities said was "necessary" to avoid expiration of one of their lethal injection drugs. Mark Berman reports: "Court orders ultimately blocked half of the scheduled lethal injections, including a second that had also been scheduled for Thursday night, even as the state was able to resume executions for the first time in more than a decade. The execution of Kenneth Williams, who was convicted of killing a man he fatally shot after escaping from a prison where he was serving a life sentence for another killing, came after his attorneys appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court, arguing that he was intellectually disabled and not fit to be executed. Relatives of another of Williams' victims ... also pleaded for his life, asking the governor to call off his execution." Still, these pleas went unanswered, and Williams was executed late Thursday and pronounced dead at 11:05 p.m.

An AP reporter who witnessed his execution said he lurched and convulsed 20 times before he died. Williams's attorney said accounts of the execution are "horrifying" and requested a full investigation into what happened.

ESCALATION ON KOREA:

- A new North Korean propaganda video shows simulated attacks on the U.S. and declares that "the enemy to be destroyed is in our sights." It shows photos of the White House and aircraft carriers with a target on them – as if they are in the cross-hairs – before panning to simulated footage of an aircraft carrier exploding into flames. A final caption reads: "When the enemy takes the first step toward provocation and invasion." (Anna Fifield)
- "There is a chance that we could end up having a major, major conflict with North Korea. Absolutely," Trump told Reuters yesterday. "We'd love to solve things diplomatically, but it's very difficult." Trump, asked if he considered North Korean leader Kim Jong Un to be rational, said he was operating from the assumption that he is rational: "He's 27 years old. His father dies, took over a regime. So say what you want but that is not easy, especially at that age. I'm not giving him credit or not giving him credit, I'm just saying that's a very hard thing to do. As to whether or not he's rational, I have no opinion on it. I hope he's rational." (Aaron Blake analyzes the comments on The Fix.)

-- Rex Tillerson said yesterday that the Trump administration is willing to bargain directly with North Korea over ending its nuclear weapons program, an apparent shift in policy aimed at strengthening international resolve. Ann Gearan reports: "Obviously, that will be the way we would like to solve this," Tillerson said in an interview with NPR scheduled to air [today] ... 'But North Korea has to decide they're ready to talk to us about the right agenda, and the right agenda is not simply stopping where they are for a few more months or a few more years and then resuming things. That's been the agenda for the last 20 years.' It is not fully clear what that means, but in the NPR interview and another Thursday with Fox News, Tillerson began to sketch a diplomatic approach for the new administration that focuses on international pressure and leveraging China's economic power over its impoverished ally. At issue is the simultaneous effort in North Korea to perfect a nuclear warhead that could be delivered far from its shores and to develop missiles with a range long enough to be a threat to the United States. Undeterred, North Korea could have that capability within a few years — likely during [Trump's] first term in office."

-- Meanwhile, Trump threatened to terminate the U.S. trade agreement with South Korea during his interview with The Post night, saying the five-year accord with Seoul was a "horrible deal" and "a Hillary Clinton disaster" that has left America "destroyed." Philip Rucker reports: "During an Oval Office interview about trade policy in North America, Trump served notice that he is looking to disrupt an important partnership in the tumultuous Asia-Pacific region as well — even with Seoul on edge because of North Korea's escalating military provocations. Trump sharply criticized the U.S.-Korea Free Trade Agreement, known as Korus, the latest version of which was ratified in 2011. 'It's a horrible deal. It was a Hillary Clinton disaster, a deal that should've never been made,' Trump said ... 'It's a one-way street.' South Korea is the United States' sixth-largest goods trade partner, and the U.S. goods trade deficit with Korea was $27.7 billion last year, according to the Office of the U.S. Trade Representative. Next week marks an anniversary for Korus and triggers a review period to potentially renegotiate or ratify a new version of the agreement. 'We've told them that we'll either terminate or negotiate,' Trump said. 'We may terminate.'"

FOGGY BOTTOM WATCH:

-- The State Department wants to rein in U.N. Ambassador Nikki Haley. "She has often been the first, most outspoken member of the Trump administration to weigh in on key foreign policy issues, on everything from military strikes on Syria to sanctions against Russia," the New York Times reports. "Much of that has come as a surprise to the State Department, and [Tillerson] has often been far from the limelight. Now, in an apparent attempt to foster greater coherence in American foreign policy, State Department officials are urging her aides to ensure her public remarks are cleared by Washington first. An email drafted by State Department diplomats urged Ms. Haley's office to rely on 'building blocks' written by the department to prepare her remarks. Her comments should be 're-cleared with Washington if they are substantively different from the building blocks, or if they are on a high-profile issue such as Syria, Iran, Israel-Palestine, or the D.P.R.K.," added the email." The request underlines the vastly contrasting styles of the Trump administration's two top diplomats, Haley and Tillerson, who, who will appear together today the first time at a U.N. Security Council meeting devoted to North Korea.

FOX NEWS INTRIGUE:

-- The Justice Department's investigation of Fox News has widened to include a second law-enforcement agency, the U.S. Postal Inspection Service. CNN's Brian Stelter reports: "Financial crimes experts from the United States Postal Inspection Service are now involved, according to four sources connected to the investigation. Mail fraud and wire fraud cases are part of the USPIS purview. Investigators from both the USPIS and the Justice Department have been conducting interviews in recent weeks -- including with some former Fox staffers -- to obtain more information about the network's managers and business practices."

-- New York Magazine, "Is a Management Shake-up Looming at Fox News?," by Gabriel Sherman: "As Fox News is roiled by lawsuits and the ouster of Bill O'Reilly, the network's co-president Bill Shine has retained the backing of the Murdochs. On Monday, Rupert Murdoch took network co-presidents Shine and Jack Abernethy to lunch at Marea, a seafood restaurant near Fox's midtown headquarters — a highly public show of support. But privately, Shine is expressing concern about his future at the network. According to three sources briefed on the conversations, Shine has told friends he recently asked Rupert's sons James and Lachlan ... to release a statement in support of him, but they refused to do so. The sources said Shine made the request because of withering press coverage of Fox News in recent weeks. A source added that Shine has privately complained that Rupert 'isn't fighting for him' in the press, which is why he wanted explicit support from the sons."

-- Bloomberg Businessweek, "And Then There Was Hannity," by Felix Gillette: "During commercial breaks on his Fox News program, Sean Hannity likes to wing around a football with anyone in the vicinity of his desk. At roughly 6 feet tall, with broad shoulders and a substantial noggin reminiscent of late-empire Roman statuary, Hannity, 55, is a sporty guy. With big personalities, eight-figure salaries, and zero-sum competition for airtime, cable news is particularly well-suited to braggadocio—and in Hannity's case, it can go a bit past bragging. In the Fox News studio one evening in October ... Hannity pulled out a gun. [Around that time, he pulled a martial arts move on his producer at a bar – who then bit him on the arm]. Internal jockeying, playful and otherwise, has been good for Hannity lately. As for the rest of Fox News, the past year or so has been ... chaos. But at a time when the company badly needs someone to steady the organization, Hannity, with his mind-meld connection to the White House and his deep, abiding connection to the Fox News brand, is the alpha anchor right now." "Hannity's experiencing a renaissance," says media historian Brian Rosenwald. "It's his network now."

VERMONT INTRIGUE:

-- "The Justice Department was investigating the activities of the now-defunct Burlington College as recently as February, according to emails obtained through a public records request," VTDigger's Morgan True reports. "The emails show the U.S. attorney for Vermont and an FBI agent reviewed Burlington College records in the state's possession earlier this year pursuant to an investigation. Both enforcement agencies declined to comment on the substance of that probe or whether it has been completed. The chair of the Burlington College board of trustees said Thursday that the FBI investigation has been going for more than a year, and at least one former school employee was subpoenaed as part of the probe.”

Jane Sanders, Bernie’s wife, is the former president of the college, and many blame her for driving the school into insolvency: “(She) overstated donation amounts in a bank application for a $6.7 million loan the college used to purchase a prime 33-acre property on Lake Champlain in 2010. She told People’s United Bank in 2010 that the college had $2.6 million in pledged donations to support the purchase of the former Roman Catholic Diocese of Burlington property. The college, however, received only $676,000 in actual donations from 2010 through 2014, according to figures provided by Burlington College. Two people whose pledges are listed as confirmed in the loan agreement told VTDigger that their personal financial records show their pledges were overstated. Neither was aware the pledges were used to secure the loan.”

Mrs. Sanders did not respond to a request for comment from VTDigger yesterday asking whether she was subpoenaed or otherwise contacted by the FBI or the U.S. attorney in relation to her time as president of the college.

THE AGENDA:

-- Trump will reverse an Obama-era restriction on oil and gas drilling in the Arctic and Atlantic oceans today. Juliet Eilperin and Brady Dennis report: “Several industry officials and experts predict that oil and gas firms will bid on areas the administration plans to open to drilling, including those off the East Coast. But the targeted Arctic areas are much less attractive to investors right now, and even potential drilling in the Atlantic could be complicated by long-standing resistance from coastal communities. Jason Bordoff ... [a] former Obama energy and environment adviser, said that while the Trump administration can rescind the former president’s efforts ... that process would be complex and involve at least two years of revamping the government’s long-term drilling plans. ‘The question then is, does anybody show up, and does anybody want these [leases]?’ Bordoff said. ‘It depends quite a bit on what the oil market looks like in two years.’ If it looks anything like it does today, with low oil prices and most industry growth taking place onshore, Trump’s new policy might have little practical effect.”

-- The Senate confirmed former U.S. attorney Alexander Acosta as labor secretary last night, voting 60 to 38 to approve his nomination. Jonnelle Marte: “Acosta, 48, will have to move quickly to take action regarding major policies that have been in limbo while the department has been without leadership for the past three months, including a rule that sets limits on the investment advice given to retirement savers and another that expands the number of workers eligible for overtime pay.” Acosta, a Cuban American from Miami, is also the only Latino in Trump’s Cabinet.

-- Worst spin of the day: Sean Spicer blamed the Obama administration for signing off on Michael Flynn’s security clearance, suggesting that Trump’s predecessor – who did not make Flynn his national security adviser – bears responsibility if he was inadequately vetted. “His clearance was last reissued by the Obama administration in 2016 with full knowledge of his activities that occurred in 2015,” Spicer said, responding to a reporter’s question about Flynn possibly breaking federal law by accepting foreign funds for a trip to Russia in 2015. “All of that clearance was made during the Obama administration and apparently with knowledge of the trip that he took, so that’s how the process works, and I welcome the Department of Defense’s review.” (HuffPost)

THE TRUMP MILIEU:

-- "Funeral directors book Trump hotel -- along with Trump ally Newt Gingrich -- for PAC fundraiser," by Amy Brittain: "Funeral directors from across the country have flocked to Washington for their annual advocacy summit - an event that includes a visit to Capitol Hill, a trip to Arlington Cemetery and lobbying on issues related to burials. But this year's gathering comes with a new, high-profile ticket: an evening at the Trump International Hotel alongside one of [Trump's] most steadfast allies, former House speaker Newt Gingrich. A happy-hour reception, a formal dinner and a keynote address from Gingrich are on the agenda for the gathering Thursday. ... Two tiers of tickets are for sale: $99 for the reception or $200 for the entire event."

-- Politico, "Lewandowski's firm appears to offer Trump meetings," by Ken Vogel and Josh Dawsey: "A firm co-founded by Trump's original campaign manager Corey Lewandowski appears to have been pitching clients around the world by offering not only policy and political advice, but also face time with President Trump, Vice President Mike Pence and senior members of their administration, according to documents and interviews. A document provided to an Eastern European politician by an international consulting firm that Lewandowski co-founded this year promises to arrange 'meetings with well-established figures,' including Trump, Pence, 'key members of the U.S. Administration,' and outside Trump allies. The previously unreported firm, Washington East West Political Strategies, was created by Lewandowski and fellow Trump campaign veteran Barry Bennett — as well as an Azerbaijani oil executive and an American political consultant who works extensively in Russia — to prospect for political business in Eastern Europe. And Lewandowski and Bennett have created different firms with other partners to prospect in the Middle East, Canada and Central America, Bennett said."

"People who are familiar with Lewandowski's pitch to potential clients" told Politico that he has pledged that he would personally call Trump or his cabinet members if necessary on behalf of prospective Avenue Strategies' clients. "Yet Lewandowski has not formally registered as a lobbyist."

-- A restaurant in Trump's SoHo hotel says it will close this year after sales have dropped in the wake of Trump's victory. Patch's Ciara McCarthy: "Koi, a sushi restaurant located within Trump SoHo, will reportedly shut its doors in June because sales have dropped so dramatically. The upscale Asian-fusion chain, a celebrity favorite, has other locations in LA, Las Vegas, Bangkok, Abu Dhabi, and Bryant Park. Suzanne Chou, the Koi Group's general counsel, told Grub Street that the restaurant had seen business drop since Trump's election in November. 'Obviously, the restaurant is closing because business is down,' Chou told Grub Street. 'Beyond that, I would prefer not to speculate as to why, but obviously since the election it's gone down.' Grubstreet also spoke with Jonathan Grullon, a busser and a host at Koi's SoHo location. 'Before Trump won we were doing great. There were a lot of people we had, our regulars, who'd go to the hotel but are not affiliated with Trump,' Grullon told Grub Street. 'And they were saying if he wins, we are not coming here anymore.'"

PROXIMITY IS POWER – Two good stories from BuzzFeed:

-- An admitted fraudster who owes hundreds of thousands of dollars to his victims has had access to Trump through his wife – a Mar-a-Lago guest manager so familiar among members that she has earned a fond nickname of the club's "house mother." Tarini Parti reports: "The tale of the Rinkus couple — one a repeat felon and the other a Trump employee who interacts regularly with top government officials — raises the curtain on the way Trump's sprawling business holdings can sweep minor figures into his political orbit. For a man with a serious criminal record, Ari Rinkus has been in remarkably close proximity to the president. He has parlayed that access — and the perception of access — to his own advantage, sources said, while pursuing potentially lucrative government contracts on behalf of a foreign company. As he sipped his vodka soda, Rinkus mentioned that his wife was busy setting up for the president's historic upcoming meeting with [Chinese President Xi]. Rinkus frequently name-drops the president, members of the first family, and top White House staff, people who know him said. He recently had dinner with ... Eric and Lara Trump — 'salt of the earth,' he said. Ivanka Trump? 'She's just like her father.' And Don Jr.? 'He's a family-focused man.' He knows them all, he stressed."

-- "The Hungarian Rise And Fall Of Sebastian Gorka," by Mitch Prothero: "Sebastian Gorka ... failed his way upwards to the White House, having been denied security clearance to work in the Hungarian parliament, defeated in a local mayoral race in the 2000s, and widely dismissed as an opportunist. Gorka has been widely criticised for his lack of qualifications and connections with fringe political groups since joining the Trump administration. But, back in Hungary in the 2000s, he wasn't seen as an extremist, but instead a self-promoter, who exaggerated claims about his past, including his work for the British intelligence services. 'Sebastian Gorka is not a Nazi or a security threat because he is some sort of secret British agent,' said a member of the Hungarian counter intelligence service ... 'Gorka is, how do you say in English — a peddler of snake oil.' It seems to be easier to rise in the Trump White House than it was in the newly free Hungarian government at the turn of the century ... [and] Gorka's rise offers a glimpse at how permeable the top strata of American power is in the age of Trump."

Kassam says he is overseeing Breitbart's efforts to grow across Europe and into Canada and Australia. (Andy Wigmore)

THE NEW WORLD ORDER:

-- "Breitbart sees potential to expand in Europe amid French, German elections," by Kevin Sullivan and James McAuley: "Nigel Farage raised a sudsy toast. The British government had just formally triggered its 'Brexit' from the European Union and Farage, the right-wing politician who had long championed it, hoisted a pint of beer, looked into the camera, and thanked the Americans he credited with helping make it happen. 'Well done, Bannon. Well done, Breitbart — you've helped with this hugely,' Farage said in a video toast ... Breitbart, which has risen in prominence with Trump's election and the surprise Brexit vote, has become a disruptive force far beyond the U.S. borders. The anti-establishment resentment that fueled Trump's campaign is surfacing again overseas in elections in France and Germany, and Breitbart hopes to tap into the anti-elite, anti-immigration rage to build its global brand. Breitbart's top U.S. editor, Alexander Marlow, described expansion plans around the time of Trump's election five months ago, with hopes to establish bureaus in France and Germany ... [And even the site's] ... harshest detractors see a potentially significant European market for Breitbart's brand of crusading coverage of a handful of key issues, including immigration, Islam, terrorism, crime and globalization."

-- "In Canadian lumber town, real fears over a trade war with Trump," by Ana Swanson: "Brett Gosselin, a lumberjack like his father before him, lives his life in solitary 12-hour shifts in the vast pine forests that stretch across the Canadian north, master of a gigantic whirling buzz saw that can fell several 100-foot trees in a single crashing roar. But on an afternoon when the future of North America's globalized economic order appeared to hang in the balance, Gosselin ... retreated to the bar of a local hotel and admitted something: He was very worried. 'You don't know what's going to happen. That's what I'm scared of,' Gosselin said ... 'I'm just a low-class little guy that runs a machine, until the mill says that's enough.'"

-- "In less than two weeks, Marine Le Pen could become the first woman to win the French presidency. But she sells herself that way only some of the time," James McAuley reports. "When Le Pen took to the stage to claim her victory in the first round of the vote, there was no talk of the proverbial glass ceiling or any mention of women, girls or gender. But gender has played a significant, if subtle, role in ... Le Pen's astonishingly successful 2017 campaign to bring her extremist party from Europe's political fringe into the halls of political power, analysts say. In her writings and speeches this year, it has operated quietly and constantly, and mostly with one particular purpose: stigmatizing Muslims. 'She's used the gender card for her own benefit,' said Cecile Alduy, the author of a well-known book on Le Pen's rhetoric ... 'But always, and only, to denigrate Islam. She almost never speaks of the feminine condition except to target Islam and immigrants.' In fact, in the public eye, Le Pen, the female leader of a party that has opposed women's rights throughout its 55-year history, has a complicated relationship with gender. On the one hand, she is ultimately the only female candidate seeking power in a political system still dominated by men. On the other, in her capacity as a deputy in the European parliament, she has repeatedly voted against resolutions that advocates say would have improved women's health and safety."

-- A Taiwanese billionaire who pledged to invest billions of dollars to create jobs in the U.S. after Trump was elected spent more than two hours visiting White House officials yesterday. David Nakamura reports: "Foxconn Chairman Terry Gou, whose company manufactures the Apple iPhone in China, declined to confirm whether he met directly with Trump [after he exited the complex] ... 'My memory is not good; maybe I already forgot,' Gou said. Foxconn, an electronics manufacturing giant with more than 1.2 million employees in China, had pledged in 2013 to invest $30 million and hire 500 workers for a new high-tech factory in central Pennsylvania, a project that has languished. After Trump was elected, Foxconn made a new commitment to invest $7 billion to hire 50,000 U.S. workers ... On Saturday, his 100th day in office, Trump will hold a campaign rally in Harrisburg, Pa., the city where Foxconn has failed to build the high-tech factory it promised four years ago." "We are made in America," Gou said in response to a reporter's question about what he discussed at the White House. "We sign a contract, we will let you know."

The Geyuan Garden features elements that will be incorporated into the D.C. garden. (Courtesy National China Garden)

-- "China wants a bold presence in Washington — so it's building a $100 million garden," by Adrian Higgins: "This summer, a construction team is expected to begin transforming a 12-acre field at the U.S. National Arboretum into one of the most ambitious Chinese gardens ever built in the West. By the time Chinese artisans finish their work some 30 months later, visitors will encounter a garden containing all the elements of a classical Chinese landscape: enticing moongate entrances, swooping and soaring roof lines, grand pavilions with carved wooden screens and groves of golden bamboo. The grounds will boast two dozen handcrafted pavilions, temples and other ornate structures around a large central lake. Its backers undoubtedly hope that the National China Garden will become a Washington landmark and achieve for Sino-U.S. relations what the gift of the Tidal Basin's cherry trees has done for Japanese-American links for more than a century. The Chinese government is so anxious to have the garden that it has agreed to foot the entire bill, which approaches $100 million."

DEMOCRATIC SOUL SEARCHING:

-- "The Obamas face the paid-speaking circuit — and all the questions that come with it," by Krissah Thompson: "When Barack and Michelle Obama left the White House, they both spoke longingly of a break from life in the public eye. But following a months-long vacation, they have started to tap into the lucrative paid-speaking circuit that has enriched so many other former presidents and first ladies — with the potential to quickly net millions of dollars. ... It was not divulged how much they were paid for these first appearances. But the former president will collect $400,000 for a September speech to a health-care conference sponsored by investment bank Cantor Fitzgerald, Fox Business reported this week. As newly minted high-dollar speakers, the Obamas follow a well-worn path from the White House — but one that poses risks to a personal and political brand rooted in their middle-class backgrounds. Aides to the Obamas would not comment on how much they are charging for other private speaking engagements, but they defended the speaking schedule and pointed out that the president's first public meeting was a conversation with college students in Chicago earlier this week."

-- Elizabeth Warren said she is "troubled" by Obama's decision to accept $400,000, saying in a radio interview that it was more evidence of money's malignant political influence. "I was troubled by that," the senator said. "One of the things I talk about in the book is the influence of money — I describe it as a snake that slithers through Washington," Warren said. "The influence of dollars on this place s what scares me. I feel like it ultimately threatens democracy. (Dave Weigel)

TAX REFORM WILL BE VERY HARD TO GET DONE:

-- Sean Spicer briefly suggested Thursday that 401ks would not remain intact in the new tax reform package – prompting anxiety across the country until the White House later issued a clarification. But the temporary confusion showed, for a minute, what a nightmare passing tax reform will be, Aaron Blake explains: "That sound you heard was the collective sigh of relief of about half the country — 54 percent of the workforce, to be exact. That's the portion of workers who participate in retirement benefits programs ... But even if 401(k)s are safe, the White House is still looking to slash all kinds of deductions that matter hugely to very specific demographics and areas. While targeting the 401(k)s would have alienated a very large portion of the entire population in one fell swoop, there will be more targeted bloodletting with the deductions that are cut.

-- How Trump's tax plan came together, from the story by Rucker, Parker, Paletta and DeYoung – with Robert Costa and Karen Tumulty: "Trump had privately grouched that he wished he had tackled taxes before trying to push through health care, a view magnified by some outside friends and confidants. Even something more modest than the full overhaul for which he hoped, such as cutting corporate tax rates, they said, would provide the president and his base with an energizing triumph. But it was an April 19 op-ed in the New York Times, titled 'Why Are Republicans Making Tax Reform So Hard?' and penned by Steve Forbes, Larry Kudlow, Arthur Laffer and Stephen Moore, that helped propel Trump to act. The op-ed ... said an overhaul of the tax code would give Trump a much-needed 'legislative victory' and complained that the White House 'seems to be all over the map on the subject.' It called on the administration to move quickly on a tax proposal, not to overthink it and to push forward 'with some degree of urgency.' Trump saw the op-ed right as he was becoming restless with the success of his economic agenda.

The White House rushed to engage the op-ed's authors and reassure the economic conservatives who have privately complained about Trump's nationalistic streak on trade and the lack of action of taxes. When Kudlow and Moore gathered a group of conservatives Tuesday evening at Cafe Berlin, a white-tablecloth German restaurant on Capitol Hill, Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin stopped by, even though he was not scheduled to attend. 'We texted him and said, 'Come by if you'd like,'" Kudlow said. 'Well, he did, and he spoke for two or three minutes and took questions.' 'Everyone looked around and said, 'This is the Steve we knew during the campaign,'" Kudlow added, referring to Mnuchin's enthusiasm for sweeping tax cuts...

On April 21, two days after the op-ed ran, Trump announced in an interview with the Associated Press that his advisers would be releasing a tax plan by the following Wednesday, or 'shortly thereafter.' Some aides working on the plan were stunned, caught unaware of the expedited timeline. Still, they reasoned, maybe 'shortly thereafter' meant they could unveil the plan a week or two later. But hours after the AP interview, during an appearance at the Treasury Department, Trump stood beside Mnuchin and told reporters that the tax plan would come out Wednesday."

-- Charles Koch praises Trump's tax proposal in an op-ed for today's Post: "Comprehensive tax reform is long overdue. Americans deserve much, much better. The president's newly offered plan to reduce rates and simplify the code is a step in the right direction. I am also encouraged by the absence of Congress' proposed border adjustment tax (or any tax) that would increase the profits of industrial companies such as Koch by raising the price on goods that Americans rely on every day. This administration should instead make room for tax cuts by encouraging Congress to rein in wasteful spending and reduce corporate welfare provisions that benefit big business at the expense of families." The title of the billionaire's piece is, "Trump's policies must not benefit only big businesses like mine."

-- The New Yorker, "A Canadian Immigration Firm's Trump-era Boom," by Jonathan Blitzer: "Canada by Choice is just one small shop, and it's still too early to tell whether Trump's Presidency will have a measurable effect on the population of legal immigrants living and working in the U.S. But ... As of this month, H-1B visa holders who live in the U.S. account for half of Canada by Choice's clients seeking permanent residency and eighty per cent of the firm's clients seeking a work visa—about seventy people altogether. -- BuzzFeed News, "John Kasich Sounds Like He's Over The Republican Party," by Henry J. Gomez: "The big story of Kasich's big media week isn't the predictable swipes he takes at President Trump in [his new] book. And it's not that he is refusing to rule out a Republican primary challenge to Trump in 2020, though his visit here Thursday raises such speculation. It's that Kasich seems tempted by the idea of running for president as an independent. The signs are there in Two Paths: America Divided or United, which recycles its title from an anti-Trump speech Kasich gave last year toward the end of his bid for the GOP nomination. The most consistent theme in the book, though, is not Kasich's disapproval of the new president but his disappointment with fellow Republicans who supported Trump's candidacy. ... At a time when he clearly wants to remain a player on the national stage, Kasich is struggling with his political identity — and so is his party. If and where he fits in a GOP led by [Trump] will say a great deal about the kind of Republicans who can succeed in it, and whether there's still space for the open and internationalist values Kasich and other Republicans long have cherished."

"People Are Trolling Trump's New Anti-Immigrant Hotline With Reports Of Space Aliens And The Government Is Not Amused," from BuzzFeed: "On Wednesday, the Trump administration launched a new office called the Victims of Immigration Crime Engagement Office (VOICE), to assist victims of crimes committed by undocumented immigrants as part of the president's executive order to curtail illegal immigration. As part of VOICE, immigration officials also established a hotline where 'people impacted by crimes committed by illegal aliens' could receive support. Critics say the initiative unfairly targets and instills fear in nonwhite immigrants and condones racism. And it did not take long for people to realize this new 'criminal alien' crackdown campaign on #AlienDay. So naturally ... the internet [heeded] the call. People started sharing the hotline's number, telling others to call and report how they've been victimized by space aliens. Or Superman or Big Foot. Others said they were calling to report an illegal alien who was impersonating the president."

The first poem in the series is called 'Revolution' and it's dedicated to Asatta Shakur, an icon among black power enthusiasts who was convicted of murdering a police officer in 1977. She escaped from prison in 1979 and fled to Cuba in 1984, where she's been hiding ever since. Shakur, whose real name is Joanne Deborah Chesimard, was the first woman to be named on the FBI's Most Wanted Terrorists list and the FBI is currently offering a $1 million reward for information leading to her arrest."

QUOTE OF THE DAY:

From a story by Financial Times Washington bureau chief Demetri Sevastopulo: "Sitting across from Donald Trump in the Oval Office, my eyes are drawn to a little red button on a box that sits on his desk. 'This isn't the nuclear button, is it?' I joke, pointing. 'No, no, everyone thinks it is,' Trump says ... before leaning over and pressing it to order some Cokes. 'Everyone does get a little nervous when I press that button.'"

NEWS YOU CAN USE IF YOU LIVE IN D.C.:

-- TGIF! Another day of great weather ahead. The Capital Weather Gang forecasts: "Sunshine returns and we get warm — into the low-to-mid 80s. Breezes are occasional, fairly light, and variable in direction. Enjoy the lower humidity levels, as indicated by lower dew-point readings in the 50s!"

Former All-Met Jonathan Allen gets selected in the first round by hometown Washington Redskins

-- "The Redskins picked Alabama's Jonathan Allen with the No. 17 pick in last night's NFL draft," by Liz Clarke: "From the moment the Chicago Bears traded up to take quarterback Mitchell Trubisky second overall, little about Thursday's first round of the NFL draft unfolded as predicted. A draft class loaded with defensive talent instead saw a run on offensive players, with two quarterbacks and three wide receivers chosen among the top 10. The upshot proved a blessing for the Washington Redskins, who badly needed to shore up their defense and headed into the proceedings with a wish list designed to do just that. 'Never in a million years,' as Coach Jay Gruden later put it, did Redskins executives think that Alabama defensive end Jonathan Allen still would be available when they chose 17th overall. Regarded as a top-10 pick — top five, in the minds of some — the 6-foot-3, 286-pound Allen had won the 2016 Chuck Bednarik and Bronko Nagurski awards as the nation's top defensive player."

-- "A year later, Penguins' Nick Bonino beats Capitals again in Game 1," by Isabelle Khurshudyan: "Many of the Washington Capitals can still clearly recall how their season ended a year ago. There was Nick Bonino in his black and gold No. 13 jersey in front of the net. He threw his arms up in the air as the Pittsburgh Penguins advanced, and the Capitals spent the next year stewing. On Thursday night, there was Bonino again in front of the net, again celebrating as he pushed the Penguins past Washington in a playoff game. His goal in the third period lifted Pittsburgh to a 3-2 win in Game 1 of the second-round series. The good news for the Capitals going forward is that they climbed out of a two-goal hole by outplaying Pittsburgh with a 35-21 edge in shots on goal, controlling possession in the second half of the game despite not getting a single power play all night. The bad news is that despite being the better team for the majority of the game, their costly errors have them in an early series deficit."

-- "Hits keep coming for Nats, who roll Rockies to complete a 9-1 trip," by Chelsea Janes in Denver: "Temperatures were in the 40s and Gio Gonzalez's pitch count was in the 90s as he waited out the most prolific offensive inning in Washington Nationals history, standing near a heater in the dugout, trying to stay warm until his teammates relented. But these days, waiting for the Nationals' offense to relent is like waiting for a Colorado winter to end. Just when the cold ebbs and the sun thaws, the chill returns, unwilling to give way. The Nationals beat the Rockies on Thursday afternoon, 16-5, a fitting end to a series in which they scored 46 runs in four games and batted .346. The Nationals (16-6) are tied for the best start in franchise history with the 1979 Montreal Expos. They own the best record in baseball. Their opponents spent much of April waiting for the Nationals' offense to quit, but they waited in vain. That seventh inning, in which they scored more runs in an inning than any Expos/Nationals team has in 20 years, is a fitting microcosm of their season."

THE BIG IDEA: Donald Trump won significantly more votes than Paul Ryan in the House Speaker's home county last fall, partly by making inroads with traditionally Democratic autoworkers who have struggled to adjust since losing their jobs when the General Motors plant in Janesville, Wisconsin, closed in 2008.

-- The president is traveling to Ryan's congressional district this afternoon for an event at Snap-on, which manufactures hand tools. Trying to show his blue-collar base that he's following through on his promises, Trump will sign a "Buy American, Hire American" executive order. The White House says it will make it harder for tech companies to replace American workers with cheaper foreign labor and strengthen rules barring foreign contractors from bidding on government projects. (More details here.)

-- Today also happens to be the publication date for Amy Goldstein's terrific new book, "Janesville: An American Story." It is a close-up look at what happened after G.M. shut down the assembly line two days before Christmas, as the company sought to survive and the country tried to fend off another depression. In a city of 63,000, as many as nine thousand people lost their jobs.

Amy, a staff writer at The Washington Post for three decades, has doggedly pursued this project for six years now. She took a two-year leave from the paper to conduct research, immersing herself in the lives of a handful of people in the community. With 55 vignettes, some as short as a page, she weaves a powerful narrative about their struggles and their perseverance from 2008 to 2013. Throughout the story, as she writes at one point, "The carcass of a 4.8-million-square-foot cathedral of industry still sits in silence on the river's edge." (Read an excerpt about three of the families she followed here.)

-- Trump's name does not appear until page 292 of "Janesville," but this really is one of the best books to understand how he could become the first Republican presidential candidate since Ronald Reagan to carry the Badger State.

To this day, most Washington elites don't fully grasp just how painful the Great Recession was for tens of millions of Americans. Government spending increased, and the military-industrial complex prospered, so D.C. denizens were mostly insulated from the economic crisis.

-- Importantly, Janesville is not part of the Rust Belt. Places like Youngstown, Ohio, and Pittsburgh have been decaying for decades. But this area was faring relatively well until the 2000s. Generations of Janesville kids, going back to 1923, grew up excited to follow their dads onto the assembly line so they too could make Chevys. They saw a union card, not a college degree, as the ticket to a respectable middle-class livelihood.

So the plant closure was a profound shock to the system: Not only did it accelerate the decline of manufacturing and organized labor, it created a sense among many working-class whites that they were being left behind – harmed by trade and globalization. With full recovery still elusive nearly a decade later, some began to look for a new kind of savior.

Historically Janesville has been a Democratic stronghold. While there was significant local excitement when Mitt Romney tapped a favorite son to be his running mate, Barack Obama nevertheless carried the county by 23 points. Last November, Hillary Clinton carried Rock County by just 10 points -- and with about 10,000 fewer votes than Obama. That doesn't seem like much until you consider that Trump only won Wisconsin by 22,000 votes. In Rock County, Trump received 31,488 votes and Ryan got 21,879. (The Speaker won reelection handily because the boundaries are drawn to include much redder counties.)

-- Ryan is a major character in the story. The book opens with the congressman's cell phone ringing. It's the CEO of GM calling to give him a heads up that the company will stop production in Janesville. Ryan is caught off guard. As they talk, he looks through his kitchen window at two houses. One belongs to a couple where the husband and wife both work at the plant. The other belongs to a family dependent on wages from a seat-making factory that is the plant's largest supplier. Ryan realizes their jobs will vanish and pleads with the CEO to switch from making gas-guzzling SUVs to smaller models, or pickup trucks, that consumers might actually want to buy. He'll soon travel to Detroit to plead that cases with other executives, but to no avail. GM would declare bankruptcy, even with massive federal loans.

This all happened before Ryan ever chaired a House committee, back when the GOP establishment saw him and his budget blueprints as a nuisance. In keeping with the convention for how she refers to all the other locals in the book, Amy refers to the Speaker of the House simply as "Paul" in her story.

Ryan, who refused to campaign with or defend Trump after the "Access Hollywood" tape came out last October, will miss Trump's event in Kenosha today. He's leading a congressional delegation in Europe, focused on reassuring NATO allies about the U.S. commitment to the alliance.

This is in the parking lot outside the UAW local in Janesville. (Alyssa Schukar for The Washington Post)

-- In many ways, the town is a useful microcosm to understand the broader trends Trump capitalized on:

Union power has dramatically dissipated. The United Auto Workers local shrank from 7,000 active members to 438 by 2012, with 4,900 retirees. To make money, the union started renting out its hall – once a heart of the community. A major festival over Labor Day weekend has gotten smaller. In 2014, Labor Fest went from three days to two. Then it was canceled altogether in 2015 on short notice. It managed to resume in 2016, but the future is precarious.

The civil war in Wisconsin after Scott Walker took on public employee unions also divided Janesville. Some of the civility that the town had really prided itself on was lost during the recall fight in 2012.

Jobs have finally come back to Janesville, but they don't pay as well. And they're not in manufacturing. The unemployment rate recently slipped below 4 percent, but many who are working again are not earning enough for the comfortable lives they had a decade ago. Rock County had about 9,500 manufacturing jobs in 2015 – about half as many as in 1990.

Dollar General decided to put a distribution center on the south side of town, thanks to generous incentives offered by the city. But most of the jobs will pay $15 an hour – compared to the $28 a lot of guys earned at GM before the plant closed. But people will take what they can get: A Dollar General job fair not long before Amy's book went to press drew three thousand people.

Many folks who lost jobs never fully regained their confidence. Working with the University of Wisconsin Survey Center, Amy conducted a major survey of Rock County residents. She includes the results in an eight-page appendix: More than one in three who responded had lost work or lived with someone who had. Economic pessimism lingered years after the recession itself. Attesting to the financial and emotional pain that losing work caused people, half said they have had trouble paying for food and nearly two-thirds reported strain in family relationships. Three-quarters of the people who responded, in 2013, said that the U.S. economy was still in a recession. Slightly more than half said their financial situation was worse than before the recession. (Buy Amy's book here.)

-- What POTUS wants you to read: "Trump spurs small-business optimism in Milwaukee area" is the headline of a Milwaukee Journal Sentinel story the president just tweeted out. "That may not seem surprising; business generally favors Republicans," the paper says. "But there was no comparable surge in small-business optimism when George W. Bush won in 2000 after eight years of Democratic incumbency."

ANOTHER PERSPECTIVE ON 2016:

-- "Shattered," a narrative of Hillary Clinton's losing campaign by journalists Jonathan Allen and Amie Parnes, is also out this morning. Campaign manager Robby Mook comes across especially poorly in their account. "As we dive into the Clinton apparatus in Brooklyn, we discover a somewhat different picture of Mook, who was largely portrayed as an affable, modern-age data whiz during the campaign," Steven Ginsberg, The Post's senior politics editor, writes in a review of the new book. "In 'Shattered,' he is depicted as a 'professional political assassin' who pushes aside anyone who threatens his control-freak grip on power. He fights with (John) Podesta. There's tension with chief strategist Joel Benenson (who appears to have been almost completely sidelined months before Election Day). Mook has little regard for communications director Jennifer Palmieri. He thinks the old-style politics of Bill Clinton are relics of a bygone time. Some of the criticism of Mook rings true — his celebrated voter modeling, for instance, turned out to be catastrophically off — but his portrait also carries the stench of bitter co-workers conveniently tossing after-the-fact blame his way.”

-- The book has some fresh details on how hard Obama pressed Clinton to concede. From Ginsberg's review: Around 7:45 on election night, when Clinton and her aides still thought they were headed to the White House, troubling news emerged from Florida. Steve Schale, the best vote-counter the Democrats had in the state, told campaign officials they were going to lose the biggest battleground in the country. “As fear gave over to dread in the Peninsula Hotel, the Clinton campaign reacted as you might expect: Bill became furious, Hillary turned stoic, and their cocksure aides started to blame one another. It wasn't long into the night before Bill Clinton called his old pal, Virginia Gov. Terry McAuliffe, and told him not to bother coming to New York. There would be no victory to celebrate...

“Shortly after 11:00 p.m., after Wisconsin was called by Fox News, Allen and Parnes report that the campaign fielded a series of calls from the White House pushing Clinton to concede, even though the margins in many states were extraordinarily close. Obama thought it was over and did not want a messy recount. First came a call from White House political director David Simas to [Mook]. ‘POTUS doesn't think it's wise to drag this out,’ Simas said. But Clinton was dragging it out. So then she got a call from POTUS. ‘You need to concede,’ urged Obama, who repeated the message in a follow-up call to [Podesta]. At last, Clinton said, ‘Give me the phone.’ And then the first woman who was going to be president got her opponent on the line and said two words she never expected to say: ‘Congratulations, Donald.’

“Moments later, Obama was back on the phone, this time making a consolation call. ‘Mr. President,’ Clinton said softly. ‘I'm sorry.’”

-- After a joint appearance in Green Bay with Obama was canceled, Clinton never went to Wisconsin. “Our failure to reach out to white voters, like literally from the New Hampshire primary on, it never changed,” one campaign official told the authors. From the New York Times's review: “In chronicling these missteps, ‘Shattered’ creates a picture of a shockingly inept campaign hobbled by hubris and unforced errors, and haunted by a sense of self-pity and doom, summed up in one Clinton aide's mantra throughout the campaign: ‘We're not allowed to have nice things.’”

-- In a surprise announcement Tuesday, British Prime Minister Theresa May called for an early election to be held on June 8 – seeking to cement her backing amid politically-tense “Brexit” negotiations and moves by Scotland to possibly carve its own independent path to remain in the European Union. Karla Adam reports from London: “‘I have concluded the only way to guarantee certainty and stability for the years ahead is to hold this election and seek your support for the decisions I have to make,’ [May] said. Part of the election call by May is to seek her own political mandate and shrug off the image as [David] Cameron's replacement. ... Still, May is taking something of a political gambit with elections set for just two weeks before the anniversary of the Brexit referendum: If her Conservative party wins the snap elections, she will have the mandate to pursue her own agenda as she heads into negotiations ... not the one set out by her predecessor Cameron. But a loss — considered unlikely at the moment — would throw deep uncertainty into the complex talks ahead between Britain and the other 27 E.U. members, and would reflect important shifts in the British sentiment since last year's referendum.”

-- "Arkansas blocked from carrying out scheduled execution after Supreme Court denies late challenge," by Mark Berman: "Despite a late challenge mounted by Arkansas officials hoping to carry out the state's first execution in 12 years, the U.S. Supreme Court early Tuesday morning declined to step in, preventing the lethal injection from taking place as scheduled. The high court's decision not to act, coming with just minutes to spare, leaves in place a stay preventing Arkansas from carrying out an execution that was originally set to be one of eight taking place this month. The Arkansas Supreme Court on Monday afternoon had stayed two executions scheduled for that night, and state officials quickly challenged one of those two stays, appealing to Supreme Court Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr., who is assigned cases from the federal circuit covering Arkansas. In a one-sentence order released 15 minutes before the execution warrant expired, the court said that Alito referred the application to the full court and that it was then denied. No explanation was given and no dissents were recorded."

-- Trump called to congratulate Turkish President Recep Tayyip Erdogan after a referendum granted him sweeping new powers, breaking in tone with the State Department, whose carefully-worded statement noted reports of voting irregularities and urged the country to respect citizen's rights. Carol Morello reports: "According to accounts by both Trump and Erdogan, the two also discussed the U.S. missile strike on a Syrian air base in response to the April 4 chemical weapons attack on civilians in Idlib province. Trump thanked Erdogan for Turkey's support of the retaliatory action. The leaders agreed that Syrian President Bashar al-Assad should be held accountable for the chemical attack that killed at least 70 people, and they talked about the ongoing campaign to counter the Islamic State."

*State's statement urged Turkey to respect the basic rights of its citizens and noted the election irregularities witnessed by monitors with the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe. (The United States is a member of the OSCE.) "We look to the government of Turkey to protect the fundamental rights and freedoms of all its citizens," said the department's acting spokesman, Mark Toner, noting the objections of the Turkish opposition and the monitors.

*"The juxtaposition of the differing responses underscored the awkward situation faced by many U.S. and European officials in responding to the disputed results of the referendum, which changed Turkey from a parliamentary democracy to one led by an executive president with strong central powers," Carol explains. It passed by a slim margin, 51.3 percent to 48.7 percent. The package of constitutional amendments eliminates the position of prime minister and expands Erdogan's power to appoint judges and prosecutors.

*But Turkey's strategic importance means that the referendum, even if voting irregularities are proved, is unlikely to affect U.S. policy. "Both the U.S. and E.U. are in a bind," said Michael Werz, a Turkey analyst with the Center for American Progress. "They can either [disagree with] the OSCE findings, or they can say the truth: It was not a free and fair election."

-- Erdogan vigorously defended his victory, strongly dismissing all criticisms of the results: "Debate about this issue is now over," he said during an occasionally combative speech at his sprawling presidential palace. "We are not going to stop," he added. His remarks came just hours after Turkey's main opposition party demanded the vote be annulled. (Kareem Fahim)

Washington goalie Braden Holtby (70) is devastated after Toronto wins 4-3 in overtime last night. (John McDonnell/The Washington Post)

-- "Capitals fail to 'Own the big moments,' fall behind in first-round series vs. Toronto," by Isabelle Khurshudyan: "There's an emblem the Washington Capitals have stuck onto a door in their locker room. It's a smiling skull with 'Own the big moments' written around the edge of it. The phrase was taken from forward Justin Williams, who repeatedly said Washington didn't do just that in its disappointing postseason run a year ago. They had it printed on the back of their team shirts before the season. The logo traveled with the Capitals to Air Canada Centre, staring back at them in the visiting locker room as a third straight game in this first-round series against the Toronto Maple Leafs went to overtime. Less than two minutes into the extra period, it was Toronto who owned the moment after Tyler Bozak's power-play goal lifted the Maple Leafs to a 4-3 win and a 2-1 series lead."

One dead, two injured in Black Hawk helicopter crash in Maryland

GET SMART FAST:

1. A U.S. Army Black Hawk helicopter crashed Monday afternoon on a golf course in southern Maryland, killing one crew member and injuring two others. The aircraft was on a routine training flight when it went down. (Arelis R. Hernández, Dan Lamothe and Justin Wm. Moyer)

2. A rapidly expanding manhunt for Steve W. Stephens -- accused of killing an elderly man in Cleveland and posting a video of the murder to Facebook -- stretched into its second day as authorities offered a $50,000 reward for information regarding his whereabouts. Stephens is considered armed and dangerous, and authorities urged residents in Pennsylvania, New York, Indiana and Michigan to be on "alert." (Lindsey Bever, Peter Holley and Drew Harwell)

3. For the first time on record, human-caused climate change has rerouted an entire river. According to a team of scientists, the retreat of a large glacier in Canada's Yukon territory shifted the flow of its meltwater from one river to another -- cutting down flow to the Yukon's largest lake, and channeling freshwater to the Pacific Ocean rather than to the Bering Sea. (Chris Mooney)

4. South Korean prosecutors indicted ex-President Park Geun-hye on a spate of high-profile corruption charges, including bribery, extortion, and abuse of power -- which could potentially carry a sentence of life in prison. It's the latest in a string of humiliations for Park, who was stripped of power last month and has since been detained at a facility near Seoul. (AP)

5. Gov. Susana Martinez (R) vetoed all higher education funding in New Mexico, defunding all state universities and potentially ratcheting up tuition prices for students as part of a $6.1 billion spending bill for the next fiscal year. Meanwhile, funding is so tight for K-12 education that Albuquerque has decided to eliminate sports programs in every middle school. The move has prompted intense criticism from education professionals and university presidents. (Valerie Strauss)

6. United, Delta, and American Airlines have all announced changes to their policies on overbooked flights -- moving to respond to last week's "dragging incident" and the maelstrom of outrage and criticism that followed. (Luz Lazo)

7. United removed a couple from a flight to their own wedding. The airline says the two "repeatedly attempted" to sit in upgraded seats that they did not pay for -- but the bride-and-groom-to-be have a very different version of the story. (Kristine Phillips)

8. New York City is weighing a proposal that would require Uber to add an in-app tipping option. If the new rules are approved, a host of other cities could adopt similar requirements -- forcing significant changes to the ride-hailing company, which has avoided past calls to add electronic tipping options. (Steven Overly)

9. A doctor who saw Prince in the days before he died had prescribed him oxycodone under a friend's name in order to "protect the musician," according to a newly-unsealed affidavit, which comes as part of the continued investigation into his death. Autopsy reports show the artist died from an accidental overdose of fentanyl -- a synthetic drug 50 times more powerful than heroin. (AP)

10. Workers from an oil service company wrested control of the leaking BP well in Alaska's Prudhoe Bay area, stopping the natural gas leak after three days. Officials said the responders must still fix a mechanical plug in a damaged portion of an underground pipe before the well can be considered completely stable. (Steven Mufson)

11. A 17-year-old girl died after being attacked by a shark while she was surfing with her father, with her mother and sisters looking on, off the southern coast of Western Australia. News of her attack comes after several great white shark sightings were reported in the area in the past week. Surfers have been advised to avoid the waters for the next 48 hours. (Cindy Boren)

12. For hundreds of years, scientists searched in vain to locate the "giant shipworm" -- a mysterious, near-mythical species of mollusk that was never seen alive, but whose mere shell fragments were enough to fascinate scientists dating back to 18th-century taxonomist Carl Linnaeus. The hunt is finally over! Scientists have discovered the so-called “unicorn of mollusks” in the Philippines, where they spend their lives submerged face-down in muddy lagoon water, and can grow up to five feet long. (Ben Guarino)

13. Glenn Beck and his network, The Blaze, are counter-suing conservative commentator Tomi Lahren, who claims her show was permanently suspended because she came out as pro-choice. But according to the newly-filed brief, the network did not suspend Lahren for her pro-choice comments, but because of a “pattern of bad behavior” including being “inappropriate and unprofessional” and complaining about lighting, shooting, room temperature, and editing. (New York Magazine)

Supporters arrive last night to an election eve rally at Andretti Indoor Karting and Games in Roswell, Georgia. The rally was for Democratic candidate Jon Ossoff. (Kevin D. Liles/Reuters)

GEORGIA'S SPECIAL ELECTION, ROUND ONE:

-- Voting kicks off today to fill the seat of HHS Secretary Tom Price – a closely-watched race that could turn the district blue for the first time since 1978, should Democratic candidate Jon Ossoff break the 50 percent mark. That outcome is unlikely, however. A far more plausible scenario is that he will emerge with support in the low-to-mid-40s, thus triggering a June 20 runoff with the next-highest candidate, likely Karen Handel, Bob Gray, or Dan Moody.

-- “This suburban swath north of Atlanta resembles the cracked mirror of the GOP’s national identity crisis, with 11 candidates bitterly feuding over what it means to be a Republican in the age of [Trump],” Robert Costa reports from Chamblee, Ga. “That crowded field is roiled by nerves about Trump and lingering internecine dramas over ideological purity. And with next year’s midterm elections beginning to take shape, the race’s currents could reverberate far beyond the white college-educated professionals along Interstate 285, regardless of which candidate emerges from the scrum Tuesday. ‘You’ve got a miniature civil war going on there,’ said Rep. Tom Cole (R-Okla.), an ally of House GOP leaders. ‘We’re all paying attention, since anything can happen in a special.’”

“The health-care episode has particular resonance in this district since Price, a physician, was its representative from 2005 until February, when he joined the Cabinet. Republicans’ failure to pass their plan to overhaul the nation’s health-care system has sown doubts among some suburban GOP voters about Trump’s effectiveness in cutting deals with lawmakers in Washington, as well as the party’s promises.”

“At the White House, the president is paying close attention and has been briefed by aides about the race. Political director Bill Stepien is working with the state party and the congressional committees. Chief strategist Stephen K. Bannon is involved in discussions about how to encourage Republican turnout.

“Interactions with Trump’s political brand have veered from hearty embrace (Dan Moody, Bob Gray, Bruce LeVell, Amy Kremer) to support but not always rah-rah (Karen Handel, Judson Hill) to flat-out defiance (David Abroms). Most of the leading candidates have bounced between those poles depending on the day or the latest controversy. Handel, a favorite of antiabortion activists who has the highest name recognition and once served as Georgia’s secretary of state, said in an interview Monday that she is concentrating on doing her ‘level best to represent the interests of the 6th District’ in her positions rather than linking arms with Trump. ‘Obviously I’m a Republican and support the president,’ Handel said. ‘But being in Congress is not the same as being an extension of the White House. I’m more than willing to step up and speak out when the circumstances demand that.’

“Endorsements from prominent Republican players have been scattered to the point of muddying the field. David Perdue has backed Moody. Newt Gingrich supports Hill, as does Sen. Marco Rubio (Fla.). Former Trump campaign manager Corey Lewandowski endorsed LeVell. Former senator Saxby Chambliss is for Handel. But the conservative Club for Growth has opposed Handel and boosted Gray.

To counter the club, the Ending Spending advocacy group, which is backed by the billionaire Ricketts family, has poured millions behind Handel's candidacy."

"Having 11 people on our side is like eating our young," Sen. David Perdue (R-Ga.), a friend of Trump, said in an interview, comparing the infighting to the "nightmare" of his own 2014 statewide primary. "You risk letting the Democrat slide through without a runoff."

-- The president recorded a robocall that doesn't offer support for any individual candidate but just urges Republicans to go vote for anyone but Osoff:

-- Trump also tried to manage expectations with two tweets last night:

-- The Atlanta Journal-Constitution's Greg Bluestein has a list of things to watch for tonight:

*Turnout: "Nearly 55,000 voters have already cast ballots, and the national attention, the Trump factor and the enthusiasm around Osoff's campaign could lead to a dramatic uptick in Election Day voting. [Pollster Mark Rountree] said his research found that there are 77,000 voters in the district who cast ballots in the past two GOP primaries. On the Democratic side, that number is just 17,000: 'It tells you that Republicans have a huge potential upswing,' he said. 'But so far Democrats are battling hard to get their votes out and are having reasonable success.'"

*The Trump factor: "Trump's late tweets could boost Republican turnout — and aggravate Democrats looking for a late edge. Trump won the district with 48 percent of the vote, and the Republicans running as his loyalists hope to land a runoff spot by locking up much of that bloc. And polls show despite his struggles in the district in November, a majority of GOP voters give the president sound approval ratings."

*A county-by-county fight: "The district encompasses only a chunk of north DeKalb County, but it's also the bluest part of the territory. Osoff is hoping to run up the score in this part of the district, so long as he can consolidate votes from the other four Democrats in the race. North Fulton County is home to some of the district's most conservative turf, but it's also the headquarters of three top contenders feuding for the same slice of the electorate."

*Changing the electorate: "Osoff's staggering fundraising haul has allowed his campaign to target beyond a smaller base of traditional Democratic voters — an essential task if he aims to win long-held GOP turf. Democrats who rarely vote in primaries or special elections are getting personalized flyers; some are receiving multiple mailers a day."

Jon Osoff speaks to reporters during a visit to a campaign office yesterday in Marietta. (Joe Raedle/Getty Images)

-- Osoff isn't doomed if he can't crack 50 percent. As NBC's Mark Murray and Carrie Dann note, "While Republicans' odds of holding on to this seat increase in a two-person race, the polling — which hasn't been of the greatest quality, mind you — shows Osoff running competitively against the top-tier Republicans in a runoff. The nonpartisan Cook Political Report is designating the overall contest as a Toss Up."

-- FiveThirtyEight's Nate Silver agrees: "We're in a somewhat Democratic-leaning environment right now, given Trump's poor approval ratings, a modest Democratic advantage on the generic congressional ballot and the results of last week's special election in Kansas. That should mitigate some of Georgia 6's Republican lean. For another thing, a couple of polls ... have tested prospective runoff matchups, and they've usually shown Ossoff a percentage point or two ahead of Handel and other Republicans. It's not much of a 'lead,' but it suggests that a runoff might at least be a toss-up for him."

Tom Perez and Bernie Sanders's Maine rally, in three minutes

-- Bernie Sanders and DNC Chairman Tom Perez traveled to Portland, Maine, last night, for the first stop in a unity tour. Dave Weigel reports: "Portland, the bluest dot in a state that has trended Republican in recent years, is the launchpad for a week-long Perez-Sanders campaign tour. The team-up came last month, but last week, when Democrats lost a closer-than-expected House race in Kansas, the reasons for doing it became clearer. While energy on the left has risen since November, the party's base can still tumble into debates about whom to blame for its defeats, with the left doing most of the talking. The Perez-Sanders tour will not go through any state holding a congressional election soon, though it will boost Heath Mello, the Democrat running for mayor of Omaha. In an interview Monday ... Perez praised Mello and said that Democrats had contributed to the Kansas race in ways that perhaps had gone unseen. 'We invested in the following ways: When people were out there knocking on doors, they were using the DNC's voter file,' he said. 'We were monitoring the election very closely with the state party. We did robo-calls at their request.' Pointing to the 20-point swing toward Democrats, Perez said that 'if we replicate that success everywhere, we will flip the House in 2018.'"

THE AGENDA:

-- As Trump continues to roll back Obama's regulatory legacy with a series of executive orders and the help of a formerly-obscure law to nullify his predecessor's actions, administration officials are also using a third tactic: Going to court to stop judges from ruling on a broad range of regulations that are being challenged by Trump's own conservative allies. Steven Mufson and Juliet Eilperin report: "These cases were filed long before the election. Now, Trump administration officials, eager to flip the government position, want judges to put the cases on hold and give federal agencies time to revise or shrink the Obama-era regulatory regime. Much is at stake. The [EPA] persuaded an appeals court to give it a chance to revise existing limits on street-level smog. The EPA also wants a court to let it rewrite the Clean Power Plan that Obama showcased at the 2015 Paris climate conference. And the Justice Department has sought to review a Department of Health and Human Services regulation that prohibits health-care providers from discriminating against people on the basis of gender identity, sex stereotyping or the termination of a pregnancy. For the Trump administration, getting the regulations back for reconsideration is also the surest way to stave off court rulings — especially those from liberal-leaning benches — that could hinder its ability to unwind rules adopted by the previous administration."

-- "The great dairy trade war that will test President Trump," by Caitlin Dewey in Sheboygan, Wis.: "Seven generations of Gartmans have birthed calves in this barn ... But the bull that Luke Gartman, 36, pulled into the world ... [could be one of the last born on their farm]. The family has two weeks to find a new dairy processing company to buy their milk and sell it into the market. The contract with their existing buyer was just canceled, the latest casualty of an increasingly acrimonious trade war with Canada over the price of ultrafiltered milk, an ingredient in cheese. The dispute ... illustrates the enormous complexity of fulfilling [Trump's] promise to renegotiate [NAFTA]: While NAFTA is often portrayed as a single trade agreement, it has specific provisions affecting thousands of products in hundreds of industries. Reworking many of these, experts say, will involve not just complex technical discussions but a fight between powerful political interests on both sides of the border."

-- Bloomberg, "Exxon, Shell Join Ivanka Trump to Defend Paris Climate Pact," by Jennifer A. Dlouhy: "As [Trump] contemplates whether to make good on his campaign promise to yank the U.S. out of the Paris climate accord, an unlikely lobbying force is hoping to talk him out of it: oil and coal producers. A pro-Paris bloc within the administration has recruited energy companies to lend their support ahead of a high-level White House meeting Tuesday to discuss the global pact to curtail greenhouse-gas emissions, ... The industry campaign to stick with the Paris accord comes amid deep divisions in the Trump administration over the carbon-cutting agreement. Both [Ivanka Trump] and her husband, Jared Kushner ... have urged the president to stay in the deal, along with [Rex] Tillerson. On the other side are senior adviser Stephen Bannon and Environmental Protection Agency Administrator Scott Pruitt, who on Friday said 'we need to exit' the pact."

CONFLICTS OF INTEREST:

-- Was Ivanka Trump, who has extensive business interests in China, a factor leading Donald Trump to change his previously tough approach to Beijing? Walter Pincus connects the dots in his Cipher Brief column today: "On Fox News and in mid-January during a Wall Street Journal interview, Trump suggested that the U.S. long-standing acceptance of Beijing's 'One China' policy ... could be changed. This led to a sharp rebuke from the Chinese government, and a frigidity in relations set in. After Trump was inaugurated president, almost two weeks went by and there was no phone call between him and Chinese President Xi Jinping, although he had spoken to more than a dozen other leaders. Enter Ivanka Trump. On February 1, she and her five-year-old daughter, Arabella Kushner, showed up as surprise guests at the Chinese Embassy near the end of its evening New Year's reception celebrating the year of the rooster. The next morning, Ivanka posted a video of Arabella, playing with a traditional Chinese marionette, while she was singing a song in Mandarin she had learned ... Seven days later, on February 8, a letter from President Trump was hand delivered to the Chinese wishing China 'a prosperous Year of the Rooster' and adding that he looked forward to 'develop a constructive relationship' with President Xi. The next day, February 9, in a late evening phone call to Xi, Trump walked back his previous comments and said the U.S. would continue to honor the 'One China' policy."

-- A coincidence? The AP reports that, on April 6, Ivanka's company won provisional approval from the Chinese government for three new trademarks, giving it monopoly rights to sell Ivanka brand jewelry, bags and spa services in the world's second-largest economy. That same night, the first daughter and her husband, Jared Kushner, sat next to the president of China and his wife for a steak and Dover sole dinner at Mar-a-Lago.

*"Ivanka has so many China ties and conflicts, yet she and Jared appear deeply involved in China contacts and policy. I would never have allowed it," said Norman Eisen, who served as chief White House ethics lawyer under Barack Obama. "For their own sake, and the country's, Ivanka and Jared should consider stepping away from China matters."

*Ivanka's attorney, Jamie Gorelick, said in a statement to the AP that the first daughter would steer clear of specific areas that could impact her business, such as duties on clothing, but she and Jared are under no legal obligation to step back from trade or China policy generally.

-- Two new plaintiffs – an association of restaurants and restaurant employees, and a woman who books banquet halls for Washington hotels – plan to join a lawsuit alleging that Trump has violated the Constitution's emoluments clause because his properties do business with foreign governments. David A. Fahrenthold and Jonathan O'Connell report: "The new plaintiffs will be added to the case on Tuesday morning, according to a spokesman for Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, a D.C.-based watchdog group. CREW had originally filed suit against Trump in federal court in January, alleging that — by continuing to own his business ... Trump had violated the constitutional provision that bans 'emoluments' from foreign powers. Legal experts had said that the case faced a serious hurdle: It wasn't clear that the watchdog group actually had standing to sue in the first place. What harm had it suffered, specifically, because of Trump's actions? The new plaintiffs are intended to offer an alternative answer to that question[:] Both say that, as direct competitors of Trump's restaurants and hotels, they may lose foreign clients, who may book with Trump properties to curry favor with the president."

Spicer says Trump is still under IRS audit

SECRECY WATCH – WHAT DOES TRUMP HAVE TO HIDE?

-- A day before the deadline for most Americans to pay their 2016 taxes, White House press secretary Sean Spicer claimed that Trump's most recent taxes are being audited and said they will not be released. From Abby Phillip: "Presidents and Vice Presidents are automatically subjected to tax audits by the IRS as a matter of routine practice — a fact that has not stopped previous holders of those offices from publicly releasing their returns. Such an audit does not prevent Trump from automatically releasing his returns. The White House has also declined to provide proof of audits of current and past tax returns. Asked whether the president would authorize the IRS to confirm the existence of audits involving his returns, Spicer did not answer. Later, Spicer was asked whether the White House would say that Trump would never release his tax returns. 'We'll have to get back to you on that,' he said."

-- Spicer also defended Trump's decision to keep visitor logs to the White House complex under wraps, saying his predecessor's disclosure policy amounted to "faux" government transparency. Sean apparently thinks no transparency is better than faux transparency. (John Wagner)

-- The narrative --> "Trump's no populist. He's a swamp monster," by Dana Milbank: "Last year, Mark Meckler, one of the founders of the tea party movement, had concerns about Trump but gave the Republican nominee the benefit of the doubt, because Trump 'at least says he's going to attack' the crony-capitalist system. Now the conservative activist has revised his opinion. Trump 'said he was going to D.C. to drain the swamp,' Meckler said in a recent Fox Business interview, but 'now it looks like we've got the Creature from the Black Lagoon in the White House.' For everybody else who believed Trump's populist talk about tackling a rigged system, it's time to recognize you've been had. ... The billionaire has embraced a level of corporate control of the government that makes previous controversies involving corporate influence — Vice President Dick Cheney's attempt in 2001 to keep secret the names of industry officials who participated in his energy task force, for example — seem quaint by comparison."

-- A growing credibility gap: The number of people who think Trump keeps his promises has plummeted 17 points since February, according to a Gallup Poll, falling from 62 percent to 45 percent. The president also lost ground on several key characteristics, falling seven points among voters who see him as a "strong and decisive leader" and a president who "can bring about changes the country needs." The percentage of people who said they see him as "honest and trustworthy" also dropped by six points.

-- Meanwhile, public dissatisfaction with Washington is weighing on the GOP more broadly, according to a Pew Research Center survey: While the new Congress is viewed about as unfavorably as the last Congress, and while both parties have been viewed more negatively than they were in January, Republican numbers have taken a sharper dip. Some key takeaways: While Republican lawmakers are seen as better-equipped to deal with terrorism (48 to 36 percent) and both parties break about even on handling the economy, Democrats have gained an advantage in several notable areas: They're now seen as the party better-equipped to deal with foreign policy (46 to 38) and hold a 50 to 39 percent lead on handling immigration.

*Fewer than half of voters (46 percent) say they are "very or somewhat confident" in Trump's ability to work with Congress, down from a 60 percent majority in December.

*The approval rating for Paul Ryan has dropped to 29 percent, with 54 percent disapproving.

Neil Gorsuch hugs his wife after he is sworn in. (Jabin Botsford/The Washington Post)

ALL THE PRESIDENT'S MEN:

-- Neil Gorsuch participated in his first session as a Supreme Court justice Monday, immediately embracing his new role and emerging as an extremely active questioner. Robert Barnes reports: "There is no expectation at the high court that new justices are to be seen and not heard, but the 49-year-old rookie seemed to push the envelope a bit. Gorsuch asked more questions at his first oral argument — 22 — than did any of his fellow justices at their first appearances, according to [Supreme Court scholar] Adam Feldman. ... In short order, Gorsuch showed he could be polite and still deliver a jab reminiscent of the justice he replaced, the late Antonin Scalia. ... As Gorsuch first emerged from behind the court's maroon velvet curtains with his colleagues, he seemed to pause for a moment to take in the scene. His silver hair looking recently trimmed, and he wore a dark red tie under his black robe. He shared a laugh with his seatmate, Sonia Sotomayor, and sat ramrod straight in his high-backed chair all the way to Roberts's left. He rarely stopped smiling."

-- New York Times, "Chris Christie Heads for the Door, Minus the Earlier Throngs," by Nick Corasaniti: "This is not how [Christie] thought it would end, running out the calendar with largely dutiful tasks. 'Well, one, I thought I might be president,' he said in an extended interview in his office this month, 'so that's a fairly material change.' But as he travels the state promoting his initiative against the opioid epidemic plaguing the country, the energy seems different[:] Gone are the nearly daily outrages and television clips of him berating an opponent or dressing down a lawmaker. In their place is a man keenly aware of his legacy, evident in the battles he chooses and in the reflexive defense against criticism. ... He has recently supplanted his small-government conservatism with populist rants against corporate America ... perhaps as a way to rehabilitate his image as he ponders his future. To be sure, he still believes that there may be a place for him in the Trump administration ... and still boasts of a close relationship with [Trump]." He says the two have at least one "extended" phone conversation weekly, and not always to talk policy. "It will be purely just a friendly conversation," he says of their talks. "And then at the end he might say: 'So how do you think I'm doing? How do you think it's going?'"

-- Politico, "The $1 million upside for an RNC digital guru," by Shane Goldmacher: "The Republican Party's top digital strategist in 2016 got a nearly $1 million payout from a firm he co-founded that collected online contributions to the party and its nominee, Donald Trump — despite earlier claims that the strategist had severed his ties to the company. Gerrit Lansing's joint roles, while legal, have raised questions of cronyism and profit-making at the Republican National Committee — and now sparked an internal review 'to prevent a situation like this from happening again,' the RNC [said]. ... Republican operatives representing multiple GOP presidential and Senate campaigns said that Lansing pushed them to use the company he co-founded, Revv, to collect their online donations after he was hired for the top RNC job — and that he used the fact that the RNC was using his platform as a selling point. ... Lansing's stake is so valuable that he was unwilling to cut financial ties to the company in order to clear White House ethics requirements, which was one of the reasons he left the administration in February, after a month (in a senior role)."

The controversy puts Spicer in an awkward spot: "As the RNC's chief strategist, Spicer denied ... in mid-2016 that Lansing had any financial stake in Revv. 'He has zero connection to Revv,' Spicer said then. 'He had to sever the ties.' In fact, Lansing never did. He received a $909,000 payout from the company last year." Asked about the inconsistency, Spicer said this week: "The statement that was issued last year was based on information provided by Gerrit."

-- Financial Times, "Former Trump aide advises Chinese tycoon on building contracts," by Lionel Barber, Gabriel Wildau, Yuan Yang and Demetri Sevastopulo: "[Paul] Manafort met Yan Jiehe, the billionaire founder of Pacific Construction Group, in Shanghai last Tuesday. Ahead of the meeting, Mr Yan told the Financial Times that Mr Manafort - who has represented leaders from the Philippines to Angola to Ukraine - would help him navigate what is expected to eventually be a US infrastructure boom. ... Speaking in a conference room decorated with Chinese classical paintings and overlooking Shanghai's financial district, Mr Yan pointed to a US map, as he outlined his ambition to win infrastructure deals in the world's largest economy. 'The map that we've hung up here is for Trump's special envoy, Paul,' Mr Yan said."

PENCE CONTINUES ASIA TOUR:

-- Mike Pence warned North Korea not to test U.S. military might by pursuing its nuclear weapons program, citing strikes in Syria and Afghanistan as proof of American "strength and resolve." The stark warning, delivered in Seoul after Pence visited the military demarcation line separating North and South Korea, could revive speculation that the White House is considering military action against the Kim regime. Anna Fifield reports:

In Washington, Trump told reporters that North Korea has "got to behave" while Sean Spicer said the president will not be "drawing red lines in the sand" with Pyongyang: "He holds his cards close to the vest, and I think you're not going to see him telegraphing how he's going to respond to any military or other situation going forward," Spicer said. "I think that the action that he took in Syria shows that when appropriate, this president will take decisive action." (Later, though, he cautioned reporters not to "make too much" of an analogy between Syria and North Korea.)

Still, any U.S. military action would likely bring the U.S. into a diplomatic crisis with China: In Beijing, Foreign Ministry spokesman Lu Kang called for international talks with North Korea to ease tensions. Russia, too, warned that the Trump administration was on what Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov called a "very risky path." "I hope there will be no unilateral actions like those we saw recently in Syria," Lavrov told reporters in Moscow.

A State Department official said the U.S. will continue trying to further isolate North Korea "economically, politically and diplomatically" – ratcheting up pressure until they stop conducting missile tests and demonstrate willingness to engage in negotiations. "We're looking for some kind of signal that they realize the current status quo is unsustainable," the official said.

-- "South Koreans are dealing with a new wild card — in Washington," by Yoonjung Seo and Anna Fifield: "For decades, South Koreans have lived in a technical state of war with a hostile brother country that considers them traitors and imperialist lackeys. Throughout verbal attacks and periodic military ones, this nation of 50 million people has brushed off tensions, much as one might ignore a combative uncle at Thanksgiving. It's similar this time around, as North Korea launches missiles and fires off increasingly incendiary threats, and as the U.S. responds with stark warnings and the strategic placement of an aircraft carrier. But now, there is one new wild card that South Koreans haven't had to factor in before: President Trump. In the three months he has been president, Trump has proved himself quick to hit the send button on his early-morning tweets and willing, in Syria and Afghanistan, to order surprise airstrikes." Some in South Korea say Trump's tough talk adds to their concerns: "Both Trump and Kim Jong Un are escalating the tensions by speaking about a possible war," said one IT worker in Seoul. "So the situation has become more serious under Trump. We know he does not stop at talking. ... He showed that by bombing Syria for using chemical weapons."

-- The real test of whether China is serious about working with Trump to hem in North Korea is whether they stop resisting installation of the THAAD system in South Korea, the Wall Street Journal's Gerald F. Seib writes. He explains that it appears to be a case of the Chinese being "long-term wise and short-term foolish": "The North Korean nuclear genie already is out of the bottle, in the sense that it has working nuclear explosive devices. The trick now is to contain that threat and, if possible, roll back the steps the North Koreans are taking, in a considerable hurry, to complete the transition from mere nuclear devices to nuclear weapons. That is going to require convincing the North Koreans that the price they will pay for continuing down this path outweighs any strategic advantage they will gain, which is where escalating economic pressure from China is key. Eventually—though perhaps not at the moment— the strategy also probably will require a diplomatic component to give the North Koreans a face-saving escape route if they want to back away. But a complete strategy also will require steps to convince the North Koreans that their new military toys won't have the power that [Kim Jong Un] hopes they do. That's where Thaad comes in—and where China is still standing in the way."

THE FRENCH PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION BEGINS SUNDAY:

-- "France's presidential race is entering its final stretch with no clear winner in sight, as the main contenders scrap for votes in a flurry of campaign rallies," Bloomberg's Geraldine Amiel and Vidya Root report: "Everyone is petrified," said Edouard Lecerf, head of the political department at polling firm Kantar Sofres. 'The challenge for each of the four candidates is to seek new votes without alienating their base. French voters are like fish, like eels -- very slippery.' With almost a third of the electorate still undecided, and the front-runners clustered around 20 percent in the polls for the first round on April 23, the race is the most unpredictable the country has seen in recent history. With two of the four candidates also hostile to the institutions of the European Union, the result of the runoff two weeks later will have far-reaching implications not just for France but for the region as a whole."

-- Bloomberg, "Here's How Bernie Sanders Is Playing a Role in France's Election," by Helene Fouquet: "Sophia Chikirou was a secret emissary of France's Communist-backed presidential candidate Jean-Luc Melenchon to the U.S. last year, embedded in Bernie Sanders's campaign. The 37-year-old crisscrossed the country, going to Miami, Brooklyn and Pennsylvania between March and June. She bought a 'Join the Political Revolution Today' t-shirt, campaigned door-to door, filmed her experience and wrote a diary on her Tumblr blogging account about her time as a volunteer for the U.S. Democratic Party candidate. Her mission: learning how to run a campaign on a shoe-string budget with an army of volunteers, using the Internet and other state-of-the-art technologies. [Now], back in France, Chikirou, the Melenchon campaign's communications director, is putting it all to work for the candidate, who has seen the biggest surge in the polls in the last month. Her efforts have helped bring the admirer of Cuba's Fidel Castro and former Venezuelan leader Hugo Chavez closer to the presidency than ever before."

-- New York Times, "Stripped Village Homes Expose a Hollowing Out of France's Heritage," by Alissa J. Rubin: "Throughout the French countryside, especially in less visited rural areas of eastern and central France, some homes have fallen victim to speculators who strip their architectural treasures and sell them, often abroad, leaving once graceful historic structures little more than empty shells behind gaily painted facades. In other cases, the owners themselves sell the architectural elements to raise some cash. The sales are for the most part legal, but the phenomenon is an element in the gradual depopulation of many of France's villages, and what some fear is an ebbing away of French traditions and culture. The issue of French identity and heritage is at the heart of the presidential campaign, and it is among the issues that have helped propel the right-wing populist Marine Le Pen to the status of a front-runner."

WAPO HIGHLIGHTS:

-- "Trump has spent one out of every five minutes of his presidency in Palm Beach," by Philip Bump: "On seven of the 13 weekends he has been president, he has spent time at the resort, usually slipping away from Mar-a-Lago to head to one of his nearby golf courses to play a round. That includes each of the past two weekends, when he arrived on Thursday and stayed through most of Sunday. Trump has spent ... 424.5 hours there and 1,663.5 hours everywhere else, including on Air Force One headed to Mar-a-Lago. (That trip takes about an hour-and-a-half, so that's an additional 21 hours spent flying there and back.)"

GOOD READS FROM ELSEWHERE:

-- The Democrat running to unseat Rep. Steve King in Iowa is a former professional psychic known as "the Spirit Weaver." The Des Moines Register's Jason Noble reports: "Before she got into politics, congressional hopeful Kim Weaver was a professional psychic. Weaver, a Democrat from Sheldon ... operated an array of psychic services websites, hosted an internet radio show and participated in online discussions of the supernatural ... Known as 'Kimberanne' — a portmanteau of her first and middle names — and 'the Spirit Weaver,' Weaver charged customers as much as $3.99 per minute for readings online and over the phone and dispensed advice on matters ranging from romance to careers to real estate. In one recording obtained by the Register, Weaver performed a tarot card reading to reassure a distraught woman that her missing husband was not dead." In responding to the Register's article, a spokesman for Weaver said: "Kim does not actually believe she has psychic abilities, but she does foresee Steve King being unemployed after 2018."

HOT ON THE LEFT:

“‘Extraordinary, good man’: A Utah judge’s description of a former Mormon bishop convicted of rape,” from Kristine Phillips: “Last month, Judge Thomas Low allowed a former Mormon bishop who was just convicted of nearly a dozen sexual assault charges to go home while he waited to be sentenced. Criticisms snowballed after Keith Robert Vallejo’s sentencing hearing last week. Although Low sentenced Vallejo to prison, he also praised the defendant[:] ‘The court has no doubt that Mr. Vallejo is an extraordinary, good man,’ Low said ... ‘But great men sometimes do bad things.’ Low became emotional as he uttered the words and took a long pause mid-sentence ... Advocates say the statement compromised Low’s independence as a judge and left an impression that the former county prosecutor had no regard for people who have been raped. It’s even more critical in a state that advocates say has one of the highest rates of sexual assault in the country.”

HOT ON THE RIGHT:

"Haitians get word of Trump crackdown, slow flow to border by 97%," from the Washington Times: "Sometime around November, word began to trickle back down the spine of Latin America: The U.S. was getting stricter about letting in Haitians at the border. Not only had the Obama administration begun deporting Haitians after a six-year humanitarian pause, but [Trump] also had just been elected, presaging an even tougher policy. Many of those en route ... figured they had gone that far and had little to lose by trying to finish the journey north. But for the tens of thousands of Haitians in Brazil, Chile and elsewhere in South America who had been planning to journey north, the news was devastating. In a matter of weeks, the northward stream of people dried up. It is one of the biggest among a plethora of success stories from the southwestern border, where illegal immigration appears to have nearly dried up in the two months since Mr. Trump took office."

DAYBOOK:

At the White House: Trump will travel to Milwaukee, Wisconsin, where he will tour and deliver remarks at Snap-On Tools. Later, Trump will sign the Buy American, Hire American Executive Order before traveling back to D.C.

Mike Pence is in Asia: Pence will deliver remarks and participate in a business listening session with U.S.-based companies in Seoul, before departing to Tokyo, where he will participate in a bilateral meeting and working lunch with Prime Minister Shinzō Abe. Later, Pence will participate in a bilateral meeting and joint press conference with Deputy Prime Minister Tarō Asō, and participate in a cultural visit.

Meanwhile, Obama will attend the funeral of former Pittsburgh Steelers owner Dan Rooney, an early supporter of his presidential campaign who later became ambassador to Ireland.

QUOTE OF THE DAY:

"Just like any other damn president," sighed Trump voter Theresa Remington, 44, a home-care worker and the mother of two active-duty Marines, scraping at an unlit cigarette as she gambled at a casino outside Philadelphia. She supported the president because she expected him to improve conditions for veterans and overhaul the health care system. Now? "Political bluster," Remington said, before making another run at the quarter slots. She wondered aloud how Bernie Sanders might have fared in the job. (New York Times)

NEWS YOU CAN USE IF YOU LIVE IN D.C.:

-- The Capital Weather Gang gives today's forecast an official "Nice Day" rating (10/10): "Sunny and comfortable, with afternoon highs in the lower to middle 70s. Light breezes from the north in the morning shift to come from the southeast in the afternoon. Humidity remains relatively low, which is great for comfort but more challenging for us allergy sufferers, unfortunately."

-- A Metro passenger was robbed and beaten on a Red Line train approaching the Wheaton station in Montgomery County. Authorities said a group of three or four people approached the seated victim, and one sat beside him. "I need you to give me the password for that phone and look the other way, otherwise it will not end well for you," the man was told, according to Metro officials. When he refused, they began punching him in the face and head, removing his credit and debit cards from his pockets as he tried to shield himself from the blows. The robbers then fled at the next station. It happened around 5:40 p.m. on Easter Sunday. (Marty Weil)

Republicans won, but the closeness of a Kansas special election could reverberate

Democratic candidate James Thompson, with his wife Lisa and daughter Liberty, concedes last night at the Murdock Theatre in Wichita, Kansas. BY JAMES HOHMANN
with Breanne Deppisch

THE BIG IDEA: Donald Trump carried Kansas's fourth congressional district by 27 points last fall. In yesterday's special election to replace Mike Pompeo, who stepped down to become CIA director, state treasurer Ron Estes prevailed by just 7 points.

The unexpectedly strong performance of a Bernie Sanders supporter, who had never before run for office, in a Wichita-area district, which is home to Koch Industries, has set off alarm bells in some Republican quarters about next year's midterm elections. It has also raised the stakes for another special election next week in Georgia.

Without the last-minute intervention of Trump himself and a big infusion of cash from the national party apparatus, Democrats might have taken the seat for the first time since Dan Glickman got swept out by the 1994 wave.

Here are 12 takeaways from last night:

1. Fewer districts can be considered truly safe. There are only 75 congressional districts that are more reliably Republican than the Kansas Fourth, based on the Cook political index. The GOP retains a 23-seat advantage in the House. As the CEO of TargetSmart, a big political data firm, notes:

From the publisher of Political Wire:

2. The close call could make it harder for the GOP to recruit the best candidates in 2018 and easier for Democrats. It could also prod some Republican lawmakers who are on the fence about running for reelection toward retirement. Illustrating that, as he conceded defeat, Democratic candidate James Thompson announced that he will try again next year.
3. If Republicans think the Kansas swing portends a bigger 2018 backlash, some may change their behavior. When a congressman thinks he'll easily win reelection in a cakewalk, he is more inclined to take tough votes and walk down whatever plank his leadership wants. If that member feels suddenly that he has a target on his back, depending on the composition of the district, he might be more inclined to break with Trump or Speaker Paul Ryan. If he starts to worry more about losing in a general election than a primary, he might be willing to vote with Democrats on some stuff, like funding the government, and shy away from supporting bills that become fodder for attack ads, like cutting Medicaid.
4. Last night will strengthen the conviction of Democratic leaders that they should not bail out their GOP counterparts. There are a bunch of rank-and-file Democrats who want to cooperate with Republicans, but leadership and the liberal base think the best strategy is to stay out of the way and let Republicans cannibalize themselves. The Kansas results will inspire Nancy Pelosi to drive a harder bargain in negotiations with Ryan when the Freedom Caucus won't come along. It is, after all, in the interests of the Democratic caucus to make Republicans look incapable of governing.

5. Sam Brownback, the toxically-unpopular governor, had a lot to do with the tightness of the race. "In Topeka, the state capital, Estes became associated with a Republican governing team that has presided over a weak economic recovery and a series of budget deficits," David Weigel reports. "Democrats — and increasingly, voters — came to blame Brownback's supply-side tax cuts, which ate into the state's revenue. In 2016, as Republicans won across the country, the party lost ground in Kansas. Democrats gained 12 seats in the state House and one seat in the state Senate, after moderate anti-Brownback Republicans defeated conservatives in a series of primaries." But Democrats and Republicans alike note that Brownback has been unpopular for a while, and it has not registered in any federal races until now. So there is certainly more to it than just him.
6. Estes's under-performance does suggest that Republicans will struggle to keep control of the governor's mansion in 2018. Brownback's approval rating has been mired in the mid-20s statewide. "If Kansas Republicans thought that running away from Brownback in a federal race was hard, they can't be looking forward to the race to succeed the deeply unpopular governor," said DGA communications director Jared Leopold. "Kansas voters are fed up with Brownback economics and will reject the next Brownback clone that Republicans nominate."

GOP holds on to House seat in Kansas

7. Trump might actually have pulled Estes across the finish line. The president recorded a robocall to push his supporters to the polls and tweeted about the contest yesterday:

The Democratic candidate even cited Trump last night as a factor in his loss. "I probably shouldn't say this, but Mr. Estes did not beat us," Thompson said. "It took a president of the United States."

8. Rural voters saved Republicans once again. Thompson narrowly carried Sedgwick County, which includes Wichita and is the most populous part of the district. Trump had won there by 18 points. But Estes held on because he ran up huge margins in smaller outlying counties.

Ron Estes thanks Ted Cruz for flying to Wichita to help him on Monday. (Fernando Salazar/The Wichita Eagle via AP)

9. The late intervention by national Republicans made a big difference. An internal GOP poll last week showed Estes up just 1 point, which prompted a massive influx of outside money. The National Republican Congressional Committee spent $92,000 on brutal attack ads that claimed the Democrat supported late-term abortion and sex-selective abortion, something he denied. The Congressional Leadership Fund, Ryan's aligned super PAC, dropped a bunch of money and organized GOTV efforts.

Thompson gets a hug from a supporter at his watch party last night. (Travis Heying/The Wichita Eagle via AP)

10. National Democrats will face more pressure than ever from the left flank to spend money in red districts, even if there's no realistic path to victory. Even as Republicans poured money in, national Democrats largely steered clear. The chair of the DNC said last week that his group wasn't planning to spend. The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee said it didn't want to nationalize the race and didn't do anything more than some late phone banking.

The House Democratic campaign arm finally reached out last week to Thompson, but only to inquire whether he had any internal polling to share, according to the New York Times. The Thompson campaign never paid for a poll.

A lot of liberals are attacking the Democratic party apparatus for not helping Thompson, arguing that he might have been able to win if they had even just matched GOP spending. A political reporter for The Guardian laughed about the intense finger-pointing:

11. There will also be more pressure on the establishment from the Bernie Wing to get behind unapologetically progressive populists, rather than the moderate candidates who have historically been able to actually compete in places like Kansas.

12. Democrats always had a better shot at picking off the open seat in Georgia than in Kansas. In the Atlanta suburbs, there was a huge drop-off from Mitt Romney in 2012 to Trump in 2016. That didn't happen in Pompeo's district. (I wrote about this dynamic in February.) Democratic candidate Jon Ossoff is currently leading in the April 18 contest to replace Health and Human Services Secretary Tom Price against a crowded field of Republicans. He is still likely to face a two-way runoff. Both parties have heavily engaged with the race.

What you need to know about former Trump adviser Carter Page

-- The FBI obtained a FISA warrant last summer to monitor the communications of former Trump adviser Carter Page, as part an investigation into possible links between Russia and the Trump campaign. Ellen Nakashima, Devlin Barrett and Adam Entous scoop: "The FBI and the Justice Department obtained the warrant ... after convincing a Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court judge that there was probable cause to believe Page was acting as an agent of a foreign power. ... This is the clearest evidence so far that the FBI had reason to believe during the 2016 presidential campaign that a Trump campaign adviser was in touch with Russian agents. The government's application ... included a lengthy declaration that laid out investigators' basis for believing that Page was an agent of the Russian government and knowingly engaged in clandestine intelligence activities on behalf of Moscow, officials said. Among other things, the application cited contacts that he had with a Russian intelligence operative in New York City in 2013 ... In addition, the application said Page had other contacts with Russian operatives that have not been publicly disclosed."

Since the 90-day warrant was first issued, it has been renewed more than once by the FISA court. "The judges who rule on FISA requests oversee the nation's most sensitive national security cases, and their warrants are some of the most closely guarded secrets in the world of U.S. law enforcement and intelligence gathering," our colleagues write. "Any FISA application has to be approved at the highest levels of the Justice Department and the FBI." FBI Director James Comey has said FISA applications are often "thicker than his wrists" – representing the magnitude of work required by Justice Department attorneys and FBI agents in order to convince a judge that such surveillance is appropriate. Page has repeatedly denied any wrongdoing.

-- Republican and Democratic lawmakers and aides who have reviewed the classified intelligence reports brought to light by Devin Nunes tell CNN that they have found "no evidence" so far that Obama administration officials did anything unusual or illegal. This undercuts Trump's claims that former national security adviser Susan Rice broke the law with her unmasking requests, which Trump calls a "massive" story. "Over the last week, several members and staff of the House and Senate intelligence committees have reviewed intelligence reports related to those requests at NSA headquarters in Fort Meade, Maryland," CNN reports. "One congressional intelligence source described the requests made by Rice as 'normal and appropriate' for officials who serve in that role to the president. And another source said there's 'absolutely' no smoking gun in the reports, urging the White House to declassify them to make clear there was nothing alarming in the documents.

-- "Records match some Ukraine ledger payments to ex-Trump aide," by the Associated Press: "Last August, a handwritten ledger surfaced in Ukraine with dollar amounts and dates next to the name of Paul Manafort, who was then [Trump's] campaign chairman. Ukrainian investigators called it evidence of off-the-books payments from a pro-Russian political party — and part of a larger pattern of corruption under the country's former president. Now, [newly obtained] financial records ... confirm that at least $1.2 million in payments listed in the ledger next to Manafort's name were actually received by his consulting firm in the United States. They include payments in 2007 and 2009, providing the first evidence that Manafort's firm received at least some money listed in the so-called Black Ledger."

Spicer: 'I made a mistake'

-- White House press secretary Sean Spicer apologized again this morning at the Newseum for claiming during his briefing that Adolph Hitler did not use chemical weapons during World War II, calling it an "inexcusable and reprehensible" mistake. In criticizing Syrian President Bashar al-Assad's alleged use of sarin gas Tuesday afternoon, Spicer said that even Hitler did not sink to that level of warfare and "was not using the gas on his own people in the same way that Assad is doing," despite Hitler's use of gas chambers to kill millions of Jews and others. Following hours of controversy, and a written statement trying to clean up what he'd said at the briefing, Spicer went on Wolf Blitzer's TV show to apologize. He also reportedly called the office of Sheldon Adelson, a major Jewish GOP donor, to apologize personally.

"President Trump and his aides rarely apologize for controversial remarks or stating factual errors and often take a confrontational approach when challenged," Jenna Johnson and Ashley Parker note. "Spicer's decision to appear on CNN late in the day was a sign of just how badly his remarks were being received both inside and outside the White House."

-- Is this the beginning of the end for Stephen K. Bannon? The president appeared to place his chief strategist at an arm's length in an interview with the New York Post's Michael Goodwin yesterday. He complained that the ex-Breitbart CEO's role in his administration and campaign has been overstated. "I like Steve, but you have to remember he was not involved in my campaign until very late," Trump said. "I had already beaten all the senators and all the governors, and I didn't know Steve. I'm my own strategist and it wasn't like I was going to change strategies because I was facing crooked Hillary." Referring to the feud between Bannon and his son-in-law Jared Kushner, Trump added: "Steve is a good guy, but I told them to straighten it out or I will."

Astute Trump observer Maggie Haberman reads between the lines:

-- Fox News host Bill O'Reilly told viewers last night that he is taking a "vacation" from his show until April 24 to go on a trip which he says was booked last fall. Dozens of companies have yanked advertisements, slicing ad time for the show by more than half. An internal investigation into sexual harassment allegations is being conducted by outside counsel. Two highly-placed Fox sources told New York Magazine's Gabriel Sherman that 21st Century Fox CEO James Murdoch would like O'Reilly to be permanently taken off the air, while his father Rupert and older brother Lachlan are more inclined to keep him. 1. ATF agents used a secret bank account to rent a $21,000 NASCAR suite, travel to Vegas, and donate to the school of one of the agent's children, the New York Times reports. The incident highlights the agency's lax oversight that allowed employees and informants to spend millions while avoiding normal accounting protocols.
2. The U.S. Postal Service agreed to pay $49 million to settle a class action lawsuit after "dawdling" for more than two decades in paying more than 2,000 life insurance beneficiaries (Joe Davidson)
3. The USDA has halted the use of cyanide traps in Idaho after one exploded last month, harming a 14-year-old boy and killing his Labrador retriever. The agency announced that it has "ceased all use of" the devices. (Karin Brulliard)
4. Navy SEALs are battling a "staggering" drug problem that has corroded their elite ranks and even forced a temporary training pause last December, CBS News reports. Three current and former SEALs said "multiple" team members have tested positive for illegal drugs including cocaine, marijuana and ecstasy. Apparently, the problem had been ignored by Navy leadership for years.
5. Former Iranian president Mahmoud Ahmadinejad unexpectedly filed to run (again) in the upcoming election. This contradicts a recommendation from the supreme leader that he should stay out of the race – and could upend an election many believed would be won by moderate President Hassan Rouhani. (AP)
6. Rolling Stone reached a settlement with former U-Va. associate dean Nicole Eramo, who sued the magazine for defamation stemming from a discredited 2014 story about an alleged gang rape on campus. The settlement caps a years-long legal trial that roiled Charlottesville. (T. Rees Shapiro and Emma Brown)

9. A Marvel comic book artist is facing disciplinary action after he inserted two Koranic references into an X-Men strip, which critics have slammed for containing "anti-Christian" and "anti-Jewish" iconography. Marvel has pulled the offending strips and says the artist is facing disciplinary action. (Cleve R. Wootson Jr.)
10. Friends, family, and fellow service members gathered to honor the life of a World War II veteran whose body was found stuffed inside a suitcase last month. The distressing discovery has prompted law enforcement officials and veterans' groups to demand justice for his death, saying the former "belly gunner" – whose wartime assignment was so dangerous it was often dubbed a "suicide mission" – deserved to be buried in dignity. ## TRUMP'S FOREIGN POLICY:

-- "Trump promised an 'unpredictable' foreign policy. To allies, it looks incoherent," by Kevin Sullivan and Karen Tumulty: "During his campaign, Trump summed up his approach to foreign policy this way: 'We must as a nation be more unpredictable.' But now that he is commander in chief, anxious allies say that unpredictability might be better described as incoherence — a dangerous tendency at a moment of high tension with Russia and Syria, and with U.S. warships heading toward the Korean Peninsula. In interviews over the past few weeks with a half-dozen foreign ambassadors based in Washington, most complained ... that thin lines of communication have made it difficult for them to explain U.S. intentions to officials in their home capitals. That is creating strain on traditionally solid alliances, they said. 'Nobody can tell us on Russia what the American policy is, on Syria what the American policy is, on China what the American policy is,' one ambassador said. 'I'm not sure there is a policy.'"

As Trump holds meetings with fellow world leaders, his remarks have at times heightened doubts that he has a clear sense of what direction he intends to take U.S. foreign policy: "During their White House meeting last month, [German Chancellor Angela] Merkel tried to pin down Trump on one of the top concerns of U.S. trading partners — a proposed 'border adjustment tax' to be imposed on imported goods. Publicly, Trump has signaled an openness to the idea, but he also said it has drawbacks. 'Don't worry,' Trump told Merkel, holding his thumb and forefinger close together. 'It will only be a little bit.'" Trump's breezy answer — and Merkel's exasperation — has been the talk of diplomatic circles in Washington and Europe. 'So all the chancellor of Germany knows is that, 'It will only be a little bit,'" said a senior European diplomat in Washington, holding up his fingers as Trump did, and repeating an account confirmed by others in anxious embassies in Washington. 'It's very puzzling.'"

Mattis: Assad 'should think long and hard' about using chemical weapons

-- The Trump administration took the unusual step of declassifying U.S. intelligence assessments as it sought to discredit Russia's claims about the attack in Syria — a coordinated broadside from the White House, State Department and Pentagon that adds to rapidly-increasing tensions with the Kremlin. Missy Ryan, Greg Jaffe and Dan Lamothe report: "Officials said their case against the Syrian government included signals and aerial intelligence — combined with local reporting and samples taken from victims ... that showed a Russian-made, Syrian-piloted SU-22 aircraft dropped at least one munition carrying the nerve agent sarin. ... [American officials] said U.S. surveillance tracked the aircraft as it took off from a base near the city of Homs, loitered over the strike area in Idlib province and delivered its deadly yield. The officials said that nothing from an array of intelligence and publicly available material provided any credence to the alternative account put forward by Syria and Russia, which claimed that routine bombing struck an opposition chemical weapons depot."

"I have personally reviewed the intelligence, and there is no doubt the Syrian regime is responsible for the decision to attack and for the attack itself," Defense Secretary Jim Mattis told reporters. And while U.S. officials have not yet reached a consensus on whether Russia knew about the assault ahead of time, many suggested it was unlikely they would have been kept in the dark. "I think it's clear that the Russians are trying to cover up what happened there," one official said.

(Reuters/Maxim Shemetov)

-- Rex Tillerson is in Russia. Carol Morello and David Filipov report: "Tillerson told reporters that the U.S. is aiming for a negotiated end to six years of conflict in Syria and wants Russia's help in ushering Assad out of office. In what was in effect an ultimatum, he said Moscow must calculate the costs of remaining an ally of Assad, the Iranians and Lebanon's Shiite militia Hezbollah. 'Is that a long-term alliance that serves Russia's interests?' he told reporters. 'Or would Russia prefer to realign with the U.S., with other Western countries and Middle East countries that are seeking to resolve the Syrian crisis?'" Tillerson also told reporters that last week's attack shows that Moscow either did not fulfill or did not take seriously its role in a 2013 agreement to oversee the destruction of Assad's chemical-weapons arsenal. In either case, he added, the distinction "doesn't much matter to the -- Before Tillerson even exited his plane in Moscow, Vladimir Putin told a news conference that the Kremlin has information that "provocateurs" are planning to plant chemical substances in Damascus and "blame it on Syrian authorities": He said the situation in Syria reminded him of events in Iraq before 2003, alluding to the unfounded "weapons of mass destruction" assertion used to justify the war. He also accused Western countries divided over Trump's election of "scapegoating" Russia and Syria: "We've seen all this before," Putin said. Putin's spokesman said it remained unclear whether the Russian president will meet with Tillerson on Wednesday.

-- Tillerson left other ministers at the G-7 conference befuddled after asking why U.S. taxpayers should care about Ukraine. Bloomberg's Nick Wadhams and John Follain report: "French Foreign Minister Jean-Marc Ayrault ... [later] said he responded that American taxpayers ought to want a European Union that's 'strong politically, strong from a security point of view, and strong economically.' But the provocative remark suggested Tillerson ... is still finding his footing in a world of diplomacy where even passing remarks are parsed for deeper meaning. The question was sure to give pause to any European official fearful that [Trump] might ease sanctions and let the former Soviet state slip back into it Russia's orbit, even as tensions with Moscow are running high." Asked what Tillerson was driving at with his question about Ukraine, State Department spokesman R.C. Hammond responded with two words: "Rhetorical device."

Trump called China a 'currency manipulator.' Does it deserve the label?

-- Trump is struggling to enact policies that match his trade rhetoric. Damian Paletta and Ana Swanson report: "Within days Trump will decide whether ... to declare China a 'currency manipulator,' a designation that could lead to new U.S. tariffs if China doesn't change its practices. And while Trump has called China 'grand champions' of currency manipulation as recently as February, three people familiar with the discussions say it did not appear likely that the Treasury Department would officially designate China in its semiannual foreign currency report due Saturday." Meanwhile, Trump suggested in a tweet Tuesday morning that he will now tie trade discussions to whether Beijing works harder to contain North Korea – his first acknowledgement that trade discussions can become subsumed into broader diplomatic negotiations."

-- But the less-confrontational approach drew harsh criticism from Sen. Chuck Schumer, who held a conference call with reporters Tuesday to criticize Trump's refusal so far to declare China a currency manipulator. Asked to respond to Trump's tweet, the Senate minority leader agreed that China's currency manipulation and current problems in North Korea are linked, "but in the opposite way" that Trump suggested: "The Chinese have done nothing on North Korea, and I don't think they will unless they think America is tough," Schumer said. "The tougher we are on trade, the more likely China is going to think we're tough on North Korea." (Ed O'Keefe)

-- Beyond China, the White House has missed an internal mid-March deadline to begin renegotiating NAFTA with Mexico and Canada. A draft letter that would begin the process remains unsigned. During a meeting with company executives yesterday, Trump promised more progress on the talks. "We're going to have some very pleasant surprises for you on NAFTA," he said.

-- Meanwhile, there are signs that frayed U.S.-Mexico relations are beginning to mend as Trump refrains from publicly attacking the country. The Wall Street Journal's David Luhnow and Jacob Schlesinger report: "Earlier this year, U.S.-Mexican relations hit their worst crisis in decades when [Trump] and Enrique Peña Nieto quarreled over who would pay for a proposed border wall, prompting the Mexican president to call off a planned trip to Washington. But then a funny thing happened: Mr. Trump, at the urging of senior aides, stopped attacking Mexico on Twitter and in public statements, opening up space to officials from both countries to markedly improve ties since then, U.S. and Mexican officials say. 'The relationship is much more constructive,' a senior Mexican government official said. A senior U.S. official agreed, saying the greater contact between the sides had improved ties. Many people in Mexico City remain nervous about Mr. Trump's trade stance. But the cautious sigh of relief there that his administration may not disrupt the world economic order as much as once feared is echoed in capitals around the world, and in Washington.” “The radio silence from the president’s Twitter feed has been extremely important to provide breathing room” to both sides, said Arturo Sarukhán, Mexico’s former ambassador to the U.S.

-- The U.S. and North Korea continued to engage in high-tension brinkmanship, with Pyongyang threatening to “hit the U.S. first” with nuclear weapons. Analysts said the prospects of them following through is slim, Anna Fifield reports. “The stakes remain too high for both countries, analysts say, today as they were yesterday, as they were last year. ‘I don’t think we’re about to go to war against North Korea,” said Ralph Cossa, president of the Center for Strategic and International Studies’s Pacific Forum. “But the U.S. is certainly trying to send a message that they are fed up with the North Koreans and with sending strong letters of protest.” Still, expectations are mounting that North Korea will unleash some kind of provocation this week, as the Kim regime prepares to celebrate the 105th anniversary of its founding president's birthday.

-- Chinese President Xi Jinping urged Trump to find a “peaceful solution” to the crisis on the Korean Peninsula during a telephone call between the two leaders early Wednesday. The call comes just days after the two held their first face-to-face talks in Florida, and hours after Trump tweeted that North Korea was “looking for trouble,” suggesting the U.S. would “solve the problem” with or without assistance from Beijing. #### THE DECONSTRUCTION OF THE ADMINISTRATIVE STATE GOES ON:

-- The White House is instructing all federal agencies to submit a plan to shrink their civilian workforces -- offering the first details on how the Trump administration aims to rein in the size and scope of the government. Lisa Rein and Damian Paletta report: OMB Director Mick Mulvaney told reporters Tuesday that a government hiring freeze will be lifted “immediately,” but said agency leaders must start “taking immediate actions” to save money and reduce staff. “This does not mean that agencies will be free to hire willy nilly,” Mulvaney said ... He called the restructuring a more “strategic” and “surgical” plan to rein in the federal workforce. In accordance with Trump’s budget proposal released last month, Mulvaney said some agencies such as the Defense Department and the VA will add staff, while others, like the EPA, will “end up paring” full-time employees “even greater than they would have ... during the hiring freeze.”

-- A draft budget proposal obtained by The Post details how the Trump administration seeks to cut more than 31 percent of the EPA’s budget. Denise Lu and Armand Emamdjomeh report: “The spending plan emphasizes a focus on the EPA’s ‘core legal requirements,’ withdrawing from state and local projects and avoiding any efforts the administration considers to be extraneous within the EPA or other agencies. Among the cuts, the budget shuts 56 programs and trims staffing by nearly 4,000 jobs. Many of the programs slated to be cut are either programs focusing on specific geographic areas or federal grants that go out to states to fund specific projects. Some of these programs are part of the Clean Water Act of 1972, which charges the EPA with helping to restore the nation’s waterways.”

-- Also being watched by environmentalists: the D.C. Circuit granted a request by Trump’s EPA to postpone oral argument in a case over the Obama administration’s 2015 smog standard – a move that allows Scott Pruitt additional time to reconsider the rule. Juliet Eilperin reports: “The EPA asked on Friday for the postponement, saying [Trump's] appointees 'are closely reviewing the 2015 rule to determine whether the Agency should reconsider the rule or some part of it.' The new standard, which imposes tighter restrictions on ground-level ozone, was challenged both by several industry groups and Republican-controlled states as too tough and by a coalition of environmental and public health organizations as not stringent enough."

-- Meanwhile, Trump has claimed credit for the creation of more than 600,000 jobs since he took office, a figure that overstates his true job creation numbers by tens of thousands — if not hundreds of thousands. Politico's Noland McCaskill reports: "'We've created over 600,000 jobs already in a very short period of time, and it's gonna really start catching on now because some of the things that we've done are big league, and they are catching on,'" Trump told CEOs in a meeting Tuesday morning. "'Already, we've created more than almost 600,000 jobs.' ... According to Labor Department data, the U. S. economy added a combined 317,000 jobs in February and March, the first full months Trump's presidency. About 98,000 of those jobs were added last month."

IMMIGRATION WARS:

-- Jeff Sessions directed U.S. prosecutors to make immigration cases a higher priority and "look for opportunities" to bring serious felony charges against undocumented immigrants. Sessions's order is the latest in a string of contentious moves, as he seeks to expand the Justice Department's role in immigration enforcement. Matt Zapotosky and Sari Horwitz report: In a memo Tuesday, Sessions directed each federal attorney to appoint a "border security coordinator" to oversee the prosecution of illegal immigrants, and to make immigration offenses — including harboring undocumented immigrants — "higher priorities." Sessions asked prosecutors to consider whether they could bring felony charges against those who illegally crossed the border multiple times, and whether they could be charged with aggravated identity theft — a felony charge carrying a mandatory two-year prison sentence. Meanwhile, he said, law enforcement will no longer "catch and release" undocumented immigrants taken into custody at the border.

Advocates and legal analysts criticized the attorney general's aggressive posture, saying it raises "troubling questions" about the DOJ's intentions and use of resources. "Which prosecutors and agents does he want to divert from the growing threats like terrorism, cyber crime, the opioid and heroin trade, organized crime and cartel activity?" asked Jenny Durkan, a former U.S. attorney in D.C. "The 'surge' philosophy always requires taking agents, money and prosecutors from other priorities. In fact, the cost of satisfying Washington will reduce the ability of every U.S. attorney to address the greatest threats in their communities."

-- The White House temporarily suspended a weekly publication of U.S. "sanctuary cities" — or localities that refuse to honor federal immigration detainers -- after several law enforcement agencies complained that they were erroneously included in the report. An ICE spokesman said the agency is reviewing its methodology and plans to resume publication after the review is completed. (David Nakamura and Maria Sacchetti)

-- Mulvaney, for his part, is pressing lawmakers to restrict federal funding grants for sanctuary cities in the upcoming short-term spending measure for the government, which expires on April 28. Politico reports: "The goal is to bring the House Freedom Caucus on board with a government funding bill, according to Capitol Hill Republicans — or at least show that the administration is courting the support of the hard-right and pushing GOP leaders to adopt Trump's priorities." Until now, the shutdown brinkmanship seemed like it wouldn't happen...

PERSONNEL IS POLICY:

-- Pennsylvania lawmaker Tom Marino has reportedly been tapped as the next White House drug czar and is expected to step down from his congressional seat to serve in the Trump administration. The 64-year-old Republican served as one of Trump's earliest Capitol Hill backers during his presidential campaign, Ed O'Keefe writes, and is reportedly in the final stages of completing his paperwork for the White House post. If confirmed, he will be the fifth congressional Republican tapped to serve in Trump's administration. This means another special election.

-- LGBT advocacy groups launched an effort to block Trump's Army secretary nominee Mark Green from being confirmed, citing the former Tennessee lawmaker's "appalling" record of antagonism and hostility towards the gay community. Dan Lamothe reports: Green has suggested that being transgender is a "disease," and sponsored controversial legislation critics say would allow employers to discriminate on the basis of sexual orientation. And his incendiary remarks date to as recently as last fall, when he said that despite widespread millennial acceptance of transgender people, he wanted to be a "light" that set the record straight. "If you really want to bring this back to who's at fault, I mean we gotta look a little bit inwardly," he said. "I mean, we've tolerated immorality and we're not reflecting light."

IF YOU CAN'T PUT ON A SUCCESSFUL EASTER EGG ROLL, WHAT CAN YOU DO?

-- The New York Times' Julie Hirschfeld Davis reports that the administration is playing catch up on organizing the annual Easter Egg Roll, and that it's not looking promising: "Trump received an urgent warning in February, informing him of a crucial date he was about to miss. 'FYI manufacturing deadlines for the Easter eggs are near,' said a Twitter post directed at Mr. Trump ... 'Please reach out!' The message came from Wells Wood Turning & Finishing, the company that supplies commemorative wooden eggs ... for the 138-year-old celebration that has drawn 35,000 people to the South Lawn in recent years. By the time Trump officials got in touch, the ovoid uncertainty appeared to raise a critical question: Could [Trump's] White House, plagued by slow hiring and lacking an on-site first lady, manage to pull off the largest, most elaborate and most heavily scrutinized public event of the year? The evidence points to a quickly thrown-together affair. ... There may be half as many guests, a fraction of the number of volunteers to manage the invasion of the South Lawn, and military bands in place of A-list entertainers like Justin Bieber, Ariana Grande, Idina Menzel and Silentó who have performed for Egg Rolls past. White House officials did not respond to several weeks' worth of inquiries ... and declined to provide basic information such as how many people are expected to attend."

-- Also unclear: Will Spicer will dig out his bunny suit for the event, as he did during the Bush years?

-- Asked for reaction to the Times's story, Spicer said: "I think we're going to have an egg-cellent time."

SOME GOOD NEWS FOR SENATE DEMS:

-- Republican Sen. Susan Collins said she is seriously contemplating a run for Maine governor in 2018. The senator had mostly demurred until a local radio interview yesterday. "Let me say that I am looking at where I can do the most good for the people of Maine," said Collins, who has served in the Senate for 20 years. "In the Senate, I now have significant seniority and that allows me to do a lot. Coming to be governor, if I were fortunate enough to be elected ... you can work on issues I care a lot about like economic development, jobs, education. And I would try to heal the state and bring people back together, which I think is important as well. So I'm trying to figure out where I can do the most good. I'm being totally honest with you – I truly don't know, I really don't, it's a hard decision."

Collins, 64, told the Portland Press Herald that she won't make a final decision until later this year. She ran for governor in 1994 and lost to Angus King, now the junior senator. If Collins won, outgoing Republican Gov. LePage would get to appoint her successor for the two years that would remain in her term. But that'd make it much easier for Democrats to pick up the seat in 2020.

When these flight troubles arise, here are your rights as a passenger

UNITED'S P.R. NIGHTMARE CONTINUES:

-- Video footage of a man being violently dragged off a United Airlines flight dominated headlines for the second day in a row, spiraling into a full-blown public relations nightmare as consumers across the globe threatened to boycott the airline and lawmakers urged a federal investigation. The story occupied nearly every corner of the news industry, with Jimmy Kimmel dedicating a portion of his show to discussing it and White House press secretary Sean Spicer lamenting the "unfortunate" incident. "Clearly, when you watch the video, it is troubling to see how that was handled," he told reporters.

The company's damage control measures escalated in kind: United CEO Oscar Munoz issued a second apology Tuesday and launched an internal investigation into the incident, after his original response was widely lampooned as tone-deaf and insufficient. "No one should ever be mistreated this way," Munoz said Tuesday. He promised a public review of the company's partnerships with law enforcement, and its policies on giving seats to employees, by the end of the month. Meanwhile, dragged passenger David Dao remained in the hospital receiving treatment for his injuries. (He also retained a high-powered attorney.)

*Chinese social media exploded with outrage over the incident, with many users suggesting the man's race may have been a factor in his treatment. By late afternoon on Tuesday, the topic had attracted 160 million readers -- prompting responses from public figures in the country and a number of widely-shared petitions urging a boycott of the airline. (This could prove to be a big headache for United, CNBC notes: the company is China's largest U.S. carrier and accounts for 20 percent of all flights between the two countries.)

*The L.A. Times published the story of a California investment manager who says United employees threatened to handcuff him last week after he refused to vacate his first-class seat in order to make room for a "higher priority" passenger: "They said they have a priority list and this other person was higher on the list than me," Geoff Fearn recounted. "They said they'd put me in cuffs if they had to."

*The Post's Abby Ohlheiser has a full timeline of how social media turned United into the biggest story in the country.

Residents in Brownsville, Tenn. (Michael S. Williamson/The Washington Post)

WAPO HIGHLIGHTS:

-- "In the Tennessee Delta, a poor community loses its hospital — and sense of security," by Amy Goldstein: "This town of the Tennessee Delta, seat of a county that once grew the most cotton east of the Mississippi, relied for decades on a little public hospital built during the Great Depression ... But these days, plywood boards are nailed up behind the hospital's sliding glass entrances ... [and] the nearest ER is more than a half-hour ambulance ride away. The demise of Haywood Park Community Hospital three years ago this summer added Brownsville to an epidemic of dying hospitals across rural America. Nearly 80 have closed since 2010 ... [and] many more are considered fragile — downstream victims of federal health policies, shifts in medical practice and the limited tolerance of distant corporate owners for empty beds and financial losses. In every rural community, the ripple effects of a lost hospital are profound, reverberating beyond the inability of would-be patients to get immediate care. Many of the best jobs in town vanish. Local leaders trying to recruit new industry face an extra hurdle.”

-- “Starving to death,” by Max Bearak and Laris Karklis: “Our world produces enough food to feed all its inhabitants. When one region is suffering severe hunger, global humanitarian institutions, though often cash-strapped, are theoretically capable of transporting food and averting catastrophe. But this year, South Sudan slipped into famine, and Nigeria, Somalia and Yemen are each on the verge of their own. Famine now threatens 20 million people — more than at any time since World War II. Each of these four countries is in a protracted conflict. While humanitarian assistance can save lives in the immediate term, none of the food crises can be solved in the long term without a semblance of peace. [And] at this time of unprecedented need, the world’s biggest supplier of humanitarian relief is getting ready for a major cutback. Humanitarian aid makes up a tiny fraction of the U.S. government spending — less than 1 percent — but the Trump administration’s proposed budget would eliminate much of it.”

GOOD READS FROM ELSEWHERE:

-- New York Times Magazine, "I Thought I Understood the American Right. Trump Proved Me Wrong," by conservative historian Rick Perlstein: "The professional guardians of America's past ... had made a mistake. We advanced a narrative of the American right that was far too constricted to anticipate the rise of a man like Trump. Historians, of course, are not called upon to be seers. Our professional canons warn us against presentism — we are supposed to weigh the evidence of the past on its own terms — but at the same time, the questions we ask are conditioned by the present. That is, ultimately, what we are called upon to explain. Which poses a question: If [Trump] is the latest chapter of conservatism's story, might historians have been telling that story wrong?"

"I was one of the historians who helped forge this narrative. Writing about the movement that led to Goldwater's 1964 Republican nomination, for instance, it never occurred to me to pay much attention to McCarthyism, even though McCarthy helped Goldwater win his Senate seat in 1952, and Goldwater supported McCarthy to the end. (As did William F. Buckley.) I was writing about the modern conservative movement, the one that led to Reagan, not about the brutish relics of a more gothic, ill-formed and supposedly incoherent reactionary era that preceded it."

-- McClatchy DC, "Can Democrats cuss their way back to the White House?" by Alex Roarty: "An old political maxim holds that politicians campaign in poetry but govern in prose. But after voters rewarded [Trump] despite – or perhaps because of – his plain, often expletive-prone rhetoric, Democrats are suddenly quite eager to adopt the language of America's president. From the party's new chairman to a senator many believe will run for the White House in 2020, Democrats are letting loose four-letter words in public speeches and interviews, causing a small stir, at least in political circles, where swearing in public is usually off limits. But behind the rhetoric is a real struggle for a party still trying to find its way in the aftermath of last year's electoral catastrophe. In the age of Trump, party strategists wonder, do Democrats need to start talking in bolder, blunter terms to connect with voters – even if that means occasionally contributing to the swear jar?"

HOT ON THE LEFT:

"Did a Republican running for Va. governor really dress up like a Confederate gent?" from Laura Vozzella: "For a minute there, it looked like Corey Stewart's bid for Virginia governor had morphed him from Confederate flag-waver to fully costumed Confederate reenactor. He turned up at the Old South Ball ... wearing a bow tie and dark bolero jacket bedecked with lots of shiny buttons. 'Over my dead body when I'm governor of Virginia are we ever going to take down the statue of Robert E. Lee or Stonewall Jackson ...' he roared in [a video filmed at the] dance hall, plastered with the Stars and Bars. He put in a good word for the flag, too. 'I'm proud to be next to the Confederate flag,' said Stewart ... 'It's time that we stop running away from our heritage. It's time that we embrace it.' So is it also time to dress up like Virginia is still the capital of the Confederacy? Apparently so for anyone attending the ball, an annual event that raises money for wounded veterans but has drawn criticism for glorifying the days of slavery."

HOT ON THE RIGHT:

"Notre Dame Students Complain: Mike Pence Makes Us 'Feel Unsafe,'" from The Federalist: "Students at the University of Notre Dame are not happy that Vice President Mike Pence is going to speak at their commencement ceremony. Some are even claiming that Pence's presence on campus makes them 'feel unsafe,' and have taken to social media to express their hurt feelings ... Two seniors encouraged their fellow students to share messages about why Pence makes them feel unsafe written out on white boards, photographed, and posted via Facebook and Twitter. Senior Jourdyhn Williams, another student involved in the protest, said she thinks it 'goes against certain Catholic Social Teaching,' to invite Pence, a conservative Christian, on campus." Seniors urged graduating students to share the hashtag, #NotMyCommencementSpeaker and #NotMyVicePresident ahead of his remarks.

DAYBOOK:

At the White House: Trump will hold meetings with House Judiciary Chairman Bob Goodlatte and Secretary General Jens Stoltenberg of NATO before leading an expanded bilateral meeting with General Stoltenberg. Later, the two will hold a joint press conference.

QUOTE OF THE DAY:

"We're not going into Syria." -- Trump to the New York Post

NEWS YOU CAN USE IF YOU LIVE IN D.C.:

-- Bring your umbrella – today's pleasantly mild morning could be followed by some scattered showers. The Capital Weather Gang forecasts: "It's a mild start with morning temperatures mainly in the 60s. As a weak cold front moves through, a few scattered showers are possible through the morning hours under partly to mostly cloudy skies. Increasing afternoon sun should help highs to the mid-to-upper 70s."

-- The Nationals beat the Cardinals 8-3.

-- Democrat Daniel Helmer, an Army veteran and Rhodes Scholar who says he is "emboldened" by the election of Trump, launched a campaign to unseat Rep. Barbara Comstock in Virginia. He said he has raised $120,000 so far — an amount he hopes will set him apart from an already-crowded field of contenders vying to represent the Northern Virginia district. (Jenna Portnoy)

-- Former congressman Tom Perriello gained a slight advantage in Virginia's gubernatorial race, according to a fresh Quinnipiac University poll of Democratic voters, giving him a 25 to 20 percent edge over Lt. Gov. Ralph Northam. Meanwhile, former political strategist Ed Gillespie continued to hold a strong 28 percent lead in the GOP primary field – with second-place contender Corey Stewart drawing 12 percent and state Sen. Frank Wagner netting 7 percent. (Fenit Nirappil)

(Stratfor)

Trade will be at the forefront of many leaders' minds this quarter as a new U.S. administration settles into the White House. Though U.S. President Donald Trump continues to be bogged down by congressional battles and allegations of inappropriate ties to Russia, his team will try to draw the public's attention back to its trade agenda. To that end, Washington will work to clarify its strategy for cracking down on currency manipulation abroad, tightening the enforcement of existing trade laws and preparing to renegotiate NAFTA. But the uncertainty surrounding the White House's intentions will linger, prompting the United States' biggest trade partners to look for new economic relationships elsewhere.

At the same time, some will leverage security cooperation and promises of investment to get on Washington's good side — or, at the very least, to try to fend off its punitive trade measures. China will be one of them as it uses its economic heft with Pyongyang, and the growing sense of urgency surrounding North Korea's nuclear program, to its advantage in tense trade talks with the United States. The White House will do what it can to push for secondary sanctions against China's stubborn neighbor, perhaps even threatening to step up its military aid to Taiwan to compel Beijing's buy-in. But even if Washington has its way, a heavier sanctions regime will do little to slow the progress of Pyongyang's nuclear program. The United States will have no choice, then, but to build a credible military deterrent against North Korea — a move that will only widen the rift between Washington and Beijing.

The Trump administration's attack on a Syrian air base was designed in large part to underscore to Beijing and Pyongyang that this White House is willing to take military action if so compelled. Though the attack sent a strong signal to U.S. adversaries, it also has created complications for the United States on the Syrian battlefield with Russia. Moscow will try to use the heightened risk of collisions on the Syrian battlefield and the fight against the Islamic State to bring Washington to the negotiating table, but the United States will be limited in any concessions it would give to Russia in return. The Kremlin will be even less inclined to trust in dialogue with the West as its problems pile up at home, though arms control may be one policy area in which the two can begin to negotiate without encountering much political blowback.

As the United States and Russia box Turkey in on the Syrian battlefield, Ankara will devote more attention to northern Iraq, where a conflict is brewing between Arab and Kurdish forces. The highly prized, oil-rich region of Kirkuk remains a key flashpoint in Turkey's competition with Iran for influence — and Iraq's rival Kurdish factions are caught in the middle. Washington will lend support to Sunni states, led by Saudi Arabia, seeking to balance against Shiite Iran as proxy battles throughout the Middle East escalate, though its nuclear deal with Tehran will remain intact.

In the meantime, Saudi Arabia and its Gulf Cooperation Council allies will shoulder most of the burden of maintaining OPEC's oil production cuts for another six months. Steady oil prices will buy Venezuela's cash-strapped government some time to get its finances in order, but not much. Caracas' risk of default will spike in the second half of the year, and the ruling party will have to spend the second quarter consolidating power in preparation for the turmoil that no doubt lies ahead.

Venezuela isn't the only state heading toward single-party rule. On the other side of the globe, Indian politics are swinging to the right — a trend Prime Minister Narendra Modi and his center-right Bharatiya Janata Party have been able to use to their advantage. This quarter, they will focus on passing a state-level version of a massive tax overhaul that cleared Parliament earlier in the year, a feat that will be more feasible as the growing power of the country's Hindu nationalists gives the ruling party the political capital to push through much-needed structural reforms.

Nigeria will have less luck passing its most pressing reforms as an intensifying power struggle in Abuja brings the government to a near-standstill. Concerns over President Muhammadu Buhari's health have raised questions about who his successor will be — a transition South Africa's own leader, Jacob Zuma, is making preparations for as well. Zuma is working quickly to consolidate power and cater to his ethnic Zulu base with a populist platform of black empowerment before he steps down, alienating investors in the process.

Europe's entrenched rulers face a growing threat to their power as well, albeit of a very different kind. France is preparing to hold elections that will pit the country's traditional political elite against an up-and-coming Euroskeptic contender, and Italy may not be far behind. Though the French electoral system is designed to keep fringe parties out of power, the possibility of a Euroskeptic win cannot be discounted — an outcome that could bring the eurozone to its knees and send shocks through global markets.

European Disintegration

This year will be the one in which political risk reaches the European Union's core members. During the second quarter, this will become evident as France — the bloc's second-largest economy — holds presidential and legislative elections, the results of which will resonate far beyond the country's borders. French voters will have to choose whether they want their country to reform the European Union or dismantle it to restore their state's full sovereignty.

Italy will also become a source of political risk as it moves closer to holding general elections. The current Italian government will probably stay in place this quarter, but the specter of an election in which Euroskeptic forces are expected to perform well will do little to ease concerns about the country's fragile banks and high debt levels. Germany, meanwhile, will try to keep the European Union together as it opens its own campaign season. The coming quarter will be eventful for Greece as well as Athens implements the reforms it promised to its creditors.

The Fate of the Eurozone

French presidential and legislative elections will be the most important events to take place in Europe during the second quarter. A significant portion of France's political apparatus will be elected and appointed over the next three months. The presidential election will be held in two rounds on April 23 and May 7, while legislative elections (also split into two rounds) will follow on June 11 and June 18. French voters will have to decide whether they want to further liberalize and deregulate their economy or increase protectionism. They will also have to choose whether they want France to stay a member of a reformed European Union or leave the Continental bloc entirely.

The biggest contenders in the elections are the nationalist National Front, the centrist En Marche!, the center-right Republicans, the left-wing Unsubmissive France, and the center-left Socialists. Should any of the moderate parties win the presidency, they will focus primarily on economic and security issues. A moderate government (especially under En Marche! or the Republicans) would seek to make the economy more competitive through various combinations of spending cuts, public investment, labor reform and initiatives to reduce bureaucracy, cut down on regulation and attract foreign investment. A moderate government would probably also direct more resources toward security forces and defense spending, while at the international level it would work to reform the European Union and defend France's leading role in it. The possibility of different parties controlling the presidency and the National Assembly cannot be excluded. This would complicate policymaking.

France's two-round electoral system has historically made it difficult for extremist parties to win presidential and legislative races. Candidates have to receive more than 50 percent of the vote to gain the presidency or a seat in the National Assembly, a threshold that the National Front, for instance, has found tough to reach. If the National Front overcomes this hurdle and wins the presidency, it will set in motion a chain of events that could lead to severe crisis in the European Union.

For one, the National Front wants to introduce tariffs on French imports and tax companies that hire foreign workers, including EU nationals. Both ideas go against the basic principles of the EU single market, which emphasizes the free movement of people, goods, services and capital. Even more important, however, the party also intends to hold a referendum on France's membership in the eurozone. Many of the National Front's campaign promises would require a majority in Parliament, and in some cases the legal procedures to implement them would be arduous. National Front leader Marine Le Pen has also said the referendum on eurozone membership would be called only after six months of negotiations on reforming the European Union. But even the mere victory of the National Front in the presidential election could trigger a crisis in the eurozone. Savers in the eurozone's periphery states (such as Spain, Portugal and Greece) could, for example, withdraw their money from local banks or transfer it to safer havens abroad, forcing authorities to introduce capital controls at the national or Continental level to stop a run on eurozone banks.

If France's moderates win, Germany will immediately invite the new president to shore up bilateral ties between Paris and Berlin and co-lead Europe. In global markets, the euro, along with riskier assets such as bonds from Europe's periphery, will strengthen rapidly. Should the National Front win, on the other hand, the German government will seek accommodation with the nationalist government in Paris, trying to dissuade it from fulfilling its most radical campaign promises. But many of the National Front's policies are simply incompatible with EU structures, limiting its room for compromise. And if serious trouble arises in the eurozone, Berlin will start making preparations for the most orderly dissolution of the currency area possible while planning its next steps with its closest partners in Central and Northern Europe. The market fallout of a potential eurozone collapse would be immediately felt in global markets as European investors flee riskier bonds and move their money to safer assets, such as German bonds.

Italy, meanwhile, is moving toward its own general elections, though it is unclear just how quickly they will arrive. The country does not have to hold elections until early 2018, but disputes within the ruling center-left Democratic Party could precipitate an early vote. The government in Rome, led by Prime Minister Paolo Gentiloni, will remain weak as Italy's main political parties prepare for the elections. Ahead of the vote, the Democratic Party will hold its primary to appoint a new leader in late April — a necessary step before the government resigns and parliamentary elections can be held.

Still, the elections will not take place during the second quarter. This means that Italy's vote will not coincide with France's, giving markets and EU governments time to digest the latter's results. But the lingering risk of elections in Italy, where Euroskeptic parties would probably make a strong showing, will add to the uncertainty clouding Italy's political and financial future. This will do little to ease market fears about the health of Italian banks and the country's high levels of public debt. But Italy could introduce some modest spending cuts to allay the European Commission's concerns about its deficit, and whatever frictions may arise, Rome and Brussels will find a compromise, allowing Italy to avoid EU sanctions.

Greece, another troubled eurozone country, will also be politically and financially fragile this quarter. Because Greece does not have any significant debt repayments to make until mid-July, negotiations between Athens and its creditors on the disbursement of the next tranche of bailout money could drag on for weeks, perhaps even extending beyond the end of the quarter. Nevertheless, the Greek bailout program will stay on track since Athens and its creditors are eager to avoid a default at all costs, though Athens will try to tone down some of the policies it has promised to implement, or announce spending increases in some areas, in hopes of avoiding a rebellion within the government.

In the meantime, Germany will continue to delay granting debt relief to Greece during its own election cycle. It could, however, make vague promises to discuss the issue in the future. Even if the International Monetary Fund does not announce a decision on its participation in the bailout program during the quarter, Greece and its creditors will work to keep it in place.

For an export-dependent economy such as Germany's, the prospect of a trade war brewing with the United States and Washington's threats to undermine the World Trade Organization are also major sources of concern. Consequently, Berlin will keep communication channels open with the new administration in the White House to defend Germany's stance on these issues, as well as on many other points of controversy between the two governments. Germany will also use its rotating presidency at the G-20 to defend free trade and the role of multilateral trade organizations.

Germany's strategy will include preserving the European Union's single market and expanding the bloc's trade relationships with other markets, primarily by supporting EU plans to resume stalled free trade talks. During the second quarter, for example, the European Union will revive negotiations with Mexico to update their free trade agreement. Brussels' efforts to sign free trade agreements with countries such as Japan and India will likewise intensify. Germany will advocate the development of closer trade ties between the European Union and China as well, though the bloc will struggle to get European companies the same level of access to China that Chinese companies have to Europe, creating room for friction during any negotiations that are held. Berlin's aggressive stance against Chinese takeovers of German companies will lead to similar complications during the talks.

To curry favor with the United States, the German government is willing to make gestures of good faith in areas such as defense spending. But this will not go over well in Germany. After all, it is an election year and the German government will be forced to keep lines of communication open with Washington while also being critical of the new administration, especially since a large portion of the German public disapproves of U.S. President Donald Trump. The relationship between the ruling center-right Christian Democratic Union (CDU) and its coalition partners in the center-left Social Democratic Party (SPD) will encounter additional tension as the two try to differentiate themselves before the general elections.

Regional elections in the northwestern German states of Schleswig-Holstein (May 7) and North Rhine-Westphalia (May 14) will test the appeal of the SPD and CDU ahead of the September vote. They will also act as a gauge of the popularity of smaller parties, such as the environmentalist Green Party, the left-wing Die Linke and the center-right Free Democratic Party — all of which could become coalition partners to the SPD and CDU after the elections end. Moreover, the regional races will show whether the nationalist Alternative for Germany (AfD), whose popularity has declined in recent months, can make gains beyond its strongholds in the east and enter the legislatures of western regions. Regardless of the AfD's performance, other parties will refuse to cooperate with it. Yet the AfD's role in German politics is not necessarily to enter government, but to force moderate parties to incorporate elements of its nationalist agenda into their own.

Brexit and Beyond

Brexit negotiations among the British government, EU institutions and EU members will begin in earnest in the second quarter. But the process will last at least two years. All sides will spend most of the next three months in exploratory discussions that aim to define the framework and terms of the negotiations, and no dramatic decisions are expected this early on. Before the talks can even begin, the European Union's remaining 27 members will have to agree to give the European Commission directives for its talks with London.

Some of the topics at the top of the Brexit agenda will include the legal status of British citizens living in the European Union and of EU citizens living in the United Kingdom. The parties are also likely to debate the Brexit's financial aspects, including the United Kingdom's contributions and payments to the European Union in the years ahead. This will create frictions, as the British government would try to keep its exit bill as small as possible. At the same time, the British government will be interested in starting conversations on the free trade agreement it hopes to sign with the European Union. But EU negotiators will insist on a sequential approach, starting with the country's exit and leaving the debate over the terms of its future relations for a later date.

British Prime Minister Theresa May's administration, meanwhile, will face the difficult task of reassuring the devolved governments in Scotland, Northern Ireland and Wales that their voices will be heard and their interests will be protected during the Brexit talks. London will also have to make sure that the central government remains in control of the Brexit process. London may promise subsidies, investment, tax breaks and even the transfer of powers currently in the hands of the European Union to regional governments to try to appease secessionist claims. It is unlikely, however, to give Scotland and Northern Ireland a decisive role in the negotiations. And as Northern Irish nationalist and unionist parties struggle to find common ground, the Good Friday Agreement that defines how the region's government operates will continue to show signs of fatigue.

Divided EU Foreign Policies

The next three months will bring a flurry of debates about Russia to the Continent. As the July 31 expiration date for EU sanctions against Russia approaches, the bloc's internal discussions about its relations with Moscow will become more frequent. Since there have not been any notable changes on the ground in eastern Ukraine or in U.S.-Russia ties since the Trump administration took office, most EU members will support the continuation of existing sanctions. Though the bloc does not have to make its decision until late July, the possibility of it coming before the end of the quarter cannot be ruled out. Should the issue be put to a vote within the next three months, some countries will voice their criticism of the sanctions but are unlikely to veto the decision of the majority. (That said, an electoral victory by France's National Front, which has argued against new punitive measures toward Russia, would significantly threaten the Continent's sanctions regime.)

Crossing Borders

As the weather starts to improve in the Mediterranean Sea, migration to the European Union's southern members will pick up. Along the migrant route traversing the eastern Mediterranean, the EU-Turkey immigration agreement still holds, but Ankara has the power to refuse to honor the deal and to stop policing migrant traffic. If it does, it would be in an effort to put pressure on the European Union, whose half-hearted compliance with the terms of the deal has rankled Ankara. The bloc, for example, has not lifted visa restrictions for Turkish citizens — one of the main promises it made to Ankara in exchange for its cooperation in preventing asylum seekers from entering the European Union. Several EU states will also continue to criticize the Turkish government's attempts to consolidate power following last year's failed coup attempt, giving Turkey added reason to threaten to renege on the deal.

Many migrants may, in fact, become emboldened by the Turkish government's threats and attempt the journey from Turkey to Greece. But Ankara will not give up on the migrant deal completely, since it still hopes to use the agreement — and Europe's fear of the political side effects that renewed waves of immigration could have in an election year — to negotiate and expand its customs union with the bloc in the near future. Maintaining these deep economic ties with Europe is especially important to Turkey as its economy continues to founder.

Regardless, EU members will try to protect themselves from a possible uptick in asylum seekers, keeping their borders closed along the biggest migration routes. This will pose a serious threat to Greece, as the country risks once again becoming a bottleneck for migrants who reach its shores but cannot keep moving northward.

There is also only so much the European Union can do to tamp down on the Central Mediterranean migrant route. In recent months the bloc has stepped up its political, economic and security cooperation with countries in sub-Saharan Africa, from which many migrants originate, as well as with Libya, the main transit state for migrants trying to reach Southern Europe. These policies will continue during the second quarter, but their impact will be modest. Italy and other southern EU members will see more migrants arrive on their doorsteps as weather conditions improve, creating tensions between them and their peers in Northern Europe. Rome will demand greater assistance to handle the influx of people, and if it allows some migrants to pass through its borders and into the rest of the Continent, frictions between it and its neighbors could worsen.

The United States and Russia will see heightened frictions this quarter despite widespread speculation that the election of U.S. President Donald Trump would pave the way for a detente with Moscow. As scrutiny over Russia's meddling in U.S. politics builds, any engagement with Moscow will become politically problematic for Washington. And despite Trump's campaign rhetoric, it is in his best interest to keep pressure on Russia through sanctions and continued support for NATO. As a result, both countries will continue their military buildups along Russia's periphery this quarter, and each will test the other's sphere of influence.

Following a limited U.S. strike on a Syrian air base, Russia will position itself as a potential spoiler on the Syrian battlefield to try to draw the United States back to the negotiating table. The risk for collision between the powers is higher this quarter as Russia tries to leverage deconfliction in Syrian airspace to complicate ongoing U.S. military operations in Syria against the Islamic State. Russia's reliance on negative influence to try to bargain with Washington, however, will risk further souring the negotiating climate and limit potential collaboration. But there may still be room for restarting a dialogue in other areas, such as arms control. Both sides need to resolve several arms control issues, including their differences over violations of the Intermediate-Range Nuclear Forces Treaty, the question of whether to renew the New Strategic Arms Reduction Treaty (START), and a strategy for responding to the buildup of weapons arsenals by other powers, such as China.

Moscow, meanwhile, will be busy trying to expand its influence abroad, including in North Africa and the Balkans. In the coming quarter, it will gradually increase its involvement in the Libyan conflict by backing multiple factions while coordinating closely with Egypt. In the Balkans, Russia will also continue bolstering its support for Serbian nationalists, both in Serbia ahead of elections and in Northern Kosovo. Moscow will likewise back the separatist claims of Bosnia's Republika Srpska and will work to deepen the divides between Macedonia and the West over the political status of the country's Albanians. Russia does not expect these countries to become staunch allies; rather, it hopes to use the mounting tension to distract the West and gain political leverage.

Moscow will also work to widen rifts in Europe, particularly as the Continent prepares for French elections. Russian cyber, information and propaganda campaigns will continue to sow discord and increase uncertainty in France, especially if the Kremlin's preferred candidate, Marine Le Pen, does not win the presidency. Moscow will use the same tools to bolster Euroskepticism, particularly in Italy and Germany. Its efforts are likely to intensify in the lead-up to Europe's July deadline to extend sanctions on Russia. Even with sanctions in place, however, Moscow will work to bring European investment back to Russia when it hosts a major investment forum in June.

The Fight for Russia's Borderlands

In the meantime, the standoff between Russia and the West will continue to shape the strategic landscape of the European borderlands. The conflict in eastern Ukraine will maintain its intensity, since the security and political components of the Minsk protocols are unlikely to be implemented this quarter. Economic ties between Ukraine and its separatist territories will deteriorate because of a blockade instituted in the first quarter, forcing the rebel regions to rely on Russia and spurring long-term energy diversification efforts in Ukraine proper forward. As the European Union and United States continue to be distracted by issues elsewhere, Ukraine will build up its economic and security cooperation with Poland and the Baltic states to supplement its Western integration strategy. Meanwhile, the course of European politics (and, in particular, the outcome of France's presidential race) will be key to determining the future of EU sanctions against Russia, though they are unlikely to be lifted altogether this quarter.

Moldova and Georgia, for their part, will look to strengthen their economic ties with Russia while seeking to soften tactical elements of their policies toward breakaway territories out of pragmatism. Nevertheless, they will also continue cooperating with the European Union and NATO. (Moldova, for instance, is slated to open a NATO liaison office in April.) To the north, Belarus will come under greater domestic pressure as protests over a controversial tax policy persist, testing longtime President Aleksandr Lukashenko's undisputed grip on power. Though the unrest has so far remained a domestic issue, external powers — including the West and Russia, which have long competed for influence in Belarus — could become involved, potentially exacerbating the protests.

Armenia and Azerbaijan's dispute over the separatist region of Nagorno-Karabakh won't die down this quarter either. In fact, hostilities may intensify after Armenia's parliamentary elections are held in early April. Russia will continue to serve as the primary arbiter and power broker in the dispute as Turkey remains distracted (and, to an extent, dependent on Russia's cooperation) in the Middle East. But Moscow's attempts to build on its gains and increase its clout in the region through the Eurasian Economic Union and Collective Security Treaty Organization will be compromised by infighting within the blocs.

Russia's Internal Struggle

Apart from its foreign interests, Russia will have to contend with a somewhat chaotic domestic environment this quarter. Though the Russian economy will continue to recover from recession, stagnation will linger through the rest of the year. Despite the sanctions against it, Moscow will court foreign investment from the West, the Asia-Pacific and South Asia at its annual St. Petersburg International Economic Forum in June, putting on hold many of its isolationist practices of the past three years.

Regardless of this relatively bright outlook, many Russian regions and citizens are in dire financial straits. Constant hardship will inflame protests over political, economic and social issues across the country. The Kremlin has tried to ensure that these demonstrations do not coalesce into a single movement against it, but if they do, security forces have been fortified and deployed nationwide to respond. Russia's heavy-handed crackdowns on opposition figures and dissent will continue, and it could start to squeeze social media channels as well.

Russian President Vladimir Putin will also work to contain the country's political elite as they continue to make grabs for power. At the same time, the Kremlin will struggle to answer tough questions about the ownership of assets, such as Chechnya's oil sector and defense companies, and whether to force energy giants such as Rosneft to cut production. All the while, Russia's security services and their cyber centers — prized portfolios for the country's elite — seem to be undergoing a reorganization behind closed doors in the wake of accusations and arrests tied to the alleged hacking campaign targeting the U.S. presidential election. Such contests for power will further isolate Putin as he grows more authoritarian in order to preserve the stability of the political system beneath him.

Moscow Looks to the East

Russia, meanwhile, will keep diversifying its ties away from the West in the second quarter. Putin will hold another much-touted summit, this time with Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe, as Russia and Japan attempt to mend their relationship. The two countries have for some time been hung up on a territorial dispute over islands they both claim. Though they have made minor progress in settling the spat, including by establishing joint investment projects and agreeing to visa-free travel on the islands, neither is ready to make a grand bargain for them or reach a peace deal. Russia still sees the islands as an issue of national sovereignty and as a front line in its nuclear deterrence, while Japan has maintained sanctions on Russia and has been slow to release funds promised to projects in Russia's Far East. So, though both sides will promote better ties, actual steps toward achieving them will be few and far between.

Russia will work to expand its relationships elsewhere in Asia as well. Moscow will hold its annual economic forum in May, which key delegations from China, Japan and India will attend. Beijing is looking to extend its "One Belt, One Road" initiative through Russia, while Japan is still holding out hope of investing in the Far East. The summit will be co-hosted by India, since New Delhi has been pumping more money into Russia, and Moscow wants to rekindle its ties with the South Asian country to balance its other relationships in Asia. Russia and Vietnam will also hold a summit this quarter; Moscow is aiming to improve its foothold in the country with energy, military and metals investment deals to gain leverage in the wider region.

Instability in Central Asia

Central Asia's troubles will not end in the second quarter as protests, militancy and political infighting persist. Kazakhstan and Kyrgyzstan will probably be the Central Asian states most vulnerable to unrest — the former because of its foundering economy and the latter because of an impending presidential election in November. (Kazakhstan will also begin the rocky process of transferring some powers from long-serving President Nursultan Nazarbayev to Parliament and the Cabinet.) But tension will build in Uzbekistan as well as the country's new president, Shavkat Mirziyoyev, and security chief Rustam Inoyatov spar over reforms. All the while, Russia will seek to steadily increase its sway over the region, particularly on matters of security.

The Syrian Civil War

The United States faces heightened risk on the Syrian battlefield this quarter at the same time it prepares to kick off a major offensive against Islamic State in Raqqa. A U.S. limited strike on a Syrian air base in response to a Syrian chemical weapons attack was designed to demonstrate the United States' decisiveness in military matters (a message not lost on North Korea,) but it also came with risks. Russia has long attempted to leverage the Syrian battlefield in its broader negotiations with the United States, but the United States is not leaving much room for a bargain with Moscow. Russia thus has to rely on negative influence to try and draw the United States into a dialogue and will try to play the role of spoiler on the Syrian battlefield to raise operational risks for the United States. There will be potential for the two sides to negotiate on deconfliction, but that will likely be the extent of their cooperation this quarter as Washington focuses on the fight against the Islamic State.

Russian forces will be active elsewhere in Syria, however, supporting the Syrian army's offensives against rebel forces as well as the Islamic State in theaters such as Deir el-Zour. After a few shaky months in place, the cease-fire that Russia, Turkey and Iran brokered between the rebels and loyalists in December 2016 has broken down completely. Its failure underscores the futility of the attempted peace talks that took place throughout the first quarter. In the second quarter, Syria's deepening economic woes, evident in the country's food shortages and collapsing currency, will threaten the government's hold on loyalist territory.

Syrian fighters backed by the United States will lead the charge in Raqqa. The United States' battle plan, which also includes deployments of U.S. troops, will rely on the most effective fighting force available in the short term: the multiethnic Syrian Democratic Forces (SDF). The SDF has made swift work of the fight so far, having nearly encircled the city. With help from the freshly deployed U.S. forces, artillery support has also been put in place.

But by emphasizing the SDF in the battle for Raqqa, the United States will further strain its already tense relations with Turkey. The forces include members of the Kurdish People's Protection Units (YPG), a militia Turkey considers a terrorist organization and an active threat to its national security. Still, Ankara's dismay will not discourage Washington from working with the force. And though Turkey will try to finagle a more prominent role for the forces it supports, including Turkish-trained Arab tribal forces, the United States will prioritize winning the fight against the Islamic State by the most expedient means available over appeasing Turkey. Turkey will nonetheless try to draw the United States deeper in a fight against the Syrian regime and push its proposals for establishing a no fly one and safe zones in in Syria.

Washington's battle plan for Raqqa is just one of many complications Ankara will have to contend with in Syria in the second quarter. By the time Turkey took al-Bab from the Islamic State during the last quarter, it had already accomplished many of its objectives in northern Syria under Operation Euphrates Shield. But its efforts to keep Kurdish forces from establishing control over a contiguous swath of territory in the northern part of the country are still in progress. To achieve that objective, it will have to tread lightly so as not to step on Russia's toes. Ankara and Moscow's alliance of convenience has mostly run its course in Syria, especially since Russia foiled Turkey's plans to take the city of Manbij. Nevertheless, the two countries need to keep the lines of communication open to ensure that their troops don't end up in conflict. If their priorities in Syria continue diverging, Turkey may start looking for other ways to gain leverage over Russia — by joining in on negotiations over the Nagorno-Karabakh dispute, for instance, or increasing its coordination with fellow NATO members in the Black Sea. And even though Turkey will have less room to maneuver in Syria this quarter, it will still have some leeway to deepen its involvement in northern Iraq.

The Fight Against the Islamic State

In the Middle East and North Africa, the primary focus of the second quarter will be the fight against the Islamic State. The battle to oust the extremist group from its strongholds in the region will reach milestones in multiple theaters in the months ahead. In Iraq, for instance, the battle for Mosul will come to a close, at least in the city itself. And in Syria, the operation to reclaim the city of Raqqa is about to get underway. These events, though notable, will hardly herald the demise of the Islamic State. In fact, the organization will redouble its terrorist activities, not only in its core area of operations in the Middle East but also internationally, in an attempt to maintain its relevance as it loses territory.

The Battle for Mosul

Five months into the fighting, the end of the Mosul offensive is now in sight. Before the operation ends, though, Iraqi forces will deploy to other Islamic State strongholds such as Tal Afar and Hawija to sweep the extremist group out of those pockets. As the main battle comes to a close, the divisions among the Iraqi coalition's constituent groups will become clearer than ever. The risk of infighting among the alliance's Shiite, Kurdish and Sunni militias will be high throughout the quarter, particularly in the northern border regions of Nineveh province.

That Iraqi army forces are engaged in fighting in the city itself has improved the central government's reputation among Mosul residents; the boost will help Baghdad gain legitimacy and establish its authority over the city. But stabilizing the reclaimed territories around the city will be a tall order for Baghdad. Rifts within Shiite, Sunni and Kurdish groups will prevent them from reaching a coherent political settlement over Nineveh province's future this quarter. Iran and Turkey, meanwhile, will continue to vie for influence in Iraq, primarily through proxy battles in the disputed territories that will soon be reclaimed from the Islamic State. The Iraqi government and the Kurdistan Regional Government (KRG) each claim control of Tal Afar, Kirkuk and Sinjar, making these areas most susceptible to fighting and disputes over territory and resources.

As Iraq's political parties gear up for provincial elections in September, regional powers such as Turkey and Iran will have yet another opportunity to try to gain influence in the country. Tehran will use its sway among Iraq's Shiite political parties and militias to goad Baghdad to prioritize its ties with Iran and to block Ankara's attempts to get involved in the political settlement process through Sunni parties. Prime Minister Haider al-Abadi will face mounting political pressure from all sides, including Iraq's nationalist parties, as he tries to appease Turkey, Iran and the West simultaneously. Adding to the mix, Saudi Arabia will make economic and diplomatic gestures in an effort to strengthen its ties with Baghdad. (U. S. President Donald Trump's administration has been pressuring the kingdom to help loosen Iran's grip on Baghdad's political and security spheres.)

The Kurdish Struggle

In Iraqi Kurdistan, disagreements will prevent the region's various political factions from forming a united front. In fact, the divisions are widening. The Patriotic Union of Kurdistan (PUK) has started pushing back more forcefully against its main political rival, the Kurdistan Democratic Party (KDP), to increase its share of oil revenues from Kirkuk and weaken the KDP's alliance with Baghdad. The dispute is good news for Baghdad, at least. Should the PUK make another attempt at disrupting the flow of oil from Kirkuk to win concessions from Baghdad or Arbil, the Iraqi government will feel less threatened than it would if the KDP were also in on the plan. But Kirkuk could become a flashpoint this quarter regardless, as the governments in Baghdad and the KRG, not to mention the rival Kurdish parties, fight over control of the province and its oil production.

Iraqi Kurdistan, similarly, will be a primary playing field in the competition between Turkey and Iran. Ankara will use the presence of the Kurdistan Workers' Party (PKK), which it considers a terrorist organization, in northern Iraq as a pretext to deploy proxy forces in the region to defend its interests there. Turkey might consider, for instance, dispatching the Rojava Peshmerga, a Kurdish militia aligned with the KDP, to fight on its behalf in the event that ethnic conflict flares up after the Mosul offensive winds down. To keep Ankara in check and support its own interests in northern Iraq, Tehran will rely on the mostly Shiite Popular Mobilization Forces positioned near Turkish-backed forces, as well as its ties with Baghdad.

Turkey's Resurgence

In Turkey, voters will head to the polls in mid-April to decide whether to go ahead with proposed constitutional amendments that could change Turkey's political future. President Recep Tayyip Erdogan has a lot riding on the success of the reforms, which would increase the powers of the presidency and curtail those of other branches of government. But when voters cast their ballots on April 16, they will have other concerns on their minds, such as the country's flagging economy. Turkey's high dollar-denominated debt and weakening currency — set to further deteriorate as the dollar strengthens — have exacerbated its financial troubles recently. If the referendum falls short of the simple majority it needs to pass, the ruling Justice and Development Party (AKP) will still retain power, though the loss would be a blow for Erdogan's campaign to consolidate institutional control.

To try to improve its chances of success, the AKP has been using the country's security concerns to stoke nationalism and stir popular support for the referendum. The wave of nationalism sweeping Turkey will buoy the ruling party, win or lose. Nevertheless, the results of the referendum will reveal strong support for and opposition to the AKP, laying bare the country's sharp political divisions.

Iran's Arc of Influence

Iran will also hold an important vote this quarter. Voters in the country will elect their next president May 19. As the election approaches, even the Islamic republic's hard-line politicians are trying to avoid instigating conflict with the United States. Washington, likewise, will be careful not to provoke hostilities with Tehran by changing the Joint Comprehensive Plan of Action nuclear deal — especially since the GCC countries support keeping the agreement in place rather than risking uncertainty by scrapping it. But that won't stop the Islamic Revolutionary Guard Corps from keeping up its usual defensive posturing and staging missile tests or military exercises in a bid to stay relevant. And as U.S. lawmakers have made clear, Congress will not hesitate to impose additional sanctions against Tehran in response to any perceived aggression.

The threat of new sanctions from the United States will compound Iranian President Hassan Rouhani's economic worries in the runup to the elections. When campaign season kicks off in April, the incumbent leader will face challenges from opponents in Iran's hard-line and conservative camps alike. And though Rouhani has experience, momentum and his role in Iran's economic recovery to date on his side, the country's lingering financial troubles will weigh heavy on voters' minds as they head for the ballot box. Inflation has fallen under Rouhani's administration, but unemployment is still high — a vulnerability his opponents may seize on during the campaign.

As the Islamic republic gears up for its election, one of its prized proxy forces, Hezbollah, could derail a vote in Lebanon. The militia's allies and enemies are still at odds over electoral reforms and a new budget, and their disagreements could postpone elections set for May. Notwithstanding the current dispute, the Lebanese government has come a long way over the past several months. A new prime minister and president have managed to reshuffle the country's military leadership and, more important, revive its stagnant energy sector. Their progress highlights the pragmatic approach Lebanon's main political parties have taken to try to find a viable compromise to solve the country's persistent problems. But as the lingering differences over electoral reform demonstrate, no solution is perfect.

Hezbollah will also be a source of growing concern for Israel during the second quarter. The group's military buildup in Syria over the course of the civil war there, combined with its growing presence in the Golan Heights, has put Israel on high alert and fueled fears of an impending war at the country's northern border. To prevent Hezbollah from getting any stronger, the Israeli government will continue attacking its arms shipments in southern Syria. Nevertheless, the conflict could escalate during the second quarter.

Israel's Survival Strategy

If the Israeli government keeps pursuing its settlement policy in the West Bank without objection from the White House, moreover, the proliferating communities could provoke a violent response from Palestinians there. The risk of renewed conflict, sparked by competing Salafist groups or merely by chance events, will loom large in the Palestinian Authority, though its two main political parties, Fatah and Hamas, will each try to avoid confrontation with Israel this quarter. In addition, the political divides between the parties could further postpone legislative elections in the Palestinian territories, scheduled in the West Bank for May.

Hamas and Fatah will each be focused on their own internal objectives this quarter rather than on bridging the divide between them. Hamas is working to modify its political charter for the first time in decades, breaking with tradition to recognize the 1967 Palestinian borders. The party's turn toward moderation, however slight, is meant to curry favor with Arab partners such as Egypt, whose support Hamas needs more than ever now that the Islamic State's Sinai faction is threatening its supply routes and legitimacy. (Israel will put little stock in the group's efforts at change, though, and will continue its operations against Hamas.) Fatah's leaders, meanwhile, will be focused on establishing a succession plan for aging party leader and Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas. The enduring rifts between the rival Palestinian parties will prompt Arab states in the region to get more involved to try to resolve the struggle.

The Saudi Survival Strategy

For Saudi Arabia, the second quarter will hinge on OPEC's May 25 meeting. The summit, during which Riyadh will cajole its fellow members in the oil cartel to extend the production cut instated in November 2016, will be a turning point for the Saudi government's economic reform initiatives. Even though the production cap hasn't boosted oil prices as much as Riyadh hoped it would, the kingdom is in no position to risk oversaturating the market by scrapping the deal. Doing so, after all, would further destabilize the price of oil, jeopardizing Saudi Arabia's oil revenues in the process. Whether the country can persuade the rest of OPEC to stay the course with the production cut will determine every other economic action that the Saudi government takes for the rest of the year.

The Yemeni Civil War

With all sides of the conflict locked in a stalemate, Yemen's civil war will enter the second quarter more or less stagnant. The rifts in the Gulf Cooperation Council (GCC) military coalition against Yemen's Houthi rebels are more pronounced than ever. The United Arab Emirates is focused on training and supporting its own forces in the south. Saudi Arabia, on the other hand, is looking to the United States for help negotiating a political resolution to end the fight. But until Riyadh compromises in its adamant support for Yemeni President Abd Rabboh Mansour Hadi, and the Houthi rebels agree to relinquish territory to the government, the prospects for peace will be slim. So though the United Nations will make another attempt at forging a peace plan for the country, it will make little headway in this endeavor.

Evidence of Iran's efforts to train and equip the Houthi rebels, meanwhile, has prompted the Pentagon to request more support for the Saudi- and Emirati-led coalition. If the White House approves, the United States will share more intelligence and boost its logistical coordination with the Gulf coalition to try to limit Iran's influence in war-torn Yemen and stabilize the strategic Bab al-Mandab Strait. At the same time, Washington will pursue a more aggressive strategy against al Qaeda in the second quarter since the group's slow and steady approach has enabled it to grow in Yemen as well as Syria.

The Libyan Civil War

Oil production will also play an important role in Libya this quarter, as multiple conflicts rage on in the country. Libyan National Army chief Field Marshal Khalifa Hifter has reclaimed the critical As Sidra and Ras Lanuf oil export terminals in eastern Libya, after the Petroleum Facilities Guards and Benghazi Defense Brigades militias overran them in early March. Though the fighting stalled oil production in Libya, it will likely maintain export levels over 400,000 barrels per day throughout the quarter.

In western Libya, meanwhile, rivalries between the U.N.-backed Government of National Accord and the General National Congress, two of the country's three rival governments, will breed divisions in Misrata and Tripoli. Outbreaks of violence between the governments' corresponding militias will continue to be a constant this quarter, particularly in the capital. International support for Libya's governments will be less divided, by contrast. Egypt and the United Arab Emirates will continue to back Hifter, while Russia increases its support for his Libyan National Army. (Unless he can bring more ground forces under his control, however, Hifter will have trouble increasing his influence in eastern Libya, and his efforts to draw new recruits will run up against tribal divisions.) And although the European Union will push for political resolutions to the various battles in Libya, negotiations will stay at a standstill this quarter.

The Difficulties of North African Reform

Elsewhere in North Africa, Algeria's government will fight a political battle of its own this quarter, albeit more quietly. The country's citizens are frustrated since the government passed a new budget that slashed public spending and raised taxes. The austerity measures, which sparked public protests, will be at the forefront of voters' minds as they head to the polls in May for legislative elections, and more demonstrations are expected in the meantime. Whatever the vote's outcome, however, the Parliament lacks the political clout to bring change to Algeria's tightly controlled political system, even if opposition parties perform better than they have in years past. Many of President Abdel Aziz Bouteflika's close allies have ensconced themselves in important ministries and positions over the past few years, including, during the first quarter, the head of state oil and gas company Sonatrach. Infighting among the country's elite will be a strong undercurrent in Algerian politics for the rest of the quarter, though it will take place largely behind closed doors.

China in Transition

Chinese President Xi Jinping's push to consolidate his grip on power will enter a critical phase in the coming months amid preparations for October's 19th Party Congress, the quinquennial meeting where senior party officials select the next Politburo Standing Committee, the country's top governing body. With as many as five of the current seven committee members expected to step down this year, the plenum will offer Xi a momentous opportunity to stack the country's leadership with his supporters, fortifying his position as China's most powerful leader in decades. In the lead-up to the congress, Xi's core task will be to eliminate remaining checks on his influence, while reshuffling personnel to move allies into key posts. Broadly speaking, these efforts will be successful.

The stakes riding on the Party Congress will compel Chinese leaders this quarter to focus overwhelmingly on stabilizing the economy, sustaining low unemployment and avoiding social disruptions, meaning much-needed but risky reforms will take a back seat. Beijing will continue to push industrial restructuring and consolidation programs, environmental initiatives and limited financial reforms. Major new initiatives, however, that would threaten to erode business confidence or destabilize the economy are unlikely in the near future. And on existing issues that the government chooses to expand, such as corporate debt-equity swaps and bankruptcy tribunals and the introduction of a nationwide property tax, authorities will delay full implementation until after the congress. In the meantime, Beijing will maintain robust support for key industrial sectors such as home construction and manufacturing while introducing piecemeal measures to strengthen the economy's defenses against potential external shocks, especially those threatened by impending shifts in U.S. trade and currency policies.

Outside the mainland, Beijing will face a bigger challenge in managing persistent discontent in Hong Kong over China's interference in the city's political affairs, a situation that the recent election of its preferred candidate, Carrie Lam, as Hong Kong's next chief executive will do little to alleviate. As the special administrative region prepares to mark the 20th anniversary of its reunification with China on July 1 (Lam's inauguration date), conditions will be ripe for an escalation of protests.

Globalization, Evolved

The ongoing evolution in U.S. trade policy will continue to be felt across the Asia-Pacific and will pose the greatest potential threat to Chinese economic stability — and therefore to Xi's drive to consolidate power — in the second quarter. In the next three months, Washington may not impose new barriers to trade with China beyond anti-dumping and countervailing duties, but Beijing will gird itself for the possibility that the Trump administration follows through on the new president's promises to name China a currency manipulator or levy new controls on U.S. imports of Chinese goods such as steel or automobiles. Chinese authorities will work to build up buffers against U.S. threats or punitive measures while seeking to deter Washington by outlining the retaliatory measures Beijing can take. China may also introduce its own anti-dumping measures. Beijing's most likely course of action, however, will be to try to use its influence on regional security matters as leverage in economic discussions with Washington. Toward this end, China may offer to cooperate with Washington on issues such as cybersecurity, military affairs and even North Korea — a rare area where U.S. and Chinese interests overlap. At the same time, it will become more openly confrontational in the South China Sea or on other regional matters.

Though China has been the primary target in Asia of Washington's attacks on trade and currency manipulation, Japan and South Korea — the United States' two most important security allies in Asia — have by no means been exempt from prospective U.S. policy changes. This will compel both countries to explore other options, including expanded investment into and potentially imports from the United States, to hedge against pressure from Washington and prevent economic frictions from undermining their security partnerships. Nonetheless, even rhetorical pressure from Washington on trade will be painful for South Korea as Seoul attempts to move on from the fall of President Park Geun Hye while also facing Chinese economic retaliation over the deployment of the Terminal High-Altitude Area Defense (THAAD) missile defense system. China may ease pressure on Seoul in an effort to open diplomacy with the next South Korean administration after the upcoming election. But the new president's attention will be divided between a range of priorities: not only the perennial North Korean threat but also reform of South Korea's scandal-prone chaebols (giant, family-run conglomerates) and broader economic restructuring.

Elsewhere in the Asia-Pacific, moderate recoveries in the global economy — particularly in commodity prices — will continue to provide much-needed relief for regional exporters. Nonetheless, countries such as South Korea and Thailand will struggle to regain their growth momentum because of internal political constraints, increased regional competition and regional geopolitical pressures. Moreover, few countries in the region will be immune to the long-term impact of the surge of protectionism across the globe or the potential fallout from a prolonged Sino-U.S. trade or currency spat. As major powers reconfigure their trade strategies, smaller economies will seek to insulate themselves from potential shocks by more proactively pursuing regional cooperation and economic diversification. In addition to Asia-centric multilateral frameworks such as the 16-member Regional Comprehensive Economic Partnership (RCEP), trade-dependent economies such as those of Malaysia, Australia, Vietnam and South Korea will explore free trade options farther afield.

The New Silk Road

Beijing will be well-positioned to exploit regionwide uncertainty over Washington's potential retrenchment to press Chinese interests elsewhere in its periphery this quarter. In response to the Trump administration's withdrawal from the Trans-Pacific Partnership trade pact, China will redouble its efforts to draw regional economies further into its orbit by touting regional trade initiatives such as RCEP.

In addition to trade, expanded investment, particularly in infrastructure, will be core to China's diplomatic outreach throughout its periphery, with Beijing using its One Belt, One Road summit in May to portray itself as an economic anchor and promote its vision for the region as a favorable alternative to the Western-led order. But its efforts to build out vast road and rail networks will be constrained by localized unrest and suspicions in target countries, particularly Pakistan and Sri Lanka, as well as at home in Xinjiang. Domestic economic pressures will also complicate implementation of Beijing's grand plans.

Coping With a Nuclear North Korea

The fraught efforts by China and the United States, as well as South Korea and Japan, to contain North Korea's nuclear weapons program will remain a singular driver of regional dynamics in the quarter. As North Korea nears the successful development of an effective nuclear deterrent against the United States, Pyongyang will continue to use every opportunity to demonstrate its expanding defense capabilities. Another North Korean nuclear test would undoubtedly elicit heated rhetoric and defense posturing by Seoul and Tokyo, including moves that Beijing views as antagonistic. This will reduce room for diplomacy between Washington and Northeast Asia's leading powers and intensify pressure on Washington to consider alternative measures to deter Pyongyang.

Direct, pre-emptive military action against Pyongyang — particularly its nuclear weapons infrastructure and arsenal — is possible but unlikely this quarter absent a complete breakdown of diplomatic efforts by the United States and China. Instead, Washington will most likely focus on pressuring Beijing to rein in Pyongyang. Beijing may use its economic pressure over North Korea to hedge against Washington's agenda on other fronts, particularly U.S. pressure on trade. But Beijing will avoid fully severing North Korea's economic lifelines in China or substantially undermining Kim Jong Un's rule in Pyongyang.

Asia-Pacific: Among Great Powers

Where possible, Beijing will work to separate its tension with Washington over trade and the Korean Peninsula from other pivotal issues in China's periphery. Beijing will be particularly on guard against any moves by Washington to use Taiwan as a bargaining chip in other negotiations. Though the Trump administration reversed course and pledged in February to continue the "One China" policy, a long-standing diplomatic formula underpinning Washington's relations with Beijing and Taipei, the White House may still seek to boost arms sales or diplomatic contact with Taipei this quarter. Meanwhile, Taiwan will also expand its economic outreach to other countries, particularly Japan, India and Southeast Asian states, to lessen the impact of diplomatic isolation by Beijing. China would heartily protest any new U.S. arms sales to Taiwan and possibly reduce military cooperation with Washington, but it will avoid inflaming cross-strait tensions in any way that would threaten Xi's goals at the upcoming Party Congress.

Meanwhile, Beijing will further its evolving strategy for managing the backlash in Southeast Asia to expanding Chinese maritime activities in regional waters. Following last year's international tribunal ruling invalidating China's territorial claims in the South China Sea, Beijing has continued a carrot-and-stick strategy, paring maritime and economic concessions with coercive measures — all while continuing to build out its regional military presence. In recent months, this strategy has helped China and some South China Sea claimant states, particularly the Philippines, achieve a tentative conciliation, even as China's broader confrontation with the United States has threatened its capacity to manage

South China Sea affairs.

But numerous potential flashpoints in the second quarter will put this reconciliation to the test. For example, the upcoming fishing season will create ample opportunities for flare-ups between Chinese fishing fleets and coast guard forces and their counterparts from littoral states such as Indonesia and Vietnam. Perhaps the biggest test will be the joint fishing arrangement between China and the Philippines in waters around the Scarborough Shoal, a long-standing flashpoint some 200 kilometers west of Luzon. Though large-scale, sustained conflict in the disputed waters is unlikely, the growing number of civilian and naval ships on the seas raises the risk of accidents and miscalculations capable of spawning an international crisis.

Landmark bilateral Sino-Philippine maritime consultations in May will not fundamentally alter the dynamic in the region. With Philippine President Rodrigo Duterte's erratic rhetoric and efforts to reorient the country's foreign policy toward China beginning to draw some pushback at home — and given China's unwavering goal of cementing its regional maritime dominance — Sino-Philippine relations will remain fraught, creating opportunities for a warming of ties between Manila and Washington. This, in turn, could affect how other states in the region deal with Chinese assertiveness. Ultimately, claimant states will continue to pursue omnidirectional foreign policies marked by greater ties with a range of outside powers, including Russia and Japan. And Beijing will work to maintain its current strategy of balancing coercion with concessions and cooperation (including on energy development in disputed waters) to temper the sharpest tensions and limit opposition to its maritime actions.

Southeast Asia: Burdened By Consensus

China and the Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN) will likely make some progress in negotiations on a Code of Conduct for the South China Sea. But divisions within ASEAN over how to deal with Beijing, combined with deepening concerns over China's growing military power and perceived assertiveness, will limit the negotiations.

Moreover, across Southeast Asia, domestic political factors will continue to hinder pan-ASEAN cohesion and complicate broader regional issues. Even as the Philippines' temporary detente with China enters rough waters this quarter, for example, so will Duterte face new challenges to his initially unquestioned authority at home. As long as Duterte's domestic popularity is high, he will face no serious threats to his power. But the threat of power struggles within the government and political establishment will grow as he pushes forward with contentious initiatives such as his violent war on drugs, peace talks with Muslim Moro and Communist rebels, and a plan to shift the government to a federal system — all while seeking to limit domestic backlash to his reorientation away from the United States, which retains deep ties throughout the Philippine defense establishment. A Duterte administration bogged down by domestic pressures would have less room to sustain a politically risky outreach to China or, as this year's ASEAN chair, steer the body toward a semblance of consensus on the South China Sea.

Meanwhile, in Cambodia — under the current government, China's most stalwart supporter in ASEAN — upcoming commune elections will test the public's support for Prime Minister Hun Sen and the grip of his Cambodian People's Party on power ahead of 2018 general elections. Similarly, an April runoff election for Jakarta governor will serve as a barometer of the ruling party's ability to solidify support to the degree necessary to expand substantial fiscal, regulatory and economic reforms and play a more decisive role in regional trade and security affairs.

A Japanese Awakening

alike will remain cautious about undertaking bilateral naval patrols with Washington or taking other actions that might antagonize Beijing. Such concerns will be unlikely, however, to deter Japan from deepening its diplomatic outreach to and defense cooperation with South China Sea claimant states. Tokyo will use arms sales and military aid to ASEAN states, along with joint exercises with regional navies and a generally increased regional maritime presence, to bolster its position as an increasingly robust check on Chinese influence in Southeast Asia.

Japan's diplomatic, economic and security offensives in Southeast Asia are just one piece in its broader push to revive the country's standing and influence abroad. In the second quarter, Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe will meet with Russian President Vladimir Putin as the two countries seek to improve ties and resolve a long-standing dispute over control of the South Kuril Islands. Even incremental progress here would help Tokyo hedge against Chinese influence in Northeast Asia. Meanwhile, Japan will continue with efforts to counter China's expanding presence in the East China Sea by increasing naval and coast guard patrols and research activities. But Tokyo's attention will be dominated by relations with Washington this quarter, with several meetings between senior Japanese and U.S. lawmakers on the docket, as the government seeks to build on the momentum generated by Abe's recent visit to Washington and Japan's promise to invest in the United States.

The Abe administration will use political capital gained from its diplomatic successes here to push for structural reform legislation at home, along with a constitutional revision allowing the emperor to abdicate. The quarter will likely see concrete progress on reform legislation in areas such as agriculture and labor. Meanwhile, the Abe administration will rely on aggressive monetary and fiscal policy to sustain overall economic stability at home.

Now that the key members of U.S. President Donald Trump's trade team have been appointed and are likely to be confirmed this quarter, trade issues will move up on the White House's agenda. Washington will use the next three months to conduct an internal review on the United States' existing trade agreements and decide which aspects of the deals to amend in negotiations. At the top of the new administration's priorities will be the revision of the North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA).

NAFTA's members — Canada, Mexico and the United States — will open the discussion within a trilateral framework. Though the United States has said it would prefer to pursue trade talks on a bilateral basis, Canada and Mexico have made clear that they prefer to stick to three-way talks. But even if the United States is willing to kick off the negotiations in this format, differences between

Washington and its North American trade partners could eventually force the parties to move to one-on-one discussions instead. This cannot happen, however, until the negotiations formally begin in the second half of the year. (The White House has said it plans to use the Trade Promotion Authority law to renegotiate NAFTA, but doing so would require the administration to give 90 days' notice before entering into official talks — notice it will almost certainly issue in the second quarter.)

In the meantime, all parties will see a flurry of preparations and lobbying take place in the coming months, ahead of the talks. The United States will use its 90-day consultation period to draft specific negotiating points for congressional review. Chief among them will be NAFTA's rules of origin: Washington will argue that products imported from Mexico and Canada should be made up of more inputs sourced from NAFTA members in order to qualify for tariff exemptions. The White House will also probably seek to reshape the bloc's Chapter 19 dispute settlement mechanism, introduce more labor and environmental requirements, and expand the deal's purview to cover modern sectors such as the digital economy that were not included in the initial agreement.

Mexico's strategy going into the negotiations also began to take shape over the first quarter. Mexico City has already triggered its own 90-day consultation period and has begun reaching out to business leaders and groups at the state and municipal levels in Mexico and the United States to lobby against any substantial alterations of NAFTA. Mexico has also outlined the sectors most likely to be affected by a breakdown in negotiations or new U.S. tariffs on Mexican goods so that it may respond in kind if it must. But with few practical means of immediate leverage against the United States, Mexico is at a distinct disadvantage. As a result, it will have no opportunity to pressure Washington without jeopardizing the NAFTA talks as a whole. Threats of scaling back intelligence sharing, for example, will probably emerge from Mexico only if Washington attempts to impose unfavorable constraints on Mexican goods during the talks.

Though Trump's harshest criticism of NAFTA has so far centered on Mexico, Canada is taking no chances. Following Mexico City's lead, Ottawa has reached out to U.S. states that frequently trade with Canada, including in the Midwest, in an attempt to minimize disruptions to NAFTA. Several of those states voted for Trump in November, but Ottawa is hoping to make the case that preserving close trade ties with Canada is in their best interest. Its lobbying and outreach efforts will continue through the second quarter. Canada has also pointed out that its own free trade agreement with the United States, which predates NAFTA, has only been suspended and could easily be resurrected should Washington choose to replace the trilateral deal with two bilateral arrangements.

Beyond its immediate neighbors, the United States will seek to more tightly enforce its existing trade deals with other partners, particularly China. Washington, however, is unlikely to make much progress on larger trade issues during the coming quarter. Though the White House has threatened to ignore the rulings of the World Trade Organization (WTO) as it sees fit, the issue probably will not come to a head in the next three months. With its health care plan on ice, the Trump administration will instead shift gears toward trying to implement its proposed tax cuts and reforms. Congress will pass a budget resolution in the second quarter that will allow it to try to approve tax adjustments through budget reconciliation before the end of the 2018 fiscal year. Meanwhile, the Trump administration will unveil its own proposed changes to the tax code this quarter, though its plan will face an uphill battle in Congress. Among the most controversial amendments that Republicans in the House of Representatives have proposed is a border tax adjustment. Many are concerned that the measure may violate the United States' obligations under the WTO by rebating "direct taxes" on exporters (potentially constituting an export subsidy) and by taxing imported goods differently than domestically produced products. EU members and other countries have expressed concern about these issues and have promised to challenge the changes if they are approved by Congress. That said, it is unclear whether these aspects of the tax reform will be eliminated, adjusted or kept before the bill is presented to lawmakers. Moreover, though Washington will kick off the process of overhauling the U.S. tax code this quarter, Congress will not face as tight a deadline to complete it as it did with health care reform earlier this year. The tax proposals' actual passage, then, will not occur until at least the second half of 2017.

The Importance of Mexico

Mexico's relationship with the United States — its most important in terms of trade, security and diplomacy — will take center stage in Mexico City this quarter. Though the Mexican government will take small steps to try to limit any alterations to its ties with Washington, it will also hedge its bets by searching for ways to diversify its economy away from its northern neighbor. Mexico will explore its options for expanding trade with the European Union and Asian partners, including Japan, China, New Zealand and Thailand, while seeking to partially substitute U.S. food imports with goods from South America. To that end, it will try to lay the groundwork for deals to purchase more soybean, beef, pork and corn imports from Brazil and Argentina.

The White House's plans to renegotiate NAFTA and insistence that Mexico do more to restrict immigration could translate into political gains for populist politicians south of the border. The campaign season for Mexico state's gubernatorial election on June 4 will heat up during the second quarter, and given the state's size and political diversity, it is widely regarded as a bellwether for the country's presidential race, which will be held in 2018. At the moment, populist figure Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador's National Regeneration Movement (Morena) appears ready to give the country's traditional political heavyweights — the Institutional Revolutionary Party (PRI) and National Action Party (PAN) — a run for their money in this year's election. As Morena squares off against the PRI and PAN for control of Mexico state's governorship, its performance will give some indication as to whether the PRI's numerous corruption scandals and Mexico City's deteriorating relationship with Washington will result in populist backlash during next year's presidential race. Lopez Obrador will no doubt capitalize on Mexican voters' dissatisfaction with the ruling PRI and U.S. antagonism to further his own campaign for the presidency over the next few months.

Venezuela's Unraveling

This year will be the toughest the ruling United Socialist Party of Venezuela (PSUV) has ever encountered. Chief among the government's concerns will be its high risk of defaulting on debt owed by state oil and natural gas firm Petroleos de Venezuela (PDVSA). PDVSA is counting on a $600 million loan from Russian oil giant Rosneft a stake in a joint venture to make its $3.1 billion in debt payments due in April and May. If the loan falls through, Venezuela will be in dire financial straits. Should the company default on its upcoming bills, the threat of unrest spreading throughout the country will rise. But even if PDVSA successfully makes its payments in the second quarter, it will owe another $3 billion in October and November — bills it will probably fail to pay without additional foreign assistance.

If Venezuela proves unable to avoid default, whether in April or November, its full impact will not be felt for several months. But eventually imports, including food supplies, will plunge and the country's already high inflation will soar. Each of these effects would pose a significant threat to the PSUV's continued rule. Political elites would likely close ranks and crack down on signs of dissent from within their own party and from the opposition in hopes of fending off potential challenges to the state.

Faced with mounting discontent, the Venezuelan government will also maintain — and perhaps increase — its surveillance of the country's armed forces. The ruling party fears that military officers in Venezuela's regional commands may someday rise up against the central government. Though no coup seems to be in the making at present, Caracas will use human intelligence sources and electronic surveillance to keep a close eye on its troops to ensure that does not change.

In addition to its predicament at home, the Venezuelan government will have to grapple with the uncertainty surrounding the new U.S. administration's foreign policy. The White House began to adopt a tougher stance toward Venezuela in the first quarter, and it may choose to build on that pressure by slapping new sanctions on Caracas, through the U.S. Treasury Department, in the second quarter. If the sanctions target Venezuelan officials, their impact on the country as a whole will be minimal. But if they are leveled against PDVSA — the government's primary source of revenue — the punitive measures will do considerable damage to Caracas' finances and the ruling party's position in power. Such sanctions (or the mere threat of them) will therefore give the United States substantial leverage over Venezuela in any future negotiations.

Colombian Peace Process

Colombia, meanwhile, will continue the process of winding down its longest-running insurgency. Rebels belonging to the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia (FARC) will stay in their demobilization zones awaiting commanders' orders to surrender their weapons. At the same time, the Colombian Congress will pass legislation that will permit the FARC to continue laying down arms. Though the group originally agreed to give up all of its weapons by June 1, this deadline may be delayed since FARC members have been slow to gather at the country's predetermined demobilization zones.

The disbandment of Colombia's largest guerrilla group, coupled with rising demand for cocaine in the United States, Europe and Asia, will fuel violent competitions among smaller rebel and criminal organizations for the FARC's former coca-producing territories in the months ahead. Now that most FARC rebels are preparing to reintegrate into society, the National Liberation Army (Colombia's second-largest insurgency) and the Clan del Golfo crime syndicate will vie with each other for control over key drug trafficking routes and resources, bringing greater violence to the Colombian hinterlands in the Choco, Cauca and Meta departments.

Brazil's Economy Recovers While Its Leaders Founder

The second quarter will bring new promise for the Brazilian economy. Buoyed by higher oil and iron ore export revenue as well as rising domestic consumption, the country will continue to pull itself out of recession in the months ahead. But Brazil's politicians will not fare as well. President Michel Temer's tenure may be cut short in the second half of the year by an ongoing Supreme Electoral Court investigation into charges that he knowingly accepted campaign funds in 2014 that were obtained through acts of corruption. Though the court is unlikely to issue its ruling during the second quarter, the accusations will continue to hang over the president in the coming months.

Several other leading figures from Brazil's major political parties have been swept up in the scandal as well. Politicians who would have otherwise been obvious candidates for the country's presidential election in 2018, such as Aécio Neves, José Serra and former President Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva, have been plagued by allegations of corruption. As the popularity of Brazil's established elite has fallen, political outsiders have seized the chance to make their own gains. Chief among them is a highly conservative former military officer, Jair Bolsonaro, who came in third place in recent polls. Bolsonaro's rise is troubling to Brazil's traditional parties, such as the Workers' Party and the Social Democracy Party of Brazil, which may have a hard time defeating him if they cannot carve out a clear majority in the first round of the presidential race. (Even da Silva, who is popular among voters, would run the risk of losing to Bolsonaro in the event of a runoff.) Still, the campaign season has only just begun, and Bolsonaro's chances of proceeding to a runoff are remote — especially if new candidates enter the race on behalf of Brazil's entrenched leaders.

For now, Temer will focus on bringing his pension reform — a key part of his austerity agenda — to a vote in the lower house of the National Congress. But protests against the proposal and government corruption could stall the vote, particularly as Eliseu Padilha (Temer's chief of staff and lead negotiator with the National Congress on the reforms) comes under scrutiny for graft. The threat of an investigation into and indictment of Padilha, or of Brazilian lawmakers, may sideline Temer's effort to rally the fractured National Congress' support for his policies.

Argentina Undertakes Subtle Reforms

Argentina's leaders will be in a no less precarious situation this quarter. President Mauricio Macri will have to balance between satisfying the demands of organized labor and attracting foreign investors as he continues to steadily make fiscal adjustments over the next few months. These measures will include hikes in the price of natural gas and likely water for consumers across the country.

There are limits, however, to how heavy a burden the government in Buenos Aires can place on taxpayers. The country will hold legislative elections <LINK: The Costs of Promoting Business in Argentina> in October that are considered a prelude to the presidential race in 2019. Determined to remain in power, the ruling party will shy away from implementing heavier austerity measures or spending cuts ahead of this year's vote that would directly harm labor unions or provincial governments.

South Asia

India's Own Worst Enemy

The India-Pakistan Rivalry

South Asian Militancy

India's Own Worst Enemy

The second quarter will be a benchmark for India's ambitious tax reforms. The Goods and Services Tax (GST) bill has weathered a halting journey in the 17 years since it was first proposed, spurring debate and disagreement as it wound its way through India's democratic system. Thanks to Finance Minister Arun Jaitley's "cooperative federalism" strategy, however, the dual value-added tax legislation clinched a major victory during the Parliament's recent budgetary session when the lower house passed all four of its component bills. The bills' passage marked a big step toward simplifying India's convoluted tax system and unifying its fragmented market — two key components of Prime Minister Narendra Modi's plan to boost economic growth.

Having passed the measures at the federal level, the ruling Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP) will now shift its attention to India's 29 state legislatures, each of which must pass a local version of the GST. This will be a lengthy undertaking, of course, especially considering that the BJP is in the minority in 14 state assemblies. Consequently, Modi's government probably won't meet its July 1 implementation deadline. But that doesn't mean the measures will fail. Through concession and compromise, Jaitley and his state counterparts in the GST Council have addressed local governments' major grievances, including the issue of compensation for lost tax revenues in manufacturing-heavy states. Ever since Parliament passed the GST constitutional amendment in August 2016, moreover, India's state and federal governments have become more aligned on the issue of tax reform. And so, notwithstanding the usual politicking, each state will pass its version of the GST eventually — though not necessarily in the second quarter.

In fact, India's economic reform project as a whole is entering the new quarter with renewed momentum after the recent state elections in the country. The BJP achieved a resounding victory in the all-important state of Uttar Pradesh, and it also formed governments in the states of Goa, Manipur and Uttarakhand. This string of successes is good news for the BJP for a couple of reasons. The ruling party, for instance, will get to send more representatives to the upper house of Parliament, easing the way for economic reforms — though this is a benefit that will take some time to pay off. More immediately, the party's strong electoral performance is a vote of confidence for Modi's demonetization campaign, despite the many inconveniences it caused.

Now that the Reserve Bank of India has removed ATM cash withdrawal limits, the demonetization process has ended, and "remonetization" is in full swing. As Indians regain access to cash, their country's economic growth should pick up a bit. At the same time, however, digital transactions — something demonetization tried to encourage — will keep falling, albeit not necessarily to pre-demonetization levels. New Delhi has yet to address the underlying reasons that have kept cash king in the Indian economy. The country's financial infrastructure remains inadequate, the cost of credit card transactions still exceeds that of cash payments, and the legal protections against credit card fraud are lacking. Until New Delhi fixes these issues, cash will continue to reign supreme.

The quarter also promises several important foreign policy visits for India covering defense, energy and investment. In April alone, Modi will host the prime ministers of Bangladesh and Australia, as well as the president of Nepal and Singapore's foreign minister. The Indian prime minister will chalk up a success in his country's quest to join multilateral institutions in June at the Shanghai Cooperation Organization summit in Astana, Kazakhstan, where India will receive full membership in the bloc. Pakistani Prime Minister Nawaz Sharif will also be in attendance to represent his country, which is also being admitted to the alliance. Their meeting will mark the first exchange between the two leaders since 2015 and offer a chance to gauge the state of South Asia's most consequential bilateral relationship.

The India-Pakistan Rivalry

With state election season behind it, the BJP has less political incentive to lambaste Pakistan, and relations between the two will stabilize during the second quarter. The two nuclear rivals will continue to bicker over a host of issues, of course, including the disputed territory of Kashmir. But since the fourth quarter of 2016, the number of cease-fire violations along the Line of Control in the region has fallen. The drop coincided with Gen. Qamar Javed Bajwa's ascension to the powerful post of Pakistan's army chief. Bajwa is redirecting his country's strategic attention away from India and toward Afghanistan (though securing the eastern border will still be a priority for Pakistan). Consequently, Islamabad will take pains to avoid antagonizing New Delhi. And as Pakistan's next general elections approach in 2018, a Supreme Court decision on Sharif and his family's involvement in the Panama Papers scandal could give the opposition useful campaign fodder.

India, likewise, will shift some of its attention from Pakistan — which will remain its biggest regional foreign policy challenge nonetheless — to another country in its periphery, Nepal. The Madhesi, an ethnic group of Indian origin living along the Terai plains near the Nepalese border with India, have renewed their demands for greater autonomy, including the creation of two Madhesi-majority provinces in the area. What's more, they have promised to boycott Nepal's May 14 local elections, the first such vote in 20 years and a milestone for the country's democracy. The opposition Communist Party of Nepal (Unified Marxist-Leninist), meanwhile, has vowed to counter the Madhesi's demands for fear that the two new provinces would give the ethnic group control over the Nepal-India border. The party's stance alone will cause greater discord as the election approaches.

Unless Nepalese Prime Minister Pushpa Kamal Dahal's Maoist Centre party concedes to negotiations over the Madhesi's requests, the local elections will hit a snag. Either the vote will be delayed, or its legitimacy will come into question, sparking protests along the Terai. Each scenario will increase the probability that India and China stage a diplomatic intervention, as they did in 2016 to try to keep former

Prime Minister Khadga Prasad Oli's administration from toppling. (New Delhi will be careful not to intervene too directly, though, lest it push Kathmandu closer to Beijing.) Even so, given that Dahal's alliance holds a majority in Nepal's legislature — even without the Madhesi parties' support — his administration will survive through the quarter.

South Asian Militancy

Back in Pakistan, the army will continue its efforts to vanquish anti-state militancy, particularly in the restive Federally Administered Tribal Areas along the border with Afghanistan. Bajwa, the new army chief, is currently overseeing Operation Radd-ul-Fasaad as part of that initiative, which has already contributed to a decline in the number of militant-related civilian deaths in Pakistan. Though the campaign will help further reduce the casualty rate, progress will come at the cost of high-profile retaliatory attacks by the Islamic State's Khorasan chapter and the Jamaat-ul-Ahrar, a breakaway faction of the Tehrik-i-Taliban Pakistan. The threat of militant attacks in South Asia, in fact, will rise during the second quarter because warmer weather heralds the start of the annual spring offensive. The Taliban will ramp up their attacks across Afghanistan — not just in their strongholds of Helmand and Kandahar provinces in the country's south. The Islamic State's Khorasan chapter may also increase its activities. The uptick in attacks, in turn, will encourage more militants to seek refuge across the border in Pakistan, complicating Operation Radd-ul-Fasaad and perpetuating a cycle of militant violence and military crackdowns in the region.

In addition, the second quarter will test Afghanistan's peacemaking skills. Notorious warlord Gulbuddin Hekmatyar is expected to end his 20-year exile from public life in the next few months as part of a deal that Kabul struck with his party, Hizb-e-Islami Gulbuddin, in fall 2016. Should he return to Kabul as anticipated, Hekmatyar will reintegrate himself into the political wing of his party to begin laying the foundation for a return to politics. This quarter, moreover, Russia will continue to increase its efforts to jump-start the peace process in Afghanistan as it joins with Pakistan and China to mediate in prospective negotiations between the Afghan government and the Taliban. Despite its bloody history with Russia, Kabul is cautiously optimistic about Moscow's involvement.

Nigeria: Obstacles to Prosperity

Nigerian President Muhammadu Buhari has had a tough year so far, made all the more complicated by lingering concerns over his health. The public's fears were significantly heightened after what was supposed to be a 10-day medical trip to London turned into a nearly two-month convalescence abroad. Should the president be unable to finish his term, which ends in 2019, the center of Nigeria's political power and patronage would shift southwestward toward the base of Vice President Yemi Osinbajo, who would assume the presidency. Aggrieved northern politicians may respond by boosting their support for the country's militant groups, while the oil-rich and restive Niger Delta's expectations of concessions from the federal government may rise. (In its negotiations with Abuja, the southern region has demanded money and other perks.) Even if Buhari's rule continues, opposition from within and outside of his ruling All Progressives Congress party will mount in the face of the country's persistent financial difficulties. This will be especially true if the president fails to allay fears over his health before potential successors begin jockeying for a place in Nigeria's 2019 election — now less than two years away — in earnest.

Regardless of who rules the country, Nigeria's numerous economic challenges will not lessen in intensity in the second quarter. Weak oil prices, high inflation and the possibility of a stronger U.S. dollar will be a difficult combination for the Nigerian state and its citizens to weather. After all, a stronger dollar relative to the naira, Nigeria's currency, would hike up the costs of food and other imports, sparking protests and other forms of unrest. Meanwhile, international financial institutions such as the International Monetary Fund will continue to pressure Nigeria to lift its foreign exchange restrictions, which have proved costly for the country's currency reserves. But the government will likely limit its actions to small steps, avoiding a completely free-floating naira in the name of price stability. Nevertheless, Abuja will make minor progress in reforming the country's business environment as it pursues its 2017-2020 Economic Growth and Recovery Plan. This progress will likely include increasing transparency in service-level agreements (such as permits) and improving efficiency in the entry and exit of people and goods, which Nigeria's plan is slated to target first. More ambitious reforms, however, will suffer if Buhari — who has reportedly reduced his working day to only a few hours — remains in ill health.

As government coffers come under increasing strain, the president will have to forgo expensive projects that could win over new allies and prevent the fissures within his party from widening. Deals intended to placate militants and stakeholders in the Niger Delta will likewise be modest, thus lacking the broad appeal needed to please the region's fractious groups and keep them from resorting to politically motivated violence. The possibility that Niger Delta militants will try to increase pressure on the federal government in the second quarter by holding protests and conducting attacks as Abuja builds a peace package for the region cannot be ruled out.

The Post-Apartheid Era Ends

The contest over who will succeed South African President Jacob Zuma as the head of the African National Congress (ANC) will continue to heat up this quarter. Finance Minister Pravin Gordhan and other Zuma detractors were dismissed in a March 30 Cabinet reshuffle that removed several ministerial roadblocks constraining the president's actions. Zuma has since appointed his close allies as replacements. Over the next three months, opposing factions within the country's ruling party will press for their favored styles of reform as Zuma further emphasizes the need for radical economic change, including greater black economic empowerment, to energize his base and improve the odds that his successor will emerge from his ethnic Zulu and pro-labor circle. One possible candidate is his political ally and former wife, Nkosazana Dlamini-Zuma, who returned to the country in March after serving at the African Union for four years. She has since begun campaigning for the ANC's top position.

Meanwhile, the president's dismissal of Gordhan, whom the international community views as a steady hand over the economy, prompted S&P Global to downgrade South Africa's credit rating on April 3. The move will only further weaken the country's fragile financial position. Judicial proceedings related to corruption allegations and other cases that involve Zuma and his inner circle may prove an additional distraction as revelations of politically damaging information threaten to complicate matters for the president.

Zuma's options will be further constrained by the countermoves of the ANC's more market-oriented faction as it seeks to strengthen its own candidate ahead of the party's December leadership congress. This wing will continue to push for restrained spending measures and budget cuts that are anathema to Zuma's need to shore up support among his followers. Its ability to hamstring the president, however, was weakened by the March 30 Cabinet reshuffle. As the country's ongoing leadership struggle intensifies, the government will have a harder time pushing through difficult reforms in the months ahead, and rifts within the ANC will widen.

For the most part, labor relations will remain calm in the second quarter — at least compared with previous years — as numerous agreements remain active until the end of the year and as the government seeks to avoid a credit downgrade. Nevertheless, tensions within the coal industry will continue to mount as the opposing sides debating the structure of wage negotiations struggle to find common ground. (In January, the previous policy of holding negotiations at a centralized level will be replaced by negotiations at the company level.) Tense labor relations in the coal sector could worsen if Zuma and his camp politicize the talks in order to energize their base for the brewing leadership battle.

Old Leaders in New Africa

In the Democratic Republic of the Congo, President Joseph Kabila's political alliance will continue seek a successor who can protect the well-entrenched system of patronage it depends on to maintain power. As it stands, a 2017 election is still a possibility, even as the ruling party and portions of the opposition struggle to implement a Dec. 31 deal to transition power away from Kabila. With the president still in office despite finishing his constitutionally mandated final term in 2016, the deal's collapse looks increasingly likely. Progress on voter registration in some provinces has been made, yet millions of Congolese citizens have yet to be registered, and it is unclear how a presidential contest would be paid for, given its hefty price tag.

The political obstacles that arose after the Dec. 31 deal was signed will endure in the second quarter, causing little progress to be made between the ruling party and the opposition. This means that the time available for Kabila, who oversees a weak and fractious political order, to find a successor before 2017 ends is running out. And in the absence of an acceptable successor, the president will be more likely to resort to additional delaying tactics — such as citing election costs — to push the election (and by extension, his rule) until 2018, risking sustained unrest in the process.

Mozambique's Financial Mess

Within the next three months, the government in Maputo will be forced to strike a deal with bondholders to restructure its debts. Negotiations became necessary when it was revealed in 2016 that bond proceedings were misused to buy military equipment and large amounts of debt were hidden. The ultimate success and timing of the negotiations will be crucial since the country, hoping to secure a bailout before the year ends, seeks to open talks with the International Monetary Fund in a bid to restore its support. A bailout would help ease the burden on the cash-strapped state, where patronage networks are strained (which could open splits within the ruling Mozambique Liberation Front) and investment in its oil and natural gas sector has stalled. Should Mozambique fail to reach a bailout deal, suspended energy industry investments could hamper development over the next few years and increase the risk that its burgeoning natural gas sector won't get off the ground amid the pending glut in the liquefied natural gas market.

Ethiopian Instability

Last year, social unrest directed against the Tigray minority-led government in Addis Ababa spread, challenging its control of the country. But Addis Ababa's use of heavy-handed security measures in the latter half of 2016 and into 2017 has blunted the opposition movement's ability to unite, grow and intensify its pressure on the government. In the second quarter, the crackdown will continue to constrain the opposition, keeping the conflict to a low boil even as flare-ups posing significant risks to foreign businesses operating in Ethiopia persist. Ethiopia's waning internal security concerns will give it additional maneuverability in neighboring Somalia, where Addis Ababa is currently reshaping its presence.

East African Integration

East Africa will continue to see crucial infrastructure projects come online this quarter. Following the inauguration of the Addis Ababa-Djibouti Railway in early 2017, another Chinese-funded project — the standard-gauge railway connecting Mombasa and Nairobi — is on track to be completed around June or July. The railway, which is Kenya's largest infrastructure project since independence, will provide the country with greater transport efficiency and supply-chain redundancy from its biggest port to the capital city.

Meanwhile, the European Union's proposed economic partnership agreement with the East African Community remains troubled. The deal, which has been in the works since 2007, would give member states duty-free and quota-free access to the European Union's market. In exchange, the community would remove tariffs on 80 percent of its imports from the bloc by 2033. But Tanzania and Uganda have serious reservations about the deal, and Burundi continues to be isolated diplomatically, leaving only Kenya and Rwanda to have signed onto the agreement. During the second quarter, the European Union and Kenya will keep lobbying the community's dissenting members for their support, but Tanzania will continue employing delaying tactics in hopes of killing the deal.

(Stratfor)

Trade will be at the forefront of many leaders' minds this quarter as a new U.S. administration settles into the White House. Though U.S. President Donald Trump continues to be bogged down by congressional battles and allegations of inappropriate ties to Russia, his team will try to draw the public's attention back to its trade agenda. To that end, Washington will work to clarify its strategy for cracking down on currency manipulation abroad, tightening the enforcement of existing trade laws and preparing to renegotiate NAFTA. But the uncertainty surrounding the White House's intentions will linger, prompting the United States' biggest trade partners to look for new economic relationships elsewhere.

At the same time, some will leverage security cooperation and promises of investment to get on Washington's good side — or, at the very least, to try to fend off its punitive trade measures. China will be one of them as it uses its economic heft with Pyongyang, and the growing sense of urgency surrounding North Korea's nuclear program, to its advantage in tense trade talks with the United States. The White House will do what it can to push for secondary sanctions against China's stubborn neighbor, perhaps even threatening to step up its military aid to Taiwan to compel Beijing's buy-in. But even if Washington has its way, a heavier sanctions regime will do little to slow the progress of Pyongyang's nuclear program. The United States will have no choice, then, but to build a credible military deterrent against North Korea — a move that will only widen the rift between Washington and Beijing.

The Trump administration's attack on a Syrian air base was designed in large part to underscore to Beijing and Pyongyang that this White House is willing to take military action if so compelled. Though the attack sent a strong signal to U.S. adversaries, it also has created complications for the United States on the Syrian battlefield with Russia. Moscow will try to use the heightened risk of collisions on the Syrian battlefield and the fight against the Islamic State to bring Washington to the negotiating table, but the United States will be limited in any concessions it would give to Russia in return. The Kremlin will be even less inclined to trust in dialogue with the West as its problems pile up at home, though arms control may be one policy area in which the two can begin to negotiate without encountering much political blowback.

As the United States and Russia box Turkey in on the Syrian battlefield, Ankara will devote more attention to northern Iraq, where a conflict is brewing between Arab and Kurdish forces. The highly prized, oil-rich region of Kirkuk remains a key flashpoint in Turkey's competition with Iran for influence — and Iraq's rival Kurdish factions are caught in the middle. Washington will lend support to Sunni states, led by Saudi Arabia, seeking to balance against Shiite Iran as proxy battles throughout the Middle East escalate, though its nuclear deal with Tehran will remain intact.

In the meantime, Saudi Arabia and its Gulf Cooperation Council allies will shoulder most of the burden of maintaining OPEC's oil production cuts for another six months. Steady oil prices will buy Venezuela's cash-strapped government some time to get its finances in order, but not much. Caracas' risk of default will spike in the second half of the year, and the ruling party will have to spend the second quarter consolidating power in preparation for the turmoil that no doubt lies ahead.

Venezuela isn't the only state heading toward single-party rule. On the other side of the globe, Indian politics are swinging to the right — a trend Prime Minister Narendra Modi and his center-right Bharatiya Janata Party have been able to use to their advantage. This quarter, they will focus on passing a state-level version of a massive tax overhaul that cleared Parliament earlier in the year, a feat that will be more feasible as the growing power of the country's Hindu nationalists gives the ruling party the political capital to push through much-needed structural reforms.

Nigeria will have less luck passing its most pressing reforms as an intensifying power struggle in Abuja brings the government to a near-standstill. Concerns over President Muhammadu Buhari's health have raised questions about who his successor will be — a transition South Africa's own leader, Jacob Zuma, is making preparations for as well. Zuma is working quickly to consolidate power and cater to his ethnic Zulu base with a populist platform of black empowerment before he steps down, alienating investors in the process.

Europe's entrenched rulers face a growing threat to their power as well, albeit of a very different kind. France is preparing to hold elections that will pit the country's traditional political elite against an up-and-coming Euroskeptic contender, and Italy may not be far behind. Though the French electoral system is designed to keep fringe parties out of power, the possibility of a Euroskeptic win cannot be discounted — an outcome that could bring the eurozone to its knees and send shocks through global markets.

European Disintegration

This year will be the one in which political risk reaches the European Union's core members. During the second quarter, this will become evident as France — the bloc's second-largest economy — holds presidential and legislative elections, the results of which will resonate far beyond the country's borders. French voters will have to choose whether they want their country to reform the European Union or dismantle it to restore their state's full sovereignty.

Italy will also become a source of political risk as it moves closer to holding general elections. The current Italian government will probably stay in place this quarter, but the specter of an election in which Euroskeptic forces are expected to perform well will do little to ease concerns about the country's fragile banks and high debt levels. Germany, meanwhile, will try to keep the European Union together as it opens its own campaign season. The coming quarter will be eventful for Greece as well as Athens implements the reforms it promised to its creditors.

French presidential and legislative elections will be the most important events to take place in Europe during the second quarter. A significant portion of France's political apparatus will be elected and appointed over the next three months. The presidential election will be held in two rounds on April 23 and May 7, while legislative elections (also split into two rounds) will follow on June 11 and June 18.

French voters will have to decide whether they want to further liberalize and deregulate their economy or increase protectionism. They will also have to choose whether they want France to stay a member of a reformed European Union or leave the Continental bloc entirely.

The biggest contenders in the elections are the nationalist National Front, the centrist En Marche!, the center-right Republicans, the left-wing Unsubmissive France, and the center-left Socialists. Should any of the moderate parties win the presidency, they will focus primarily on economic and security issues. A moderate government (especially under En Marche! or the Republicans) would seek to make the economy more competitive through various combinations of spending cuts, public investment, labor reform and initiatives to reduce bureaucracy, cut down on regulation and attract foreign investment. A moderate government would probably also direct more resources toward security forces and defense spending, while at the international level it would work to reform the European Union and defend France's leading role in it. The possibility of different parties controlling the presidency and the National Assembly cannot be excluded. This would complicate policymaking.

France's two-round electoral system has historically made it difficult for extremist parties to win presidential and legislative races. Candidates have to receive more than 50 percent of the vote to gain the presidency or a seat in the National Assembly, a threshold that the National Front, for instance, has found tough to reach. If the National Front overcomes this hurdle and wins the presidency, it will set in motion a chain of events that could lead to severe crisis in the European Union.

For one, the National Front wants to introduce tariffs on French imports and tax companies that hire foreign workers, including EU nationals. Both ideas go against the basic principles of the EU single market, which emphasizes the free movement of people, goods, services and capital. Even more important, however, the party also intends to hold a referendum on France's membership in the eurozone. Many of the National Front's campaign promises would require a majority in Parliament, and in some cases the legal procedures to implement them would be arduous. National Front leader Marine Le Pen has also said the referendum on eurozone membership would be called only after six months of negotiations on reforming the European Union. But even the mere victory of the National Front in the presidential election could trigger a crisis in the eurozone. Savers in the eurozone's periphery states (such as Spain, Portugal and Greece) could, for example, withdraw their money from local banks or transfer it to safer havens abroad, forcing authorities to introduce capital controls at the national or Continental level to stop a run on eurozone banks.

If France's moderates win, Germany will immediately invite the new president to shore up bilateral ties between Paris and Berlin and co-lead Europe. In global markets, the euro, along with riskier assets such as bonds from Europe's periphery, will strengthen rapidly. Should the National Front win, on the other hand, the German government will seek accommodation with the nationalist government in Paris, trying to dissuade it from fulfilling its most radical campaign promises. But many of the National Front's policies are simply incompatible with EU structures, limiting its room for compromise. And if serious trouble arises in the eurozone, Berlin will start making preparations for the most orderly dissolution of the currency area possible while planning its next steps with its closest partners in Central and Northern Europe. The market fallout of a potential eurozone collapse would be immediately felt in global markets as European investors flee riskier bonds and move their money to safer assets, such as German bonds.

Italy, meanwhile, is moving toward its own general elections, though it is unclear just how quickly they will arrive. The country does not have to hold elections until early 2018, but disputes within the ruling center-left Democratic Party could precipitate an early vote. The government in Rome, led by Prime Minister Paolo Gentiloni, will remain weak as Italy's main political parties prepare for the elections. Ahead of the vote, the Democratic Party will hold its primary to appoint a new leader in late April — a necessary step before the government resigns and parliamentary elections can be held.

Still, the elections will not take place during the second quarter. This means that Italy's vote will not coincide with France's, giving markets and EU governments time to digest the latter's results. But the lingering risk of elections in Italy, where Euroskeptic parties would probably make a strong showing, will add to the uncertainty clouding Italy's political and financial future. This will do little to ease market fears about the health of Italian banks and the country's high levels of public debt. But Italy could introduce some modest spending cuts to allay the European Commission's concerns about its deficit, and whatever frictions may arise, Rome and Brussels will find a compromise, allowing Italy to avoid EU sanctions.

Greece, another troubled eurozone country, will also be politically and financially fragile this quarter. Because Greece does not have any significant debt repayments to make until mid-July, negotiations between Athens and its creditors on the disbursement of the next tranche of bailout money could drag on for weeks, perhaps even extending beyond the end of the quarter. Nevertheless, the Greek bailout program will stay on track since Athens and its creditors are eager to avoid a default at all costs, though Athens will try to tone down some of the policies it has promised to implement, or announce spending increases in some areas, in hopes of avoiding a rebellion within the government.

In the meantime, Germany will continue to delay granting debt relief to Greece during its own election cycle. It could, however, make vague promises to discuss the issue in the future. Even if the International Monetary Fund does not announce a decision on its participation in the bailout program during the quarter, Greece and its creditors will work to keep it in place.

For an export-dependent economy such as Germany's, the prospect of a trade war brewing with the United States and Washington's threats to undermine the World Trade Organization are also major sources of concern. Consequently, Berlin will keep communication channels open with the new administration in the White House to defend Germany's stance on these issues, as well as on many other points of controversy between the two governments. Germany will also use its rotating presidency at the G-20 to defend free trade and the role of multilateral trade organizations.

Germany's strategy will include preserving the European Union's single market and expanding the bloc's trade relationships with other markets, primarily by supporting EU plans to resume stalled free trade talks. During the second quarter, for example, the European Union will revive negotiations with Mexico to update their free trade agreement. Brussels' efforts to sign free trade agreements with countries such as Japan and India will likewise intensify. Germany will advocate the development of closer trade ties between the European Union and China as well, though the bloc will struggle to get European companies the same level of access to China that Chinese companies have to Europe, creating room for friction during any negotiations that are held. Berlin's aggressive stance against Chinese takeovers of German companies will lead to similar complications during the talks.

To curry favor with the United States, the German government is willing to make gestures of good faith in areas such as defense spending. But this will not go over well in Germany. After all, it is an election year and the German government will be forced to keep lines of communication open with Washington while also being critical of the new administration, especially since a large portion of the German public disapproves of U.S. President Donald Trump. The relationship between the ruling center-right Christian Democratic Union (CDU) and its coalition partners in the center-left Social Democratic Party (SPD) will encounter additional tension as the two try to differentiate themselves before the general elections.

Regional elections in the northwestern German states of Schleswig-Holstein (May 7) and North Rhine-Westphalia (May 14) will test the appeal of the SPD and CDU ahead of the September vote. They will also act as a gauge of the popularity of smaller parties, such as the environmentalist Green Party, the left-wing Die Linke and the center-right Free Democratic Party — all of which could become coalition partners to the SPD and CDU after the elections end. Moreover, the regional races will show whether the nationalist Alternative for Germany (AfD), whose popularity has declined in recent months, can make gains beyond its strongholds in the east and enter the legislatures of western regions. Regardless of the AfD's performance, other parties will refuse to cooperate with it. Yet the AfD's role in German politics is not necessarily to enter government, but to force moderate parties to incorporate elements of its nationalist agenda into their own.

Brexit and Beyond

Brexit negotiations among the British government, EU institutions and EU members will begin in earnest in the second quarter. But the process will last at least two years. All sides will spend most of the next three months in exploratory discussions that aim to define the framework and terms of the negotiations, and no dramatic decisions are expected this early on. Before the talks can even begin, the European Union's remaining 27 members will have to agree to give the European Commission directives for its talks with London.

Some of the topics at the top of the Brexit agenda will include the legal status of British citizens living in the European Union and of EU citizens living in the United Kingdom. The parties are also likely to debate the Brexit's financial aspects, including the United Kingdom's contributions and payments to the European Union in the years ahead. This will create frictions, as the British government would try to keep its exit bill as small as possible. At the same time, the British government will be interested in starting conversations on the free trade agreement it hopes to sign with the European Union. But EU negotiators will insist on a sequential approach, starting with the country's exit and leaving the debate over the terms of its future relations for a later date.

British Prime Minister Theresa May's administration, meanwhile, will face the difficult task of reassuring the devolved governments in Scotland, Northern Ireland and Wales that their voices will be heard and their interests will be protected during the Brexit talks. London will also have to make sure that the central government remains in control of the Brexit process. London may promise subsidies, investment, tax breaks and even the transfer of powers currently in the hands of the European Union to regional governments to try to appease secessionist claims. It is unlikely, however, to give Scotland and Northern Ireland a decisive role in the negotiations. And as Northern Irish nationalist and unionist parties struggle to find common ground, the Good Friday Agreement that defines how the region's government operates will continue to show signs of fatigue.

Divided EU Foreign Policies

The next three months will bring a flurry of debates about Russia to the Continent. As the July 31 expiration date for EU sanctions against Russia approaches, the bloc's internal discussions about its relations with Moscow will become more frequent. Since there have not been any notable changes on the ground in eastern Ukraine or in U.S.-Russia ties since the Trump administration took office, most EU members will support the continuation of existing sanctions. Though the bloc does not have to make its decision until late July, the possibility of it coming before the end of the quarter cannot be ruled out. Should the issue be put to a vote within the next three months, some countries will voice their criticism of the sanctions but are unlikely to veto the decision of the majority. (That said, an electoral victory by France's National Front, which has argued against new punitive measures toward Russia, would significantly threaten the Continent's sanctions regime.)

Crossing Borders

As the weather starts to improve in the Mediterranean Sea, migration to the European Union's southern members will pick up. Along the migrant route traversing the eastern Mediterranean, the EU-Turkey immigration agreement still holds, but Ankara has the power to refuse to honor the deal and to stop policing migrant traffic. If it does, it would be in an effort to put pressure on the European Union, whose half-hearted compliance with the terms of the deal has rankled Ankara. The bloc, for example, has not lifted visa restrictions for Turkish citizens — one of the main promises it made to Ankara in exchange for its cooperation in preventing asylum seekers from entering the European Union. Several EU states will also continue to criticize the Turkish government's attempts to consolidate power following last year's failed coup attempt, giving Turkey added reason to threaten to renege on the deal.

Many migrants may, in fact, become emboldened by the Turkish government's threats and attempt the journey from Turkey to Greece. But Ankara will not give up on the migrant deal completely, since it still hopes to use the agreement — and Europe's fear of the political side effects that renewed waves of immigration could have in an election year — to negotiate and expand its customs union with the bloc in the near future. Maintaining these deep economic ties with Europe is especially important to Turkey as its economy continues to founder.

Regardless, EU members will try to protect themselves from a possible uptick in asylum seekers, keeping their borders closed along the biggest migration routes. This will pose a serious threat to Greece, as the country risks once again becoming a bottleneck for migrants who reach its shores but cannot keep moving northward.

There is also only so much the European Union can do to tamp down on the Central Mediterranean migrant route. In recent months the bloc has stepped up its political, economic and security cooperation with countries in sub-Saharan Africa, from which many migrants originate, as well as with Libya, the main transit state for migrants trying to reach Southern Europe. These policies will continue during the second quarter, but their impact will be modest. Italy and other southern EU members will see more migrants arrive on their doorsteps as weather conditions improve, creating tensions between them and their peers in Northern Europe. Rome will demand greater assistance to handle the influx of people, and if it allows some migrants to pass through its borders and into the rest of the Continent, frictions between it and its neighbors could worsen.

Echoes of the Cold War

The United States and Russia will see heightened frictions this quarter despite widespread speculation that the election of U.S. President Donald Trump would pave the way for a detente with Moscow. As scrutiny over Russia's meddling in U.S. politics builds, any engagement with Moscow will become politically problematic for Washington. And despite Trump's campaign rhetoric, it is in his best interest to keep pressure on Russia through sanctions and continued support for NATO. As a result, both countries will continue their military buildups along Russia's periphery this quarter, and each will test the other's sphere of influence.

Following a limited U.S. strike on a Syrian air base, Russia will position itself as a potential spoiler on the Syrian battlefield to try to draw the United States back to the negotiating table. The risk for collision between the powers is higher this quarter as Russia tries to leverage deconfliction in Syrian airspace to complicate ongoing U.S. military operations in Syria against the Islamic State. Russia's reliance on negative influence to try to bargain with Washington, however, will risk further souring the negotiating climate and limit potential collaboration. But there may still be room for restarting a dialogue in other areas, such as arms control. Both sides need to resolve several arms control issues, including their differences over violations of the Intermediate-Range Nuclear Forces Treaty, the question of whether to renew the New Strategic Arms Reduction Treaty (START), and a strategy for responding to the buildup of weapons arsenals by other powers, such as China.

Moscow, meanwhile, will be busy trying to expand its influence abroad, including in North Africa and the Balkans. In the coming quarter, it will gradually increase its involvement in the Libyan conflict by backing multiple factions while coordinating closely with Egypt. In the Balkans, Russia will also continue bolstering its support for Serbian nationalists, both in Serbia ahead of elections and in Northern Kosovo. Moscow will likewise back the separatist claims of Bosnia's Republika Srpska and will work to deepen the divides between Macedonia and the West over the political status of the country's Albanians. Russia does not expect these countries to become staunch allies; rather, it hopes to use the mounting tension to distract the West and gain political leverage.

Moscow will also work to widen rifts in Europe, particularly as the Continent prepares for French elections. Russian cyber, information and propaganda campaigns will continue to sow discord and increase uncertainty in France, especially if the Kremlin's preferred candidate, Marine Le Pen, does not win the presidency. Moscow will use the same tools to bolster Euroskepticism, particularly in Italy and Germany. Its efforts are likely to intensify in the lead-up to Europe's July deadline to extend sanctions on Russia. Even with sanctions in place, however, Moscow will work to bring European investment back to Russia when it hosts a major investment forum in June.

The Fight for Russia's Borderlands

In the meantime, the standoff between Russia and the West will continue to shape the strategic landscape of the European borderlands. The conflict in eastern Ukraine will maintain its intensity, since the security and political components of the Minsk protocols are unlikely to be implemented this quarter. Economic ties between Ukraine and its separatist territories will deteriorate because of a blockade instituted in the first quarter, forcing the rebel regions to rely on Russia and spurring long-term energy diversification efforts in Ukraine proper forward. As the European Union and United States continue to be distracted by issues elsewhere, Ukraine will build up its economic and security cooperation with Poland and the Baltic states to supplement its Western integration strategy. Meanwhile, the course of European politics (and, in particular, the outcome of France's presidential race) will be key to determining the future of EU sanctions against Russia, though they are unlikely to be lifted altogether this quarter.

Moldova and Georgia, for their part, will look to strengthen their economic ties with Russia while seeking to soften tactical elements of their policies toward breakaway territories out of pragmatism. Nevertheless, they will also continue cooperating with the European Union and NATO. (Moldova, for instance, is slated to open a NATO liaison office in April.) To the north, Belarus will come under greater domestic pressure as protests over a controversial tax policy persist, testing longtime President Aleksandr Lukashenko's undisputed grip on power. Though the unrest has so far remained a domestic issue, external powers — including the West and Russia, which have long competed for influence in Belarus — could become involved, potentially exacerbating the protests.

Armenia and Azerbaijan's dispute over the separatist region of Nagorno-Karabakh won't die down this quarter either. In fact, hostilities may intensify after Armenia's parliamentary elections are held in early April. Russia will continue to serve as the primary arbiter and power broker in the dispute as Turkey remains distracted (and, to an extent, dependent on Russia's cooperation) in the Middle East. But Moscow's attempts to build on its gains and increase its clout in the region through the Eurasian Economic Union and Collective Security Treaty Organization will be compromised by infighting within the blocs.

Russia's Internal Struggle

Apart from its foreign interests, Russia will have to contend with a somewhat chaotic domestic environment this quarter. Though the Russian economy will continue to recover from recession, stagnation will linger through the rest of the year. Despite the sanctions against it, Moscow will court foreign investment from the West, the Asia-Pacific and South Asia at its annual St. Petersburg International Economic Forum in June, putting on hold many of its isolationist practices of the past three years.

Regardless of this relatively bright outlook, many Russian regions and citizens are in dire financial straits. Constant hardship will inflame protests over political, economic and social issues across the country. The Kremlin has tried to ensure that these demonstrations do not coalesce into a single movement against it, but if they do, security forces have been fortified and deployed nationwide to respond. Russia's heavy-handed crackdowns on opposition figures and dissent will continue, and it could start to squeeze social media channels as well.

Russian President Vladimir Putin will also work to contain the country's political elite as they continue to make grabs for power. At the same time, the Kremlin will struggle to answer tough questions about the ownership of assets, such as Chechnya's oil sector and defense companies, and whether to force energy giants such as Rosneft to cut production. All the while, Russia's security services and their cyber centers — prized portfolios for the country's elite — seem to be undergoing a reorganization behind closed doors in the wake of accusations and arrests tied to the alleged hacking campaign targeting the U.S. presidential election. Such contests for power will further isolate Putin as he grows more authoritarian in order to preserve the stability of the political system beneath him.

Moscow Looks to the East

Russia, meanwhile, will keep diversifying its ties away from the West in the second quarter. Putin will hold another much-touted summit, this time with Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe, as Russia and Japan attempt to mend their relationship. The two countries have for some time been hung up on a territorial dispute over islands they both claim. Though they have made minor progress in settling the spat, including by establishing joint investment projects and agreeing to visa-free travel on the islands, neither is ready to make a grand bargain for them or reach a peace deal. Russia still sees the islands as an issue of national sovereignty and as a front line in its nuclear deterrence, while Japan has maintained sanctions on Russia and has been slow to release funds promised to projects in Russia's Far East. So, though both sides will promote better ties, actual steps toward achieving them will be few and far between.

Russia will work to expand its relationships elsewhere in Asia as well. Moscow will hold its annual economic forum in May, which key delegations from China, Japan and India will attend. Beijing is looking to extend its "One Belt, One Road" initiative through Russia, while Japan is still holding out hope of investing in the Far East. The summit will be co-hosted by India, since New Delhi has been pumping more money into Russia, and Moscow wants to rekindle its ties with the South Asian country to balance its other relationships in Asia. Russia and Vietnam will also hold a summit this quarter; Moscow is aiming to improve its foothold in the country with energy, military and metals investment deals to gain leverage in the wider region.

Instability in Central Asia

Central Asia's troubles will not end in the second quarter as protests, militancy and political infighting persist. Kazakhstan and Kyrgyzstan will probably be the Central Asian states most vulnerable to unrest — the former because of its foundering economy and the latter because of an impending presidential election in November. (Kazakhstan will also begin the rocky process of transferring some powers from long-serving President Nursultan Nazarbayev to Parliament and the Cabinet.) But tension will build in Uzbekistan as well as the country's new president, Shavkat Mirziyoyev, and security chief Rustam Inoyatov spar over reforms. All the while, Russia will seek to steadily increase its sway over the region, particularly on matters of security.

The Syrian Civil War

The United States faces heightened risk on the Syrian battlefield this quarter at the same time it prepares to kick off a major offensive against Islamic State in Raqqa. A U.S. limited strike on a Syrian air base in response to a Syrian chemical weapons attack was designed to demonstrate the United States' decisiveness in military matters (a message not lost on North Korea,) but it also came with risks. Russia has long attempted to leverage the Syrian battlefield in its broader negotiations with the United States, but the United States is not leaving much room for a bargain with Moscow. Russia thus has to rely on negative influence to try and draw the United States into a dialogue and will try to play the role of spoiler on the Syrian battlefield to raise operational risks for the United States. There will be potential for the two sides to negotiate on deconfliction, but that will likely be the extent of their cooperation this quarter as Washington focuses on the fight against the Islamic State.

Russian forces will be active elsewhere in Syria, however, supporting the Syrian army's offensives against rebel forces as well as the Islamic State in theaters such as Deir el-Zour. After a few shaky months in place, the cease-fire that Russia, Turkey and Iran brokered between the rebels and loyalists in December 2016 has broken down completely. Its failure underscores the futility of the attempted peace talks that took place throughout the first quarter. In the second quarter, Syria's deepening economic woes, evident in the country's food shortages and collapsing currency, will threaten the government's hold on loyalist territory.

Syrian fighters backed by the United States will lead the charge in Raqqa. The United States' battle plan, which also includes deployments of U.S. troops, will rely on the most effective fighting force available in the short term: the multiethnic Syrian Democratic Forces (SDF). The SDF has made swift work of the fight so far, having nearly encircled the city. With help from the freshly deployed U.S. forces, artillery support has also been put in place.

But by emphasizing the SDF in the battle for Raqqa, the United States will further strain its already tense relations with Turkey. The forces include members of the Kurdish People's Protection Units (YPG), a militia Turkey considers a terrorist organization and an active threat to its national security. Still, Ankara's dismay will not discourage Washington from working with the force. And though Turkey will try to finagle a more prominent role for the forces it supports, including Turkish-trained Arab tribal forces, the United States will prioritize winning the fight against the Islamic State by the most expedient means available over appeasing Turkey. Turkey will nonetheless try to draw the United States deeper in a fight against the Syrian regime and push its proposals for establishing a no fly one and safe zones in in Syria.

Washington's battle plan for Raqqa is just one of many complications Ankara will have to contend with in Syria in the second quarter. By the time Turkey took al-Bab from the Islamic State during the last quarter, it had already accomplished many of its objectives in northern Syria under Operation Euphrates Shield. But its efforts to keep Kurdish forces from establishing control over a contiguous swath of territory in the northern part of the country are still in progress. To achieve that objective, it will have to tread lightly so as not to step on Russia's toes. Ankara and Moscow's alliance of convenience has mostly run its course in Syria, especially since Russia foiled Turkey's plans to take the city of Manbij. Nevertheless, the two countries need to keep the lines of communication open to ensure that their troops don't end up in conflict. If their priorities in Syria continue diverging, Turkey may start looking for other ways to gain leverage over Russia — by joining in on negotiations over the Nagorno-Karabakh dispute, for instance, or increasing its coordination with fellow NATO members in the Black Sea. And even though Turkey will have less room to maneuver in Syria this quarter, it will still have some leeway to deepen its involvement in northern Iraq.

The Fight Against the Islamic State

In the Middle East and North Africa, the primary focus of the second quarter will be the fight against the Islamic State. The battle to oust the extremist group from its strongholds in the region will reach milestones in multiple theaters in the months ahead. In Iraq, for instance, the battle for Mosul will come to a close, at least in the city itself. And in Syria, the operation to reclaim the city of Raqqa is about to get underway. These events, though notable, will hardly herald the demise of the Islamic State. In fact, the organization will redouble its terrorist activities, not only in its core area of operations in the Middle East but also internationally, in an attempt to maintain its relevance as it loses territory.

The Battle for Mosul

Five months into the fighting, the end of the Mosul offensive is now in sight. Before the operation ends, though, Iraqi forces will deploy to other Islamic State strongholds such as Tal Afar and Hawija to sweep the extremist group out of those pockets. As the main battle comes to a close, the divisions among the Iraqi coalition's constituent groups will become clearer than ever. The risk of infighting among the alliance's Shiite, Kurdish and Sunni militias will be high throughout the quarter, particularly in the northern border regions of Nineveh province.

That Iraqi army forces are engaged in fighting in the city itself has improved the central government's reputation among Mosul residents; the boost will help Baghdad gain legitimacy and establish its authority over the city. But stabilizing the reclaimed territories around the city will be a tall order for Baghdad. Rifts within Shiite, Sunni and Kurdish groups will prevent them from reaching a coherent political settlement over Nineveh province's future this quarter. Iran and Turkey, meanwhile, will continue to vie for influence in Iraq, primarily through proxy battles in the disputed territories that will soon be reclaimed from the Islamic State. The Iraqi government and the Kurdistan Regional Government (KRG) each claim control of Tal Afar, Kirkuk and Sinjar, making these areas most susceptible to fighting and disputes over territory and resources.

As Iraq's political parties gear up for provincial elections in September, regional powers such as Turkey and Iran will have yet another opportunity to try to gain influence in the country. Tehran will use its sway among Iraq's Shiite political parties and militias to goad Baghdad to prioritize its ties with Iran and to block Ankara's attempts to get involved in the political settlement process through Sunni parties. Prime Minister Haider al-Abadi will face mounting political pressure from all sides, including Iraq's nationalist parties, as he tries to appease Turkey, Iran and the West simultaneously. Adding to the mix, Saudi Arabia will make economic and diplomatic gestures in an effort to strengthen its ties with Baghdad. (U. S. President Donald Trump's administration has been pressuring the kingdom to help loosen Iran's grip on Baghdad's political and security spheres.)

The Kurdish Struggle

In Iraqi Kurdistan, disagreements will prevent the region's various political factions from forming a united front. In fact, the divisions are widening. The Patriotic Union of Kurdistan (PUK) has started pushing back more forcefully against its main political rival, the Kurdistan Democratic Party (KDP), to increase its share of oil revenues from Kirkuk and weaken the KDP's alliance with Baghdad. The dispute is good news for Baghdad, at least. Should the PUK make another attempt at disrupting the flow of oil from Kirkuk to win concessions from Baghdad or Arbil, the Iraqi government will feel less threatened than it would if the KDP were also in on the plan. But Kirkuk could become a flashpoint this quarter regardless, as the governments in Baghdad and the KRG, not to mention the rival Kurdish parties, fight over control of the province and its oil production.

Iraqi Kurdistan, similarly, will be a primary playing field in the competition between Turkey and Iran. Ankara will use the presence of the Kurdistan Workers' Party (PKK), which it considers a terrorist organization, in northern Iraq as a pretext to deploy proxy forces in the region to defend its interests there. Turkey might consider, for instance, dispatching the Rojava Peshmerga, a Kurdish militia aligned with the KDP, to fight on its behalf in the event that ethnic conflict flares up after the Mosul offensive winds down. To keep Ankara in check and support its own interests in northern Iraq, Tehran will rely on the mostly Shiite Popular Mobilization Forces positioned near Turkish-backed forces, as well as its ties with Baghdad.

Turkey's Resurgence

In Turkey, voters will head to the polls in mid-April to decide whether to go ahead with proposed constitutional amendments that could change Turkey's political future. President Recep Tayyip Erdogan has a lot riding on the success of the reforms, which would increase the powers of the presidency and curtail those of other branches of government. But when voters cast their ballots on April 16, they will have other concerns on their minds, such as the country's flagging economy. Turkey's high dollar-denominated debt and weakening currency — set to further deteriorate as the dollar strengthens — have exacerbated its financial troubles recently. If the referendum falls short of the simple majority it needs to pass, the ruling Justice and Development Party (AKP) will still retain power, though the loss would be a blow for Erdogan's campaign to consolidate institutional control.

To try to improve its chances of success, the AKP has been using the country's security concerns to stoke nationalism and stir popular support for the referendum. The wave of nationalism sweeping Turkey will buoy the ruling party, win or lose. Nevertheless, the results of the referendum will reveal strong support for and opposition to the AKP, laying bare the country's sharp political divisions.

Iran's Arc of Influence

Iran will also hold an important vote this quarter. Voters in the country will elect their next president May 19. As the election approaches, even the Islamic republic's hard-line politicians are trying to avoid instigating conflict with the United States. Washington, likewise, will be careful not to provoke hostilities with Tehran by changing the Joint Comprehensive Plan of Action nuclear deal — especially since the GCC countries support keeping the agreement in place rather than risking uncertainty by scrapping it. But that won't stop the Islamic Revolutionary Guard Corps from keeping up its usual defensive posturing and staging missile tests or military exercises in a bid to stay relevant. And as U.S. lawmakers have made clear, Congress will not hesitate to impose additional sanctions against Tehran in response to any perceived aggression.

The threat of new sanctions from the United States will compound Iranian President Hassan Rouhani's economic worries in the runup to the elections. When campaign season kicks off in April, the incumbent leader will face challenges from opponents in Iran's hard-line and conservative camps alike. And though Rouhani has experience, momentum and his role in Iran's economic recovery to date on his side, the country's lingering financial troubles will weigh heavy on voters' minds as they head for the ballot box. Inflation has fallen under Rouhani's administration, but unemployment is still high — a vulnerability his opponents may seize on during the campaign.

As the Islamic republic gears up for its election, one of its prized proxy forces, Hezbollah, could derail a vote in Lebanon. The militia's allies and enemies are still at odds over electoral reforms and a new budget, and their disagreements could postpone elections set for May. Notwithstanding the current dispute, the Lebanese government has come a long way over the past several months. A new prime minister and president have managed to reshuffle the country's military leadership and, more important, revive its stagnant energy sector. Their progress highlights the pragmatic approach Lebanon's main political parties have taken to try to find a viable compromise to solve the country's persistent problems. But as the lingering differences over electoral reform demonstrate, no solution is perfect.

Hezbollah will also be a source of growing concern for Israel during the second quarter. The group's military buildup in Syria over the course of the civil war there, combined with its growing presence in the Golan Heights, has put Israel on high alert and fueled fears of an impending war at the country's northern border. To prevent Hezbollah from getting any stronger, the Israeli government will continue attacking its arms shipments in southern Syria. Nevertheless, the conflict could escalate during the second quarter.

Israel's Survival Strategy

If the Israeli government keeps pursuing its settlement policy in the West Bank without objection from the White House, moreover, the proliferating communities could provoke a violent response from Palestinians there. The risk of renewed conflict, sparked by competing Salafist groups or merely by chance events, will loom large in the Palestinian Authority, though its two main political parties, Fatah and Hamas, will each try to avoid confrontation with Israel this quarter. In addition, the political divides between the parties could further postpone legislative elections in the Palestinian territories, scheduled in the West Bank for May.

Hamas and Fatah will each be focused on their own internal objectives this quarter rather than on bridging the divide between them. Hamas is working to modify its political charter for the first time in decades, breaking with tradition to recognize the 1967 Palestinian borders. The party's turn toward moderation, however slight, is meant to curry favor with Arab partners such as Egypt, whose support Hamas needs more than ever now that the Islamic State's Sinai faction is threatening its supply routes and legitimacy. (Israel will put little stock in the group's efforts at change, though, and will continue its operations against Hamas.) Fatah's leaders, meanwhile, will be focused on establishing a succession plan for aging party leader and Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas. The enduring rifts between the rival Palestinian parties will prompt Arab states in the region to get more involved to try to resolve the struggle.

The Saudi Survival Strategy

For Saudi Arabia, the second quarter will hinge on OPEC's May 25 meeting. The summit, during which Riyadh will cajole its fellow members in the oil cartel to extend the production cut instated in November 2016, will be a turning point for the Saudi government's economic reform initiatives. Even though the production cap hasn't boosted oil prices as much as Riyadh hoped it would, the kingdom is in no position to risk oversaturating the market by scrapping the deal. Doing so, after all, would further destabilize the price of oil, jeopardizing Saudi Arabia's oil revenues in the process. Whether the country can persuade the rest of OPEC to stay the course with the production cut will determine every other economic action that the Saudi government takes for the rest of the year.

The Yemeni Civil War

With all sides of the conflict locked in a stalemate, Yemen's civil war will enter the second quarter more or less stagnant. The rifts in the Gulf Cooperation Council (GCC) military coalition against Yemen's Houthi rebels are more pronounced than ever. The United Arab Emirates is focused on training and supporting its own forces in the south. Saudi Arabia, on the other hand, is looking to the United States for help negotiating a political resolution to end the fight. But until Riyadh compromises in its adamant support for Yemeni President Abd Rabboh Mansour Hadi, and the Houthi rebels agree to relinquish territory to the government, the prospects for peace will be slim. So though the United Nations will make another attempt at forging a peace plan for the country, it will make little headway in this endeavor.

Evidence of Iran's efforts to train and equip the Houthi rebels, meanwhile, has prompted the Pentagon to request more support for the Saudi- and Emirati-led coalition. If the White House approves, the United States will share more intelligence and boost its logistical coordination with the Gulf coalition to try to limit Iran's influence in war-torn Yemen and stabilize the strategic Bab al-Mandab Strait. At the same time, Washington will pursue a more aggressive strategy against al Qaeda in the second quarter since the group's slow and steady approach has enabled it to grow in Yemen as well as Syria.

The Libyan Civil War

Oil production will also play an important role in Libya this quarter, as multiple conflicts rage on in the country. Libyan National Army chief Field Marshal Khalifa Hifter has reclaimed the critical As Sidra and Ras Lanuf oil export terminals in eastern Libya, after the Petroleum Facilities Guards and Benghazi Defense Brigades militias overran them in early March. Though the fighting stalled oil production in Libya, it will likely maintain export levels over 400,000 barrels per day throughout the quarter.

In western Libya, meanwhile, rivalries between the U.N.-backed Government of National Accord and the General National Congress, two of the country's three rival governments, will breed divisions in Misrata and Tripoli. Outbreaks of violence between the governments' corresponding militias will continue to be a constant this quarter, particularly in the capital. International support for Libya's governments will be less divided, by contrast. Egypt and the United Arab Emirates will continue to back Hifter, while Russia increases its support for his Libyan National Army. (Unless he can bring more ground forces under his control, however, Hifter will have trouble increasing his influence in eastern Libya, and his efforts to draw new recruits will run up against tribal divisions.) And although the European Union will push for political resolutions to the various battles in Libya, negotiations will stay at a standstill this quarter.

The Difficulties of North African Reform

Elsewhere in North Africa, Algeria's government will fight a political battle of its own this quarter, albeit more quietly. The country's citizens are frustrated since the government passed a new budget that slashed public spending and raised taxes. The austerity measures, which sparked public protests, will be at the forefront of voters' minds as they head to the polls in May for legislative elections, and more demonstrations are expected in the meantime. Whatever the vote's outcome, however, the Parliament lacks the political clout to bring change to Algeria's tightly controlled political system, even if opposition parties perform better than they have in years past. Many of President Abdel Aziz Bouteflika's close allies have ensconced themselves in important ministries and positions over the past few years, including, during the first quarter, the head of state oil and gas company Sonatrach. Infighting among the country's elite will be a strong undercurrent in Algerian politics for the rest of the quarter, though it will take place largely behind closed doors.

China in Transition

Chinese President Xi Jinping's push to consolidate his grip on power will enter a critical phase in the coming months amid preparations for October's 19th Party Congress, the quinquennial meeting where senior party officials select the next Politburo Standing Committee, the country's top governing body. With as many as five of the current seven committee members expected to step down this year, the plenum will offer Xi a momentous opportunity to stack the country's leadership with his supporters, fortifying his position as China's most powerful leader in decades. In the lead-up to the congress, Xi's core task will be to eliminate remaining checks on his influence, while reshuffling personnel to move allies into key posts. Broadly speaking, these efforts will be successful.

The stakes riding on the Party Congress will compel Chinese leaders this quarter to focus overwhelmingly on stabilizing the economy, sustaining low unemployment and avoiding social disruptions, meaning much-needed but risky reforms will take a back seat. Beijing will continue to push industrial restructuring and consolidation programs, environmental initiatives and limited financial reforms. Major new initiatives, however, that would threaten to erode business confidence or destabilize the economy are unlikely in the near future. And on existing issues that the government chooses to expand, such as corporate debt-equity swaps and bankruptcy tribunals and the introduction of a nationwide property tax, authorities will delay full implementation until after the congress. In the meantime, Beijing will maintain robust support for key industrial sectors such as home construction and manufacturing while introducing piecemeal measures to strengthen the economy's defenses against potential external shocks, especially those threatened by impending shifts in U.S. trade and currency policies.

Outside the mainland, Beijing will face a bigger challenge in managing persistent discontent in Hong Kong over China's interference in the city's political affairs, a situation that the recent election of its preferred candidate, Carrie Lam, as Hong Kong's next chief executive will do little to alleviate. As the special administrative region prepares to mark the 20th anniversary of its reunification with China on July 1 (Lam's inauguration date), conditions will be ripe for an escalation of protests.

Globalization, Evolved

The ongoing evolution in U.S. trade policy will continue to be felt across the Asia-Pacific and will pose the greatest potential threat to Chinese economic stability — and therefore to Xi's drive to consolidate power — in the second quarter. In the next three months, Washington may not impose new barriers to trade with China beyond anti-dumping and countervailing duties, but Beijing will gird itself for the possibility that the Trump administration follows through on the new president's promises to name China a currency manipulator or levy new controls on U.S. imports of Chinese goods such as steel or automobiles. Chinese authorities will work to build up buffers against U.S. threats or punitive measures while seeking to deter Washington by outlining the retaliatory measures Beijing can take. China may also introduce its own anti-dumping measures. Beijing's most likely course of action, however, will be to try to use its influence on regional security matters as leverage in economic discussions with Washington. Toward this end, China may offer to cooperate with Washington on issues such as cybersecurity, military affairs and even North Korea — a rare area where U.S. and Chinese interests overlap. At the same time, it will become more openly confrontational in the South China Sea or on other regional matters.

Though China has been the primary target in Asia of Washington's attacks on trade and currency manipulation, Japan and South Korea — the United States' two most important security allies in Asia — have by no means been exempt from prospective U.S. policy changes. This will compel both countries to explore other options, including expanded investment into and potentially imports from the United States, to hedge against pressure from Washington and prevent economic frictions from undermining their security partnerships. Nonetheless, even rhetorical pressure from Washington on trade will be painful for South Korea as Seoul attempts to move on from the fall of President Park Geun Hye while also facing Chinese economic retaliation over the deployment of the Terminal High-Altitude Area Defense (THAAD) missile defense system. China may ease pressure on Seoul in an effort to open diplomacy with the next South Korean administration after the upcoming election. But the new president's attention will be divided between a range of priorities: not only the perennial North Korean threat but also reform of South Korea's scandal-prone chaebols (giant, family-run conglomerates) and broader economic restructuring.

Elsewhere in the Asia-Pacific, moderate recoveries in the global economy — particularly in commodity prices — will continue to provide much-needed relief for regional exporters. Nonetheless, countries such as South Korea and Thailand will struggle to regain their growth momentum because of internal political constraints, increased regional competition and regional geopolitical pressures. Moreover, few countries in the region will be immune to the long-term impact of the surge of protectionism across the globe or the potential fallout from a prolonged Sino-U.S. trade or currency spat. As major powers reconfigure their trade strategies, smaller economies will seek to insulate themselves from potential shocks by more proactively pursuing regional cooperation and economic diversification. In addition to Asia-centric multilateral frameworks such as the 16-member Regional Comprehensive Economic Partnership (RCEP), trade-dependent economies such as those of Malaysia, Australia, Vietnam and South Korea will explore free trade options farther afield.

The New Silk Road

Beijing will be well-positioned to exploit regionwide uncertainty over Washington's potential retrenchment to press Chinese interests elsewhere in its periphery this quarter. In response to the Trump administration's withdrawal from the Trans-Pacific Partnership trade pact, China will redouble its efforts to draw regional economies further into its orbit by touting regional trade initiatives such as RCEP.

In addition to trade, expanded investment, particularly in infrastructure, will be core to China's diplomatic outreach throughout its periphery, with Beijing using its One Belt, One Road summit in May to portray itself as an economic anchor and promote its vision for the region as a favorable alternative to the Western-led order. But its efforts to build out vast road and rail networks will be constrained by localized unrest and suspicions in target countries, particularly Pakistan and Sri Lanka, as well as at home in Xinjiang. Domestic economic pressures will also complicate implementation of Beijing's grand plans.

Coping With a Nuclear North Korea

The fraught efforts by China and the United States, as well as South Korea and Japan, to contain North Korea's nuclear weapons program will remain a singular driver of regional dynamics in the quarter. As North Korea nears the successful development of an effective nuclear deterrent against the United States, Pyongyang will continue to use every opportunity to demonstrate its expanding defense capabilities. Another North Korean nuclear test would undoubtedly elicit heated rhetoric and defense posturing by Seoul and Tokyo, including moves that Beijing views as antagonistic. This will reduce room for diplomacy between Washington and Northeast Asia's leading powers and intensify pressure on Washington to consider alternative measures to deter Pyongyang.

Direct, pre-emptive military action against Pyongyang — particularly its nuclear weapons infrastructure and arsenal — is possible but unlikely this quarter absent a complete breakdown of diplomatic efforts by the United States and China. Instead, Washington will most likely focus on pressuring Beijing to rein in Pyongyang. Beijing may use its economic pressure over North Korea to hedge against Washington's agenda on other fronts, particularly U.S. pressure on trade. But Beijing will avoid fully severing North Korea's economic lifelines in China or substantially undermining Kim Jong Un's rule in Pyongyang.

Asia-Pacific: Among Great Powers

Where possible, Beijing will work to separate its tension with Washington over trade and the Korean Peninsula from other pivotal issues in China's periphery. Beijing will be particularly on guard against any moves by Washington to use Taiwan as a bargaining chip in other negotiations. Though the Trump administration reversed course and pledged in February to continue the "One China" policy, a long-standing diplomatic formula underpinning Washington's relations with Beijing and Taipei, the White House may still seek to boost arms sales or diplomatic contact with Taipei this quarter. Meanwhile, Taiwan will also expand its economic outreach to other countries, particular Japan, India and Southeast Asian states, to lessen the impact of diplomatic isolation by Beijing. China would heartily protest any new U.S. arms sales to Taiwan and possibly reduce military cooperation with Washington, but it will avoid inflaming cross-strait tensions in any way that would threaten Xi's goals at the upcoming Party Congress.

Meanwhile, Beijing will further its evolving strategy for managing the backlash in Southeast Asia to expanding Chinese maritime activities in regional waters. Following last year's international tribunal ruling invalidating China's territorial claims in the South China Sea, Beijing has continued a carrot-and-stick strategy, paring maritime and economic concessions with coercive measures — all while continuing to build out its regional military presence. In recent months, this strategy has helped China and some South China Sea claimant states, particularly the Philippines, achieve a tentative conciliation, even as China's broader confrontation with the United States has threatened its capacity to manage South China Sea affairs.

But numerous potential flashpoints in the second quarter will put this reconciliation to the test. For example, the upcoming fishing season will create ample opportunities for flare-ups between Chinese fishing fleets and coast guard forces and their counterparts from littoral states such as Indonesia and Vietnam. Perhaps the biggest test will be the joint fishing arrangement between China and the Philippines in waters around the Scarborough Shoal, a long-standing flashpoint some 200 kilometers west of Luzon. Though large-scale, sustained conflict in the disputed waters is unlikely, the growing number of civilian and naval ships on the seas raises the risk of accidents and miscalculations capable of spawning an international crisis.

Landmark bilateral Sino-Philippine maritime consultations in May will not fundamentally alter the dynamic in the region. With Philippine President Rodrigo Duterte's erratic rhetoric and efforts to reorient the country's foreign policy toward China beginning to draw some pushback at home — and given China's unwavering goal of cementing its regional maritime dominance — Sino-Philippine relations will remain fraught, creating opportunities for a warming of ties between Manila and Washington. This, in turn, could affect how other states in the region deal with Chinese assertiveness. Ultimately, claimant states will continue to pursue omnidirectional foreign policies marked by greater ties with a range of outside powers, including Russia and Japan. And Beijing will work to maintain its current strategy of balancing coercion with concessions and cooperation (including on energy development in disputed waters) to temper the sharpest tensions and limit opposition to its maritime actions.

Southeast Asia: Burdened By Consensus

China and the Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN) will likely make some progress in negotiations on a Code of Conduct for the South China Sea. But divisions within ASEAN over how to deal with Beijing, combined with deepening concerns over China's growing military power and perceived assertiveness, will limit the negotiations.

Moreover, across Southeast Asia, domestic political factors will continue to hinder pan-ASEAN cohesion and complicate broader regional issues. Even as the Philippines' temporary detente with China enters rough waters this quarter, for example, so will Duterte face new challenges to his initially unquestioned authority at home. As long as Duterte's domestic popularity is high, he will face no serious threats to his power. But the threat of power struggles within the government and political establishment will grow as he pushes forward with contentious initiatives such as his violent war on drugs, peace talks with Muslim Moro and Communist rebels, and a plan to shift the government to a federal system — all while seeking to limit domestic backlash to his reorientation away from the United States, which retains deep ties throughout the Philippine defense establishment. A Duterte administration bogged down by domestic pressures would have less room to sustain a politically risky outreach to China or, as this year's ASEAN chair, steer the body toward a semblance of consensus on the South China Sea.

Meanwhile, in Cambodia — under the current government, China's most stalwart supporter in ASEAN — upcoming commune elections will test the public's support for Prime Minister Hun Sen and the grip of his Cambodian People's Party on power ahead of 2018 general elections. Similarly, an April runoff election for Jakarta governor will serve as a barometer of the ruling party's ability to solidify support to the degree necessary to expand substantial fiscal, regulatory and economic reforms and play a more decisive role in regional trade and security affairs.

A Japanese Awakening

Barring a significant change in U.S. policy toward the South China Sea, claimant states and U.S. allies alike will remain cautious about undertaking bilateral naval patrols with Washington or taking other actions that might antagonize Beijing. Such concerns will be unlikely, however, to deter Japan from deepening its diplomatic outreach to and defense cooperation with South China Sea claimant states. Tokyo will use arms sales and military aid to ASEAN states, along with joint exercises with regional navies and a generally increased regional maritime presence, to bolster its position as an increasingly robust check on Chinese influence in Southeast Asia.

Japan's diplomatic, economic and security offensives in Southeast Asia are just one piece in its broader push to revive the country's standing and influence abroad. In the second quarter, Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe will meet with Russian President Vladimir Putin as the two countries seek to improve ties and resolve a long-standing dispute over control of the South Kuril Islands. Even incremental progress here would help Tokyo hedge against Chinese influence in Northeast Asia. Meanwhile, Japan will continue with efforts to counter China's expanding presence in the East China Sea by increasing naval and coast guard patrols and research activities. But Tokyo's attention will be dominated by relations with Washington this quarter, with several meetings between senior Japanese and U.S. lawmakers on the docket, as the government seeks to build on the momentum generated by Abe's recent visit to Washington and Japan's promise to invest in the United States.

The Abe administration will use political capital gained from its diplomatic successes here to push for structural reform legislation at home, along with a constitutional revision allowing the emperor to abdicate. The quarter will likely see concrete progress on reform legislation in areas such as agriculture and labor. Meanwhile, the Abe administration will rely on aggressive monetary and fiscal policy to sustain overall economic stability at home.

Brazil's Economy Recovers While Its Leaders Founder

Argentina Undertakes Subtle Reforms

North America Unrivaled

Now that the key members of U.S. President Donald Trump's trade team have been appointed and are likely to be confirmed this quarter, trade issues will move up on the White House's agenda. Washington will use the next three months to conduct an internal review on the United States' existing trade agreements and decide which aspects of the deals to amend in negotiations. At the top of the new administration's priorities will be the revision of the North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA).

NAFTA's members — Canada, Mexico and the United States — will open the discussion within a trilateral framework. Though the United States has said it would prefer to pursue trade talks on a bilateral basis, Canada and Mexico have made clear that they prefer to stick to three-way talks. But even if the United States is willing to kick off the negotiations in this format, differences between Washington and its North American trade partners could eventually force the parties to move to one-on-one discussions instead. This cannot happen, however, until the negotiations formally begin in the second half of the year. (The White House has said it plans to use the Trade Promotion Authority law to renegotiate NAFTA, but doing so would require the administration to give 90 days' notice before entering into official talks — notice it will almost certainly issue in the second quarter.)

In the meantime, all parties will see a flurry of preparations and lobbying take place in the coming months, ahead of the talks. The United States will use its 90-day consultation period to draft specific negotiating points for congressional review. Chief among them will be NAFTA's rules of origin: Washington will argue that products imported from Mexico and Canada should be made up of more inputs sourced from NAFTA members in order to qualify for tariff exemptions. The White House will also probably seek to reshape the bloc's Chapter 19 dispute settlement mechanism, introduce more labor and environmental requirements, and expand the deal's purview to cover modern sectors such as the digital economy that were not included in the initial agreement.

Mexico's strategy going into the negotiations also began to take shape over the first quarter. Mexico City has already triggered its own 90-day consultation period and has begun reaching out to business leaders and groups at the state and municipal levels in Mexico and the United States to lobby against any substantial alterations of NAFTA. Mexico has also outlined the sectors most likely to be affected by a breakdown in negotiations or new U.S. tariffs on Mexican goods so that it may respond in kind if it must. But with few practical means of immediate leverage against the United States, Mexico is at a distinct disadvantage. As a result, it will have no opportunity to pressure Washington without jeopardizing the NAFTA talks as a whole. Threats of scaling back intelligence sharing, for example, will probably emerge from Mexico only if Washington attempts to impose unfavorable constraints on Mexican goods during the talks.

Though Trump's harshest criticism of NAFTA has so far centered on Mexico, Canada is taking no chances. Following Mexico City's lead, Ottawa has reached out to U.S. states that frequently trade with Canada, including in the Midwest, in an attempt to minimize disruptions to NAFTA. Several of those states voted for Trump in November, but Ottawa is hoping to make the case that preserving close trade ties with Canada is in their best interest. Its lobbying and outreach efforts will continue through the second quarter. Canada has also pointed out that its own free trade agreement with the United States, which predates NAFTA, has only been suspended and could easily be resurrected should Washington choose to replace the trilateral deal with two bilateral arrangements.

Beyond its immediate neighbors, the United States will seek to more tightly enforce its existing trade deals with other partners, particularly China. Washington, however, is unlikely to make much progress on larger trade issues during the coming quarter. Though the White House has threatened to ignore the rulings of the World Trade Organization (WTO) as it sees fit, the issue probably will not come to a head in the next three months. With its health care plan on ice, the Trump administration will instead shift gears toward trying to implement its proposed tax cuts and reforms. Congress will pass a budget resolution in the second quarter that will allow it to try to approve tax adjustments through budget reconciliation before the end of the 2018 fiscal year. Meanwhile, the Trump administration will unveil its own proposed changes to the tax code this quarter, though its plan will face an uphill battle in Congress. Among the most controversial amendments that Republicans in the House of Representatives have proposed is a border tax adjustment. Many are concerned that the measure may violate the United States' obligations under the WTO by rebating "direct taxes" on exporters (potentially constituting an export subsidy) and by taxing imported goods differently than domestically produced products. EU members and other countries have expressed concern about these issues and have promised to challenge the changes if they are approved by Congress. That said, it is unclear whether these aspects of the tax reform will be eliminated, adjusted or kept before the bill is presented to lawmakers. Moreover, though Washington will kick off the process of overhauling the U.S. tax code this quarter, Congress will not face as tight a deadline to complete it as it did with health care reform earlier this year. The tax proposals' actual passage, then, will not occur until at least the second half of 2017.

The Importance of Mexico

Mexico's relationship with the United States — its most important in terms of trade, security and diplomacy — will take center stage in Mexico City this quarter. Though the Mexican government will take small steps to try to limit any alterations to its ties with Washington, it will also hedge its bets by searching for ways to diversify its economy away from its northern neighbor. Mexico will explore its options for expanding trade with the European Union and Asian partners, including Japan, China, New Zealand and Thailand, while seeking to partially substitute U.S. food imports with goods from South America. To that end, it will try to lay the groundwork for deals to purchase more soybean, beef, pork and corn imports from Brazil and Argentina.

The White House's plans to renegotiate NAFTA and insistence that Mexico do more to restrict immigration could translate into political gains for populist politicians south of the border. The campaign season for Mexico state's gubernatorial election on June 4 will heat up during the second quarter, and given the state's size and political diversity, it is widely regarded as a bellwether for the country's presidential race, which will be held in 2018. At the moment, populist figure Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador's National Regeneration Movement (Morena) appears ready to give the country's traditional political heavyweights — the Institutional Revolutionary Party (PRI) and National Action Party (PAN) — a run for their money in this year's election. As Morena squares off against the PRI and PAN for control of Mexico state's governorship, its performance will give some indication as to whether the PRI's numerous corruption scandals and Mexico City's deteriorating relationship with Washington will result in populist backlash during next year's presidential race. Lopez Obrador will no doubt capitalize on Mexican voters' dissatisfaction with the ruling PRI and U.S. antagonism to further his own campaign for the presidency over the next few months.

Venezuela's Unraveling

This year will be the toughest the ruling United Socialist Party of Venezuela (PSUV) has ever encountered. Chief among the government's concerns will be its high risk of defaulting on debt owed by state oil and natural gas firm Petroleos de Venezuela (PDVSA). PDVSA is counting on a $600 million loan from Russian oil giant Rosneft a stake in a joint venture to make its $3.1 billion in debt payments due in April and May. If the loan falls through, Venezuela will be in dire financial straits. Should the company default on its upcoming bills, the threat of unrest spreading throughout the country will rise. But even if PDVSA successfully makes its payments in the second quarter, it will owe another $3 billion in October and November — bills it will probably fail to pay without additional foreign assistance.

If Venezuela proves unable to avoid default, whether in April or November, its full impact will not be felt for several months. But eventually imports, including food supplies, will plunge and the country's already high inflation will soar. Each of these effects would pose a significant threat to the PSUV's continued rule. Political elites would likely close ranks and crack down on signs of dissent from within their own party and from the opposition in hopes of fending off potential challenges to the state.

Faced with mounting discontent, the Venezuelan government will also maintain — and perhaps increase — its surveillance of the country's armed forces. The ruling party fears that military officers in Venezuela's regional commands may someday rise up against the central government. Though no coup seems to be in the making at present, Caracas will use human intelligence sources and electronic surveillance to keep a close eye on its troops to ensure that does not change.

In addition to its predicament at home, the Venezuelan government will have to grapple with the uncertainty surrounding the new U.S. administration's foreign policy. The White House began to adopt a tougher stance toward Venezuela in the first quarter, and it may choose to build on that pressure by slapping new sanctions on Caracas, through the U.S. Treasury Department, in the second quarter. If the sanctions target Venezuelan officials, their impact on the country as a whole will be minimal. But if they are leveled against PDVSA — the government's primary source of revenue — the punitive measures will do considerable damage to Caracas' finances and the ruling party's position in power. Such sanctions (or the mere threat of them) will therefore give the United States substantial leverage over Venezuela in any future negotiations.

Colombian Peace Process

Colombia, meanwhile, will continue the process of winding down its longest-running insurgency. Rebels belonging to the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia (FARC) will stay in their demobilization zones awaiting commanders' orders to surrender their weapons. At the same time, the Colombian Congress will pass legislation that will permit the FARC to continue laying down arms. Though the group originally agreed to give up all of its weapons by June 1, this deadline may be delayed since FARC members have been slow to gather at the country's predetermined demobilization zones.

The disbandment of Colombia's largest guerrilla group, coupled with rising demand for cocaine in the United States, Europe and Asia, will fuel violent competitions among smaller rebel and criminal organizations for the FARC's former coca-producing territories in the months ahead. Now that most FARC rebels are preparing to reintegrate into society, the National Liberation Army (Colombia's second-largest insurgency) and the Clan del Golfo crime syndicate will vie with each other for control over key drug trafficking routes and resources, bringing greater violence to the Colombian hinterlands in the Choco, Cauca and Meta departments.

Brazil's Economy Recovers While Its Leaders Founder

The second quarter will bring new promise for the Brazilian economy. Buoyed by higher oil and iron ore export revenue as well as rising domestic consumption, the country will continue to pull itself out of recession in the months ahead. But Brazil's politicians will not fare as well. President Michel Temer's tenure may be cut short in the second half of the year by an ongoing Supreme Electoral Court investigation into charges that he knowingly accepted campaign funds in 2014 that were obtained through acts of corruption. Though the court is unlikely to issue its ruling during the second quarter, the accusations will continue to hang over the president in the coming months.

Several other leading figures from Brazil's major political parties have been swept up in the scandal as well. Politicians who would have otherwise been obvious candidates for the country's presidential election in 2018, such as Aécio Neves, José Serra and former President Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva, have been plagued by allegations of corruption. As the popularity of Brazil's established elite has fallen, political outsiders have seized the chance to make their own gains. Chief among them is a highly conservative former military officer, Jair Bolsonaro, who came in third place in recent polls. Bolsonaro's rise is troubling to Brazil's traditional parties, such as the Workers' Party and the Social Democracy Party of Brazil, which may have a hard time defeating him if they cannot carve out a clear majority in the first round of the presidential race. (Even da Silva, who is popular among voters, would run the risk of losing to Bolsonaro in the event of a runoff.) Still, the campaign season has only just begun, and Bolsonaro's chances of proceeding to a runoff are remote — especially if new candidates enter the race on behalf of Brazil's entrenched leaders.

For now, Temer will focus on bringing his pension reform — a key part of his austerity agenda — to a vote in the lower house of the National Congress. But protests against the proposal and government corruption could stall the vote, particularly as Eliseu Padilha (Temer's chief of staff and lead negotiator with the National Congress on the reforms) comes under scrutiny for graft. The threat of an investigation into and indictment of Padilha, or of Brazilian lawmakers, may sideline Temer's effort to rally the fractured National Congress' support for his policies.

Argentina Undertakes Subtle Reforms

Argentina's leaders will be in a no less precarious situation this quarter. President Mauricio Macri will have to balance between satisfying the demands of organized labor and attracting foreign investors as he continues to steadily make fiscal adjustments over the next few months. These measures will include hikes in the price of natural gas and likely water for consumers across the country.

There are limits, however, to how heavy a burden the government in Buenos Aires can place on taxpayers. The country will hold legislative elections <LINK: The Costs of Promoting Business in Argentina> in October that are considered a prelude to the presidential race in 2019. Determined to remain in power, the ruling party will shy away from implementing heavier austerity measures or spending cuts ahead of this year's vote that would directly harm labor unions or provincial governments.

South Asia

India's Own Worst Enemy

The India-Pakistan Rivalry

South Asian Militancy

India's Own Worst Enemy

The second quarter will be a benchmark for India's ambitious tax reforms. The Goods and Services Tax (GST) bill has weathered a halting journey in the 17 years since it was first proposed, spurring debate and disagreement as it wound its way through India's democratic system. Thanks to Finance Minister Arun Jaitley's "cooperative federalism" strategy, however, the dual value-added tax legislation clinched a major victory during the Parliament's recent budgetary session when the lower house passed all four of its component bills. The bills' passage marked a big step toward simplifying India's convoluted tax system and unifying its fragmented market — two key components of Prime Minister Narendra Modi's plan to boost economic growth.

Having passed the measures at the federal level, the ruling Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP) will now shift its attention to India's 29 state legislatures, each of which must pass a local version of the GST. This will be a lengthy undertaking, of course, especially considering that the BJP is in the minority in 14 state assemblies. Consequently, Modi's government probably won't meet its July 1 implementation deadline. But that doesn't mean the measures will fail. Through concession and compromise, Jaitley and his state counterparts in the GST Council have addressed local governments' major grievances, including the issue of compensation for lost tax revenues in manufacturing-heavy states. Ever since Parliament passed the GST constitutional amendment in August 2016, moreover, India's state and federal governments have become more aligned on the issue of tax reform. And so, notwithstanding the usual politicking, each state will pass its version of the GST eventually — though not necessarily in the second quarter.

In fact, India's economic reform project as a whole is entering the new quarter with renewed momentum after the recent state elections in the country. The BJP achieved a resounding victory in the all-important state of Uttar Pradesh, and it also formed governments in the states of Goa, Manipur and Uttarakhand. This string of successes is good news for the BJP for a couple of reasons. The ruling party, for instance, will get to send more representatives to the upper house of Parliament, easing the way for economic reforms — though this is a benefit that will take some time to pay off. More immediately, the party's strong electoral performance is a vote of confidence for Modi's demonetization campaign, despite the many inconveniences it caused.

Now that the Reserve Bank of India has removed ATM cash withdrawal limits, the demonetization process has ended, and "remonetization" is in full swing. As Indians regain access to cash, their country's economic growth should pick up a bit. At the same time, however, digital transactions — something demonetization tried to encourage — will keep falling, albeit not necessarily to pre-demonetization levels. New Delhi has yet to address the underlying reasons that have kept cash king in the Indian economy. The country's financial infrastructure remains inadequate, the cost of credit card transactions still exceeds that of cash payments, and the legal protections against credit card fraud are lacking. Until New Delhi fixes these issues, cash will continue to reign supreme.

The quarter also promises several important foreign policy visits for India covering defense, energy and investment. In April alone, Modi will host the prime ministers of Bangladesh and Australia, as well as the president of Nepal and Singapore's foreign minister. The Indian prime minister will chalk up a success in his country's quest to join multilateral institutions in June at the Shanghai Cooperation Organization summit in Astana, Kazakhstan, where India will receive full membership in the bloc. Pakistani Prime Minister Nawaz Sharif will also be in attendance to represent his country, which is also being admitted to the alliance. Their meeting will mark the first exchange between the two leaders since 2015 and offer a chance to gauge the state of South Asia's most consequential bilateral relationship.

The India-Pakistan Rivalry

With state election season behind it, the BJP has less political incentive to lambaste Pakistan, and relations between the two will stabilize during the second quarter. The two nuclear rivals will continue to bicker over a host of issues, of course, including the disputed territory of Kashmir. But since the fourth quarter of 2016, the number of cease-fire violations along the Line of Control in the region has fallen. The drop coincided with Gen. Qamar Javed Bajwa's ascension to the powerful post of Pakistan's army chief. Bajwa is redirecting his country's strategic attention away from India and toward Afghanistan (though securing the eastern border will still be a priority for Pakistan). Consequently, Islamabad will take pains to avoid antagonizing New Delhi. And as Pakistan's next general elections approach in 2018, a Supreme Court decision on Sharif and his family's involvement in the Panama Papers scandal could give the opposition useful campaign fodder.

India, likewise, will shift some of its attention from Pakistan — which will remain its biggest regional foreign policy challenge nonetheless — to another country in its periphery, Nepal. The Madhesi, an ethnic group of Indian origin living along the Terai plains near the Nepalese border with India, have renewed their demands for greater autonomy, including the creation of two Madhesi-majority provinces in the area. What's more, they have promised to boycott Nepal's May 14 local elections, the first such vote in 20 years and a milestone for the country's democracy. The opposition Communist Party of Nepal (Unified Marxist-Leninist), meanwhile, has vowed to counter the Madhesi's demands for fear that the two new provinces would give the ethnic group control over the Nepal-India border. The party's stance alone will cause greater discord as the election approaches.

Unless Nepalese Prime Minister Pushpa Kamal Dahal's Maoist Centre party concedes to negotiations over the Madhesi's requests, the local elections will hit a snag. Either the vote will be delayed, or its legitimacy will come into question, sparking protests along the Terai. Each scenario will increase the probability that India and China stage a diplomatic intervention, as they did in 2016 to try to keep former Prime Minister Khadga Prasad Oli's administration from toppling. (New Delhi will be careful not to intervene too directly, though, lest it push Kathmandu closer to Beijing.) Even so, given that Dahal's alliance holds a majority in Nepal's legislature — even without the Madhesi parties' support — his administration will survive through the quarter.

South Asian Militancy

Back in Pakistan, the army will continue its efforts to vanquish anti-state militancy, particularly in the restive Federally Administered Tribal Areas along the border with Afghanistan. Bajwa, the new army chief, is currently overseeing Operation Radd-ul-Fasaad as part of that initiative, which has already contributed to a decline in the number of militant-related civilian deaths in Pakistan. Though the campaign will help further reduce the casualty rate, progress will come at the cost of high-profile retaliatory attacks by the Islamic State's Khorasan chapter and the Jamaat-ul-Ahrar, a breakaway faction of the Tehrik-i-Taliban Pakistan. The threat of militant attacks in South Asia, in fact, will rise during the second quarter because warmer weather heralds the start of the annual spring offensive. The Taliban will ramp up their attacks across Afghanistan — not just in their strongholds of Helmand and Kandahar provinces in the country's south. The Islamic State's Khorasan chapter may also increase its activities. The uptick in attacks, in turn, will encourage more militants to seek refuge across the border in Pakistan, complicating Operation Radd-ul-Fasaad and perpetuating a cycle of militant violence and military crackdowns in the region.

In addition, the second quarter will test Afghanistan's peacemaking skills. Notorious warlord Gulbuddin Hekmatyar is expected to end his 20-year exile from public life in the next few months as part of a deal that Kabul struck with his party, Hizb-e-Islami Gulbuddin, in fall 2016. Should he return to Kabul as anticipated, Hekmatyar will reintegrate himself into the political wing of his party to begin laying the foundation for a return to politics. This quarter, moreover, Russia will continue to increase its efforts to jump-start the peace process in Afghanistan as it joins with Pakistan and China to mediate in prospective negotiations between the Afghan government and the Taliban. Despite its bloody history with Russia, Kabul is cautiously optimistic about Moscow's involvement.

Nigerian President Muhammadu Buhari has had a tough year so far, made all the more complicated by lingering concerns over his health. The public's fears were significantly heightened after what was supposed to be a 10-day medical trip to London turned into a nearly two-month convalescence abroad. Should the president be unable to finish his term, which ends in 2019, the center of Nigeria's political power and patronage would shift southwestward toward the base of Vice President Yemi Osinbajo, who would assume the presidency. Aggrieved northern politicians may respond by boosting their support for the country's militant groups, while the oil-rich and restive Niger Delta's expectations of concessions from the federal government may rise. (In its negotiations with Abuja, the southern region has demanded money and other perks.) Even if Buhari's rule continues, opposition from within and outside of his ruling All Progressives Congress party will mount in the face of the country's persistent financial difficulties. This will be especially true if the president fails to allay fears over his health before potential successors begin jockeying for a place in Nigeria's 2019 election — now less than two years away — in earnest.

Regardless of who rules the country, Nigeria's numerous economic challenges will not lessen in intensity in the second quarter. Weak oil prices, high inflation and the possibility of a stronger U.S. dollar will be a difficult combination for the Nigerian state and its citizens to weather. After all, a stronger dollar relative to the naira, Nigeria's currency, would hike up the costs of food and other imports, sparking protests and other forms of unrest. Meanwhile, international financial institutions such as the International Monetary Fund will continue to pressure Nigeria to lift its foreign exchange restrictions, which have proved costly for the country's currency reserves. But the government will likely limit its actions to small steps, avoiding a completely free-floating naira in the name of price stability. Nevertheless, Abuja will make minor progress in reforming the country's business environment as it pursues its 2017-2020 Economic Growth and Recovery Plan. This progress will likely include increasing transparency in service-level agreements (such as permits) and improving efficiency in the entry and exit of people and goods, which Nigeria's plan is slated to target first. More ambitious reforms, however, will suffer if Buhari — who has reportedly reduced his working day to only a few hours — remains in ill health.

As government coffers come under increasing strain, the president will have to forgo expensive projects that could win over new allies and prevent the fissures within his party from widening. Deals intended to placate militants and stakeholders in the Niger Delta will likewise be modest, thus lacking the broad appeal needed to please the region's fractious groups and keep them from resorting to politically motivated violence. The possibility that Niger Delta militants will try to increase pressure on the federal government in the second quarter by holding protests and conducting attacks as Abuja builds a peace package for the region cannot be ruled out.

The Post-Apartheid Era Ends

The contest over who will succeed South African President Jacob Zuma as the head of the African National Congress (ANC) will continue to heat up this quarter. Finance Minister Pravin Gordhan and other Zuma detractors were dismissed in a March 30 Cabinet reshuffle that removed several ministerial roadblocks constraining the president's actions. Zuma has since appointed his close allies as replacements. Over the next three months, opposing factions within the country's ruling party will press for their favored styles of reform as Zuma further emphasizes the need for radical economic change, including greater black economic empowerment, to energize his base and improve the odds that his successor will emerge from his ethnic Zulu and pro-labor circle. One possible candidate is his political ally and former wife, Nkosazana Dlamini-Zuma, who returned to the country in March after serving at the African Union for four years. She has since begun campaigning for the ANC's top position.

Meanwhile, the president's dismissal of Gordhan, whom the international community views as a steady hand over the economy, prompted S&P Global to downgrade South Africa's credit rating on April 3. The move will only further weaken the country's fragile financial position. Judicial proceedings related to corruption allegations and other cases that involve Zuma and his inner circle may prove an additional distraction as revelations of politically damaging information threaten to complicate matters for the president.

Zuma's options will be further constrained by the countermoves of the ANC's more market-oriented faction as it seeks to strengthen its own candidate ahead of the party's December leadership congress. This wing will continue to push for restrained spending measures and budget cuts that are anathema to Zuma's need to shore up support among his followers. Its ability to hamstring the president, however, was weakened by the March 30 Cabinet reshuffle. As the country's ongoing leadership struggle intensifies, the government will have a harder time pushing through difficult reforms in the months ahead, and rifts within the ANC will widen.

For the most part, labor relations will remain calm in the second quarter — at least compared with previous years — as numerous agreements remain active until the end of the year and as the government seeks to avoid a credit downgrade. Nevertheless, tensions within the coal industry will continue to mount as the opposing sides debating the structure of wage negotiations struggle to find common ground. (In January, the previous policy of holding negotiations at a centralized level will be replaced by negotiations at the company level.) Tense labor relations in the coal sector could worsen if Zuma and his camp politicize the talks in order to energize their base for the brewing leadership battle.

Old Leaders in New Africa

a successor who can protect the well-entrenched system of patronage it depends on to maintain power. As it stands, a 2017 election is still a possibility, even as the ruling party and portions of the opposition struggle to implement a Dec. 31 deal to transition power away from Kabila. With the president still in office despite finishing his constitutionally mandated final term in 2016, the deal's collapse looks increasingly likely. Progress on voter registration in some provinces has been made, yet millions of Congolese citizens have yet to be registered, and it is unclear how a presidential contest would be paid for, given its hefty price tag.

The political obstacles that arose after the Dec. 31 deal was signed will endure in the second quarter, causing little progress to be made between the ruling party and the opposition. This means that the time available for Kabila, who oversees a weak and fractious political order, to find a successor before 2017 ends is running out. And in the absence of an acceptable successor, the president will be more likely to resort to additional delaying tactics — such as citing election costs — to push the election (and by extension, his rule) until 2018, risking sustained unrest in the process.

Mozambique's Financial Mess

Within the next three months, the government in Maputo will be forced to strike a deal with bondholders to restructure its debts. Negotiations became necessary when it was revealed in 2016 that bond proceedings were misused to buy military equipment and large amounts of debt were hidden. The ultimate success and timing of the negotiations will be crucial since the country, hoping to secure a bailout before the year ends, seeks to open talks with the International Monetary Fund in a bid to restore its support. A bailout would help ease the burden on the cash-strapped state, where patronage networks are strained (which could open splits within the ruling Mozambique Liberation Front) and investment in its oil and natural gas sector has stalled. Should Mozambique fail to reach a bailout deal, suspended energy industry investments could hamper development over the next few years and increase the risk that its burgeoning natural gas sector won't get off the ground amid the pending glut in the liquefied natural gas market.

Ethiopian Instability

Last year, social unrest directed against the Tigray minority-led government in Addis Ababa spread, challenging its control of the country. But Addis Ababa's use of heavy-handed security measures in the latter half of 2016 and into 2017 has blunted the opposition movement's ability to unite, grow and intensify its pressure on the government. In the second quarter, the crackdown will continue to constrain the opposition, keeping the conflict to a low boil even as flare-ups posing significant risks to foreign businesses operating in Ethiopia persist. Ethiopia's waning internal security concerns will give it additional maneuverability in neighboring Somalia, where Addis Ababa is currently reshaping its presence.

East African Integration

East Africa will continue to see crucial infrastructure projects come online this quarter. Following the inauguration of the Addis Ababa-Djibouti Railway in early 2017, another Chinese-funded project — the standard-gauge railway connecting Mombasa and Nairobi — is on track to be completed around June or July. The railway, which is Kenya's largest infrastructure project since independence, will provide the country with greater transport efficiency and supply-chain redundancy from its biggest port to the capital city.

Meanwhile, the European Union's proposed economic partnership agreement with the East African Community remains troubled. The deal, which has been in the works since 2007, would give member states duty-free and quota-free access to the European Union's market. In exchange, the community would remove tariffs on 80 percent of its imports from the bloc by 2033. But Tanzania and Uganda have serious reservations about the deal, and Burundi continues to be isolated diplomatically, leaving only Kenya and Rwanda to have signed onto the agreement. During the second quarter, the European Union and Kenya will keep lobbying the community's dissenting members for their support, but Tanzania will continue employing delaying tactics in hopes of killing the deal.

(Stratfor)

Trade will be at the forefront of many leaders' minds this quarter as a new U.S. administration settles into the White House. Though U.S. President Donald Trump continues to be bogged down by congressional battles and allegations of inappropriate ties to Russia, his team will try to draw the public's attention back to its trade agenda. To that end, Washington will work to clarify its strategy for cracking down on currency manipulation abroad, tightening the enforcement of existing trade laws and preparing to renegotiate NAFTA. But the uncertainty surrounding the White House's intentions will linger, prompting the United States' biggest trade partners to look for new economic relationships elsewhere.

At the same time, some will leverage security cooperation and promises of investment to get on Washington's good side — or, at the very least, to try to fend off its punitive trade measures. China will be one of them as it uses its economic heft with Pyongyang, and the growing sense of urgency surrounding North Korea's nuclear program, to its advantage in tense trade talks with the United States. The White House will do what it can to push for secondary sanctions against China's stubborn neighbor, perhaps even threatening to step up its military aid to Taiwan to compel Beijing's buy-in. But even if Washington has its way, a heavier sanctions regime will do little to slow the progress of Pyongyang's nuclear program. The United States will have no choice, then, but to build a credible military deterrent against North Korea — a move that will only widen the rift between Washington and Beijing.

The Trump administration's attack on a Syrian air base was designed in large part to underscore to Beijing and Pyongyang that this White House is willing to take military action if so compelled. Though the attack sent a strong signal to U.S. adversaries, it also has created complications for the United States on the Syrian battlefield with Russia. Moscow will try to use the heightened risk of collisions on the Syrian battlefield and the fight against the Islamic State to bring Washington to the negotiating table, but the United States will be limited in any concessions it would give to Russia in return. The Kremlin will be even less inclined to trust in dialogue with the West as its problems pile up at home, though arms control may be one policy area in which the two can begin to negotiate without encountering much political blowback.

As the United States and Russia box Turkey in on the Syrian battlefield, Ankara will devote more attention to northern Iraq, where a conflict is brewing between Arab and Kurdish forces. The highly prized, oil-rich region of Kirkuk remains a key flashpoint in Turkey's competition with Iran for influence — and Iraq's rival Kurdish factions are caught in the middle. Washington will lend support to Sunni states, led by Saudi Arabia, seeking to balance against Shiite Iran as proxy battles throughout the Middle East escalate, though its nuclear deal with Tehran will remain intact.

In the meantime, Saudi Arabia and its Gulf Cooperation Council allies will shoulder most of the burden of maintaining OPEC's oil production cuts for another six months. Steady oil prices will buy Venezuela's cash-strapped government some time to get its finances in order, but not much. Caracas' risk of default will spike in the second half of the year, and the ruling party will have to spend the second quarter consolidating power in preparation for the turmoil that no doubt lies ahead.

Venezuela isn't the only state heading toward single-party rule. On the other side of the globe, Indian politics are swinging to the right — a trend Prime Minister Narendra Modi and his center-right Bharatiya Janata Party have been able to use to their advantage. This quarter, they will focus on passing a state-level version of a massive tax overhaul that cleared Parliament earlier in the year, a feat that will be more feasible as the growing power of the country's Hindu nationalists gives the ruling party the political capital to push through much-needed structural reforms.

Nigeria will have less luck passing its most pressing reforms as an intensifying power struggle in Abuja brings the government to a near-standstill. Concerns over President Muhammadu Buhari's health have raised questions about who his successor will be — a transition South Africa's own leader, Jacob Zuma, is making preparations for as well. Zuma is working quickly to consolidate power and cater to his ethnic Zulu base with a populist platform of black empowerment before he steps down, alienating investors in the process.

Europe's entrenched rulers face a growing threat to their power as well, albeit of a very different kind. France is preparing to hold elections that will pit the country's traditional political elite against an up-and-coming Euroskeptic contender, and Italy may not be far behind. Though the French electoral system is designed to keep fringe parties out of power, the possibility of a Euroskeptic win cannot be discounted — an outcome that could bring the eurozone to its knees and send shocks through global markets.

European Disintegration

This year will be the one in which political risk reaches the European Union's core members. During the second quarter, this will become evident as France — the bloc's second-largest economy — holds presidential and legislative elections, the results of which will resonate far beyond the country's borders. French voters will have to choose whether they want their country to reform the European Union or dismantle it to restore their state's full sovereignty.

Italy will also become a source of political risk as it moves closer to holding general elections. The current Italian government will probably stay in place this quarter, but the specter of an election in which Euroskeptic forces are expected to perform well will do little to ease concerns about the country's fragile banks and high debt levels. Germany, meanwhile, will try to keep the European Union together as it opens its own campaign season. The coming quarter will be eventful for Greece as well as Athens implements the reforms it promised to its creditors.

The Fate of the Eurozone

French presidential and legislative elections will be the most important events to take place in Europe during the second quarter. A significant portion of France's political apparatus will be elected and appointed over the next three months. The presidential election will be held in two rounds on April 23 and May 7, while legislative elections (also split into two rounds) will follow on June 11 and June 18. French voters will have to decide whether they want to further liberalize and deregulate their economy or increase protectionism. They will also have to choose whether they want France to stay a member of a reformed European Union or leave the Continental bloc entirely.

The biggest contenders in the elections are the nationalist National Front, the centrist En Marche!, the center-right Republicans, the left-wing Unsubmissive France, and the center-left Socialists. Should any of the moderate parties win the presidency, they will focus primarily on economic and security issues. A moderate government (especially under En Marche! or the Republicans) would seek to make the economy more competitive through various combinations of spending cuts, public investment, labor reform and initiatives to reduce bureaucracy, cut down on regulation and attract foreign investment. A moderate government would probably also direct more resources toward security forces and defense spending, while at the international level it would work to reform the European Union and defend France's leading role in it. The possibility of different parties controlling the presidency and the National Assembly cannot be excluded. This would complicate policymaking.

France's two-round electoral system has historically made it difficult for extremist parties to win presidential and legislative races. Candidates have to receive more than 50 percent of the vote to gain the presidency or a seat in the National Assembly, a threshold that the National Front, for instance, has found tough to reach. If the National Front overcomes this hurdle and wins the presidency, it will set in motion a chain of events that could lead to severe crisis in the European Union.

For one, the National Front wants to introduce tariffs on French imports and tax companies that hire foreign workers, including EU nationals. Both ideas go against the basic principles of the EU single market, which emphasizes the free movement of people, goods, services and capital. Even more important, however, the party also intends to hold a referendum on France's membership in the eurozone. Many of the National Front's campaign promises would require a majority in Parliament, and in some cases the legal procedures to implement them would be arduous. National Front leader Marine Le Pen has also said the referendum on eurozone membership would be called only after six months of negotiations on reforming the European Union. But even the mere victory of the National Front in the presidential election could trigger a crisis in the eurozone. Savers in the eurozone's periphery states (such as Spain, Portugal and Greece) could, for example, withdraw their money from local banks or transfer it to safer havens abroad, forcing authorities to introduce capital controls at the national or Continental level to stop a run on eurozone banks.

If France's moderates win, Germany will immediately invite the new president to shore up bilateral ties between Paris and Berlin and co-lead Europe. In global markets, the euro, along with riskier assets such as bonds from Europe's periphery, will strengthen rapidly. Should the National Front win, on the other hand, the German government will seek accommodation with the nationalist government in Paris, trying to dissuade it from fulfilling its most radical campaign promises. But many of the National Front's policies are simply incompatible with EU structures, limiting its room for compromise. And if serious trouble arises in the eurozone, Berlin will start making preparations for the most orderly dissolution of the currency area possible while planning its next steps with its closest partners in Central and Northern Europe. The market fallout of a potential eurozone collapse would be immediately felt in global markets as European investors flee riskier bonds and move their money to safer assets, such as German bonds.

Italy, meanwhile, is moving toward its own general elections, though it is unclear just how quickly they will arrive. The country does not have to hold elections until early 2018, but disputes within the ruling center-left Democratic Party could precipitate an early vote. The government in Rome, led by Prime Minister Paolo Gentiloni, will remain weak as Italy's main political parties prepare for the elections. Ahead of the vote, the Democratic Party will hold its primary to appoint a new leader in late April — a necessary step before the government resigns and parliamentary elections can be held.

Still, the elections will not take place during the second quarter. This means that Italy's vote will not coincide with France's, giving markets and EU governments time to digest the latter's results. But the lingering risk of elections in Italy, where Euroskeptic parties would probably make a strong showing, will add to the uncertainty clouding Italy's political and financial future. This will do little to ease market fears about the health of Italian banks and the country's high levels of public debt. But Italy could introduce some modest spending cuts to allay the European Commission's concerns about its deficit, and whatever frictions may arise, Rome and Brussels will find a compromise, allowing Italy to avoid EU sanctions.

Greece, another troubled eurozone country, will also be politically and financially fragile this quarter. Because Greece does not have any significant debt repayments to make until mid-July, negotiations between Athens and its creditors on the disbursement of the next tranche of bailout money could drag on for weeks, perhaps even extending beyond the end of the quarter. Nevertheless, the Greek bailout program will stay on track since Athens and its creditors are eager to avoid a default at all costs, though Athens will try to tone down some of the policies it has promised to implement, or announce spending increases in some areas, in hopes of avoiding a rebellion within the government.

In the meantime, Germany will continue to delay granting debt relief to Greece during its own election cycle. It could, however, make vague promises to discuss the issue in the future. Even if the International Monetary Fund does not announce a decision on its participation in the bailout program during the quarter, Greece and its creditors will work to keep it in place.

For an export-dependent economy such as Germany's, the prospect of a trade war brewing with the United States and Washington's threats to undermine the World Trade Organization are also major sources of concern. Consequently, Berlin will keep communication channels open with the new administration in the White House to defend Germany's stance on these issues, as well as on many other points of controversy between the two governments. Germany will also use its rotating presidency at the G-20 to defend free trade and the role of multilateral trade organizations.

Germany's strategy will include preserving the European Union's single market and expanding the bloc's trade relationships with other markets, primarily by supporting EU plans to resume stalled free trade talks. During the second quarter, for example, the European Union will revive negotiations with Mexico to update their free trade agreement. Brussels' efforts to sign free trade agreements with countries such as Japan and India will likewise intensify. Germany will advocate the development of closer trade ties between the European Union and China as well, though the bloc will struggle to get European companies the same level of access to China that Chinese companies have to Europe, creating room for friction during any negotiations that are held. Berlin's aggressive stance against Chinese takeovers of German companies will lead to similar complications during the talks.

To curry favor with the United States, the German government is willing to make gestures of good faith in areas such as defense spending. But this will not go over well in Germany. After all, it is an election year and the German government will be forced to keep lines of communication open with Washington while also being critical of the new administration, especially since a large portion of the German public disapproves of U.S. President Donald Trump. The relationship between the ruling center-right Christian Democratic Union (CDU) and its coalition partners in the center-left Social Democratic Party (SPD) will encounter additional tension as the two try to differentiate themselves before the general elections.

Regional elections in the northwestern German states of Schleswig-Holstein (May 7) and North Rhine-Westphalia (May 14) will test the appeal of the SPD and CDU ahead of the September vote. They will also act as a gauge of the popularity of smaller parties, such as the environmentalist Green Party, the left-wing Die Linke and the center-right Free Democratic Party — all of which could become coalition partners to the SPD and CDU after the elections end. Moreover, the regional races will show whether the nationalist Alternative for Germany (AfD), whose popularity has declined in recent months, can make gains beyond its strongholds in the east and enter the legislatures of western regions. Regardless of the AfD's performance, other parties will refuse to cooperate with it. Yet the AfD's role in German politics is not necessarily to enter government, but to force moderate parties to incorporate elements of its nationalist agenda into their own.

Brexit and Beyond

Brexit negotiations among the British government, EU institutions and EU members will begin in earnest in the second quarter. But the process will last at least two years. All sides will spend most of the next three months in exploratory discussions that aim to define the framework and terms of the negotiations, and no dramatic decisions are expected this early on. Before the talks can even begin, the European Union's remaining 27 members will have to agree to give the European Commission directives for its talks with London.

Some of the topics at the top of the Brexit agenda will include the legal status of British citizens living in the European Union and of EU citizens living in the United Kingdom. The parties are also likely to debate the Brexit's financial aspects, including the United Kingdom's contributions and payments to the European Union in the years ahead. This will create frictions, as the British government would try to keep its exit bill as small as possible. At the same time, the British government will be interested in starting conversations on the free trade agreement it hopes to sign with the European Union. But EU negotiators will insist on a sequential approach, starting with the country's exit and leaving the debate over the terms of its future relations for a later date.

British Prime Minister Theresa May's administration, meanwhile, will face the difficult task of reassuring the devolved governments in Scotland, Northern Ireland and Wales that their voices will be heard and their interests will be protected during the Brexit talks. London will also have to make sure that the central government remains in control of the Brexit process. London may promise subsidies, investment, tax breaks and even the transfer of powers currently in the hands of the European Union to regional governments to try to appease secessionist claims. It is unlikely, however, to give Scotland and Northern Ireland a decisive role in the negotiations. And as Northern Irish nationalist and unionist parties struggle to find common ground, the Good Friday Agreement that defines how the region's government operates will continue to show signs of fatigue.

Divided EU Foreign Policies

The next three months will bring a flurry of debates about Russia to the Continent. As the July 31 expiration date for EU sanctions against Russia approaches, the bloc's internal discussions about its relations with Moscow will become more frequent. Since there have not been any notable changes on the ground in eastern Ukraine or in U.S.-Russia ties since the Trump administration took office, most EU members will support the continuation of existing sanctions. Though the bloc does not have to make its decision until late July, the possibility of it coming before the end of the quarter cannot be ruled out. Should the issue be put to a vote within the next three months, some countries will voice their criticism of the sanctions but are unlikely to veto the decision of the majority. (That said, an electoral victory by France's National Front, which has argued against new punitive measures toward Russia, would significantly threaten the Continent's sanctions regime.)

Crossing Borders

As the weather starts to improve in the Mediterranean Sea, migration to the European Union's southern members will pick up. Along the migrant route traversing the eastern Mediterranean, the EU-Turkey immigration agreement still holds, but Ankara has the power to refuse to honor the deal and to stop policing migrant traffic. If it does, it would be in an effort to put pressure on the European Union, whose half-hearted compliance with the terms of the deal has rankled Ankara. The bloc, for example, has not lifted visa restrictions for Turkish citizens — one of the main promises it made to Ankara in exchange for its cooperation in preventing asylum seekers from entering the European Union. Several EU states will also continue to criticize the Turkish government's attempts to consolidate power following last year's failed coup attempt, giving Turkey added reason to threaten to renege on the deal.

Many migrants may, in fact, become emboldened by the Turkish government's threats and attempt the journey from Turkey to Greece. But Ankara will not give up on the migrant deal completely, since it still hopes to use the agreement — and Europe's fear of the political side effects that renewed waves of immigration could have in an election year — to negotiate and expand its customs union with the bloc in the near future. Maintaining these deep economic ties with Europe is especially important to Turkey as its economy continues to founder.

Regardless, EU members will try to protect themselves from a possible uptick in asylum seekers, keeping their borders closed along the biggest migration routes. This will pose a serious threat to Greece, as the country risks once again becoming a bottleneck for migrants who reach its shores but cannot keep moving northward.

There is also only so much the European Union can do to tamp down on the Central Mediterranean migrant route. In recent months the bloc has stepped up its political, economic and security cooperation with countries in sub-Saharan Africa, from which many migrants originate, as well as with Libya, the main transit state for migrants trying to reach Southern Europe. These policies will continue during the second quarter, but their impact will be modest. Italy and other southern EU members will see more migrants arrive on their doorsteps as weather conditions improve, creating tensions between them and their peers in Northern Europe. Rome will demand greater assistance to handle the influx of people, and if it allows some migrants to pass through its borders and into the rest of the Continent, frictions between it and its neighbors could worsen.

Echoes of the Cold War

Russia's Internal Struggle

Moscow Looks to the East

Instability in Central Asia

Echoes of the Cold War

The United States and Russia will see heightened frictions this quarter despite widespread speculation that the election of U.S. President Donald Trump would pave the way for a detente with Moscow. As scrutiny over Russia's meddling in U.S. politics builds, any engagement with Moscow will become politically problematic for Washington. And despite Trump's campaign rhetoric, it is in his best interest to keep pressure on Russia through sanctions and continued support for NATO. As a result, both countries will continue their military buildups along Russia's periphery this quarter, and each will test the other's sphere of influence.

Following a limited U.S. strike on a Syrian air base, Russia will position itself as a potential spoiler on the Syrian battlefield to try to draw the United States back to the negotiating table. The risk for collision between the powers is higher this quarter as Russia tries to leverage deconfliction in Syrian airspace to complicate ongoing U.S. military operations in Syria against the Islamic State. Russia's reliance on negative influence to try to bargain with Washington, however, will risk further souring the negotiating climate and limit potential collaboration. But there may still be room for restarting a dialogue in other areas, such as arms control. Both sides need to resolve several arms control issues, including their differences over violations of the Intermediate-Range Nuclear Forces Treaty, the question of whether to renew the New Strategic Arms Reduction Treaty (START), and a strategy for responding to the buildup of weapons arsenals by other powers, such as China.

Moscow, meanwhile, will be busy trying to expand its influence abroad, including in North Africa and the Balkans. In the coming quarter, it will gradually increase its involvement in the Libyan conflict by backing multiple factions while coordinating closely with Egypt. In the Balkans, Russia will also continue bolstering its support for Serbian nationalists, both in Serbia ahead of elections and in Northern Kosovo. Moscow will likewise back the separatist claims of Bosnia's Republika Srpska and will work to deepen the divides between Macedonia and the West over the political status of the country's Albanians. Russia does not expect these countries to become staunch allies; rather, it hopes to use the mounting tension to distract the West and gain political leverage.

Moscow will also work to widen rifts in Europe, particularly as the Continent prepares for French elections. Russian cyber, information and propaganda campaigns will continue to sow discord and increase uncertainty in France, especially if the Kremlin's preferred candidate, Marine Le Pen, does not win the presidency. Moscow will use the same tools to bolster Euroskepticism, particularly in Italy and Germany. Its efforts are likely to intensify in the lead-up to Europe's July deadline to extend sanctions on Russia. Even with sanctions in place, however, Moscow will work to bring European investment back to Russia when it hosts a major investment forum in June.

In the meantime, the standoff between Russia and the West will continue to shape the strategic landscape of the European borderlands. The conflict in eastern Ukraine will maintain its intensity, since the security and political components of the Minsk protocols are unlikely to be implemented this quarter. Economic ties between Ukraine and its separatist territories will deteriorate because of a blockade instituted in the first quarter, forcing the rebel regions to rely on Russia and spurring long-term energy diversification efforts in Ukraine proper forward. As the European Union and United States continue to be distracted by issues elsewhere, Ukraine will build up its economic and security cooperation with Poland and the Baltic states to supplement its Western integration strategy. Meanwhile, the course of European politics (and, in particular, the outcome of France's presidential race) will be key to determining the future of EU sanctions against Russia, though they are unlikely to be lifted altogether this quarter.

Moldova and Georgia, for their part, will look to strengthen their economic ties with Russia while seeking to soften tactical elements of their policies toward breakaway territories out of pragmatism. Nevertheless, they will also continue cooperating with the European Union and NATO. (Moldova, for instance, is slated to open a NATO liaison office in April.) To the north, Belarus will come under greater domestic pressure as protests over a controversial tax policy persist, testing longtime President Aleksandr Lukashenko's undisputed grip on power. Though the unrest has so far remained a domestic issue, external powers — including the West and Russia, which have long competed for influence in Belarus — could become involved, potentially exacerbating the protests.

Armenia and Azerbaijan's dispute over the separatist region of Nagorno-Karabakh won't die down this quarter either. In fact, hostilities may intensify after Armenia's parliamentary elections are held in early April. Russia will continue to serve as the primary arbiter and power broker in the dispute as Turkey remains distracted (and, to an extent, dependent on Russia's cooperation) in the Middle East. But Moscow's attempts to build on its gains and increase its clout in the region through the Eurasian Economic Union and Collective Security Treaty Organization will be compromised by infighting within the blocs.

Russia's Internal Struggle

Apart from its foreign interests, Russia will have to contend with a somewhat chaotic domestic environment this quarter. Though the Russian economy will continue to recover from recession, stagnation will linger through the rest of the year. Despite the sanctions against it, Moscow will court foreign investment from the West, the Asia-Pacific and South Asia at its annual St. Petersburg International Economic Forum in June, putting on hold many of its isolationist practices of the past three years.

Regardless of this relatively bright outlook, many Russian regions and citizens are in dire financial straits. Constant hardship will inflame protests over political, economic and social issues across the country. The Kremlin has tried to ensure that these demonstrations do not coalesce into a single movement against it, but if they do, security forces have been fortified and deployed nationwide to respond. Russia's heavy-handed crackdowns on opposition figures and dissent will continue, and it could start to squeeze social media channels as well.

Russian President Vladimir Putin will also work to contain the country's political elite as they continue to make grabs for power. At the same time, the Kremlin will struggle to answer tough questions about the ownership of assets, such as Chechnya's oil sector and defense companies, and whether to force energy giants such as Rosneft to cut production. All the while, Russia's security services and their cyber centers — prized portfolios for the country's elite — seem to be undergoing a reorganization behind closed doors in the wake of accusations and arrests tied to the alleged hacking campaign targeting the U.S. presidential election. Such contests for power will further isolate Putin as he grows more authoritarian in order to preserve the stability of the political system beneath him.

Moscow Looks to the East

Russia, meanwhile, will keep diversifying its ties away from the West in the second quarter. Putin will hold another much-touted summit, this time with Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe, as Russia and Japan attempt to mend their relationship. The two countries have for some time been hung up on a territorial dispute over islands they both claim. Though they have made minor progress in settling the spat, including by establishing joint investment projects and agreeing to visa-free travel on the islands, neither is ready to make a grand bargain for them or reach a peace deal. Russia still sees the islands as an issue of national sovereignty and as a front line in its nuclear deterrence, while Japan has maintained sanctions on Russia and has been slow to release funds promised to projects in Russia's Far East. So, though both sides will promote better ties, actual steps toward achieving them will be few and far between.

Russia will work to expand its relationships elsewhere in Asia as well. Moscow will hold its annual economic forum in May, which key delegations from China, Japan and India will attend. Beijing is looking to extend its "One Belt, One Road" initiative through Russia, while Japan is still holding out hope of investing in the Far East. The summit will be co-hosted by India, since New Delhi has been pumping more money into Russia, and Moscow wants to rekindle its ties with the South Asian country to balance its other relationships in Asia. Russia and Vietnam will also hold a summit this quarter; Moscow is aiming to improve its foothold in the country with energy, military and metals investment deals to gain leverage in the wider region.

Instability in Central Asia

Central Asia's troubles will not end in the second quarter as protests, militancy and political infighting persist. Kazakhstan and Kyrgyzstan will probably be the Central Asian states most vulnerable to unrest — the former because of its foundering economy and the latter because of an impending presidential election in November. (Kazakhstan will also begin the rocky process of transferring some powers from long-serving President Nursultan Nazarbayev to Parliament and the Cabinet.) But tension will build in Uzbekistan as well as the country's new president, Shavkat Mirziyoyev, and security chief Rustam Inoyatov spar over reforms. All the while, Russia will seek to steadily increase its sway over the region, particularly on matters of security.

The Syrian Civil War

The United States faces heightened risk on the Syrian battlefield this quarter at the same time it prepares to kick off a major offensive against Islamic State in Raqqa. A U.S. limited strike on a Syrian air base in response to a Syrian chemical weapons attack was designed to demonstrate the United States' decisiveness in military matters (a message not lost on North Korea,) but it also came with risks. Russia has long attempted to leverage the Syrian battlefield in its broader negotiations with the United States, but the United States is not leaving much room for a bargain with Moscow. Russia thus has to rely on negative influence to try and draw the United States into a dialogue and will try to play the role of spoiler on the Syrian battlefield to raise operational risks for the United States. There will be potential for the two sides to negotiate on deconfliction, but that will likely be the extent of their cooperation this quarter as Washington focuses on the fight against the Islamic State.

Russian forces will be active elsewhere in Syria, however, supporting the Syrian army's offensives against rebel forces as well as the Islamic State in theaters such as Deir el-Zour. After a few shaky months in place, the cease-fire that Russia, Turkey and Iran brokered between the rebels and loyalists in December 2016 has broken down completely. Its failure underscores the futility of the attempted peace talks that took place throughout the first quarter. In the second quarter, Syria's deepening economic woes, evident in the country's food shortages and collapsing currency, will threaten the government's hold on loyalist territory.

Syrian fighters backed by the United States will lead the charge in Raqqa. The United States' battle plan, which also includes deployments of U.S. troops, will rely on the most effective fighting force available in the short term: the multiethnic Syrian Democratic Forces (SDF). The SDF has made swift work of the fight so far, having nearly encircled the city. With help from the freshly deployed U.S. forces, artillery support has also been put in place.

But by emphasizing the SDF in the battle for Raqqa, the United States will further strain its already tense relations with Turkey. The forces include members of the Kurdish People's Protection Units (YPG), a militia Turkey considers a terrorist organization and an active threat to its national security. Still, Ankara's dismay will not discourage Washington from working with the force. And though Turkey will try to finagle a more prominent role for the forces it supports, including Turkish-trained Arab tribal forces, the United States will prioritize winning the fight against the Islamic State by the most expedient means available over appeasing Turkey. Turkey will nonetheless try to draw the United States deeper in a fight against the Syrian regime and push its proposals for establishing a no fly one and safe zones in in Syria.

Washington's battle plan for Raqqa is just one of many complications Ankara will have to contend with in Syria in the second quarter. By the time Turkey took al-Bab from the Islamic State during the last quarter, it had already accomplished many of its objectives in northern Syria under Operation Euphrates Shield. But its efforts to keep Kurdish forces from establishing control over a contiguous swath of territory in the northern part of the country are still in progress. To achieve that objective, it will have to tread lightly so as not to step on Russia's toes. Ankara and Moscow's alliance of convenience has mostly run its course in Syria, especially since Russia foiled Turkey's plans to take the city of Manbij. Nevertheless, the two countries need to keep the lines of communication open to ensure that their troops don't end up in conflict. If their priorities in Syria continue diverging, Turkey may start looking for other ways to gain leverage over Russia — by joining in on negotiations over the Nagorno-Karabakh dispute, for instance, or increasing its coordination with fellow NATO members in the Black Sea. And even though Turkey will have less room to maneuver in Syria this quarter, it will still have some leeway to deepen its involvement in northern Iraq.

The Fight Against the Islamic State

In the Middle East and North Africa, the primary focus of the second quarter will be the fight against the Islamic State. The battle to oust the extremist group from its strongholds in the region will reach milestones in multiple theaters in the months ahead. In Iraq, for instance, the battle for Mosul will come to a close, at least in the city itself. And in Syria, the operation to reclaim the city of Raqqa is about to get underway. These events, though notable, will hardly herald the demise of the Islamic State. In fact, the organization will redouble its terrorist activities, not only in its core area of operations in the Middle East but also internationally, in an attempt to maintain its relevance as it loses territory.

The Battle for Mosul

Five months into the fighting, the end of the Mosul offensive is now in sight. Before the operation ends, though, Iraqi forces will deploy to other Islamic State strongholds such as Tal Afar and Hawija to sweep the extremist group out of those pockets. As the main battle comes to a close, the divisions among the Iraqi coalition's constituent groups will become clearer than ever. The risk of infighting among the alliance's Shiite, Kurdish and Sunni militias will be high throughout the quarter, particularly in the northern border regions of Nineveh province.

That Iraqi army forces are engaged in fighting in the city itself has improved the central government's reputation among Mosul residents; the boost will help Baghdad gain legitimacy and establish its authority over the city. But stabilizing the reclaimed territories around the city will be a tall order for Baghdad. Rifts within Shiite, Sunni and Kurdish groups will prevent them from reaching a coherent political settlement over Nineveh province's future this quarter. Iran and Turkey, meanwhile, will continue to vie for influence in Iraq, primarily through proxy battles in the disputed territories that will soon be reclaimed from the Islamic State. The Iraqi government and the Kurdistan Regional Government (KRG) each claim control of Tal Afar, Kirkuk and Sinjar, making these areas most susceptible to fighting and disputes over territory and resources.

As Iraq's political parties gear up for provincial elections in September, regional powers such as Turkey and Iran will have yet another opportunity to try to gain influence in the country. Tehran will use its sway among Iraq's Shiite political parties and militias to goad Baghdad to prioritize its ties with Iran and to block Ankara's attempts to get involved in the political settlement process through Sunni parties. Prime Minister Haider al-Abadi will face mounting political pressure from all sides, including Iraq's nationalist parties, as he tries to appease Turkey, Iran and the West simultaneously. Adding to the mix, Saudi Arabia will make economic and diplomatic gestures in an effort to strengthen its ties with Baghdad. (U. S. President Donald Trump's administration has been pressuring the kingdom to help loosen Iran's grip on Baghdad's political and security spheres.)

The Kurdish Struggle

In Iraqi Kurdistan, disagreements will prevent the region's various political factions from forming a united front. In fact, the divisions are widening. The Patriotic Union of Kurdistan (PUK) has started pushing back more forcefully against its main political rival, the Kurdistan Democratic Party (KDP), to increase its share of oil revenues from Kirkuk and weaken the KDP's alliance with Baghdad. The dispute is good news for Baghdad, at least. Should the PUK make another attempt at disrupting the flow of oil from Kirkuk to win concessions from Baghdad or Arbil, the Iraqi government will feel less threatened than it would if the KDP were also in on the plan. But Kirkuk could become a flashpoint this quarter regardless, as the governments in Baghdad and the KRG, not to mention the rival Kurdish parties, fight over control of the province and its oil production.

Iraqi Kurdistan, similarly, will be a primary playing field in the competition between Turkey and Iran. Ankara will use the presence of the Kurdistan Workers' Party (PKK), which it considers a terrorist organization, in northern Iraq as a pretext to deploy proxy forces in the region to defend its interests there. Turkey might consider, for instance, dispatching the Rojava Peshmerga, a Kurdish militia aligned with the KDP, to fight on its behalf in the event that ethnic conflict flares up after the Mosul offensive winds down. To keep Ankara in check and support its own interests in northern Iraq, Tehran will rely on the mostly Shiite Popular Mobilization Forces positioned near Turkish-backed forces, as well as its ties with Baghdad.

Turkey's Resurgence

In Turkey, voters will head to the polls in mid-April to decide whether to go ahead with proposed constitutional amendments that could change Turkey's political future. President Recep Tayyip Erdogan has a lot riding on the success of the reforms, which would increase the powers of the presidency and curtail those of other branches of government. But when voters cast their ballots on April 16, they will have other concerns on their minds, such as the country's flagging economy. Turkey's high dollar-denominated debt and weakening currency — set to further deteriorate as the dollar strengthens — have exacerbated its financial troubles recently. If the referendum falls short of the simple majority it needs to pass, the ruling Justice and Development Party (AKP) will still retain power, though the loss would be a blow for Erdogan's campaign to consolidate institutional control.

To try to improve its chances of success, the AKP has been using the country's security concerns to stoke nationalism and stir popular support for the referendum. The wave of nationalism sweeping Turkey will buoy the ruling party, win or lose. Nevertheless, the results of the referendum will reveal strong support for and opposition to the AKP, laying bare the country's sharp political divisions.

Iran's Arc of Influence

Iran will also hold an important vote this quarter. Voters in the country will elect their next president May 19. As the election approaches, even the Islamic republic's hard-line politicians are trying to avoid instigating conflict with the United States. Washington, likewise, will be careful not to provoke hostilities with Tehran by changing the Joint Comprehensive Plan of Action nuclear deal — especially since the GCC countries support keeping the agreement in place rather than risking uncertainty by scrapping it. But that won't stop the Islamic Revolutionary Guard Corps from keeping up its usual defensive posturing and staging missile tests or military exercises in a bid to stay relevant. And as U.S. lawmakers have made clear, Congress will not hesitate to impose additional sanctions against Tehran in response to any perceived aggression.

The threat of new sanctions from the United States will compound Iranian President Hassan Rouhani's economic worries in the runup to the elections. When campaign season kicks off in April, the incumbent leader will face challenges from opponents in Iran's hard-line and conservative camps alike. And though Rouhani has experience, momentum and his role in Iran's economic recovery to date on his side, the country's lingering financial troubles will weigh heavy on voters' minds as they head for the ballot box. Inflation has fallen under Rouhani's administration, but unemployment is still high — a vulnerability his opponents may seize on during the campaign.

As the Islamic republic gears up for its election, one of its prized proxy forces, Hezbollah, could derail a vote in Lebanon. The militia's allies and enemies are still at odds over electoral reforms and a new budget, and their disagreements could postpone elections set for May. Notwithstanding the current dispute, the Lebanese government has come a long way over the past several months. A new prime minister and president have managed to reshuffle the country's military leadership and, more important, revive its stagnant energy sector. Their progress highlights the pragmatic approach Lebanon's main political parties have taken to try to find a viable compromise to solve the country's persistent problems. But as the lingering differences over electoral reform demonstrate, no solution is perfect.

Hezbollah will also be a source of growing concern for Israel during the second quarter. The group's military buildup in Syria over the course of the civil war there, combined with its growing presence in the Golan Heights, has put Israel on high alert and fueled fears of an impending war at the country's northern border. To prevent Hezbollah from getting any stronger, the Israeli government will continue attacking its arms shipments in southern Syria. Nevertheless, the conflict could escalate during the second quarter.

Israel's Survival Strategy

If the Israeli government keeps pursuing its settlement policy in the West Bank without objection from the White House, moreover, the proliferating communities could provoke a violent response from Palestinians there. The risk of renewed conflict, sparked by competing Salafist groups or merely by chance events, will loom large in the Palestinian Authority, though its two main political parties, Fatah and Hamas, will each try to avoid confrontation with Israel this quarter. In addition, the political divides between the parties could further postpone legislative elections in the Palestinian territories, scheduled in the West Bank for May.

Hamas and Fatah will each be focused on their own internal objectives this quarter rather than on bridging the divide between them. Hamas is working to modify its political charter for the first time in decades, breaking with tradition to recognize the 1967 Palestinian borders. The party's turn toward moderation, however slight, is meant to curry favor with Arab partners such as Egypt, whose support Hamas needs more than ever now that the Islamic State's Sinai faction is threatening its supply routes and legitimacy. (Israel will put little stock in the group's efforts at change, though, and will continue its operations against Hamas.) Fatah's leaders, meanwhile, will be focused on establishing a succession plan for aging party leader and Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas. The enduring rifts between the rival Palestinian parties will prompt Arab states in the region to get more involved to try to resolve the struggle.

The Saudi Survival Strategy

For Saudi Arabia, the second quarter will hinge on OPEC's May 25 meeting. The summit, during which Riyadh will cajole its fellow members in the oil cartel to extend the production cut instated in November 2016, will be a turning point for the Saudi government's economic reform initiatives. Even though the production cap hasn't boosted oil prices as much as Riyadh hoped it would, the kingdom is in no position to risk oversaturating the market by scrapping the deal. Doing so, after all, would further destabilize the price of oil, jeopardizing Saudi Arabia's oil revenues in the process. Whether the country can persuade the rest of OPEC to stay the course with the production cut will determine every other economic action that the Saudi government takes for the rest of the year.

The Yemeni Civil War

With all sides of the conflict locked in a stalemate, Yemen's civil war will enter the second quarter more or less stagnant. The rifts in the Gulf Cooperation Council (GCC) military coalition against Yemen's Houthi rebels are more pronounced than ever. The United Arab Emirates is focused on training and supporting its own forces in the south. Saudi Arabia, on the other hand, is looking to the United States for help negotiating a political resolution to end the fight. But until Riyadh compromises in its adamant support for Yemeni President Abd Rabboh Mansour Hadi, and the Houthi rebels agree to relinquish territory to the government, the prospects for peace will be slim. So though the United Nations will make another attempt at forging a peace plan for the country, it will make little headway in this endeavor.

Evidence of Iran's efforts to train and equip the Houthi rebels, meanwhile, has prompted the Pentagon to request more support for the Saudi- and Emirati-led coalition. If the White House approves, the United States will share more intelligence and boost its logistical coordination with the Gulf coalition to try to limit Iran's influence in war-torn Yemen and stabilize the strategic Bab al-Mandab Strait. At the same time, Washington will pursue a more aggressive strategy against al Qaeda in the second quarter since the group's slow and steady approach has enabled it to grow in Yemen as well as Syria.

The Libyan Civil War

Oil production will also play an important role in Libya this quarter, as multiple conflicts rage on in the country. Libyan National Army chief Field Marshal Khalifa Hifter has reclaimed the critical As Sidra and Ras Lanuf oil export terminals in eastern Libya, after the Petroleum Facilities Guards and Benghazi Defense Brigades militias overran them in early March. Though the fighting stalled oil production in Libya, it will likely maintain export levels over 400,000 barrels per day throughout the quarter.

In western Libya, meanwhile, rivalries between the U.N.-backed Government of National Accord and the General National Congress, two of the country's three rival governments, will breed divisions in Misrata and Tripoli. Outbreaks of violence between the governments' corresponding militias will continue to be a constant this quarter, particularly in the capital. International support for Libya's governments will be less divided, by contrast. Egypt and the United Arab Emirates will continue to back Hifter, while Russia increases its support for his Libyan National Army. (Unless he can bring more ground forces under his control, however, Hifter will have trouble increasing his influence in eastern Libya, and his efforts to draw new recruits will run up against tribal divisions.) And although the European Union will push for political resolutions to the various battles in Libya, negotiations will stay at a standstill this quarter.

The Difficulties of North African Reform

Elsewhere in North Africa, Algeria's government will fight a political battle of its own this quarter, albeit more quietly. The country's citizens are frustrated since the government passed a new budget that slashed public spending and raised taxes. The austerity measures, which sparked public protests, will be at the forefront of voters' minds as they head to the polls in May for legislative elections, and more demonstrations are expected in the meantime. Whatever the vote's outcome, however, the Parliament lacks the political clout to bring change to Algeria's tightly controlled political system, even if opposition parties perform better than they have in years past. Many of President Abdel Aziz Bouteflika's close allies have ensconced themselves in important ministries and positions over the past few years, including, during the first quarter, the head of state oil and gas company Sonatrach. Infighting among the country's elite will be a strong undercurrent in Algerian politics for the rest of the quarter, though it will take place largely behind closed doors.

Chinese President Xi Jinping's push to consolidate his grip on power will enter a critical phase in the coming months amid preparations for October's 19th Party Congress, the quinquennial meeting where senior party officials select the next Politburo Standing Committee, the country's top governing body. With as many as five of the current seven committee members expected to step down this year, the plenum will offer Xi a momentous opportunity to stack the country's leadership with his supporters, fortifying his position as China's most powerful leader in decades. In the lead-up to the congress, Xi's core task will be to eliminate remaining checks on his influence, while reshuffling personnel to move allies into key posts. Broadly speaking, these efforts will be successful.

The stakes riding on the Party Congress will compel Chinese leaders this quarter to focus overwhelmingly on stabilizing the economy, sustaining low unemployment and avoiding social disruptions, meaning much-needed but risky reforms will take a back seat. Beijing will continue to push industrial restructuring and consolidation programs, environmental initiatives and limited financial reforms. Major new initiatives, however, that would threaten to erode business confidence or destabilize the economy are unlikely in the near future. And on existing issues that the government chooses to expand, such as corporate debt-equity swaps and bankruptcy tribunals and the introduction of a nationwide property tax, authorities will delay full implementation until after the congress. In the meantime, Beijing will maintain robust support for key industrial sectors such as home construction and manufacturing while introducing piecemeal measures to strengthen the economy's defenses against potential external shocks, especially those threatened by impending shifts in U.S. trade and currency policies.

Outside the mainland, Beijing will face a bigger challenge in managing persistent discontent in Hong Kong over China's interference in the city's political affairs, a situation that the recent election of its preferred candidate, Carrie Lam, as Hong Kong's next chief executive will do little to alleviate. As the special administrative region prepares to mark the 20th anniversary of its reunification with China on July 1 (Lam's inauguration date), conditions will be ripe for an escalation of protests.

Globalization, Evolved

The ongoing evolution in U.S. trade policy will continue to be felt across the Asia-Pacific and will pose the greatest potential threat to Chinese economic stability — and therefore to Xi's drive to consolidate power — in the second quarter. In the next three months, Washington may not impose new barriers to trade with China beyond anti-dumping and countervailing duties, but Beijing will gird itself for the possibility that the Trump administration follows through on the new president's promises to name China a currency manipulator or levy new controls on U.S. imports of Chinese goods such as steel or automobiles. Chinese authorities will work to build up buffers against U.S. threats or punitive measures while seeking to deter Washington by outlining the retaliatory measures Beijing can take. China may also introduce its own anti-dumping measures. Beijing's most likely course of action, however, will be to try to use its influence on regional security matters as leverage in economic discussions with Washington. Toward this end, China may offer to cooperate with Washington on issues such as cybersecurity, military affairs and even North Korea — a rare area where U.S. and Chinese interests overlap. At the same time, it will become more openly confrontational in the South China Sea or on other regional matters.

Though China has been the primary target in Asia of Washington's attacks on trade and currency manipulation, Japan and South Korea — the United States' two most important security allies in Asia — have by no means been exempt from prospective U.S. policy changes. This will compel both countries to explore other options, including expanded investment into and potentially imports from the United States, to hedge against pressure from Washington and prevent economic frictions from undermining their security partnerships. Nonetheless, even rhetorical pressure from Washington on trade will be painful for South Korea as Seoul attempts to move on from the fall of President Park Geun Hye while also facing Chinese economic retaliation over the deployment of the Terminal High-Altitude Area Defense (THAAD) missile defense system. China may ease pressure on Seoul in an effort to open diplomacy with the next South Korean administration after the upcoming election. But the new president's attention will be divided between a range of priorities: not only the perennial North Korean threat but also reform of South Korea's scandal-prone chaebols (giant, family-run conglomerates) and broader economic restructuring.

Elsewhere in the Asia-Pacific, moderate recoveries in the global economy — particularly in commodity prices — will continue to provide much-needed relief for regional exporters. Nonetheless, countries such as South Korea and Thailand will struggle to regain their growth momentum because of internal political constraints, increased regional competition and regional geopolitical pressures. Moreover, few countries in the region will be immune to the long-term impact of the surge of protectionism across the globe or the potential fallout from a prolonged Sino-U.S. trade or currency spat. As major powers reconfigure their trade strategies, smaller economies will seek to insulate themselves from potential shocks by more proactively pursuing regional cooperation and economic diversification. In addition to Asia-centric multilateral frameworks such as the 16-member Regional Comprehensive Economic Partnership (RCEP), trade-dependent economies such as those of Malaysia, Australia, Vietnam and South Korea will explore free trade options farther afield.

The New Silk Road

Beijing will be well-positioned to exploit regionwide uncertainty over Washington's potential retrenchment to press Chinese interests elsewhere in its periphery this quarter. In response to the Trump administration's withdrawal from the Trans-Pacific Partnership trade pact, China will redouble its efforts to draw regional economies further into its orbit by touting regional trade initiatives such as RCEP.

In addition to trade, expanded investment, particularly in infrastructure, will be core to China's diplomatic outreach throughout its periphery, with Beijing using its One Belt, One Road summit in May to portray itself as an economic anchor and promote its vision for the region as a favorable alternative to the Western-led order. But its efforts to build out vast road and rail networks will be constrained by localized unrest and suspicions in target countries, particularly Pakistan and Sri Lanka, as well as at home in Xinjiang. Domestic economic pressures will also complicate implementation of Beijing's grand plans.

Coping With a Nuclear North Korea

The fraught efforts by China and the United States, as well as South Korea and Japan, to contain North Korea's nuclear weapons program will remain a singular driver of regional dynamics in the quarter. As North Korea nears the successful development of an effective nuclear deterrent against the United States, Pyongyang will continue to use every opportunity to demonstrate its expanding defense capabilities. Another North Korean nuclear test would undoubtedly elicit heated rhetoric and defense posturing by Seoul and Tokyo, including moves that Beijing views as antagonistic. This will reduce room for diplomacy between Washington and Northeast Asia's leading powers and intensify pressure on Washington to consider alternative measures to deter Pyongyang.

Direct, pre-emptive military action against Pyongyang — particularly its nuclear weapons infrastructure and arsenal — is possible but unlikely this quarter absent a complete breakdown of diplomatic efforts by the United States and China. Instead, Washington will most likely focus on pressuring Beijing to rein in Pyongyang. Beijing may use its economic pressure over North Korea to hedge against Washington's agenda on other fronts, particularly U.S. pressure on trade. But Beijing will avoid fully severing North Korea's economic lifelines in China or substantially undermining Kim Jong Un's rule in Pyongyang.

Asia-Pacific: Among Great Powers

Where possible, Beijing will work to separate its tension with Washington over trade and the Korean Peninsula from other pivotal issues in China's periphery. Beijing will be particularly on guard against any moves by Washington to use Taiwan as a bargaining chip in other negotiations. Though the Trump administration reversed course and pledged in February to continue the "One China" policy, a long-standing diplomatic formula underpinning Washington's relations with Beijing and Taipei, the White House may still seek to boost arms sales or diplomatic contact with Taipei this quarter. Meanwhile, Taiwan will also expand its economic outreach to other countries, particularly Japan, India and Southeast Asian states, to lessen the impact of diplomatic isolation by Beijing. China would heartily protest any new U.S. arms sales to Taiwan and possibly reduce military cooperation with Washington, but it will avoid inflaming cross-strait tensions in any way that would threaten Xi's goals at the upcoming Party Congress.

Meanwhile, Beijing will further its evolving strategy for managing the backlash in Southeast Asia to expanding Chinese maritime activities in regional waters. Following last year's international tribunal ruling invalidating China's territorial claims in the South China Sea, Beijing has continued a carrot-and-stick strategy, paring maritime and economic concessions with coercive measures — all while continuing to build out its regional military presence. In recent months, this strategy has helped China and some South China Sea claimant states, particularly the Philippines, achieve a tentative conciliation, even as China's broader confrontation with the United States has threatened its capacity to manage

South China Sea affairs.

But numerous potential flashpoints in the second quarter will put this reconciliation to the test. For example, the upcoming fishing season will create ample opportunities for flare-ups between Chinese fishing fleets and coast guard forces and their counterparts from littoral states such as Indonesia and Vietnam. Perhaps the biggest test will be the joint fishing arrangement between China and the Philippines in waters around the Scarborough Shoal, a long-standing flashpoint some 200 kilometers west of Luzon. Though large-scale, sustained conflict in the disputed waters is unlikely, the growing number of civilian and naval ships on the seas raises the risk of accidents and miscalculations capable of spawning an international crisis.

Landmark bilateral Sino-Philippine maritime consultations in May will not fundamentally alter the dynamic in the region. With Philippine President Rodrigo Duterte's erratic rhetoric and efforts to reorient the country's foreign policy toward China beginning to draw some pushback at home — and given China's unwavering goal of cementing its regional maritime dominance — Sino-Philippine relations will remain fraught, creating opportunities for a warming of ties between Manila and Washington. This, in turn, could affect how other states in the region deal with Chinese assertiveness. Ultimately, claimant states will continue to pursue omnidirectional foreign policies marked by greater ties with a range of outside powers, including Russia and Japan. And Beijing will work to maintain its current strategy of balancing coercion with concessions and cooperation (including on energy development in disputed waters) to temper the sharpest tensions and limit opposition to its maritime actions.

Southeast Asia: Burdened By Consensus

China and the Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN) will likely make some progress in negotiations on a Code of Conduct for the South China Sea. But divisions within ASEAN over how to deal with Beijing, combined with deepening concerns over China's growing military power and perceived assertiveness, will limit the negotiations.

Moreover, across Southeast Asia, domestic political factors will continue to hinder pan-ASEAN cohesion and complicate broader regional issues. Even as the Philippines' temporary detente with China enters rough waters this quarter, for example, so will Duterte face new challenges to his initially unquestioned authority at home. As long as Duterte's domestic popularity is high, he will face no serious threats to his power. But the threat of power struggles within the government and political establishment will grow as he pushes forward with contentious initiatives such as his violent war on drugs, peace talks with Muslim Moro and Communist rebels, and a plan to shift the government to a federal system — all while seeking to limit domestic backlash to his reorientation away from the United States, which retains deep ties throughout the Philippine defense establishment. A Duterte administration bogged down by domestic pressures would have less room to sustain a politically risky outreach to China or, as this year's ASEAN chair, steer the body toward a semblance of consensus on the South China Sea.

Meanwhile, in Cambodia — under the current government, China's most stalwart supporter in ASEAN — upcoming commune elections will test the public's support for Prime Minister Hun Sen and the grip of his Cambodian People's Party on power ahead of 2018 general elections. Similarly, an April runoff election for Jakarta governor will serve as a barometer of the ruling party's ability to solidify support to the degree necessary to expand substantial fiscal, regulatory and economic reforms and play a more decisive role in regional trade and security affairs.

A Japanese Awakening

alike will remain cautious about undertaking bilateral naval patrols with Washington or taking other actions that might antagonize Beijing. Such concerns will be unlikely, however, to deter Japan from deepening its diplomatic outreach to and defense cooperation with South China Sea claimant states. Tokyo will use arms sales and military aid to ASEAN states, along with joint exercises with regional navies and a generally increased regional maritime presence, to bolster its position as an increasingly robust check on Chinese influence in Southeast Asia.

Japan's diplomatic, economic and security offensives in Southeast Asia are just one piece in its broader push to revive the country's standing and influence abroad. In the second quarter, Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe will meet with Russian President Vladimir Putin as the two countries seek to improve ties and resolve a long-standing dispute over control of the South Kuril Islands. Even incremental progress here would help Tokyo hedge against Chinese influence in Northeast Asia. Meanwhile, Japan will continue with efforts to counter China's expanding presence in the East China Sea by increasing naval and coast guard patrols and research activities. But Tokyo's attention will be dominated by relations with Washington this quarter, with several meetings between senior Japanese and U.S. lawmakers on the docket, as the government seeks to build on the momentum generated by Abe's recent visit to Washington and Japan's promise to invest in the United States.

The Abe administration will use political capital gained from its diplomatic successes here to push for structural reform legislation at home, along with a constitutional revision allowing the emperor to abdicate. The quarter will likely see concrete progress on reform legislation in areas such as agriculture and labor. Meanwhile, the Abe administration will rely on aggressive monetary and fiscal policy to sustain overall economic stability at home.

Now that the key members of U.S. President Donald Trump's trade team have been appointed and are likely to be confirmed this quarter, trade issues will move up on the White House's agenda. Washington will use the next three months to conduct an internal review on the United States' existing trade agreements and decide which aspects of the deals to amend in negotiations. At the top of the new administration's priorities will be the revision of the North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA).

NAFTA's members — Canada, Mexico and the United States — will open the discussion within a trilateral framework. Though the United States has said it would prefer to pursue trade talks on a bilateral basis, Canada and Mexico have made clear that they prefer to stick to three-way talks. But even if the United States is willing to kick off the negotiations in this format, differences between

Washington and its North American trade partners could eventually force the parties to move to one-on-one discussions instead. This cannot happen, however, until the negotiations formally begin in the second half of the year. (The White House has said it plans to use the Trade Promotion Authority law to renegotiate NAFTA, but doing so would require the administration to give 90 days' notice before entering into official talks — notice it will almost certainly issue in the second quarter.)

In the meantime, all parties will see a flurry of preparations and lobbying take place in the coming months, ahead of the talks. The United States will use its 90-day consultation period to draft specific negotiating points for congressional review. Chief among them will be NAFTA's rules of origin: Washington will argue that products imported from Mexico and Canada should be made up of more inputs sourced from NAFTA members in order to qualify for tariff exemptions. The White House will also probably seek to reshape the bloc's Chapter 19 dispute settlement mechanism, introduce more labor and environmental requirements, and expand the deal's purview to cover modern sectors such as the digital economy that were not included in the initial agreement.

Mexico's strategy going into the negotiations also began to take shape over the first quarter. Mexico City has already triggered its own 90-day consultation period and has begun reaching out to business leaders and groups at the state and municipal levels in Mexico and the United States to lobby against any substantial alterations of NAFTA. Mexico has also outlined the sectors most likely to be affected by a breakdown in negotiations or new U.S. tariffs on Mexican goods so that it may respond in kind if it must. But with few practical means of immediate leverage against the United States, Mexico is at a distinct disadvantage. As a result, it will have no opportunity to pressure Washington without jeopardizing the NAFTA talks as a whole. Threats of scaling back intelligence sharing, for example, will probably emerge from Mexico only if Washington attempts to impose unfavorable constraints on Mexican goods during the talks.

Though Trump's harshest criticism of NAFTA has so far centered on Mexico, Canada is taking no chances. Following Mexico City's lead, Ottawa has reached out to U.S. states that frequently trade with Canada, including in the Midwest, in an attempt to minimize disruptions to NAFTA. Several of those states voted for Trump in November, but Ottawa is hoping to make the case that preserving close trade ties with Canada is in their best interest. Its lobbying and outreach efforts will continue through the second quarter. Canada has also pointed out that its own free trade agreement with the United States, which predates NAFTA, has only been suspended and could easily be resurrected should Washington choose to replace the trilateral deal with two bilateral arrangements.

Beyond its immediate neighbors, the United States will seek to more tightly enforce its existing trade deals with other partners, particularly China. Washington, however, is unlikely to make much progress on larger trade issues during the coming quarter. Though the White House has threatened to ignore the rulings of the World Trade Organization (WTO) as it sees fit, the issue probably will not come to a head in the next three months. With its health care plan on ice, the Trump administration will instead shift gears toward trying to implement its proposed tax cuts and reforms. Congress will pass a budget resolution in the second quarter that will allow it to try to approve tax adjustments through budget reconciliation before the end of the 2018 fiscal year. Meanwhile, the Trump administration will unveil its own proposed changes to the tax code this quarter, though its plan will face an uphill battle in Congress. Among the most controversial amendments that Republicans in the House of Representatives have proposed is a border tax adjustment. Many are concerned that the measure may violate the United States' obligations under the WTO by rebating "direct taxes" on exporters (potentially constituting an export subsidy) and by taxing imported goods differently than domestically produced products. EU members and other countries have expressed concern about these issues and have promised to challenge the changes if they are approved by Congress. That said, it is unclear whether these aspects of the tax reform will be eliminated, adjusted or kept before the bill is presented to lawmakers. Moreover, though Washington will kick off the process of overhauling the U.S. tax code this quarter, Congress will not face as tight a deadline to complete it as it did with health care reform earlier this year. The tax proposals' actual passage, then, will not occur until at least the second half of 2017.

The Importance of Mexico

Mexico's relationship with the United States — its most important in terms of trade, security and diplomacy — will take center stage in Mexico City this quarter. Though the Mexican government will take small steps to try to limit any alterations to its ties with Washington, it will also hedge its bets by searching for ways to diversify its economy away from its northern neighbor. Mexico will explore its options for expanding trade with the European Union and Asian partners, including Japan, China, New Zealand and Thailand, while seeking to partially substitute U.S. food imports with goods from South America. To that end, it will try to lay the groundwork for deals to purchase more soybean, beef, pork and corn imports from Brazil and Argentina.

The White House's plans to renegotiate NAFTA and insistence that Mexico do more to restrict immigration could translate into political gains for populist politicians south of the border. The campaign season for Mexico state's gubernatorial election on June 4 will heat up during the second quarter, and given the state's size and political diversity, it is widely regarded as a bellwether for the country's presidential race, which will be held in 2018. At the moment, populist figure Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador's National Regeneration Movement (Morena) appears ready to give the country's traditional political heavyweights — the Institutional Revolutionary Party (PRI) and National Action Party (PAN) — a run for their money in this year's election. As Morena squares off against the PRI and PAN for control of Mexico state's governorship, its performance will give some indication as to whether the PRI's numerous corruption scandals and Mexico City's deteriorating relationship with Washington will result in populist backlash during next year's presidential race. Lopez Obrador will no doubt capitalize on Mexican voters' dissatisfaction with the ruling PRI and U.S. antagonism to further his own campaign for the presidency over the next few months.

Venezuela's Unraveling

This year will be the toughest the ruling United Socialist Party of Venezuela (PSUV) has ever encountered. Chief among the government's concerns will be its high risk of defaulting on debt owed by state oil and natural gas firm Petroleos de Venezuela (PDVSA). PDVSA is counting on a $600 million loan from Russian oil giant Rosneft a stake in a joint venture to make its $3.1 billion in debt payments due in April and May. If the loan falls through, Venezuela will be in dire financial straits. Should the company default on its upcoming bills, the threat of unrest spreading throughout the country will rise. But even if PDVSA successfully makes its payments in the second quarter, it will owe another $3 billion in October and November — bills it will probably fail to pay without additional foreign assistance.

If Venezuela proves unable to avoid default, whether in April or November, its full impact will not be felt for several months. But eventually imports, including food supplies, will plunge and the country's already high inflation will soar. Each of these effects would pose a significant threat to the PSUV's continued rule. Political elites would likely close ranks and crack down on signs of dissent from within their own party and from the opposition in hopes of fending off potential challenges to the state.

Faced with mounting discontent, the Venezuelan government will also maintain — and perhaps increase — its surveillance of the country's armed forces. The ruling party fears that military officers in Venezuela's regional commands may someday rise up against the central government. Though no coup seems to be in the making at present, Caracas will use human intelligence sources and electronic surveillance to keep a close eye on its troops to ensure that does not change.

In addition to its predicament at home, the Venezuelan government will have to grapple with the uncertainty surrounding the new U.S. administration's foreign policy. The White House began to adopt a tougher stance toward Venezuela in the first quarter, and it may choose to build on that pressure by slapping new sanctions on Caracas, through the U.S. Treasury Department, in the second quarter. If the sanctions target Venezuelan officials, their impact on the country as a whole will be minimal. But if they are leveled against PDVSA — the government's primary source of revenue — the punitive measures will do considerable damage to Caracas' finances and the ruling party's position in power. Such sanctions (or the mere threat of them) will therefore give the United States substantial leverage over Venezuela in any future negotiations.

Colombian Peace Process

Colombia, meanwhile, will continue the process of winding down its longest-running insurgency. Rebels belonging to the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia (FARC) will stay in their demobilization zones awaiting commanders' orders to surrender their weapons. At the same time, the Colombian Congress will pass legislation that will permit the FARC to continue laying down arms. Though the group originally agreed to give up all of its weapons by June 1, this deadline may be delayed since FARC members have been slow to gather at the country's predetermined demobilization zones.

The disbandment of Colombia's largest guerrilla group, coupled with rising demand for cocaine in the United States, Europe and Asia, will fuel violent competitions among smaller rebel and criminal organizations for the FARC's former coca-producing territories in the months ahead. Now that most FARC rebels are preparing to reintegrate into society, the National Liberation Army (Colombia's second-largest insurgency) and the Clan del Golfo crime syndicate will vie with each other for control over key drug trafficking routes and resources, bringing greater violence to the Colombian hinterlands in the Choco, Cauca and Meta departments.

Brazil's Economy Recovers While Its Leaders Founder

The second quarter will bring new promise for the Brazilian economy. Buoyed by higher oil and iron ore export revenue as well as rising domestic consumption, the country will continue to pull itself out of recession in the months ahead. But Brazil's politicians will not fare as well. President Michel Temer's tenure may be cut short in the second half of the year by an ongoing Supreme Electoral Court investigation into charges that he knowingly accepted campaign funds in 2014 that were obtained through acts of corruption. Though the court is unlikely to issue its ruling during the second quarter, the accusations will continue to hang over the president in the coming months.

Several other leading figures from Brazil's major political parties have been swept up in the scandal as well. Politicians who would have otherwise been obvious candidates for the country's presidential election in 2018, such as Aécio Neves, José Serra and former President Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva, have been plagued by allegations of corruption. As the popularity of Brazil's established elite has fallen, political outsiders have seized the chance to make their own gains. Chief among them is a highly conservative former military officer, Jair Bolsonaro, who came in third place in recent polls. Bolsonaro's rise is troubling to Brazil's traditional parties, such as the Workers' Party and the Social Democracy Party of Brazil, which may have a hard time defeating him if they cannot carve out a clear majority in the first round of the presidential race. (Even da Silva, who is popular among voters, would run the risk of losing to Bolsonaro in the event of a runoff.) Still, the campaign season has only just begun, and Bolsonaro's chances of proceeding to a runoff are remote — especially if new candidates enter the race on behalf of Brazil's entrenched leaders.

For now, Temer will focus on bringing his pension reform — a key part of his austerity agenda — to a vote in the lower house of the National Congress. But protests against the proposal and government corruption could stall the vote, particularly as Eliseu Padilha (Temer's chief of staff and lead negotiator with the National Congress on the reforms) comes under scrutiny for graft. The threat of an investigation into and indictment of Padilha, or of Brazilian lawmakers, may sideline Temer's effort to rally the fractured National Congress' support for his policies.

Argentina Undertakes Subtle Reforms

Argentina's leaders will be in a no less precarious situation this quarter. President Mauricio Macri will have to balance between satisfying the demands of organized labor and attracting foreign investors as he continues to steadily make fiscal adjustments over the next few months. These measures will include hikes in the price of natural gas and likely water for consumers across the country.

There are limits, however, to how heavy a burden the government in Buenos Aires can place on taxpayers. The country will hold legislative elections <LINK: The Costs of Promoting Business in Argentina> in October that are considered a prelude to the presidential race in 2019. Determined to remain in power, the ruling party will shy away from implementing heavier austerity measures or spending cuts ahead of this year's vote that would directly harm labor unions or provincial governments.

South Asia

India's Own Worst Enemy

The India-Pakistan Rivalry

South Asian Militancy

India's Own Worst Enemy

The second quarter will be a benchmark for India's ambitious tax reforms. The Goods and Services Tax (GST) bill has weathered a halting journey in the 17 years since it was first proposed, spurring debate and disagreement as it wound its way through India's democratic system. Thanks to Finance Minister Arun Jaitley's "cooperative federalism" strategy, however, the dual value-added tax legislation clinched a major victory during the Parliament's recent budgetary session when the lower house passed all four of its component bills. The bills' passage marked a big step toward simplifying India's convoluted tax system and unifying its fragmented market — two key components of Prime Minister Narendra Modi's plan to boost economic growth.

Having passed the measures at the federal level, the ruling Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP) will now shift its attention to India's 29 state legislatures, each of which must pass a local version of the GST. This will be a lengthy undertaking, of course, especially considering that the BJP is in the minority in 14 state assemblies. Consequently, Modi's government probably won't meet its July 1 implementation deadline. But that doesn't mean the measures will fail. Through concession and compromise, Jaitley and his state counterparts in the GST Council have addressed local governments' major grievances, including the issue of compensation for lost tax revenues in manufacturing-heavy states. Ever since Parliament passed the GST constitutional amendment in August 2016, moreover, India's state and federal governments have become more aligned on the issue of tax reform. And so, notwithstanding the usual politicking, each state will pass its version of the GST eventually — though not necessarily in the second quarter.

In fact, India's economic reform project as a whole is entering the new quarter with renewed momentum after the recent state elections in the country. The BJP achieved a resounding victory in the all-important state of Uttar Pradesh, and it also formed governments in the states of Goa, Manipur and Uttarakhand. This string of successes is good news for the BJP for a couple of reasons. The ruling party, for instance, will get to send more representatives to the upper house of Parliament, easing the way for economic reforms — though this is a benefit that will take some time to pay off. More immediately, the party's strong electoral performance is a vote of confidence for Modi's demonetization campaign, despite the many inconveniences it caused.

Now that the Reserve Bank of India has removed ATM cash withdrawal limits, the demonetization process has ended, and "remonetization" is in full swing. As Indians regain access to cash, their country's economic growth should pick up a bit. At the same time, however, digital transactions — something demonetization tried to encourage — will keep falling, albeit not necessarily to pre-demonetization levels. New Delhi has yet to address the underlying reasons that have kept cash king in the Indian economy. The country's financial infrastructure remains inadequate, the cost of credit card transactions still exceeds that of cash payments, and the legal protections against credit card fraud are lacking. Until New Delhi fixes these issues, cash will continue to reign supreme.

The quarter also promises several important foreign policy visits for India covering defense, energy and investment. In April alone, Modi will host the prime ministers of Bangladesh and Australia, as well as the president of Nepal and Singapore's foreign minister. The Indian prime minister will chalk up a success in his country's quest to join multilateral institutions in June at the Shanghai Cooperation Organization summit in Astana, Kazakhstan, where India will receive full membership in the bloc. Pakistani Prime Minister Nawaz Sharif will also be in attendance to represent his country, which is also being admitted to the alliance. Their meeting will mark the first exchange between the two leaders since 2015 and offer a chance to gauge the state of South Asia's most consequential bilateral relationship.

The India-Pakistan Rivalry

With state election season behind it, the BJP has less political incentive to lambaste Pakistan, and relations between the two will stabilize during the second quarter. The two nuclear rivals will continue to bicker over a host of issues, of course, including the disputed territory of Kashmir. But since the fourth quarter of 2016, the number of cease-fire violations along the Line of Control in the region has fallen. The drop coincided with Gen. Qamar Javed Bajwa's ascension to the powerful post of Pakistan's army chief. Bajwa is redirecting his country's strategic attention away from India and toward Afghanistan (though securing the eastern border will still be a priority for Pakistan). Consequently, Islamabad will take pains to avoid antagonizing New Delhi. And as Pakistan's next general elections approach in 2018, a Supreme Court decision on Sharif and his family's involvement in the Panama Papers scandal could give the opposition useful campaign fodder.

India, likewise, will shift some of its attention from Pakistan — which will remain its biggest regional foreign policy challenge nonetheless — to another country in its periphery, Nepal. The Madhesi, an ethnic group of Indian origin living along the Terai plains near the Nepalese border with India, have renewed their demands for greater autonomy, including the creation of two Madhesi-majority provinces in the area. What's more, they have promised to boycott Nepal's May 14 local elections, the first such vote in 20 years and a milestone for the country's democracy. The opposition Communist Party of Nepal (Unified Marxist-Leninist), meanwhile, has vowed to counter the Madhesi's demands for fear that the two new provinces would give the ethnic group control over the Nepal-India border. The party's stance alone will cause greater discord as the election approaches.

Unless Nepalese Prime Minister Pushpa Kamal Dahal's Maoist Centre party concedes to negotiations over the Madhesi's requests, the local elections will hit a snag. Either the vote will be delayed, or its legitimacy will come into question, sparking protests along the Terai. Each scenario will increase the probability that India and China stage a diplomatic intervention, as they did in 2016 to try to keep former

Prime Minister Khadga Prasad Oli's administration from toppling. (New Delhi will be careful not to intervene too directly, though, lest it push Kathmandu closer to Beijing.) Even so, given that Dahal's alliance holds a majority in Nepal's legislature — even without the Madhesi parties' support — his administration will survive through the quarter.

South Asian Militancy

Back in Pakistan, the army will continue its efforts to vanquish anti-state militancy, particularly in the restive Federally Administered Tribal Areas along the border with Afghanistan. Bajwa, the new army chief, is currently overseeing Operation Radd-ul-Fasaad as part of that initiative, which has already contributed to a decline in the number of militant-related civilian deaths in Pakistan. Though the campaign will help further reduce the casualty rate, progress will come at the cost of high-profile retaliatory attacks by the Islamic State's Khorasan chapter and the Jamaat-ul-Ahrar, a breakaway faction of the Tehrik-i-Taliban Pakistan. The threat of militant attacks in South Asia, in fact, will rise during the second quarter because warmer weather heralds the start of the annual spring offensive. The Taliban will ramp up their attacks across Afghanistan — not just in their strongholds of Helmand and Kandahar provinces in the country's south. The Islamic State's Khorasan chapter may also increase its activities. The uptick in attacks, in turn, will encourage more militants to seek refuge across the border in Pakistan, complicating Operation Radd-ul-Fasaad and perpetuating a cycle of militant violence and military crackdowns in the region.

In addition, the second quarter will test Afghanistan's peacemaking skills. Notorious warlord Gulbuddin Hekmatyar is expected to end his 20-year exile from public life in the next few months as part of a deal that Kabul struck with his party, Hizb-e-Islami Gulbuddin, in fall 2016. Should he return to Kabul as anticipated, Hekmatyar will reintegrate himself into the political wing of his party to begin laying the foundation for a return to politics. This quarter, moreover, Russia will continue to increase its efforts to jump-start the peace process in Afghanistan as it joins with Pakistan and China to mediate in prospective negotiations between the Afghan government and the Taliban. Despite its bloody history with Russia, Kabul is cautiously optimistic about Moscow's involvement.

Nigerian President Muhammadu Buhari has had a tough year so far, made all the more complicated by lingering concerns over his health. The public's fears were significantly heightened after what was supposed to be a 10-day medical trip to London turned into a nearly two-month convalescence abroad. Should the president be unable to finish his term, which ends in 2019, the center of Nigeria's political power and patronage would shift southwestward toward the base of Vice President Yemi Osinbajo, who would assume the presidency. Aggrieved northern politicians may respond by boosting their support for the country's militant groups, while the oil-rich and restive Niger Delta's expectations of concessions from the federal government may rise. (In its negotiations with Abuja, the southern region has demanded money and other perks.) Even if Buhari's rule continues, opposition from within and outside of his ruling All Progressives Congress party will mount in the face of the country's persistent financial difficulties. This will be especially true if the president fails to allay fears over his health before potential successors begin jockeying for a place in Nigeria's 2019 election — now less than two years away — in earnest.

Regardless of who rules the country, Nigeria's numerous economic challenges will not lessen in intensity in the second quarter. Weak oil prices, high inflation and the possibility of a stronger U.S. dollar will be a difficult combination for the Nigerian state and its citizens to weather. After all, a stronger dollar relative to the naira, Nigeria's currency, would hike up the costs of food and other imports, sparking protests and other forms of unrest. Meanwhile, international financial institutions such as the International Monetary Fund will continue to pressure Nigeria to lift its foreign exchange restrictions, which have proved costly for the country's currency reserves. But the government will likely limit its actions to small steps, avoiding a completely free-floating naira in the name of price stability. Nevertheless, Abuja will make minor progress in reforming the country's business environment as it pursues its 2017-2020 Economic Growth and Recovery Plan. This progress will likely include increasing transparency in service-level agreements (such as permits) and improving efficiency in the entry and exit of people and goods, which Nigeria's plan is slated to target first. More ambitious reforms, however, will suffer if Buhari — who has reportedly reduced his working day to only a few hours — remains in ill health.

As government coffers come under increasing strain, the president will have to forgo expensive projects that could win over new allies and prevent the fissures within his party from widening. Deals intended to placate militants and stakeholders in the Niger Delta will likewise be modest, thus lacking the broad appeal needed to please the region's fractious groups and keep them from resorting to politically motivated violence. The possibility that Niger Delta militants will try to increase pressure on the federal government in the second quarter by holding protests and conducting attacks as Abuja builds a peace package for the region cannot be ruled out.

The Post-Apartheid Era Ends

The contest over who will succeed South African President Jacob Zuma as the head of the African National Congress (ANC) will continue to heat up this quarter. Finance Minister Pravin Gordhan and other Zuma detractors were dismissed in a March 30 Cabinet reshuffle that removed several ministerial roadblocks constraining the president's actions. Zuma has since appointed his close allies as replacements. Over the next three months, opposing factions within the country's ruling party will press for their favored styles of reform as Zuma further emphasizes the need for radical economic change, including greater black economic empowerment, to energize his base and improve the odds that his successor will emerge from his ethnic Zulu and pro-labor circle. One possible candidate is his political ally and former wife, Nkosazana Dlamini-Zuma, who returned to the country in March after serving at the African Union for four years. She has since begun campaigning for the ANC's top position.

Meanwhile, the president's dismissal of Gordhan, whom the international community views as a steady hand over the economy, prompted S&P Global to downgrade South Africa's credit rating on April 3. The move will only further weaken the country's fragile financial position. Judicial proceedings related to corruption allegations and other cases that involve Zuma and his inner circle may prove an additional distraction as revelations of politically damaging information threaten to complicate matters for the president.

Zuma's options will be further constrained by the countermoves of the ANC's more market-oriented faction as it seeks to strengthen its own candidate ahead of the party's December leadership congress. This wing will continue to push for restrained spending measures and budget cuts that are anathema to Zuma's need to shore up support among his followers. Its ability to hamstring the president, however, was weakened by the March 30 Cabinet reshuffle. As the country's ongoing leadership struggle intensifies, the government will have a harder time pushing through difficult reforms in the months ahead, and rifts within the ANC will widen.

For the most part, labor relations will remain calm in the second quarter — at least compared with previous years — as numerous agreements remain active until the end of the year and as the government seeks to avoid a credit downgrade. Nevertheless, tensions within the coal industry will continue to mount as the opposing sides debating the structure of wage negotiations struggle to find common ground. (In January, the previous policy of holding negotiations at a centralized level will be replaced by negotiations at the company level.) Tense labor relations in the coal sector could worsen if Zuma and his camp politicize the talks in order to energize their base for the brewing leadership battle.

Old Leaders in New Africa

In the Democratic Republic of the Congo, President Joseph Kabila's political alliance will continue seek a successor who can protect the well-entrenched system of patronage it depends on to maintain power. As it stands, a 2017 election is still a possibility, even as the ruling party and portions of the opposition struggle to implement a Dec. 31 deal to transition power away from Kabila. With the president still in office despite finishing his constitutionally mandated final term in 2016, the deal's collapse looks increasingly likely. Progress on voter registration in some provinces has been made, yet millions of Congolese citizens have yet to be registered, and it is unclear how a presidential contest would be paid for, given its hefty price tag.

The political obstacles that arose after the Dec. 31 deal was signed will endure in the second quarter, causing little progress to be made between the ruling party and the opposition. This means that the time available for Kabila, who oversees a weak and fractious political order, to find a successor before 2017 ends is running out. And in the absence of an acceptable successor, the president will be more likely to resort to additional delaying tactics — such as citing election costs — to push the election (and by extension, his rule) until 2018, risking sustained unrest in the process.

Mozambique's Financial Mess

Within the next three months, the government in Maputo will be forced to strike a deal with bondholders to restructure its debts. Negotiations became necessary when it was revealed in 2016 that bond proceedings were misused to buy military equipment and large amounts of debt were hidden. The ultimate success and timing of the negotiations will be crucial since the country, hoping to secure a bailout before the year ends, seeks to open talks with the International Monetary Fund in a bid to restore its support. A bailout would help ease the burden on the cash-strapped state, where patronage networks are strained (which could open splits within the ruling Mozambique Liberation Front) and investment in its oil and natural gas sector has stalled. Should Mozambique fail to reach a bailout deal, suspended energy industry investments could hamper development over the next few years and increase the risk that its burgeoning natural gas sector won't get off the ground amid the pending glut in the liquefied natural gas market.

Ethiopian Instability

Last year, social unrest directed against the Tigray minority-led government in Addis Ababa spread, challenging its control of the country. But Addis Ababa's use of heavy-handed security measures in the latter half of 2016 and into 2017 has blunted the opposition movement's ability to unite, grow and intensify its pressure on the government. In the second quarter, the crackdown will continue to constrain the opposition, keeping the conflict to a low boil even as flare-ups posing significant risks to foreign businesses operating in Ethiopia persist. Ethiopia's waning internal security concerns will give it additional maneuverability in neighboring Somalia, where Addis Ababa is currently reshaping its presence.

East African Integration

East Africa will continue to see crucial infrastructure projects come online this quarter. Following the inauguration of the Addis Ababa-Djibouti Railway in early 2017, another Chinese-funded project — the standard-gauge railway connecting Mombasa and Nairobi — is on track to be completed around June or July. The railway, which is Kenya's largest infrastructure project since independence, will provide the country with greater transport efficiency and supply-chain redundancy from its biggest port to the capital city.

Meanwhile, the European Union's proposed economic partnership agreement with the East African Community remains troubled. The deal, which has been in the works since 2007, would give member states duty-free and quota-free access to the European Union's market. In exchange, the community would remove tariffs on 80 percent of its imports from the bloc by 2033. But Tanzania and Uganda have serious reservations about the deal, and Burundi continues to be isolated diplomatically, leaving only Kenya and Rwanda to have signed onto the agreement. During the second quarter, the European Union and Kenya will keep lobbying the community's dissenting members for their support, but Tanzania will continue employing delaying tactics in hopes of killing the deal.

Trade will be at the forefront of many leaders' minds this quarter as a new U.S. administration settles into the White House. Though U.S. President Donald Trump continues to be bogged down by congressional battles and allegations of inappropriate ties to Russia, his team will try to draw the public's attention back to its trade agenda. To that end, Washington will work to clarify its strategy for cracking down on currency manipulation abroad, tightening the enforcement of existing trade laws and preparing to renegotiate NAFTA. But the uncertainty surrounding the White House's intentions will linger, prompting the United States' biggest trade partners to look for new economic relationships elsewhere.

At the same time, some will leverage security cooperation and promises of investment to get on Washington's good side — or, at the very least, to try to fend off its punitive trade measures. China will be one of them as it uses its economic heft with Pyongyang, and the growing sense of urgency surrounding North Korea's nuclear program, to its advantage in tense trade talks with the United States. The White House will do what it can to push for secondary sanctions against China's stubborn neighbor, perhaps even threatening to step up its military aid to Taiwan to compel Beijing's buy-in. But even if Washington has its way, a heavier sanctions regime will do little to slow the progress of Pyongyang's nuclear program. The United States will have no choice, then, but to build a credible military deterrent against North Korea — a move that will only widen the rift between Washington and Beijing.

The Trump administration's attack on a Syrian air base was designed in large part to underscore to Beijing and Pyongyang that this White House is willing to take military action if so compelled. Though the attack sent a strong signal to U.S. adversaries, it also has created complications for the United States on the Syrian battlefield with Russia. Moscow will try to use the heightened risk of collisions on the Syrian battlefield and the fight against the Islamic State to bring Washington to the negotiating table, but the United States will be limited in any concessions it would give to Russia in return. The Kremlin will be even less inclined to trust in dialogue with the West as its problems pile up at home, though arms control may be one policy area in which the two can begin to negotiate without encountering much political blowback.

As the United States and Russia box Turkey in on the Syrian battlefield, Ankara will devote more attention to northern Iraq, where a conflict is brewing between Arab and Kurdish forces. The highly prized, oil-rich region of Kirkuk remains a key flashpoint in Turkey's competition with Iran for influence — and Iraq's rival Kurdish factions are caught in the middle. Washington will lend support to Sunni states, led by Saudi Arabia, seeking to balance against Shiite Iran as proxy battles throughout the Middle East escalate, though its nuclear deal with Tehran will remain intact.

In the meantime, Saudi Arabia and its Gulf Cooperation Council allies will shoulder most of the burden of maintaining OPEC's oil production cuts for another six months. Steady oil prices will buy Venezuela's cash-strapped government some time to get its finances in order, but not much. Caracas' risk of default will spike in the second half of the year, and the ruling party will have to spend the second quarter consolidating power in preparation for the turmoil that no doubt lies ahead.

Venezuela isn't the only state heading toward single-party rule. On the other side of the globe, Indian politics are swinging to the right — a trend Prime Minister Narendra Modi and his center-right Bharatiya Janata Party have been able to use to their advantage. This quarter, they will focus on passing a state-level version of a massive tax overhaul that cleared Parliament earlier in the year, a feat that will be more feasible as the growing power of the country's Hindu nationalists gives the ruling party the political capital to push through much-needed structural reforms.

Nigeria will have less luck passing its most pressing reforms as an intensifying power struggle in Abuja brings the government to a near-standstill. Concerns over President Muhammadu Buhari's health have raised questions about who his successor will be — a transition South Africa's own leader, Jacob Zuma, is making preparations for as well. Zuma is working quickly to consolidate power and cater to his ethnic Zulu base with a populist platform of black empowerment before he steps down, alienating investors in the process.

Europe's entrenched rulers face a growing threat to their power as well, albeit of a very different kind. France is preparing to hold elections that will pit the country's traditional political elite against an up-and-coming Euroskeptic contender, and Italy may not be far behind. Though the French electoral system is designed to keep fringe parties out of power, the possibility of a Euroskeptic win cannot be discounted — an outcome that could bring the eurozone to its knees and send shocks through global markets.

European Disintegration

This year will be the one in which political risk reaches the European Union's core members. During the second quarter, this will become evident as France — the bloc's second-largest economy — holds presidential and legislative elections, the results of which will resonate far beyond the country's borders. French voters will have to choose whether they want their country to reform the European Union or dismantle it to restore their state's full sovereignty.

Italy will also become a source of political risk as it moves closer to holding general elections. The current Italian government will probably stay in place this quarter, but the specter of an election in which Euroskeptic forces are expected to perform well will do little to ease concerns about the country's fragile banks and high debt levels. Germany, meanwhile, will try to keep the European Union together as it opens its own campaign season. The coming quarter will be eventful for Greece as well as Athens implements the reforms it promised to its creditors.

The Fate of the Eurozone

French presidential and legislative elections will be the most important events to take place in Europe during the second quarter. A significant portion of France's political apparatus will be elected and appointed over the next three months. The presidential election will be held in two rounds on April 23 and May 7, while legislative elections (also split into two rounds) will follow on June 11 and June 18. French voters will have to decide whether they want to further liberalize and deregulate their economy or increase protectionism. They will also have to choose whether they want France to stay a member of a reformed European Union or leave the Continental bloc entirely.

The biggest contenders in the elections are the nationalist National Front, the centrist En Marche!, the center-right Republicans, the left-wing Unsubmissive France, and the center-left Socialists. Should any of the moderate parties win the presidency, they will focus primarily on economic and security issues. A moderate government (especially under En Marche! or the Republicans) would seek to make the economy more competitive through various combinations of spending cuts, public investment, labor reform and initiatives to reduce bureaucracy, cut down on regulation and attract foreign investment. A moderate government would probably also direct more resources toward security forces and defense spending, while at the international level it would work to reform the European Union and defend France's leading role in it. The possibility of different parties controlling the presidency and the National Assembly cannot be excluded. This would complicate policymaking.

France's two-round electoral system has historically made it difficult for extremist parties to win presidential and legislative races. Candidates have to receive more than 50 percent of the vote to gain the presidency or a seat in the National Assembly, a threshold that the National Front, for instance, has found tough to reach. If the National Front overcomes this hurdle and wins the presidency, it will set in motion a chain of events that could lead to severe crisis in the European Union.

For one, the National Front wants to introduce tariffs on French imports and tax companies that hire foreign workers, including EU nationals. Both ideas go against the basic principles of the EU single market, which emphasizes the free movement of people, goods, services and capital. Even more important, however, the party also intends to hold a referendum on France's membership in the eurozone. Many of the National Front's campaign promises would require a majority in Parliament, and in some cases the legal procedures to implement them would be arduous. National Front leader Marine Le Pen has also said the referendum on eurozone membership would be called only after six months of negotiations on reforming the European Union. But even the mere victory of the National Front in the presidential election could trigger a crisis in the eurozone. Savers in the eurozone's periphery states (such as Spain, Portugal and Greece) could, for example, withdraw their money from local banks or transfer it to safer havens abroad, forcing authorities to introduce capital controls at the national or Continental level to stop a run on eurozone banks.

If France's moderates win, Germany will immediately invite the new president to shore up bilateral ties between Paris and Berlin and co-lead Europe. In global markets, the euro, along with riskier assets such as bonds from Europe's periphery, will strengthen rapidly. Should the National Front win, on the other hand, the German government will seek accommodation with the nationalist government in Paris, trying to dissuade it from fulfilling its most radical campaign promises. But many of the National Front's policies are simply incompatible with EU structures, limiting its room for compromise. And if serious trouble arises in the eurozone, Berlin will start making preparations for the most orderly dissolution of the currency area possible while planning its next steps with its closest partners in Central and Northern Europe. The market fallout of a potential eurozone collapse would be immediately felt in global markets as European investors flee riskier bonds and move their money to safer assets, such as German bonds.

Italy, meanwhile, is moving toward its own general elections, though it is unclear just how quickly they will arrive. The country does not have to hold elections until early 2018, but disputes within the ruling center-left Democratic Party could precipitate an early vote. The government in Rome, led by Prime Minister Paolo Gentiloni, will remain weak as Italy's main political parties prepare for the elections. Ahead of the vote, the Democratic Party will hold its primary to appoint a new leader in late April — a necessary step before the government resigns and parliamentary elections can be held.

Still, the elections will not take place during the second quarter. This means that Italy's vote will not coincide with France's, giving markets and EU governments time to digest the latter's results. But the lingering risk of elections in Italy, where Euroskeptic parties would probably make a strong showing, will add to the uncertainty clouding Italy's political and financial future. This will do little to ease market fears about the health of Italian banks and the country's high levels of public debt. But Italy could introduce some modest spending cuts to allay the European Commission's concerns about its deficit, and whatever frictions may arise, Rome and Brussels will find a compromise, allowing Italy to avoid EU sanctions.

Greece, another troubled eurozone country, will also be politically and financially fragile this quarter. Because Greece does not have any significant debt repayments to make until mid-July, negotiations between Athens and its creditors on the disbursement of the next tranche of bailout money could drag on for weeks, perhaps even extending beyond the end of the quarter. Nevertheless, the Greek bailout program will stay on track since Athens and its creditors are eager to avoid a default at all costs, though Athens will try to tone down some of the policies it has promised to implement, or announce spending increases in some areas, in hopes of avoiding a rebellion within the government.

In the meantime, Germany will continue to delay granting debt relief to Greece during its own election cycle. It could, however, make vague promises to discuss the issue in the future. Even if the International Monetary Fund does not announce a decision on its participation in the bailout program during the quarter, Greece and its creditors will work to keep it in place.

For an export-dependent economy such as Germany's, the prospect of a trade war brewing with the United States and Washington's threats to undermine the World Trade Organization are also major sources of concern. Consequently, Berlin will keep communication channels open with the new administration in the White House to defend Germany's stance on these issues, as well as on many other points of controversy between the two governments. Germany will also use its rotating presidency at the G-20 to defend free trade and the role of multilateral trade organizations.

Germany's strategy will include preserving the European Union's single market and expanding the bloc's trade relationships with other markets, primarily by supporting EU plans to resume stalled free trade talks. During the second quarter, for example, the European Union will revive negotiations with Mexico to update their free trade agreement. Brussels' efforts to sign free trade agreements with countries such as Japan and India will likewise intensify. Germany will advocate the development of closer trade ties between the European Union and China as well, though the bloc will struggle to get European companies the same level of access to China that Chinese companies have to Europe, creating room for friction during any negotiations that are held. Berlin's aggressive stance against Chinese takeovers of German companies will lead to similar complications during the talks.

To curry favor with the United States, the German government is willing to make gestures of good faith in areas such as defense spending. But this will not go over well in Germany. After all, it is an election year and the German government will be forced to keep lines of communication open with Washington while also being critical of the new administration, especially since a large portion of the German public disapproves of U.S. President Donald Trump. The relationship between the ruling center-right Christian Democratic Union (CDU) and its coalition partners in the center-left Social Democratic Party (SPD) will encounter additional tension as the two try to differentiate themselves before the general elections.

Regional elections in the northwestern German states of Schleswig-Holstein (May 7) and North Rhine-Westphalia (May 14) will test the appeal of the SPD and CDU ahead of the September vote. They will also act as a gauge of the popularity of smaller parties, such as the environmentalist Green Party, the left-wing Die Linke and the center-right Free Democratic Party — all of which could become coalition partners to the SPD and CDU after the elections end. Moreover, the regional races will show whether the nationalist Alternative for Germany (AfD), whose popularity has declined in recent months, can make gains beyond its strongholds in the east and enter the legislatures of western regions. Regardless of the AfD's performance, other parties will refuse to cooperate with it. Yet the AfD's role in German politics is not necessarily to enter government, but to force moderate parties to incorporate elements of its nationalist agenda into their own.

Brexit and Beyond

Brexit negotiations among the British government, EU institutions and EU members will begin in earnest in the second quarter. But the process will last at least two years. All sides will spend most of the next three months in exploratory discussions that aim to define the framework and terms of the negotiations, and no dramatic decisions are expected this early on. Before the talks can even begin, the European Union's remaining 27 members will have to agree to give the European Commission directives for its talks with London.

Some of the topics at the top of the Brexit agenda will include the legal status of British citizens living in the European Union and of EU citizens living in the United Kingdom. The parties are also likely to debate the Brexit's financial aspects, including the United Kingdom's contributions and payments to the European Union in the years ahead. This will create frictions, as the British government would try to keep its exit bill as small as possible. At the same time, the British government will be interested in starting conversations on the free trade agreement it hopes to sign with the European Union. But EU negotiators will insist on a sequential approach, starting with the country's exit and leaving the debate over the terms of its future relations for a later date.

British Prime Minister Theresa May's administration, meanwhile, will face the difficult task of reassuring the devolved governments in Scotland, Northern Ireland and Wales that their voices will be heard and their interests will be protected during the Brexit talks. London will also have to make sure that the central government remains in control of the Brexit process. London may promise subsidies, investment, tax breaks and even the transfer of powers currently in the hands of the European Union to regional governments to try to appease secessionist claims. It is unlikely, however, to give Scotland and Northern Ireland a decisive role in the negotiations. And as Northern Irish nationalist and unionist parties struggle to find common ground, the Good Friday Agreement that defines how the region's government operates will continue to show signs of fatigue.

Divided EU Foreign Policies

The next three months will bring a flurry of debates about Russia to the Continent. As the July 31 expiration date for EU sanctions against Russia approaches, the bloc's internal discussions about its relations with Moscow will become more frequent. Since there have not been any notable changes on the ground in eastern Ukraine or in U.S.-Russia ties since the Trump administration took office, most EU members will support the continuation of existing sanctions. Though the bloc does not have to make its decision until late July, the possibility of it coming before the end of the quarter cannot be ruled out. Should the issue be put to a vote within the next three months, some countries will voice their criticism of the sanctions but are unlikely to veto the decision of the majority. (That said, an electoral victory by France's National Front, which has argued against new punitive measures toward Russia, would significantly threaten the Continent's sanctions regime.)

Crossing Borders

As the weather starts to improve in the Mediterranean Sea, migration to the European Union's southern members will pick up. Along the migrant route traversing the eastern Mediterranean, the EU-Turkey immigration agreement still holds, but Ankara has the power to refuse to honor the deal and to stop policing migrant traffic. If it does, it would be in an effort to put pressure on the European Union, whose half-hearted compliance with the terms of the deal has rankled Ankara. The bloc, for example, has not lifted visa restrictions for Turkish citizens — one of the main promises it made to Ankara in exchange for its cooperation in preventing asylum seekers from entering the European Union. Several EU states will also continue to criticize the Turkish government's attempts to consolidate power following last year's failed coup attempt, giving Turkey added reason to threaten to renege on the deal.

Many migrants may, in fact, become emboldened by the Turkish government's threats and attempt the journey from Turkey to Greece. But Ankara will not give up on the migrant deal completely, since it still hopes to use the agreement — and Europe's fear of the political side effects that renewed waves of immigration could have in an election year — to negotiate and expand its customs union with the bloc in the near future. Maintaining these deep economic ties with Europe is especially important to Turkey as its economy continues to founder.

Regardless, EU members will try to protect themselves from a possible uptick in asylum seekers, keeping their borders closed along the biggest migration routes. This will pose a serious threat to Greece, as the country risks once again becoming a bottleneck for migrants who reach its shores but cannot keep moving northward.

There is also only so much the European Union can do to tamp down on the Central Mediterranean migrant route. In recent months the bloc has stepped up its political, economic and security cooperation with countries in sub-Saharan Africa, from which many migrants originate, as well as with Libya, the main transit state for migrants trying to reach Southern Europe. These policies will continue during the second quarter, but their impact will be modest. Italy and other southern EU members will see more migrants arrive on their doorsteps as weather conditions improve, creating tensions between them and their peers in Northern Europe. Rome will demand greater assistance to handle the influx of people, and if it allows some migrants to pass through its borders and into the rest of the Continent, frictions between it and its neighbors could worsen.

Russia's Internal Struggle

Moscow Looks to the East

Instability in Central Asia

Echoes of the Cold War

The United States and Russia will see heightened frictions this quarter despite widespread speculation that the election of U.S. President Donald Trump would pave the way for a detente with Moscow. As scrutiny over Russia's meddling in U.S. politics builds, any engagement with Moscow will become politically problematic for Washington. And despite Trump's campaign rhetoric, it is in his best interest to keep pressure on Russia through sanctions and continued support for NATO. As a result, both countries will continue their military buildups along Russia's periphery this quarter, and each will test the other's sphere of influence.

Following a limited U.S. strike on a Syrian air base, Russia will position itself as a potential spoiler on the Syrian battlefield to try to draw the United States back to the negotiating table. The risk for collision between the powers is higher this quarter as Russia tries to leverage deconfliction in Syrian airspace to complicate ongoing U.S. military operations in Syria against the Islamic State. Russia's reliance on negative influence to try to bargain with Washington, however, will risk further souring the negotiating climate and limit potential collaboration. But there may still be room for restarting a dialogue in other areas, such as arms control. Both sides need to resolve several arms control issues, including their differences over violations of the Intermediate-Range Nuclear Forces Treaty, the question of whether to renew the New Strategic Arms Reduction Treaty (START), and a strategy for responding to the buildup of weapons arsenals by other powers, such as China.

Moscow, meanwhile, will be busy trying to expand its influence abroad, including in North Africa and the Balkans. In the coming quarter, it will gradually increase its involvement in the Libyan conflict by backing multiple factions while coordinating closely with Egypt. In the Balkans, Russia will also continue bolstering its support for Serbian nationalists, both in Serbia ahead of elections and in Northern Kosovo. Moscow will likewise back the separatist claims of Bosnia's Republika Srpska and will work to deepen the divides between Macedonia and the West over the political status of the country's Albanians. Russia does not expect these countries to become staunch allies; rather, it hopes to use the mounting tension to distract the West and gain political leverage.

Moscow will also work to widen rifts in Europe, particularly as the Continent prepares for French elections. Russian cyber, information and propaganda campaigns will continue to sow discord and increase uncertainty in France, especially if the Kremlin's preferred candidate, Marine Le Pen, does not win the presidency. Moscow will use the same tools to bolster Euroskepticism, particularly in Italy and Germany. Its efforts are likely to intensify in the lead-up to Europe's July deadline to extend sanctions on Russia. Even with sanctions in place, however, Moscow will work to bring European investment back to Russia when it hosts a major investment forum in June.

In the meantime, the standoff between Russia and the West will continue to shape the strategic landscape of the European borderlands. The conflict in eastern Ukraine will maintain its intensity, since the security and political components of the Minsk protocols are unlikely to be implemented this quarter. Economic ties between Ukraine and its separatist territories will deteriorate because of a blockade instituted in the first quarter, forcing the rebel regions to rely on Russia and spurring long-term energy diversification efforts in Ukraine proper forward. As the European Union and United States continue to be distracted by issues elsewhere, Ukraine will build up its economic and security cooperation with Poland and the Baltic states to supplement its Western integration strategy. Meanwhile, the course of European politics (and, in particular, the outcome of France's presidential race) will be key to determining the future of EU sanctions against Russia, though they are unlikely to be lifted altogether this quarter.

Moldova and Georgia, for their part, will look to strengthen their economic ties with Russia while seeking to soften tactical elements of their policies toward breakaway territories out of pragmatism. Nevertheless, they will also continue cooperating with the European Union and NATO. (Moldova, for instance, is slated to open a NATO liaison office in April.) To the north, Belarus will come under greater domestic pressure as protests over a controversial tax policy persist, testing longtime President Aleksandr Lukashenko's undisputed grip on power. Though the unrest has so far remained a domestic issue, external powers — including the West and Russia, which have long competed for influence in Belarus — could become involved, potentially exacerbating the protests.

Armenia and Azerbaijan's dispute over the separatist region of Nagorno-Karabakh won't die down this quarter either. In fact, hostilities may intensify after Armenia's parliamentary elections are held in early April. Russia will continue to serve as the primary arbiter and power broker in the dispute as Turkey remains distracted (and, to an extent, dependent on Russia's cooperation) in the Middle East. But Moscow's attempts to build on its gains and increase its clout in the region through the Eurasian Economic Union and Collective Security Treaty Organization will be compromised by infighting within the blocs.

Russia's Internal Struggle

Apart from its foreign interests, Russia will have to contend with a somewhat chaotic domestic environment this quarter. Though the Russian economy will continue to recover from recession, stagnation will linger through the rest of the year. Despite the sanctions against it, Moscow will court foreign investment from the West, the Asia-Pacific and South Asia at its annual St. Petersburg International Economic Forum in June, putting on hold many of its isolationist practices of the past three years.

Regardless of this relatively bright outlook, many Russian regions and citizens are in dire financial straits. Constant hardship will inflame protests over political, economic and social issues across the country. The Kremlin has tried to ensure that these demonstrations do not coalesce into a single movement against it, but if they do, security forces have been fortified and deployed nationwide to respond. Russia's heavy-handed crackdowns on opposition figures and dissent will continue, and it could start to squeeze social media channels as well.

Russian President Vladimir Putin will also work to contain the country's political elite as they continue to make grabs for power. At the same time, the Kremlin will struggle to answer tough questions about the ownership of assets, such as Chechnya's oil sector and defense companies, and whether to force energy giants such as Rosneft to cut production. All the while, Russia's security services and their cyber centers — prized portfolios for the country's elite — seem to be undergoing a reorganization behind closed doors in the wake of accusations and arrests tied to the alleged hacking campaign targeting the U.S. presidential election. Such contests for power will further isolate Putin as he grows more authoritarian in order to preserve the stability of the political system beneath him.

Moscow Looks to the East

Russia, meanwhile, will keep diversifying its ties away from the West in the second quarter. Putin will hold another much-touted summit, this time with Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe, as Russia and Japan attempt to mend their relationship. The two countries have for some time been hung up on a territorial dispute over islands they both claim. Though they have made minor progress in settling the spat, including by establishing joint investment projects and agreeing to visa-free travel on the islands, neither is ready to make a grand bargain for them or reach a peace deal. Russia still sees the islands as an issue of national sovereignty and as a front line in its nuclear deterrence, while Japan has maintained sanctions on Russia and has been slow to release funds promised to projects in Russia's Far East. So, though both sides will promote better ties, actual steps toward achieving them will be few and far between.

Russia will work to expand its relationships elsewhere in Asia as well. Moscow will hold its annual economic forum in May, which key delegations from China, Japan and India will attend. Beijing is looking to extend its "One Belt, One Road" initiative through Russia, while Japan is still holding out hope of investing in the Far East. The summit will be co-hosted by India, since New Delhi has been pumping more money into Russia, and Moscow wants to rekindle its ties with the South Asian country to balance its other relationships in Asia. Russia and Vietnam will also hold a summit this quarter; Moscow is aiming to improve its foothold in the country with energy, military and metals investment deals to gain leverage in the wider region.

Instability in Central Asia

Central Asia's troubles will not end in the second quarter as protests, militancy and political infighting persist. Kazakhstan and Kyrgyzstan will probably be the Central Asian states most vulnerable to unrest — the former because of its foundering economy and the latter because of an impending presidential election in November. (Kazakhstan will also begin the rocky process of transferring some powers from long-serving President Nursultan Nazarbayev to Parliament and the Cabinet.) But tension will build in Uzbekistan as well as the country's new president, Shavkat Mirziyoyev, and security chief Rustam Inoyatov spar over reforms. All the while, Russia will seek to steadily increase its sway over the region, particularly on matters of security.

The Syrian Civil War

The United States faces heightened risk on the Syrian battlefield this quarter at the same time it prepares to kick off a major offensive against Islamic State in Raqqa. A U.S. limited strike on a Syrian air base in response to a Syrian chemical weapons attack was designed to demonstrate the United States' decisiveness in military matters (a message not lost on North Korea,) but it also came with risks. Russia has long attempted to leverage the Syrian battlefield in its broader negotiations with the United States, but the United States is not leaving much room for a bargain with Moscow. Russia thus has to rely on negative influence to try and draw the United States into a dialogue and will try to play the role of spoiler on the Syrian battlefield to raise operational risks for the United States. There will be potential for the two sides to negotiate on deconfliction, but that will likely be the extent of their cooperation this quarter as Washington focuses on the fight against the Islamic State.

Russian forces will be active elsewhere in Syria, however, supporting the Syrian army's offensives against rebel forces as well as the Islamic State in theaters such as Deir el-Zour. After a few shaky months in place, the cease-fire that Russia, Turkey and Iran brokered between the rebels and loyalists in December 2016 has broken down completely. Its failure underscores the futility of the attempted peace talks that took place throughout the first quarter. In the second quarter, Syria's deepening economic woes, evident in the country's food shortages and collapsing currency, will threaten the government's hold on loyalist territory.

Syrian fighters backed by the United States will lead the charge in Raqqa. The United States' battle plan, which also includes deployments of U.S. troops, will rely on the most effective fighting force available in the short term: the multiethnic Syrian Democratic Forces (SDF). The SDF has made swift work of the fight so far, having nearly encircled the city. With help from the freshly deployed U.S. forces, artillery support has also been put in place.

But by emphasizing the SDF in the battle for Raqqa, the United States will further strain its already tense relations with Turkey. The forces include members of the Kurdish People's Protection Units (YPG), a militia Turkey considers a terrorist organization and an active threat to its national security. Still, Ankara's dismay will not discourage Washington from working with the force. And though Turkey will try to finagle a more prominent role for the forces it supports, including Turkish-trained Arab tribal forces, the United States will prioritize winning the fight against the Islamic State by the most expedient means available over appeasing Turkey. Turkey will nonetheless try to draw the United States deeper in a fight against the Syrian regime and push its proposals for establishing a no fly one and safe zones in in Syria.

Washington's battle plan for Raqqa is just one of many complications Ankara will have to contend with in Syria in the second quarter. By the time Turkey took al-Bab from the Islamic State during the last quarter, it had already accomplished many of its objectives in northern Syria under Operation Euphrates Shield. But its efforts to keep Kurdish forces from establishing control over a contiguous swath of territory in the northern part of the country are still in progress. To achieve that objective, it will have to tread lightly so as not to step on Russia's toes. Ankara and Moscow's alliance of convenience has mostly run its course in Syria, especially since Russia foiled Turkey's plans to take the city of Manbij. Nevertheless, the two countries need to keep the lines of communication open to ensure that their troops don't end up in conflict. If their priorities in Syria continue diverging, Turkey may start looking for other ways to gain leverage over Russia — by joining in on negotiations over the Nagorno-Karabakh dispute, for instance, or increasing its coordination with fellow NATO members in the Black Sea. And even though Turkey will have less room to maneuver in Syria this quarter, it will still have some leeway to deepen its involvement in northern Iraq.

The Fight Against the Islamic State

In the Middle East and North Africa, the primary focus of the second quarter will be the fight against the Islamic State. The battle to oust the extremist group from its strongholds in the region will reach milestones in multiple theaters in the months ahead. In Iraq, for instance, the battle for Mosul will come to a close, at least in the city itself. And in Syria, the operation to reclaim the city of Raqqa is about to get underway. These events, though notable, will hardly herald the demise of the Islamic State. In fact, the organization will redouble its terrorist activities, not only in its core area of operations in the Middle East but also internationally, in an attempt to maintain its relevance as it loses territory.

The Battle for Mosul

Five months into the fighting, the end of the Mosul offensive is now in sight. Before the operation ends, though, Iraqi forces will deploy to other Islamic State strongholds such as Tal Afar and Hawija to sweep the extremist group out of those pockets. As the main battle comes to a close, the divisions among the Iraqi coalition's constituent groups will become clearer than ever. The risk of infighting among the alliance's Shiite, Kurdish and Sunni militias will be high throughout the quarter, particularly in the northern border regions of Nineveh province.

That Iraqi army forces are engaged in fighting in the city itself has improved the central government's reputation among Mosul residents; the boost will help Baghdad gain legitimacy and establish its authority over the city. But stabilizing the reclaimed territories around the city will be a tall order for Baghdad. Rifts within Shiite, Sunni and Kurdish groups will prevent them from reaching a coherent political settlement over Nineveh province's future this quarter. Iran and Turkey, meanwhile, will continue to vie for influence in Iraq, primarily through proxy battles in the disputed territories that will soon be reclaimed from the Islamic State. The Iraqi government and the Kurdistan Regional Government (KRG) each claim control of Tal Afar, Kirkuk and Sinjar, making these areas most susceptible to fighting and disputes over territory and resources.

As Iraq's political parties gear up for provincial elections in September, regional powers such as Turkey and Iran will have yet another opportunity to try to gain influence in the country. Tehran will use its sway among Iraq's Shiite political parties and militias to goad Baghdad to prioritize its ties with Iran and to block Ankara's attempts to get involved in the political settlement process through Sunni parties. Prime Minister Haider al-Abadi will face mounting political pressure from all sides, including Iraq's nationalist parties, as he tries to appease Turkey, Iran and the West simultaneously. Adding to the mix, Saudi Arabia will make economic and diplomatic gestures in an effort to strengthen its ties with Baghdad. (U. S. President Donald Trump's administration has been pressuring the kingdom to help loosen Iran's grip on Baghdad's political and security spheres.)

The Kurdish Struggle

In Iraqi Kurdistan, disagreements will prevent the region's various political factions from forming a united front. In fact, the divisions are widening. The Patriotic Union of Kurdistan (PUK) has started pushing back more forcefully against its main political rival, the Kurdistan Democratic Party (KDP), to increase its share of oil revenues from Kirkuk and weaken the KDP's alliance with Baghdad. The dispute is good news for Baghdad, at least. Should the PUK make another attempt at disrupting the flow of oil from Kirkuk to win concessions from Baghdad or Arbil, the Iraqi government will feel less threatened than it would if the KDP were also in on the plan. But Kirkuk could become a flashpoint this quarter regardless, as the governments in Baghdad and the KRG, not to mention the rival Kurdish parties, fight over control of the province and its oil production.

Iraqi Kurdistan, similarly, will be a primary playing field in the competition between Turkey and Iran. Ankara will use the presence of the Kurdistan Workers' Party (PKK), which it considers a terrorist organization, in northern Iraq as a pretext to deploy proxy forces in the region to defend its interests there. Turkey might consider, for instance, dispatching the Rojava Peshmerga, a Kurdish militia aligned with the KDP, to fight on its behalf in the event that ethnic conflict flares up after the Mosul offensive winds down. To keep Ankara in check and support its own interests in northern Iraq, Tehran will rely on the mostly Shiite Popular Mobilization Forces positioned near Turkish-backed forces, as well as its ties with Baghdad.

Turkey's Resurgence

In Turkey, voters will head to the polls in mid-April to decide whether to go ahead with proposed constitutional amendments that could change Turkey's political future. President Recep Tayyip Erdogan has a lot riding on the success of the reforms, which would increase the powers of the presidency and curtail those of other branches of government. But when voters cast their ballots on April 16, they will have other concerns on their minds, such as the country's flagging economy. Turkey's high dollar-denominated debt and weakening currency — set to further deteriorate as the dollar strengthens — have exacerbated its financial troubles recently. If the referendum falls short of the simple majority it needs to pass, the ruling Justice and Development Party (AKP) will still retain power, though the loss would be a blow for Erdogan's campaign to consolidate institutional control.

To try to improve its chances of success, the AKP has been using the country's security concerns to stoke nationalism and stir popular support for the referendum. The wave of nationalism sweeping Turkey will buoy the ruling party, win or lose. Nevertheless, the results of the referendum will reveal strong support for and opposition to the AKP, laying bare the country's sharp political divisions.

Iran's Arc of Influence

Iran will also hold an important vote this quarter. Voters in the country will elect their next president May 19. As the election approaches, even the Islamic republic's hard-line politicians are trying to avoid instigating conflict with the United States. Washington, likewise, will be careful not to provoke hostilities with Tehran by changing the Joint Comprehensive Plan of Action nuclear deal — especially since the GCC countries support keeping the agreement in place rather than risking uncertainty by scrapping it. But that won't stop the Islamic Revolutionary Guard Corps from keeping up its usual defensive posturing and staging missile tests or military exercises in a bid to stay relevant. And as U.S. lawmakers have made clear, Congress will not hesitate to impose additional sanctions against Tehran in response to any perceived aggression.

The threat of new sanctions from the United States will compound Iranian President Hassan Rouhani's economic worries in the runup to the elections. When campaign season kicks off in April, the incumbent leader will face challenges from opponents in Iran's hard-line and conservative camps alike. And though Rouhani has experience, momentum and his role in Iran's economic recovery to date on his side, the country's lingering financial troubles will weigh heavy on voters' minds as they head for the ballot box. Inflation has fallen under Rouhani's administration, but unemployment is still high — a vulnerability his opponents may seize on during the campaign.

As the Islamic republic gears up for its election, one of its prized proxy forces, Hezbollah, could derail a vote in Lebanon. The militia's allies and enemies are still at odds over electoral reforms and a new budget, and their disagreements could postpone elections set for May. Notwithstanding the current dispute, the Lebanese government has come a long way over the past several months. A new prime minister and president have managed to reshuffle the country's military leadership and, more important, revive its stagnant energy sector. Their progress highlights the pragmatic approach Lebanon's main political parties have taken to try to find a viable compromise to solve the country's persistent problems. But as the lingering differences over electoral reform demonstrate, no solution is perfect.

Hezbollah will also be a source of growing concern for Israel during the second quarter. The group's military buildup in Syria over the course of the civil war there, combined with its growing presence in the Golan Heights, has put Israel on high alert and fueled fears of an impending war at the country's northern border. To prevent Hezbollah from getting any stronger, the Israeli government will continue attacking its arms shipments in southern Syria. Nevertheless, the conflict could escalate during the second quarter.

Israel's Survival Strategy

If the Israeli government keeps pursuing its settlement policy in the West Bank without objection from the White House, moreover, the proliferating communities could provoke a violent response from Palestinians there. The risk of renewed conflict, sparked by competing Salafist groups or merely by chance events, will loom large in the Palestinian Authority, though its two main political parties, Fatah and Hamas, will each try to avoid confrontation with Israel this quarter. In addition, the political divides between the parties could further postpone legislative elections in the Palestinian territories, scheduled in the West Bank for May.

Hamas and Fatah will each be focused on their own internal objectives this quarter rather than on bridging the divide between them. Hamas is working to modify its political charter for the first time in decades, breaking with tradition to recognize the 1967 Palestinian borders. The party's turn toward moderation, however slight, is meant to curry favor with Arab partners such as Egypt, whose support Hamas needs more than ever now that the Islamic State's Sinai faction is threatening its supply routes and legitimacy. (Israel will put little stock in the group's efforts at change, though, and will continue its operations against Hamas.) Fatah's leaders, meanwhile, will be focused on establishing a succession plan for aging party leader and Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas. The enduring rifts between the rival Palestinian parties will prompt Arab states in the region to get more involved to try to resolve the struggle.

The Saudi Survival Strategy

For Saudi Arabia, the second quarter will hinge on OPEC's May 25 meeting. The summit, during which Riyadh will cajole its fellow members in the oil cartel to extend the production cut instated in November 2016, will be a turning point for the Saudi government's economic reform initiatives. Even though the production cap hasn't boosted oil prices as much as Riyadh hoped it would, the kingdom is in no position to risk oversaturating the market by scrapping the deal. Doing so, after all, would further destabilize the price of oil, jeopardizing Saudi Arabia's oil revenues in the process. Whether the country can persuade the rest of OPEC to stay the course with the production cut will determine every other economic action that the Saudi government takes for the rest of the year.

The Yemeni Civil War

With all sides of the conflict locked in a stalemate, Yemen's civil war will enter the second quarter more or less stagnant. The rifts in the Gulf Cooperation Council (GCC) military coalition against Yemen's Houthi rebels are more pronounced than ever. The United Arab Emirates is focused on training and supporting its own forces in the south. Saudi Arabia, on the other hand, is looking to the United States for help negotiating a political resolution to end the fight. But until Riyadh compromises in its adamant support for Yemeni President Abd Rabboh Mansour Hadi, and the Houthi rebels agree to relinquish territory to the government, the prospects for peace will be slim. So though the United Nations will make another attempt at forging a peace plan for the country, it will make little headway in this endeavor.

Evidence of Iran's efforts to train and equip the Houthi rebels, meanwhile, has prompted the Pentagon to request more support for the Saudi- and Emirati-led coalition. If the White House approves, the United States will share more intelligence and boost its logistical coordination with the Gulf coalition to try to limit Iran's influence in war-torn Yemen and stabilize the strategic Bab al-Mandab Strait. At the same time, Washington will pursue a more aggressive strategy against al Qaeda in the second quarter since the group's slow and steady approach has enabled it to grow in Yemen as well as Syria.

The Libyan Civil War

Oil production will also play an important role in Libya this quarter, as multiple conflicts rage on in the country. Libyan National Army chief Field Marshal Khalifa Hifter has reclaimed the critical As Sidra and Ras Lanuf oil export terminals in eastern Libya, after the Petroleum Facilities Guards and Benghazi Defense Brigades militias overran them in early March. Though the fighting stalled oil production in Libya, it will likely maintain export levels over 400,000 barrels per day throughout the quarter.

In western Libya, meanwhile, rivalries between the U.N.-backed Government of National Accord and the General National Congress, two of the country's three rival governments, will breed divisions in Misrata and Tripoli. Outbreaks of violence between the governments' corresponding militias will continue to be a constant this quarter, particularly in the capital. International support for Libya's governments will be less divided, by contrast. Egypt and the United Arab Emirates will continue to back Hifter, while Russia increases its support for his Libyan National Army. (Unless he can bring more ground forces under his control, however, Hifter will have trouble increasing his influence in eastern Libya, and his efforts to draw new recruits will run up against tribal divisions.) And although the European Union will push for political resolutions to the various battles in Libya, negotiations will stay at a standstill this quarter.

The Difficulties of North African Reform

Elsewhere in North Africa, Algeria's government will fight a political battle of its own this quarter, albeit more quietly. The country's citizens are frustrated since the government passed a new budget that slashed public spending and raised taxes. The austerity measures, which sparked public protests, will be at the forefront of voters' minds as they head to the polls in May for legislative elections, and more demonstrations are expected in the meantime. Whatever the vote's outcome, however, the Parliament lacks the political clout to bring change to Algeria's tightly controlled political system, even if opposition parties perform better than they have in years past. Many of President Abdel Aziz Bouteflika's close allies have ensconced themselves in important ministries and positions over the past few years, including, during the first quarter, the head of state oil and gas company Sonatrach. Infighting among the country's elite will be a strong undercurrent in Algerian politics for the rest of the quarter, though it will take place largely behind closed doors.

Chinese President Xi Jinping's push to consolidate his grip on power will enter a critical phase in the coming months amid preparations for October's 19th Party Congress, the quinquennial meeting where senior party officials select the next Politburo Standing Committee, the country's top governing body. With as many as five of the current seven committee members expected to step down this year, the plenum will offer Xi a momentous opportunity to stack the country's leadership with his supporters, fortifying his position as China's most powerful leader in decades. In the lead-up to the congress, Xi's core task will be to eliminate remaining checks on his influence, while reshuffling personnel to move allies into key posts. Broadly speaking, these efforts will be successful.

The stakes riding on the Party Congress will compel Chinese leaders this quarter to focus overwhelmingly on stabilizing the economy, sustaining low unemployment and avoiding social disruptions, meaning much-needed but risky reforms will take a back seat. Beijing will continue to push industrial restructuring and consolidation programs, environmental initiatives and limited financial reforms. Major new initiatives, however, that would threaten to erode business confidence or destabilize the economy are unlikely in the near future. And on existing issues that the government chooses to expand, such as corporate debt-equity swaps and bankruptcy tribunals and the introduction of a nationwide property tax, authorities will delay full implementation until after the congress. In the meantime, Beijing will maintain robust support for key industrial sectors such as home construction and manufacturing while introducing piecemeal measures to strengthen the economy's defenses against potential external shocks, especially those threatened by impending shifts in U.S. trade and currency policies.

Outside the mainland, Beijing will face a bigger challenge in managing persistent discontent in Hong Kong over China's interference in the city's political affairs, a situation that the recent election of its preferred candidate, Carrie Lam, as Hong Kong's next chief executive will do little to alleviate. As the special administrative region prepares to mark the 20th anniversary of its reunification with China on July 1 (Lam's inauguration date), conditions will be ripe for an escalation of protests.

Globalization, Evolved

The ongoing evolution in U.S. trade policy will continue to be felt across the Asia-Pacific and will pose the greatest potential threat to Chinese economic stability — and therefore to Xi's drive to consolidate power — in the second quarter. In the next three months, Washington may not impose new barriers to trade with China beyond anti-dumping and countervailing duties, but Beijing will gird itself for the possibility that the Trump administration follows through on the new president's promises to name China a currency manipulator or levy new controls on U.S. imports of Chinese goods such as steel or automobiles. Chinese authorities will work to build up buffers against U.S. threats or punitive measures while seeking to deter Washington by outlining the retaliatory measures Beijing can take. China may also introduce its own anti-dumping measures. Beijing's most likely course of action, however, will be to try to use its influence on regional security matters as leverage in economic discussions with Washington. Toward this end, China may offer to cooperate with Washington on issues such as cybersecurity, military affairs and even North Korea — a rare area where U.S. and Chinese interests overlap. At the same time, it will become more openly confrontational in the South China Sea or on other regional matters.

Though China has been the primary target in Asia of Washington's attacks on trade and currency manipulation, Japan and South Korea — the United States' two most important security allies in Asia — have by no means been exempt from prospective U.S. policy changes. This will compel both countries to explore other options, including expanded investment into and potentially imports from the United States, to hedge against pressure from Washington and prevent economic frictions from undermining their security partnerships. Nonetheless, even rhetorical pressure from Washington on trade will be painful for South Korea as Seoul attempts to move on from the fall of President Park Geun Hye while also facing Chinese economic retaliation over the deployment of the Terminal High-Altitude Area Defense (THAAD) missile defense system. China may ease pressure on Seoul in an effort to open diplomacy with the next South Korean administration after the upcoming election. But the new president's attention will be divided between a range of priorities: not only the perennial North Korean threat but also reform of South Korea's scandal-prone chaebols (giant, family-run conglomerates) and broader economic restructuring.

Elsewhere in the Asia-Pacific, moderate recoveries in the global economy — particularly in commodity prices — will continue to provide much-needed relief for regional exporters. Nonetheless, countries such as South Korea and Thailand will struggle to regain their growth momentum because of internal political constraints, increased regional competition and regional geopolitical pressures. Moreover, few countries in the region will be immune to the long-term impact of the surge of protectionism across the globe or the potential fallout from a prolonged Sino-U.S. trade or currency spat. As major powers reconfigure their trade strategies, smaller economies will seek to insulate themselves from potential shocks by more proactively pursuing regional cooperation and economic diversification. In addition to Asia-centric multilateral frameworks such as the 16-member Regional Comprehensive Economic Partnership (RCEP), trade-dependent economies such as those of Malaysia, Australia, Vietnam and South Korea will explore free trade options farther afield.

The New Silk Road

Beijing will be well-positioned to exploit regionwide uncertainty over Washington's potential retrenchment to press Chinese interests elsewhere in its periphery this quarter. In response to the Trump administration's withdrawal from the Trans-Pacific Partnership trade pact, China will redouble its efforts to draw regional economies further into its orbit by touting regional trade initiatives such as RCEP.

In addition to trade, expanded investment, particularly in infrastructure, will be core to China's diplomatic outreach throughout its periphery, with Beijing using its One Belt, One Road summit in May to portray itself as an economic anchor and promote its vision for the region as a favorable alternative to the Western-led order. But its efforts to build out vast road and rail networks will be constrained by localized unrest and suspicions in target countries, particularly Pakistan and Sri Lanka, as well as at home in Xinjiang. Domestic economic pressures will also complicate implementation of Beijing's grand plans.

Coping With a Nuclear North Korea

The fraught efforts by China and the United States, as well as South Korea and Japan, to contain North Korea's nuclear weapons program will remain a singular driver of regional dynamics in the quarter. As North Korea nears the successful development of an effective nuclear deterrent against the United States, Pyongyang will continue to use every opportunity to demonstrate its expanding defense capabilities. Another North Korean nuclear test would undoubtedly elicit heated rhetoric and defense posturing by Seoul and Tokyo, including moves that Beijing views as antagonistic. This will reduce room for diplomacy between Washington and Northeast Asia's leading powers and intensify pressure on Washington to consider alternative measures to deter Pyongyang.

Direct, pre-emptive military action against Pyongyang — particularly its nuclear weapons infrastructure and arsenal — is possible but unlikely this quarter absent a complete breakdown of diplomatic efforts by the United States and China. Instead, Washington will most likely focus on pressuring Beijing to rein in Pyongyang. Beijing may use its economic pressure over North Korea to hedge against Washington's agenda on other fronts, particularly U.S. pressure on trade. But Beijing will avoid fully severing North Korea's economic lifelines in China or substantially undermining Kim Jong Un's rule in Pyongyang.

Asia-Pacific: Among Great Powers

Where possible, Beijing will work to separate its tension with Washington over trade and the Korean Peninsula from other pivotal issues in China's periphery. Beijing will be particularly on guard against any moves by Washington to use Taiwan as a bargaining chip in other negotiations. Though the Trump administration reversed course and pledged in February to continue the "One China" policy, a long-standing diplomatic formula underpinning Washington's relations with Beijing and Taipei, the White House may still seek to boost arms sales or diplomatic contact with Taipei this quarter. Meanwhile, Taiwan will also expand its economic outreach to other countries, particularly Japan, India and Southeast Asian states, to lessen the impact of diplomatic isolation by Beijing. China would heartily protest any new U.S. arms sales to Taiwan and possibly reduce military cooperation with Washington, but it will avoid inflaming cross-strait tensions in any way that would threaten Xi's goals at the upcoming Party Congress.

Meanwhile, Beijing will further its evolving strategy for managing the backlash in Southeast Asia to expanding Chinese maritime activities in regional waters. Following last year's international tribunal ruling invalidating China's territorial claims in the South China Sea, Beijing has continued a carrot-and-stick strategy, paring maritime and economic concessions with coercive measures — all while continuing to build out its regional military presence. In recent months, this strategy has helped China and some South China Sea claimant states, particularly the Philippines, achieve a tentative conciliation, even as China's broader confrontation with the United States has threatened its capacity to manage

South China Sea affairs.

But numerous potential flashpoints in the second quarter will put this reconciliation to the test. For example, the upcoming fishing season will create ample opportunities for flare-ups between Chinese fishing fleets and coast guard forces and their counterparts from littoral states such as Indonesia and Vietnam. Perhaps the biggest test will be the joint fishing arrangement between China and the Philippines in waters around the Scarborough Shoal, a long-standing flashpoint some 200 kilometers west of Luzon. Though large-scale, sustained conflict in the disputed waters is unlikely, the growing number of civilian and naval ships on the seas raises the risk of accidents and miscalculations capable of spawning an international crisis.

Landmark bilateral Sino-Philippine maritime consultations in May will not fundamentally alter the dynamic in the region. With Philippine President Rodrigo Duterte's erratic rhetoric and efforts to reorient the country's foreign policy toward China beginning to draw some pushback at home — and given China's unwavering goal of cementing its regional maritime dominance — Sino-Philippine relations will remain fraught, creating opportunities for a warming of ties between Manila and Washington. This, in turn, could affect how other states in the region deal with Chinese assertiveness. Ultimately, claimant states will continue to pursue omnidirectional foreign policies marked by greater ties with a range of outside powers, including Russia and Japan. And Beijing will work to maintain its current strategy of balancing coercion with concessions and cooperation (including on energy development in disputed waters) to temper the sharpest tensions and limit opposition to its maritime actions.

Southeast Asia: Burdened By Consensus

China and the Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN) will likely make some progress in negotiations on a Code of Conduct for the South China Sea. But divisions within ASEAN over how to deal with Beijing, combined with deepening concerns over China's growing military power and perceived assertiveness, will limit the negotiations.

Moreover, across Southeast Asia, domestic political factors will continue to hinder pan-ASEAN cohesion and complicate broader regional issues. Even as the Philippines' temporary detente with China enters rough waters this quarter, for example, so will Duterte face new challenges to his initially unquestioned authority at home. As long as Duterte's domestic popularity is high, he will face no serious threats to his power. But the threat of power struggles within the government and political establishment will grow as he pushes forward with contentious initiatives such as his violent war on drugs, peace talks with Muslim Moro and Communist rebels, and a plan to shift the government to a federal system — all while seeking to limit domestic backlash to his reorientation away from the United States, which retains deep ties throughout the Philippine defense establishment. A Duterte administration bogged down by domestic pressures would have less room to sustain a politically risky outreach to China or, as this year's ASEAN chair, steer the body toward a semblance of consensus on the South China Sea.

Meanwhile, in Cambodia — under the current government, China's most stalwart supporter in ASEAN — upcoming commune elections will test the public's support for Prime Minister Hun Sen and the grip of his Cambodian People's Party on power ahead of 2018 general elections. Similarly, an April runoff election for Jakarta governor will serve as a barometer of the ruling party's ability to solidify support to the degree necessary to expand substantial fiscal, regulatory and economic reforms and play a more decisive role in regional trade and security affairs.

A Japanese Awakening

alike will remain cautious about undertaking bilateral naval patrols with Washington or taking other actions that might antagonize Beijing. Such concerns will be unlikely, however, to deter Japan from deepening its diplomatic outreach to and defense cooperation with South China Sea claimant states. Tokyo will use arms sales and military aid to ASEAN states, along with joint exercises with regional navies and a generally increased regional maritime presence, to bolster its position as an increasingly robust check on Chinese influence in Southeast Asia.

Japan's diplomatic, economic and security offensives in Southeast Asia are just one piece in its broader push to revive the country's standing and influence abroad. In the second quarter, Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe will meet with Russian President Vladimir Putin as the two countries seek to improve ties and resolve a long-standing dispute over control of the South Kuril Islands. Even incremental progress here would help Tokyo hedge against Chinese influence in Northeast Asia. Meanwhile, Japan will continue with efforts to counter China's expanding presence in the East China Sea by increasing naval and coast guard patrols and research activities. But Tokyo's attention will be dominated by relations with Washington this quarter, with several meetings between senior Japanese and U.S. lawmakers on the docket, as the government seeks to build on the momentum generated by Abe's recent visit to Washington and Japan's promise to invest in the United States.

The Abe administration will use political capital gained from its diplomatic successes here to push for structural reform legislation at home, along with a constitutional revision allowing the emperor to abdicate. The quarter will likely see concrete progress on reform legislation in areas such as agriculture and labor. Meanwhile, the Abe administration will rely on aggressive monetary and fiscal policy to sustain overall economic stability at home.

North America Unrivaled

Now that the key members of U.S. President Donald Trump's trade team have been appointed and are likely to be confirmed this quarter, trade issues will move up on the White House's agenda. Washington will use the next three months to conduct an internal review on the United States' existing trade agreements and decide which aspects of the deals to amend in negotiations. At the top of the new administration's priorities will be the revision of the North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA).

NAFTA's members — Canada, Mexico and the United States — will open the discussion within a trilateral framework. Though the United States has said it would prefer to pursue trade talks on a bilateral basis, Canada and Mexico have made clear that they prefer to stick to three-way talks. But even if the United States is willing to kick off the negotiations in this format, differences between

Washington and its North American trade partners could eventually force the parties to move to one-on-one discussions instead. This cannot happen, however, until the negotiations formally begin in the second half of the year. (The White House has said it plans to use the Trade Promotion Authority law to renegotiate NAFTA, but doing so would require the administration to give 90 days' notice before entering into official talks — notice it will almost certainly issue in the second quarter.)

In the meantime, all parties will see a flurry of preparations and lobbying take place in the coming months, ahead of the talks. The United States will use its 90-day consultation period to draft specific negotiating points for congressional review. Chief among them will be NAFTA's rules of origin: Washington will argue that products imported from Mexico and Canada should be made up of more inputs sourced from NAFTA members in order to qualify for tariff exemptions. The White House will also probably seek to reshape the bloc's Chapter 19 dispute settlement mechanism, introduce more labor and environmental requirements, and expand the deal's purview to cover modern sectors such as the digital economy that were not included in the initial agreement.

Mexico's strategy going into the negotiations also began to take shape over the first quarter. Mexico City has already triggered its own 90-day consultation period and has begun reaching out to business leaders and groups at the state and municipal levels in Mexico and the United States to lobby against any substantial alterations of NAFTA. Mexico has also outlined the sectors most likely to be affected by a breakdown in negotiations or new U.S. tariffs on Mexican goods so that it may respond in kind if it must. But with few practical means of immediate leverage against the United States, Mexico is at a distinct disadvantage. As a result, it will have no opportunity to pressure Washington without jeopardizing the NAFTA talks as a whole. Threats of scaling back intelligence sharing, for example, will probably emerge from Mexico only if Washington attempts to impose unfavorable constraints on Mexican goods during the talks.

Though Trump's harshest criticism of NAFTA has so far centered on Mexico, Canada is taking no chances. Following Mexico City's lead, Ottawa has reached out to U.S. states that frequently trade with Canada, including in the Midwest, in an attempt to minimize disruptions to NAFTA. Several of those states voted for Trump in November, but Ottawa is hoping to make the case that preserving close trade ties with Canada is in their best interest. Its lobbying and outreach efforts will continue through the second quarter. Canada has also pointed out that its own free trade agreement with the United States, which predates NAFTA, has only been suspended and could easily be resurrected should Washington choose to replace the trilateral deal with two bilateral arrangements.

Beyond its immediate neighbors, the United States will seek to more tightly enforce its existing trade deals with other partners, particularly China. Washington, however, is unlikely to make much progress on larger trade issues during the coming quarter. Though the White House has threatened to ignore the rulings of the World Trade Organization (WTO) as it sees fit, the issue probably will not come to a head in the next three months. With its health care plan on ice, the Trump administration will instead shift gears toward trying to implement its proposed tax cuts and reforms. Congress will pass a budget resolution in the second quarter that will allow it to try to approve tax adjustments through budget reconciliation before the end of the 2018 fiscal year. Meanwhile, the Trump administration will unveil its own proposed changes to the tax code this quarter, though its plan will face an uphill battle in Congress. Among the most controversial amendments that Republicans in the House of Representatives have proposed is a border tax adjustment. Many are concerned that the measure may violate the United States' obligations under the WTO by rebating "direct taxes" on exporters (potentially constituting an export subsidy) and by taxing imported goods differently than domestically produced products. EU members and other countries have expressed concern about these issues and have promised to challenge the changes if they are approved by Congress. That said, it is unclear whether these aspects of the tax reform will be eliminated, adjusted or kept before the bill is presented to lawmakers. Moreover, though Washington will kick off the process of overhauling the U.S. tax code this quarter, Congress will not face as tight a deadline to complete it as it did with health care reform earlier this year. The tax proposals' actual passage, then, will not occur until at least the second half of 2017.

The Importance of Mexico

Mexico's relationship with the United States — its most important in terms of trade, security and diplomacy — will take center stage in Mexico City this quarter. Though the Mexican government will take small steps to try to limit any alterations to its ties with Washington, it will also hedge its bets by searching for ways to diversify its economy away from its northern neighbor. Mexico will explore its options for expanding trade with the European Union and Asian partners, including Japan, China, New Zealand and Thailand, while seeking to partially substitute U.S. food imports with goods from South America. To that end, it will try to lay the groundwork for deals to purchase more soybean, beef, pork and corn imports from Brazil and Argentina.

The White House's plans to renegotiate NAFTA and insistence that Mexico do more to restrict immigration could translate into political gains for populist politicians south of the border. The campaign season for Mexico state's gubernatorial election on June 4 will heat up during the second quarter, and given the state's size and political diversity, it is widely regarded as a bellwether for the country's presidential race, which will be held in 2018. At the moment, populist figure Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador's National Regeneration Movement (Morena) appears ready to give the country's traditional political heavyweights — the Institutional Revolutionary Party (PRI) and National Action Party (PAN) — a run for their money in this year's election. As Morena squares off against the PRI and PAN for control of Mexico state's governorship, its performance will give some indication as to whether the PRI's numerous corruption scandals and Mexico City's deteriorating relationship with Washington will result in populist backlash during next year's presidential race. Lopez Obrador will no doubt capitalize on Mexican voters' dissatisfaction with the ruling PRI and U.S. antagonism to further his own campaign for the presidency over the next few months.

Venezuela's Unraveling

This year will be the toughest the ruling United Socialist Party of Venezuela (PSUV) has ever encountered. Chief among the government's concerns will be its high risk of defaulting on debt owed by state oil and natural gas firm Petroleos de Venezuela (PDVSA). PDVSA is counting on a $600 million loan from Russian oil giant Rosneft a stake in a joint venture to make its $3.1 billion in debt payments due in April and May. If the loan falls through, Venezuela will be in dire financial straits. Should the company default on its upcoming bills, the threat of unrest spreading throughout the country will rise. But even if PDVSA successfully makes its payments in the second quarter, it will owe another $3 billion in October and November — bills it will probably fail to pay without additional foreign assistance.

If Venezuela proves unable to avoid default, whether in April or November, its full impact will not be felt for several months. But eventually imports, including food supplies, will plunge and the country's already high inflation will soar. Each of these effects would pose a significant threat to the PSUV's continued rule. Political elites would likely close ranks and crack down on signs of dissent from within their own party and from the opposition in hopes of fending off potential challenges to the state.

Faced with mounting discontent, the Venezuelan government will also maintain — and perhaps increase — its surveillance of the country's armed forces. The ruling party fears that military officers in Venezuela's regional commands may someday rise up against the central government. Though no coup seems to be in the making at present, Caracas will use human intelligence sources and electronic surveillance to keep a close eye on its troops to ensure that does not change.

In addition to its predicament at home, the Venezuelan government will have to grapple with the uncertainty surrounding the new U.S. administration's foreign policy. The White House began to adopt a tougher stance toward Venezuela in the first quarter, and it may choose to build on that pressure by slapping new sanctions on Caracas, through the U.S. Treasury Department, in the second quarter. If the sanctions target Venezuelan officials, their impact on the country as a whole will be minimal. But if they are leveled against PDVSA — the government's primary source of revenue — the punitive measures will do considerable damage to Caracas' finances and the ruling party's position in power. Such sanctions (or the mere threat of them) will therefore give the United States substantial leverage over Venezuela in any future negotiations.

Colombian Peace Process

Colombia, meanwhile, will continue the process of winding down its longest-running insurgency. Rebels belonging to the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia (FARC) will stay in their demobilization zones awaiting commanders' orders to surrender their weapons. At the same time, the Colombian Congress will pass legislation that will permit the FARC to continue laying down arms. Though the group originally agreed to give up all of its weapons by June 1, this deadline may be delayed since FARC members have been slow to gather at the country's predetermined demobilization zones.

The disbandment of Colombia's largest guerrilla group, coupled with rising demand for cocaine in the United States, Europe and Asia, will fuel violent competitions among smaller rebel and criminal organizations for the FARC's former coca-producing territories in the months ahead. Now that most FARC rebels are preparing to reintegrate into society, the National Liberation Army (Colombia's second-largest insurgency) and the Clan del Golfo crime syndicate will vie with each other for control over key drug trafficking routes and resources, bringing greater violence to the Colombian hinterlands in the Choco, Cauca and Meta departments.

Brazil's Economy Recovers While Its Leaders Founder

The second quarter will bring new promise for the Brazilian economy. Buoyed by higher oil and iron ore export revenue as well as rising domestic consumption, the country will continue to pull itself out of recession in the months ahead. But Brazil's politicians will not fare as well. President Michel Temer's tenure may be cut short in the second half of the year by an ongoing Supreme Electoral Court investigation into charges that he knowingly accepted campaign funds in 2014 that were obtained through acts of corruption. Though the court is unlikely to issue its ruling during the second quarter, the accusations will continue to hang over the president in the coming months.

Several other leading figures from Brazil's major political parties have been swept up in the scandal as well. Politicians who would have otherwise been obvious candidates for the country's presidential election in 2018, such as Aécio Neves, Jose Serra and former President Luiz Inacio Lula da Silva, have been plagued by allegations of corruption. As the popularity of Brazil's established elite has fallen, political outsiders have seized the chance to make their own gains. Chief among them is a highly conservative former military officer, Jair Bolsonaro, who came in third place in recent polls. Bolsonaro's rise is troubling to Brazil's traditional parties, such as the Workers' Party and the Social Democracy Party of Brazil, which may have a hard time defeating him if they cannot carve out a clear majority in the first round of the presidential race. (Even da Silva, who is popular among voters, would run the risk of losing to Bolsonaro in the event of a runoff.) Still, the campaign season has only just begun, and Bolsonaro's chances of proceeding to a runoff are remote — especially if new candidates enter the race on behalf of Brazil's entrenched leaders.

For now, Temer will focus on bringing his pension reform — a key part of his austerity agenda — to a vote in the lower house of the National Congress. But protests against the proposal and government corruption could stall the vote, particularly as Eliseu Padilha (Temer's chief of staff and lead negotiator with the National Congress on the reforms) comes under scrutiny for graft. The threat of an investigation into and indictment of Padilha, or of Brazilian lawmakers, may sideline Temer's effort to rally the fractured National Congress' support for his policies.

Argentina Undertakes Subtle Reforms

Argentina's leaders will be in a no less precarious situation this quarter. President Mauricio Macri will have to balance between satisfying the demands of organized labor and attracting foreign investors as he continues to steadily make fiscal adjustments over the next few months. These measures will include hikes in the price of natural gas and likely water for consumers across the country.

There are limits, however, to how heavy a burden the government in Buenos Aires can place on taxpayers. The country will hold legislative elections <LINK: The Costs of Promoting Business in Argentina> in October that are considered a prelude to the presidential race in 2019. Determined to remain in power, the ruling party will shy away from implementing heavier austerity measures or spending cuts ahead of this year's vote that would directly harm labor unions or provincial governments.

South Asia

India's Own Worst Enemy

The India-Pakistan Rivalry

South Asian Militancy

India's Own Worst Enemy

The second quarter will be a benchmark for India's ambitious tax reforms. The Goods and Services Tax (GST) bill has weathered a halting journey in the 17 years since it was first proposed, spurring debate and disagreement as it wound its way through India's democratic system. Thanks to Finance Minister Arun Jaitley's "cooperative federalism" strategy, however, the dual value-added tax legislation clinched a major victory during the Parliament's recent budgetary session when the lower house passed all four of its component bills. The bills' passage marked a big step toward simplifying India's convoluted tax system and unifying its fragmented market — two key components of Prime Minister Narendra Modi's plan to boost economic growth.

Having passed the measures at the federal level, the ruling Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP) will now shift its attention to India's 29 state legislatures, each of which must pass a local version of the GST. This will be a lengthy undertaking, of course, especially considering that the BJP is in the minority in 14 state assemblies. Consequently, Modi's government probably won't meet its July 1 implementation deadline. But that doesn't mean the measures will fail. Through concession and compromise, Jaitley and his state counterparts in the GST Council have addressed local governments' major grievances, including the issue of compensation for lost tax revenues in manufacturing-heavy states. Ever since Parliament passed the GST constitutional amendment in August 2016, moreover, India's state and federal governments have become more aligned on the issue of tax reform. And so, notwithstanding the usual politicking, each state will pass its version of the GST eventually — though not necessarily in the second quarter.

In fact, India's economic reform project as a whole is entering the new quarter with renewed momentum after the recent state elections in the country. The BJP achieved a resounding victory in the all-important state of Uttar Pradesh, and it also formed governments in the states of Goa, Manipur and Uttarakhand. This string of successes is good news for the BJP for a couple of reasons. The ruling party, for instance, will get to send more representatives to the upper house of Parliament, easing the way for economic reforms — though this is a benefit that will take some time to pay off. More immediately, the party's strong electoral performance is a vote of confidence for Modi's demonetization campaign, despite the many inconveniences it caused.

Now that the Reserve Bank of India has removed ATM cash withdrawal limits, the demonetization process has ended, and "remonetization" is in full swing. As Indians regain access to cash, their country's economic growth should pick up a bit. At the same time, however, digital transactions — something demonetization tried to encourage — will keep falling, albeit not necessarily to pre-demonetization levels. New Delhi has yet to address the underlying reasons that have kept cash king in the Indian economy. The country's financial infrastructure remains inadequate, the cost of credit card transactions still exceeds that of cash payments, and the legal protections against credit card fraud are lacking. Until New Delhi fixes these issues, cash will continue to reign supreme.

The quarter also promises several important foreign policy visits for India covering defense, energy and investment. In April alone, Modi will host the prime ministers of Bangladesh and Australia, as well as the president of Nepal and Singapore's foreign minister. The Indian prime minister will chalk up a success in his country's quest to join multilateral institutions in June at the Shanghai Cooperation Organization summit in Astana, Kazakhstan, where India will receive full membership in the bloc. Pakistani Prime Minister Nawaz Sharif will also be in attendance to represent his country, which is also being admitted to the alliance. Their meeting will mark the first exchange between the two leaders since 2015 and offer a chance to gauge the state of South Asia's most consequential bilateral relationship.

The India-Pakistan Rivalry

With state election season behind it, the BJP has less political incentive to lambaste Pakistan, and relations between the two will stabilize during the second quarter. The two nuclear rivals will continue to bicker over a host of issues, of course, including the disputed territory of Kashmir. But since the fourth quarter of 2016, the number of cease-fire violations along the Line of Control in the region has fallen. The drop coincided with Gen. Qamar Javed Bajwa's ascension to the powerful post of Pakistan's army chief. Bajwa is redirecting his country's strategic attention away from India and toward Afghanistan (though securing the eastern border will still be a priority for Pakistan). Consequently, Islamabad will take pains to avoid antagonizing New Delhi. And as Pakistan's next general elections approach in 2018, a Supreme Court decision on Sharif and his family's involvement in the Panama Papers scandal could give the opposition useful campaign fodder.

India, likewise, will shift some of its attention from Pakistan — which will remain its biggest regional foreign policy challenge nonetheless — to another country in its periphery, Nepal. The Madhesi, an ethnic group of Indian origin living along the Terai plains near the Nepalese border with India, have renewed their demands for greater autonomy, including the creation of two Madhesi-majority provinces in the area. What's more, they have promised to boycott Nepal's May 14 local elections, the first such vote in 20 years and a milestone for the country's democracy. The opposition Communist Party of Nepal (Unified Marxist-Leninist), meanwhile, has vowed to counter the Madhesi's demands for fear that the two new provinces would give the ethnic group control over the Nepal-India border. The party's stance alone will cause greater discord as the election approaches.

Unless Nepalese Prime Minister Pushpa Kamal Dahal's Maoist Centre party concedes to negotiations over the Madhesi's requests, the local elections will hit a snag. Either the vote will be delayed, or its legitimacy will come into question, sparking protests along the Terai. Each scenario will increase the probability that India and China stage a diplomatic intervention, as they did in 2016 to try to keep former

Prime Minister Khadga Prasad Oli's administration from toppling. (New Delhi will be careful not to intervene too directly, though, lest it push Kathmandu closer to Beijing.) Even so, given that Dahal's alliance holds a majority in Nepal's legislature — even without the Madhesi parties' support — his administration will survive through the quarter.

South Asian Militancy

Back in Pakistan, the army will continue its efforts to vanquish anti-state militancy, particularly in the restive Federally Administered Tribal Areas along the border with Afghanistan. Bajwa, the new army chief, is currently overseeing Operation Radd-ul-Fasaad as part of that initiative, which has already contributed to a decline in the number of militant-related civilian deaths in Pakistan. Though the campaign will help further reduce the casualty rate, progress will come at the cost of high-profile retaliatory attacks by the Islamic State's Khorasan chapter and the Jamaat-ul-Ahrar, a breakaway faction of the Tehrik-i-Taliban Pakistan. The threat of militant attacks in South Asia, in fact, will rise during the second quarter because warmer weather heralds the start of the annual spring offensive. The Taliban will ramp up their attacks across Afghanistan — not just in their strongholds of Helmand and Kandahar provinces in the country's south. The Islamic State's Khorasan chapter may also increase its activities. The uptick in attacks, in turn, will encourage more militants to seek refuge across the border in Pakistan, complicating Operation Radd-ul-Fasaad and perpetuating a cycle of militant violence and military crackdowns in the region.

In addition, the second quarter will test Afghanistan's peacemaking skills. Notorious warlord Gulbuddin Hekmatyar is expected to end his 20-year exile from public life in the next few months as part of a deal that Kabul struck with his party, Hizb-e-Islami Gulbuddin, in fall 2016. Should he return to Kabul as anticipated, Hekmatyar will reintegrate himself into the political wing of his party to begin laying the foundation for a return to politics. This quarter, moreover, Russia will continue to increase its efforts to jump-start the peace process in Afghanistan as it joins with Pakistan and China to mediate in prospective negotiations between the Afghan government and the Taliban. Despite its bloody history with Russia, Kabul is cautiously optimistic about Moscow's involvement.

Nigerian President Muhammadu Buhari has had a tough year so far, made all the more complicated by lingering concerns over his health. The public's fears were significantly heightened after what was supposed to be a 10-day medical trip to London turned into a nearly two-month convalescence abroad. Should the president be unable to finish his term, which ends in 2019, the center of Nigeria's political power and patronage would shift southwestward toward the base of Vice President Yemi Osinbajo, who would assume the presidency. Aggrieved northern politicians may respond by boosting their support for the country's militant groups, while the oil-rich and restive Niger Delta's expectations of concessions from the federal government may rise. (In its negotiations with Abuja, the southern region has demanded money and other perks.) Even if Buhari's rule continues, opposition from within and outside of his ruling All Progressives Congress party will mount in the face of the country's persistent financial difficulties. This will be especially true if the president fails to allay fears over his health before potential successors begin jockeying for a place in Nigeria's 2019 election — now less than two years away — in earnest.

Regardless of who rules the country, Nigeria's numerous economic challenges will not lessen in intensity in the second quarter. Weak oil prices, high inflation and the possibility of a stronger U.S. dollar will be a difficult combination for the Nigerian state and its citizens to weather. After all, a stronger dollar relative to the naira, Nigeria's currency, would hike up the costs of food and other imports, sparking protests and other forms of unrest. Meanwhile, international financial institutions such as the International Monetary Fund will continue to pressure Nigeria to lift its foreign exchange restrictions, which have proved costly for the country's currency reserves. But the government will likely limit its actions to small steps, avoiding a completely free-floating naira in the name of price stability. Nevertheless, Abuja will make minor progress in reforming the country's business environment as it pursues its 2017-2020 Economic Growth and Recovery Plan. This progress will likely include increasing transparency in service-level agreements (such as permits) and improving efficiency in the entry and exit of people and goods, which Nigeria's plan is slated to target first. More ambitious reforms, however, will suffer if Buhari — who has reportedly reduced his working day to only a few hours — remains in ill health.

As government coffers come under increasing strain, the president will have to forgo expensive projects that could win over new allies and prevent the fissures within his party from widening. Deals intended to placate militants and stakeholders in the Niger Delta will likewise be modest, thus lacking the broad appeal needed to please the region's fractious groups and keep them from resorting to politically motivated violence. The possibility that Niger Delta militants will try to increase pressure on the federal government in the second quarter by holding protests and conducting attacks as Abuja builds a peace package for the region cannot be ruled out.

The Post-Apartheid Era Ends

The contest over who will succeed South African President Jacob Zuma as the head of the African National Congress (ANC) will continue to heat up this quarter. Finance Minister Pravin Gordhan and other Zuma detractors were dismissed in a March 30 Cabinet reshuffle that removed several ministerial roadblocks constraining the president's actions. Zuma has since appointed his close allies as replacements. Over the next three months, opposing factions within the country's ruling party will press for their favored styles of reform as Zuma further emphasizes the need for radical economic change, including greater black economic empowerment, to energize his base and improve the odds that his successor will emerge from his ethnic Zulu and pro-labor circle. One possible candidate is his political ally and former wife, Nkosazana Dlamini-Zuma, who returned to the country in March after serving at the African Union for four years. She has since begun campaigning for the ANC's top position.

Meanwhile, the president's dismissal of Gordhan, whom the international community views as a steady hand over the economy, prompted S&P Global to downgrade South Africa's credit rating on April 3. The move will only further weaken the country's fragile financial position. Judicial proceedings related to corruption allegations and other cases that involve Zuma and his inner circle may prove an additional distraction as revelations of politically damaging information threaten to complicate matters for the president.

Zuma's options will be further constrained by the countermoves of the ANC's more market-oriented faction as it seeks to strengthen its own candidate ahead of the party's December leadership congress. This wing will continue to push for restrained spending measures and budget cuts that are anathema to Zuma's need to shore up support among his followers. Its ability to hamstring the president, however, was weakened by the March 30 Cabinet reshuffle. As the country's ongoing leadership struggle intensifies, the government will have a harder time pushing through difficult reforms in the months ahead, and rifts within the ANC will widen.

For the most part, labor relations will remain calm in the second quarter — at least compared with previous years — as numerous agreements remain active until the end of the year and as the government seeks to avoid a credit downgrade. Nevertheless, tensions within the coal industry will continue to mount as the opposing sides debating the structure of wage negotiations struggle to find common ground. (In January, the previous policy of holding negotiations at a centralized level will be replaced by negotiations at the company level.) Tense labor relations in the coal sector could worsen if Zuma and his camp politicize the talks in order to energize their base for the brewing leadership battle.

Old Leaders in New Africa

In the Democratic Republic of the Congo, President Joseph Kabila's political alliance will continue seek a successor who can protect the well-entrenched system of patronage it depends on to maintain power. As it stands, a 2017 election is still a possibility, even as the ruling party and portions of the opposition struggle to implement a Dec. 31 deal to transition power away from Kabila. With the president still in office despite finishing his constitutionally mandated final term in 2016, the deal's collapse looks increasingly likely. Progress on voter registration in some provinces has been made, yet millions of Congolese citizens have yet to be registered, and it is unclear how a presidential contest would be paid for, given its hefty price tag.

The political obstacles that arose after the Dec. 31 deal was signed will endure in the second quarter, causing little progress to be made between the ruling party and the opposition. This means that the time available for Kabila, who oversees a weak and fractious political order, to find a successor before 2017 ends is running out. And in the absence of an acceptable successor, the president will be more likely to resort to additional delaying tactics — such as citing election costs — to push the election (and by extension, his rule) until 2018, risking sustained unrest in the process.

Mozambique's Financial Mess

Within the next three months, the government in Maputo will be forced to strike a deal with bondholders to restructure its debts. Negotiations became necessary when it was revealed in 2016 that bond proceedings were misused to buy military equipment and large amounts of debt were hidden. The ultimate success and timing of the negotiations will be crucial since the country, hoping to secure a bailout before the year ends, seeks to open talks with the International Monetary Fund in a bid to restore its support. A bailout would help ease the burden on the cash-strapped state, where patronage networks are strained (which could open splits within the ruling Mozambique Liberation Front) and investment in its oil and natural gas sector has stalled. Should Mozambique fail to reach a bailout deal, suspended energy industry investments could hamper development over the next few years and increase the risk that its burgeoning natural gas sector won't get off the ground amid the pending glut in the liquefied natural gas market.

Ethiopian Instability

Last year, social unrest directed against the Tigray minority-led government in Addis Ababa spread, challenging its control of the country. But Addis Ababa's use of heavy-handed security measures in the latter half of 2016 and into 2017 has blunted the opposition movement's ability to unite, grow and intensify its pressure on the government. In the second quarter, the crackdown will continue to constrain the opposition, keeping the conflict to a low boil even as flare-ups posing significant risks to foreign businesses operating in Ethiopia persist. Ethiopia's waning internal security concerns will give it additional maneuverability in neighboring Somalia, where Addis Ababa is currently reshaping its presence.

East African Integration

East Africa will continue to see crucial infrastructure projects come online this quarter. Following the inauguration of the Addis Ababa-Djibouti Railway in early 2017, another Chinese-funded project — the standard-gauge railway connecting Mombasa and Nairobi — is on track to be completed around June or July. The railway, which is Kenya's largest infrastructure project since independence, will provide the country with greater transport efficiency and supply-chain redundancy from its biggest port to the capital city.

Meanwhile, the European Union's proposed economic partnership agreement with the East African Community remains troubled. The deal, which has been in the works since 2007, would give member states duty-free and quota-free access to the European Union's market. In exchange, the community would remove tariffs on 80 percent of its imports from the bloc by 2033. But Tanzania and Uganda have serious reservations about the deal, and Burundi continues to be isolated diplomatically, leaving only Kenya and Rwanda to have signed onto the agreement. During the second quarter, the European Union and Kenya will keep lobbying the community's dissenting members for their support, but Tanzania will continue employing delaying tactics in hopes of killing the deal.

DMR: Victims' loved ones can't fathom a life being taken, then 'very few consequences'

KATHY A. BOLTEN KBOLTEN@DMREG.COM © COPYRIGHT 2017, DES MOINES REGISTER AND TRIBUNE CO.

Part of The Des Moines Register series "Driving Drunk: Iowa's deadly problem."

In December 2013, Miranda Lalla was sent away for up to 25 years after she pleaded guilty to vehicular homicide while intoxicated for running over her friend in a pickup truck.

But two years, one month and eight days later, Lalla walked out of prison a free woman.

"It makes it feel like her life didn't matter," said Jessica Anderson, 28, the niece of Pamela Gross, the 44-year-old Iowa City woman Lalla killed. "I don't understand how you can take someone's life and then suffer very few consequences."

It's a common refrain from families whose loved ones have been killed in crashes caused by intoxicated drivers: Offenders are serving only a fraction of their sentences, which is evidence, they say, that Iowa doesn't treat drunken driving with the seriousness it deserves.

A Des Moines Register analysis of Iowa felony sentences lends credence to their argument.

Over the past six years, 47 people convicted of vehicular homicide while intoxicated were released after serving an average of 6 years and 4 months in prison — roughly one-fourth of their maximum sentence, Iowa Department of Corrections data show.

That's far less on average than inmates serving time for Iowa's other Class B felonies, including arson, robbery and manslaughter, all of which are punishable by up to 25 years in prison.

For example, released offenders serving time for second-degree murder or manslaughter spent 12 years on average behind bars, Iowa Board of Parole data show.

And prisoners doing time for arson or robbery, crimes where a victim may have been injured but not killed, spent seven to 15½ years on average in prison before they were released, a parole board report shows. "What message is that sending Iowa residents? That it's OK to get intoxicated, get in your car and go out and kill someone?" said Frank Harris, director of state government affairs for Mothers Against Drunk Driving, who has spent time in Iowa lobbying lawmakers for legislation that would strengthen Iowa's intoxicated driving laws. "Unfortunately, this is par for the course nationwide."

Others, however, caution that while there should be serious consequences for killing someone while driving drunk, it's equally important to provide treatment to offenders struggling with alcohol addiction. "The sentences should be done on a person-to-person basis," said Lilly Wisely of Clinton, who in 2006 pleaded guilty to vehicular homicide-reckless or eluding and served one year. "I didn't have a previous criminal history or a drunk driving history. "I was scared straight in prison. Serving a longer sentence would not have been beneficial to me at all."

How much time is enough?

Despite decades of attention on the issue, Iowa has struggled to curb the state's problem with drunken driving, which in 2016 resulted in the deaths of at least 84 people from alcohol-related crashes.

The state is investigating another 16 fatal crashes where alcohol is suspected, potentially driving that number higher. Vehicular homicide while intoxicated has been a criminal offense in Iowa since 1911, according to a guide written by the state's Legislative Services Agency.

In 1986, Iowa lawmakers, citing its serious nature, made the offense its own chapter in the state criminal code. They designated the crime as a Class D felony, punishable by up to five years in prison and fines up to $7,500.

Harsher sentences and fines were passed during the next decade, and by 1997, vehicular homicide while intoxicated was designated a Class B felony punishable up to 25 years.

Iowa is one of 14 states that sentences offenders up to 25 years or more for killing someone while driving impaired, but it also has one of the nation's most generous earnedtime policies for inmates. Depending on the crime, many offenders see their sentences cut by more than half the first day they are incarcerated.

On Dec. 2, 2005, Teresa Fagen, 15, was driving home after a Perry High School basketball game when a man fleeing police in a pickup rear-ended her vehicle, killing her. Joseph Phillip Long pleaded guilty to four charges, including vehicular homicide while intoxicated and was sentenced to up to 35 years in prison.

In late 2015, Long, now 46, was released to parole after serving 8 years and 10 months in prison.

"Once a sentence is handed down, you should be required to serve all of that sentence," said Michelle Brecht, 35, of Des Moines, who is Teresa's oldest sister. "When you go through the trial and the sentencing, it's all about the victim, which is the way it should be.

"But when you get to the prison part, it's like they forget there's a victim because they are so busy focusing on ways to get (the offender) out."

Efforts to reach Long were unsuccessful.

Through a spokesperson, parole board chairman John Hodges declined interview requests on what the board considers when deciding whether to release someone on parole. Hodges was appointed in May 2014 to the board, a full-time, taxpayer-paid position.

A spokeswoman provided the Register with criteria the board considers, including previous criminal and recidivism records, participation in prison programs, drug and alcohol history and propensity for violence.

Matthew Lindholm, a defense attorney whose practice is in West Des Moines, said the parole board also must take other factors into consideration, such as crowding in the state's prisons and whether there is room for "more dangerous offenders who need to be housed." "Everybody is so quick to point the finger at the offender — let's put them in jail and throw away the key," Lindholm said. "Statistics show that incarceration doesn't work. These are people with an addiction, and we need to look at solving their addictions.”

Wisconsin lawmakers for the past three years have debated whether to require offenders convicted of vehicular homicide while intoxicated to serve a mandatory minimum sentence before becoming parole eligible. Polk County Attorney John Sarcone said that is worth exploring.

“The penalty (now) is such that it’s almost like you’re forgiving certain things,” Sarcone said. “Maybe it should be higher, like second-degree murder, which has a 70 percent mandatory minimum” on the sentence.

Intoxicated driving third or subsequent offense is Iowa’s most serious charge for impaired drivers who haven’t hurt or killed anyone, no matter how many times they’re charged. Other states have added graduated levels and increased penalties for repeat drunken drivers. Beginning in January, Wisconsin can punish someone convicted of a fourth intoxicated driving charge with up to six years in prison. In addition, someone convicted of their 10th lifetime drunken-driving offense in Wisconsin must serve at least four years before becoming eligible for parole. However, an Iowa coalition that made recommendations last year for getting impaired drivers off the state’s roads did not include stiffer penalties for current drunken driving charges.

In past years, the Iowa Peace Officers Association has supported strengthening Iowa’s drunken driving laws. A spokeswoman said the group stopped advocating for changes because of the lack of interest from Iowa lawmakers. Sarcone said he would favor stricter sentences for repeat drunken driving offenders, particularly for those with three or more convictions.

“That’s the one area that ought to be looked at because for that small group, they are a danger to everyone,” Sarcone said. “It’s obvious they haven’t learned their lesson.” Since 2005, at least 11,390 people have been charged in Iowa with operating while intoxicated third or subsequent offense, a Register review of court record records shows. Among them is Leon Kurt Shivers, who in May 2012 and June 2014 was charged with third or subsequent offense drunken driving. Shivers eventually was sentenced to up to five years in prison but served 8 months and 25 days. Eight months after his release to parole, Shivers was driving drunk when he slammed into the minivan of John McCartney, 82, killing him. “The lack of teeth to our laws is frustrating,” said Story County Attorney Jessica Reynolds, whose staff prosecuted Shivers on the June 2014 charge. “When we send someone to prison for five years, we believe that they should go to prison for five years.” A review of data provided by the Iowa Justice Data Warehouse shows that on average, people convicted of third or subsequent drunken driving spend less than three months in prison before they are released to an OWI treatment center. Offenders who don’t go to a treatment center typically spend 15 months or less in prison, the data show. “It’s every prosecutor’s worst nightmare to have something like this happen,” Reynolds said, “that you work hard to send someone to prison for a certain amount of time, they are let out and re-offend and kill someone.”

Pamela Gross’ family remains puzzled why Lalla served less than three years of her 25-year sentence.

Gross and Lalla had gotten into a fight in a parking lot after the two had been at a bar, court records show. Lalla got into her truck to leave, knocked Gross down with the truck and then ran over her, killing her.

Lalla spent more than a year in the Johnson County jail before she entered a guilty plea and was sentenced.

That jail time, as well as her time in prison, contributed toward her early release, as did her completion of a prison program, a parole board spokesman told the Iowa City Press-Citizen last year.

Lalla declined an interview request. Her parole was revoked in January because she was consuming alcohol and living with a felon. She's at a community- based corrections facility in Cedar Rapids.

Gross' family remains unsatisfied with her punishment.

"People know drunk driving is wrong and the risks involved with doing it," said Dianne Hesseltine, Gross' sister. "There should be mandatory sentences when you kill someone when you're driving drunk."

DMR: Duel on guns at public venues in Iowa

Bill's passage spurs debate on potential allowance at sites such as courts, Capitol

WILLIAM PETROSKI

BPETROSK@DMREG.COM

The passage of a wide-ranging gun rights bill by Iowa lawmakers is raising questions about whether local officials can stop gun-carrying citizens from entering courthouses and city halls, although supporters of the measure insist there won't be any problems.

Sen. Nate Boulton, D-Des Moines, an attorney who voted against House File 517, said the legislation lacks clarity in defining local government control over firearms in public buildings. A "pre-emption" section of the bill says that Iowans can sue any city, county or township that enacts firearms bans if they believe they are adversely affected by the ban.

"I think there were a lot of missed opportunities to expressly define where these rights and limitations are," Boulton said. "Right now there are a lot of grey areas and it is going to require court interpretation."

But Sen. Dan Dawson, R-Council Bluffs, the bill's floor manager, said nothing has changed in current law regarding security in Iowa's public buildings. The legislation does include a "just cause" provision for people who believe they have been adversely affected, he added.

"Our position is that it doesn't change the status-quo out there," said Dawson, who is also an Iowa Division of Criminal Investigation agent. For courthouses in Polk County and Pottawattamie County, for example, where dangerous weapons are banned and people must pass through a metal detector, there would be a "pretty high threshold" for someone to prove that while the buildings are highly secure, they are adversely affected, Dawson said. He believes city officials can prohibit weapons in city halls and he noted that schools will remain gun-free zones under a different section of state law.

The Iowa Judicial Branch, representing the state's courts, is officially opposed to the legislation, which received final approval Thursday from the Iowa House.

"The Judicial Branch registered against HF 517 solely because we are unsure if the pre-emption section of the bill (Division VII) will maintain the status-quo on courthouse security," said Steve Davis, communications director for the Iowa Judicial Branch.

Iowa Attorney General Tom Miller, the Iowa County Attorneys Association, and the Iowa Judges Association are also registered as opposed to the gun bill, which has a host of other provisions. They includes a controversial "stand your ground" section that says a law-abiding person does not have a duty to retreat before using deadly force with a gun.

Bill headed to Branstad

The bill now goes to Gov. Terry Branstad, who must decide whether to sign it or veto it. Branstad spokesman Ben Hammes said the governor is reserving judgment until he has time to carefully review the bill, as he does with all legislation. Polk County Attorney John Sarcone, a Democrat, told The Des Moines Register on Friday he wants Branstad to veto the gun bill. There is no question that local rules banning guns in courthouses and city halls will be challenged in the courts, Sarcone said, and he is concerned how the legislation will be interpreted. He also has concerns about possible difficulties in prosecuting homicide cases as a result of the stand your ground provisions. He described his stance as not political, but pro-public safety. "We come to the courthouse to resolve disputes in a peaceful fashion, not to fear if someone is carrying a weapon if they don't like the result," Sarcone said. "Banning all types of weapons from the courthouse just makes sense."

Sarcone said the gun legislation raises the possibility that someone could be charged with a felony crime, yet not have a criminal record and still have a permit to carry a gun that could be brought into a courtroom.

"Can they sit there at the counsel table with a gun?" Sarcone asked.

Firearms at the Iowa Capitol

One legal issue is clear: The new legislation will allow Iowans who have a permit to carry firearms to have concealed guns as they walk inside the Capitol to visit with legislators, watch debates and attend committee meetings. Visitors to the Capitol are now screened and they aren't allowed to bring guns into the building, although some legislators have acknowledged being armed inside the Capitol. Sen. Jake Chapman, R-Adel, said he believes law-abiding Iowans should be allowed to carry firearms at the Capitol, and in courthouses and city halls as well. "The reality is that this building is owned by the people of Iowa," Chapman said in an interview at the Capitol. "My seat out there is not my seat; it is the seat of the people of Senate District 10. This is their seat. They own the building. If they have a right to keep and bear arms, they have a right to carry in their building." Sen. Tod Bowman, D-Maquoketa, has a different view. He points to an incident in September 2014 in which a man died at the Jackson County Courthouse in Maquoketa after he pulled a gun from a briefcase and pointed it at the county assessor. Francis Glaser, 71, a former Maquoketa city manager, had become agitated and vocal about his property taxes going up during a weekly meeting of Jackson County Board of Supervisors. Glaser pulled a small gun and fired at County Assessor Deb Lane but missed. A struggle ensued with a county supervisor and Glaser died when he was struck by a second shot.

"Most people that I have talked to don't want guns freely floating into these environments where feelings and emotions get high," Bowman said. Bowman voted for the overall gun rights bill, but he supported an unsuccessful effort to amend the measure.

Rep. Dave Heaton, R-Mount Pleasant, was among a handful of Republicans who voted against the gun bill. He said last month he supported most of the gun rights provisions, but the section applying to cities and counties would keep him from voting for it. He pointed to the 1986 murder of then-Mount Pleasant Mayor Edd King, who was shot by an angry constituent during a city council meeting.

"My town will never forget what happened," Heaton said. "They are my constituents. I can't support this bill because of what this bill does."

One of the gun bill's most controversial provisions, which would have prevented the Board of Regents from enacting gun-free zones on college campuses, was previously removed from the bill.

DMR Editorial: Legislature should ban use of traffic cameras

Regulation of the devices won't solve the profit-motive problem

At the beginning of this legislative session, it appeared that Iowa's state lawmakers were finally prepared to ban the use of traffic-enforcement cameras throughout the state.

The proposal seemed to have the support of both the governor and the Senate's Judiciary Committee chairman, Brad Zaun.

Then lawmakers gravitated toward a compromise proposal that would allow the cameras to remain. The final version approved by the Senate sought only to regulate the cameras' use by limiting their deployment to state-approved, high-risk locations, with fines capped and the revenue used for infrastructure improvements and public safety.

Now, however, the pendulum may be swinging back toward an outright ban. More than two dozen representatives in the Iowa House are supporting a bill that would prohibit the use of red-light and speeding cameras.

Not surprisingly, the biggest obstacles to both proposals are the Iowa cities that rely on revenue from the cameras. Cedar Rapids, for example, generates more than $3 million a year from the cameras. Along with the cities of Muscatine and Des Moines, Cedar Rapids is now suing the Iowa Department of Transportation over the state agency's efforts to regulate the devices. It may be only a few weeks before a judge rules on the question of whether the state has the authority to order cities to take down cameras in locations where they aren't improving traffic safety.

Iowa lawmakers who remain unsure of how to proceed should take a close look at the arguments presented in this case. The cities are opposing a DOT rule that requires 1,000 feet of separation between a traffic camera and a speed-limit reduction. That rule was imposed after research conformed what common sense would indicate: placing the cameras any closer than 1,000 feet leads to more rear-end collisions as law-abiding drivers slam on the brakes to avoid being ticketed for exceeding the reduced speed limit.

It's a clear-cut example of how cities are willing to use the cameras not to make their streets safer, but to raise revenue. In fact, it could be argued that the cities are raising revenue at the expense of public safety — placing cameras in a manner that leads to more, not fewer, crashes.

Lawmakers should also be mindful of what triggered the lawsuit: In 2015, after the DOT examined the cameras' impact on traffic flow around the state, it determined that 21 of the 31 cameras in use could remain in place due to their positive impact on traffic safety. But almost one-third of the cameras couldn't meet that standard and had to either be eliminated or modified, the DOT said. The cities didn't accept that.

Again and again, backers of the technology have argued that those who don't like the cameras should just watch their speed and they'll have nothing to worry about. Not true. They'll still have to be concerned with rear-end collisions caused by obvious speed traps. They'll also have to be concerned with their local law enforcement agencies being turned into revenue centers by their city council.

As effective as the cameras are in identifying and penalizing violators, they also invite abuse. Some states have been forced to pass laws prohibiting cities from collecting more than 30 or 40 percent of their total revenue from traffic citations.

As the DOT court case makes clear, some Iowa cities not only refuse to respect the DOT's authority to regulate traffic cameras, they are also willing to spend taxpayer money arguing that point in court. They also are unwilling to act appropriately even when their own data shows the cameras aren't being used in a way that enhances public safety.

That's why the Iowa Legislature needs to move forward with its initial effort to ban the devices outright. It's the only way to prevent cities from continuing to partner with questionable, revenue-sharing companies that spit out citations in the form of civil penalties that completely bypass the criminal courts

DMR: THE FUTURE OF IOWA'S 100 COURTHOUSES

Warren County may be harbinger of efforts to meld services

GRANT RODGERS

GRODGERS@DMREG.COM

KNOXVILLE, Ia. — The court appearance here Wednesday by Warren County resident Erin Karas lasted just two minutes.

But it pulled Karas away from her restaurant job to make the 35-minute trip east from her home in Indianola to the Marion County Courthouse. Warren County's courthouse has sat mostly empty for more than nine months, evacuated amid worries about mold, plumbing issues and other problems.

"I'm missing out on work today because of this," said Karas, 45, who pleaded guilty to providing alcohol to a minor at her home last month.

For more than two decades, Iowa Supreme Court chief justices have issued intermittent warnings that budget considerations might someday force consolidation of the legal system. The move of Warren County's court operations is temporary, but what residents, attorneys and judges have experienced since June offers a glimpse of what court consolidation could bring.

State Rep. Chip Baltimore, a Boone Republican and attorney, said in an interview with The Des Moines Register that certain measures, such as closing clerks of court offices in certain counties, could be worth considering again — particularly in the age of digital filing.

"I think it has to come up," he said. "We talk about government efficiency and efficient use of tax dollars. ... Not that we are going to close a bunch of clerk's offices, but do they need to be there 40 hours a week, every week of the year with a full staff. I think that's definitely something we need to take a look at."

There is no plan in the works to consolidate court services, said State Court Administrator David Boyd, who is set to retire in September after four decades of working for Iowa's court system. And there are state laws barring certain moves, such as creating regional litigation centers or moving clerk offices out of county seats.

But Boyd admits there may come a time when offering court services in all 99 counties could be reconsidered.

"I really do hope at some point we are in fact considered to be a separate and equal branch of government and properly funded," he said. "That's not to say that we have to continue to do things in a particular way just because we've always done it that way." Legislators in January cut $3 million from of the judicial branch's current budget as part of cost-cutting effort spread across the entire state government, causing a $400,000 budget gap. In response, Boyd and court officials chose to close courts for an unpaid furlough day on May 26. The branch was already hamstrung when legislators in 2016 gave the judicial branch the same $178.7 million it received the year before, forcing a hiring freeze, Chief Justice Mark Cady told lawmakers in January. "We are starting to see delays in our court process, and I fear that this is going to continue if our needs aren't met," he said at the time.

While the judicial branch administers court services in the counties and employs clerk staff, judges and other workers, the responsibility for maintaining the state's aging courthouses falls to county governments. The average age of an Iowa courthouse is 100 years old. Thirty-eight of the current courthouses were built before 1900.

In May 2016, Warren County voters shot down a $35 million plan to build a new courthouse and jail to replace the existing courthouse built in 1939 with financial support from the Public Works Administration. One month later, Arthur Gamble, chief judge of the Fifth Judicial District of Iowa, ordered court services to vacate the building amid health concerns.

Court officials hope they can return to Indianola next month. Warren County is renovating a former Fusion Fitness center into temporary courtrooms. It will spend about $100,000 annually to lease the space while a more permanent solution is found to repair or replace the town square's deteriorating courthouse.

Years of chatter, but opposition remains

In 1991, lawmakers faced a $300 million budget deficit. In an interview with the Register, former Chief Justice Arthur McGiverin outlined several ideas aimed at saving money, including the creation of regional "litigation centers" that could replace court services in some counties. McGiverin, an Ottumwa resident, emphasized that he would prefer having court in all 99 counties, but admitted "that may well be difficult to do" in the future. In January 1993, McGiverin announced in the annual State of the Judiciary Address to legislators that court administrators were working on plans to move courts out of several county courthouses and into regional centers. But the plan met strong opposition. The Iowa State Bar Association and rural county supervisors organized opposition amid concerns, in part, that closing court services would hurt small-town economies, even if other offices like county auditors and treasurers remained in courthouses.

That same concern would likely be raised again — along with concerns about Iowans' access to justice — if lawmakers and judicial officials were to consider consolidating services again, said Skip Kenyon, president of the Iowa State Bar Association. Kenyon is a longtime attorney in the Union County seat of Creston, where a district court judge travels to the courthouse for hearings one day a week and an associate district court judge comes on a different day.

In neighboring Adams, Taylor and Ringgold counties, a judge comes to the courthouse for hearings every other week, Kenyon said.

"If you don't have that draw to help bring commerce in, I think it's real hard for the town to continue to thrive," he said. "And I think the courthouse is part of that. It brings people to town."

Judicial branch officials under Chief Justice Louis Lavorato in 2001 released a cost-savings restructuring plan that would have moved clerk of court offices out of several counties in the state and into regional centers. But the plan was pulled weeks after it was released when lawyers and county officials again spoke out.

"Chief Justice Lavorato and I took a lot of heat," said Boyd, the deputy court administrator at the time.

Two years later, then-Gov. Tom Vilsack, a Democrat, signed a bill that included language prohibiting the creation of "regional litigation centers" — a reaction borne out of the court's restructuring plan floated in 2001, Boyd said.

In her 2009 address to lawmakers, Chief Justice Marsha Ternus briefly raised the issue again amid a national recession.

“We simply do not want to spend precious time on a concept that you are not prepared to consider, and in the past, you have acted to prevent any movement toward consolidating court operations,” she told lawmakers at the time.

Consolidation in a microcosm

Warren County attorneys have gotten a taste of space sharing due to the forced closure of the courthouse in June 2016.

Under the order from Gamble, the Fifth District chief judge, most of Warren County’s court services were moved to the neighboring Marion and Madison county courthouses in Knoxville and Winterset, respectively. In the order, Gamble described “periodic” leaks of sewer water found in courtrooms, deteriorating air quality that made some employees sick, and dirty restrooms in the old building.

“Unfortunately, it is likely these alternate places of holding court will not be convenient for the citizens of Warren County. However, the board has not provided an alternative,” Gamble wrote at the time. Warren County Attorney Doug Eichholz, who was appointed to the position, said the emergency closure of the courthouse has put his office approximately $41,000 over its yearly budget, partly due to the travel costs now associated with cases. To cut down on the costs of driving to Knoxville, the sheriff lent the attorney’s office a spare vehicle, and prosecutors try to carpool, he said.

Sharing space in aging courthouses is a temporary fix.

Several attorneys and others interviewed by the Register agreed that consolidating court services into regional centers would require construction of new facilities. “I think that almost unquestionably that would have to happen,” Boyd said.

Others, such as the Iowa State Bar Association’s Kenyon, suggest that the most worrisome aspect of consolidation is the effect on people using court services.

Since the closure of the Warren County Courthouse, some of the biggest frustrations have come from families involved with juvenile proceedings.

Juvenile matters were moved to Winterset, a 25-mile drive from Indianola and approximately 40 miles one-way from both Carlisle and Southeast Warren Junior-Senior High School in Liberty Center. Juvenile court hearings take place on Monday mornings. Children who are being held by the county have to be driven to and from court by their parents or guardians, said Alex Crabb, the first assistant Warren County attorney. “You’re picking your kid up at school and now you’re driving all the way over to Winterset,” he said. “I think that’s where I’ve had most of the frustration.”

Mason Ouderkirk, whose Indianola law firm sits on the town square directly north of the empty courthouse, said the costs passed on to clients is the chief burden. The travel costs for the average 45 minutes he spends on the road driving to and from Knoxville or Winterset can add “hundreds of dollars to the cost of a hearing for a client,” he said. “It’s a burden directly upon the client,” said Ouderkirk, who specializes in civil cases and family law. “They’re paying me for my time, and that’s unfortunate.”

Kenyon raised a similar concern. A state budget crisis forced the judicial branch to belt-tighten around 2009 and cut back on travel costs for judges and other employees, he said. At the time, he was litigating a personal injury case filed in Adair County that ultimately went to trial at the Dallas County Courthouse to accommodate the judge’s travel schedule. That meant Kenyon and the other attorneys and witnesses were on the road daily to Adel throughout the trial. “It created a lot of additional expense for my client,” he said. “If you go to something like a regional center, that makes it that much more expensive, and the people who need (court services) are the ones that are going to have to be paying for it,” he said. Warren County officials are trying to decide their next move. They could choose to tear down the existing courthouse on the Indianola square and start from scratch at another location. Or they could keep the courthouse where it is, but build a jail at another location. A new bond referendum is currently scheduled for Aug. 8.

DMR: DRIVING DRUNK: IOWA'S DEADLY PROBLEM

State struggles to reduce number of repeat offenders

Since 2005, over 11,300 have been hit with at least their third drunken driving charge

KATHY A. BOLTEN

KBOLTEN@DMREG.COM © COPYRIGHT 2017, DES MOINES REGISTER AND TRIBUNE CO.

Part of The Des Moines Register series "Driving Drunk: Iowa's deadly problem."

Randy John Stubbe was sent to prison in 2008 for driving while intoxicated in a Butler County crash that killed his wife. After he got out, he was charged twice more with driving drunk and in March returned to prison for two more years.

Deanna Marie Gliem of Des Moines was drinking before she crashed her car into another vehicle in 2015, killing the driver and passenger. Before she could go to trial, she was arrested for drunken driving in Lucas County.

And Donald Dean Gridley of Fairfield served less than a year in prison in the 1990s for causing the death of a passenger in a drunken driving crash. When he got out, he was arrested twice more for drunken driving, then charged with vehicular homicide while intoxicated in a 2012 crash that killed his father.

Talk with Iowa law enforcement officers, and they will tell story after story of people arrested repeatedly for being drunk behind the wheel. It's a constant struggle that is costing lives, they say.

"You would think, as a human being, if I killed somebody while I was drinking and driving that I wouldn't drink and drive anymore," Woodbury County Sheriff Dave Drew said. "That just shows you the power of alcohol in some people's lives. Some people are better off never touching it."

An exclusive Des Moines Register analysis of more than 200,000 Iowa court records involving intoxicated driving over the past 12 years illustrates the magnitude of that struggle:

» Since 2005, 222 people have been charged with vehicular homicide while intoxicated, and nearly one-third previously had been arrested for driving while intoxicated. Several had been arrested multiple times.

» At least 13 of those drivers were caught driving drunk again after they had been charged or convicted of killing someone while driving under the influence.

» More than 11,300 people were charged with intoxicated driving-third or subsequent offense, meaning they had been charged with driving while intoxicated at least three times in the past dozen years. The repercussions of those stark statistics play out daily on Iowa's roads, too often ending in tragedy, such as on Oct. 17, 2006, in Story County. A driver weaving in a van on U.S. Highway 30 slammed head-on into a sedan and killed Jonathan Baugh, a 17-year-old Valley High School senior who was on his way to watch a volleyball match in Ames. The van's driver, Phillip Ray Stephens, had an open bottle in the vehicle and reeked of alcohol, court records show. Stephens had already been convicted of drunken driving in 2000 and had another charge pending for a January 2005 arrest, according to court records.

Stephens was sentenced to up to 18 years in prison for the fatal crash but served only 5 1/2 years before being released in September 2012 to a community program. In May 2016, he was discharged from parole and within weeks was arrested twice for operating a vehicle while intoxicated, with sentencing scheduled for Monday. “He’s using his vehicle like a weapon when he gets behind the wheel,” said Tracy Baugh, a Baptist minister and father of Jonathan, who was among the 1,100 people who have been killed in alcohol-related crashes in Iowa since 2005. Stephens did not respond to a request for an interview. Tracy and his wife, Pam, who now live in Spencer, want Iowa to require intoxicated drivers who kill someone to serve 80 percent or more of their sentence. And they want to see chronic offenders such as Stephens barred from driving for life. “People on the road with him are escaping death — just like if there’s a gunman in a shopping mall and people walk away unharmed,” Tracy Baugh said.

Donald Gridley, who has twice killed people while driving drunk, said people like him are “playing with disaster.”

“Bad things are going to happen to you eventually,” Gridley told the Register during a telephone interview from Mount Pleasant Correctional Facility.

A jury in 2014 convicted after a jury convicted him of vehicular homicide while intoxicated. “Drinking is a like a deadly weapon, and somebody will either be hurt or wind up dead because of it.” Of the 13 drivers in the past dozen years caught driving drunk again after already killing someone while driving drunk, nine, including Gridley, Stephens and Stubbe, had served time in prison. Four, including Gliem, were awaiting trial. Gridley’s first conviction for causing a death came in 1992, when he pleaded guilty to involuntary manslaughter and driving drunk. That was followed by two more arrests for drunken driving before the night of drinking in December 2012 when his father, Patrick Gridley, was killed. Gridley said his father had persuaded him to attend a funeral with him. Afterward, the two went to a bar and drank into the early hours. “I made a bad choice to go to the funeral and then to drink,” Gridley said. “It ended up in a mess.” Gridley said he doesn’t remember the crash or whether he was driving. Court records say he ran a stop sign and drove his father’s Ford pickup into a ditch in rural Wapello County, then walked to a nearby farmhouse for help. A county sheriff’s deputy found his father, 65, dead inside the truck.

A test administered several hours after the crash showed that Donald Gridley’s alcohol concentration was 0.198 percent, more than twice Iowa’s legal limit.

It also detected marijuana, oxycodone and an anxiety medication, court records show. Gridley was sentenced to up to 25 years in prison. His expected release date is December 2025. While in prison, Gridley said he’s attended weekly meetings of Alcoholics Anonymous and Narcotics Anonymous and attended a class called “Thinking for a Change.”

But, he said, he’s not received any treatment or counseling for his addiction to alcohol.

Nonetheless, Donald’s mother, Linda Gridley, said her son has been behind bars long enough.

“He’s not the man he was five years ago,” said Gridley, 69, of Fairfield. “He talks differently and he acts differently. He’s paid his dues — now he’s in there without any rehabilitation and with no treatment.” Donald Gridley also believes he’s ready to be released after more than two years behind bars. He said he won’t drink again because “of all the trouble and pain and agony it caused my mother and the rest of my family.”

‘He should have been sitting in jail’

Intoxicated driving third or subsequent offense, filed against more than 11,300 people in Iowa in the past dozen years, is the state's most serious charge for impaired drivers who haven't hurt or killed anyone. The Register found offenders who had been arrested as many as eight times for impaired driving since 2005, but they still faced the "third or subsequent offense" charge. One of the people who faced that charge was 53-year-old Kirk Arnell Thomas of Marshall County, who was sentenced in February 2016 to up to 15 years in prison as a habitual drunken driving offender after his third arrest in less than six years. In fall 2015, Thomas was arrested twice for driving while intoxicated by Marshalltown police. Preliminary breath tests showed Thomas' blood al-

Signs you may be an alcoholic

People who answer "yes" to at least two questions on the so-called CAGE screening test should investigate whether they may be abusing alcohol. The screening test is widely used to determine potential problems with alcohol, according to the National Institute on Alcohol Abuse and Alcoholism. CAGE is an acronym based on key words from each of four questions: cut down, annoyed, guilty and eye-opener.

The questions to ask yourself are: » Have you ever felt you needed to cut down on your drinking?

» Have people annoyed you by criticizing your drinking?

» Have you ever felt guilty about drinking?

» Have you ever felt you needed a drink first thing in the morning (eye-opener) to steady your nerves or to get rid of a hangover?

cohol concentration at nearly three times the legal limit.

Thomas, in a telephone interview, said he has been attending Alcoholics Anonymous meetings and life-skills classes while incarcerated at Iowa's North Central Correctional Facility in Rockwell City.

He said he's lucky he didn't seriously injure or kill someone when he drove drunk.

"There was no good reason for me to be doing that," Thomas said. "But I did it, for some foolish, unknown reason."

Law enforcement officials say something is wrong that people like Thomas can't be kept from behind the wheel of a vehicle after multiple intoxicated driving charges.

“It’s frustrating to me because, one, he shouldn’t have been driving because he had been barred,” said Marshalltown police Lt. Rick Bellile, who arrested Thomas on Oct. 6, 2015, for third-offense drunken driving. Thomas had also been arrested four weeks earlier for drunken driving.

“The problem with our system is that we let these repeat offenders out of jail while they are waiting (for trial), and they go out” and continue to drive while they are intoxicated, Bellile said.

The fact is most people caught driving drunk have done it before, said Kim Brangoccio, manager of UnityPoint Health’s Powell Chemical Dependency Center in Des Moines.

Alcoholism is a “chronic relapsing disease, and although people can get treatment, sometimes they really don’t want to quit,” she said.

Typically, Iowa requires those charged with third-offense intoxicated driving to undergo treatment. Many are sent to community-based residential correctional facilities, which provide substance abuse treatment programs licensed through the Iowa Department of Public Health.

Treatment isn’t always successful, however, particularly if offenders fall back into old habits. “If they get back into similar life situations with the same stressors and the same friend and the same job, they’ll relapse,” Brangoccio said. “Changing just a few things is not enough — you have to really make some significant changes.” People need to understand what causes them to drink, she said. “If the reason you drink has to do with coping or has to do with your inability to deal with your own self-anxiety — if you don’t get help for those things at the same time you’re getting alcohol or drug help, your chance of relapse is very high.”

Searching for a better way

Meanwhile, Iowa continues to look for ways to better address its drunken driving problem, particularly repeat offenders.

Last year, a coalition submitted 66 proposals for reducing impaired driving in the state. One of those has made its way into a bill making its way through Legislature. The proposal would give law enforcement jurisdictions the option of participating in a program requiring some offenders to provide a breath sample twice a day to prove they haven’t been drinking. A similar program in South Dakota called 24-7 requires repeat drunken drivers to take a Breathalyzer test twice a day as part of their bond or parole conditions. Since the program has been in place, arrests for repeat drunken driving have fallen 12 percent, studies have shown. Polk County associate district court Judge Carol Egly wonders whether some drivers must be saved from themselves.

“There are some people that — maybe one should just assume — should not be driving regardless of what they do with their treatment program,” said Egly, whose assignments include presiding over intoxicated driving sentencing. “Maybe we should be identifying those people and making it possible for them not to be using automobiles.”

That idea appeals to Tracy and Pam Baugh, whose teenage son died in a drunken driving crash 11 years ago. Stephens, the driver who killed their son, was arrested Aug. 26, 2016, after a Johnson County sheriff’s deputy saw him swerving “all over” eastbound Interstate Highway 80 in Iowa City, court records show. Stephens “smelled strongly of ingested alcohol.”

Six weeks earlier, Stephens was arrested at Saylorville Lake in Polk County for operating a boat while intoxicated.

A trial is pending in the Polk County case; Stephens pleaded guilty to the Johnson County charge and will be sentenced Monday.

life is going to be next?”

DMR: Bondurant community remembers killed family

LINH TA

LTA@DMREG.COM

The community of Bondurant is close-knit.

Most people know each other, or know of each other, residents say.

So when they learned that three of their own were killed, they did what close communities do — they gathered to support one another.

“Because it’s Bondurant, people just come to help each other,” said Samantha Hunter, a 24-yearold from the town.

Outside Bondurant-Farrar High School, people cried and embraced during a vigil to remember Mark, Charla and Tawni Nicholson.

In a circle around the flagpole, people stood shoulder-to-shoulder with candles flickering against the night sky.

It was 9:30 p.m. Thursday when Polk County deputies went to the Nicholsons’ home to conduct a welfare check. There, they found the bodies of Mark Alan Nicholson, 58, Charla Lee Nicholson, 56, and their daughter Tawni Alexis Nicholson, 24.

Chase Marcus Nicholson, 20, is currently in Polk County Jail on a valid material witness warrant, according to a news release. He is being held on a $2 million cash-only bond. He is the son of Mark and Charla, and is Tawni’s brother.

Hunter and Lindsay Schaper, 24, went to Bondurant- Farrar High School with Tawni.

They also roomed together at Iowa State University, where she graduated in August.

“She was just a ray of sunshine,” Schaper said. “She always had open arms for everybody.”

When they learned both she and her parents were killed, they were shocked.

It’s something that doesn’t happen in the town of about 5,000 people.

“It’s one of those things you can’t believe that happened here,” Hunter said. “They treated you like you were a part of their family.” As Chase Nicholson sits in Polk County Jail, additional charges in relation to the case are possible, according to law enforcement.

But as the community mourned together outside, Jeff Sanderson, pastor at the Federated Church of Bondurant, addressed them. He reminded them of one thing — that in the afterlife, anything is possible.

“I pray that we have the opportunity to watch a mother, a father, a daughter and son embrace.”

DMR: KUTCHER: ‘I ALMOST OWE EVERYTHING OF WHO I AM’ TO IOWA

Actor in W.D.M. to get award for 'good character'

MATTHEW LEIMKUEHLER

MLEIMKUEHLER@DMREG.COM

Ashton Kutcher left Iowa wanting to escape the small towns and endless farmland that surrounds each.

Now, a worldwide success at age 39 and a father of two, he seems pretty happy to be home.

"I left Iowa wanting to get out of Iowa, and the older I get the more I want to come home," he said in an exclusive interview with the Register Saturday evening. "In part, because the more places I go, the more I realize how great it is here, and the more I realize that I almost owe everything of who I am to where I come from."

The eastern Iowa-raised Hollywood superstar appeared at the Ron Pearson Center in West Des Moines Saturday night to receive the Robert D. Ray Pillar of Character Award, an annual honor given by Drake University to "individuals who demonstrate good character as a role model." Outside of acting, Kutcher, 39, is known for multiple philanthropic efforts, including cofounding (alongside Dallas Clark) the Iowa disaster relief organization The Native Fund and Thorn: Digital Defends of Children, which uses technology to combat sexual exploitation of children.

"I think the one thing that you realize the minute you become a parent is that character is the one thing you can give them as a parent," he said. "You can actually, materially impact that ... and then everything else becomes their choice."

The "That '70s Show" and "The Ranch" star was born in Cedar Rapids and went to high school in Homestead; he made his West Des Moines appearance alongside wife and fellow star Mila Kunis. Kutcher's mother, Diane Portwood, and her spouse, Mark, as well as his father Larry and his spouse, Colleen, were also in town to see one of Iowa's most celebrated bring home the award.

On fatherhood, Kutcher said there are three Iowan values that impact how he raises his children: A general kindness, always keeping your word and showing good work ethic. Kutcher and Kunis welcomed their second child, a son, Dimitri Portwood Kutcher, into the world last November. The couple became parents to a girl, Wyatt Isabelle Kutcher, in 2014.

"There's an earnestness and an honest-ness here that lacks in a lot of other places in the world," Kutcher said. "People aren't afraid to work and aren't afraid to work really hard. They understand that working hard actually gets you there."

That earnestness was on display Thursday when Kutcher and Kunis surprised students at Oskaloosa High School. When addressing the students, he delivered a short, galvanizing message: "Just because you're a kid from Iowa, don't think you can't have big dreams."

It wasn't his first time impacting Iowa schools: In 2016 he surprised teachers in more than 100 Iowa schools by fulfilling funding every Donors Choose.org project open in the state on that day. DonorsChoose is an online crowdfunding platform teachers use to finance classroom needs. Kutcher said he wanted to let the students know that you can build "the next great thing," no matter where you're from.

"What I suggested to those kids is (that) they don't limit the scope of their pursuits to the things that see that already exist," he said.

Kutcher received the Pillar of Character award in part due to the launch of The Native Fund, which works primarily in disaster relief for Iowans. Kutcher said he could see the locally-based non-profit extend the model in place to other states and more causes.

First, he said, the organization must continue to grow capital. After that could come expansion into new regions and different causes.

“For us right now, it’s about raising a significant reserve capital fund for disaster relief,” Kutcher said. “And then really identifying for ourselves what constitutes disaster relief. Who actually needs disaster relief? And how do (we) build this so it’s not some wonky entitlement plan that grows and gets sloppy? ... This is all about helping people. It’s not about doing for people.”

The discussion wasn’t completely dominated by Kutcher’s character and philanthropic efforts; when asked about the Hawkeyes’ football prospects in the fall, he smiled and laughed.

“That’s a set-up,” he laughed. “I know a set-up when I see one.”

Notables intended for the “All Star Evening” featuring Kutcher and Kunis included Gov. Terry Branstad, Lt. Gov. Kim Reynolds, Super Bowl-winning former NFL tight end Dallas Clark, Drake University president Marty Martin and “The Bachelor” alum Chris Soules, a news release said. Past recipients for the award include Hayden Fry, Fred Hoiberg and Shawn Johnson.

DMR: Chinese media take interest in D.M.-based Jasper Winery

While Chinese President Xi Jinping’s first meeting with President Donald Trump has made headlines for the potential implications to trade and international relations, it has also sent reporters looking for off-the-beaten-path stories about the two nations.

That’s what recently led CGTN, China’s state-owned 24-hour English Language TV network, to a winery in Des Moines.

CGTN this week published a feature about Jasper Winery, highlighting the deep economic and political ties between Iowa and China and the growing interest from Hawkeye State companies to do business in the world’s most populous country.

Mason Groban, head winemaker at Jasper said the TV spot could help the small, Des Moines-based winery gain a larger foothold in China.

“If you understand the Chinese consumer, a story like this can be pretty significant,” he said.

The ties between Iowa and China, and specifically those between Gov. Terry Branstad and Xi, who have called each other “old friends,” are well-documented and widely celebrated.

In 1985, Xi visited Iowa on an agricultural research trip and met Branstad for the first time. The two leaders met again in 2011 during a gubernatorial trade mission to China.

In 2012, Xi returned to Iowa, for a farm tour, agricultural forum and state dinner, where he and Branstad toasted with wine from Jasper.

In December, Trump appointed Branstad ambassador to China, noting his deep ties to China and Xi. Branstad is yet to be confirmed.

CGTN toured Jasper’s vineyard and winery and then visited Muscatine, where Xi stayed as a young agricultural researcher.

The network also asked Iowa Republican Party Chair Jeff Kaufmann about the tension between Iowa’s dependence on exports to China and the state's support for Trump, who has promised to get tough on China, stoking fears of a potential trade war.

"Hopefully, we can find a policy that fits our interests but at the same time doesn't alienate any economic opportunities we have with China," Kauffman told CGTN.

China Daily, a stateowned English-language newspaper, also recently featured the state in a front-page story titled "Iowa hopes to ramp up trade with China."

Jasper Winery has been eyeing the Chinese market ever since the toast between Xi and Branstad. The winery hired The China Iowa Group, a West Des Moines-based trade consulting firm, to help clear regulatory and political hurdles needed to sell wine in China.

In 2015, Jasper made its first shipment, selling about 1,000 bottles in China.

"They don't have a lot of spare capacity, but we sold as much as we could get our hands on," said Li Zhao, founder of the China Iowa Group.

Chinese consumers have a taste for wines from Napa and other well-known grape-growing regions, but few Iowa wines have made it into the market, Li said.

Groban, the winemaker, hopes the CGTN feature, as well as Branstad's pending ambassadorship, open the door to more exports. "Initially, we were just getting our feet wet in the market," he said. "We would love to export more and we definitely have the capacity to ramp up production."

China Iowa Group and LS2group form partnership

The China Iowa Group, meanwhile, recently announced a partnership with LS2group, another Des Moines-area consulting firm. The two firms said they plan to work together to help U.S. companies sell products in China and facilitate the Chinese investment in the U.S.

LS2group will focus on government affairs, lobbying for policies, like those that would allow U.S. eggs, beef and other products to be imported to China. China Iowa Group will focus on finding markets for U.S. products in China and facilitating Chinese investment in the U.S. "It's a perfect relationship because our skill sets complement each other well," said Chuck Larson, a partner with LS2group, and a former state senator and U.S. Ambassador to Latvia.

DMR: COMING OUT CONSERVATIVE

Chadwick Moore was an openly gay socialist at the University of Iowa. Now he's a pariah among New York liberals

For Chadwick Moore, admitting he was a gay man to his "Fox News-watching, gun-toting Republican" dad in Iowa was a breeze compared to coming out as a conservative this year to his liberal friends in New York.

This is the 33-year-old University of Iowa alumnus whose Out Magazine profile of former Breitbart News provocateur and "Internet super villain" Milo Yiannopoulos inspired such outcry against Moore that it made him realize he had been living a lie: He now has more in common with the GOP.

He has been lambasted as a "fake conservative" and "attention whore" on social media. But he insists that his ideological shift was glacial and gradual, not sudden and opportunistic. Even in high school, Moore said, his senior AP English thesis was an argument against hate-crime legislation based on constitutional grounds. "I'm not, like, an establishment Republican," he said. "I'm still very much the person I've always been. And I've never registered as a Democrat for that reason."

His world was simpler and more neatly defined in 2001, when Moore was a high school graduate en route to his freshman year at the University of Iowa in Iowa City. He rode shotgun in his father's pickup truck.

On the verge of dropping off his son into a teeming throng of 29,000 restless young coeds, Moore's father, Gary, finally broached the topic.

Well, his dad said, your sister told me something about you.

Moore had an inkling of what was next: Oh yeah?

She told me that you're gay. Is that true?

Moore's stomach suddenly was in knots. He already had come out to his liberal mom a few years earlier, with no problem. His parents are divorced; she lives in Nashville. But he was a little more daunted by his dad: a macho, cigarchomping accountant, farmer and hunter in Oskaloosa.

Moore braced himself and answered: Yeah, it's true. Gary was quiet for a minute. Finally, he responded: Well, I guess I'm going to have to tell your boyfriends what I tell your sister's boyfriends.

Moore, still apprehensive, suddenly was intensely curious: What's that?

If you hurt my son

I'll... To complete that sentence no doubt would offend some of you. Suffice it to say that Gary, to quote Iowa Sen. Joni Ernst, was ready to "make 'em squeal" in defense of his son. Moore thanked his dad profusely for the sweetly protective sentiment.

That tender moment, if a bit raw, was a bridge between a father and son who, at the time, stood on opposite ends of the political spectrum.

Once ensconced at the U of I, Moore "became an immediate socialist," he said. He marched and protested his way through college while decked out in a garish wardrobe of thrift store castoffs.

All the while, the identity crisis that seethed within Moore was not hormonal. It was ideological.

"Some people experiment with their sexuality in college," he said. "I experimented with farleft politics."

'Alienated and frightened'

Moore now lives in another liberal enclave — the Williamsburg neighborhood of Brooklyn, New York. He has long since set aside his college dreams of becoming a fiction writer to establish himself as a legitimate working journalist.

His profile of Yiannopoulos was posted Sept.

21 in the publication catering to the LGBT community that serves an audience of a couple hundred thousand readers, on the eve of the bitter presidential election. The Breitbart editor had become a notorious figure thanks to his loud mouth and the rampant protests over his speeches on college campuses.

(This was before Yiannopoulos resigned from Breitbart in reaction to the firestorm spurred by his comments that appeared to condone pedophilia.) Moore faced instant backlash from friends and strangers alike.

His editors went so far as to preface the profile with a lengthy disclaimer to distance themselves from Yiannopoulos' views while simultaneously decrying "social media tribalism," where "the mere act of covering a contentious person can be misrepresented as an endorsement."

Moore kept getting the cold shoulder at his local gay bar. Good friends stopped calling.

He had become a pariah.

"The gay community has been my entire life since I was 15," he said.

"And I love the gay community. I love gay culture. I love drag queens.

I love gay bars. It's been my everything, and now all that's gone. So, yeah, it's sad. I'm mourning the loss of that."

Fed up with all the backlash, Moore in February wrote a manifesto of sorts in the New York Post: "I'm a gay New Yorker — and I'm coming out as conservative." He criticized President Donald Trump for his travel ban and cabinet choices. But mostly the article served as a kiss-off to the left wing that had counted him as one of their own. "All I had done was write a balanced story on an outspoken Trump supporter for a liberal, gay magazine," he said, "and now I was being attacked. I felt alienated and frightened." "It can seem like liberals are actually against free speech if it fails to conform with the way they think," he added.

"And I don't want to be a part of that club anymore."

'It seems like if you choose a side, you're ostracized'

Among those shocked by Moore's conservative coming out were two of his best friends and college classmates, a pair of women from Iowa. Kat Durst, raised in Ottumwa and Davenport, met Moore on their first day in the college dorm, not long after the pivotal scene in the pickup truck with his father. Today, she's a 34-year-old real estate agent. She and her husband, a physician, are raising two kids, 3 and 5, in Gainesville, Florida. Moore was a bridesmaid in her 2010 wedding.

As Moore tangles with critics on Twitter, Durst fills her Facebook feed with liberal commentary fully in keeping with her former undergraduate self. Durst can't take the leap from Democratic socialist to conservatism with her friend, but that doesn't matter to her.

"Even the things that I thought he thought in college... He doesn't owe that to me — to still think that — or owe it to anyone," she said. A third friend entered their circle at the U of I when Haley Niichel spotted Moore in a computer lab clad in a white T-shirt, tight jeans and blue bandanna. She grew up in Orange City, the conservative stronghold of northwest Iowa. This was the first gay person she was aware of meeting.

Moore "knows how to kind of step on a nerve," said Niichel, who now lives in West Des Moines. "He has that innate sense of going in for the kill.

But I think he makes liberals really think about what they're fighting for."

Her job as a mortgage underwriter, as Niichel puts it, is to "document logic." She wonders whether that helps make her more of a libertarian who falls on the political spectrum somewhere between her two friends.

"It seems like if you choose a side, you're ostracized by the other side," she said. "If you're not super liberal, you're a Republican in the liberals' eyes. If you're not actively going to all these protests — in an aggressive, gnashing way — it's not enough for them."

Are we building bridges or silos?

Moore's paternal family roots in Iowa predate the Civil War. He was born in Tennessee and raised in Illinois.

I wouldn't be surprised if he ends up writing his gay, Midwestern variation on J.D. Vance's "Hillbilly Elegy," a New York Times best-selling account of the author's roots in white workingclass Appalachia that has been embraced as a guide to the rural disaffection that helped Trump win the White House.

"I've always known these people," Moore said of his conservative Midwestern friends and family. "I've always liked these people." Moore's dad said that he and his son always have been close and have shared quality political discussions.

"I probably disagree with everybody on certain things," Gary said.

"Talk to me. I will listen.

But don't try to be overbearing and convince me that you're right unless you can really have some facts to prove it." Perhaps surprisingly, Moore in the recent election voted for Hillary Clinton — not Trump. He called it a "pre-emptive defense" against criticism from his liberal neighbors, when he still was worried about mending fences.

Moore's dilemma made me seek out one of Iowa's most prominent, stalwart gay activists: Donna Red Wing. She has fought for decades for gay rights. She's married to a woman. She recently stepped down as director of LGBTQ-advocacy group One Iowa and now directs the Eychaner Foundation that awards its own Matthew Shepard Scholarships.

Red Wing made headlines in recent years by partnering with somebody perceived as her nemesis: Bob Vander Plaats, whose Family Leader pushes the "family values" cause of evangelical conservatives and led the fight against same-sex marriage in Iowa. The unlikely pair turned their private coffee conversations into a public series of dialogues to make a point about the desperate need for civility in our polarized politics.

If not to the extent of Moore, both of them weathered criticism from their respective political camps for breaking bread with the "enemy." But Red Wing considers herself "old and cranky enough" that she's "tired of always making it one side or the other."

"Are we living in this community," she said, "or are we just building silos and living by ourselves?"

She added, "Our sexual orientation and gender identity really have little to do with where we are, in terms of being progressive and conservative."

Not that Red Wing is on the same page as Moore when it comes to Trump. He sees the president as opening up the GOP to new, more diverse voices. He sees the president's trolling of the media and his rivals as a necessary gambit to wrangle with entrenched forces.

"The most powerful institutions in our society are all toting the same narrative," he said, "and they're all left-leaning."

Red Wing, however, sees Trump promoting intolerance. She worries that his actions hampering, say, immigrants and Muslims all too easily may spread to the gay community, or already have through far-right forces grown more powerful in various courts and state and local offices.

I don't have easy answers about when to stand up and shout in protest versus when to sit quietly and talk, extending an olive branch.

Both civility and protest, if we can apply them at the proper times, are crucial to our democracy. I do know that Moore shouldn't have been spurned for writing his original profile of Yiannopoulos when he was simply doing his job as a journalist. Because Red Wing's words echo in my head: Are we living in this community, or are we just building silos and living by ourselves?

As Gary put it, "I don't know if there's ever going to be an answer" to our polarized politics.

"All I can say is I hope people will listen."

If nothing else, Moore as an outed conservative has a lot more to discuss politically with his dad and his other Republican relatives in Iowa. "If Trump does a good job," he said, "I'll be very excited to vote for him in four years." That may not be a rhetorical bomb on par with Yiannopoulos.

But it still won't play very well in Brooklyn.

DMR Editorial: State and federal forfeiture reforms fall short

Civil libertarians and small-government conservatives agree: The government should not be allowed to seize the assets of law-abiding citizens.

Yet, for the past 30 years, state and federal officials have done exactly that, wrapping the practice in the bulletproof vest of "law enforcement." The officials argue that they are keeping our streets safe by laying claim to the cash, cars and real estate belonging to individuals whose only "crime," assuming one was even committed, was a minor traffic offense or drug-possession rap. In 2013, two California men driving home after a gambling tournament in Illinois had their $100,000 bankroll seized after an Iowa police officer pulled them over for failing to signal a lane change on Interstate 80 in Poweshiek County. Authorities eventually gave back $90,000 of the money, but after the men sued, the state was forced to pay the men an additional $60,000 just to settle their case.

Such abuses are numerous and well-documented, but state and federal lawmakers have been slow to enact reforms for fear of being perceived as soft on crime. But changes are in the works.

Under a bill approved late last month by the Iowa Senate, prosecutors would have to convict a suspected offender of illegal activity before seizing any property that's valued at less than $5,000, and that property will have to be linked to the charged criminal activity.

The intent is to keep the police from shaking clean the pockets of motorists. You might not think such a law would be necessary, but it is.

Last year, there were 822 cases of cash forfeiture made in Iowa under state law, for a total of $2.6 million. Individually, none of these cases involved more than $15,000, and only eight cases involved assets worth $5,000 to $15,000.

The average value of a cash forfeiture was just $3,217. So we're not talking about cartel-caliber drug kingpins here.

In fact, the police are only too happy to seize sofa-cushion money. No amount of money seems too small. In one 2015 case, Iowa authorities seized $13 from an individual and claimed it as their own. That's one reason why the bill approved by the Senate zeroes in on amounts of less than $5,000. But of course the argument could be made that this limit preserves the profit motive for police and prosecutors to pursue high-dollar assets.

Fortunately, the Senate bill, which has to be approved by the House, would also raise the standard of proof in forfeiture cases so police and prosecutors would have to present “clear and convincing evidence” that the assets are tied to criminal activity. There’s also a proportionality test that says the assets seized cannot be “grossly disproportionate to the severity of the offense,” which should help ensure that Iowa police aren’t seizing six-figure sums from people who have been convicted of only minor offenses.

The legislation also requires law enforcement agencies to maintain certain records related to asset forfeiture, so lawmakers — and the public — will know if the abuses are continuing.

Even so, this bill is far from perfect. It does nothing to redirect assets away from the police and prosecutors who initiate property seizures, so they can continue to use the process not to enhance public safety but to enhance their own budgets. The bill also says that while police agencies will be required to keep detailed, publicly accessible records of property seizures, these “records shall not identify or enable identification of the individual officer who seized any item of property.” That provision would make it impossible to determine whether any abuses can be traced to one rogue law enforcement officer.

Even if the Senate bill becomes law, it will do nothing to address the larger problem of civil forfeitures initiated by federal authorities. On March 29, the inspector general of the U.S. Department of Justice released a report that details the manner in which the agency has failed to evaluate its own forfeiture data to determine the extent to which these property seizures benefit law enforcement and threaten civil liberties.

The report makes a series of recommendations for improvement, all of which are long overdue. The most urgent is the call to ensure that the DOJ’s state and local task-force officers are adequately trained on federal forfeiture laws.

A newly introduced, GOP-sponsored bill in the U.S. Senate, dubbed the Fifth Amendment Integrity Restoration Act, would help end some of the abuses. It would shift the burden of proof in forfeiture cases to the government; it would provide for indigent defense in all such cases; and it would eliminate the profit motive altogether by steering the proceeds away from police agencies and into the U.S. Treasury. It’s almost identical to a bill first proposed in 2014, but now, at least, it is being given serious consideration by Congress.

These state and federal initiatives represent progress, but they also underscore the fact that when it comes to civil forfeiture, much work remains to be done.

DMR: Did city councilman’s opposition to a pork plant lead to suicide?

The brief life and premature death of a dynamic Iowa politician provokes hard questions

“(One) can easily wreck in a day or two what builders have taken years to do.”

— verse from a poem Mason City Mayor Eric Bookmeyer sent to City Councilman Alex Kuhn

“ There won’t be any bullies to burden your way.

No words that cut like a knife at the end of the day.”

— verse from a poem to Alex Kuhn from his father, Mark, after his son’s death

MASON CITY, Ia. — An overflow crowd turned out for a City Council meeting last May 3 in anticipation of a final vote for construction of a $240 million, 600,000-square-foot pork-processing plant on Mason City’s southwest side. Processing up to 10,000 pigs a day, it would be the state’s second- largest of its kind.

State and local officials stood ready to welcome it with generous subsidies. Realtor Dick Mathes addressed the council in favor, citing job losses and Prestage Foods' promise to add up to 2,000 jobs in four years. But the 14 supporters there to speak were outnumbered by 47 opponents, who voiced concern over the plant's potential impact on health, the environment and the community, especially if a concentration of hog confinements followed.

One young man, Dylan Daniels, handed the council a petition he said had nearly 1,000 signatures opposing the plant. "The council is still ignoring the way the majority of citizens feel," he said.

He spoke prematurely. It turned out to be a fateful night for Prestage and its proponents, who had considered passage a done deal: The vote tied at 3-3, effectively killing the proposal.

It was also, some believe, a fateful night for a popular 34-year-old at-large city councilman named Alex Kuhn, who had been heavily courted by proponents and opponents. After much research and questioning, Kuhn was not convinced that the city was getting a good deal for its investment. Unbeknownst to him and everyone else, his hesitation had paved the way for the other two "no" votes.

Two months later, Kuhn shot and killed himself, after his friends and family say he was pressured and blamed for the outcome. Once heralded by people from both parties as destined to go far in politics, praised for his compassion and commitment to the underrepresented as well as to economic development, Kuhn now found himself an outcast among the city's powerful. He became a casualty of the divisive, high-pressured, back-biting political environment.

His father, Mark Kuhn, is blunt: "Alex was being bullied."

A promising future

With his youthful good looks, intelligence, political pedigree and knack for getting along with everyone, Alex Kuhn was often likened to a young John Kennedy. He grew up around both politics and farming, having clerked for his father, a former Democratic state representative now on the Floyd County Board of Supervisors, and helped on the family's 850-acre farm in Charles City, southeast of Mason City. After graduating from high school there in 2000 and Iowa State University in 2004, he went to Houston, Texas, to student-teach. But when his father was injured the following year in a farming accident, Alex returned to help.

"He'd get up early in the morning and load corn all day," says his mother, Denise Kuhn. "At night he would do exercises with his dad. He took him to physical therapy."

In 2006, Alex went to work for U.S. Sen. Tom Harkin, directing his mobile office from Des Moines. He moved in 2008 to Mason City, where his ex-wife's family lived, where he taught and did community organizing for United Way. He got elected to the Mason City City Council in 2011. Although a Democrat, he had support from many Republicans, says a Republican friend, Todd Blodgett. "His purpose was to defend people who couldn't defend themselves."

Blodgett introduced me to a man of modest means named Jim Burgess, who previously lived in a rental home where he had awoken daily to the sounds of mice nibbling his food. The landlord's response, Burgess says, was to advise him to get cheese from the local food bank and put it out for the mice. Then Kuhn came by, saw the situation and not only worked to resolve it but also sponsored an ordinance targeting problem landlords, Burgess said.

Nearly all of the 20 people I interviewed said Kuhn was the last person they'd expect to take his own life. But his parents and others who spoke to him before his death also noted his deep distress at the furor that erupted around him after the Prestage Foods deal collapsed.

Mark Kuhn is driven to speak because of a Dec. 18, 2016, front-page story in the Mason City Globe-Gazette, which attributed Alex's suicide to an ongoing struggle with depression. True, Alex had dealt with the fallout from a divorce and co-parenting his two young sons. He had at times seen a therapist and taken anxiety medication, but had no history of depression, his parents say. They say despite their disclosures to the newspaper about Alex being taunted and blamed for his vote, the writer chose to build a narrative around depression, enabling those who had hurt Alex to turn his suffering back on him. Now Mark Kuhn wants to give Alex a voice.

The failure of the Prestage deal inflamed politicians, agribusinesses, local business boosters and government economic development folks, Mark Kuhn says. But it was the wrath of those Alex considered his friends, particularly the mayor, that really hurt him.

Blodgett agrees, saying, "The mayor bullied Alex relentlessly."

"I certainly reject the accusation," responded Mayor Eric Bookmeyer. "Did we have frank conversations? Sure." But "I know that Alex had a lot of other stuff going on in his life. I don't believe under any circumstances that it was just one thing."

Debate divides the town

The Prestage plant was the biggest economic development prospect Mason City residents can remember. It had the vocal support and lobbying of the governor, the mayor and state and local economic development officials.

But as with anything involving hogs in Iowa, the proposal sparked controversy.

"If this processing plant is so good, why not put it in West Des Moines?" bristled state Rep. Sharon Steckman, a Democrat who represents Mason City, in an interview with me last May.

Bookmeyer, in an interview, called farming "our lifeblood," and said he saw an opportunity to help the city grow and use water and sewer systems that taxpayers were already paying for.

Mark Kuhn points out that farming was Alex's lifeblood, too. Both father and son became embroiled in the debate over Big Pork during their political careers. Mark Kuhn was in the Legislature in the 1990s when Gov. Terry Branstad and the Republican majority took actions to prevent neighbors of hog confinements from suing for nuisance and stripped localities of a final say on where confinements were placed. Kuhn was also in the Legislature in 2001 under Democratic Gov. Tom Vilsack, when lawmakers commissioned a study of proposed air pollution rules, which 27 state university scientists spent two years studying and signing off on. Yet repeatedly, in 2003 and 2008 (then under Gov. Chet Culver), the rules were voided by a legislative majority and sent back for further study to satisfy lobbyists, Kuhn says.

Prestage's interest in Mason City first became known to the mayor when state economic development officials contacted Chad Shreck, who heads the North Iowa Corridor Economic Development, on Dec. 17, 2015. Prestage officials arrived the next day. The mayor was excited. "This was not your everyday, average project," Bookmeyer said.

But the mayor doesn't get to vote. So after meeting company representatives, he called council members in a few at a time to rally them in favor, without revealing Prestage's name. Kuhn spotted it in February in the city manager's folder. As mayor pro tem, Kuhn was the first to be called in, along with Councilman Travis Hickey, who is also on the North Iowa Corridor board.

In February, the city's planning and zoning commission rezoned the area from farming to heavy industrial. Secrecy surrounding the move angered some residents, who later accused the council of flouting democracy and ramming the plant through without an independent environmental impact study.

Branstad and Prestage leaders went to Mason City in March to announce the plan, and the Iowa Economic Development Board voted to issue $34 million in general obligation bonds to support it. After a six-hour meeting April 5, the council voted unanimously to set the terms for a development agreement. But Kuhn had reservations about them. He didn't necessarily oppose Prestage, people close to him say, but didn't think the city should give it a 50 percent tax abatement. And he was wary of the city offering $15.5 million in tax-increment financing. Kuhn cited reports showing a 50 percent turnover in meat processing. He wanted to require a $13-per-hour minimum wage, along with a 2.5-mile buffer zone preventing hog confinements around Mason City and Clear Lake.

"I didn't feel it was the role of local government to put that stuff in," Bookmeyer says, but he says he and city staff worked to accommodate Kuhn's concerns. Prestage committed $1.4 million to Mason City schools over 10 years to help accommodate the expected influx of employees' children, including English-language learners.

On April 21, after a seven-hour meeting, Kuhn broke ranks with the five other council members to vote no on the agreement, noting Prestage had lowered its estimate of the number of hires to 1,772, split in two phases. He brought up odors from rendering, the cost of improvements to the water utility and the fact that Prestage hadn't promised to hire local farmers for feeding operations. And in reference to the hourly wages, he asked, "Does the industry deserve incentives for these kind of wages? Why do we have to give $15.5 million to get it? I'm not going to vote for a development agreement at any cost." After the meeting, a local pork producer accosted Kuhn, accusing him of putting his career before the community, Mark Kuhn said.

On the day of the final vote, May 3, it was learned that Prestage's planned contribution to the schools fell short of meeting needs. Just before casting their votes, two other council members, John Lee and Bill Schickel, announced they were voting no. Everyone was shocked when the proposal failed, including Kuhn, several people say. Schreck says Kuhn had told him, "'There are five votes and you don't need me.'" Gary Schmit, Kuhn's boss at Henkel Construction, said, "He was hoping they would come back with answers."

Reaction spreads beyond Mason City

Opponents celebrated, but the governor told a press conference the City Council made a mistake. Ron Prestage, a principal in the company, blamed racism, and City Councilwoman Janet Solberg agreed. Iowa Economic Development Authority Director Debi Durham warned that Mason City would now be less attractive to site selectors.

Iowa Pork Producers Association CEO Pat McGonegle called it "a vote against agriculture" in the May 2016 Iowa Pork Producer newsletter. In the same issue, Kirk Leeds, CEO of the Iowa Soybean Association, declared that when leadership was needed, "a few elected officials ... apparently caved to a group of activists opposed to livestock production and Iowa agriculture."

The Globe-Gazette, which had editorially supported the project, lamented the "negative light" cast on the community and asked whether new information would change Kuhn's mind.

And Rick Mathes, a local Realtor with his father, Dick, and a Prestage booster on the city's planning and zoning commission, sent out a mass email declaring, "Prestage Blindsided." He organized a petition drive for a revote, and according to Mark Kuhn, would turn up at Alex's office to show him the names of important people who had signed it.

Mathes has since moved to Michigan, after concluding Mason City's future is bleak. He acknowledged lobbying Kuhn in weekly visits but called the idea of harassment "ludicrous."

The local chamber of commerce hosted a closed-door meeting June 2 hoping to resurrect the deal. Schickel was said to be reconsidering his vote, but Kuhn remained unsatisfied with the terms, according to his friend Jodi Draper and others. "Alex wasn't against Prestage. He was against the process," she said.

On June 2, Prestage announced it was no longer interested in Mason City. In a written statement, it blamed misinformation for the vote.

Still, even after Prestage pulled out, Kuhn approached Schreck, the economic development director, wondering if there was a chance of continued negotiations. But Schreck said the company felt there was “too much animosity” toward it.

“He was made to feel he let people down,” says Denise Kuhn, Alex’s mother.

It’s unclear whether the pressures Kuhn felt included fears the vote would affect his job at Henkel Construction. Schmit says Henkel probably was too small to have a role in the Prestage project, but Bookmeyer says the company might have benefited from side contracts. While Blodgett and others say Kuhn did fear for his job, Schmit insists: “There was no pressure at all on Alex from me.”

A friendship strained

Alex Kuhn and the mayor had been so close, Bookmeyer says, that Kuhn had the code to his garage door, and stopped by regularly for a craft beer and a chat. “We were like brothers.”

Mark Kuhn says his son had received frequent emails and text messages from the mayor’s private email address. But “after the first no vote, he shunned Alex,” Kuhn said. “Alex said, ‘He shut me out.’ “ “We didn’t communicate much,” Bookmeyer acknowledged in an interview in February 2017. “He certainly knew I was disappointed.” On May 11, Alex Kuhn got a call from the mayor that lasted 51 minutes. Mark Kuhn learned that from getting Alex’s cellphone records after his death. The next day, Bookmeyer sent Alex an email from a private account that Mark later found, under the subject line, “So...?” It said: “AK, It is time to find out if you can lead or not.” That was followed by a poem, “A Builder or a Wrecker?” containing the lines, “I can easily wreck in a day or two what builders have taken years to do.” It referred to a wrecker “who walks to town, content with the labor of tearing down.”

Asked about that, Bookmeyer said, “The point was, let’s not lend voice to folks who don’t have our interests in mind.”

His message to Kuhn went on: “One ill-timed, politically expedient vote and commentary set off an amazing set of events. We talked about the repercussions yesterday but maybe you should read it for yourself.”

Attached was an email from California developer Philip Chodur to City Administrator Brent Trout. Chodur was planning to develop a hotel as part of a downtown redevelopment project, but claimed the failed Prestage plan would make it harder to get financing and as a result, he was scrapping plans to add a floor.

However, even Councilman Hickey, who was at odds with Kuhn over Prestage, believes Chodur was using Prestage as an excuse for his failure to get financing.

Family and friends say in the last weeks of his life, Kuhn’s mood grew darker and he rarely went out. He told his father he wasn’t attending City Council meetings in person to avoid seeing Bookmeyer and Hickey. He also stayed away from Democratic functions, says John Stone, the Cerro Gordo County Democratic Party chairman. Kuhn told Stone the mayor was very mad at him.

“Alex wanted to be friends with everyone and help everyone,” Stone said. “I would have attacked back. A lot of people would have.”

Tornquist was Kuhn saying he was grateful that Hy-Vee delivered groceries because he didn't want to be out in public running into people. "That was so diametrically opposite to who he was."

"For one and a half hours, he just unloaded," Tornquist said. "...He said he was catching unbelievable heat and pressure from both Eric (the mayor) and from Travis Hickey."

On July 5, Prestage announced it was going to locate outside Eagle Grove. The Mason City council met that night, with Kuhn participating by phone. Hickey singled him out in remarks when the council voted unanimously to grant Chodur an extension on the downtown hotel project. Noting Kuhn had been the council member most in contact with Chodur, he suggested a conflict of interest since Alex's employer, Henkel Construction, could get a contract for part of the downtown development project.

Blodgett last saw Kuhn 10 or 12 days before his July 15 death. He said during the last two months of his life, Alex made half a dozen stops at the Outing Club, a posh, members-only club near Clear Lake partly owned by Blodgett's family and frequented by Republicans. On the last two visits, he was more distraught than Blodgett had ever seen him.

"He said he was having a hard time accepting, and dealing with ... the way some people were showing such malice toward him," Blodgett said. "He said his life wasn't fun and he found it hard to get up in the mornings."

A week before Kuhn's death, Jodi Draper, who had made an unsuccessful run for city council in 2013, said Kuhn called her and asked if she had considered running again, for the at-large seat. "I said, 'Nobody's going to beat you.'" Now she believes he was already planning to end his life.

"The guilt I feel from that couldn't possibly be put into words," she said choking up. "You wish you could turn back time."

Both Tornquist and Draper had had their own run-ins with the mayor. Draper said she campaigned on giving voice to city employees, to whom she claimed Bookmeyer "was sometimes very mean and rude." At least one city employee filed a hostile work environment complaint against Bookmeyer, the Globe-Gazette reported in 2010. And North Iowa Today reported in 2014 that a lawsuit against the mayor and city council by Lionel Foster, the former director of the city's Human Rights agency, resulted in a $240,000 settlement. Foster alleged race and age discrimination and retaliation for his civil rights investigations. One of his claims was that Bookmeyer had refused to reappoint three of his commissioners, telling one, a woman, that he wanted younger commissioners with fresher perspectives.

Tornquist said he too felt pushed "to the brink" in his council position, and like Kuhn had thoughts of ending his own life. He said on one occasion, Bookmeyer put him on a committee to look at the future of the city sanitation department, and Tornquist felt he "stacked the deck to get the outcome he wanted," to keep the budget down. Then he learned the press and public were excluded. After more incidents, he left for Indianapolis.

"My wife and I were trapped in our own house. We couldn't go out to dinner," said Tornquist, about having to face constituents after being associated with such tactics.

"I think of Alex every day," said Tornquist. "How could I have not seen it? But nobody saw it in me."

Bookmeyer has his defenders. Council member John Lee was one of the three to change his mind at the last minute and vote against Prestage because of the funding shortfall with the schools. But he says, "The mayor never put undue pressure on me or called to say, 'What the hell are you doing?'" Hickey, who says he, like Bookmeyer, felt "let down" by the vote against Prestage, observed, "As a part-time mayor, Eric takes his role very seriously and does a very good job lobbying folks to go in whatever direction he thinks would be good for the community."

Kuhn's last days

On July 12, Mark Kuhn attended Alex's 11-year-old son's Little League game and sat with Alex on the bleachers. "I could tell there was really something wrong," he said of Alex's withdrawn mood. "He believed it was all his fault that the community was so divided. When I told him 'No way, most people in Mason City think you are a hero for standing up for what you believe is a bad deal,' Alex replied, " 'That's not what I hear from some people in the business community I work with.' " The Kuhns later learned from his calendar that Alex had plans to see his counselor on Thursday, July 14, (the counselor declined to answer my calls) and also to meet Hickey. "He woke up on the 14th and the very first thing he did was a Google search on conflict of interest legislation," said Mark Kuhn, referring to the other councilman's accusations.

Hickey says Kuhn showed up unexpectedly at his office that day. There had been tension between them, Hickey acknowledged. "We were on opposite sides. I was frustrated with his vote."

During a previous lunch meeting, Kuhn had expressed dismay at Hickey's allegation but neither mind was changed, Hickey said. But calling Kuhn "one of the nicest guys you'd ever want to meet," he said Alex wasn't angry.

On that day Alex also called his employer to say he wouldn't be attending a scheduled pontoon boat ride with the company that evening, according to a cell phone log of Alex's shared with me by his father. Instead, he stopped by his parent's farm and stayed for dinner, seeming OK but revealing little.

He left early, saying he'd see them the next day. They had weekend plans with his two sons.

At 7:12 p.m. he tried to call the mayor, whom he had also messaged late that morning, according to the phone records. The log didn't show what the text said. Asked about that, Bookmeyer emailed me, "I don't believe we spoke, but I sure wish we would have, to have known where he was in his mind." He said he had last seen Alex in his office a number of days earlier. "He wanted to know how I was," Bookmeyer said. "I told him I need time."

Alex then exchanged some text messages with a woman he had dated. She declined to talk to me, but the Kuhns, who are in touch with her, say she had no prior indication of his plans. Then he repeatedly watched a short compilation of clips from the TV series, "Breaking Bad" that had been posted on YouTube. Called "Jesse Pinkman: Civilian," it involved some emotional encounters between a remorseful young man, Pinkman, and the former chemistry professor he had teamed up with to cook meth, Walter White. At the end, Pinkman held a gun to White's face, and White held a gun to his own forehead, urging Pinkman to kill him. A shot was fired.

Earlier, Pinkman called himself "the bad guy," and told White, "Since I met you, everything I've ever cared about is gone. ... I have never been more alone!"

On July 15, Henkel officials showed up at the Kuhn farm wondering where Alex was, since he hadn't turned up for a presentation related to a hospital expansion project. Denise Kuhn drove over to his place, where Henkel CEO Schmit and another employee also showed up. She told them he wasn't there, but one of them went into Alex's room, she said. After picking up Alex's sons, his mother took a different route home, checking the ditches in case he'd had a car accident.

Back home, she asked Mark to check their guns. He discovered a .22-caliber pistol missing. They called police.

It was around noon when the sheriff and a deputy arrived to say they had found Alex's car and body at the end of a dead-end road near a recreation area north of Marble Rock, which is about halfway between their two homes. An autopsy revealed he died from a bullet fired from the gun taken from his parents' cabinet. There were no drugs or alcohol in his system. He didn't leave a note, and was wearing the same clothes they had last seen him in, leading the Kuhns to believe he never went home the night

“We can all say there were times he was pretty upset and down about some things,” said Denise Kuhn. “But I never, ever could have imagined this.”

The aftermath

Former Sen. Harkin gave a eulogy at the funeral. Former state Sen. Jack Hatch, who served alongside Mark Kuhn in the Legislature, dedicated his new book “No Surrender” in part to Alex, saying he showed courage with his vote. “Not everyone agreed with Alex’s principled stand, and he took the brunt of public and private scrutiny,” it reads. “He became depressed and was unable to reconcile the differences.”

At the Kuhns’ behest, Blodgett notified the mayor that he would not be welcome at Alex’s funeral. But Bookmeyer said he attended anyway.

Bookmeyer says he was devastated by Kuhn’s death. Asked if he believed Kuhn was bullied, he referred to Prestage opponents, saying, “We were all bullied.”

Max Weaver, a former Mason City council member, says: “Alex was on the brink. Bookmeyer pushed him over.”

In January, Bookmeyer announced he won’t seek re-election in November. He called 2016 “rough,” and noted Alex Kuhn’s contributions to moving the city forward. Asked why he wasn’t running, Bookmeyer told me he had no further political ambitions, and was ready for a new career. He said Alex knew that was his intent.

Postscript

It would be irresponsible to blame others for someone’s suicide without hearing a cause in the deceased person’s own words. But as Draper, who works in the mental health field, points out, there can be triggers in the same way that smoking can contribute to the risk of cancer.

Everyone has different triggers, and everyone has periods of particular susceptibility to being demeaned, shunned or blamed. We live in an era when gossip, lies and rumors, spread through social media, can swiftly destroy reputations, careers and relationships. Schools and communities are finally focusing on the effects of such bullying on children. But adults are not immune.

People who go into public service to make a difference sometimes find themselves confronting powerful vested interests, and then back away from a fight. Alex Kuhn neither backed away nor wanted a fight. He wanted to do right by everyone: his constituents, his family, his job, colleagues and friends. One of the tragedies of politics is how limited a space there is for that — and how devastating it can be to an idealistic leader to find out.

“He said he was having a hard time accepting, and dealing with ... the way some people were showing such malice toward him. He said his life wasn’t fun and he found it hard to get up in the mornings.”

TODD BLODGETT, A FRIEND OF ALEX KUHN

DMR Iowa View: On abortion, liberals cite science fiction

By: Joel Kurtinitis

The growing tension between moral relativism and scientific absolutism has produced two related effects on the left: a growing rift between liberal politics and the scientific community, and the insecure, blustery hollering of the word “science” by progressives — as if repeating it three times in a mirror will summon Bill Nye in a lab coat to validate their worldview.

There’s laughable irony in liberal attempts to squeeze science into the frock of their relativistic priesthood: Science — real science — is consummately objective. It doesn’t care about your feelings, your politics, your identity, or your faith. Science is observable, testable, repeatable, falsifiable.

Even casual political observers will note that leftists rarely seek — or present — specific evidence to back their claims anymore. Rather, their continual allusion to “science” is only an appeal to authority, whether applied to climate change, vaccines, GMOs or abortion.

Such appeals abound in abortion defense pieces like the March 31 column “Myths like life at conception don’t belong in the law.”

In it, Rekha Basu opines that a prolife legislator “is free to believe whatever she wants as a matter of personal faith. But that doesn’t justify the distortion of scientific fact or the imposition of religious beliefs on the public.”

But life at conception isn’t rooted in abstract notions like faith or values — it’s rooted in basic, high-school biology.

It’s amazing that, after decades of pushing sex ed in classrooms across America, liberals still can’t figure out what pregnancy is.

The article quotes Richard J. Paulson of the American Society for Reproductive Medicine: “Life is a continuum,” Paulson wrote. “The egg cell is alive, and it has the potential to become a zygote (a single-celled embryo)” if fertilized by sperm. The resulting cell is also alive, but “from a biological perspective, no new life has been created, because it is nearly identical to the egg cell.”

There’s some good science in the above statement, but there’s also a lot of nakedly unscientific editorializing and deliberate misdirection.

Is life a continuum? In Mufasa’s Circle of Life sense, sure.

In any meaningful scientific sense, absolutely not.

We are conceived, we grow, we are born, we live, we die. Our physical existence has a definite beginning and end.

Science.

Your body can be distinguished from another person’s body by a unique genetic marker known to us as DNA. Sperm cells and egg cells contain only the respective parent’s DNA. Once a zygote is formed, a new organism (read: new life) with DNA distinct from both parents is present within hours of conception. If DNA can convict a murderer for a crime 50 years ago, it should be ample evidence of a new human life in the womb.

Because science.

This new entity is the earliest stage of human life. Prior to this, all cells involved were parts of the parent. A new genetic signature means a new, developing, genetically human organism, whether it looks “nearly identical to the egg cell” or not.

More science. Anyone — scientist or not — attempting to add ambiguity to this simplest of biological truths has an agenda.

Like maybe, I don't know, making money on reproductive tech, or raking in $127 million in "family planning" profits.

Here's another biological reality: Abortion doesn't "terminate a pregnancy" or "remove the product of conception." It kills developing human beings. That's why Planned Parenthood workers caught in the Center for Medical Progress' 2015 sting operation were shown sorting through refrigerated pans of tiny human arms and legs, discussing organ value.

If you're going to advocate for something so brutal, at least be honest about it and don't hide behind terms like "women's health" or "reproductive rights."

The political left is losing their war on science, because they aren't interested in genuine discovery or progress, only in using it as a cloak to push their own religion — yes, secular humanism is a religion— on those of us who believe every human being is endowed by our creator with an inalienable right to life.

DMR: Grassley pledges to preserve filibuster for legislation

Sen. Chuck Grassley said he doesn't expect any fallout for the future of the U.S. Supreme Court from Senate Republicans' decision to use the "nuclear option."

"It isn't going to change anything whatsoever, because for the first time in the 228-year history of our country, there's a partisan filibuster of a Supreme Court judge. So, this is the first time in 228 years, so if we aren't going to do it anymore, it's not going to be any different than it's been for those 228 years," he said in an interview Thursday.

Got that? In essence, Grassley's saying one bad apple don't spoil the whole bunch, girl.

(But if he actually said that, he'd correct the grammar and credit the Osmond Brothers.

And he wouldn't call me "girl." He's no dummy.) I watched on C-SPAN as history was being made, or unmade, depending on your perspective. Republicans and Democrats alike got up and recited the details of decades-old partisan grudges like a mournful Greek chorus. This isn't one bad apple. The whole barrel is rotten.

I tend to agree with Grassley that this wasn't about Justice Neil Gorsuch, not really.

He's conservative, to be sure.

But Democrats' best efforts to paint him as a corporate shill or heartless ideologue fell flat, in my estimation. He's qualified to serve and his addition to the court does not obviously change the balance that existed before last year's death of Justice Antonin Scalia.

Mostly, this was about Republicans' decision last year to make history by refusing to bring up President Barack Obama's nomination of Judge Merrick Garland. They blamed that on Democrats by inventing the so-called "Biden rule" that never actually delayed any justice's confirmation. It was indeed deplorable, but it worked and is now the standard.

It's all about power and the Republicans have it. So you might think it would follow that Republicans like Grassley don't fear partisan fallout on issues like tax reform or infrastructure because they can also eliminate the filibuster on legislation.

Grassley says no. He said Thursday he just signed a letter being circulated by Sen.

Susan Collins, R-Maine, saying he wouldn't vote to change the 60-vote rule for legislation.

"Because the only significant difference between the House and Senate is that in the House of Representatives, the minority has no rights. As long as the majority sticks together, they can run roughshod over minorities," Grassley said.

Guess he knows from experience what that looks like.

He said it's only happened twice during his 40 years in office that one party has held 60 seats. "If you want minorities to have any voice whatsoever in the legislative process, the only place that can be done is in the United States Senate," he said.

The real power in the nuclear option is the threat of mutually assured destruction. Both parties can imagine they'll eventually be in the minority and will have to live with whatever rules they impose while in the majority.

When it comes to judicial appointments, though, the bombs have already fallen enough times to make the threat seem weak. When a president campaigns on a list of names of potential Supreme Court nominees, as Trump did, there's no expectation of bipartisan support.

Presidents and senators say they want an independent judiciary, but that's true only if it means the courts will reliably support their partisan agenda. Meanwhile, the public's confidence in the courts continues to erode. This is the real danger of nuclear fallout. The damage lasts for generations.

Grassley says one remedy to that is his legislation to allow cameras in the Supreme Court. "I think TV in the courtrooms would help. Let the public know more about how it works," he said.

The Iowa Supreme Court started holding oral arguments on the road so people across the state could attend and learn more about how the court works, Grassley noted.

It's a good idea for many reasons. For one thing, voters might realize they need to hold their legislators accountable for writing clear, unambiguous laws. The old saying "garbage in, garbage out" may have been coined to describe the effect of bad data on computer programming, but it applies to our legal system. Poorly written laws lead to poor judicial rulings.

But real-life court is nothing like the dramas on TV. People other than hardcore court watchers will soon tune out. Video clips taken out of context may show up on the internet and, you guessed it, political campaigns. TV is not a cure for getting politics out of the courtroom.

Meanwhile, we don't know how long the tattered remnants of the filibuster will stand. I'm all for bipartisan cooperation, but there's something to be said for forcing the majority party to be entirely accountable for its action — or inaction.

Material witness on suicide watch after surrender in Missouri

A Bondurant man considered a material witness in the killing of his parents and sister allegedly told police, "I killed three people last night" as he turned himself in, said Neosho, Mo., Police Chief David Kennedy. Chase Marcus Nicholson, 20, approached Wal-Mart employees in the small southwest Missouri town about 12 hours after his family members were found dead in their Bondurant home. Kennedy said Nicholson allegedly told the Wal-Mart employees the same thing he told police.

Polk County authorities were expected to arrive in Neosho late Friday to question Nicholson in connection to the killing of his parents, Mark Alan Nicholson, 58, and Charla Lee Nicholson, 56, and his sister Tawni Alexis Nicholson, 24. They were found dead in the family home in the 9700 block of Northeast 88th Street, said Lt. Rich Blaylock, spokesman with the Polk County Sheriff's Office.

Chase and Tawni's cousin Seth Nicholson, 28, of Des Moines, said Tawni was at the house to help plan her brother's 21st birthday party.

Nicholson turned himself in at about 10 a.m. Friday in Neosho, a town of 12,000 people about a 5 1/2-hour drive from Bondurant. He is in custody in the Newton County, Missouri, jail and was on suicide watch, Kennedy said.

Seth Nicholson, one of Chase's cousins, said Friday that Chase Nicholson had been treated for mental illness for many years.

"His entire life has been a giant adjustment," he said. It was 9:30 p.m. Thursday when Polk County deputies went to the Nicholsons' home to conduct a welfare check, which may have been prompted by a friend who had spoken to Chase Nicholson. Investigators cleared the scene late Friday morning. Blaylock declined to say how the victims were killed. The Nicholsons were remembered fondly by neighbors and co-workers.

Charla Nicholson had been a teacher at Des Moines Public Schools since 1986, the school district confirmed. She worked with Goodrell Middle School students until the fall of 1999, when she moved over to Cattell Elementary. Cattell Principal Tiona Sandbulte said Charla was a dedicated teacher who loved her students. She most recently worked with children in kindergarten and first grade as an intervention teacher, who met with students who needed extra support with reading or math. She also helped monitor lunch time.

"The kids looked forward to her coming in," Sandbulte said, adding that Charla would often joke with students. "She just sparkled. She's just so great with the kids."

Charla was adored by co-workers and was always willing to help her colleagues when needed, Sandbulte said.

The school district is making counselors available to help students and staff cope with Charla's death, Sandbulte said. Cattell also planned to email students' families.

Charla's daughter, Tawni, was just starting her career at an area insurance company after graduating from Iowa State University in August, a neighbor said.

She received a bachelor's degree in business with a major in marketing, said university spokeswoman Annette Hacker.

Cadets' explicit photos cause annual dinner to be canceled

RYAN J. FOLEY

ASSOCIATED PRESS

The commander of a military training program at Iowa State University canceled an annual formal dinner Friday after news broke that explicit photographs of some male cadets had been posted on Facebook.

Capt. Scott Curtis sent an email to the Naval Reserve Officer Training Corps saying he was calling off Saturday's "Dining In" event in light of publicity about the incident, which a Navy spokesman said involved seven male cadets who were "willing participants" in inappropriate behavior around campus and online.

Curtis said the decision was unfortunate, and he warned students would likely not be refunded the full cost of tickets they bought for the dinner for upperclassmen, alumni and retirees.

"My overarching goal is to ensure that all of you personally, as well as the reputation of the Cyclone Battalion as a whole is protected to the maximum extent possible given the current media situation," Curtis wrote.

The Associated Press reported Thursday that explicit photos were taken of some cadets around campus on March 4 and posted to the Facebook page of a student group connected to the program.

Lt. Sean Brophy, spokesman for the Naval Service Training Command, said other students did the right thing by reporting the photos to program leaders.

The Navy said "appropriate administrative actions" were taken against the midshipmen, who remain with the program. Curtis apologized to Iowa State leaders.

Curtis said the incident doesn't "reflect on the Character of this Battalion — how we respond and move forward does." He called the group fantastic and urged members to "dust yourselves off and move on." A separate email sent by a student leader instructed students in the battalion to decline comment and inform program leaders of any media inquiries.

DMR: Grassley, Ernst back U.S. strike on Syria

LINH TA AND JASON NOBLE

LTA@DMREG.COM

Iowa U.S. Sens. Chuck Grassley and Joni Ernst each voiced support for airstrikes launched late Thursday against a target in Syria. Grassley, in a statement released Friday afternoon, called the airstrike ordered by Republican President Donald Trump "appropriate" following Syrian leader Bashar al-Assad's apparent use of chemical weapons on civilians.

"Assad's actions follow a policy under President Obama that lacked any consequences for heinous crimes against Syrian civilians," Grassley said.

"The action taken by President Trump to prevent further use of chemical weapons by Assad or anyone else was appropriate.”

He added that the president now must “develop a comprehensive strategy” for ending the six-year-long civil war.

Ernst, meanwhile, praised the strike within hours of its announcement on Thursday, crediting Trump with showing “global leadership” in a statement that also described Assad as a war criminal. “This has been a tragic reality for the past six years and has gone on far too long,” she said. “Unlike the Obama administration, the Trump administration is showing global leadership and we must work to find an end to the root causes of this crisis.” Both of the Republican senators’ statements represent an evolution from 2013, when Assad previously deployed chemical weapons and then-President Barack Obama, a Democrat, proposed a military response. “I don’t think the case for military action has been made. ...” Grassley said in a September 2013 statement. “If the goal is to deter and degrade Assad’s ability to use chemical weapons, how would a limited strike achieve this goal? What are the risks of military action? What is the U.S. national interest in striking Syria?”

That same month, Ernst — then a state senator and a candidate for U.S. Senate — said Obama had not made the case for “why it is in our vital interests to use force in the midst of Syria’s ongoing civil war.”

Grassley’s office clarified the senator’s shift in viewpoint in a statement to the Register, arguing that Trump’s strike was a single, clear action to disrupt Assad’s ability to launch another chemical weapons attack. Obama in 2013, by contrast, considered a wider military action “but the goal, strategy and plan were unclear.”

“Congress and the American people deserve details on the mission, and the plan to achieve it, before entering into a possible long-term conflict, regardless of which president is in the White House,” spokesman Michael Zona said. In a CNN interview on Friday, Ernst likewise argued that Trump has made the case for Thursday’s strike in a way that Obama did not four years ago. “He has laid out the case — humanitarian atrocities of course, and the use of chemical weapons — and we also have ISIS engaged in that region,” she said. “We simply do not want to see chemicals fall into the hands of ISIS operators. There’s an ongoing civil war and that paired with the ISIS threat makes it even more imperative that we make sure we’re destroying any of those deliver systems.”

Another Iowa member of Congress, U.S. Rep. Rod Blum, praised Trump’s “decisive leadership” in a tweet late Thursday, but he said if there was to be a sustained military effort, the president should seek congressional authorization.

Trump ordered the strike against Syria late Thursday in retaliation for the chemical weapons attack that killed 86 people on Tuesday.

The attack, the first conventional assault on another country ordered by Trump, comes a day after he declared that the chemical weapons assault had “crossed many, many lines,” including the deaths of 27 children.

The 59 missiles, fired from the destroyers USS Porter and Ross in the eastern Mediterranean Sea, struck the airfield where Syria based the warplanes used in the chemical attack, according to Navy Capt. Jeff Davis, a Pentagon spokesman.

The missiles destroyed aircraft, hardened hangars, ammunition supply bunkers, air defense systems and radar at the Shayrat Airfield, according to USA TODAY.

DMR: MATERIAL WITNESS IN KILLINGS TOLD COUSIN HE ‘DOESN’T FIT IN SOCIETY’

LINH TA

LTA@DMREG.COM

For Chase Nicholson's entire life, he's struggled with feeling adequate, his cousin Seth Nicholson of Des Moines said Friday. That struggle also caused friction between him and his family, the 28-year-old said. "His entire life has been a giant adjustment," Seth Nicholson said. Chase Marcus Nicholson, 20, is considered a material witness in the killing of his parents and sister in Bondurant on Thursday night. Chase Nicholson approached Wal-Mart employees in Neosho, Mo., about 12 hours after his family members were found dead in their Bondurant home. He allegedly told police, "I killed three people last night" as he turned himself in, said Neosho, Mo., Police Chief David Kennedy.

His parents, Mark Alan Nicholson, 58, and Charla Lee Nicholson, 56, and his sister Tawni Alexis Nicholson, 24, were found dead in the family home in the 9700 block of Northeast 88th Street, authorities said.

At about 4 a. m. Friday, Seth Nicholson said, his mother called his wife, Kelsea Nicholson. She was bawling on the phone and told them about the deaths. However, she also warned them to lock their doors. "She said every one of them is dead," Seth said. "It was a nightmare."

Chase had been living with his parents in Bondurant. Seth Nicholson said police told relatives that Chase had stopped at a friend's house after the slayings and told him he killed his family. Then he drove south. "His friend called the police just to make sure it wasn't just a story," Seth Nicholson said. The call apparently prompted the welfare check on the Bondurant home.

The last time the family heard from the three victims was around 8 p. m. Thursday, Seth said.

Tawni, who graduated from Iowa State University in August, was at her family's home in Bondurant to help plan her brother's 21st birthday party. It was supposed to be in conjunction with the family's Easter celebration.

Her last text to a family member was discussing plans for the party.

"Tawni was there to plan the birthday party," Seth said. "She was there to help him." Chase Nicholson stayed at Orchard Place, a Des Moines charity that provides mental health treatment for children, from age 16 to 18, his cousin said. He went to school in the Bondurant school district and later attended an area private school.

Seth said Chase seemed to do well at Orchard Place.

"He was good for a little while, and then the assault happened with dad," Seth said, referring to Chase Nicholson's arrest in 2014.

A criminal complaint filed in that incident alleges Chase Nicholson threw a piece of metal from a fireplace set at his father on May 10, 2014. Mark Nicholson was cut on the left side of his face, by his left eye. Chase, who was 18 at the time, told officers that he had thrown a soccer cleat at his dad and said that could have caused the cut, according to the complaint. The criminal charge was eventually dropped.

But Chase was often easy to talk with, his cousin said. During family gatherings, he was upbeat and smiling.

"You would never know he had these issues," Kelsea Nicholson said.

After becoming an adult, Seth Nicholson said, Chase has been in and out of mental health treatment. Nicholson said he had a hard time finding a hospital that would allow him to stay for longer than 24 hours.

In the fall, he was enrolled at the Ankeny Des Moines Area Community College campus studying computer programming.

He did not return for the spring semester because of complications with his mental health, Seth said. He had been working at a local Wal-Mart.

Seth said Chase Nicholson looked up to him, since they grew up together and he was a few years older than him.

He would confide to him about his thoughts, Seth said. He said Chase liked video games and listened to “headbanging” music. He was also interested in weapons, including knives.

Two weeks ago, Seth said, he spoke with Chase on the phone. He said Chase confided in him and told him he “doesn’t fit in society.”

Seth said the family has no ties with people in Missouri, so they’re unsure why he ended up there.

A vigil will be held on Saturday in Bondurant to remember Mark, Charla and Tawni.

It will be held from 7: 30 to 8: 30 p. m. outside Bondurant- Farrar High School at 1000 Grant Street North in Bondurant.

Seth said the tragic story demonstrates the importance of mental health care. He said he was concerned about Chase’s future.

“It is just a classic story of good people who had something really bad happen to them,” he said. “I don’t think he knows peace. I don’t think he’s ever met it.”

DMR: Iowa Senate confirms three appointees to regents board

JEFF CHARIS- CARLSON JCHARISC@PRESS-CITIZEN.COM

The Iowa Senate voted Wednesday to confirm all three of Gov. Terry Branstad’s appointees to the board that oversees Iowa’s three public universities.

In a series of 49-0 votes, the senate approved Branstad’s decision to appoint two former state lawmakers — former Rep. Nancy Dunkel, D-Dyersville, and former Sen. Nancy Boettger, R-Harlan — to the nine-member Iowa Board of Regents. Boettger and Dunkel will join board May 1, replacing regents Bruce Rastetter and Katie Mulholland, whose six-year terms expire April 30. Rastetter did not seek a second term, and Mulholland was not reappointed to one.

In another 49-0 vote, the senate confirmed Wednesday the reappointment of regent Sherry Bates, who has served on the board since 2015 and who heads the board’s Campus and Safety Subcommittee. When reappointing Bates in March, the Governor’s Office said she deserved a full, six-year term on the board. The Senate also voted 49-0 last month to confirm last year’s recess appointment of Regent Mike Richards, who has been serving on the board since May 2016. As with Wednesday’s confirmation vote, there was no debate. Wednesday’s vote will change the gender balance on the board after May 1 to five women and four men, but the partisan balance on the board will stay the same: five Republicans, one Democratic and three independents. With Rastetter and Mulholland stepping down, the board will be without a president and a president pro tem. A new leadership election will need to take place on or after May 1. One of the new board’s first tasks will be to find a replacement for Iowa State University President Steven Leath, who is leaving to become president of Auburn University in Alabama.

Regent Larry McKibben, who served in the Iowa Senate from 1997 to 2008, described Boettger as “the leader on issues of education and educational finance.” He said both former lawmakers are “highly qualified appointees.”

“I care very much about the system,” Boettger told the Register in an earlier phone interview. “Iowa State is what brought me to Iowa in the first place. The state is known for quality education. I want to make sure it stays that way.” Boettger said she plans to learn as much as she can from her fellow Harlan resident, Mary Louise Petersen, who served as president of the regents from 1973 to 1981. Dunkel, a Democrat who served in the House for four years, is a retired banker and a former board member of Iowa Student Loan Liquidity Corporation and the Iowa Values Fund board.

She told the Register that she views Iowa’s public universities as a key part of Iowa’s economic development landscape “in terms of their research and in terms of their business incubators.”

“Have the colleges been not given enough money? Sure. But you know you can say that about a lot of other departments as well,” Dunkel said. “Our job is to make sure they are doing the best they can with the money they are getting,” Dunkel told the Register she initially had been contacted by Lt. Gov. Kim Reynolds to inquire whether she was interested in the position.

Once she agreed, the governor called later that day to make the offer.

With Branstad scheduled to be appointed as the next U.S. ambassador to China, Reynolds will take over the governor’s responsibilities.

The governor office said the choice of appointees was made collaboratively.

“Like all of our appointments the past seven years, they were all decided upon together by Gov. Branstad and Lt. Gov. Reynolds,” Ben Hammes, a gubernatorial spokesman, said Tuesday via email last month.

DMR: Lawmakers promise to protect credit for poor families in tax reform efforts

BRIANNE PFANNENSTIEL

BPFANNENST@DMREG.COM

Iowa lawmakers promised to protect a popular tax credit benefiting more than 220,000 low-income working families in their effort to reform the tax code. House Appropriations Committee Chairman Rep. Pat Grassley, R-New Hartford, said at a subcommittee meeting Thursday the Earned Income Tax Credit, along with another that benefits community colleges, would be held harmless as lawmakers work to cut back state spending on tax credits. Grassley said he heard from legislators, advocates and others who opposed reducing benefits under the Earned Income Tax Credit, which primarily benefits those living in or near poverty.

“You have to weigh how difficult of a vote that is versus the savings that you’re going to achieve,” he said. “And I just think that this point, there wasn’t the appetite to take that on.”

Grassley recently introduced House File 187, which would cap and gradually reduce the total amount the state spends on tax credits, funneling the savings into a state account for an as-yet undetermined purpose. It also would roll back some of the most generous benefits associated with some credits, which result in refund checks for individuals and companies that have no tax liability.

But, he said Wednesday, it became too difficult to put an overall cap on state tax credit spending, which has ballooned by about 180 percent since 2005. Instead, he plans to look at each tax credit individually and find ways to cut back.

According to data from the Department of Revenue, the total value of state tax credits has grown from about $153 million in 2005 to an expected $427 million in 2018.

The state spends more on the Earned Income Tax Credit than any other on the books. During the 2016 budget year, it totaled $71.9 million. That's projected to grow to $76.3 million in 2021. About 71 percent of those credits were claimed by taxpayers with an adjusted gross income of less than $25,000.

Rep. Chris Hall, DSioux City and the top Democrat on the House Appropriations Committee, said he supports taking that credit off the table, saying it has been "extremely effective" at accomplishing its intended purpose.

After a year in which spending outpaced revenue by about $250 million, Hall and other Democrats have pushed for a review of tax credits as a way to save money and shore up the state's budget. But Republicans say cutting back on tax credits would provide savings that could be used to balance out a future tax cut.

"If the goal is tax reform, then you need to begin to achieve the savings from the tax credits, in my opinion," he said.

Hall said he disagrees with that approach.

"We need to make sure that this conversation is linked directly to improving and making the state's budget more sustainable, balanced, transparent and predictable," he said.

DMR: Templeton Rye one step closer to distilling whiskey in Iowa

Iowa-based manufacturer breaks ground on $26M, 99,000-square-foot complex

THE DES MOINES REGISTER

Templeton Rye, the Iowa-based whiskey manufacturer, has broken ground on its new $26 million distillery building in Templeton, Iowa.

The new 99,000-square-foot complex includes a 34,500-square-foot distillery as well as a museum and barrel-aging warehouse.

It's expected to be completed in the fall of 2018.

The new facility may muzzle critics who claim Templeton had been misrepresenting its liquor by labeling it as "small-batch rye" and "made in Iowa," when it actually was made from a stock whiskey distilled by MGP Ingredients in Indiana. Complaints culminated in a series of lawsuits over the whiskey's authenticity, which the company settled in 2015 with promises to change its marketing materials and bottle labeling.

Templeton Rye has six fulltime and about 10 part-time employees, the company said.

The distillery project will add 27 jobs and will be able to produce 500,000 proof gallons of rye whiskey annually.

The aging warehouse will be able to store 40,000 barrels.

DMR: Casino in Clinton debuts simulcast horse, dog racing

LINH TA

LTA@DMREG.COM

Iowans looking to bet on video simulcasts of horse and dog races will no longer have to go to a casino with live racing to make their wagers. On Friday, Wild Rose Casino & Resort in Clinton began to offer off-track betting, including races from Santa Anita Park, Aqueduct, Keeneland and Oak Lawn. It's the first state-regulated Iowa casino without live racing to offer off-track betting. "It's something new and fresh we're offering to people on the eastern side of the state," said Tom Timmons, president and chief operating officer of Wild Rose Casinos. "We're hoping to attract people from Clinton and the Quad Cities." The Iowa Legislature agreed in 2014 to allow state-regulated casinos that do not offer live racing to take bets on simulcasts of horse and dog races as part of a broader bill that permitted the state's greyhound tracks to stop offering live racing. The simulcasts are offered through a hub hosted by the Iowa Greyhound Association, which is operating the Dubuque dog track. Iowa's only other recent greyhound track, Bluffs Run in Council Bluffs, shut down in December 2015.

The greyhound association will receive a share of the revenues.

Previously, the only Iowa gambling operations that offered wagering on simulcasts of horse and dog races from outside tracks were Prairie Meadows Racetrack and Casino in Altoona and Iowa Greyhound Park in Dubuque, along with Meskwaki Bingo Casino Hotel at Tama. The Meskwaki casino, which is regulated by a tribal gaming commission, has long been allowed to offer off-track wagering under provisions of the federal Indian Gaming Regulatory Act.

For its debut, The Wild Rose will offer races from 16 different tracks across the country.

People interested in making bets will go into the Coaches Corner — Wild Rose's sports bar and grill. The area includes 56 new televisions including 16 screens that combine for theater-style viewing. Each booth includes screens for watching races.

Patrons can purchase a program and then let a clerk know what they're interested in betting on. They will receive a ticket and can either stay or leave Coaches Corner.

The wagering is parimutuel and people are not betting against the house. The casino will take a cut of the winnings, while the rest will be dispersed towards the winning tickets, Timmons said.

"We're excited," Timmons said "Got everything finalized and tested everything."

Timmons said they may expand simulcasting to its Jefferson and Emmetsburg locations.

"We'll be watching and see how it goes," Timmons said. "There is an investment with it."

The casino will feature the Santa Anita Derby on Saturday.

DMR Editorial: Is Harreld proposing merger or hostile takeover?

This isn't the way to unify the UI foundation and alumni

Perhaps it makes sense for the University of Iowa Foundation to merge with the school's alumni association.

But it seems odd that the school's president, Bruce Harreld, is the man who has decided to make that happen; that he hasn't given much of a rationale for it; and that he's already decided, on his own, who will lead the new organization.

Stranger still, he has done all of this without consulting with the alumni group, leaving its leaders "shocked" by Harreld's actions.

It's important to remember the entities — the school, the foundation and the alumni association — are separate and distinct entities. The University of Iowa is a public institution dedicated to higher learning and run by the Board of Regents. The foundation and alumni groups are two separate, private, tax-exempt organizations run by their own boards of directors.

Obviously, the three have common interests and they collaborate and coordinate while pursuing their individual goals. But they have missions that are fundamentally different. The school exists to educate students; the foundation exists to raise money for the school and the University of Iowa Hospitals; and the alumni association exists to strengthen the school through recruiting, alumni events, networking opportunities and career programs.

Last fall, Harreld asked the leadership of the foundation and alumni association to form a committee that would explore ways the two organizations could work together in supporting the school. He said that after reviewing the committee's recommendations — none of which involved a merger — he decided to "create one, new, unified organization," citing their "overlapping missions and aspirations."

But the report on which Harreld claims to have based his decision doesn't actually recommend the merger of the two organizations.

Still, Harreld says a newly created, single entity will better serve the university by creating "more meaningful alumni engagement and increased philanthropic support" — although it's not clear how that would occur. There's no question the alumni and foundation have overlapping objectives, but they are fundamentally different organizations. The foundation, for example, employs 233 people and recently completed an eight-year fundraising drive by securing almost $2 billion in pledges. The much smaller alumni organization has 25 employees and one of its biggest contractors is the foundation, which was paid $137,000 last year for information-technology services.

To put the size of the two organizations in perspective, consider this: Last year, the foundation spent $124 million, while the alumni association's total spending for the year was $4 million. In fact, the foundation's fundraising budget was more than three times the total spending by the alumni group.

Can the two be merged without the alumni association losing its identity and focus?

Perhaps. But it's easy to see why the alumni organization's leaders are worried.

"The alumni association's board of directors was not aware that (Harreld) was going to make that decision until the day he did," Clare Kelly, chairwoman of the association's board of directors, told the Cedar Rapids Gazette. "We are not happy with the manner in which it's been handled."

And Harreld has done more than decree that these two nonprofits be combined. He has also decided that once merged, they will be led by Lynette Marshall, who now earns more than a half a million dollars annually as the foundation's president and CEO.

Harreld has also instructed the association to stop accepting new members and stop collecting membership dues.

"The board didn't vote on those decisions," Kelly told the Gazette. At this point, Harreld's "merger" looks more like a hostile corporate takeover than a mutually agreed-upon consolidation. It's almost as if the two charities' boards of directors have no say in the fate of their organizations or their leadership, and their bylaws are utterly meaningless. If that's the case, the Internal Revenue Service should take a close look at their tax-exempt status and ask why it is that the head of a public university can, by his own edict, reorganize or dissolve these two independent, nonprofit organizations.

A merger might make sense, but the manner in which this one is being pursued does not.

DMR Iowa View: Women deserve to receive equal pay for equal work

This column was signed by Iowa state Sens. Rita Hart, Pam Jochum, Liz Mathis, Janet Petersen, Amanda Ragan; state Reps. Marti Anderson, Liz Bennett, Timi Brown-Powers, Abby Finkenauer, Ruth Ann Gaines, Mary Gaskill, Lisa Heddens, Monica Kurth, Vicki Lensing, Mary Mascher, Helen Miller, Amy Nielsen, Jo Oldson, Kirsten Running-Marquardt, Sharon Steckman, Beth Wessel-Kroeschell, Phyllis Thede, Cindy Winckler, Mary Wolfe.

Equal pay for equal work. It might sound like common sense, but unfortunately it's not reality.

The figures on equal pay are daunting. Women make just 80 cents for every dollar a man makes, according to data released by the Census Bureau. African-American and Hispanic women are even further behind, making just 63 and 54 cents, respectively.

Unfortunately, Iowa lags behind even those disappointing numbers. Iowa women make less than 77 cents on the dollar for what a man earns.

Women and our families are being shortchanged hundreds of thousands of dollars over the course of a lifetime.

Some argue that women choose different jobs, or choose motherhood over career opportunities. But even within the same profession, women are paid less. Female doctors and surgeons make 71 percent of what men make, and female financial specialists make 66 percent compared with men in their profession. For lawyers and judges, the pay gap is 82 percent. And while three-fourths of women who enter the workforce will get pregnant, half of working firsttime mothers receive no paid leave to have their babies, according to the Census Bureau.

Women are much more likely to have career interruptions because of child care being costly or unavailable, often resulting in lost pay raises when they return.

These are difficult financial decisions forced upon women and families because of failing economic policies.

Those are the figures. But they don't tell the whole story or how we can take action.

Tuesday was Equal Pay Day, symbolizing how long into the year women must work to earn what men earned last year. It's a day when we should remember not just the numbers, but the impact on women and families. After all, women are sole, primary, or co-breadwinners in nearly 72 percent of Iowa families.

Hardworking women trying to provide for their families are falling behind because of a discriminatory pay gap and policies that don't support the tough choices facing families.

Thankfully, there are solutions to make pay equitable.

The Legislature can create paid leave and child-care policies allowing mothers to keep their jobs, avoiding long gaps in employment that drive down wages. And we need to raise the minimum wage — two-thirds of minimum-wage earners are women — and enact other policies to raise wages instead of engaging in a race to the bottom.

Employers can get help to correct their pay practices, through equalpay guidelines from the U.S.

Department of Labor. Women must also be empowered to ask prospective employers to show women and men are paid equally, that their hiring process seeks diversity, and that they can join a union. Women in unions earn over one-third more than women in non-union workplaces.

If there is unequal pay, women should discuss the problem with their employer.

If discrimination continues, every woman has the right to file a complaint with the U.S.

Equal Employment Opportunity Commission.

Equal pay for equal work shouldn't be an idea. It should be reality. Other states are moving forward, and women continue to recognize this issue's importance. We need to move Iowa forward, and we need citizen action, legislative action and participation from the businesses to make it happen. At current pace, the wage gap will not close for 50 years. Women and hardworking Iowa families cannot afford to wait that long.

Iowa's insurance market could be the canary in the nation's coal mine if Congress or President Donald Trump doesn't offer clarity soon on the future of the Affordable Care Act, with millions of people losing coverage, one industry expert said Friday.

Two insurers announced this week that they would stop selling individual health plans both on and off the Iowa exchange — Des Moines-based Wellmark Blue Cross and Blue Shield on Monday and Aetna on Thursday. The decisions affect some 57,600 Iowans — 21,400 Wellmark policy holders and 36,200 policy holders with Aetna.

It also leaves the vast majority of the 50,000 Iowans purchasing subsidy-eligible insurance on the exchange with only one option — Minnesota-based Medica. But that insurer is tight-lipped on what it plans to do in 2018, saying Thursday that it is "evaluating the situation and (its) options."

"Iowa is a bit different in that it's happening so early," said Cynthia Cox, associate director for the program for the study of health reform and private insurance at not-for-profit Kaiser Family Foundation. "But it might be the start of many more exits to come."

Iowa has never shown up in any of the health care policy organization's lists of states with fragile markets. States such as Tennessee, Arizona and Oklahoma have had steep premium increases and seen insurers drop out.

"This goes to show that political uncertainty can make an otherwise stable market unstable overnight," she said.

The problem Wellmark, Aetna and other insurers face is that not enough young and healthy people are choosing to enroll in plans to help spread out costs. Instead, older, sicker individuals with multiple chronic illnesses — who need insurance and coverage — are purchasing the health plans, putting a high concentration of expenses in the individual market.

Wellmark said on Monday it lost $90 million through the individual market in Iowa.

There's also quite a bit of uncertainty still looming over the future of the ACA. Trump and Congressional Republicans have promised to repeal and replace President Barack Obama's signature health care legislation, but have been stalled by disagreement over the changes they will make.

Insurers have said the unpredictability over which rules will be in place in 2018 — and over the billions of dollars in government subsidies that make the plans more affordable to millions of people — make it difficult to commit to offering such insurance.

Many have asked the government to extend the subsidies for 2018.

This comes as health insurers are preparing 2018 premium rate proposals to submit to federal and state insurance regulators over the next few months.

Whether Medica will stay in Iowa is hard to say, Kaiser's Cox added. Several states have only one insurance option on the exchange — but that insurer typically is the Blue Cross and Blue Shield plan, which are more established.

Medica is a significant player in Minnesota, Cox noted, and it has expanded into additional markets including Iowa and Kansas.

Bottom of Form

"But it's not clear if they have capacity to absorb all the enrollees in Iowa," she said. "It puts them in tough spot."

If Medica were to drop out, there isn't much in terms of a Plan B. Iowans could purchase plans off the exchange without subsidies, but Iowa insurers are pulling out of that market, too.

Trump has indicated he will not enforce the mandate or penalize those without insurance.

But that is hardly a relief if you are sick and in need of medical care, Cox said.

"This is warning sign," Cox said. If Congress "doesn't act soon, ... we can see this happen around the country."

SCJ Editorial: Election bill will strengthen system of voting in Iowa

Top of Form

Iowa's election system will be stronger as a result of a bill advancing through the Legislature.

Last month, the Senate passed and returned to the House for final approval a package of election changes. The House is expected to pass the bill, as well.

Getting the most attention within the bill is a voter ID provision.

As an additional layer of protection for the integrity of elections in this state, we long have supported a requirement that voters show some form of identification before casting a ballot. We are not alone on this within or outside Iowa.

A February Des Moines Register/Mediacom Iowa Poll showed 69 percent of Iowans support such a requirement. Voter ID requirements vary from state to state, but 34 states have passed laws requiring voters to produce a form of identification at the polls, according to the National Conference of State Legislatures.

Under the bill moving through the Iowa Legislature, voters would need to show an acceptable form of government-issued ID before casting a ballot at polling places. If a voter doesn't have one of the acceptable forms of ID, the state will issue him or her a voter-verification card, free of charge. A request for an absentee ballot would need to include an acceptable personal identification number, as well.

Within today's society, one needs some form of identification to conduct almost any kind of personal business. We do not believe asking the same of voters in the name of ensuring honest elections in our state is at all unreasonable.

Another component of the bill we support and have advocated for in this space because it also speaks to improved integrity within the process of voting is elimination of the straight-party voting option.

Bottom of Form

In our view, straight-party voting is lazy voting. We understand voters have every right to vote for all Republicans or all Democrats if they wish and even if a straight-party option didn't exist on the ballot, voters could (and some would) fill in the ovals for all candidates of one party or another.

Still, if this choice wasn't so easily available, we believe more voters would spend more time getting to know more about all of the candidates whose names appear on their ballot.

Another benefit to elimination of the straight-party voting option is this: Nonpartisan questions on the back of the ballot wouldn't be so easily forgotten or ignored.

We look forward to the House joining the Senate and sending this election bill to the governor for signature into law.

LEE: Branstad meets with senators handling his confirmation

ROD BOSCHART

Gov. Terry Branstad said Friday he had productive meetings with members of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee during this week's trip to Washington, D.C. However, he doesn't expect a hearing on his confirmation to be the next U.S. ambassador to China to take place until next month at the earliest.

Branstad said he met with committee chairman Sen. Bob Corker, R-Tenn., and ranking member, Sen. Ben Cardin, D-Md., as well as other committee members and Iowa Republican Sens. Chuck Grassley and Joni Ernst, and he plans a return trip the last week in April after the two-week Easter recess. At that time, he'll meet with more members of the committee who will consider his appointment by President Donald Trump to be America's top diplomat in China.

"I had a lot of good meetings with senators," Branstad said Friday during his first public event since his trip. He said he has completed the paperwork phase of the process and now he is "learning as much as I can about the China issues, and there are many."

The governor said he also met with Sonny Perdue, Trump's secretary of agriculture nominee, who has cleared the committee process but awaits Senate confirmation pending an April 24 vote.

“It’s getting kind of frustrating, I think, for a lot of people. This process has been very slow,” Branstad said of this year’s Senate action. “They’ve now just confirmed Neil Gorsuch to the Supreme Court and that took up a significant amount of time.

“But this has been the most, I guess, disruptive process that we’ve ever seen in terms of appointments. Confirmations usually don’t take nearly this long. But, unfortunately, I think the Democrats have decided that they’re going to just basically attack everybody. I hope that by the time I get there that will have worn out and that won’t be case,” he said.

“They ask tough questions and there are a number of issues. But I’m hopeful that I can generate bipartisan support. Time will tell,” he added.

Grassley said he expects Branstad’s confirmation to “go well.”

Bottom of Form

“He’s personable, professional and has the proven leadership and policy skills to serve in such an important diplomatic position. As members of the Foreign Relations Committee get to know him, they’ll appreciate his trustworthiness, his work ethic and his ability to get the job done for the United States as he has for Iowa for a record number of years,” Grassley added.

Ernst said Branstad would make an excellent ambassador and hopes the Senate moves him through the confirmation process “as soon as possible.”

“Our relationship with China is very important — from agricultural trade to national security — so I look forward to the Senate moving on his nomination soon,” she said.

LEE: Branstad and Xi: From possibilities, an enduring relationship

B.A. MORELLI

Top of Form

Bottom of Form

Jack Kintzle was part of a welcome wagon in 1985 that cast such a positive light on Iowa it sparked a decades-long friendship between Xi Jinping, who would go on to become China’s president, and Iowa Gov. Terry Branstad — now thrusting Branstad and Iowa into the spotlight of U.S.-Chinese relations.

Branstad, who was nominated as U.S. ambassador to China last year although has not yet been confirmed, has met with Chinese officials a handful of times over the past 30-some years. The relationship has blossomed and the impact has been far-reaching for the state, say officials in business, trade and education.

Hospitality laid the groundwork for the good relations, but Kintzle observed a measure of strategy and foresight by Branstad in encouraging the warm, respectful welcome in the midst of the farm crisis.

“Iowa was going through such a tough time with agriculture, especially farm foreclosures,” said Kintzle, 73. “Iowa was at a level we needed publicity and we wanted to open doors. I think that’s one of the reasons they were treated so well. How many million Chinese are there? I think he saw an opportunity to trade. I think the governor sensed the possibilities.”

Pending confirmation, Branstad plans to move to Beijing with his wife, Chris, his daughter and son-in-law and granddaughters as he works to enhance the relationship between the two countries, he said during a celebration with Chinese officials during the Lunar New Year earlier this year in Muscatine.

“I’m an old friend of China,” Branstad said there. “I’ve very honored and very proud that I’ve had a number of interactions with China and the leadership of China. We’ve seen great improvement in terms of exchanges and trade. Exchanges of students is one way to improve personal relationship and friendships. That is critically important to both of our countries and the world.”

Branstad would step in amid heightened tensions between the United States and China over trade equity, punitive tariffs and how to handle North Korea. Branstad was not scheduled to be at the meeting in Florida late last week between President Donald Trump and Xi.

Kintzle was an Iowa Corn Growers Association director with a farm near Coggon in the summer of 1985 when Xi — then a county-level party leader Kintzle equated to a state secretary of agriculture in America — toured Iowa farms as part of a small agricultural delegation from Hebei province.

Kintzle’s farm was right off the highway and convenient, so he got a call wondering if the delegation could visit. Soon, a small group of Chinese men wheeled up and spent a few hours inspecting machinery, grain bins and harvesters, then came inside for coffee. At the end, they took pictures together.

“They go back to China, he becomes president, and I farm for the next 30 years,” Kintzle said. “I should have bought a lottery ticket. Although, having a president on my farm might be better than winning the lottery.”

Branstad, then in his first term as Iowa governor, was instrumental in the visit, including hosting a then-unheralded Xi in his office.

By the time of the visit, Branstad already had signed an agreement establishing a sister-state relationship between Iowa and Hebei. In 1984, he led a 50-person delegation to Hebei. It was the first of six trade missions Branstad led to China.

Branstad next traveled to China as part of a three-country trade mission in fall 1993, marking the 10-year anniversary of the sister-state relationship. The goal was to expand markets for agricultural products, appliances, machinery and other exports, as well as stress in China Iowa’s commitment to human rights and treating people with dignity.

“We think that one of the things that helped lead to the downfall of communism in Russia and Eastern Europe was all the contacts to the West — the sister states, the trade missions and the understanding that the people gain from that,” Branstad said at the time. “I feel somewhat the same way about trade and building relationships in China.

“We can, hopefully, help push the Chinese state in the direction of more freedom and opportunity for the people as opposed to the old policy of trying to isolate them,” he added.

The early legwork has made a difference for Iowa. China is the fourth-largest export market for Iowa, with $490.6 million worth of manufactured and value-added goods, according to the Iowa Department of Economic Development.

China’s spending supports 4,000 jobs, and 5,000 “young talents” are studying in Iowa universities, Hong Lei, consul general based at the Chinese Consulate of Chicago, said during the recent Muscatine visit.

“I would say because of the sheer fact he’s been involved, he’s never let go,” said Kim Heidemann, executive director of Iowa Sister States. “He’s continued to nurture this relationship. He goes to visit, goes to meetings. He's hosted meetings. The governor has made it a point. He's simply done things right, especially in the last few years with Xi and done it in such a way he puts Iowa first."

The trips to China, and return visits from Chinese officials, have continued.

Xi returned to visit Muscatine and Des Moines in 2012 for an "old friends" reunion dinner stemming from the 1985 trip, and 20 Iowans traveled to China that same year for another reunion. Branstad also participated in trade missions in 2014 and 2016.

Downing Thomas, a professor and dean of International Programs at the University of Iowa, traveled with Branstad to China in 2012.

The delegation also included elected officials from Wisconsin and Virginia, along with a handful of business people and educational leaders. The significance of Branstad's relationship with Xi was evident in the respect and attention he received compared with the other visitors. The China Daily newspaper sought him out specifically for an interview.

Bottom of Form

Iowa universities and colleges have seen enrollment among Chinese students soar in the past 10 years. More than 4,000 Chinese students are enrolled at the three state universities alone. While the influx of Chinese college students is seen beyond Iowa's borders, the relationship between Iowa and China has helped Iowa schools, Thomas said.

"Clearly many of our students are aware of the relationship with Xi and Iowa, and their parents are aware of it." Thomas said.

The economic impact from international students and their families in Iowa topped $365 million and has supported or created 3,700 jobs, according to an annual report from International Programs. Thomas estimates more UI alumni are living in China than anywhere else outside of Iowa and Chicago.

The visibility of Branstad's relationship with Xi and Branstad's personal involvement has opened doors for Iowa companies, such as West Des Moines-based Hy-Line International.

Tom Dixon, director of international sales and marketing for Hy-Line, which is one of the world's largest breeders of laying hens, said the company received direct and indirect assistance from Branstad's office in forging a relationship between it and the Huayu Group, based in Hebei.

Branstad was present at a deal signing in October 2013 between the companies for a breeder housing project in Hebei province. That show of support was important in a later deal in 2016 for a joint venture to distribute Hy-Line chicks in China. The ceremonial nature of the signing, particularly with someone on friendly terms with Xi, carries a lot of influence for local, state and regional officials in China, Dixon said.

"There's some coincidence, but it certainly helped," Dixon said. "Branstad put more prestige and elevated the deal. It gave more of an official nature, credibility it's a real project. In China, government involvement is so very important for companies. It helped locally (in China) to get approvals."

In China, Dixon explained, support of government officials and good relations between business and government is vital. Government officials need to sign off on acquisitions, permits and land sales, for example.

Dixon is hopeful Branstad's agricultural background will help ease restrictions on poultry imports in China, which have been curtailed since the bird flu outbreak in 2015. He declined to be specific, but said it has cost Hy-Line millions of dollars.

“We’ve been working to try to negotiate things with health officials in China,” Dixon said. “We hope the governor of a large agricultural state could maybe lend influence to motivate or encourage some kind of solution so we can start exporting again. We hope his level of ambassador could facilitate and shed some light on the situation.”

Globe Gazette: Skipper: Government is often one big jigsaw puzzle

JOHN SKIPPER

Top of Form

Bottom of Form

Have you ever worked at putting a jigsaw puzzle together? Are you good at it?

The trick is to put all the corner pieces together first and then work your way in. You would think it would get easier as you go along, but it doesn't.

Often, the intricacies of city government are like putting a jigsaw puzzle together. The good news is you usually have an image of what the completed puzzle is supposed to look like -- the image on the cover of the box. The bad news is you have to put a thousand pieces together to get to the promised land.

Mason City seems to have to deal with one jigsaw puzzle after another. You know about many of them in the past. They're history, and that's where they should remain.

The new one is the proposal of Gatehouse Capital to build a hotel in the parking lot of Southbridge Mall, connect it to The Music Man Square with a skywalk, build a conference center/ballroom inside and relocate the museum on-site.

This is a project that has excited a lot of people, important because without public support, an important piece to the puzzle will be missing.

The city and Gatehouse have begun discussions on a development agreement.

Gatehouse is proposing a $15 million project that should bring in oodles property tax and sales tax revenue and provide a viable entertainment venue for North Iowa.

The Music Man Square and Southbridge Mall should both benefit -- and both could use a boost. The city tax base will increase. The community will have another asset.

For its efforts, Gatehouse at this point wants a $150,000 payment to get things moving and a development fee that is still negotiable but would probably be more than $150,000.

Other negotiating points are an interest-free loan to Gatehouse estimated at between $3.5 and $4.3 million to be paid back to the city after 20 years. The city wants provisions on number of jobs created.

As of now, the city would be responsible for paying for the construction of the skywalk and renovations to The Music Man Square. And that brings in another element to the puzzle -- the city's application through the Iowa Economic Development Authority for state funds to help leverage a $36.2 million River City Renaissance downtown development project.

The state has given pre-application approval for at least $7 million in funding and more could be coming if final approval is given.

But the project has changed since first approval was given. Instead of a hotel downtown next to City Hall -- the developer, Philip Chodur defaulted on that plan -- the Gatehouse proposal is now in place. The state requires $10 million in private investment to qualify for state funding. The Gatehouse plan fulfills that requirement.

Bottom of Form

Other parts of the pre-approved plan included a music pavilion, a parking ramp, a mixed-use building and an ice arena/multipurpose center.

When Trout meets with Iowa Economic Development staffers later this month, he will explain the change in hotel developers, how the parking ramp is no longer needed, and that there might be a change regarding the mixed-use building. None of this will be a surprise to the IEDA people because Trout has kept them advised for many months.

The wild card in all of this activity could be a referendum on Nov. 7 which residents petitioned for, regarding bonding for the ice arena.

The ice arena is part of the package for the state funding, so if voters reject it, the proposed state funding will probably die -- and that is the revenue Trout and the city hope to use to fund the renovations of The Music Man Square.

So, it is a big puzzle and one in which there are many opportunities for someone or something to come along and tip over the table.

Why do things have to be so complicated? It's government -- and it's puzzling.

LEE: Iowa's budget pinch: How did we get here?

ERIN MURPHY

A mere five years ago Iowa's state budget had nearly $1 billion to spare and its reserve accounts were flush with another $600 million.

And while money coming into the state continues to increase, the state budget has fallen into disrepair. This year, state lawmakers have been forced to cut make $250 million in budget cuts, and next year's budget figures to be tight as well.

It has been a fast fall from fiscal fitness to this beleaguered budget despite ever-increasing revenue.

Gov. Terry Branstad, a Republican, regularly says a sluggish agricultural economy has slowed state revenue, leading to the current budget pinch.

Capitol Democrats say the state has too many tax breaks that leave too much money in big businesses' accounts rather than the state's.

Experts in state economics say the problem has been created by myriad factors.

Busted budget

Iowa's state budget was a picture of financial health in fiscal year 2013. There was a $928 million budget surplus — unspent money in the state's general fund — and the state's two reserve accounts — a cash reserve and an emergency fund — were flush with $622 million.

Fast-forward to fiscal year 2017, which has roughly three months remaining: the budget surplus has been whittled to less than $50 million, and revenue came in roughly $250 million under projections. So lawmakers cut $118 million from state departments and used another $130 million from the reserve accounts to make the budget whole.

And lawmakers just started work the budget for fiscal 2018, which, likely for the first time in eight years, will spend less than the previous year.

The amount of money coming into the state is not the issue; post-recession revenues have increased each year.

So what is the cause of Iowa's budget pinch?

Farm economy

Branstad regularly cites this as the main issue for the state's budget trouble. Prices for corn and soybeans, Iowa's largest crops, have been low — lower than the cost of production for roughly a year. That puts a drag on farm incomes — and thus the state's income tax collections. It also impacts state manufacturing, much of which is built around agriculture — and thus hinders state sales tax collections.

"Agriculture in Iowa has changed so much," said Pat Grassley, a Republican state legislator who leads the Iowa House's budget committee and a farmer. "It isn't just your corn and soybeans and your hogs and cattle and your chickens. It's the fact then you have a plant that makes a tractor. If they lay off people, those layoffs impact you as well. And it's not just those layoffs. Maybe there's somebody that makes a headlight for them, and they lay off people. ...

"That, in my mind, is the agriculture economy because it ties to how agriculture goes. That's kind of the anchor."

David Roederer, Branstad's budget director and a member of the three-member panel that makes future revenue projections on which the state budget is based, said the average total net farm income in Iowa from 2006 through 2010 was $3.7 billion, and from 2011 through 2014 that exploded to an annual average of $7.6 billion. But in 2015 that dropped to $2.6 billion.

"Iowa still is very tied to agriculture, and generally that has served us well. But some years commodity prices are going to be better than others," Roederer said. "So you can see that in (2011 through 2014) that those were extraordinary years. If you average it out, you're going to be pretty close to what we normally have. The problem is life doesn't work on averages. ... Some years are going to be better than others."

Ernie Goss, an economics professor at Creighton University in Omaha, Nebraska, said the sluggish farm economy is impacting many Midwest states, leading to budget shortfalls in Iowa neighbors Nebraska and Kansas. Goss said net farm income has been falling since 2013, and that impact is felt in state tax collections.

"It really has to do with agriculture and those businesses tied to ag," Goss said. "Farmers are just not purchasing, for example, heavy equipment, and that shows up in the economy in Iowa and across the United States."

But not all economic experts agree the sluggish ag economy is driving Iowa's budget woes.

Dave Swenson, an economics professor at Iowa State University, said the farm economy's role in influencing the state budget often is overstated.

"The farm economy is not the main, nor a major cause of the current situation," Swenson said in an email interview. "Farmers do not contribute as much to the state's coffers as many think, and the ebbs and flows of farmer incomes are spread out over years — both gains and losses — allowing farmers to truly minimize both their federal and state taxation bites.”

Holly Lyons, who works with the state’s non-partisan fiscal estimating agency and also serves on the budget estimating panel, said the farm economy is only a part of the equation that has led to the current budget situation.

Lyons said income tax revenues turned flat in the spring of 2016, and that can be explained in part by lower commodity prices and a decline in the manufacturing economy — again, which is heavily tied to agriculture.

But Lyons said other factors, such as slowed sales tax revenue, also impacted the budget.

“The farm economy is just one of the factors in the shortfall — it is by no means the primary cause,” Lyons wrote in an email to Democratic state legislator Cindy Winckler, of Davenport, who had asked for Lyons’ assessment of Branstad’s claims that the farm economy is driving the budget issues.

Tax cuts and credits

Democratic state legislators insist the biggest driver of state budget issues is money not collected thanks to various tax relief programs.

Iowa’s 67 tax credit programs will cost the state more than $1 billion in fiscal year 2018.

Statehouse Democrats take particular exception with the tax relief programs that they say go to big businesses that don’t need the help.

The most expensive programs are for commercial and industrial property tax relief ($152.1 million), the homestead tax credit ($136 million), and a business property tax credit ($125 million).

Bottom of Form

“Farm prices certainly have affected Iowa’s economy, but our state budget is much more directly impacted by the cost of tax cuts and tax credits that have grown in the last four years at a rate that is just unsustainable,” said Chris Hall, a state legislator from Sioux City and the top Democrat on the House budget committee. “The areas of the budget that have been increasing in cost at the most rapid rate are tax cuts primarily to out-of-state corporations and also tax credits. Both of those numbers have increased exponentially over the last few years at a pace that is faster than the state’s economy is growing.”

Swenson agrees. He said tax relief programs for businesses — including the commercial and industrial property tax relief program, another for companies that perform research and development, and a sales tax break on manufacturing sales — are the primary drivers of the state’s revenue shortage.

Grassley said he is willing to examine the state’s myriad tax credits and whether some could be reduced or eliminated. He has introduced legislation that would start that process.

However, Grassley said he would like any change in state tax credits to be a part of a larger overhaul of state tax laws.

“I think the other party (Democrats) looks at the tax credits saying that money should go to be spent (in other areas of the budget). Philosophically, I would look at it as, can we do tax policy better in the state of Iowa than just doing a bunch of different tax credits. Could we do something that benefits all Iowans,” Grassley said. “But looking at the tax credits, I think, is healthy for us to do if the objective is how can we make Iowa’s tax climate more competitive with other states.”

Roederer said he thinks the impact of tax credits on the budget is overstated. He said two programs that have experienced some of the largest growth in the past half-decade are two programs largely supported by Democrats: the earned income tax credit, which benefits low-income taxpayers, and a program that helps cities rebuild aging buildings.

“To say that is the reason (for the budget troubles) is, I don’t think the numbers support that,” Roederer said.

Missing the mark

Whatever factors may be influencing state revenues, those revenues still continue to increase.

One critical issue that led to this year’s budget cuts was a misjudgment by the budget estimating panel. The group lowered its projections three times, in October, December and January, and the state was forced to cut the current budget with only a few months remaining.

The estimating panel meets quarterly to project the coming year’s state revenue. Its December estimate is used by the governor and state lawmakers to craft the next year’s budget.

This year the panel reduced its estimate by more than $90 million in December, and then by another $130 million in March, leaving the governor and state lawmakers to scramble.

The last time the estimating conference guessed too high by such a wide margin was in fiscal years 2009 and 2010 in the immediate wake of the recession.

“Based on indicators we saw at the time, we did our revenue estimate and it appeared, at least we thought, our estimates were going to be accurate. And obviously they were not,” Roederer said. “So you can still have a growing economy, but if your budget is based on an economy that is growing faster than it actually is, then you have a belt-tightening, which is what we’re going through.”

Grassley also has introduced legislation that he said would aim to help streamline the data collection process for the budget estimating panel and make it easier to perform its work. But Grassley conceded at the end of the day legislators will always be working with an estimate.

“That’s like playing the lottery. It’s hard when you’re estimating. There are so many moving parts,” Grassley said. “There is still growth. And that’s why we’ve tried to approach the budgeting process knowing that there’s going to be times when you don’t meet your growth level, and when you spend less you set yourself up in a position that you have a cash reserve or you have some other things that may help you take care of those situations.”

JAMES Q. LYNCH

Iowa lawmakers hope to wrap up the 2017 session this month, but Senate President Jack Whitver thinks there’s an “outside chance” tax reform can be accomplished

However, the Ankeny Republican said it will be hard to do this year because of the state’s revenue and budget situation.

“The reality of the situation is our budget is a little tighter than we had hoped,” Whitver said during taping of Iowa Public Television’s Iowa Press Friday. Lawmakers had to cut the current year budget by nearly $120 million in January and tap the cash reserve fund for about $130 million last month. So majority Republicans want to “do the fiscally responsible thing and get the budget under control before looking at reform.”

Reforming Iowa’s taxes is one of the reasons he ran in 2010, Whitver said, and something he’s been working on since.

“I was hoping we could get to it this year, but it’s looking more and more like this might be a 2018 issue,” he said. Whitver acknowledged it won’t get any easier in an election year, but “frankly, to have real, true, lasting, impactful tax reform is a complicated process.”

As GOP senators look at reform possibilities, everything is on the table, including federal deductibility and tax credits, Whitver said. His priority is lowering individual income tax rates because that would affect the most Iowans and Iowa small businesses.

“The states that are growing and thriving and are prospering right now are the states with the lowest — or even no income tax,” he said. “I’m not sitting here today saying next year we’re going to eliminate the income tax, but the lower we can go on that, I think research shows we can be more prosperous.”

Not only would lower individual income tax rates affect most Iowa taxpayers, but Whitver said it would benefit small business owners like him. His food and fitness businesses are “pass through” businesses that pay individual income tax.

Bottom of Form

“When you talk about corporate tax reform, that really isn’t that big a part of our state budget,” he said. “What we really need to do is reform the individual tax code and that would help thousands of small business owners across the state.”

He ruled out a sales tax increase unless it is accompanied by “major tax reform.”

Looking at the final weeks of the session, Whitver predicts the GOP House and Senate majorities are going to iron out differences in their respective 20-week abortion ban bills. The House version called for a 72-hour waiting period and contained no exceptions for fetal anomalies. The Senate bill included a 24-hour waiting period between the time a woman meets with her doctor and has the procedure. It also allowed an exception for abortions beyond 20 weeks in the case of a fetal anomaly.

Whitver also said lawmakers will provide more money for water quality efforts, will not dismantle the Des Moines Water Works, will ban texting while driving and said that if traffic enforcement cameras aren’t banned they will be “heavily regulated.”

WCF COURIER: Does Altmayer arrest have any connection to missing cousins case?

JEFF REINITZ

Authorities have declined to comment on any investigation into possible links between Jeff Lee Altmayer and the disappearance and deaths of cousins Lyric Cook-Morrissey and Elizabeth Collins.

Altmayer, 57, of Ankeny, is charged with attempting to lure children into his silver passenger car as far west as Onawa — near the Nebraska border — to a mobile home park just east of Dike. He’s also a person of interest in a similar incident at a Cedar Falls park.

Lyric, 10, and Elizabeth, 8, disappeared while riding their bikes in Evansdale on July 13, 2012, and their bodies were found Dec. 5, 2012, in a rural wilderness area in Bremer County. No arrests have been made in their deaths.

Black Hawk County Attorney Brian Williams said investigators in the cousins case are aware of Altmayer. The Iowa Division of Criminal Investigation agent who filed the criminal complaint in Altmayer's Jasper County case is the lead agent in the cousins probe.

In the past, authorities have commented about the rarity of double abductions when talking about the cousins case, and Black Hawk County Sheriff Tony Thompson said he found "interesting" the fact at least one of Altmayer's crimes involve approaching a pair of girls at the same time.

The double abduction angle also has been a red herring for cousins investigators. In 2013, authorities began looking into Michael Klunder for possible ties to Lyric and Elizabeth's deaths. Klunder, a 42-year-old farm worker who had served prison time for abductions, picked up two girls near a Dayton bus stop in May 2013. One fled, and he killed the other before taking his own life. Investigators eventually ruled out Klunder as a suspect in the cousins case after accounting for his whereabouts.

Reached Wednesday, Elizabeth's father, Drew Collins, said he wasn't familiar with the Altmayer case and said authorities haven't contacted him about it. However, he remembers hearing about the enticement attempts last summer before Altmayer was arrested.

Collins is skeptical about any connection to his daughter's death.

Bottom of Form

"It doesn't seem like that would fit," Collins said. "Whoever this is, I think if he takes a couple of little girls, why would he let them go if he already killed a couple kids."

Collins said he's heard countless leads and rumors since his daughter's death. It can be maddening, he said.

"I think something different every day, man. I think in my head, 'it could be this,' but the next week or the next day or 20 minutes later, I'm thinking 'it's this guy or that guy.' I've heard a ton of names, I can't keep them all in my brain. All I can do is speculate, and I think about it all day, every day," Collins said.

LEE: Branstad no fan of granting pardons

His rate since 2011 is lowest in more than six decades

Since returning to the governor's office in 2011, Terry Branstad has granted fewer pardons on average than any Iowa governor in more than six decades.

His record of granting reduced jail sentences is similarly stingy.

A review of Iowa gubernatorial records going back to 1949 — a span covering 11 administrations — shows Branstad, since his return to office in 2011, granted fewer pardons than any other Iowa governor during that time span.

Branstad is closer to the middle of that pack for granting commutations, or reduced sentences, since 2011. However, remove the roughly three dozen commutations that were the direct result of a 2012 U. S. Supreme Court ruling that negated lifetime sentences for juveniles, and Branstad once again drops to the fewest granted since at least 1949.

A pardon forgives an individual for a crime committed and restores lost rights.

A commutation reduces an individual's sentence and makes him or her eligible for parole.

"I've always tried to be very thoughtful and very judicious in making these decisions. The governor is given the extraordinary power of being able to grant pardons," said Branstad, a Republican who was a lawyer before being first elected to public office — the Iowa House — in 1972.

Branstad has approved just more than four pardons per year, on average, since 2011.

Not only is that the lowest average of any governor since 1949, it is dramatically lower than the averages posted by Branstad's two immediate predecessors, both of whom were Democrats.

Chet Culver, who governed Iowa from 2007 to 2010, approved an average of nearly 24 pardons per year, a rate six times higher than Branstad. Tom Vilsack, who led Iowa for two terms from 1999 to 2006, approved more than 12 pardons per year.

Even Gov. Robert Ray, a Republican under whom Branstad served as lieutenant governor, granted nearly a dozen pardons per year on average, or a rate three times higher than Branstad's.

Since 2011, Branstad has been slightly stricter even than his previous self: He approved an annual average of seven pardons during his first stint as governor from 1983 to 1999.

Branstad said he believes a governor's power to pardon should be used sparingly. In addition to the normal application process, he requires a face-to-face interview with the applicant.

"I believe a pardon, which is an extraordinary power, which basically eliminates that conviction from their record, should only be granted if you're very confident this person is an exemplary citizen who has given back and helped other people in substantial ways," he said. "So, I have required a personal interview. I want to be able to look them straight in the eye. I want to feel confident that they're never going to commit another crime, that they're never going to embarrass me or the people of the state of Iowa."

Branstad is even less a fan of commutations.

During his first, 16-year term in office, he approved just two reduced sentences. In his second, six-year stint, he has approved 39 commutations, but 38 of those were in response to that U.S. Supreme Court ruling.

Take those out and Branstad, during 22 years in office, has approved three reduced sentences overall.

"Most governors keep in mind they're running for re-election almost always. The worst thing you can do is be called soft on crime," said Robert Rigg, a Drake University Law School professor who specializes in criminal law. "No politician ever wanted to get stuck with being soft on crime. Certainly, Terry Branstad can never be accused of being soft on crime."

Branstad's rare commutations are not as strikingly different from his predecessors as were his pardons. Culver granted no commutations during his four years in office; Vilsack granted seven during his eight years; Ray granted an average of just two per year during his 14 years in office.

The Iowa governors with the highest rates of commutations held office during the 1950s. Leo Hoegh granted 30 in two years, and Herschel C. Loveless averaged 12 per year during his one term.

"Any time you deal with a governor, you're dealing with the political office. And any governor's staff is going to sit there and try to review the downside of doing a parole, or commutations, or a pardon," Rigg said. "I'm sure all governors, whether Terry Branstad or somebody else, is going to take that into the calculus of whether you grant a pardon or commutation. But hopefully that's not the only reason."

When pardons and commutations are combined and averaged, Branstad's separate tenures account for two of the three lowest among all Iowa governors since at least 1949. If those commutations that were the result of that U.S. Supreme Court ruling are removed, Branstad's tenures are the two lowest.

Branstad received nearly 400 requests for pardons since 2011 and approved 26. He received almost 90 requests for commutations and granted 39. Branstad said the application process for pardons and commutations is thorough, and justified his rare approvals as having public safety in mind.

"We go through a very extensive process. We do an extensive (Iowa Division of Criminal Investigation) background investigation, it has to go before the parole board before it ever comes to me," Branstad said. "The good news is we've not had the tragedies that have occurred in some other states where governors haven't been as careful or judicious and people that they pardoned have then committed other serious crimes."

P.S. Ruckman, a professor at Rock Valley College in Rockford, Ill., who writes a blog on executive clemency, said while commutations can be risky, he thinks there is little downside to granting pardons.

"When I see a pardon number that low, I just don't get why that is not in the hundreds," Ruckman said. "Because, again, the political risks there are just about zero."

Ruckman said governors appear to be motivated, in part, by wanting to avoid granting a pardon or a commutation to an individual who then commits another crime. Ruckman and Rigg both noted George H.W. Bush's 1988 campaign ad that used the example of a felon who raped a woman after he escaped while on a weekend furlough program supported by Bush's opponent, Michael Dukakis. Even though that individual was given neither a commutation nor a pardon, Ruckman and Rigg said they think that kind of example weighs on governors when making those decisions.

"There's something to this idea that you should be careful, but you should be careful anyway," Ruckman said. "If you look into those high-profile things, they're almost always about commutations (not pardons). The idea that there is some risk to restoring rights is just lunacy."

WHOTV: ISU Sees 20% Decrease in International Student Applications, Says Political Climate is Responsible

Iowa State University is seeing fewer international applications as places of higher education are facing similar issues nationwide.

The school says it has received 20% fewer international applications than the year before. Forty percent of colleges across the country also report reduced interest from international students, and ISU says the reason why is clear.

"Some of our students are just concerned about safety and how welcome they're going to be in the community. So with the executive orders issued, it has some of them a little concerned about will they be welcomed once they get to the U.S.," said Director of Admissions Katharine Johnson Suski.

The executive orders aimed at stopping travel from several predominantly Muslim countries and President Trump's campaign stance on China is not going unnoticed by potential students. ISU's applications from China are down 30%, and those from predominantly Muslim countries are down 60% to 80%.

"Certainly it saddens me when students don't feel safe here because, really, we know students are going to be very welcome here and taken care of in Ames," said Suski.

International student Waasay Mirza came to study from Pakistan, and says the problem is one of perception.

"I didn't feel uncomfortable, especially on this campus. People were really good, they helped me out," said Mirza.

Mirza came four years ago to study electrical engineering, and said being an international student has changed his life for the better.

"You get a lot of exposure, you get to learn a lot of things, and not only that, you get to see and meet so many different cultures and different diverse communities that you learn a lot," he said.

This is a message the college is trying to drive home as they participate in the national "You are Welcome Here Campaign."

"The You are Welcome Here Campaign will be a video of a lot of our students, faculty, and staff standing there saying 'you are welcome,' some in their native languages so students can hear that message from across campus," said Suski.

Suski also said representatives from the school recently returned from a trip to China, where international alumni spoke to prospective students about coming to America to study.

ISU says while international applications to the United States are down, applications to schools in Canada are on the rise.

KCCI: Six years later: Ashley Okland's murder still unsolved

Saturday marks the sixth anniversary of real estate agent Ashley Okland's shooting death.

Okland, 27, was working as a real estate agent in West Des Moines when she was found shot on April 8, 2011, at 558 Stone Creek Court, a model town home for a new development.

She was rushed to Iowa Methodist Medical Center in Des Moines, where she later died.

Investigators have interviewed hundreds of witnesses since her death, but no one has been charged in the case. West Des Moines police have said it remains an active investigation.

The case sparked new calls throughout the real estate industry to increase safety for real estate agents.

Anyone with information on the case is asked to call the West Des Moines Police Department at 515-222-3344 or Crime Stoppers of Polk County at 515-223-1400.

The Gazette: Branstad expects to sign firearms bill following review

Legislation makes 'monumental' changes to Iowa's gun laws

Gov. Terry Branstad said Friday he expects to sign legislation making major changes to Iowa's firearms laws but he is reserving judgment until he and his staff have time to review the provisions of House File 517 that received final House approval on Thursday.

"Obviously, we want to review it in its final form, but generally I've been a strong supporter of the Second Amendment and I believe the legislation passed with bipartisan support with a pretty strong margin,” Branstad said in an interview. “I’m inclined to be supportive but I want to reserve judgment until I get a chance to review it in its final form.”

Branstad said he had some concerns with the original version passed by the Iowa House but those were addressed in changes adopted by the Iowa Senate that were accepted by representatives Thursday before sending it to his desk for consideration.

Included in House File 517 is a controversial “stand your ground” provision that states a law-abiding citizen does not have a duty to retreat in a public place before using deadly force when confronted with danger to life or property.

The bill also would allow children below the age of 14 to handle pistols or revolvers under the supervision of an adult parent, guardian or instructor; pre-empt local ordinances restricting gun rights; create a uniform permit to carry weapons; provide for five-year permits to acquire handguns rather than single-year permits; and create confidentiality for those with permits, legalize short-barreled rifles and shotguns and allow those with permits to carry handguns in the Iowa Capitol and other public buildings.

Iowa Republican Party Chairman Jeff Kaufmann praised Speaker Pro Tempore Matt Windschitl and House and Senate Republicans for their work in shepherding the bill through both chambers of the Legislature in a bipartisan fashion. He called the bill “the most monumental piece of pro-Second Amendment legislation in Iowa’s history.”

Earlier in the week, members of Iowans for Gun Safety expressed concerns about the bill and on Friday, the Rev. Jeremy J. Brigham, executive director of the organization, wrote Branstad a letter urging him to veto the bill.

“This bill is particularly dangerous to men of color, women and children and many from these communities have joined us in speaking out,” Brigham said in his letter.

“Gov. Branstad, we believe it is particularly important that you veto this bill. As ambassador to China, like your predecessors, you will be asked to protect the rights of minorities in China. This bill ... threatens the rights of minorities in Iowa and we ask that you veto this bill and protect the rights of minorities in Iowa.”

If the bill becomes law, members of the Iowa Chapter of Moms Demand Action for Gun Sense in America said Iowa will become only the second state to enact a new “stand-your-ground” law since the killing of Trayvon Martin in Florida in 2012.

“In the weeks since this bill was introduced, lawmakers have listened thoughtfully to the widespread concerns about certain portions of it, and we’re grateful they removed dangerous sections that would have gutted Iowa’s background check and permit-to-carry requirements,” said Amber Gustafson of the Iowa Chapter of Moms Demand Action for Gun Sense in America.

“Still, we remain deeply concerned that the stand-your-ground and punitive pre-emption portions of this bill would leave our communities less safe,” Gustafson added in a statement. Stand-your-ground laws embolden people to escalate everyday disputes, and the statistics from states that have passed them are deeply troubling. We’ll be urging the governor to keep our state from following their concerning lead.”

Burlington Hawk-Eye Editorial: A wise move

Rex Troute, Steve Delaney

Bottom of Form

There is a bill on Gov. Terry Branstad's desk that would consolidate elections in Iowa. School board and municipal elections would be held on the same day.

While many times on this page we take exception to what's happening in the Statehouse, this is one measure we can support, and we hope the governor signs this bill into law.

Lobbyists for schools oppose this bill. They haven't articulated why and there really is no objective reason to oppose a measure that would encourage more people to cast a ballot for someone to represent us.

A check of the records over the years reveals school elections, held in early September, have generated embarrassingly low turnout. It's been a disservice to the taxpayers who must pay the bills. It's been a disservice to the people who put their names on the ballot.

We ask people to serve and then hold them accountable for their service. That's the trade-off of public service. Greater voter turnout isn't all that much to ask.

One would think school lobbyists would embrace a law designed to get more people to the polls, get more people involved in the process. Instead, they oppose it.

That's unfortunate. And troubling.

Moreover, school districts typically charge taxpayers more than other government entities. Shouldn't they want more involvement among the public?

And equally, municipal elections have had terrible turnout when not combined with national elections.

We should remember, it's our local representatives — city council members, school board members, county supervisors — who have the most impact on us, and our pocketbooks.

We preach frequently the need for people to get involved in their government. Voting is the most important part of that process. Government should make voting convenient for people. With today's technology, there's no reason voting couldn't be done on someone's home computer. The hope here is that day will soon come.

After all, if we can pay all of our bills online, and grab cash from an ATM machine, and trust that it's secure, surely we can vote online as well. But, as with most things related to government, change takes time.

This new law will, we believe, get more people to participate in the process of electing representatives who are to work on our behalf. It's difficult to imagine why someone would be opposed to that.

Here's hoping the governor isn't opposed to that concept.

Centerville Daily lowegian: Main Street Iowa honors outstanding achievements

Centerville reaches $1 million benchmark and Ryan Stober receives leadership award during ceremony honoring award winning projects, entrepreneurs and volunteers

Main Street Iowa hosted the 31st annual Main Street Iowa awards celebration on Friday, April 7 at Hoyt Sherman Place in Des Moines. The program honored the efforts of those who work day in and day out in downtown revitalization in Iowa. The event was attended by approximately 550 individuals representing communities across the state.

Main Street Iowa has annually presented awards honoring outstanding accomplishments, activities and people that are making a difference in Iowa's Main Street districts. Projects large and small are recognized and serve as outstanding examples of what historic commercial district revitalization is all about.

Fifteen projects and activities occurring in local Main Street communities were selected to be recognized from the 160 competitive nominations submitted. The honors were presented by Gov. Terry E. Branstad, Lt. Gov. Kim Reynolds and Debi Durham, director of the Iowa Economic Development Authority.

"The Main Street Iowa program has stood the test of time since its introduction in 1985. The program continues to bring businesses, jobs, investment and vitality to our states' communities, both big and small," stated Branstad. "The Main Street Approach works, and Main Street Iowa has been a national model because we are creative, we embrace change, we demand local initiative and action, while holding strong to our roots as an historic preservation program."

"Healthy, historic commercial districts are a key deciding factor for industrial and business recruitment," said Reynolds. "Since 1986, local Main Street programs have made a significant impact on Iowa's economy with 4,514 new businesses and a net gain of 13,402 jobs. More than 740 building projects have been reported with an investment in those rehabs of over $2 billion. Last year alone, the Main Street Iowa network surpassed 156,135 total documented hours of human capital invested into Iowa's downtown revitalization efforts. This demonstrates a tremendous commitment to Iowa's Main Streets."

During the event, 10 communities were recognized for reaching significant benchmarks based on private dollar investments made in the purchase and revitalization of properties within their respective commercial districts. Centerville and Lansing were recognized for reaching the $1 million benchmark in the last year and Ft. Madison was honored for $2 million in local investment. Ames and Guthrie Center were recognized for achieving the $5 million level. Des Moines Sixth Avenue, Chariton, Corning, State Center and Ottumwa all attained $10 million in local investment since being designated as local Main Street programs. Four communities were recognized for significant anniversaries. Osceola was recognized for 20 years of participation as a designated Main Street community. Cedar Falls, Spencer and West Des Moines were recognized for 30 year anniversaries.

Two special awards were presented as well. James Walsh received the Spirit of Main Street Award, an honor that recognizes the person, organization, community or project which best demonstrates the true meaning and spirit of "Main Street at Work." The community of Oskaloosa was honored with a Signature Project Award for their inspiring and innovative place-making efforts in beautification, promotion and partnership.

In 1985, the Iowa Legislature adopted the National Main Street Center's Four Point Approach to district revitalization by establishing Main Street Iowa within the agency that is now the Iowa Economic Development Authority. Since its inception, the state program and its communities have been considered examples of excellence in the national effort to revitalize historic commercial districts across the country.

The Gazette Editorial: Affordable Housing: Second chances & better processes

Elected officials don't often get second chances, or clear-cut strategies for complex problems. Right now Cedar Rapids City Council members have both.

Minnesota-based nonprofit CommonBond Communities has submitted an updated plan for Crestwood Ridge, a northwest side housing project that fell shy of supermajority support last fall amid outcry from neighborhood residents.

Awarded $8 million in federal tax credits through the Iowa Finance Authority to develop alongside Edgewood and Crestwood roads, Crestwood Ridge included a mix of market rate and affordable apartments, including five supportive housing units. Staff from Willis Dady was tapped to provide case management for those five tenants.

Council members rejected rezoning for the project in October, when a majority neighbors voiced concerns about area sidewalks, increased traffic, lot density and water runoff. The updated Crestwood plan addresses these issues, so the nonprofit is requesting the city forego its typical 1-year delay and reconsider the project now, before the grant expires.

We continue to support the development because it earned city support for its grant application, met the strict criteria of the competitive grant, aligns with the comprehensive plan, won the recommendation of city staff and, most importantly, fills a long-standing affordable supportive housing gap. We also remain impressed by CommonBond and its partnership with Willis Dady.

Although most national reports rate the Midwest, Iowa and Cedar Rapids as generally affordable, the reality is a lack of local housing stock has increased local demand and cost. Rental vacancy rates in the city hover around 2 percent, and more than 40 percent of area renters are cost-burdened. Many households are only one financial crisis away from added reliance on taxpayer-funded safety nets or homelessness.

To make matters worse, the Trump administration wants to cut $6.2 billion, or 13 percent, from the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development. Specifically targeted are two programs that help people secure and sustain affordable housing — Community Development Block Grants, which fund initiatives ranging from disaster aid to police engagement to anti-poverty efforts like Meals on Wheels, and the HOME Investment Partnership, which helps low-income citizens repair existing homes.

Other HUD programs related to housing are in danger as well, including rental assistance, heating and air-conditioning aid, energy-efficiency assistance and various other local government partnerships like AmeriCorps and the Interagency Council on Homelessness. The Self-Help Homeownership Opportunity and Choice Neighborhoods programs, which aim to replace distressed public housing with mixed-income development, are on the chopping block too.

Given what's happening in Washington, you'd think Iowa lawmakers would be doing more to help communities prepare for worst-case scenarios. Instead, they are supporting similar policies and implementing laws that further erode the middle class, adding more lowans to the list of those searching for housing and other assistance.

That's the economic and political backdrop Cedar Rapids Council members need to consider before they once again refuse $8 million in housing tax credits, newly offered neighborhood improvements and proven affordable housing project management partners.

This is a multifaceted challenge that needs public-private coordination and public buy-in.

Healthy communities offer diverse housing options for people at all levels of the economic ladder. Business owners, retirees, farm laborers and bus drivers all need a place to live. When they can't find one, negatives ripple out.

For instance, a lack of workforce housing impedes the ability of employers to attract talent, leaving jobs unfilled and companies thinking twice about local expansions. And, when workers can't live near employers, they must travel further. Individual cars increase traffic and impact air quality. Alternatively, public transit faces greater demands in an ever-widening service area, which costs taxpayers.

Throughout Linn County, only eight supportive housing units are open to the public. And yet housing is the foundation for well-being — food security, economic contribution, health management, stability.

This housing gap won't be closed if strategies are limited to owner-occupied, large-lot single-family housing — or if all options are regulated to only certain neighborhoods.

This is a test of political will we cannot afford to fail. Fortunately, the Safe, Equitable and Thriving Communities Task Force subcommittee on housing has recommendations:

- Expand financial incentives for development of affordable housing throughout the city
- Build community capacity for supportive services programming
- Implement ongoing landlord education efforts
- Target nuisance property owners
- Develop partnerships to revitalize aging housing stock
- Remove barriers faced by specific populations
- Strengthen and support neighborhood associations
- Coordinate and unify affordable housing efforts

While these objectives are fully and individually possible, they are more easily accomplished by first focusing on the final item.

As the task force noted “at present, there is no coordinated, collaborative, unifying body or effort that develops and implements a strategic communitywide vision for affordable housing.”

That must change. We agree with the task force that Cedar Rapids needs a group — perhaps something similar to the Johnson County Affordable Housing Coalition or the long-dormant Affordable Housing Commission mandated by municipal code — with the necessary political capital to drive public policy. Ideally, this group will spur additional regional opportunities.

Dr. Mary Wilcynski and Stacey Walker, who served as co-chairs of the SET Task Force, noted that the group's recommendations were derived from discussions with several housing experts, many of whom served on the subcommittee. They aren't commentary on any one proposal, but an attempt to establish a more comprehensive approach.

"We do know that barriers to affordable housing currently exist in our community and everyone interested in a safe, equitable and thriving community should take the challenge of affordable housing seriously," they said as part of a joint statement.

"It is imperative that local governments work with nonprofit organizations and good developers to bring more affordable housing options to our city. ... The need for safe, affordable housing is not going away, therefore it is incumbent upon leaders to act."

Perhaps due to political aspirations or concern about the next election, needed and initially supported Cedar Rapids housing projects have been successfully derailed by small groups of citizens. Each time this happens, the city's relationships with established housing developers erode, more groups are emboldened to read from the same noisy playbook, and the diverse housing supply needed for the city to thrive is delayed.

Whether the updated Crestwood development stands or falls, it shouldn't have come to this. Taxpayers shell out thousands each year for professionals who use council-approved tools like the comprehensive plan and city ordinances to determine details like landscaping and water retention.

Given the inability of council to consider recent housing projects by the standards of merit they established, we are no longer convinced the current system provides a level playing field for all developers or projects. Time for changes. Let's start with a fearless and politically-savvy team committed to meeting the city's long-term and diversified housing goals.

The Gazette Column: This is no time for a constitutional convention

Todd Dorman

So amid the deepening political divisions and thrill-a-minute volatility of our post-truth Trumpian times, Republicans running our Legislature think the moment is right to grab us by the Constitution.

Last month, the Iowa House voted 58-38 along party lines to petition Congress to convene a constitutional convention under Article V of the U.S. Constitution. The convention, according to House Joint Resolution 12, would be "limited to consideration and support of amendments that impose fiscal restraints on the federal government, and amendments that limit the power and jurisdiction of the federal government, and no amendments on any other topic."

So just money, power and jurisdiction. What else is there?

It's now awaiting action in the Iowa Senate. Its floor manager there, Sen. Jason Schultz, R-Schleswig, said a debate will come "soon."

The resolution's writers have a flare for drama. It addresses our "crushing national debt." It accuses our federal government of "abuses of power" and talks of how it's "invaded the legitimate role of states" through federal mandates. It has "ceased to live under proper interpretation of the Constitution."

Stirring, to be sure. But the convention won't come in time to stop the feds from, for instance, invading Iowa with a fresh $225 million transfusion to save Gov. Terry Branstad's hemorrhaging Medicaid scheme. Such future federal incursions, funding roads, crop insurance and water quality, surely could be halted. Ask your nearest county supervisor, after lawmakers' 2017 local control pre-emption fest, about abuses of power, legitimate roles and unfunded mandates.

But I digress.

State Rep. Zach Nunn, R-Bondurant, led the charge in the House on March 15, insisting a constitutional convention would be like a “subcommittee,” or simply a “proving ground for new ideas.” It can happen if 34 state legislatures approve petitions. Nine have taken the plunge, including Arizona, Georgia, Alaska, Florida, Alabama, Tennessee, Indiana, Oklahoma and Louisiana. Other states, including Wisconsin and Ohio, are debating the issue.

Some con-con backers claim as many as 30 states have passed resolutions, counting actions taken years or even decades ago. Maryland just rescinded its resolution, passed in 1977.

“If not us, then who? If not now, when?” Nunn asked the House as debate opened.

It was hardly a debate for the ages.

Minority Democrats questioned the wisdom of lecturing Congress at a time when Iowa’s budget is a mess. That didn’t sit well with Rep. Chip Baltimore, R-Boone, who called a “point of order,” accusing Democrats of breaking House rules by going off topic. Apparently you can’t discuss state budgetary imprudence in a debate over federal budgetary imprudence. Somehow, his point was well taken by House Speaker Linda Upmeyer, R-Clear Lake.

It was not until Rep. Tim Kacena, D-Sioux City, rose to speak did we get a solid assessment of the convention drive.

“I can honestly say this resolution scares the hell out of me,” said Kacena, a retired firefighter who probably knows scary when he sees it. “This is dangerous.”

The thought of popping the hood on the Constitution at this point in our history is pretty scary. Our facts now are alternative. Our political cash comes in two flavors, shady and dark. Our nation just put a tweeting huckster in the Oval Office. Scrapping health insurance for 24 million people is what passes for sound public policy. We’re still trying to recover from the Bowling Green massacre.

A convention, now? Maybe the Russians will send delegates.

Sure, it takes 34 states to call a convention and 38 states to ratify any amendments it yields. No worries. That will never happen. Just like Donald Trump will never be president. Thank goodness.

I’m not going to defend the crushing national debt or any other boneheaded action taken by the federal government. There are many. And I can think of ways I’d like to change the Constitution.

But when the hottest trend in governing is called “the nuclear option,” the time to change the Constitution is not now. The people to do it is not us.

Legislatures across the country, including Iowa’s, are shoving through sweeping ideologically-driven initiatives with all the care, caution and concern for consequences of Visigoths on a Roman holiday. They would pick the convention delegates. That ought to work out well.

And a convention would not necessarily be “limited.”

We’ve had one such convention, in 1787. It was called by Congress to amend the Articles of Confederation. Instead, delegates tossed the articles and crafted an entirely new Constitution. It was a masterstroke for the future of America. It is not an example of cautious restraint.

Drake University Professor Dennis Goldford, who teaches constitutional law, said there were strong objections to straying from Congress’ original charge in 1787. James Madison answered those criticisms in Federalist 40.

"He said, look, if you think things are so tough and difficult right now that we can't stay where we are, then go ahead and vote for this new Constitution, and we'll take that as your consent to the rather irregular procedure we adopted," Goldford said. "If you think that we had a runaway convention ... vote against the new proposed Constitution.

"So we had precisely this issue as far back as 1787-1788. Our only constitutional convention in American history was itself a runaway convention," Goldford said.

And if a convention's actions sparked a court challenge, it's uncertain what jurisdiction the courts would have, Goldford said.

"This opens up a huge can of worms," Goldford said.

I say let's not open that can.

Conservatives who want big changes at the federal level should note they currently control Congress and the White House, with a Supreme Court majority on the way. A convention isn't necessary, unless you want to do things so unpopular they can't be accomplished through the normal political process. Many of these proposals also are known as bad ideas.

And HJR 12 is a bad idea. The Senate should grab it and scrap it.

QC Times: Q-C lawmakers weigh in on Syria strikes

Ed Tibbetts

Top of Form

Bottom of Form

In mostly measured tones, lawmakers representing the Quad-Cities got behind President Donald Trump's decision to launch missile strikes against Syria. But there also were warnings, mostly from Democrats, about the prospect of a deeper commitment there.

The strikes, which came late Thursday, also rekindled calls in some corners of Congress for lawmakers to come up with an authorization for use of military force in the event there was to be further action. Rep. Dave Loebsack, D-Iowa, said Friday that Trump should have come to Congress before launching Thursday's strikes.

Republicans said Trump showed resolve, and that this represented a break from the Obama administration.

"Assad's actions follow a policy under President Obama that lacked any consequences for heinous crimes against Syrian civilians," Grassley said. "The action taken by President Trump to prevent further use of chemical weapons by Assad or anyone else was appropriate."

Sen. Joni Ernst, R-Iowa, praised the strikes Thursday night. "Unlike the Obama administration, the Trump administration is showing global leadership and we must work to find an end to the root causes of this crisis," Ernst said in a statement.

Republicans have long criticized Obama over Syria. In 2013, he raised the prospect of military action after government forces launched a chemical attack. The year before, Obama had said chemical weapons would cross a red line.

Obama decided ultimately against launching an attack on his own and went to Congress for authorization. But Congress took no action, either.

As for the region's Democrats, Sen. Dick Durbin, D-Illinois, called Thursday's strikes a "measured response." Sen. Tammy Duckworth, D-Illinois, said they sent a "clear and measured message" to Syrian President Bashar al-Assad.

Rep. Cheri Bustos, D- Illinois, called Thursday's action a "proportional response."

However, they also said Trump needs to lay out a strategy before any further action is taken.

Bottom of Form

Duckworth raised concerns about heightened tensions with Russia. "After weeks of sending dangerously mixed signals on Syria, the president owes it to our troops, who are now in greater danger, to clearly and unequivocally outline the long-term strategic end-state he is seeking to achieve in Syria and the region," she said.

Bustos said the president "must present the American people and Congress a clear and transparent strategy to ensure we do not rush into another open-ended conflict in the Middle East."

Loeb sack, meanwhile, also called for a "comprehensive plan." He did not weigh in specifically on the propriety of Thursday's missile strike but said it was important that the U.S. and the world "ensure that Assad is held to account for war crimes committed against his own people."

Grassley also called on the president to "develop a comprehensive strategy with respect to ending the six-year-long crisis in Syria."

QC Times Editorial: No answers in sight as Iowa exchange crumbles

Quad-City Times editorial board

Top of Form

Bottom of Form

Iowa's health insurance exchange this week became the poster child for self-fulfilling prophecies.

In just 72 hours, Iowa's version of the Affordable Care Act, or Obamacare, crumbled under its own weight and the additional heft a Republican White House with no interest in supporting it.

Wellmark Blue Cross and Blue Shield and Aetna last week both announced departures from Iowa's exchange in 2018, citing mounting financial losses and continued "uncertainty." That leaves Iowa's exchange with just one provider, Medica, which has yet to make its future intentions known. Wellmark and Aetna represent a majority of the Iowa exchange's total plans.

So, now what?

What's clear so far is Republicans in Washington have no answers.

Obamacare has always been a highly compromised, deeply troubled program. Even proponents of the massive federal program lamented its shortcomings. It's over-reliance on young, healthy populations to subsidize the elderly and sick didn't pan out. Obamacare was costly and clunky. But, by most objective measures, it was relatively successful.

Roughly 20 million Americans have health insurance thanks to the ACA. In 2016, national insurance rates reached a record low of 10.6 percent, according to Gallup. That's down from 18 percent in 2013, and it's the working poor -- a population who spent decades one heart attack away from financial ruin -- who benefited most.

An imperfect program, for sure. But Obamacare isn't responsible for the country's astronomically high health care costs. Americans pay more and get less relative to the rest of the developed world, according to the World Health Organization. It even slowed the incessant rise of health insurance premiums, concluded the Congressional Budget Office.

Republicans spent seven years wasting time on meaningless votes to repeal ACA. It was a go-to foil in congressional districts in every purple district throughout the country. It was "evil," they said. They stoked nonsensical fears about "death panels." President Donald Trump has repeatedly called it a "disaster" without bothering to actually understand it and last month promised to let ACA fail when his party couldn't offer any real solutions.

That last bit is the "uncertainty" to which Aetna and Wellmark officials were referring. Trump's promise to starve ACA to death all but doomed an already troubled Iowa exchange.

Bottom of Form

The White House and congressional Republicans, still smarting after last month's failure, spent much of last week in closed-door meetings trying to hash out a replacement to ACA, reported the New York Times. Most of the talks involving the White House concerned placating the GOP's right-wing Freedom Caucus, which killed the party's first attempt at repeal. Proposed concessions included high-risk pools, a downright scam that's failed in multiple states, and the elimination of hugely popular pre-existing conditions protections for consumers.

A bill that already turned the noses of the GOP's reasonable center reeks even worse after this week. Flailing is fine for a minority party. Chaos is not acceptable for the majority that's supposed to govern.

So, we ask again: What now?

Republicans tapped widespread confusion and fear to score political points off Obamacare. They've railed against it without any real solution. They're now actively destabilizing it. And, predictably, Iowa's exchange is quite literally falling apart amid a GOP civil war.

The well-being of thousands of Iowans are at stake here. More than 50,000 benefit from taxpayer subsidized policies on Iowa exchange. Tens of thousands of Iowa's poorest rely on the state's already foundering Medicaid system, expanded as part of the ACA and privatized by Gov. Terry Branstad.

And the very people who sowed discontent and stoked fears have, so far, proven incapable of picking up the pieces.

RI: Ashton Kutcher says good character 'is like your DNA'

APRIL 9, 2017 BY O. KAY HENDERSON

Eastern Iowa native Ashton Kutcher is the latest recipient of a "Pillar of Character" Award named in honor of former Iowa Governor Robert D. Ray.

“Thank you for having me home,” Kutcher said as he took the stage at Saturday’s ceremony in West Des Moines.

The actor who has starred in “That ’70s Show” and the current Netflix series “The Ranch” relied on some of the biochemistry he studied at the University of Iowa to explain the difference between personality and character.

“Personality is kind of the you that you show in the light,” Kutcher said. “...But your character is the you in the light and it’s the you in the darkest moment of your life. It’s just you. It’s like your DNA.”

Kutcher thanked his wife, his parents, his scoutmaster, his teachers and the neighbors from his childhood for their influence on his character.

“I’m the lucky one, but then I also had the great fortune to fail again and again and again,” Kutcher said. “I had the great fortune of going to jail when I was 18 and getting a deferred judgment, because I knew I never wanted to go back.”

Kutcher also talked about how his twin brother, Michael, has influenced his life.

“My brother was born with cerebral palsy and he taught me that loving people isn’t a choice and that people aren’t actually all created equal,” Kutcher said. “...We’re all created incredibly unequal to one another in our capabilities and what we can do and how we think and what we see, but we all have the equal capacity to love one another...He also taught me that he had gifts that I didn’t have...and that every time I felt sorry for him in life, I made him less.”

Kutcher, who is now 39 and the father of two young children, told his parents that with the experience of being a parent, he finally realized how much his own parents loved him.

“And so actually I didn’t come here, ultimately, to receive this award for myself,” Kutcher said. “I came here to receive it for all of you.”

Kutcher has become known as an entrepreneur, investor and philanthropist in addition to his work as an actor. He recently testified against human trafficking during a congressional hearing. Kutcher and his ex-wife, Demi Moore, co-founded a non-profit called “Thorn” that fights “the sexual exploitation of children.”

RI: New leader to take over at the Clarinda prison

APRIL 7, 2017 BY RADIO IOWA CONTRIBUTOR

A new warden has been named for a prison facility in southwest Iowa.

The Board of Corrections has approved the appointment of Randy Gibbs to become Warden of the Clarinda Correctional Facility on April 21. Gibbs is currently Assistant Deputy Director of Institution Operations.

The Clarinda facility currently houses over 900 inmates, many of whom are classified with “special needs” — offenders with mental health issues or intellectual disabilities.

The warden vacancy at Clarinda was created when Sheryl Dahm was appointed in January as Warden of the Iowa Correctional Institution for Women in Mitchellville. That was after former women’s prison warden Pattie Wachtendorf was named the first female warden of the Iowa State Penitentiary in Fort Madison. She replaced Nick Ludwick, who retired.

RI: Grassley, others comment on Supreme Court confirmation vote

Iowa Senator Chuck Grassley, a Republican from New Hartford, spoke to reporters today after the U.S. Senate voted to confirm Neil Gorsuch to the Supreme Court.

“I think that we just witnessed one of the most important votes that a member of the Senate can cast,” Grassley says. “Judge Gorsuch will be an independent voice on that Supreme Court. He proved that by answering questions for 20 hours.”

Grassley is the chair of the Senate Judiciary Committee which holds hearings on the Supreme Court nominees. The Senate used the so-called “nuclear option” to change the rules so Gorsuch would not need 60 votes to be confirmed. Grassley would ask if that would be a constant negative for Gorsuch in his time on the High Court. The senator says it will not be because Democrats set the precedent of changing the rules back in 2001.

“When they said ‘we’ve got to change the ground rules.’ We’ll they did change the ground rules. Those ground rules were changed for a lot of nominees that George W. Bush had, those same ground rule...continued through the Obama administration,” Grassley says. “So those Democrats who met back in 2001 poisoned the well that got us to where we are.”

Some Democrats said they were against Gorsuch’s nomination because Grassley would not hold a hearing on a judge President Obama nomination. He was asked how the whole fight over the Supreme Court nomination will impact other work in the U-S Senate.

“I think the comity will be back to the Senate in regards to legislation — but I think it’s going to take somebody like Senator Schumer who started this whole slippery slope back in 2001 — to drill a new well that’s not going to be poisoned,” Grassley replied.

Grassley says there are plenty of Republicans and Democrats who are willing to work together to make that new start when it comes to selecting Supreme Court judges.

Iowa other U.S. Senator Joni Ernst, a Republican from Red Oak, voted for Gorsuch and released this statement on her vote:

“I am thrilled that a bipartisan majority has voted to confirm Judge Gorsuch, who is eminently qualified to serve on our nation’s highest court,” said Senator Ernst. “Throughout his career, Judge Gorsuch has shown an unparalleled depth of understanding and respect for our Constitution. He is dedicated to interpreting the text of the Constitution and statutes as they are written, rather than attempting to legislate from the bench. It’s easy to see why Judge Gorsuch was previously confirmed by the Senate with unanimous support – including the support of Minority Leader Chuck Schumer.

“The American people are behind Judge Gorsuch, and I look forward to seeing him take his seat on the bench very soon.”

The group Why Courts Matter Iowa issued this statement in response to the confirmation of Neil Gorsuch, to the U.S. Supreme Court:

“Senator Grassley and Republicans in the Senate just ensured that the Supreme Court will be far more partisan and political than at any time in our country’s history, after voting to end the filibuster for Judge Gorsuch and future nominees. The so-called ‘nuclear option’ completes the partisan hatchet job on the independence of the judiciary that began last year when Grassley and Republicans engaged in unprecedented obstruction of Merrick Garland’s nomination.”

“Working side by side, President Trump, Senator Grassley, and Senate Republicans have undermined the U.S. Senate, an American institution. And their vote today undermines the independence of our highest court in the land.”

“This move to further politicize the judiciary is unfortunate, and it did not have to come to this. Republicans made a choice to strip away more than two centuries of Senate tradition. If they truly cared about bipartisanship, they would have worked across the aisle to put forward a consensus nominee who could receive the 60 votes that 25 of the past 26 justices have earned.”

“President Trump, Senator Grassley, and Senate Republicans won their vote today, but the American people lost. A judge who does not believe in protecting the constitutional rights of every citizen will be given a lifetime appointment because of a partisan vote. That’s not what we expect from our judiciary, or from our Senators, and we deserve far better.”

RI: Key senator: ‘outside chance’ for tax cuts, reform in 2017

The president of the Iowa Senate today said he and other Republicans are anxious to reform and cut Iowa income taxes, but with about two-weeks of scheduled work left in the 2017 legislative session, the task may be tabled ‘til next year.

“I was that hoping we could get to it this year,” Senate President Jack Whitver of Ankeny said. “There’s still an outside chance we could do something, but it’s looking more and more like this might be a 2018 issue.”

Whitver said the delay is mainly because when state tax revenues started falling below expectations, it forced two rounds of cuts to state budget plans.

“The reality of our situation right now in the state of Iowa is our budget is a little tighter than we hoped and we want to focus on getting our budget under control, do the fiscally responsible thing there,” Whitver said, “and then start looking at tax policy.”

After decades of resistance from within the Republican Party, Whitver said it is possible GOP lawmakers will get rid of the deduction that lets Iowans subtract their federal income taxes from their state income tax liability. Only one other state has that deduction and it makes Iowa’s income tax rates appear higher than they actually are.

“The states that are growing and thriving and are prospering right now are the states that have the lowest or even no income tax,” Whitver said. “I’m not sitting here today and saying: ‘Next year we’re going to eliminate the income tax,’ but the lower we can go on that, I think research shows we can be more prosperous.”

Whitver said he is willing to “consider anything” — including a single-rate “flat tax” on income — if it reduces the tax burden “on hard-working Iowans.” Cutting individual income taxes is a higher priority for Whitver than reducing the state’s tax rate on corporate income.

“That really isn’t that big a (part) of our state budget,” Whitver says. “What we really need to do is reform the individual tax code and that would help thousands of small business owners across our state.”

That's because the majority of small business owners do not operate a corporation. They pay taxes on their small business by filing Iowa individual income forms. Whitver made his comments during taping of tonight's "Iowa Press" program that will air on Iowa Public Television at 7:30.

RI: Iowa Supreme Court rules against request for a hospital safety report

The Iowa Supreme Court says information gathered for a patient safety study cannot be used in a lawsuit against a hospital.

Dennis Willard was seriously injured in an accident in Davenport in November of 2011 and was transferred from the hospital there to the University of Iowa Hospitals in Iowa City.

He was sedated for a scan of his stomach to check for injuries. After returning from the scan he had problems with his left arm, and an x-ray found his shoulder was dislocated.

The x-rays taken before the scan had not shown the dislocated shoulder and Willard believed the shoulder was dislocated as he was moved for the scan, so he filed a lawsuit against the hospital. He sought to get a copy of what's called a Patient Safety Net report that was filed about an incident during the scan.

The incident reports are intended to help improve the safety of hospitals and under Iowa law are required to remain confidential. The district court ruled he should be given the report as part of the discovery phase of the lawsuit.

The Iowa Supreme Court ruled Willard cannot have the report as the confidentiality given the reports allows hospital staff to feel comfortable reporting problems and that information is utilized to improve patient safety by reducing preventable medical errors. The ruling says the protection is intended to apply to documents or communications that constitute "patient safety work product."

POLITICO: White House on edge as 100-day judgment nears

'We've got essentially two-and-a-half weeks to turn everything around,' says one Trump staffer.

By SHANE GOLDMACHER

President Donald Trump has far more than three years left in his first term. But inside his pressure-cooker of a White House, aides and advisers are sweating the next three weeks.

The symbolic 100-day mark by which modern presidents are judged menaces for an image-obsessed chief executive whose opening sprint has been marred by legislative stumbles, legal setbacks, senior staff kneecapping one another, the resignation of his national security adviser and near-daily headlines and headaches about links to Russia.

The date, April 29, hangs over the West Wing like the sword of Damocles as the unofficial deadline to find their footing— or else.

But however real Trump's frustrations are with the three rival power centers he has installed — chief of staff Reince Priebus, son-in-law Jared Kushner and chief strategist Stephen Bannon — top officials inside and around the White House don't expect Trump to make any drastic changes until after 100 days, lest staff turmoil stories swamp a key stretch of media coverage.

That reprieve — unless Trump simply decides he's had enough — has both bought his staff a little time and put them on edge.

"One hundred days is the marker, and we've got essentially two-and-a-half weeks to turn everything around," said one White House official. "This is going to be a monumental task."

For a president who often begins and ends his days imbibing cable news, the burden has fallen heavily on a press team that recognizes how well they sell Trump's early tenure in the media will likely color the president's appetite for an internal shake-up.

That was the backdrop for a tense planning session for the 100-day mark last week.

More than 30 Trump staffers piled into a conference room in the Eisenhower Executive Office Building adjoining the White House, according to a half-dozen attendees who described the Tuesday meeting.

Mike Dubke, Trump's communications director, and his deputy, Jessica Ditto, kicked off the discussion of how to package Trump's tumultuous first 100 days by pitching the need for a "rebranding" to get Trump back on track.

"I think the president's head would explode if he heard that," one of the White House officials present said.

Staffers, including counselor Kellyanne Conway, were broken into three groups, complete with whiteboards, markers and giant butcher-block-type paper to brainstorm lists of early successes. One group worked in the hallway.

"It made me feel like I was back in 5th grade," complained another White House aide who was there. "That's the best way I could describe it."

Dubke, who did not work on the campaign, told the assembled aides that international affairs would present a messaging challenge because the president lacks a coherent foreign policy. Three days later, Trump would order missile strikes in Syria in a reversal of years of previous opposition to such intervention.

"There is no Trump doctrine," Dubke declared.

Some in the room were stunned by the remark.

"It rubbed people the wrong way because on the campaign we were pretty clear about what he wanted to do," said a third White House official in the room, "He was elected on a vision of America First. America First is the Trump doctrine."

One of the administration officials lamented, "We've got a comms team supposedly articulating the president's message [that] does not appear to understand the president's message."

Dubke told POLITICO he was disappointed White House staff would complain in the press rather than in real time.

"It was a brainstorming session and I really wish they had spoken up in the room so that we could have had an open and honest conversation," he said. "It is unproductive adjudicating internal discussions through the media."

As for the rebranding remark, Dubke said that had been misinterpreted. "There is not a need for a rebranding but there is a need to brand the first 100 days," Dubke said. "Because if we don't do it the media is going to do it. That's what our job is."

Trump's communications team is now plotting to divide their first 100 days into three categories of accomplishments, according to people familiar with plans: "prosperity" (such as new manufacturing jobs, reduced regulations and pulling out of the Trans-Pacific Partnership trade deal), "accountability" (following through on swamp-draining campaign promises such as lobbying restrictions) and "safety/security" (including the dramatic reduction in border crossing and the strike in Syria).

Amid near-constant talk of staff shuffling, Dubke's name has fallen below the radar, in part because he cuts such a low profile. He was a late addition to Trump's team after the initial pick for the job, Jason Miller, bowed out for personal reasons. A behind-the-scenes operator, Dubke has yet to appear on television, Trump's favorite medium.

But as most of Trump's senior team — Cabinet members, military and economic advisers, Bannon, Priebus, Kushner and White House press secretary Sean Spicer — went to Mar-a-Lago last week for the bilateral meeting with China amid the unfolding Syrian situation, Dubke was conspicuously absent and back in D.C.

"That would tell you exactly how he is perceived," said one of the White House officials.

However, another White House official defended Dubke's internal role, saying before his arrival people in the press operation were "doing whatever they wanted to do without a broader set of goals being defined." Dubke imposed structure "and that's going to ruffle some feathers."

Still, the more sympathetic aide to Dubke admitted, "He has not yet integrated into the senior leadership."

The constant presence of senior advisers encircling Trump has created a vicious — and some officials say self-defeating — cycle in which top aides feel they cannot leave his side, lest they lose influence or be perceived to have.

"People are saying, 'Why is everyone traveling with the president?' and in the next breath, 'You must not be important, you're not traveling with the president?'" another White House official complained. "You can't have it both ways."

Trump hired Dubke in mid-February after a frustrating first month of bad press, telling Fox News later that month "in terms of messaging, I would give myself a C or a C+." But even after Dubke's arrival, Trump and his senior team have continued to seek outside advice.

During the failed push to pass health care legislation, Miller drafted a short messaging memo with four bullet points that was given to top White House officials, including Kushner and Bannon, according to four people familiar with the matter.

Miller, who now works for Teneo, the consulting firm created by former aides to Bill and Hillary Clinton, has been spotted around the White House twice in recent weeks, though he has made clear to friends in the administration that he has no interest in joining the White House.

The constant palace intrigue and internal jockeying has left the White House in a state of paralysis.

Trump parted with deputy chief of staff Katie Walsh in late March, his aides are discussing a reorganization and Trump himself has begun floating names to replace Priebus, his chief of staff, for feedback, according to a person close to the White House. On Friday, Trump ordered his two other senior-most advisers, Kushner and Bannon, to settle their differences in a Mar-a-Lago sit down after a week of their increasing shadowboxing through anonymous accusations in the press.

One White House official last week questioned why Bannon was taking on a member of Trump's family

so openly.

“For a Svengali that doesn’t seem like a smart thing to do,” the official said. “I don’t think that ends well for him.”

A White House ally of Bannon noted that despite bumping up against Trump’s son-in-law, he had held sway over the most crucial policy rollouts, such as Trump’s hard line on immigration and trade. “Anyone who thinks that Steve has lost his influence, they don’t know what the f--- they’re talking about,” this person said.

The strikes on Syria, a successful summit with President Xi Jinping of China and Friday’s sit-down between Bannon and Kushner appear to have calmed some frayed nerves. Two people who have spoken with the president in recent days said Trump’s mood has improved.

Still, the question of how to frame the first 100 days remains a challenge.

Trump aides are grappling with the reality that they will end this opening period with no significant legislative achievements other than rolling back Obama-era regulations. Even the White House’s most far-reaching success, the confirmation of Justice Neil Gorsuch to the Supreme Court, required the Senate rewriting its own rules to overcome Democratic opposition.

Though the White House continues to push for progress on stalled health care legislation, there are only five legislative days remaining once Congress returns from a two-week spring break. Plus, another deadline looms: Trump and the Republican-controlled Congress must still pass a bill before April 28 to keep the government running.

If they fail, a shutdown would begin on Trump’s 100th day in office.

Bloomberg: Islamic State Kills Dozens in Egypt Palm Sunday Bombings

Egyptian President Declares 3-Month State of Emergency

Suspected suicide bombers struck two Egyptian churches on Palm Sunday, killing more than 40 people in the deadliest assault on civilians since President Abdel-Fattah El-Sisi’s election nearly three years ago.

Islamic State claimed the attacks on the St. George church in the Nile Delta city of Tanta and St. Mark’s cathedral in Alexandria, according to the U.S.-based SITE Intel Group, which monitors jihadist channels on social media. At least 27 people were killed in the Tanta bombing, the day’s first blast, Health Ministry spokesman Khaled Mogahed said. In Alexandria, at least 16 were killed in an attack on the seat of the Coptic Orthodox church there.

The violence demonstrates Islamic State’s intent to expand its presence in Egypt beyond the rugged confines of the Sinai Peninsula. That will likely add more pressure on El-Sisi to restore order as he seeks to attract foreign capital and placate a population increasingly frustrated with economic hardship.

The bombings come less than a week after El-Sisi met President Donald Trump at the White House, where he was praised for his efforts to fight terrorism. Targeting two major cities outside Sinai lets Islamic State show it’s “still able to operate -- despite this growing pressure -- and to embarrass the Egyptian government after Sisi’s visit to Washington” and before Pope Francis’s visit this month, said Michael Horowitz, director of intelligence at the political risk consultancy Prime Source.

‘Great Confidence’

Trump tweeted that he's "sad to hear about the terrorist attack in Egypt" and has "great confidence that President Al Sisi will handle the situation properly." The U.S. "will continue to support Egypt's security and stability in its efforts to defeat terrorism," State Department spokesman Mark Toner said in a statement. Al Sisi ordered the deployment of military units to help protect vital installations nationwide, the presidency said in a statement.

Egyptian shares dropped after the bombings, with the benchmark EGX 30 Index retreating 1.6 percent, the most since Feb. 27, at the close in Cairo.

The incidents bore the hallmarks of the Islamic State -- multi-pronged attacks aimed at inflicting as much damage as possible while minimizing the group's losses. In Alexandria, one of the casualties was a police officer who blocked the suspected suicide bomber from entering the church after he evaded a metal detector, security footage aired on television showed. In Tanta, the remains of a suspected suicide bomber were found in the church, the state-run Middle East News Agency said, citing an unidentified security official.

The bombings were "a mixed bag" for El-Sisi, said Samuel Tadros, a senior fellow at the Hudson Institute in Washington.

'Dangerous Development'

"On the one hand it reinforces his narrative that Egypt is in war against terrorism, rallying the nation around the flag and so forth," Tadros said. "At the same time the attacks send a message of incompetence of the security apparatus" in containing the militancy, he said.

If the jihadist group proves able to operate more extensively outside of Sinai, "that would be a very dangerous development," he added.

El-Sisi declared that the attacks "will not undermine the resolve and true will of the Egyptian people to counter the forces of evil," according to a statement from the presidency. But the violence against civilians dealt the president a new blow at a time when his support is already being tested by the hardships Egyptians are being forced to endure as part of his economic reform program.

Currency Controls

A November decision to abandon currency controls helped to secure a $12 billion International Monetary Fund loan and attract foreign investors. Yet it has also caused the pound to lose half its value against the dollar, sending prices soaring and annual core inflation climbing to over 33 percent in February.

Bottom of Form

The militant threat exploded after the 2013 military-backed popular uprising against Islamist President Mohamed Mursi and the deadly crackdown on his Muslim Brotherhood group that followed. The expansion of the attacks outside the confines of Sinai and, according to Egyptian media, a new focus on targeting Christians have only proven the jihadists' resilience. A deadly bombing at the Cairo cathedral in December, claimed by Islamic State's local affiliate, killed at least 25 worshippers.

The latest bombing "won't be the last terrorist attack because the state fights terrorism but doesn't fight terrorism-inspiring ideas, which is the main cause of the problem," billionaire Naguib Sawiris wrote on his official Twitter account.

Loyal Backers

Christians, who are widely estimated to make up around 10 percent of the nation's 92 million residents, have long complained of discrimination in the Muslim majority nation. They were among El-Sisi's strongest backers after Mursi was pushed from power, but that loyalty, too, is being strained by the government's failure to contain the assaults on their community.

"This type of attack is the most dangerous, since it inflicts maximum amount of damage on human lives, disrupts tourism, and shakes the image of the state," said Ghanem Nuseibeh, founder of London-based consulting firm Cornerstone Global Associates. "It turns the conflict from a confrontation in the desert to a civil conflict in the heart of Egypt."

"This attack is likely to embolden the government, and provide it with even more legitimacy in its crackdown on Islamists and on dissent," he said.

WSJ: Democrats' Conditions for Tax Overhaul Make Bipartisan Deal Unlikely

GOP attempts to reach across the aisle are complicated by lack of agreement on priorities

By RICHARD RUBIN

Democrats are starting to settle on a price for participating in a tax-code overhaul, and many Republicans won't want to pay it.

Democrats say they oppose net tax cuts and will resist proposals that mostly benefit high-income households. Those priorities diverge from President Donald Trump's repeated promise to "cut the hell out of taxes" and congressional Republicans' plans to lower marginal tax rates and repeal the estate tax.

"Tax reform's got to be responsible and it's got to be progressive," said Sen. Ben Cardin (D., Md.).

Republicans made overtures across the aisle in recent weeks and, in theory, Democratic participation on tax policy could ease legislative challenges for Republicans vexed by slim House and Senate majorities and internal disagreements. By attracting Democratic votes, Republicans could overcome procedural hurdles without uniting fractious wings of their own party.

TRUMP'S FIRST 100 DAYS

There is, at some level, rhetorical room for agreement. Mr. Trump says middle-class tax cuts are a top priority. House Speaker Paul Ryan (R., Wis.) says he's aiming for his plan to be revenue neutral—collecting as much money over the next decade as the current system does. Mix Mr. Trump's class rhetoric, Mr. Ryan's budgetary promise and the prospect of spending on infrastructure and there is a recipe for bipartisanship.

But so far, those priorities aren't widely shared among Republicans and GOP plans haven't matched them. Mr. Trump's campaign plan delivered half its tax cuts to the top 1% of households, according to the Tax Policy Center, a joint project of the Urban Institute and Brookings Institution. House Republicans haven't shown in detail how their plan adds up and don't want to tie infrastructure and taxes together. Lower tax rates on businesses, investors and top earners are a unifying force in the GOP, and many lawmakers are reluctant to give that up to get a deal with Democrats.

Even if the White House and Democrats reach a conceptual agreement on taxes, any accord would drive many Republicans away and require the Trump administration and lawmakers to make decisions on hundreds of details.

Still, White House officials, who declared they are taking the lead on tax policy, have been meeting with Democratic lawmakers. House Ways and Means Chairman Rep. Kevin Brady (R., Texas) met with two groups of Democrats last week.

Democrats say they are wary but listening.

Mr. Trump's unpopularity, especially among Democratic voters, gives lawmakers political advantages in opposing the admin

Part of The Des Moines Register series "Driving Drunk: Iowa's deadly problem."

In December 2013, Miranda Lalla was sent away for up to 25 years after she pleaded guilty to vehicular homicide while intoxicated for running over her friend in a pickup truck.

But two years, one month and eight days later, Lalla walked out of prison a free woman.

"It makes it feel like her life didn't matter," said Jessica Anderson, 28, the niece of Pamela Gross, the 44-year-old Iowa City woman Lalla killed. "I don't understand how you can take someone's life and then suffer very few consequences."

It's a common refrain from families whose loved ones have been killed in crashes caused by intoxicated drivers: Offenders are serving only a fraction of their sentences, which is evidence, they say, that Iowa doesn't treat drunken driving with the seriousness it deserves.

A Des Moines Register analysis of Iowa felony sentences lends credence to their argument.

Over the past six years, 47 people convicted of vehicular homicide while intoxicated were released after serving an average of 6 years and 4 months in prison — roughly one-fourth of their maximum sentence, Iowa Department of Corrections data show.

That's far less on average than inmates serving time for Iowa's other Class B felonies, including arson, robbery and manslaughter, all of which are punishable by up to 25 years in prison.

For example, released offenders serving time for second-degree murder or manslaughter spent 12 years on average behind bars, Iowa Board of Parole data show.

And prisoners doing time for arson or robbery, crimes where a victim may have been injured but not killed, spent seven to 15½ years on average in prison before they were released, a parole board report shows. "What message is that sending Iowa residents? That it's OK to get intoxicated, get in your car and go out and kill someone?" said Frank Harris, director of state government affairs for Mothers Against Drunk Driving, who has spent time in Iowa lobbying lawmakers for legislation that would strengthen Iowa's intoxicated driving laws. "Unfortunately, this is par for the course nationwide."

Others, however, caution that while there should be serious consequences for killing someone while driving drunk, it's equally important to provide treatment to offenders struggling with alcohol addiction. "The sentences should be done on a person-to-person basis," said Lilly Wisely of Clinton, who in 2006 pleaded guilty to vehicular homicide-reckless or eluding and served one year. "I didn't have a previous criminal history or a drunk driving history. "I was scared straight in prison. Serving a longer sentence would not have been beneficial to me at all."

How much time is enough?

Despite decades of attention on the issue, Iowa has struggled to curb the state's problem with drunken driving, which in 2016 resulted in the deaths of at least 84 people from alcohol-related crashes.

The state is investigating another 16 fatal crashes where alcohol is suspected, potentially driving that number higher. Vehicular homicide while intoxicated has been a criminal offense in Iowa since 1911, according to a guide written by the state's Legislative Services Agency.

In 1986, Iowa lawmakers, citing its serious nature, made the offense its own chapter in the state criminal code. They designated the crime as a Class D felony, punishable by up to five years in prison and fines up to $7,500.

Harsher sentences and fines were passed during the next decade, and by 1997, vehicular homicide while intoxicated was designated a Class B felony punishable up to 25 years.

Iowa is one of 14 states that sentences offenders up to 25 years or more for killing someone while driving impaired, but it also has one of the nation's most generous earnedtime policies for inmates. Depending on the crime, many offenders see their sentences cut by more than half the first day they are incarcerated.

On Dec. 2, 2005, Teresa Fagen, 15, was driving home after a Perry High School basketball game when a man fleeing police in a pickup rear-ended her vehicle, killing her. Joseph Phillip Long pleaded guilty to four charges, including vehicular homicide while intoxicated and was sentenced to up to 35 years in prison.

In late 2015, Long, now 46, was released to parole after serving 8 years and 10 months in prison.

"Once a sentence is handed down, you should be required to serve all of that sentence," said Michelle Brecht, 35, of Des Moines, who is Teresa's oldest sister. "When you go through the trial and the sentencing, it's all about the victim, which is the way it should be.

"But when you get to the prison part, it's like they forget there's a victim because they are so busy focusing on ways to get (the offender) out."

Efforts to reach Long were unsuccessful.

Through a spokesperson, parole board chairman John Hodges declined interview requests on what the board considers when deciding whether to release someone on parole. Hodges was appointed in May 2014 to the board, a full-time, taxpayer-paid position.

A spokeswoman provided the Register with criteria the board considers, including previous criminal and recidivism records, participation in prison programs, drug and alcohol history and propensity for violence.

Matthew Lindholm, a defense attorney whose practice is in West Des Moines, said the parole board also must take other factors into consideration, such as crowding in the state's prisons and whether there is room for "more dangerous offenders who need to be housed." "Everybody is so quick to point the finger at the offender — let's put them in jail and throw away the key," Lindholm said. "Statistics show that incarceration doesn't work. These are people with an addiction, and we need to look at solving their

Wisconsin lawmakers for the past three years have debated whether to require offenders convicted of vehicular homicide while intoxicated to serve a mandatory minimum sentence before becoming parole eligible. Polk County Attorney John Sarcone said that is worth exploring.

“The penalty (now) is such that it’s almost like you’re forgiving certain things,” Sarcone said. “Maybe it should be higher, like second-degree murder, which has a 70 percent mandatory minimum” on the sentence.

Intoxicated driving third or subsequent offense is Iowa’s most serious charge for impaired drivers who haven’t hurt or killed anyone, no matter how many times they’re charged. Other states have added graduated levels and increased penalties for repeat drunken drivers. Beginning in January, Wisconsin can punish someone convicted of a fourth intoxicated driving charge with up to six years in prison. In addition, someone convicted of their 10th lifetime drunken-driving offense in Wisconsin must serve at least four years before becoming eligible for parole. However, an Iowa coalition that made recommendations last year for getting impaired drivers off the state’s roads did not include stiffer penalties for current drunken driving charges.

In past years, the Iowa Peace Officers Association has supported strengthening Iowa’s drunken driving laws. A spokeswoman said the group stopped advocating for changes because of the lack of interest from Iowa lawmakers. Sarcone said he would favor stricter sentences for repeat drunken driving offenders, particularly for those with three or more convictions.

“That’s the one area that ought to be looked at because for that small group, they are a danger to everyone,” Sarcone said. “It’s obvious they haven’t learned their lesson.” Since 2005, at least 11,390 people have been charged in Iowa with operating while intoxicated third or subsequent offense, a Register review of court record records shows. Among them is Leon Kurt Shivers, who in May 2012 and June 2014 was charged with third or subsequent offense drunken driving. Shivers eventually was sentenced to up to five years in prison but served 8 months and 25 days. Eight months after his release to parole, Shivers was driving drunk when he slammed into the minivan of John McCartney, 82, killing him. “The lack of teeth to our laws is frustrating,” said Story County Attorney Jessica Reynolds, whose staff prosecuted Shivers on the June 2014 charge. “When we send someone to prison for five years, we believe that they should go to prison for five years.” A review of data provided by the Iowa Justice Data Warehouse shows that on average, people convicted of third or subsequent drunken driving spend less than three months in prison before they are released to an OWI treatment center. Offenders who don’t go to a treatment center typically spend 15 months or less in prison, the data show. “It’s every prosecutor’s worst nightmare to have something like this happen,” Reynolds said, “that you work hard to send someone to prison for a certain amount of time, they are let out and re-offend and kill someone.”

Pamela Gross’ family remains puzzled why Lalla served less than three years of her 25-year sentence.

Gross and Lalla had gotten into a fight in a parking lot after the two had been at a bar, court records show. Lalla got into her truck to leave, knocked Gross down with the truck and then ran over her, killing her.

Lalla spent more than a year in the Johnson County jail before she entered a guilty plea and was sentenced.

That jail time, as well as her time in prison, contributed toward her early release, as did her completion of a prison program, a parole board spokesman told the Iowa City Press-Citizen last year.

Lalla declined an interview request. Her parole was revoked in January because she was consuming alcohol and living with a felon. She's at a community- based corrections facility in Cedar Rapids.

Gross' family remains unsatisfied with her punishment.

"People know drunk driving is wrong and the risks involved with doing it," said Dianne Hesseltine, Gross' sister. "There should be mandatory sentences when you kill someone when you're driving drunk."

DMR: Duel on guns at public venues in Iowa

Bill's passage spurs debate on potential allowance at sites such as courts, Capitol

WILLIAM PETROSKI

BPETROSK@DMREG.COM

The passage of a wide-ranging gun rights bill by Iowa lawmakers is raising questions about whether local officials can stop gun-carrying citizens from entering courthouses and city halls, although supporters of the measure insist there won't be any problems.

Sen. Nate Boulton, D-Des Moines, an attorney who voted against House File 517, said the legislation lacks clarity in defining local government control over firearms in public buildings. A "pre-emption" section of the bill says that Iowans can sue any city, county or township that enacts firearms bans if they believe they are adversely affected by the ban.

"I think there were a lot of missed opportunities to expressly define where these rights and limitations are," Boulton said. "Right now there are a lot of grey areas and it is going to require court interpretation."

But Sen. Dan Dawson, R-Council Bluffs, the bill's floor manager, said nothing has changed in current law regarding security in Iowa's public buildings. The legislation does include a "just cause" provision for people who believe they have been adversely affected, he added.

"Our position is that it doesn't change the status-quo out there," said Dawson, who is also an Iowa Division of Criminal Investigation agent. For courthouses in Polk County and Pottawattamie County, for example, where dangerous weapons are banned and people must pass through a metal detector, there would be a "pretty high threshold" for someone to prove that while the buildings are highly secure, they are adversely affected, Dawson said. He believes city officials can prohibit weapons in city halls and he noted that schools will remain gun-free zones under a different section of state law.

The Iowa Judicial Branch, representing the state's courts, is officially opposed to the legislation, which received final approval Thursday from the Iowa House.

"The Judicial Branch registered against HF 517 solely because we are unsure if the pre-emption section of the bill (Division VII) will maintain the status-quo on courthouse security," said Steve Davis, communications director for the Iowa Judicial Branch.

Iowa Attorney General Tom Miller, the Iowa County Attorneys Association, and the Iowa Judges Association are also registered as opposed to the gun bill, which has a host of other provisions. They includes a controversial "stand your ground" section that says a law-abiding person does not have a duty to retreat before using deadly force with a gun.

Bill headed to Branstad

The bill now goes to Gov. Terry Branstad, who must decide whether to sign it or veto it. Branstad spokesman Ben Hammes said the governor is reserving judgment until he has time to carefully review the bill, as he does with all legislation. Polk County Attorney John Sarcone, a Democrat, told The Des Moines Register on Friday he wants Branstad to veto the gun bill. There is no question that local rules banning guns in courthouses and city halls will be challenged in the courts, Sarcone said, and he is concerned how the legislation will be interpreted. He also has concerns about possible difficulties in prosecuting homicide cases as a result of the stand your ground provisions. He described his stance as not political, but pro-public safety. "We come to the courthouse to resolve disputes in a peaceful fashion, not to fear if someone is carrying a weapon if they don't like the result," Sarcone said. "Banning all types of weapons from the courthouse just makes sense."

Sarcone said the gun legislation raises the possibility that someone could be charged with a felony crime, yet not have a criminal record and still have a permit to carry a gun that could be brought into a courtroom.

"Can they sit there at the counsel table with a gun?" Sarcone asked.

Firearms at the Iowa Capitol

One legal issue is clear: The new legislation will allow Iowans who have a permit to carry firearms to have concealed guns as they walk inside the Capitol to visit with legislators, watch debates and attend committee meetings. Visitors to the Capitol are now screened and they aren't allowed to bring guns into the building, although some legislators have acknowledged being armed inside the Capitol. Sen. Jake Chapman, RAdel, said he believes law-abiding Iowans should be allowed to carry firearms at the Capitol, and in courthouses and city halls as well. "The reality is that this building is owned by the people of Iowa," Chapman said in an interview at the Capitol. "My seat out there is not my seat; it is the seat of the people of Senate District 10. This is their seat. They own the building. If they have a right to keep and bear arms, they have a right to carry in their building." Sen. Tod Bowman, DMAquoketa, has a different view. He points to an incident in September 2014 in which a man died at the Jackson County Courthouse in Maquoketa after he pulled a gun from a briefcase and pointed it at the county assessor. Francis Glaser, 71, a former Maquoketa city manager, had become agitated and vocal about his property taxes going up during a weekly meeting of Jackson County Board of Supervisors. Glaser pulled a small gun and fired at County Assessor Deb Lane but missed. A struggle ensued with a county supervisor and Glaser died when he was struck by a second shot.

"Most people that I have talked to don't want guns freely floating into these environments where feelings and emotions get high," Bowman said. Bowman voted for the overall gun rights bill, but he supported an unsuccessful effort to amend the measure.

Rep. Dave Heaton, RMount Pleasant, was among a handful of Republicans who voted against the gun bill. He said last month he supported most of the gun rights provisions, but the section applying to cities and counties would keep him from voting for it. He pointed to the 1986 murder of then-Mount Pleasant Mayor Edd King, who was shot by an angry constituent during a city council meeting.

"My town will never forget what happened," Heaton said. "They are my constituents. I can't support this bill because of what this bill does."

One of the gun bill's most controversial provisions, which would have prevented the Board of Regents from enacting gun-free zones on college campuses, was previously removed from the bill.

DMR Editorial: Legislature should ban use of traffic cameras

Regulation of the devices won't solve the profit-motive problem

At the beginning of this legislative session, it appeared that Iowa's state lawmakers were finally prepared to ban the use of traffic-enforcement cameras throughout the state.

The proposal seemed to have the support of both the governor and the Senate's Judiciary Committee chairman, Brad Zaun.

Then lawmakers gravitated toward a compromise proposal that would allow the cameras to remain. The final version approved by the Senate sought only to regulate the cameras' use by limiting their deployment to state-approved, high-risk locations, with fines capped and the revenue used for infrastructure improvements and public safety.

Now, however, the pendulum may be swinging back toward an outright ban. More than two dozen representatives in the Iowa House are supporting a bill that would prohibit the use of red-light and speeding cameras.

Not surprisingly, the biggest obstacles to both proposals are the Iowa cities that rely on revenue from the cameras. Cedar Rapids, for example, generates more than $3 million a year from the cameras. Along with the cities of Muscatine and Des Moines, Cedar Rapids is now suing the Iowa Department of Transportation over the state agency's efforts to regulate the devices. It may be only a few weeks before a judge rules on the question of whether the state has the authority to order cities to take down cameras in locations where they aren't improving traffic safety.

Iowa lawmakers who remain unsure of how to proceed should take a close look at the arguments presented in this case. The cities are opposing a DOT rule that requires 1,000 feet of separation between a traffic camera and a speed-limit reduction. That rule was imposed after research conformed what common sense would indicate: placing the cameras any closer than 1,000 feet leads to more rear-end collisions as law-abiding drivers slam on the brakes to avoid being ticketed for exceeding the reduced speed limit.

It's a clear-cut example of how cities are willing to use the cameras not to make their streets safer, but to raise revenue. In fact, it could be argued that the cities are raising revenue at the expense of public safety — placing cameras in a manner that leads to more, not fewer, crashes.

Lawmakers should also be mindful of what triggered the lawsuit: In 2015, after the DOT examined the cameras' impact on traffic flow around the state, it determined that 21 of the 31 cameras in use could remain in place due to their positive impact on traffic safety. But almost one-third of the cameras couldn't meet that standard and had to either be eliminated or modified, the DOT said. The cities didn't accept that.

Again and again, backers of the technology have argued that those who don't like the cameras should just watch their speed and they'll have nothing to worry about. Not true. They'll still have to be concerned with rear-end collisions caused by obvious speed traps. They'll also have to be concerned with their local law enforcement agencies being turned into revenue centers by their city council.

As effective as the cameras are in identifying and penalizing violators, they also invite abuse. Some states have been forced to pass laws prohibiting cities from collecting more than 30 or 40 percent of their total revenue from traffic citations.

As the DOT court case makes clear, some Iowa cities not only refuse to respect the DOT's authority to regulate traffic cameras, they are also willing to spend taxpayer money arguing that point in court. They also are unwilling to act appropriately even when their own data shows the cameras aren't being used in a way that enhances public safety.

That's why the Iowa Legislature needs to move forward with its initial effort to ban the devices outright. It's the only way to prevent cities from continuing to partner with questionable, revenue-sharing companies that spit out citations in the form of civil penalties that completely bypass the criminal courts

DMR: THE FUTURE OF IOWA'S 100 COURTHOUSES

Warren County may be harbinger of efforts to meld services

GRANT RODGERS

GRODGERS@DMREG.COM

KNOXVILLE, Ia. — The court appearance here Wednesday by Warren County resident Erin Karas lasted just two minutes.

But it pulled Karas away from her restaurant job to make the 35-minute trip east from her home in Indianola to the Marion County Courthouse. Warren County's courthouse has sat mostly empty for more than nine months, evacuated amid worries about mold, plumbing issues and other problems.

"I'm missing out on work today because of this," said Karas, 45, who pleaded guilty to providing alcohol to a minor at her home last month.

For more than two decades, Iowa Supreme Court chief justices have issued intermittent warnings that budget considerations might someday force consolidation of the legal system. The move of Warren County's court operations is temporary, but what residents, attorneys and judges have experienced since June offers a glimpse of what court consolidation could bring.

State Rep. Chip Baltimore, a Boone Republican and attorney, said in an interview with The Des Moines Register that certain measures, such as closing clerks of court offices in certain counties, could be worth considering again — particularly in the age of digital filing.

"I think it has to come up," he said. "We talk about government efficiency and efficient use of tax dollars. ... Not that we are going to close a bunch of clerk's offices, but do they need to be there 40 hours a week, every week of the year with a full staff. I think that's definitely something we need to take a look at."

There is no plan in the works to consolidate court services, said State Court Administrator David Boyd, who is set to retire in September after four decades of working for Iowa's court system. And there are state laws barring certain moves, such as creating regional litigation centers or moving clerk offices out of county seats.

But Boyd admits there may come a time when offering court services in all 99 counties could be reconsidered.

"I really do hope at some point we are in fact considered to be a separate and equal branch of government and properly funded," he said. "That's not to say that we have to continue to do things in a particular way just because we've always done it that way." Legislators in January cut $3 million from of the judicial branch's current budget as part of cost-cutting effort spread across the entire state government, causing a $400,000 budget gap. In response, Boyd and court officials chose to close courts for an unpaid furlough day on May 26. The branch was already hamstrung when legislators in 2016 gave the judicial branch the same $178.7 million it received the year before, forcing a hiring freeze, Chief Justice Mark Cady told lawmakers in January. "We are starting to see delays in our court process, and I fear that this is going to continue if our needs aren't met," he said at the time.

While the judicial branch administers court services in the counties and employs clerk staff, judges and other workers, the responsibility for maintaining the state's aging courthouses falls to county governments. The average age of an Iowa courthouse is 100 years old. Thirty-eight of the current courthouses were built before 1900.

In May 2016, Warren County voters shot down a $35 million plan to build a new courthouse and jail to replace the existing courthouse built in 1939 with financial support from the Public Works Administration. One month later, Arthur Gamble, chief judge of the Fifth Judicial District of Iowa, ordered court services to vacate the building amid health concerns.

Court officials hope they can return to Indianola next month. Warren County is renovating a former Fusion Fitness center into temporary courtrooms. It will spend about $100,000 annually to lease the space while a more permanent solution is found to repair or replace the town square's deteriorating courthouse.

Years of chatter, but opposition remains

In 1991, lawmakers faced a $300 million budget deficit. In an interview with the Register, former Chief Justice Arthur McGiverin outlined several ideas aimed at saving money, including the creation of regional "litigation centers" that could replace court services in some counties. McGiverin, an Ottumwa resident, emphasized that he would prefer having court in all 99 counties, but admitted "that may well be difficult to do" in the future. In January 1993, McGiverin announced in the annual State of the Judiciary Address to legislators that court administrators were working on plans to move courts out of several county courthouses and into regional centers. But the plan met strong opposition. The Iowa State Bar Association and rural county supervisors organized opposition amid concerns, in part, that closing court services would hurt small-town economies, even if other offices like county auditors and treasurers remained in courthouses.

That same concern would likely be raised again — along with concerns about Iowans' access to justice — if lawmakers and judicial officials were to consider consolidating services again, said Skip Kenyon, president of the Iowa State Bar Association. Kenyon is a longtime attorney in the Union County seat of Creston, where a district court judge travels to the courthouse for hearings one day a week and an associate district court judge comes on a different day.

In neighboring Adams, Taylor and Ringgold counties, a judge comes to the courthouse for hearings every other week, Kenyon said.

"If you don't have that draw to help bring commerce in, I think it's real hard for the town to continue to thrive," he said. "And I think the courthouse is part of that. It brings people to town."

Judicial branch officials under Chief Justice Louis Lavorato in 2001 released a cost-savings restructuring plan that would have moved clerk of court offices out of several counties in the state and into regional centers. But the plan was pulled weeks after it was released when lawyers and county officials again spoke out.

"Chief Justice Lavorato and I took a lot of heat," said Boyd, the deputy court administrator at the time.

Two years later, then-Gov. Tom Vilsack, a Democrat, signed a bill that included language prohibiting the creation of "regional litigation centers" — a reaction borne out of the court's restructuring plan floated in 2001, Boyd said.

In her 2009 address to lawmakers, Chief Justice Marsha Ternus briefly raised the issue again amid a national recession.

“We simply do not want to spend precious time on a concept that you are not prepared to consider, and in the past, you have acted to prevent any movement toward consolidating court operations,” she told lawmakers at the time.

Consolidation in a microcosm

Warren County attorneys have gotten a taste of space sharing due to the forced closure of the courthouse in June 2016.

Under the order from Gamble, the Fifth District chief judge, most of Warren County’s court services were moved to the neighboring Marion and Madison county courthouses in Knoxville and Winterset, respectively. In the order, Gamble described “periodic” leaks of sewer water found in courtrooms, deteriorating air quality that made some employees sick, and dirty restrooms in the old building.

“Unfortunately, it is likely these alternate places of holding court will not be convenient for the citizens of Warren County. However, the board has not provided an alternative,” Gamble wrote at the time. Warren County Attorney Doug Eichholz, who was appointed to the position, said the emergency closure of the courthouse has put his office approximately $41,000 over its yearly budget, partly due to the travel costs now associated with cases. To cut down on the costs of driving to Knoxville, the sheriff lent the attorney’s office a spare vehicle, and prosecutors try to carpool, he said.

Sharing space in aging courthouses is a temporary fix.

Several attorneys and others interviewed by the Register agreed that consolidating court services into regional centers would require construction of new facilities. “I think that almost unquestionably that would have to happen,” Boyd said.

Others, such as the Iowa State Bar Association’s Kenyon, suggest that the most worrisome aspect of consolidation is the effect on people using court services.

Since the closure of the Warren County Courthouse, some of the biggest frustrations have come from families involved with juvenile proceedings.

Juvenile matters were moved to Winterset, a 25-mile drive from Indianola and approximately 40 miles one-way from both Carlisle and Southeast Warren Junior-Senior High School in Liberty Center. Juvenile court hearings take place on Monday mornings. Children who are being held by the county have to be driven to and from court by their parents or guardians, said Alex Crabb, the first assistant Warren County attorney. “You’re picking your kid up at school and now you’re driving all the way over to Winterset,” he said. “I think that’s where I’ve had most of the frustration.”

Mason Ouderkirk, whose Indianola law firm sits on the town square directly north of the empty courthouse, said the costs passed on to clients is the chief burden. The travel costs for the average 45 minutes he spends on the road driving to and from Knoxville or Winterset can add “hundreds of dollars to the cost of a hearing for a client,” he said. “It’s a burden directly upon the client,” said Ouderkirk, who specializes in civil cases and family law. “They’re paying me for my time, and that’s unfortunate.”

Kenyon raised a similar concern. A state budget crisis forced the judicial branch to belt-tighten around 2009 and cut back on travel costs for judges and other employees, he said. At the time, he was litigating a personal injury case filed in Adair County that ultimately went to trial at the Dallas County Courthouse to accommodate the judge’s travel schedule. That meant Kenyon and the other attorneys and witnesses were on the road daily to Adel throughout the trial. “It created a lot of additional expense for my client,” he said. “If you go to something like a regional center, that makes it that much more expensive, and the people who need (court services) are the ones that are going to have to be paying for it,” he said. Warren County officials are trying to decide their next move. They could choose to tear down the existing courthouse on the Indianola square and start from scratch at another location. Or they could keep the courthouse where it is, but build a jail at another location. A new bond referendum is currently scheduled for Aug. 8.

State struggles to reduce number of repeat offenders

Since 2005, over 11,300 have been hit with at least their third drunken driving charge

Randy John Stubbe was sent to prison in 2008 for driving while intoxicated in a Butler County crash that killed his wife. After he got out, he was charged twice more with driving drunk and in March returned to prison for two more years.

Deanna Marie Gliem of Des Moines was drinking before she crashed her car into another vehicle in 2015, killing the driver and passenger. Before she could go to trial, she was arrested for drunken driving in Lucas County.

And Donald Dean Gridley of Fairfield served less than a year in prison in the 1990s for causing the death of a passenger in a drunken driving crash. When he got out, he was arrested twice more for drunken driving, then charged with vehicular homicide while intoxicated in a 2012 crash that killed his father.

Talk with Iowa law enforcement officers, and they will tell story after story of people arrested repeatedly for being drunk behind the wheel. It's a constant struggle that is costing lives, they say.

"You would think, as a human being, if I killed somebody while I was drinking and driving that I wouldn't drink and drive anymore," Woodbury County Sheriff Dave Drew said. "That just shows you the power of alcohol in some people's lives. Some people are better off never touching it."

An exclusive Des Moines Register analysis of more than 200,000 Iowa court records involving intoxicated driving over the past 12 years illustrates the magnitude of that struggle:

» Since 2005, 222 people have been charged with vehicular homicide while intoxicated, and nearly one-third previously had been arrested for driving while intoxicated. Several had been arrested multiple times.

» At least 13 of those drivers were caught driving drunk again after they had been charged or convicted of killing someone while driving under the influence.

» More than 11,300 people were charged with intoxicated driving-third or subsequent offense, meaning they had been charged with driving while intoxicated at least three times in the past dozen years. The repercussions of those stark statistics play out daily on Iowa's roads, too often ending in tragedy, such as on Oct. 17, 2006, in Story County. A driver weaving in a van on U.S. Highway 30 slammed head-on into a sedan and killed Jonathan Baugh, a 17-year-old Valley High School senior who was on his way to watch a volleyball match in Ames. The van's driver, Phillip Ray Stephens, had an open bottle in the vehicle and reeked of alcohol, court records show. Stephens had already been convicted of drunken driving in 2000 and had another charge pending for a January 2005 arrest, according to court records.

Stephens was sentenced to up to 18 years in prison for the fatal crash but served only 5 1/2 years before being released in September 2012 to a community program. In May 2016, he was discharged from parole and within weeks was arrested twice for operating a vehicle while intoxicated, with sentencing scheduled for Monday. “He’s using his vehicle like a weapon when he gets behind the wheel,” said Tracy Baugh, a Baptist minister and father of Jonathan, who was among the 1,100 people who have been killed in alcohol-related crashes in Iowa since 2005. Stephens did not respond to a request for an interview. Tracy and his wife, Pam, who now live in Spencer, want Iowa to require intoxicated drivers who kill someone to serve 80 percent or more of their sentence. And they want to see chronic offenders such as Stephens barred from driving for life. “People on the road with him are escaping death — just like if there’s a gunman in a shopping mall and people walk away unharmed,” Tracy Baugh said.

Donald Gridley, who has twice killed people while driving drunk, said people like him are “playing with disaster.”

“Bad things are going to happen to you eventually,” Gridley told the Register during a telephone interview from Mount Pleasant Correctional Facility.

A jury in 2014 convicted after a jury convicted him of vehicular homicide while intoxicated. “Drinking is a like a deadly weapon, and somebody will either be hurt or wind up dead because of it.” Of the 13 drivers in the past dozen years caught driving drunk again after already killing someone while driving drunk, nine, including Gridley, Stephens and Stubbe, had served time in prison. Four, including Gliem, were awaiting trial. Gridley’s first conviction for causing a death came in 1992, when he pleaded guilty to involuntary manslaughter and driving drunk. That was followed by two more arrests for drunken driving before the night of drinking in December 2012 when his father, Patrick Gridley, was killed. Gridley said his father had persuaded him to attend a funeral with him. Afterward, the two went to a bar and drank into the early hours. “I made a bad choice to go to the funeral and then to drink,” Gridley said. “It ended up in a mess.” Gridley said he doesn’t remember the crash or whether he was driving. Court records say he ran a stop sign and drove his father’s Ford pickup into a ditch in rural Wapello County, then walked to a nearby farmhouse for help. A county sheriff’s deputy found his father, 65, dead inside the truck.

A test administered several hours after the crash showed that Donald Gridley’s alcohol concentration was 0.198 percent, more than twice Iowa’s legal limit.

It also detected marijuana, oxycodone and an anxiety medication, court records show. Gridley was sentenced to up to 25 years in prison. His expected release date is December 2025. While in prison, Gridley said he’s attended weekly meetings of Alcoholics Anonymous and Narcotics Anonymous and attended a class called “Thinking for a Change.”

But, he said, he’s not received any treatment or counseling for his addiction to alcohol.

Nonetheless, Donald’s mother, Linda Gridley, said her son has been behind bars long enough.

“He’s not the man he was five years ago,” said Gridley, 69, of Fairfield. “He talks differently and he acts differently. He’s paid his dues — now he’s in there without any rehabilitation and with no treatment.” Donald Gridley also believes he’s ready to be released after more than two years behind bars. He said he won’t drink again because “of all the trouble and pain and agony it caused my mother and the rest of my family.”

‘He should have been sitting in jail’

Intoxicated driving third or subsequent offense, filed against more than 11,300 people in Iowa in the past dozen years, is the state's most serious charge for impaired drivers who haven't hurt or killed anyone. The Register found offenders who had been arrested as many as eight times for impaired driving since 2005, but they still faced the "third or subsequent offense" charge. One of the people who faced that charge was 53-year-old Kirk Arnell Thomas of Marshall County, who was sentenced in February 2016 to up to 15 years in prison as a habitual drunken driving offender after his third arrest in less than six years. In fall 2015, Thomas was arrested twice for driving while intoxicated by Marshalltown police. Preliminary breath tests showed Thomas' blood al-

Signs you may be an alcoholic

People who answer "yes" to at least two questions on the so-called CAGE screening test should investigate whether they may be abusing alcohol. The screening test is widely used to determine potential problems with alcohol, according to the National Institute on Alcohol Abuse and Alcoholism. CAGE is an acronym based on key words from each of four questions: cut down, annoyed, guilty and eye-opener.

The questions to ask yourself are: » Have you ever felt you needed to cut down on your drinking?

» Have people annoyed you by criticizing your drinking?

» Have you ever felt guilty about drinking?

» Have you ever felt you needed a drink first thing in the morning (eye-opener) to steady your nerves or to get rid of a hangover?

cohol concentration at nearly three times the legal limit.

Thomas, in a telephone interview, said he has been attending Alcoholics Anonymous meetings and life-skills classes while incarcerated at Iowa's North Central Correctional Facility in Rockwell City.

He said he's lucky he didn't seriously injure or kill someone when he drove drunk.

"There was no good reason for me to be doing that," Thomas said. "But I did it, for some foolish, unknown reason."

Law enforcement officials say something is wrong that people like Thomas can't be kept from behind the wheel of a vehicle after multiple intoxicated driving charges.

“It’s frustrating to me because, one, he shouldn’t have been driving because he had been barred,” said Marshalltown police Lt. Rick Bellile, who arrested Thomas on Oct. 6, 2015, for third-offense drunken driving. Thomas had also been arrested four weeks earlier for drunken driving.

“The problem with our system is that we let these repeat offenders out of jail while they are waiting (for trial), and they go out” and continue to drive while they are intoxicated, Bellile said.

The fact is most people caught driving drunk have done it before, said Kim Brangoccio, manager of UnityPoint Health’s Powell Chemical Dependency Center in Des Moines.

Alcoholism is a “chronic relapsing disease, and although people can get treatment, sometimes they really don’t want to quit,” she said.

Typically, Iowa requires those charged with third-offense intoxicated driving to undergo treatment. Many are sent to community-based residential correctional facilities, which provide substance abuse treatment programs licensed through the Iowa Department of Public Health.

Treatment isn’t always successful, however, particularly if offenders fall back into old habits. “If they get back into similar life situations with the same stressors and the same friend and the same job, they’ll relapse,” Brangoccio said. “Changing just a few things is not enough — you have to really make some significant changes.” People need to understand what causes them to drink, she said. “If the reason you drink has to do with coping or has to do with your inability to deal with your own self-anxiety — if you don’t get help for those things at the same time you’re getting alcohol or drug help, your chance of relapse is very high.”

Meanwhile, Iowa continues to look for ways to better address its drunken driving problem, particularly repeat offenders.

Last year, a coalition submitted 66 proposals for reducing impaired driving in the state. One of those has made its way into a bill making its way through Legislature. The proposal would give law enforcement jurisdictions the option of participating in a program requiring some offenders to provide a breath sample twice a day to prove they haven’t been drinking. A similar program in South Dakota called 24-7 requires repeat drunken drivers to take a Breathalyzer test twice a day as part of their bond or parole conditions. Since the program has been in place, arrests for repeat drunken driving have fallen 12 percent, studies have shown. Polk County associate district court Judge Carol Egly wonders whether some drivers must be saved from themselves.

“There are some people that — maybe one should just assume — should not be driving regardless of what they do with their treatment program,” said Egly, whose assignments include presiding over intoxicated driving sentencing. “Maybe we should be identifying those people and making it possible for them not to be using automobiles.”

That idea appeals to Tracy and Pam Baugh, whose teenage son died in a drunken driving crash 11 years ago. Stephens, the driver who killed their son, was arrested Aug. 26, 2016, after a Johnson County sheriff’s deputy saw him swerving “all over” eastbound Interstate Highway 80 in Iowa City, court records show. Stephens “smelled strongly of ingested alcohol.”

Six weeks earlier, Stephens was arrested at Saylorville Lake in Polk County for operating a boat while intoxicated.

A trial is pending in the Polk County case; Stephens pleaded guilty to the Johnson County charge and will be sentenced Monday.

life is going to be next?”

DMR: Bondurant community remembers killed family

LINH TA

LTA@DMREG.COM

The community of Bondurant is close-knit.

Most people know each other, or know of each other, residents say.

So when they learned that three of their own were killed, they did what close communities do — they gathered to support one another.

“Because it’s Bondurant, people just come to help each other,” said Samantha Hunter, a 24-yearold from the town.

Outside Bondurant-Farrar High School, people cried and embraced during a vigil to remember Mark, Charla and Tawni Nicholson.

In a circle around the flagpole, people stood shoulder-to-shoulder with candles flickering against the night sky.

It was 9:30 p.m. Thursday when Polk County deputies went to the Nicholsons’ home to conduct a welfare check. There, they found the bodies of Mark Alan Nicholson, 58, Charla Lee Nicholson, 56, and their daughter Tawni Alexis Nicholson, 24.

Chase Marcus Nicholson, 20, is currently in Polk County Jail on a valid material witness warrant, according to a news release. He is being held on a $2 million cash-only bond. He is the son of Mark and Charla, and is Tawni’s brother.

Hunter and Lindsay Schaper, 24, went to Bondurant- Farrar High School with Tawni.

They also roomed together at Iowa State University, where she graduated in August.

“She was just a ray of sunshine,” Schaper said. “She always had open arms for everybody.”

When they learned both she and her parents were killed, they were shocked.

It’s something that doesn’t happen in the town of about 5,000 people.

“It’s one of those things you can’t believe that happened here,” Hunter said. “They treated you like you were a part of their family.” As Chase Nicholson sits in Polk County Jail, additional charges in relation to the case are possible, according to law enforcement.

But as the community mourned together outside, Jeff Sanderson, pastor at the Federated Church of Bondurant, addressed them. He reminded them of one thing — that in the afterlife, anything is possible.

“I pray that we have the opportunity to watch a mother, a father, a daughter and son embrace.”

DMR: KUTCHER: ‘I ALMOST OWE EVERYTHING OF WHO I AM’ TO IOWA

Actor in W.D.M. to get award for 'good character'

MATTHEW LEIMKUEHLER

Ashton Kutcher left Iowa wanting to escape the small towns and endless farmland that surrounds each.

Now, a worldwide success at age 39 and a father of two, he seems pretty happy to be home.

"I left Iowa wanting to get out of Iowa, and the older I get the more I want to come home," he said in an exclusive interview with the Register Saturday evening. "In part, because the more places I go, the more I realize how great it is here, and the more I realize that I almost owe everything of who I am to where I come from."

The eastern Iowa-raised Hollywood superstar appeared at the Ron Pearson Center in West Des Moines Saturday night to receive the Robert D. Ray Pillar of Character Award, an annual honor given by Drake University to "individuals who demonstrate good character as a role model." Outside of acting, Kutcher, 39, is known for multiple philanthropic efforts, including cofounding (alongside Dallas Clark) the Iowa disaster relief organization The Native Fund and Thorn: Digital Defends of Children, which uses technology to combat sexual exploitation of children.

"I think the one thing that you realize the minute you become a parent is that character is the one thing you can give them as a parent," he said. "You can actually, materially impact that ... and then everything else becomes their choice."

The "That '70s Show" and "The Ranch" star was born in Cedar Rapids and went to high school in Homestead; he made his West Des Moines appearance alongside wife and fellow star Mila Kunis. Kutcher's mother, Diane Portwood, and her spouse, Mark, as well as his father Larry and his spouse, Colleen, were also in town to see one of Iowa's most celebrated bring home the award.

On fatherhood, Kutcher said there are three Iowan values that impact how he raises his children: A general kindness, always keeping your word and showing good work ethic. Kutcher and Kunis welcomed their second child, a son, Dimitri Portwood Kutcher, into the world last November. The couple became parents to a girl, Wyatt Isabelle Kutcher, in 2014.

"There's an earnestness and an honest-ness here that lacks in a lot of other places in the world," Kutcher said. "People aren't afraid to work and aren't afraid to work really hard. They understand that working hard actually gets you there."

That earnestness was on display Thursday when Kutcher and Kunis surprised students at Oskaloosa High School. When addressing the students, he delivered a short, galvanizing message: "Just because you're a kid from Iowa, don't think you can't have big dreams."

It wasn't his first time impacting Iowa schools: In 2016 he surprised teachers in more than 100 Iowa schools by fully funding every Donors Choose.org project open in the state on that day. DonorsChoose is an online crowdfunding platform teachers use to finance classroom needs. Kutcher said he wanted to let the students know that you can build "the next great thing," no matter where you're from.

"What I suggested to those kids is (that) they don't limit the scope of their pursuits to the things that see that already exist," he said.

Kutcher received the Pillar of Character award in part due to the launch of The Native Fund, which works primarily in disaster relief for Iowans. Kutcher said he could see the locally-based non-profit extend the model in place to other states and more causes.

First, he said, the organization must continue to grow capital. After that could come expansion into new regions and different causes.

“For us right now, it’s about raising a significant reserve capital fund for disaster relief,” Kutcher said. “And then really identifying for ourselves what constitutes disaster relief. Who actually needs disaster relief? And how do (we) build this so it’s not some wonky entitlement plan that grows and gets sloppy? ... This is all about helping people. It’s not about doing for people.”

The discussion wasn’t completely dominated by Kutcher’s character and philanthropic efforts; when asked about the Hawkeyes’ football prospects in the fall, he smiled and laughed.

Notables intended for the “All Star Evening” featuring Kutcher and Kunis included Gov. Terry Branstad, Lt. Gov. Kim Reynolds, Super Bowl-winning former NFL tight end Dallas Clark, Drake University president Marty Martin and “The Bachelor” alum Chris Soules, a news release said. Past recipients for the award include Hayden Fry, Fred Hoiberg and Shawn Johnson.

DMR: Chinese media take interest in D.M.-based Jasper Winery

While Chinese President Xi Jinping’s first meeting with President Donald Trump has made headlines for the potential implications to trade and international relations, it has also sent reporters looking for off-the-beaten-path stories about the two nations.

That’s what recently led CGTN, China’s state-owned 24-hour English Language TV network, to a winery in Des Moines.

CGTN this week published a feature about Jasper Winery, highlighting the deep economic and political ties between Iowa and China and the growing interest from Hawkeye State companies to do business in the world’s most populous country.

Mason Groban, head winemaker at Jasper said the TV spot could help the small, Des Moines-based winery gain a larger foothold in China.

“If you understand the Chinese consumer, a story like this can be pretty significant,” he said.

The ties between Iowa and China, and specifically those between Gov. Terry Branstad and Xi, who have called each other “old friends,” are well-documented and widely celebrated.

In 1985, Xi visited Iowa on an agricultural research trip and met Branstad for the first time. The two leaders met again in 2011 during a gubernatorial trade mission to China.

In 2012, Xi returned to Iowa, for a farm tour, agricultural forum and state dinner, where he and Branstad toasted with wine from Jasper.

In December, Trump appointed Branstad ambassador to China, noting his deep ties to China and Xi. Branstad is yet to be confirmed.

CGTN toured Jasper’s vineyard and winery and then visited Muscatine, where Xi stayed as a young agricultural researcher.

The network also asked Iowa Republican Party Chair Jeff Kaufmann about the tension between Iowa’s dependence on exports to China and the state's support for Trump, who has promised to get tough on China, stoking fears of a potential trade war.

"Hopefully, we can find a policy that fits our interests but at the same time doesn't alienate any economic opportunities we have with China," Kauffman told CGTN.

China Daily, a stateowned English-language newspaper, also recently featured the state in a front-page story titled "Iowa hopes to ramp up trade with China."

Jasper Winery has been eyeing the Chinese market ever since the toast between Xi and Branstad. The winery hired The China Iowa Group, a West Des Moines-based trade consulting firm, to help clear regulatory and political hurdles needed to sell wine in China.

In 2015, Jasper made its first shipment, selling about 1,000 bottles in China.

"They don't have a lot of spare capacity, but we sold as much as we could get our hands on," said Li Zhao, founder of the China Iowa Group.

Chinese consumers have a taste for wines from Napa and other well-known grape-growing regions, but few Iowa wines have made it into the market, Li said.

Groban, the winemaker, hopes the CGTN feature, as well as Branstad's pending ambassadorship, open the door to more exports. "Initially, we were just getting our feet wet in the market," he said. "We would love to export more and we definitely have the capacity to ramp up production."

China Iowa Group and LS2group form partnership

The China Iowa Group, meanwhile, recently announced a partnership with LS2group, another Des Moines-area consulting firm. The two firms said they plan to work together to help U.S. companies sell products in China and facilitate the Chinese investment in the U.S.

LS2group will focus on government affairs, lobbying for policies, like those that would allow U.S. eggs, beef and other products to be imported to China. China Iowa Group will focus on finding markets for U.S. products in China and facilitating Chinese investment in the U.S. "It's a perfect relationship because our skill sets complement each other well," said Chuck Larson, a partner with LS2group, and a former state senator and U.S. Ambassador to Latvia.

DMR: COMING OUT CONSERVATIVE

Chadwick Moore was an openly gay socialist at the University of Iowa. Now he's a pariah among New York liberals

For Chadwick Moore, admitting he was a gay man to his "Fox News-watching, gun-toting Republican" dad in Iowa was a breeze compared to coming out as a conservative this year to his liberal friends in New York.

This is the 33-year-old University of Iowa alumnus whose Out Magazine profile of former Breitbart News provocateur and "Internet super villain" Milo Yiannopoulos inspired such outcry against Moore that it made him realize he had been living a lie: He now has more in common with the GOP.

He has been lambasted as a "fake conservative" and "attention whore" on social media. But he insists that his ideological shift was glacial and gradual, not sudden and opportunistic. Even in high school, Moore said, his senior AP English thesis was an argument against hate-crime legislation based on constitutional grounds. "I'm not, like, an establishment Republican," he said. "I'm still very much the

His world was simpler and more neatly defined in 2001, when Moore was a high school graduate en route to his freshman year at the University of Iowa in Iowa City. He rode shotgun in his father's pickup truck.

On the verge of dropping off his son into a teeming throng of 29,000 restless young coeds, Moore's father, Gary, finally broached the topic.

Well, his dad said, your sister told me something about you.

Moore had an inkling of what was next: Oh yeah?

She told me that you're gay. Is that true?

Moore's stomach suddenly was in knots. He already had come out to his liberal mom a few years earlier, with no problem. His parents are divorced; she lives in Nashville. But he was a little more daunted by his dad: a macho, cigarchomping accountant, farmer and hunter in Oskaloosa.

Moore braced himself and answered: Yeah, it's true. Gary was quiet for a minute. Finally, he responded: Well, I guess I'm going to have to tell your boyfriends what I tell your sister's boyfriends.

Moore, still apprehensive, suddenly was intensely curious: What's that?

If you hurt my son

I'll... To complete that sentence no doubt would offend some of you. Suffice it to say that Gary, to quote Iowa Sen. Joni Ernst, was ready to “make 'em squeal” in defense of his son. Moore thanked his dad profusely for the sweetly protective sentiment.

That tender moment, if a bit raw, was a bridge between a father and son who, at the time, stood on opposite ends of the political spectrum.

Once ensconced at the U of I, Moore “became an immediate socialist,” he said. He marched and protested his way through college while decked out in a garish wardrobe of thrift store castoffs.

All the while, the identity crisis that seethed within Moore was not hormonal. It was ideological.

Moore now lives in another liberal enclave — the Williamsburg neighborhood of Brooklyn, New York. He has long since set aside his college dreams of becoming a fiction writer to establish himself as a legitimate working journalist.

His profile of Yiannopoulos was posted Sept.

21 in the publication catering to the LGBT community that serves an audience of a couple hundred thousand readers, on the eve of the bitter presidential election. The Breitbart editor had become a notorious figure thanks to his loud mouth and the rampant protests over his speeches on college campuses.

(This was before Yiannopoulos resigned from Breitbart in reaction to the firestorm spurred by his comments that appeared to condone pedophilia.) Moore faced instant backlash from friends and strangers alike.

His editors went so far as to preface the profile with a lengthy disclaimer to distance themselves from Yiannopoulos' views while simultaneously decrying "social media tribalism," where "the mere act of covering a contentious person can be misrepresented as an endorsement."

Moore kept getting the cold shoulder at his local gay bar. Good friends stopped calling.

He had become a pariah.

"The gay community has been my entire life since I was 15," he said.

"And I love the gay community. I love gay culture. I love drag queens.

I love gay bars. It's been my everything, and now all that's gone. So, yeah, it's sad. I'm mourning the loss of that."

Fed up with all the backlash, Moore in February wrote a manifesto of sorts in the New York Post: "I'm a gay New Yorker — and I'm coming out as conservative." He criticized President Donald Trump for his travel ban and cabinet choices. But mostly the article served as a kiss-off to the left wing that had counted him as one of their own. "All I had done was write a balanced story on an outspoken Trump supporter for a liberal, gay magazine," he said, "and now I was being attacked. I felt alienated and frightened." "It can seem like liberals are actually against free speech if it fails to conform with the way they think," he added.

"And I don't want to be a part of that club anymore."

Among those shocked by Moore's conservative coming out were two of his best friends and college classmates, a pair of women from Iowa. Kat Durst, raised in Ottumwa and Davenport, met Moore on their first day in the college dorm, not long after the pivotal scene in the pickup truck with his father. Today, she's a 34-year-old real estate agent. She and her husband, a physician, are raising two kids, 3 and 5, in Gainesville, Florida. Moore was a bridesmaid in her 2010 wedding.

As Moore tangles with critics on Twitter, Durst fills her Facebook feed with liberal commentary fully in keeping with her former undergraduate self. Durst can't take the leap from Democratic socialist to conservatism with her friend, but that doesn't matter to her.

"Even the things that I thought he thought in college... He doesn't owe that to me — to still think that — or owe it to anyone," she said. A third friend entered their circle at the U of I when Haley Niichel spotted Moore in a computer lab clad in a white T-shirt, tight jeans and blue bandanna. She grew up in Orange City, the conservative stronghold of northwest Iowa. This was the first gay person she was aware of meeting.

Moore "knows how to kind of step on a nerve," said Niichel, who now lives in West Des Moines. "He has that innate sense of going in for the kill.

But I think he makes liberals really think about what they're fighting for."

Her job as a mortgage underwriter, as Niichel puts it, is to "document logic." She wonders whether that helps make her more of a libertarian who falls on the political spectrum somewhere between her two friends.

"It seems like if you choose a side, you're ostracized by the other side," she said. "If you're not super liberal, you're a Republican in the liberals' eyes. If you're not actively going to all these protests — in an aggressive, gnashing way — it's not enough for them."

Are we building bridges or silos?

Moore's paternal family roots in Iowa predate the Civil War. He was born in Tennessee and raised in Illinois.

I wouldn't be surprised if he ends up writing his gay, Midwestern variation on J.D. Vance's "Hillbilly Elegy," a New York Times best-selling account of the author's roots in white workingclass Appalachia that has been embraced as a guide to the rural disaffection that helped Trump win the White House.

"I've always known these people," Moore said of his conservative Midwestern friends and family. "I've always liked these people." Moore's dad said that he and his son always have been close and have shared quality political discussions.

"I probably disagree with everybody on certain things," Gary said.

"Talk to me. I will listen.

But don't try to be overbearing and convince me that you're right unless you can really have some facts to prove it." Perhaps surprisingly, Moore in the recent election voted for Hillary Clinton — not Trump. He called it a "pre-emptive defense" against criticism from his liberal neighbors, when he still was worried about mending fences.

Moore's dilemma made me seek out one of Iowa's most prominent, stalwart gay activists: Donna Red Wing. She has fought for decades for gay rights. She's married to a woman. She recently stepped down as director of LGBTQ-advocacy group One Iowa and now directs the Eychaner Foundation that awards its own Matthew Shepard Scholarships.

Red Wing made headlines in recent years by partnering with somebody perceived as her nemesis: Bob Vander Plaats, whose Family Leader pushes the "family values" cause of evangelical conservatives and led the fight against same-sex marriage in Iowa. The unlikely pair turned their private coffee conversations into a public series of dialogues to make a point about the desperate need for civility in our polarized politics.

If not to the extent of Moore, both of them weathered criticism from their respective political camps for breaking bread with the "enemy." But Red Wing considers herself "old and cranky enough" that she's "tired of always making it one side or the other."

"Are we living in this community," she said, "or are we just building silos and living by ourselves?"

She added, "Our sexual orientation and gender identity really have little to do with where we are, in terms of being progressive and conservative."

Not that Red Wing is on the same page as Moore when it comes to Trump. He sees the president as opening up the GOP to new, more diverse voices. He sees the president's trolling of the media and his rivals as a necessary gambit to wrangle with entrenched forces.

"The most powerful institutions in our society are all toting the same narrative," he said, "and they're all left-leaning."

Red Wing, however, sees Trump promoting intolerance. She worries that his actions hampering, say, immigrants and Muslims all too easily may spread to the gay community, or already have through far-right forces grown more powerful in various courts and state and local offices.

I don't have easy answers about when to stand up and shout in protest versus when to sit quietly and talk, extending an olive branch.

Both civility and protest, if we can apply them at the proper times, are crucial to our democracy. I do know that Moore shouldn't have been spurned for writing his original profile of Yiannopoulos when he was simply doing his job as a journalist. Because Red Wing's words echo in my head: Are we living in this community, or are we just building silos and living by ourselves?

As Gary put it, "I don't know if there's ever going to be an answer" to our polarized politics.

"All I can say is I hope people will listen."

If nothing else, Moore as an outed conservative has a lot more to discuss politically with his dad and his other Republican relatives in Iowa. "If Trump does a good job," he said, "I'll be very excited to vote for him in four years." That may not be a rhetorical bomb on par with Yiannopoulos.

But it still won't play very well in Brooklyn.

DMR Editorial: State and federal forfeiture reforms fall short

Civil libertarians and small-government conservatives agree: The government should not be allowed to seize the assets of law-abiding citizens.

Yet, for the past 30 years, state and federal officials have done exactly that, wrapping the practice in the bulletproof vest of "law enforcement." The officials argue that they are keeping our streets safe by laying claim to the cash, cars and real estate belonging to individuals whose only "crime," assuming one was even committed, was a minor traffic offense or drug-possession rap. In 2013, two California men driving home after a gambling tournament in Illinois had their $100,000 bankroll seized after an Iowa police officer pulled them over for failing to signal a lane change on Interstate 80 in Poweshiek County. Authorities eventually gave back $90,000 of the money, but after the men sued, the state was forced to pay the men an additional $60,000 just to settle their case.

Such abuses are numerous and well-documented, but state and federal lawmakers have been slow to enact reforms for fear of being perceived as soft on crime. But changes are in the works.

Under a bill approved late last month by the Iowa Senate, prosecutors would have to convict a suspected offender of illegal activity before seizing any property that's valued at less than $5,000, and that property will have to be linked to the charged criminal activity.

The intent is to keep the police from shaking clean the pockets of motorists. You might not think such a law would be necessary, but it is.

Last year, there were 822 cases of cash forfeiture made in Iowa under state law, for a total of $2.6 million. Individually, none of these cases involved more than $15,000, and only eight cases involved assets worth $5,000 to $15,000.

The average value of a cash forfeiture was just $3,217. So we're not talking about cartel-caliber drug kingpins here.

In fact, the police are only too happy to seize sofa-cushion money. No amount of money seems too small. In one 2015 case, Iowa authorities seized $13 from an individual and claimed it as their own. That's one reason why the bill approved by the Senate zeroes in on amounts of less than $5,000. But of course the argument could be made that this limit preserves the profit motive for police and prosecutors to pursue high-dollar assets.

Fortunately, the Senate bill, which has to be approved by the House, would also raise the standard of proof in forfeiture cases so police and prosecutors would have to present “clear and convincing evidence” that the assets are tied to criminal activity. There’s also a proportionality test that says the assets seized cannot be “grossly disproportionate to the severity of the offense,” which should help ensure that Iowa police aren’t seizing six-figure sums from people who have been convicted of only minor offenses.

The legislation also requires law enforcement agencies to maintain certain records related to asset forfeiture, so lawmakers — and the public — will know if the abuses are continuing.

Even so, this bill is far from perfect. It does nothing to redirect assets away from the police and prosecutors who initiate property seizures, so they can continue to use the process not to enhance public safety but to enhance their own budgets. The bill also says that while police agencies will be required to keep detailed, publicly accessible records of property seizures, these “records shall not identify or enable identification of the individual officer who seized any item of property.” That provision would make it impossible to determine whether any abuses can be traced to one rogue law enforcement officer.

Even if the Senate bill becomes law, it will do nothing to address the larger problem of civil forfeitures initiated by federal authorities. On March 29, the inspector general of the U.S. Department of Justice released a report that details the manner in which the agency has failed to evaluate its own forfeiture data to determine the extent to which these property seizures benefit law enforcement and threaten civil liberties.

The report makes a series of recommendations for improvement, all of which are long overdue. The most urgent is the call to ensure that the DOJ’s state and local task-force officers are adequately trained on federal forfeiture laws.

A newly introduced, GOP-sponsored bill in the U.S. Senate, dubbed the Fifth Amendment Integrity Restoration Act, would help end some of the abuses. It would shift the burden of proof in forfeiture cases to the government; it would provide for indigent defense in all such cases; and it would eliminate the profit motive altogether by steering the proceeds away from police agencies and into the U.S. Treasury. It’s almost identical to a bill first proposed in 2014, but now, at least, it is being given serious consideration by Congress.

These state and federal initiatives represent progress, but they also underscore the fact that when it comes to civil forfeiture, much work remains to be done.

DMR: Did city councilman’s opposition to a pork plant lead to suicide?

The brief life and premature death of a dynamic Iowa politician provokes hard questions

“(One) can easily wreck in a day or two what builders have taken years to do.”

— verse from a poem Mason City Mayor Eric Bookmeyer sent to City Councilman Alex Kuhn

“ There won’t be any bullies to burden your way.

No words that cut like a knife at the end of the day.”

— verse from a poem to Alex Kuhn from his father, Mark, after his son’s death

MASON CITY, Ia. — An overflow crowd turned out for a City Council meeting last May 3 in anticipation of a final vote for construction of a $240 million, 600,000-square-foot pork-processing plant on Mason City’s southwest side. Processing up to 10,000 pigs a day, it would be the state’s second- largest of its kind.

State and local officials stood ready to welcome it with generous subsidies. Realtor Dick Mathes addressed the council in favor, citing job losses and Prestage Foods' promise to add up to 2,000 jobs in four years. But the 14 supporters there to speak were outnumbered by 47 opponents, who voiced concern over the plant's potential impact on health, the environment and the community, especially if a concentration of hog confinements followed.

One young man, Dylan Daniels, handed the council a petition he said had nearly 1,000 signatures opposing the plant. "The council is still ignoring the way the majority of citizens feel," he said.

He spoke prematurely. It turned out to be a fateful night for Prestage and its proponents, who had considered passage a done deal: The vote tied at 3-3, effectively killing the proposal.

It was also, some believe, a fateful night for a popular 34-year-old at-large city councilman named Alex Kuhn, who had been heavily courted by proponents and opponents. After much research and questioning, Kuhn was not convinced that the city was getting a good deal for its investment. Unbeknownst to him and everyone else, his hesitation had paved the way for the other two "no" votes.

Two months later, Kuhn shot and killed himself, after his friends and family say he was pressured and blamed for the outcome. Once heralded by people from both parties as destined to go far in politics, praised for his compassion and commitment to the underrepresented as well as to economic development, Kuhn now found himself an outcast among the city's powerful. He became a casualty of the divisive, high-pressured, back-biting political environment.

A promising future

With his youthful good looks, intelligence, political pedigree and knack for getting along with everyone, Alex Kuhn was often likened to a young John Kennedy. He grew up around both politics and farming, having clerked for his father, a former Democratic state representative now on the Floyd County Board of Supervisors, and helped on the family's 850-acre farm in Charles City, southeast of Mason City. After graduating from high school there in 2000 and Iowa State University in 2004, he went to Houston, Texas, to student-teach. But when his father was injured the following year in a farming accident, Alex returned to help.

"He'd get up early in the morning and load corn all day," says his mother, Denise Kuhn. "At night he would do exercises with his dad. He took him to physical therapy."

In 2006, Alex went to work for U.S. Sen. Tom Harkin, directing his mobile office from Des Moines. He moved in 2008 to Mason City, where his ex-wife's family lived, where he taught and did community organizing for United Way. He got elected to the Mason City City Council in 2011. Although a Democrat, he had support from many Republicans, says a Republican friend, Todd Blodgett. "His purpose was to defend people who couldn't defend themselves."

Blodgett introduced me to a man of modest means named Jim Burgess, who previously lived in a rental home where he had awoken daily to the sounds of mice nibbling his food. The landlord's response, Burgess says, was to advise him to get cheese from the local food bank and put it out for the mice. Then Kuhn came by, saw the situation and not only worked to resolve it but also sponsored an ordinance targeting problem landlords, Burgess said.

Nearly all of the 20 people I interviewed said Kuhn was the last person they'd expect to take his own life. But his parents and others who spoke to him before his death also noted his deep distress at the furor that erupted around him after the Prestage Foods deal collapsed.

Mark Kuhn is driven to speak because of a Dec. 18, 2016, front-page story in the Mason City Globe-Gazette, which attributed Alex's suicide to an ongoing struggle with depression. True, Alex had dealt with the fallout from a divorce and co-parenting his two young sons. He had at times seen a therapist and taken anxiety medication, but had no history of depression, his parents say. They say despite their disclosures to the newspaper about Alex being taunted and blamed for his vote, the writer chose to build a narrative around depression, enabling those who had hurt Alex to turn his suffering back on him. Now Mark Kuhn wants to give Alex a voice.

The failure of the Prestage deal inflamed politicians, agribusinesses, local business boosters and government economic development folks, Mark Kuhn says. But it was the wrath of those Alex considered his friends, particularly the mayor, that really hurt him.

Blodgett agrees, saying, "The mayor bullied Alex relentlessly."

"I certainly reject the accusation," responded Mayor Eric Bookmeyer. "Did we have frank conversations? Sure." But "I know that Alex had a lot of other stuff going on in his life. I don't believe under any circumstances that it was just one thing."

Debate divides the town

The Prestage plant was the biggest economic development prospect Mason City residents can remember. It had the vocal support and lobbying of the governor, the mayor and state and local economic development officials.

But as with anything involving hogs in Iowa, the proposal sparked controversy.

"If this processing plant is so good, why not put it in West Des Moines?" bristled state Rep. Sharon Steckman, a Democrat who represents Mason City, in an interview with me last May.

Bookmeyer, in an interview, called farming "our lifeblood," and said he saw an opportunity to help the city grow and use water and sewer systems that taxpayers were already paying for.

Mark Kuhn points out that farming was Alex's lifeblood, too. Both father and son became embroiled in the debate over Big Pork during their political careers. Mark Kuhn was in the Legislature in the 1990s when Gov. Terry Branstad and the Republican majority took actions to prevent neighbors of hog confinements from suing for nuisance and stripped localities of a final say on where confinements were placed. Kuhn was also in the Legislature in 2001 under Democratic Gov. Tom Vilsack, when lawmakers commissioned a study of proposed air pollution rules, which 27 state university scientists spent two years studying and signing off on. Yet repeatedly, in 2003 and 2008 (then under Gov. Chet Culver), the rules were voided by a legislative majority and sent back for further study to satisfy lobbyists, Kuhn says.

Prestage's interest in Mason City first became known to the mayor when state economic development officials contacted Chad Shreck, who heads the North Iowa Corridor Economic Development, on Dec. 17, 2015. Prestage officials arrived the next day. The mayor was excited. "This was not your everyday, average project," Bookmeyer said.

But the mayor doesn't get to vote. So after meeting company representatives, he called council members in a few at a time to rally them in favor, without revealing Prestage's name. Kuhn spotted it in February in the city manager's folder. As mayor pro tem, Kuhn was the first to be called in, along with Councilman Travis Hickey, who is also on the North Iowa Corridor board.

In February, the city's planning and zoning commission rezoned the area from farming to heavy industrial. Secrecy surrounding the move angered some residents, who later accused the council of flouting democracy and ramming the plant through without an independent environmental impact study.

Branstad and Prestage leaders went to Mason City in March to announce the plan, and the Iowa Economic Development Board voted to issue $34 million in general obligation bonds to support it. After a six-hour meeting April 5, the council voted unanimously to set the terms for a development agreement. But Kuhn had reservations about them. He didn't necessarily oppose Prestage, people close to him say, but didn't think the city should give it a 50 percent tax abatement. And he was wary of the city offering $15.5 million in tax-increment financing. Kuhn cited reports showing a 50 percent turnover in meat processing. He wanted to require a $13-per-hour minimum wage, along with a 2.5-mile buffer zone preventing hog confinements around Mason City and Clear Lake.

"I didn't feel it was the role of local government to put that stuff in," Bookmeyer says, but he says he and city staff worked to accommodate Kuhn's concerns. Prestage committed $1.4 million to Mason City schools over 10 years to help accommodate the expected influx of employees' children, including English-language learners.

On April 21, after a seven-hour meeting, Kuhn broke ranks with the five other council members to vote no on the agreement, noting Prestage had lowered its estimate of the number of hires to 1,772, split in two phases. He brought up odors from rendering, the cost of improvements to the water utility and the fact that Prestage hadn't promised to hire local farmers for feeding operations. And in reference to the hourly wages, he asked, "Does the industry deserve incentives for these kind of wages? Why do we have to give $15.5 million to get it? I'm not going to vote for a development agreement at any cost." After the meeting, a local pork producer accosted Kuhn, accusing him of putting his career before the community, Mark Kuhn said.

On the day of the final vote, May 3, it was learned that Prestage's planned contribution to the schools fell short of meeting needs. Just before casting their votes, two other council members, John Lee and Bill Schickel, announced they were voting no. Everyone was shocked when the proposal failed, including Kuhn, several people say. Schreck says Kuhn had told him, "'There are five votes and you don't need me.'" Gary Schmit, Kuhn's boss at Henkel Construction, said, "He was hoping they would come back with answers."

Reaction spreads beyond Mason City

Opponents celebrated, but the governor told a press conference the City Council made a mistake. Ron Prestage, a principal in the company, blamed racism, and City Councilwoman Janet Solberg agreed. Iowa Economic Development Authority Director Debi Durham warned that Mason City would now be less attractive to site selectors.

Iowa Pork Producers Association CEO Pat McGonegle called it "a vote against agriculture" in the May 2016 Iowa Pork Producer newsletter. In the same issue, Kirk Leeds, CEO of the Iowa Soybean Association, declared that when leadership was needed, "a few elected officials ... apparently caved to a group of activists opposed to livestock production and Iowa agriculture."

The Globe-Gazette, which had editorially supported the project, lamented the "negative light" cast on the community and asked whether new information would change Kuhn's mind.

And Rick Mathes, a local Realtor with his father, Dick, and a Prestage booster on the city's planning and zoning commission, sent out a mass email declaring, "Prestage Blindsided." He organized a petition drive for a revote, and according to Mark Kuhn, would turn up at Alex's office to show him the names of important people who had signed it.

Mathes has since moved to Michigan, after concluding Mason City's future is bleak. He acknowledged lobbying Kuhn in weekly visits but called the idea of harassment "ludicrous."

The local chamber of commerce hosted a closed-door meeting June 2 hoping to resurrect the deal. Schickel was said to be reconsidering his vote, but Kuhn remained unsatisfied with the terms, according to his friend Jodi Draper and others. "Alex wasn't against Prestage. He was against the process," she said.

On June 2, Prestage announced it was no longer interested in Mason City. In a written statement, it blamed misinformation for the vote.

Still, even after Prestage pulled out, Kuhn approached Schreck, the economic development director, wondering if there was a chance of continued negotiations. But Schreck said the company felt there was “too much animosity” toward it.

“He was made to feel he let people down,” says Denise Kuhn, Alex’s mother.

It’s unclear whether the pressures Kuhn felt included fears the vote would affect his job at Henkel Construction. Schmit says Henkel probably was too small to have a role in the Prestage project, but Bookmeyer says the company might have benefited from side contracts. While Blodgett and others say Kuhn did fear for his job, Schmit insists: “There was no pressure at all on Alex from me.”

A friendship strained

Alex Kuhn and the mayor had been so close, Bookmeyer says, that Kuhn had the code to his garage door, and stopped by regularly for a craft beer and a chat. “We were like brothers.”

Mark Kuhn says his son had received frequent emails and text messages from the mayor’s private email address. But “after the first no vote, he shunned Alex,” Kuhn said. “Alex said, ‘He shut me out.’ “ “We didn’t communicate much,” Bookmeyer acknowledged in an interview in February 2017. “He certainly knew I was disappointed.” On May 11, Alex Kuhn got a call from the mayor that lasted 51 minutes. Mark Kuhn learned that from getting Alex’s cellphone records after his death. The next day, Bookmeyer sent Alex an email from a private account that Mark later found, under the subject line, “So...?” It said: “AK, It is time to find out if you can lead or not.” That was followed by a poem, “A Builder or a Wrecker?” containing the lines, “I can easily wreck in a day or two what builders have taken years to do.” It referred to a wrecker “who walks to town, content with the labor of tearing down.”

Asked about that, Bookmeyer said, “The point was, let’s not lend voice to folks who don’t have our interests in mind.”

His message to Kuhn went on: “One ill-timed, politically expedient vote and commentary set off an amazing set of events. We talked about the repercussions yesterday but maybe you should read it for yourself.”

Attached was an email from California developer Philip Chodur to City Administrator Brent Trout. Chodur was planning to develop a hotel as part of a downtown redevelopment project, but claimed the failed Prestage plan would make it harder to get financing and as a result, he was scrapping plans to add a floor.

However, even Councilman Hickey, who was at odds with Kuhn over Prestage, believes Chodur was using Prestage as an excuse for his failure to get financing.

Family and friends say in the last weeks of his life, Kuhn’s mood grew darker and he rarely went out. He told his father he wasn’t attending City Council meetings in person to avoid seeing Bookmeyer and Hickey. He also stayed away from Democratic functions, says John Stone, the Cerro Gordo County Democratic Party chairman. Kuhn told Stone the mayor was very mad at him.

“Alex wanted to be friends with everyone and help everyone,” Stone said. “I would have attacked back. A lot of people would have.”

Tornquist was Kuhn saying he was grateful that Hy-Vee delivered groceries because he didn't want to be out in public running into people. "That was so diametrically opposite to who he was."

"For one and a half hours, he just unloaded," Tornquist said. "...He said he was catching unbelievable heat and pressure from both Eric (the mayor) and from Travis Hickey."

On July 5, Prestage announced it was going to locate outside Eagle Grove. The Mason City council met that night, with Kuhn participating by phone. Hickey singled him out in remarks when the council voted unanimously to grant Chodur an extension on the downtown hotel project. Noting Kuhn had been the council member most in contact with Chodur, he suggested a conflict of interest since Alex's employer, Henkel Construction, could get a contract for part of the downtown development project.

Blodgett last saw Kuhn 10 or 12 days before his July 15 death. He said during the last two months of his life, Alex made half a dozen stops at the Outing Club, a posh, members-only club near Clear Lake partly owned by Blodgett's family and frequented by Republicans. On the last two visits, he was more distraught than Blodgett had ever seen him.

"He said he was having a hard time accepting, and dealing with ... the way some people were showing such malice toward him," Blodgett said. "He said his life wasn't fun and he found it hard to get up in the mornings."

A week before Kuhn's death, Jodi Draper, who had made an unsuccessful run for city council in 2013, said Kuhn called her and asked if she had considered running again, for the at-large seat. "I said, 'Nobody's going to beat you.'" Now she believes he was already planning to end his life.

"The guilt I feel from that couldn't possibly be put into words," she said choking up. "You wish you could turn back time."

Both Tornquist and Draper had had their own run-ins with the mayor. Draper said she campaigned on giving voice to city employees, to whom she claimed Bookmeyer "was sometimes very mean and rude." At least one city employee filed a hostile work environment complaint against Bookmeyer, the Globe-Gazette reported in 2010. And North Iowa Today reported in 2014 that a lawsuit against the mayor and city council by Lionel Foster, the former director of the city's Human Rights agency, resulted in a $240,000 settlement. Foster alleged race and age discrimination and retaliation for his civil rights investigations. One of his claims was that Bookmeyer had refused to reappoint three of his commissioners, telling one, a woman, that he wanted younger commissioners with fresher perspectives.

Tornquist said he too felt pushed "to the brink" in his council position, and like Kuhn had thoughts of ending his own life. He said on one occasion, Bookmeyer put him on a committee to look at the future of the city sanitation department, and Tornquist felt he "stacked the deck to get the outcome he wanted," to keep the budget down. Then he learned the press and public were excluded. After more incidents, he left for Indianapolis.

"My wife and I were trapped in our own house. We couldn't go out to dinner," said Tornquist, about having to face constituents after being associated with such tactics.

"I think of Alex every day," said Tornquist. "How could I have not seen it? But nobody saw it in me."

Bookmeyer has his defenders. Council member John Lee was one of the three to change his mind at the last minute and vote against Prestage because of the funding shortfall with the schools. But he says, "The mayor never put undue pressure on me or called to say, 'What the hell are you doing?'" Hickey, who says he, like Bookmeyer, felt "let down" by the vote against Prestage, observed, "As a part-time mayor, Eric takes his role very seriously and does a very good job lobbying folks to go in whatever direction he thinks would be good for the community."

Kuhn's last days

On July 12, Mark Kuhn attended Alex's 11-year-old son's Little League game and sat with Alex on the bleachers. "I could tell there was really something wrong," he said of Alex's withdrawn mood. "He believed it was all his fault that the community was so divided. When I told him 'No way, most people in Mason City think you are a hero for standing up for what you believe is a bad deal,' Alex replied, " 'That's not what I hear from some people in the business community I work with.' " The Kuhns later learned from his calendar that Alex had plans to see his counselor on Thursday, July 14, (the counselor declined to answer my calls) and also to meet Hickey. "He woke up on the 14th and the very first thing he did was a Google search on conflict of interest legislation," said Mark Kuhn, referring to the other councilman's accusations.

Hickey says Kuhn showed up unexpectedly at his office that day. There had been tension between them, Hickey acknowledged. "We were on opposite sides. I was frustrated with his vote."

During a previous lunch meeting, Kuhn had expressed dismay at Hickey's allegation but neither mind was changed, Hickey said. But calling Kuhn "one of the nicest guys you'd ever want to meet," he said Alex wasn't angry.

On that day Alex also called his employer to say he wouldn't be attending a scheduled pontoon boat ride with the company that evening, according to a cell phone log of Alex's shared with me by his father. Instead, he stopped by his parent's farm and stayed for dinner, seeming OK but revealing little.

He left early, saying he'd see them the next day. They had weekend plans with his two sons.

At 7:12 p.m. he tried to call the mayor, whom he had also messaged late that morning, according to the phone records. The log didn't show what the text said. Asked about that, Bookmeyer emailed me, "I don't believe we spoke, but I sure wish we would have, to have known where he was in his mind." He said he had last seen Alex in his office a number of days earlier. "He wanted to know how I was," Bookmeyer said. "I told him I need time."

Alex then exchanged some text messages with a woman he had dated. She declined to talk to me, but the Kuhns, who are in touch with her, say she had no prior indication of his plans. Then he repeatedly watched a short compilation of clips from the TV series, "Breaking Bad" that had been posted on YouTube. Called "Jesse Pinkman: Civilian," it involved some emotional encounters between a remorseful young man, Pinkman, and the former chemistry professor he had teamed up with to cook meth, Walter White. At the end, Pinkman held a gun to White's face, and White held a gun to his own forehead, urging Pinkman to kill him. A shot was fired.

Earlier, Pinkman called himself "the bad guy," and told White, "Since I met you, everything I've ever cared about is gone. ... I have never been more alone!"

On July 15, Henkel officials showed up at the Kuhn farm wondering where Alex was, since he hadn't turned up for a presentation related to a hospital expansion project. Denise Kuhn drove over to his place, where Henkel CEO Schmit and another employee also showed up. She told them he wasn't there, but one of them went into Alex's room, she said. After picking up Alex's sons, his mother took a different route home, checking the ditches in case he'd had a car accident.

Back home, she asked Mark to check their guns. He discovered a .22-caliber pistol missing. They called police.

It was around noon when the sheriff and a deputy arrived to say they had found Alex's car and body at the end of a dead-end road near a recreation area north of Marble Rock, which is about halfway between their two homes. An autopsy revealed he died from a bullet fired from the gun taken from his parents' cabinet. There were no drugs or alcohol in his system. He didn't leave a note, and was wearing the same clothes they had last seen him in, leading the Kuhns to believe he never went home the night before.

“We can all say there were times he was pretty upset and down about some things,” said Denise Kuhn. “But I never, ever could have imagined this.”

The aftermath

Former Sen. Harkin gave a eulogy at the funeral. Former state Sen. Jack Hatch, who served alongside Mark Kuhn in the Legislature, dedicated his new book “No Surrender” in part to Alex, saying he showed courage with his vote. “Not everyone agreed with Alex’s principled stand, and he took the brunt of public and private scrutiny,” it reads. “He became depressed and was unable to reconcile the differences.”

At the Kuhns’ behest, Blodgett notified the mayor that he would not be welcome at Alex’s funeral. But Bookmeyer said he attended anyway.

Bookmeyer says he was devastated by Kuhn’s death. Asked if he believed Kuhn was bullied, he referred to Prestage opponents, saying, “We were all bullied.”

Max Weaver, a former Mason City council member, says: “Alex was on the brink. Bookmeyer pushed him over.”

In January, Bookmeyer announced he won’t seek re-election in November. He called 2016 “rough,” and noted Alex Kuhn’s contributions to moving the city forward. Asked why he wasn’t running, Bookmeyer told me he had no further political ambitions, and was ready for a new career. He said Alex knew that was his intent.

Postscript

It would be irresponsible to blame others for someone’s suicide without hearing a cause in the deceased person’s own words. But as Draper, who works in the mental health field, points out, there can be triggers in the same way that smoking can contribute to the risk of cancer.

Everyone has different triggers, and everyone has periods of particular susceptibility to being demeaned, shunned or blamed. We live in an era when gossip, lies and rumors, spread through social media, can swiftly destroy reputations, careers and relationships. Schools and communities are finally focusing on the effects of such bullying on children. But adults are not immune.

People who go into public service to make a difference sometimes find themselves confronting powerful vested interests, and then back away from a fight. Alex Kuhn neither backed away nor wanted a fight. He wanted to do right by everyone: his constituents, his family, his job, colleagues and friends. One of the tragedies of politics is how limited a space there is for that — and how devastating it can be to an idealistic leader to find out.

“He said he was having a hard time accepting, and dealing with ... the way some people were showing such malice toward him. He said his life wasn’t fun and he found it hard to get up in the mornings.”

TODD BLODGETT, A FRIEND OF ALEX KUHN

DMR Iowa View: On abortion, liberals cite science fiction

By: Joel Kurtinitis

The growing tension between moral relativism and scientific absolutism has produced two related effects on the left: a growing rift between liberal politics and the scientific community, and the insecure, blustery hollering of the word “science” by progressives — as if repeating it three times in a mirror will summon Bill Nye in a lab coat to validate their worldview.

There’s laughable irony in liberal attempts to squeeze science into the frock of their relativistic priesthood: Science — real science — is consummately objective. It doesn’t care about your feelings, your politics, your identity, or your faith. Science is observable, testable, repeatable, falsifiable.

Even casual political observers will note that leftists rarely seek — or present — specific evidence to back their claims anymore. Rather, their continual allusion to “science” is only an appeal to authority, whether applied to climate change, vaccines, GMOs or abortion.

Such appeals abound in abortion defense pieces like the March 31 column “Myths like life at conception don’t belong in the law.”

In it, Rekha Basu opines that a prolife legislator “is free to believe whatever she wants as a matter of personal faith. But that doesn’t justify the distortion of scientific fact or the imposition of religious beliefs on the public.”

But life at conception isn’t rooted in abstract notions like faith or values — it’s rooted in basic, high-school biology.

It’s amazing that, after decades of pushing sex ed in classrooms across America, liberals still can’t figure out what pregnancy is.

The article quotes Richard J. Paulson of the American Society for Reproductive Medicine: “Life is a continuum,” Paulson wrote. “The egg cell is alive, and it has the potential to become a zygote (a single-celled embryo)” if fertilized by sperm. The resulting cell is also alive, but “from a biological perspective, no new life has been created, because it is nearly identical to the egg cell.”

There’s some good science in the above statement, but there’s also a lot of nakedly unscientific editorializing and deliberate misdirection.

Is life a continuum? In Mufasa’s Circle of Life sense, sure.

In any meaningful scientific sense, absolutely not.

We are conceived, we grow, we are born, we live, we die. Our physical existence has a definite beginning and end.

Science.

Your body can be distinguished from another person’s body by a unique genetic marker known to us as DNA. Sperm cells and egg cells contain only the respective parent’s DNA. Once a zygote is formed, a new organism (read: new life) with DNA distinct from both parents is present within hours of conception. If DNA can convict a murderer for a crime 50 years ago, it should be ample evidence of a new human life in the womb.

Because science.

This new entity is the earliest stage of human life. Prior to this, all cells involved were parts of the parent. A new genetic signature means a new, developing, genetically human organism, whether it looks “nearly identical to the egg cell” or not.

More science. Anyone — scientist or not — attempting to add ambiguity to this simplest of biological truths has an agenda.

Like maybe, I don't know, making money on reproductive tech, or raking in $127 million in "family planning" profits.

Here's another biological reality: Abortion doesn't "terminate a pregnancy" or "remove the product of conception." It kills developing human beings. That's why Planned Parenthood workers caught in the Center for Medical Progress' 2015 sting operation were shown sorting through refrigerated pans of tiny human arms and legs, discussing organ value.

If you're going to advocate for something so brutal, at least be honest about it and don't hide behind terms like "women's health" or "reproductive rights."

The political left is losing their war on science, because they aren't interested in genuine discovery or progress, only in using it as a cloak to push their own religion — yes, secular humanism is a religion— on those of us who believe every human being is endowed by our creator with an inalienable right to life.

DMR: Grassley pledges to preserve filibuster for legislation

Sen. Chuck Grassley said he doesn't expect any fallout for the future of the U.S. Supreme Court from Senate Republicans' decision to use the "nuclear option."

"It isn't going to change anything whatsoever, because for the first time in the 228-year history of our country, there's a partisan filibuster of a Supreme Court judge. So, this is the first time in 228 years, so if we aren't going to do it anymore, it's not going to be any different than it's been for those 228 years," he said in an interview Thursday.

Got that? In essence, Grassley's saying one bad apple don't spoil the whole bunch, girl.

(But if he actually said that, he'd correct the grammar and credit the Osmond Brothers.

And he wouldn't call me "girl." He's no dummy.) I watched on C-SPAN as history was being made, or unmade, depending on your perspective. Republicans and Democrats alike got up and recited the details of decades-old partisan grudges like a mournful Greek chorus. This isn't one bad apple. The whole barrel is rotten.

I tend to agree with Grassley that this wasn't about Justice Neil Gorsuch, not really.

He's conservative, to be sure.

But Democrats' best efforts to paint him as a corporate shill or heartless ideologue fell flat, in my estimation. He's qualified to serve and his addition to the court does not obviously change the balance that existed before last year's death of Justice Antonin Scalia.

Mostly, this was about Republicans' decision last year to make history by refusing to bring up President Barack Obama's nomination of Judge Merrick Garland. They blamed that on Democrats by inventing the so-called "Biden rule" that never actually delayed any justice's confirmation. It was indeed deplorable, but it worked and is now the standard.

It's all about power and the Republicans have it. So you might think it would follow that Republicans like Grassley don't fear partisan fallout on issues like tax reform or infrastructure because they can also eliminate the filibuster on legislation.

Grassley says no. He said Thursday he just signed a letter being circulated by Sen.

Susan Collins, R-Maine, saying he wouldn't vote to change the 60-vote rule for legislation.

"Because the only significant difference between the House and Senate is that in the House of Representatives, the minority has no rights. As long as the majority sticks together, they can run roughshod over minorities," Grassley said.

Guess he knows from experience what that looks like.

He said it's only happened twice during his 40 years in office that one party has held 60 seats. "If you want minorities to have any voice whatsoever in the legislative process, the only place that can be done is in the United States Senate," he said.

The real power in the nuclear option is the threat of mutually assured destruction. Both parties can imagine they'll eventually be in the minority and will have to live with whatever rules they impose while in the majority.

When it comes to judicial appointments, though, the bombs have already fallen enough times to make the threat seem weak. When a president campaigns on a list of names of potential Supreme Court nominees, as Trump did, there's no expectation of bipartisan support.

Presidents and senators say they want an independent judiciary, but that's true only if it means the courts will reliably support their partisan agenda. Meanwhile, the public's confidence in the courts continues to erode. This is the real danger of nuclear fallout. The damage lasts for generations.

Grassley says one remedy to that is his legislation to allow cameras in the Supreme Court. "I think TV in the courtrooms would help. Let the public know more about how it works," he said.

The Iowa Supreme Court started holding oral arguments on the road so people across the state could attend and learn more about how the court works, Grassley noted.

It's a good idea for many reasons. For one thing, voters might realize they need to hold their legislators accountable for writing clear, unambiguous laws. The old saying "garbage in, garbage out" may have been coined to describe the effect of bad data on computer programming, but it applies to our legal system. Poorly written laws lead to poor judicial rulings.

But real-life court is nothing like the dramas on TV. People other than hardcore court watchers will soon tune out. Video clips taken out of context may show up on the internet and, you guessed it, political campaigns. TV is not a cure for getting politics out of the courtroom.

Meanwhile, we don't know how long the tattered remnants of the filibuster will stand. I'm all for bipartisan cooperation, but there's something to be said for forcing the majority party to be entirely accountable for its action — or inaction.

Material witness on suicide watch after surrender in Missouri

A Bondurant man considered a material witness in the killing of his parents and sister allegedly told police, "I killed three people last night" as he turned himself in, said Neosho, Mo., Police Chief David Kennedy. Chase Marcus Nicholson, 20, approached Wal-Mart employees in the small southwest Missouri town about 12 hours after his family members were found dead in their Bondurant home. Kennedy said Nicholson allegedly told the Wal-Mart employees the same thing he told police.

Polk County authorities were expected to arrive in Neosho late Friday to question Nicholson in connection to the killing of his parents, Mark Alan Nicholson, 58, and Charla Lee Nicholson, 56, and his sister Tawni Alexis Nicholson, 24. They were found dead in the family home in the 9700 block of Northeast 88th Street, said Lt. Rich Blaylock, spokesman with the Polk County Sheriff's Office.

Chase and Tawni's cousin Seth Nicholson, 28, of Des Moines, said Tawni was at the house to help plan her brother's 21st birthday party.

Nicholson turned himself in at about 10 a.m. Friday in Neosho, a town of 12,000 people about a 5 1/2-hour drive from Bondurant. He is in custody in the Newton County, Missouri, jail and was on suicide watch, Kennedy said.

Seth Nicholson, one of Chase's cousins, said Friday that Chase Nicholson had been treated for mental illness for many years.

"His entire life has been a giant adjustment," he said. It was 9:30 p.m. Thursday when Polk County deputies went to the Nicholsons' home to conduct a welfare check, which may have been prompted by a friend who had spoken to Chase Nicholson. Investigators cleared the scene late Friday morning. Blaylock declined to say how the victims were killed. The Nicholsons were remembered fondly by neighbors and co-workers.

Charla Nicholson had been a teacher at Des Moines Public Schools since 1986, the school district confirmed. She worked with Goodrell Middle School students until the fall of 1999, when she moved over to Cattell Elementary. Cattell Principal Tiona Sandbulte said Charla was a dedicated teacher who loved her students. She most recently worked with children in kindergarten and first grade as an intervention teacher, who met with students who needed extra support with reading or math. She also helped monitor lunch time.

"The kids looked forward to her coming in," Sandbulte said, adding that Charla would often joke with students. "She just sparkled. She's just so great with the kids."

Charla was adored by co-workers and was always willing to help her colleagues when needed, Sandbulte said.

The school district is making counselors available to help students and staff cope with Charla's death, Sandbulte said. Cattell also planned to email students' families.

Charla's daughter, Tawni, was just starting her career at an area insurance company after graduating from Iowa State University in August, a neighbor said.

She received a bachelor's degree in business with a major in marketing, said university spokeswoman Annette Hacker.

Cadets' explicit photos cause annual dinner to be canceled

RYAN J. FOLEY

ASSOCIATED PRESS

The commander of a military training program at Iowa State University canceled an annual formal dinner Friday after news broke that explicit photographs of some male cadets had been posted on Facebook.

Capt. Scott Curtis sent an email to the Naval Reserve Officer Training Corps saying he was calling off Saturday's "Dining In" event in light of publicity about the incident, which a Navy spokesman said involved seven male cadets who were "willing participants" in inappropriate behavior around campus and online.

Curtis said the decision was unfortunate, and he warned students would likely not be refunded the full cost of tickets they bought for the dinner for upperclassmen, alumni and retirees.

"My overarching goal is to ensure that all of you personally, as well as the reputation of the Cyclone Battalion as a whole is protected to the maximum extent possible given the current media situation," Curtis wrote.

The Associated Press reported Thursday that explicit photos were taken of some cadets around campus on March 4 and posted to the Facebook page of a student group connected to the program.

Lt. Sean Brophy, spokesman for the Naval Service Training Command, said other students did the right thing by reporting the photos to program leaders.

The Navy said "appropriate administrative actions" were taken against the midshipmen, who remain with the program. Curtis apologized to Iowa State leaders.

Curtis said the incident doesn't "reflect on the Character of this Battalion — how we respond and move forward does." He called the group fantastic and urged members to "dust yourselves off and move on." A separate email sent by a student leader instructed students in the battalion to decline comment and inform program leaders of any media inquiries.

DMR: Grassley, Ernst back U.S. strike on Syria

LTA@DMREG.COM

Iowa U.S. Sens. Chuck Grassley and Joni Ernst each voiced support for airstrikes launched late Thursday against a target in Syria. Grassley, in a statement released Friday afternoon, called the airstrike ordered by Republican President Donald Trump "appropriate" following Syrian leader Bashar al-Assad's apparent use of chemical weapons on civilians.

"Assad's actions follow a policy under President Obama that lacked any consequences for heinous crimes against Syrian civilians," Grassley said.

"The action taken by President Trump to prevent further use of chemical weapons by Assad or anyone else was appropriate.”

He added that the president now must “develop a comprehensive strategy” for ending the six-year-long civil war.

Ernst, meanwhile, praised the strike within hours of its announcement on Thursday, crediting Trump with showing “global leadership” in a statement that also described Assad as a war criminal. “This has been a tragic reality for the past six years and has gone on far too long,” she said. “Unlike the Obama administration, the Trump administration is showing global leadership and we must work to find an end to the root causes of this crisis.” Both of the Republican senators’ statements represent an evolution from 2013, when Assad previously deployed chemical weapons and then-President Barack Obama, a Democrat, proposed a military response. “I don’t think the case for military action has been made. ...” Grassley said in a September 2013 statement. “If the goal is to deter and degrade Assad’s ability to use chemical weapons, how would a limited strike achieve this goal? What are the risks of military action? What is the U.S. national interest in striking Syria?”

That same month, Ernst — then a state senator and a candidate for U.S. Senate — said Obama had not made the case for “why it is in our vital interests to use force in the midst of Syria’s ongoing civil war.”

Grassley’s office clarified the senator’s shift in viewpoint in a statement to the Register, arguing that Trump’s strike was a single, clear action to disrupt Assad’s ability to launch another chemical weapons attack. Obama in 2013, by contrast, considered a wider military action “but the goal, strategy and plan were unclear.”

“Congress and the American people deserve details on the mission, and the plan to achieve it, before entering into a possible long-term conflict, regardless of which president is in the White House,” spokesman Michael Zona said. In a CNN interview on Friday, Ernst likewise argued that Trump has made the case for Thursday’s strike in a way that Obama did not four years ago. “He has laid out the case — humanitarian atrocities of course, and the use of chemical weapons — and we also have ISIS engaged in that region,” she said. “We simply do not want to see chemicals fall into the hands of ISIS operators. There’s an ongoing civil war and that paired with the ISIS threat makes it even more imperative that we make sure we’re destroying any of those deliver systems.”

Another Iowa member of Congress, U.S. Rep. Rod Blum, praised Trump’s “decisive leadership” in a tweet late Thursday, but he said if there was to be a sustained military effort, the president should seek congressional authorization.

Trump ordered the strike against Syria late Thursday in retaliation for the chemical weapons attack that killed 86 people on Tuesday.

The attack, the first conventional assault on another country ordered by Trump, comes a day after he declared that the chemical weapons assault had “crossed many, many lines,” including the deaths of 27 children.

The 59 missiles, fired from the destroyers USS Porter and Ross in the eastern Mediterranean Sea, struck the airfield where Syria based the warplanes used in the chemical attack, according to Navy Capt. Jeff Davis, a Pentagon spokesman.

The missiles destroyed aircraft, hardened hangars, ammunition supply bunkers, air defense systems and radar at the Shayrat Airfield, according to USA TODAY.

DMR: MATERIAL WITNESS IN KILLINGS TOLD COUSIN HE ‘DOESN’T FIT IN SOCIETY’

LINH TA

LTA@DMREG.COM

For Chase Nicholson's entire life, he's struggled with feeling adequate, his cousin Seth Nicholson of Des Moines said Friday. That struggle also caused friction between him and his family, the 28-year-old said. "His entire life has been a giant adjustment," Seth Nicholson said. Chase Marcus Nicholson, 20, is considered a material witness in the killing of his parents and sister in Bondurant on Thursday night. Chase Nicholson approached Wal-Mart employees in Neosho, Mo., about 12 hours after his family members were found dead in their Bondurant home. He allegedly told police, "I killed three people last night" as he turned himself in, said Neosho, Mo., Police Chief David Kennedy.

His parents, Mark Alan Nicholson, 58, and Charla Lee Nicholson, 56, and his sister Tawni Alexis Nicholson, 24, were found dead in the family home in the 9700 block of Northeast 88th Street, authorities said.

At about 4 a. m. Friday, Seth Nicholson said, his mother called his wife, Kelsea Nicholson. She was bawling on the phone and told them about the deaths. However, she also warned them to lock their doors. "She said every one of them is dead," Seth said. "It was a nightmare."

Chase had been living with his parents in Bondurant. Seth Nicholson said police told relatives that Chase had stopped at a friend's house after the slayings and told him he killed his family. Then he drove south. "His friend called the police just to make sure it wasn't just a story," Seth Nicholson said. The call apparently prompted the welfare check on the Bondurant home.

The last time the family heard from the three victims was around 8 p. m. Thursday, Seth said.

Tawni, who graduated from Iowa State University in August, was at her family's home in Bondurant to help plan her brother's 21st birthday party. It was supposed to be in conjunction with the family's Easter celebration.

Her last text to a family member was discussing plans for the party.

"Tawni was there to plan the birthday party," Seth said. "She was there to help him." Chase Nicholson stayed at Orchard Place, a Des Moines charity that provides mental health treatment for children, from age 16 to 18, his cousin said. He went to school in the Bondurant school district and later attended an area private school.

Seth said Chase seemed to do well at Orchard Place.

"He was good for a little while, and then the assault happened with dad," Seth said, referring to Chase Nicholson's arrest in 2014.

A criminal complaint filed in that incident alleges Chase Nicholson threw a piece of metal from a fireplace set at his father on May 10, 2014. Mark Nicholson was cut on the left side of his face, by his left eye. Chase, who was 18 at the time, told officers that he had thrown a soccer cleat at his dad and said that could have caused the cut, according to the complaint. The criminal charge was eventually dropped.

But Chase was often easy to talk with, his cousin said. During family gatherings, he was upbeat and smiling.

"You would never know he had these issues," Kelsea Nicholson said.

After becoming an adult, Seth Nicholson said, Chase has been in and out of mental health treatment. Nicholson said he had a hard time finding a hospital that would allow him to stay for longer than 24 hours.

In the fall, he was enrolled at the Ankeny Des Moines Area Community College campus studying computer programming.

He did not return for the spring semester because of complications with his mental health, Seth said. He had been working at a local Wal-Mart.

Seth said Chase Nicholson looked up to him, since they grew up together and he was a few years older than him.

He would confide to him about his thoughts, Seth said. He said Chase liked video games and listened to “headbanging” music. He was also interested in weapons, including knives.

Two weeks ago, Seth said, he spoke with Chase on the phone. He said Chase confided in him and told him he “doesn’t fit in society.”

Seth said the family has no ties with people in Missouri, so they’re unsure why he ended up there.

A vigil will be held on Saturday in Bondurant to remember Mark, Charla and Tawni.

It will be held from 7: 30 to 8: 30 p. m. outside Bondurant- Farrar High School at 1000 Grant Street North in Bondurant.

Seth said the tragic story demonstrates the importance of mental health care. He said he was concerned about Chase’s future.

“It is just a classic story of good people who had something really bad happen to them,” he said. “I don’t think he knows peace. I don’t think he’s ever met it.”

DMR: Iowa Senate confirms three appointees to regents board

JEFF CHARIS- CARLSON JCHARISC@PRESS-CITIZEN.COM

The Iowa Senate voted Wednesday to confirm all three of Gov. Terry Branstad’s appointees to the board that oversees Iowa’s three public universities.

In a series of 49-0 votes, the senate approved Branstad’s decision to appoint two former state lawmakers — former Rep. Nancy Dunkel, D-Dyersville, and former Sen. Nancy Boettger, R-Harlan — to the nine-member Iowa Board of Regents. Boettger and Dunkel will join board May 1, replacing regents Bruce Rastetter and Katie Mulholland, whose six-year terms expire April 30. Rastetter did not seek a second term, and Mulholland was not reappointed to one.

In another 49-0 vote, the senate confirmed Wednesday the reappointment of regent Sherry Bates, who has served on the board since 2015 and who heads the board’s Campus and Safety Subcommittee. When reappointing Bates in March, the Governor’s Office said she deserved a full, six-year term on the board. The Senate also voted 49-0 last month to confirm last year’s recess appointment of Regent Mike Richards, who has been serving on the board since May 2016. As with Wednesday’s confirmation vote, there was no debate. Wednesday’s vote will change the gender balance on the board after May 1 to five women and four men, but the partisan balance on the board will stay the same: five Republicans, one Democratic and three independents. With Rastetter and Mulholland stepping down, the board will be without a president and a president pro tem. A new leadership election will need to take place on or after May 1. One of the new board’s first tasks will be to find a replacement for Iowa State University President Steven Leath, who is leaving to become president of Auburn University in Alabama.

Regent Larry McKibben, who served in the Iowa Senate from 1997 to 2008, described Boettger as “the leader on issues of education and educational finance.” He said both former lawmakers are “highly qualified appointees.”

“I care very much about the system,” Boettger told the Register in an earlier phone interview. “Iowa State is what brought me to Iowa in the first place. The state is known for quality education. I want to make sure it stays that way.” Boettger said she plans to learn as much as she can from her fellow Harlan resident, Mary Louise Petersen, who served as president of the regents from 1973 to 1981. Dunkel, a Democrat who served in the House for four years, is a retired banker and a former board member of Iowa Student Loan Liquidity Corporation and the Iowa Values Fund board.

She told the Register that she views Iowa’s public universities as a key part of Iowa’s economic development landscape “in terms of their research and in terms of their business incubators.”

“Have the colleges been not given enough money? Sure. But you know you can say that about a lot of other departments as well,” Dunkel said. “Our job is to make sure they are doing the best they can with the money they are getting,” Dunkel told the Register she initially had been contacted by Lt. Gov. Kim Reynolds to inquire whether she was interested in the position.

Once she agreed, the governor called later that day to make the offer.

With Branstad scheduled to be appointed as the next U.S. ambassador to China, Reynolds will take over the governor’s responsibilities.

The governor office said the choice of appointees was made collaboratively.

“Like all of our appointments the past seven years, they were all decided upon together by Gov. Branstad and Lt. Gov. Reynolds,” Ben Hammes, a gubernatorial spokesman, said Tuesday via email last month.

DMR: Lawmakers promise to protect credit for poor families in tax reform efforts

BRIANNE PFANNENSTIEL

BPFANNENST@DMREG.COM

Iowa lawmakers promised to protect a popular tax credit benefiting more than 220,000 low-income working families in their effort to reform the tax code. House Appropriations Committee Chairman Rep. Pat Grassley, R-New Hartford, said at a subcommittee meeting Thursday the Earned Income Tax Credit, along with another that benefits community colleges, would be held harmless as lawmakers work to cut back state spending on tax credits. Grassley said he heard from legislators, advocates and others who opposed reducing benefits under the Earned Income Tax Credit, which primarily benefits those living in or near poverty.

“You have to weigh how difficult of a vote that is versus the savings that you’re going to achieve,” he said. “And I just think that this point, there wasn’t the appetite to take that on.”

Grassley recently introduced House File 187, which would cap and gradually reduce the total amount the state spends on tax credits, funneling the savings into a state account for an as-yet undetermined purpose. It also would roll back some of the most generous benefits associated with some credits, which result in refund checks for individuals and companies that have no tax liability.

But, he said Wednesday, it became too difficult to put an overall cap on state tax credit spending, which has ballooned by about 180 percent since 2005. Instead, he plans to look at each tax credit individually and find ways to cut back.

According to data from the Department of Revenue, the total value of state tax credits has grown from about $153 million in 2005 to an expected $427 million in 2018.

The state spends more on the Earned Income Tax Credit than any other on the books. During the 2016 budget year, it totaled $71.9 million. That's projected to grow to $76.3 million in 2021. About 71 percent of those credits were claimed by taxpayers with an adjusted gross income of less than $25,000.

Rep. Chris Hall, DSioux City and the top Democrat on the House Appropriations Committee, said he supports taking that credit off the table, saying it has been "extremely effective" at accomplishing its intended purpose.

After a year in which spending outpaced revenue by about $250 million, Hall and other Democrats have pushed for a review of tax credits as a way to save money and shore up the state's budget. But Republicans say cutting back on tax credits would provide savings that could be used to balance out a future tax cut.

"If the goal is tax reform, then you need to begin to achieve the savings from the tax credits, in my opinion," he said.

Hall said he disagrees with that approach.

"We need to make sure that this conversation is linked directly to improving and making the state's budget more sustainable, balanced, transparent and predictable," he said.

DMR: Templeton Rye one step closer to distilling whiskey in Iowa

Iowa-based manufacturer breaks ground on $26M, 99,000-square-foot complex

THE DES MOINES REGISTER

Templeton Rye, the Iowa-based whiskey manufacturer, has broken ground on its new $26 million distillery building in Templeton, Iowa.

The new 99,000-square-foot complex includes a 34,500-square-foot distillery as well as a museum and barrel-aging warehouse.

It's expected to be completed in the fall of 2018.

The new facility may muzzle critics who claim Templeton had been misrepresenting its liquor by labeling it as "small-batch rye" and "made in Iowa," when it actually was made from a stock whiskey distilled by MGP Ingredients in Indiana. Complaints culminated in a series of lawsuits over the whiskey's authenticity, which the company settled in 2015 with promises to change its marketing materials and bottle labeling.

Templeton Rye has six fulltime and about 10 part-time employees, the company said.

The distillery project will add 27 jobs and will be able to produce 500,000 proof gallons of rye whiskey annually.

The aging warehouse will be able to store 40,000 barrels.

DMR: Casino in Clinton debuts simulcast horse, dog racing

LINH TA

LTA@DMREG.COM

Iowans looking to bet on video simulcasts of horse and dog races will no longer have to go to a casino with live racing to make their wagers. On Friday, Wild Rose Casino & Resort in Clinton began to offer off-track betting, including races from Santa Anita Park, Aqueduct, Keeneland and Oak Lawn. It's the first state-regulated Iowa casino without live racing to offer off-track betting. "It's something new and fresh we're offering to people on the eastern side of the state," said Tom Timmons, president and chief operating officer of Wild Rose Casinos. "We're hoping to attract people from Clinton and the Quad Cities." The Iowa Legislature agreed in 2014 to allow state-regulated casinos that do not offer live racing to take bets on simulcasts of horse and dog races as part of a broader bill that permitted the state's greyhound tracks to stop offering live racing. The simulcasts are offered through a hub hosted by the Iowa Greyhound Association, which is operating the Dubuque dog track. Iowa's only other recent greyhound track, Bluffs Run in Council Bluffs, shut down in December 2015.

The greyhound association will receive a share of the revenues.

Previously, the only Iowa gambling operations that offered wagering on simulcasts of horse and dog races from outside tracks were Prairie Meadows Racetrack and Casino in Altoona and Iowa Greyhound Park in Dubuque, along with Meskwaki Bingo Casino Hotel at Tama. The Meskwaki casino, which is regulated by a tribal gaming commission, has long been allowed to offer off-track wagering under provisions of the federal Indian Gaming Regulatory Act.

For its debut, The Wild Rose will offer races from 16 different tracks across the country.

People interested in making bets will go into the Coaches Corner — Wild Rose's sports bar and grill. The area includes 56 new televisions including 16 screens that combine for theater-style viewing. Each booth includes screens for watching races.

Patrons can purchase a program and then let a clerk know what they're interested in betting on. They will receive a ticket and can either stay or leave Coaches Corner.

The wagering is parimutuel and people are not betting against the house. The casino will take a cut of the winnings, while the rest will be dispersed towards the winning tickets, Timmons said.

"We're excited," Timmons said "Got everything finalized and tested everything."

Timmons said they may expand simulcasting to its Jefferson and Emmetsburg locations.

"We'll be watching and see how it goes," Timmons said. "There is an investment with it."

The casino will feature the Santa Anita Derby on Saturday.

DMR Editorial: Is Harreld proposing merger or hostile takeover?

This isn't the way to unify the UI foundation and alumni

Perhaps it makes sense for the University of Iowa Foundation to merge with the school's alumni association.

But it seems odd that the school's president, Bruce Harreld, is the man who has decided to make that happen; that he hasn't given much of a rationale for it; and that he's already decided, on his own, who will lead the new organization.

Stranger still, he has done all of this without consulting with the alumni group, leaving its leaders "shocked" by Harreld's actions.

It's important to remember the entities — the school, the foundation and the alumni association — are separate and distinct entities. The University of Iowa is a public institution dedicated to higher learning and run by the Board of Regents. The foundation and alumni groups are two separate, private, tax-exempt organizations run by their own boards of directors.

Obviously, the three have common interests and they collaborate and coordinate while pursuing their individual goals. But they have missions that are fundamentally different. The school exists to educate students; the foundation exists to raise money for the school and the University of Iowa Hospitals; and the alumni association exists to strengthen the school through recruiting, alumni events, networking opportunities and career programs.

Last fall, Harreld asked the leadership of the foundation and alumni association to form a committee that would explore ways the two organizations could work together in supporting the school. He said that after reviewing the committee's recommendations — none of which involved a merger — he decided to "create one, new, unified organization," citing their "overlapping missions and aspirations."

But the report on which Harreld claims to have based his decision doesn't actually recommend the merger of the two organizations.

Still, Harreld says a newly created, single entity will better serve the university by creating "more meaningful alumni engagement and increased philanthropic support" — although it's not clear how that would occur. There's no question the alumni and foundation have overlapping objectives, but they are fundamentally different organizations. The foundation, for example, employs 233 people and recently completed an eight-year fundraising drive by securing almost $2 billion in pledges. The much smaller alumni organization has 25 employees and one of its biggest contractors is the foundation, which was paid $137,000 last year for information-technology services.

To put the size of the two organizations in perspective, consider this: Last year, the foundation spent $124 million, while the alumni association's total spending for the year was $4 million. In fact, the foundation's fundraising budget was more than three times the total spending by the alumni group.

Can the two be merged without the alumni association losing its identity and focus?

Perhaps. But it's easy to see why the alumni organization's leaders are worried.

"The alumni association's board of directors was not aware that (Harreld) was going to make that decision until the day he did," Clare Kelly, chairwoman of the association's board of directors, told the Cedar Rapids Gazette. "We are not happy with the manner in which it's been handled."

And Harreld has done more than decree that these two nonprofits be combined. He has also decided that once merged, they will be led by Lynette Marshall, who now earns more than a half a million dollars annually as the foundation's president and CEO.

Harreld has also instructed the association to stop accepting new members and stop collecting membership dues.

"The board didn't vote on those decisions," Kelly told the Gazette. At this point, Harreld's "merger" looks more like a hostile corporate takeover than a mutually agreed-upon consolidation. It's almost as if the two charities' boards of directors have no say in the fate of their organizations or their leadership, and their bylaws are utterly meaningless. If that's the case, the Internal Revenue Service should take a close look at their tax-exempt status and ask why it is that the head of a public university can, by his own edict, reorganize or dissolve these two independent, nonprofit organizations.

A merger might make sense, but the manner in which this one is being pursued does not.

DMR Iowa View: Women deserve to receive equal pay for equal work

This column was signed by Iowa state Sens. Rita Hart, Pam Jochum, Liz Mathis, Janet Petersen, Amanda Ragan; state Reps. Marti Anderson, Liz Bennett, Timi Brown-Powers, Abby Finkenauer, Ruth Ann Gaines, Mary Gaskill, Lisa Heddens, Monica Kurth, Vicki Lensing, Mary Mascher, Helen Miller, Amy Nielsen, Jo Oldson, Kirsten Running-Marquardt, Sharon Steckman, Beth Wessel-Kroeschell, Phyllis Thede, Cindy Winckler, Mary Wolfe.

Equal pay for equal work. It might sound like common sense, but unfortunately it's not reality.

The figures on equal pay are daunting. Women make just 80 cents for every dollar a man makes, according to data released by the Census Bureau. African-American and Hispanic women are even further behind, making just 63 and 54 cents, respectively.

Unfortunately, Iowa lags behind even those disappointing numbers. Iowa women make less than 77 cents on the dollar for what a man earns.

Women and our families are being shortchanged hundreds of thousands of dollars over the course of a lifetime.

Some argue that women choose different jobs, or choose motherhood over career opportunities. But even within the same profession, women are paid less. Female doctors and surgeons make 71 percent of what men make, and female financial specialists make 66 percent compared with men in their profession. For lawyers and judges, the pay gap is 82 percent. And while three-fourths of women who enter the workforce will get pregnant, half of working firsttime mothers receive no paid leave to have their babies, according to the Census Bureau.

Women are much more likely to have career interruptions because of child care being costly or unavailable, often resulting in lost pay raises when they return.

These are difficult financial decisions forced upon women and families because of failing economic policies.

Those are the figures. But they don't tell the whole story or how we can take action.

Tuesday was Equal Pay Day, symbolizing how long into the year women must work to earn what men earned last year. It's a day when we should remember not just the numbers, but the impact on women and families. After all, women are sole, primary, or co-breadwinners in nearly 72 percent of Iowa families.

Hardworking women trying to provide for their families are falling behind because of a discriminatory pay gap and policies that don't support the tough choices facing families.

Thankfully, there are solutions to make pay equitable.

The Legislature can create paid leave and child-care policies allowing mothers to keep their jobs, avoiding long gaps in employment that drive down wages. And we need to raise the minimum wage — two-thirds of minimum-wage earners are women — and enact other policies to raise wages instead of engaging in a race to the bottom.

Employers can get help to correct their pay practices, through equalpay guidelines from the U.S.

Department of Labor. Women must also be empowered to ask prospective employers to show women and men are paid equally, that their hiring process seeks diversity, and that they can join a union. Women in unions earn over one-third more than women in non-union workplaces.

If there is unequal pay, women should discuss the problem with their employer.

If discrimination continues, every woman has the right to file a complaint with the U.S.

Equal Employment Opportunity Commission.

Equal pay for equal work shouldn't be an idea. It should be reality. Other states are moving forward, and women continue to recognize this issue's importance. We need to move Iowa forward, and we need citizen action, legislative action and participation from the businesses to make it happen. At current pace, the wage gap will not close for 50 years. Women and hardworking Iowa families cannot afford to wait that long.

LEE: Is Iowa's ACA insurance market a sign of what's to come nationally?

CHELSEA KEENAN

Top of Form

Bottom of Form

Iowa's insurance market could be the canary in the nation's coal mine if Congress or President Donald Trump doesn't offer clarity soon on the future of the Affordable Care Act, with millions of people losing coverage, one industry expert said Friday.

Two insurers announced this week that they would stop selling individual health plans both on and off the Iowa exchange — Des Moines-based Wellmark Blue Cross and Blue Shield on Monday and Aetna on Thursday. The decisions affect some 57,600 Iowans — 21,400 Wellmark policy holders and 36,200 policy holders with Aetna.

It also leaves the vast majority of the 50,000 Iowans purchasing subsidy-eligible insurance on the exchange with only one option — Minnesota-based Medica. But that insurer is tight-lipped on what it plans to do in 2018, saying Thursday that it is "evaluating the situation and (its) options."

"Iowa is a bit different in that it's happening so early," said Cynthia Cox, associate director for the program for the study of health reform and private insurance at not-for-profit Kaiser Family Foundation. "But it might be the start of many more exits to come."

Iowa has never shown up in any of the health care policy organization's lists of states with fragile markets. States such as Tennessee, Arizona and Oklahoma have had steep premium increases and seen insurers drop out.

"This goes to show that political uncertainty can make an otherwise stable market unstable overnight," she said.

The problem Wellmark, Aetna and other insurers face is that not enough young and healthy people are choosing to enroll in plans to help spread out costs. Instead, older, sicker individuals with multiple chronic illnesses — who need insurance and coverage — are purchasing the health plans, putting a high concentration of expenses in the individual market.

Wellmark said on Monday it lost $90 million through the individual market in Iowa.

There's also quite a bit of uncertainty still looming over the future of the ACA. Trump and Congressional Republicans have promised to repeal and replace President Barack Obama's signature health care legislation, but have been stalled by disagreement over the changes they will make.

Insurers have said the unpredictability over which rules will be in place in 2018 — and over the billions of dollars in government subsidies that make the plans more affordable to millions of people — make it difficult to commit to offering such insurance.

Many have asked the government to extend the subsidies for 2018.

This comes as health insurers are preparing 2018 premium rate proposals to submit to federal and state insurance regulators over the next few months.

Whether Medica will stay in Iowa is hard to say, Kaiser's Cox added. Several states have only one insurance option on the exchange — but that insurer typically is the Blue Cross and Blue Shield plan, which are more established.

Medica is a significant player in Minnesota, Cox noted, and it has expanded into additional markets including Iowa and Kansas.

Bottom of Form

"But it's not clear if they have capacity to absorb all the enrollees in Iowa," she said. "It puts them in a tough spot."

If Medica were to drop out, there isn't much in terms of a Plan B. Iowans could purchase plans off the exchange without subsidies, but Iowa insurers are pulling out of that market, too.

Trump has indicated he will not enforce the mandate or penalize those without insurance.

But that is hardly a relief if you are sick and in need of medical care, Cox said.

"This is a warning sign," Cox said. If Congress "doesn't act soon, ... we can see this happen around the country."

SCJ Editorial: Election bill will strengthen system of voting in Iowa

Top of Form

Iowa's election system will be stronger as a result of a bill advancing through the Legislature.

Last month, the Senate passed and returned to the House for final approval a package of election changes. The House is expected to pass the bill, as well.

Getting the most attention within the bill is a voter ID provision.

As an additional layer of protection for the integrity of elections in this state, we long have supported a requirement that voters show some form of identification before casting a ballot. We are not alone on this within or outside Iowa.

A February Des Moines Register/Mediacom Iowa Poll showed 69 percent of Iowans support such a requirement. Voter ID requirements vary from state to state, but 34 states have passed laws requiring voters to produce a form of identification at the polls, according to the National Conference of State Legislatures.

Under the bill moving through the Iowa Legislature, voters would need to show an acceptable form of government-issued ID before casting a ballot at polling places. If a voter doesn't have one of the acceptable forms of ID, the state will issue him or her a voter-verification card, free of charge. A request for an absentee ballot would need to include an acceptable personal identification number, as well.

Within today's society, one needs some form of identification to conduct almost any kind of personal business. We do not believe asking the same of voters in the name of ensuring honest elections in our state is at all unreasonable.

Another component of the bill we support and have advocated for in this space because it also speaks to improved integrity within the process of voting is elimination of the straight-party voting option.

Bottom of Form

In our view, straight-party voting is lazy voting. We understand voters have every right to vote for all Republicans or all Democrats if they wish and even if a straight-party option didn't exist on the ballot, voters could (and some would) fill in the ovals for all candidates of one party or another.

Still, if this choice wasn't so easily available, we believe more voters would spend more time getting to know more about all of the candidates whose names appear on their ballot.

Another benefit to elimination of the straight-party voting option is this: Nonpartisan questions on the back of the ballot wouldn't be so easily forgotten or ignored.

We look forward to the House joining the Senate and sending this election bill to the governor for signature into law.

LEE: Branstad meets with senators handling his confirmation

ROD BOSCHART

Gov. Terry Branstad said Friday he had productive meetings with members of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee during this week's trip to Washington, D.C. However, he doesn't expect a hearing on his confirmation to be the next U.S. ambassador to China to take place until next month at the earliest.

Branstad said he met with committee chairman Sen. Bob Corker, R-Tenn., and ranking member, Sen. Ben Cardin, D-Md., as well as other committee members and Iowa Republican Sens. Chuck Grassley and Joni Ernst, and he plans a return trip the last week in April after the two-week Easter recess. At that time, he'll meet with more members of the committee who will consider his appointment by President Donald Trump to be America's top diplomat in China.

"I had a lot of good meetings with senators," Branstad said Friday during his first public event since his trip. He said he has completed the paperwork phase of the process and now he is "learning as much as I can about the China issues, and there are many."

The governor said he also met with Sonny Perdue, Trump's secretary of agriculture nominee, who has cleared the committee process but awaits Senate confirmation pending an April 24 vote.

“It’s getting kind of frustrating, I think, for a lot of people. This process has been very slow,” Branstad said of this year’s Senate action. “They’ve now just confirmed Neil Gorsuch to the Supreme Court and that took up a significant amount of time.

“But this has been the most, I guess, disruptive process that we’ve ever seen in terms of appointments. Confirmations usually don’t take nearly this long. But, unfortunately, I think the Democrats have decided that they’re going to just basically attack everybody. I hope that by the time I get there that will have worn out and that won’t be case,” he said.

“They ask tough questions and there are a number of issues. But I’m hopeful that I can generate bipartisan support. Time will tell,” he added.

Grassley said he expects Branstad’s confirmation to “go well.”

Bottom of Form

“He’s personable, professional and has the proven leadership and policy skills to serve in such an important diplomatic position. As members of the Foreign Relations Committee get to know him, they’ll appreciate his trustworthiness, his work ethic and his ability to get the job done for the United States as he has for Iowa for a record number of years,” Grassley added.

Ernst said Branstad would make an excellent ambassador and hopes the Senate moves him through the confirmation process “as soon as possible.”

“Our relationship with China is very important — from agricultural trade to national security — so I look forward to the Senate moving on his nomination soon,” she said.

LEE: Branstad and Xi: From possibilities, an enduring relationship

B.A. MORELLI

Top of Form

Bottom of Form

Jack Kintzle was part of a welcome wagon in 1985 that cast such a positive light on Iowa it sparked a decades-long friendship between Xi Jinping, who would go on to become China’s president, and Iowa Gov. Terry Branstad — now thrusting Branstad and Iowa into the spotlight of U.S.-Chinese relations.

Branstad, who was nominated as U.S. ambassador to China last year although has not yet been confirmed, has met with Chinese officials a handful of times over the past 30-some years. The relationship has blossomed and the impact has been far-reaching for the state, say officials in business, trade and education.

Hospitality laid the groundwork for the good relations, but Kintzle observed a measure of strategy and foresight by Branstad in encouraging the warm, respectful welcome in the midst of the farm crisis.

“Iowa was going through such a tough time with agriculture, especially farm foreclosures,” said Kintzle, 73. “Iowa was at a level we needed publicity and we wanted to open doors. I think that’s one of the reasons they were treated so well. How many million Chinese are there? I think he saw an opportunity to trade. I think the governor sensed the possibilities.”

Pending confirmation, Branstad plans to move to Beijing with his wife, Chris, his daughter and son-in-law and granddaughters as he works to enhance the relationship between the two countries, he said during a celebration with Chinese officials during the Lunar New Year earlier this year in Muscatine.

“I’m an old friend of China,” Branstad said there. “I’ve very honored and very proud that I’ve had a number of interactions with China and the leadership of China. We’ve seen great improvement in terms of exchanges and trade. Exchanges of students is one way to improve personal relationship and friendships. That is critically important to both of our countries and the world.”

Branstad would step in amid heightened tensions between the United States and China over trade equity, punitive tariffs and how to handle North Korea. Branstad was not scheduled to be at the meeting in Florida late last week between President Donald Trump and Xi.

Kintzle was an Iowa Corn Growers Association director with a farm near Coggon in the summer of 1985 when Xi — then a county-level party leader Kintzle equated to a state secretary of agriculture in America — toured Iowa farms as part of a small agricultural delegation from Hebei province.

Kintzle’s farm was right off the highway and convenient, so he got a call wondering if the delegation could visit. Soon, a small group of Chinese men wheeled up and spent a few hours inspecting machinery, grain bins and harvesters, then came inside for coffee. At the end, they took pictures together.

“They go back to China, he becomes president, and I farm for the next 30 years,” Kintzle said. “I should have bought a lottery ticket. Although, having a president on my farm might be better than winning the lottery.”

Branstad, then in his first term as Iowa governor, was instrumental in the visit, including hosting a then-unheralded Xi in his office.

By the time of the visit, Branstad already had signed an agreement establishing a sister-state relationship between Iowa and Hebei. In 1984, he led a 50-person delegation to Hebei. It was the first of six trade missions Branstad led to China.

Branstad next traveled to China as part of a three-country trade mission in fall 1993, marking the 10-year anniversary of the sister-state relationship. The goal was to expand markets for agricultural products, appliances, machinery and other exports, as well as stress in China Iowa’s commitment to human rights and treating people with dignity.

“We think that one of the things that helped lead to the downfall of communism in Russia and Eastern Europe was all the contacts to the West — the sister states, the trade missions and the understanding that the people gain from that,” Branstad said at the time. “I feel somewhat the same way about trade and building relationships in China.

“We can, hopefully, help push the Chinese state in the direction of more freedom and opportunity for the people as opposed to the old policy of trying to isolate them,” he added.

The early legwork has made a difference for Iowa. China is the fourth-largest export market for Iowa, with $490.6 million worth of manufactured and value-added goods, according to the Iowa Department of Economic Development.

China’s spending supports 4,000 jobs, and 5,000 “young talents” are studying in Iowa universities, Hong Lei, consul general based at the Chinese Consulate of Chicago, said during the recent Muscatine visit.

“I would say because of the sheer fact he’s been involved, he’s never let go,” said Kim Heidemann, executive director of Iowa Sister States. “He’s continued to nurture this relationship. He goes to visit, goes to meetings. He's hosted meetings. The governor has made it a point. He's simply done things right, especially in the last few years with Xi and done it in such a way he puts Iowa first."

The trips to China, and return visits from Chinese officials, have continued.

Xi returned to visit Muscatine and Des Moines in 2012 for an "old friends" reunion dinner stemming from the 1985 trip, and 20 Iowans traveled to China that same year for another reunion. Branstad also participated in trade missions in 2014 and 2016.

Downing Thomas, a professor and dean of International Programs at the University of Iowa, traveled with Branstad to China in 2012.

The delegation also included elected officials from Wisconsin and Virginia, along with a handful of business people and educational leaders. The significance of Branstad's relationship with Xi was evident in the respect and attention he received compared with the other visitors. The China Daily newspaper sought him out specifically for an interview.

Bottom of Form

Iowa universities and colleges have seen enrollment among Chinese students soar in the past 10 years. More than 4,000 Chinese students are enrolled at the three state universities alone. While the influx of Chinese college students is seen beyond Iowa's borders, the relationship between Iowa and China has helped Iowa schools, Thomas said.

"Clearly many of our students are aware of the relationship with Xi and Iowa, and their parents are aware of it." Thomas said.

The economic impact from international students and their families in Iowa topped $365 million and has supported or created 3,700 jobs, according to an annual report from International Programs. Thomas estimates more UI alumni are living in China than anywhere else outside of Iowa and Chicago.

The visibility of Branstad's relationship with Xi and Branstad's personal involvement has opened doors for Iowa companies, such as West Des Moines-based Hy-Line International.

Tom Dixon, director of international sales and marketing for Hy-Line, which is one of the world's largest breeders of laying hens, said the company received direct and indirect assistance from Branstad's office in forging a relationship between it and the Huayu Group, based in Hebei.

Branstad was present at a deal signing in October 2013 between the companies for a breeder housing project in Hebei province. That show of support was important in a later deal in 2016 for a joint venture to distribute Hy-Line chicks in China. The ceremonial nature of the signing, particularly with someone on friendly terms with Xi, carries a lot of influence for local, state and regional officials in China, Dixon said.

"There's some coincidence, but it certainly helped," Dixon said. "Branstad put more prestige and elevated the deal. It gave more of an official nature, credibility it's a real project. In China, government involvement is so very important for companies. It helped locally (in China) to get approvals."

In China, Dixon explained, support of government officials and good relations between business and government is vital. Government officials need to sign off on acquisitions, permits and land sales, for example.

Dixon is hopeful Branstad's agricultural background will help ease restrictions on poultry imports in China, which have been curtailed since the bird flu outbreak in 2015. He declined to be specific, but said it has cost Hy-Line millions of dollars.

“We’ve been working to try to negotiate things with health officials in China,” Dixon said. “We hope the governor of a large agricultural state could maybe lend influence to motivate or encourage some kind of solution so we can start exporting again. We hope his level of ambassador could facilitate and shed some light on the situation.”

Globe Gazette: Skipper: Government is often one big jigsaw puzzle

JOHN SKIPPER

Top of Form

Bottom of Form

Have you ever worked at putting a jigsaw puzzle together? Are you good at it?

The trick is to put all the corner pieces together first and then work your way in. You would think it would get easier as you go along, but it doesn't.

Often, the intricacies of city government are like putting a jigsaw puzzle together. The good news is you usually have an image of what the completed puzzle is supposed to look like -- the image on the cover of the box. The bad news is you have to put a thousand pieces together to get to the promised land.

Mason City seems to have to deal with one jigsaw puzzle after another. You know about many of them in the past. They're history, and that's where they should remain.

The new one is the proposal of Gatehouse Capital to build a hotel in the parking lot of Southbridge Mall, connect it to The Music Man Square with a skywalk, build a conference center/ballroom inside and relocate the museum on-site.

This is a project that has excited a lot of people, important because without public support, an important piece to the puzzle will be missing.

The city and Gatehouse have begun discussions on a development agreement.

Gatehouse is proposing a $15 million project that should bring in oodles property tax and sales tax revenue and provide a viable entertainment venue for North Iowa.

The Music Man Square and Southbridge Mall should both benefit -- and both could use a boost. The city tax base will increase. The community will have another asset.

For its efforts, Gatehouse at this point wants a $150,000 payment to get things moving and a development fee that is still negotiable but would probably be more than $150,000.

Other negotiating points are an interest-free loan to Gatehouse estimated at between $3.5 and $4.3 million to be paid back to the city after 20 years. The city wants provisions on number of jobs created.

As of now, the city would be responsible for paying for the construction of the skywalk and renovations to The Music Man Square. And that brings in another element to the puzzle -- the city's application through the Iowa Economic Development Authority for state funds to help leverage a $36.2 million River City Renaissance downtown development project.

The state has given pre-application approval for at least $7 million in funding and more could be coming if final approval is given.

But the project has changed since first approval was given. Instead of a hotel downtown next to City Hall -- the developer, Philip Chodur defaulted on that plan -- the Gatehouse proposal is now in place. The state requires $10 million in private investment to qualify for state funding. The Gatehouse plan fulfills that requirement.

Bottom of Form

Other parts of the pre-approved plan included a music pavilion, a parking ramp, a mixed-use building and an ice arena/multipurpose center.

When Trout meets with Iowa Economic Development staffers later this month, he will explain the change in hotel developers, how the parking ramp is no longer needed, and that there might be a change regarding the mixed-use building. None of this will be a surprise to the IEDA people because Trout has kept them advised for many months.

The wild card in all of this activity could be a referendum on Nov. 7 which residents petitioned for, regarding bonding for the ice arena.

The ice arena is part of the package for the state funding, so if voters reject it, the proposed state funding will probably die -- and that is the revenue Trout and the city hope to use to fund the renovations of The Music Man Square.

So, it is a big puzzle and one in which there are many opportunities for someone or something to come along and tip over the table.

Why do things have to be so complicated? It's government -- and it's puzzling.

LEE: Iowa's budget pinch: How did we get here?

ERIN MURPHY

A mere five years ago Iowa's state budget had nearly $1 billion to spare and its reserve accounts were flush with another $600 million.

And while money coming into the state continues to increase, the state budget has fallen into disrepair. This year, state lawmakers have been forced to cut make $250 million in budget cuts, and next year's budget figures to be tight as well.

It has been a fast fall from fiscal fitness to this beleaguered budget despite ever-increasing revenue.

Gov. Terry Branstad, a Republican, regularly says a sluggish agricultural economy has slowed state revenue, leading to the current budget pinch.

Capitol Democrats say the state has too many tax breaks that leave too much money in big businesses' accounts rather than the state's.

Experts in state economics say the problem has been created by myriad factors.

Busted budget

Iowa's state budget was a picture of financial health in fiscal year 2013. There was a $928 million budget surplus — unspent money in the state's general fund — and the state's two reserve accounts — a cash reserve and an emergency fund — were flush with $622 million.

Fast-forward to fiscal year 2017, which has roughly three months remaining: the budget surplus has been whittled to less than $50 million, and revenue came in roughly $250 million under projections. So lawmakers cut $118 million from state departments and used another $130 million from the reserve accounts to make the budget whole.

And lawmakers just started work the budget for fiscal 2018, which, likely for the first time in eight years, will spend less than the previous year.

The amount of money coming into the state is not the issue; post-recession revenues have increased each year.

So what is the cause of Iowa's budget pinch?

Farm economy

Branstad regularly cites this as the main issue for the state's budget trouble. Prices for corn and soybeans, Iowa's largest crops, have been low — lower than the cost of production for roughly a year. That puts a drag on farm incomes — and thus the state's income tax collections. It also impacts state manufacturing, much of which is built around agriculture — and thus hinders state sales tax collections.

"Agriculture in Iowa has changed so much," said Pat Grassley, a Republican state legislator who leads the Iowa House's budget committee and a farmer. "It isn't just your corn and soybeans and your hogs and cattle and your chickens. It's the fact then you have a plant that makes a tractor. If they lay off people, those layoffs impact you as well. And it's not just those layoffs. Maybe there's somebody that makes a headlight for them, and they lay off people. ...

"That, in my mind, is the agriculture economy because it ties to how agriculture goes. That's kind of the anchor."

David Roederer, Branstad's budget director and a member of the three-member panel that makes future revenue projections on which the state budget is based, said the average total net farm income in Iowa from 2006 through 2010 was $3.7 billion, and from 2011 through 2014 that exploded to an annual average of $7.6 billion. But in 2015 that dropped to $2.6 billion.

"Iowa still is very tied to agriculture, and generally that has served us well. But some years commodity prices are going to be better than others," Roederer said. "So you can see that in (2011 through 2014) that those were extraordinary years. If you average it out, you're going to be pretty close to what we normally have. The problem is life doesn't work on averages. ... Some years are going to be better than others."

Ernie Goss, an economics professor at Creighton University in Omaha, Nebraska, said the sluggish farm economy is impacting many Midwest states, leading to budget shortfalls in Iowa neighbors Nebraska and Kansas. Goss said net farm income has been falling since 2013, and that impact is felt in state tax collections.

"It really has to do with agriculture and those businesses tied to ag," Goss said. "Farmers are just not purchasing, for example, heavy equipment, and that shows up in the economy in Iowa and across the United States."

But not all economic experts agree the sluggish ag economy is driving Iowa's budget woes.

Dave Swenson, an economics professor at Iowa State University, said the farm economy's role in influencing the state budget often is overstated.

"The farm economy is not the main, nor a major cause of the current situation," Swenson said in an email interview. "Farmers do not contribute as much to the state's coffers as many think, and the ebbs and flows of farmer incomes are spread out over years — both gains and losses — allowing farmers to truly minimize both their federal and state taxation bites.”

Holly Lyons, who works with the state’s non-partisan fiscal estimating agency and also serves on the budget estimating panel, said the farm economy is only a part of the equation that has led to the current budget situation.

Lyons said income tax revenues turned flat in the spring of 2016, and that can be explained in part by lower commodity prices and a decline in the manufacturing economy — again, which is heavily tied to agriculture.

But Lyons said other factors, such as slowed sales tax revenue, also impacted the budget.

“The farm economy is just one of the factors in the shortfall — it is by no means the primary cause,” Lyons wrote in an email to Democratic state legislator Cindy Winckler, of Davenport, who had asked for Lyons’ assessment of Branstad’s claims that the farm economy is driving the budget issues.

Tax cuts and credits

Democratic state legislators insist the biggest driver of state budget issues is money not collected thanks to various tax relief programs.

Iowa’s 67 tax credit programs will cost the state more than $1 billion in fiscal year 2018.

Statehouse Democrats take particular exception with the tax relief programs that they say go to big businesses that don’t need the help.

The most expensive programs are for commercial and industrial property tax relief ($152.1 million), the homestead tax credit ($136 million), and a business property tax credit ($125 million).

Bottom of Form

“Farm prices certainly have affected Iowa’s economy, but our state budget is much more directly impacted by the cost of tax cuts and tax credits that have grown in the last four years at a rate that is just unsustainable,” said Chris Hall, a state legislator from Sioux City and the top Democrat on the House budget committee. “The areas of the budget that have been increasing in cost at the most rapid rate are tax cuts primarily to out-of-state corporations and also tax credits. Both of those numbers have increased exponentially over the last few years at a pace that is faster than the state’s economy is growing.”

Swenson agrees. He said tax relief programs for businesses — including the commercial and industrial property tax relief program, another for companies that perform research and development, and a sales tax break on manufacturing sales — are the primary drivers of the state’s revenue shortage.

Grassley said he is willing to examine the state’s myriad tax credits and whether some could be reduced or eliminated. He has introduced legislation that would start that process.

However, Grassley said he would like any change in state tax credits to be a part of a larger overhaul of state tax laws.

“I think the other party (Democrats) looks at the tax credits saying that money should go to be spent (in other areas of the budget). Philosophically, I would look at it as, can we do tax policy better in the state of Iowa than just doing a bunch of different tax credits. Could we do something that benefits all Iowans,” Grassley said. “But looking at the tax credits, I think, is healthy for us to do if the objective is how can we make Iowa’s tax climate more competitive with other states.”

Roederer said he thinks the impact of tax credits on the budget is overstated. He said two programs that have experienced some of the largest growth in the past half-decade are two programs largely supported by Democrats: the earned income tax credit, which benefits low-income taxpayers, and a program that helps cities rebuild aging buildings.

“To say that is the reason (for the budget troubles) is, I don’t think the numbers support that,” Roederer said.

Missing the mark

Whatever factors may be influencing state revenues, those revenues still continue to increase.

One critical issue that led to this year’s budget cuts was a misjudgment by the budget estimating panel. The group lowered its projections three times, in October, December and January, and the state was forced to cut the current budget with only a few months remaining.

The estimating panel meets quarterly to project the coming year’s state revenue. Its December estimate is used by the governor and state lawmakers to craft the next year’s budget.

This year the panel reduced its estimate by more than $90 million in December, and then by another $130 million in March, leaving the governor and state lawmakers to scramble.

The last time the estimating conference guessed too high by such a wide margin was in fiscal years 2009 and 2010 in the immediate wake of the recession.

“Based on indicators we saw at the time, we did our revenue estimate and it appeared, at least we thought, our estimates were going to be accurate. And obviously they were not,” Roederer said. “So you can still have a growing economy, but if your budget is based on an economy that is growing faster than it actually is, then you have a belt-tightening, which is what we’re going through.”

Grassley also has introduced legislation that he said would aim to help streamline the data collection process for the budget estimating panel and make it easier to perform its work. But Grassley conceded at the end of the day legislators will always be working with an estimate.

“That’s like playing the lottery. It’s hard when you’re estimating. There are so many moving parts,” Grassley said. “There is still growth. And that’s why we’ve tried to approach the budgeting process knowing that there’s going to be times when you don’t meet your growth level, and when you spend less you set yourself up in a position that you have a cash reserve or you have some other things that may help you take care of those situations.”

JAMES Q. LYNCH

Iowa lawmakers hope to wrap up the 2017 session this month, but Senate President Jack Whitver thinks there’s an “outside chance” tax reform can be accomplished

However, the Ankeny Republican said it will be hard to do this year because of the state’s revenue and budget situation.

“The reality of the situation is our budget is a little tighter than we had hoped,” Whitver said during taping of Iowa Public Television’s Iowa Press Friday. Lawmakers had to cut the current year budget by nearly $120 million in January and tap the cash reserve fund for about $130 million last month. So majority Republicans want to “do the fiscally responsible thing and get the budget under control before

Reforming Iowa’s taxes is one of the reasons he ran in 2010, Whitver said, and something he’s been working on since.

“I was hoping we could get to it this year, but it’s looking more and more like this might be a 2018 issue,” he said. Whitver acknowledged it won’t get any easier in an election year, but “frankly, to have real, true, lasting, impactful tax reform is a complicated process.”

As GOP senators look at reform possibilities, everything is on the table, including federal deductibility and tax credits, Whitver said. His priority is lowering individual income tax rates because that would affect the most Iowans and Iowa small businesses.

“The states that are growing and thriving and are prospering right now are the states with the lowest — or even no income tax,” he said. “I’m not sitting here today saying next year we’re going to eliminate the income tax, but the lower we can go on that, I think research shows we can be more prosperous.”

Not only would lower individual income tax rates affect most Iowa taxpayers, but Whitver said it would benefit small business owners like him. His food and fitness businesses are “pass through” businesses that pay individual income tax.

Bottom of Form

“When you talk about corporate tax reform, that really isn’t that big a part of our state budget,” he said. “What we really need to do is reform the individual tax code and that would help thousands of small business owners across the state.”

He ruled out a sales tax increase unless it is accompanied by “major tax reform.”

Looking at the final weeks of the session, Whitver predicts the GOP House and Senate majorities are going to iron out differences in their respective 20-week abortion ban bills. The House version called for a 72-hour waiting period and contained no exceptions for fetal anomalies. The Senate bill included a 24-hour waiting period between the time a woman meets with her doctor and has the procedure. It also allowed an exception for abortions beyond 20 weeks in the case of a fetal anomaly.

Whitver also said lawmakers will provide more money for water quality efforts, will not dismantle the Des Moines Water Works, will ban texting while driving and said that if traffic enforcement cameras aren’t banned they will be “heavily regulated.”

WCF COURIER: Does Altmayer arrest have any connection to missing cousins case?

JEFF REINITZ

Authorities have declined to comment on any investigation into possible links between Jeff Lee Altmayer and the disappearance and deaths of cousins Lyric Cook-Morrissey and Elizabeth Collins.

Altmayer, 57, of Ankeny, is charged with attempting to lure children into his silver passenger car as far west as Onawa — near the Nebraska border — to a mobile home park just east of Dike. He’s also a person of interest in a similar incident at a Cedar Falls park.

Lyric, 10, and Elizabeth, 8, disappeared while riding their bikes in Evansdale on July 13, 2012, and their bodies were found Dec. 5, 2012, in a rural wilderness area in Bremer County. No arrests have been made in their deaths.

Black Hawk County Attorney Brian Williams said investigators in the cousins case are aware of Altmayer. The Iowa Division of Criminal Investigation agent who filed the criminal complaint in Altmayer's Jasper County case is the lead agent in the cousins probe.

In the past, authorities have commented about the rarity of double abductions when talking about the cousins case, and Black Hawk County Sheriff Tony Thompson said he found "interesting" the fact at least one of Altmayer's crimes involve approaching a pair of girls at the same time.

The double abduction angle also has been a red herring for cousins investigators. In 2013, authorities began looking into Michael Klunder for possible ties to Lyric and Elizabeth's deaths. Klunder, a 42-year-old farm worker who had served prison time for abductions, picked up two girls near a Dayton bus stop in May 2013. One fled, and he killed the other before taking his own life. Investigators eventually ruled out Klunder as a suspect in the cousins case after accounting for his whereabouts.

Reached Wednesday, Elizabeth's father, Drew Collins, said he wasn't familiar with the Altmayer case and said authorities haven't contacted him about it. However, he remembers hearing about the enticement attempts last summer before Altmayer was arrested.

Collins is skeptical about any connection to his daughter's death.

Bottom of Form

"It doesn't seem like that would fit," Collins said. "Whoever this is, I think if he takes a couple of little girls, why would he let them go if he already killed a couple kids."

Collins said he's heard countless leads and rumors since his daughter's death. It can be maddening, he said.

"I think something different every day, man. I think in my head, 'it could be this,' but the next week or the next day or 20 minutes later, I'm thinking 'it's this guy or that guy.' I've heard a ton of names, I can't keep them all in my brain. All I can do is speculate, and I think about it all day, every day," Collins said.

His rate since 2011 is lowest in more than six decades

Since returning to the governor's office in 2011, Terry Branstad has granted fewer pardons on average than any Iowa governor in more than six decades.

His record of granting reduced jail sentences is similarly stingy.

A review of Iowa gubernatorial records going back to 1949 — a span covering 11 administrations — shows Branstad, since his return to office in 2011, granted fewer pardons than any other Iowa governor during that time span.

Branstad is closer to the middle of that pack for granting commutations, or reduced sentences, since 2011. However, remove the roughly three dozen commutations that were the direct result of a 2012 U. S. Supreme Court ruling that negated lifetime sentences for juveniles, and Branstad once again drops to the fewest granted since at least 1949.

A pardon forgives an individual for a crime committed and restores lost rights.

A commutation reduces an individual's sentence and makes him or her eligible for parole.

"I've always tried to be very thoughtful and very judicious in making these decisions. The governor is given the extraordinary power of being able to grant pardons," said Branstad, a Republican who was a lawyer before being first elected to public office — the Iowa House — in 1972.

Branstad has approved just more than four pardons per year, on average, since 2011.

Not only is that the lowest average of any governor since 1949, it is dramatically lower than the averages posted by Branstad's two immediate predecessors, both of whom were Democrats.

Chet Culver, who governed Iowa from 2007 to 2010, approved an average of nearly 24 pardons per year, a rate six times higher than Branstad. Tom Vilsack, who led Iowa for two terms from 1999 to 2006, approved more than 12 pardons per year.

Even Gov. Robert Ray, a Republican under whom Branstad served as lieutenant governor, granted nearly a dozen pardons per year on average, or a rate three times higher than Branstad's.

Since 2011, Branstad has been slightly stricter even than his previous self: He approved an annual average of seven pardons during his first stint as governor from 1983 to 1999.

Branstad said he believes a governor's power to pardon should be used sparingly. In addition to the normal application process, he requires a face-to-face interview with the applicant.

"I believe a pardon, which is an extraordinary power, which basically eliminates that conviction from their record, should only be granted if you're very confident this person is an exemplary citizen who has given back and helped other people in substantial ways," he said. "So, I have required a personal interview. I want to be able to look them straight in the eye. I want to feel confident that they're never going to commit another crime, that they're never going to embarrass me or the people of the state of Iowa."

Branstad is even less a fan of commutations.

During his first, 16-year term in office, he approved just two reduced sentences. In his second, six-year stint, he has approved 39 commutations, but 38 of those were in response to that U.S. Supreme Court ruling.

Take those out and Branstad, during 22 years in office, has approved three reduced sentences overall.

"Most governors keep in mind they're running for re-election almost always. The worst thing you can do is be called soft on crime," said Robert Rigg, a Drake University Law School professor who specializes in criminal law. "No politician ever wanted to get stuck with being soft on crime. Certainly, Terry Branstad can never be accused of being soft on crime."

Branstad's rare commutations are not as strikingly different from his predecessors as were his pardons. Culver granted no commutations during his four years in office; Vilsack granted seven during his eight years; Ray granted an average of just two per year during his 14 years in office.

The Iowa governors with the highest rates of commutations held office during the 1950s. Leo Hoegh granted 30 in two years, and Herschel C. Loveless averaged 12 per year during his one term.

"Any time you deal with a governor, you're dealing with the political office. And any governor's staff is going to sit there and try to review the downside of doing a parole, or commutations, or a pardon," Rigg said. "I'm sure all governors, whether Terry Branstad or somebody else, is going to take that into the calculus of whether you grant a pardon or commutation. But hopefully that's not the only reason."

When pardons and commutations are combined and averaged, Branstad's separate tenures account for two of the three lowest among all Iowa governors since at least 1949. If those commutations that were the result of that U.S. Supreme Court ruling are removed, Branstad's tenures are the two lowest.

Branstad received nearly 400 requests for pardons since 2011 and approved 26. He received almost 90 requests for commutations and granted 39. Branstad said the application process for pardons and commutations is thorough, and justified his rare approvals as having public safety in mind.

"We go through a very extensive process. We do an extensive (Iowa Division of Criminal Investigation) background investigation, it has to go before the parole board before it ever comes to me," Branstad said. "The good news is we've not had the tragedies that have occurred in some other states where governors haven't been as careful or judicious and people that they pardoned have then committed other serious crimes."

P.S. Ruckman, a professor at Rock Valley College in Rockford, Ill., who writes a blog on executive clemency, said while commutations can be risky, he thinks there is little downside to granting pardons.

"When I see a pardon number that low, I just don't get why that is not in the hundreds," Ruckman said. "Because, again, the political risks there are just about zero."

Ruckman said governors appear to be motivated, in part, by wanting to avoid granting a pardon or a commutation to an individual who then commits another crime. Ruckman and Rigg both noted George H.W. Bush's 1988 campaign ad that used the example of a felon who raped a woman after he escaped while on a weekend furlough program supported by Bush's opponent, Michael Dukakis. Even though that individual was given neither a commutation nor a pardon, Ruckman and Rigg said they think that kind of example weighs on governors when making those decisions.

"There's something to this idea that you should be careful, but you should be careful anyway," Ruckman said. "If you look into those high-profile things, they're almost always about commutations (not pardons). The idea that there is some risk to restoring rights is just lunacy."

WHOTV: ISU Sees 20% Decrease in International Student Applications, Says Political Climate is Responsible

Iowa State University is seeing fewer international applications as places of higher education are facing similar issues nationwide.

The school says it has received 20% fewer international applications than the year before. Forty percent of colleges across the country also report reduced interest from international students, and ISU says the reason why is clear.

"Some of our students are just concerned about safety and how welcome they're going to be in the community. So with the executive orders issued, it has some of them a little concerned about will they be welcomed once they get to the U.S.," said Director of Admissions Katharine Johnson Suski.

The executive orders aimed at stopping travel from several predominantly Muslim countries and President Trump's campaign stance on China is not going unnoticed by potential students. ISU's applications from China are down 30%, and those from predominantly Muslim countries are down 60% to 80%.

"Certainly it saddens me when students don't feel safe here because, really, we know students are going to be very welcome here and taken care of in Ames," said Suski.

International student Waasay Mirza came to study from Pakistan, and says the problem is one of perception.

"I didn't feel uncomfortable, especially on this campus. People were really good, they helped me out," said Mirza.

Mirza came four years ago to study electrical engineering, and said being an international student has changed his life for the better.

"You get a lot of exposure, you get to learn a lot of things, and not only that, you get to see and meet so many different cultures and different diverse communities that you learn a lot," he said.

This is a message the college is trying to drive home as they participate in the national "You are Welcome Here Campaign."

"The You are Welcome Here Campaign will be a video of a lot of our students, faculty, and staff standing there saying 'you are welcome,' some in their native languages so students can hear that message from across campus," said Suski.

Suski also said representatives from the school recently returned from a trip to China, where international alumni spoke to prospective students about coming to America to study.

ISU says while international applications to the United States are down, applications to schools in Canada are on the rise.

KCCI: Six years later: Ashley Okland's murder still unsolved

Saturday marks the sixth anniversary of real estate agent Ashley Okland's shooting death.

Okland, 27, was working as a real estate agent in West Des Moines when she was found shot on April 8, 2011, at 558 Stone Creek Court, a model town home for a new development.

She was rushed to Iowa Methodist Medical Center in Des Moines, where she later died.

Investigators have interviewed hundreds of witnesses since her death, but no one has been charged in the case. West Des Moines police have said it remains an active investigation.

The case sparked new calls throughout the real estate industry to increase safety for real estate agents.

Anyone with information on the case is asked to call the West Des Moines Police Department at 515-222-3344 or Crime Stoppers of Polk County at 515-223-1400.

The Gazette: Branstad expects to sign firearms bill following review

Legislation makes 'monumental' changes to Iowa's gun laws

Gov. Terry Branstad said Friday he expects to sign legislation making major changes to Iowa's firearms laws but he is reserving judgment until he and his staff have time to review the provisions of House File 517 that received final House approval on Thursday.

"Obviously, we want to review it in its final form, but generally I've been a strong supporter of the Second Amendment and I believe the legislation passed with bipartisan support with a pretty strong margin,” Branstad said in an interview. “I’m inclined to be supportive but I want to reserve judgment until I get a chance to review it in its final form.”

Branstad said he had some concerns with the original version passed by the Iowa House but those were addressed in changes adopted by the Iowa Senate that were accepted by representatives Thursday before sending it to his desk for consideration.

Included in House File 517 is a controversial “stand your ground” provision that states a law-abiding citizen does not have a duty to retreat in a public place before using deadly force when confronted with danger to life or property.

The bill also would allow children below the age of 14 to handle pistols or revolvers under the supervision of an adult parent, guardian or instructor; pre-empt local ordinances restricting gun rights; create a uniform permit to carry weapons; provide for five-year permits to acquire handguns rather than single-year permits; and create confidentiality for those with permits, legalize short-barreled rifles and shotguns and allow those with permits to carry handguns in the Iowa Capitol and other public buildings.

Iowa Republican Party Chairman Jeff Kaufmann praised Speaker Pro Tempore Matt Windschitl and House and Senate Republicans for their work in shepherding the bill through both chambers of the Legislature in a bipartisan fashion. He called the bill “the most monumental piece of pro-Second Amendment legislation in Iowa’s history.”

Earlier in the week, members of Iowans for Gun Safety expressed concerns about the bill and on Friday, the Rev. Jeremy J. Brigham, executive director of the organization, wrote Branstad a letter urging him to veto the bill.

“This bill is particularly dangerous to men of color, women and children and many from these communities have joined us in speaking out,” Brigham said in his letter.

“Gov. Branstad, we believe it is particularly important that you veto this bill. As ambassador to China, like your predecessors, you will be asked to protect the rights of minorities in China. This bill ... threatens the rights of minorities in Iowa and we ask that you veto this bill and protect the rights of minorities in Iowa.”

If the bill becomes law, members of the Iowa Chapter of Moms Demand Action for Gun Sense in America said Iowa will become only the second state to enact a new “stand-your-ground” law since the killing of Trayvon Martin in Florida in 2012.

“In the weeks since this bill was introduced, lawmakers have listened thoughtfully to the widespread concerns about certain portions of it, and we’re grateful they removed dangerous sections that would have gutted Iowa’s background check and permit-to-carry requirements,” said Amber Gustafson of the Iowa Chapter of Moms Demand Action for Gun Sense in America.

“Still, we remain deeply concerned that the stand-your-ground and punitive pre-emption portions of this bill would leave our communities less safe,” Gustafson added in a statement. Stand-your-ground laws embolden people to escalate everyday disputes, and the statistics from states that have passed them are deeply troubling. We’ll be urging the governor to keep our state from following their concerning lead.”

Burlington Hawk-Eye Editorial: A wise move

Rex Troute, Steve Delaney

Top of Form

Bottom of Form

There is a bill on Gov. Terry Branstad's desk that would consolidate elections in Iowa. School board and municipal elections would be held on the same day.

While many times on this page we take exception to what's happening in the Statehouse, this is one measure we can support, and we hope the governor signs this bill into law.

Lobbyists for schools oppose this bill. They haven't articulated why and there really is no objective reason to oppose a measure that would encourage more people to cast a ballot for someone to represent us.

A check of the records over the years reveals school elections, held in early September, have generated embarrassingly low turnout. It's been a disservice to the taxpayers who must pay the bills. It's been a disservice to the people who put their names on the ballot.

We ask people to serve and then hold them accountable for their service. That's the trade-off of public service. Greater voter turnout isn't all that much to ask.

One would think school lobbyists would embrace a law designed to get more people to the polls, get more people involved in the process. Instead, they oppose it.

That's unfortunate. And troubling.

Moreover, school districts typically charge taxpayers more than other government entities. Shouldn't they want more involvement among the public?

And equally, municipal elections have had terrible turnout when not combined with national elections.

We should remember, it's our local representatives — city council members, school board members, county supervisors — who have the most impact on us, and our pocketbooks.

We preach frequently the need for people to get involved in their government. Voting is the most important part of that process. Government should make voting convenient for people. With today's technology, there's no reason voting couldn't be done on someone's home computer. The hope here is that day will soon come.

After all, if we can pay all of our bills online, and grab cash from an ATM machine, and trust that it's secure, surely we can vote online as well. But, as with most things related to government, change takes time.

This new law will, we believe, get more people to participate in the process of electing representatives who are to work on our behalf. It's difficult to imagine why someone would be opposed to that.

Here's hoping the governor isn't opposed to that concept.

Centerville reaches $1 million benchmark and Ryan Stober receives leadership award during ceremony honoring award winning projects, entrepreneurs and volunteers

Main Street Iowa hosted the 31st annual Main Street Iowa awards celebration on Friday, April 7 at Hoyt Sherman Place in Des Moines. The program honored the efforts of those who work day in and day out in downtown revitalization in Iowa. The event was attended by approximately 550 individuals representing communities across the state.

Main Street Iowa has annually presented awards honoring outstanding accomplishments, activities and people that are making a difference in Iowa's Main Street districts. Projects large and small are recognized and serve as outstanding examples of what historic commercial district revitalization is all about.

Fifteen projects and activities occurring in local Main Street communities were selected to be recognized from the 160 competitive nominations submitted. The honors were presented by Gov. Terry E. Branstad, Lt. Gov. Kim Reynolds and Debi Durham, director of the Iowa Economic Development Authority.

"The Main Street Iowa program has stood the test of time since its introduction in 1985. The program continues to bring businesses, jobs, investment and vitality to our states' communities, both big and small," stated Branstad. "The Main Street Approach works, and Main Street Iowa has been a national model because we are creative, we embrace change, we demand local initiative and action, while holding strong to our roots as an historic preservation program."

"Healthy, historic commercial districts are a key deciding factor for industrial and business recruitment," said Reynolds. "Since 1986, local Main Street programs have made a significant impact on Iowa's economy with 4,514 new businesses and a net gain of 13,402 jobs. More than 740 building projects have been reported with an investment in those rehabs of over $2 billion. Last year alone, the Main Street Iowa network surpassed 156,135 total documented hours of human capital invested into Iowa's downtown revitalization efforts. This demonstrates a tremendous commitment to Iowa's Main Streets."

During the event, 10 communities were recognized for reaching significant benchmarks based on private dollar investments made in the purchase and revitalization of properties within their respective commercial districts. Centerville and Lansing were recognized for reaching the $1 million benchmark in the last year and Ft. Madison was honored for $2 million in local investment. Ames and Guthrie Center were recognized for achieving the $5 million level. Des Moines Sixth Avenue, Chariton, Corning, State Center and Ottumwa all attained $10 million in local investment since being designated as local Main Street programs. Four communities were recognized for significant anniversaries. Osceola was recognized for 20 years of participation as a designated Main Street community. Cedar Falls, Spencer and West Des Moines were recognized for 30 year anniversaries.

Two special awards were presented as well. James Walsh received the Spirit of Main Street Award, an honor that recognizes the person, organization, community or project which best demonstrates the true meaning and spirit of "Main Street at Work." The community of Oskaloosa was honored with a Signature Project Award for their inspiring and innovative place-making efforts in beautification, promotion and partnership.

In 1985, the Iowa Legislature adopted the National Main Street Center's Four Point Approach to district revitalization by establishing Main Street Iowa within the agency that is now the Iowa Economic Development Authority. Since its inception, the state program and its communities have been considered examples of excellence in the national effort to revitalize historic commercial districts across the country.

The Gazette Editorial: Affordable Housing: Second chances & better processes

Elected officials don't often get second chances, or clear-cut strategies for complex problems. Right now Cedar Rapids City Council members have both.

Minnesota-based nonprofit CommonBond Communities has submitted an updated plan for Crestwood Ridge, a northwest side housing project that fell shy of supermajority support last fall amid outcry from neighborhood residents.

Awarded $8 million in federal tax credits through the Iowa Finance Authority to develop alongside Edgewood and Crestwood roads, Crestwood Ridge included a mix of market rate and affordable apartments, including five supportive housing units. Staff from Willis Dady was tapped to provide case management for those five tenants.

Council members rejected rezoning for the project in October, when a majority neighbors voiced concerns about area sidewalks, increased traffic, lot density and water runoff. The updated Crestwood plan addresses these issues, so the nonprofit is requesting the city forego its typical 1-year delay and reconsider the project now, before the grant expires.

We continue to support the development because it earned city support for its grant application, met the strict criteria of the competitive grant, aligns with the comprehensive plan, won the recommendation of city staff and, most importantly, fills a long-standing affordable supportive housing gap. We also remain impressed by CommonBond and its partnership with Willis Dady.

Although most national reports rate the Midwest, Iowa and Cedar Rapids as generally affordable, the reality is a lack of local housing stock has increased local demand and cost. Rental vacancy rates in the city hover around 2 percent, and more than 40 percent of area renters are cost-burdened. Many households are only one financial crisis away from added reliance on taxpayer-funded safety nets or homelessness.

To make matters worse, the Trump administration wants to cut $6.2 billion, or 13 percent, from the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development. Specifically targeted are two programs that help people secure and sustain affordable housing — Community Development Block Grants, which fund initiatives ranging from disaster aid to police engagement to anti-poverty efforts like Meals on Wheels, and the HOME Investment Partnership, which helps low-income citizens repair existing homes.

Other HUD programs related to housing are in danger as well, including rental assistance, heating and air-conditioning aid, energy-efficiency assistance and various other local government partnerships like AmeriCorps and the Interagency Council on Homelessness. The Self-Help Homeownership Opportunity and Choice Neighborhoods programs, which aim to replace distressed public housing with mixed-income development, are on the chopping block too.

Given what's happening in Washington, you'd think Iowa lawmakers would be doing more to help communities prepare for worst-case scenarios. Instead, they are supporting similar policies and implementing laws that further erode the middle class, adding more lowans to the list of those searching for housing and other assistance.

That's the economic and political backdrop Cedar Rapids Council members need to consider before they once again refuse $8 million in housing tax credits, newly offered neighborhood improvements and proven affordable housing project management partners.

This is a multifaceted challenge that needs public-private coordination and public buy-in.

Healthy communities offer diverse housing options for people at all levels of the economic ladder. Business owners, retirees, farm laborers and bus drivers all need a place to live. When they can't find one, negatives ripple out.

For instance, a lack of workforce housing impedes the ability of employers to attract talent, leaving jobs unfilled and companies thinking twice about local expansions. And, when workers can't live near employers, they must travel further. Individual cars increase traffic and impact air quality. Alternatively, public transit faces greater demands in an ever-widening service area, which costs taxpayers.

Throughout Linn County, only eight supportive housing units are open to the public. And yet housing is the foundation for well-being — food security, economic contribution, health management, stability.

This housing gap won't be closed if strategies are limited to owner-occupied, large-lot single-family housing — or if all options are regulated to only certain neighborhoods.

This is a test of political will we cannot afford to fail. Fortunately, the Safe, Equitable and Thriving Communities Task Force subcommittee on housing has recommendations:

- Expand financial incentives for development of affordable housing throughout the city
- Build community capacity for supportive services programming
- Implement ongoing landlord education efforts
- Target nuisance property owners
- Develop partnerships to revitalize aging housing stock
- Remove barriers faced by specific populations
- Strengthen and support neighborhood associations
- Coordinate and unify affordable housing efforts

While these objectives are fully and individually possible, they are more easily accomplished by first focusing on the final item.

As the task force noted “at present, there is no coordinated, collaborative, unifying body or effort that develops and implements a strategic communitywide vision for affordable housing.”

That must change. We agree with the task force that Cedar Rapids needs a group — perhaps something similar to the Johnson County Affordable Housing Coalition or the long-dormant Affordable Housing Commission mandated by municipal code — with the necessary political capital to drive public policy. Ideally, this group will spur additional regional opportunities.

Dr. Mary Wilcynski and Stacey Walker, who served as co-chairs of the SET Task Force, noted that the group's recommendations were derived from discussions with several housing experts, many of whom served on the subcommittee. They aren't commentary on any one proposal, but an attempt to establish a more comprehensive approach.

"We do know that barriers to affordable housing currently exist in our community and everyone interested in a safe, equitable and thriving community should take the challenge of affordable housing seriously," they said as part of a joint statement.

"It is imperative that local governments work with nonprofit organizations and good developers to bring more affordable housing options to our city. ... The need for safe, affordable housing is not going away, therefore it is incumbent upon leaders to act."

Perhaps due to political aspirations or concern about the next election, needed and initially supported Cedar Rapids housing projects have been successfully derailed by small groups of citizens. Each time this happens, the city's relationships with established housing developers erode, more groups are emboldened to read from the same noisy playbook, and the diverse housing supply needed for the city to thrive is delayed.

Whether the updated Crestwood development stands or falls, it shouldn't have come to this. Taxpayers shell out thousands each year for professionals who use council-approved tools like the comprehensive plan and city ordinances to determine details like landscaping and water retention.

Given the inability of council to consider recent housing projects by the standards of merit they established, we are no longer convinced the current system provides a level playing field for all developers or projects. Time for changes. Let's start with a fearless and politically-savvy team committed to meeting the city's long-term and diversified housing goals.

Todd Dorman

So amid the deepening political divisions and thrill-a-minute volatility of our post-truth Trumpian times, Republicans running our Legislature think the moment is right to grab us by the Constitution.

Last month, the Iowa House voted 58-38 along party lines to petition Congress to convene a constitutional convention under Article V of the U.S. Constitution. The convention, according to House Joint Resolution 12, would be "limited to consideration and support of amendments that impose fiscal restraints on the federal government, and amendments that limit the power and jurisdiction of the federal government, and no amendments on any other topic."

So just money, power and jurisdiction. What else is there?

It's now awaiting action in the Iowa Senate. Its floor manager there, Sen. Jason Schultz, R-Schleswig, said a debate will come "soon."

The resolution's writers have a flare for drama. It addresses our "crushing national debt." It accuses our federal government of "abuses of power" and talks of how it's "invaded the legitimate role of states" through federal mandates. It has "ceased to live under proper interpretation of the Constitution."

Stirring, to be sure. But the convention won't come in time to stop the feds from, for instance, invading Iowa with a fresh $225 million transfusion to save Gov. Terry Branstad's hemorrhaging Medicaid scheme. Such future federal incursions, funding roads, crop insurance and water quality, surely could be halted. Ask your nearest county supervisor, after lawmakers' 2017 local control pre-emption fest, about abuses of power, legitimate roles and unfunded mandates.

But I digress.

State Rep. Zach Nunn, R-Bondurant, led the charge in the House on March 15, insisting a constitutional convention would be like a “subcommittee,” or simply a “proving ground for new ideas.” It can happen if 34 state legislatures approve petitions. Nine have taken the plunge, including Arizona, Georgia, Alaska, Florida, Alabama, Tennessee, Indiana, Oklahoma and Louisiana. Other states, including Wisconsin and Ohio, are debating the issue.

Some con-con backers claim as many as 30 states have passed resolutions, counting actions taken years or even decades ago. Maryland just rescinded its resolution, passed in 1977.

“If not us, then who? If not now, when?” Nunn asked the House as debate opened.

It was hardly a debate for the ages.

Minority Democrats questioned the wisdom of lecturing Congress at a time when Iowa’s budget is a mess. That didn’t sit well with Rep. Chip Baltimore, R-Boone, who called a “point of order,” accusing Democrats of breaking House rules by going off topic. Apparently you can’t discuss state budgetary imprudence in a debate over federal budgetary imprudence. Somehow, his point was well taken by House Speaker Linda Upmeyer, R-Clear Lake.

It was not until Rep. Tim Kacena, D-Sioux City, rose to speak did we get a solid assessment of the convention drive.

“I can honestly say this resolution scares the hell out of me,” said Kacena, a retired firefighter who probably knows scary when he sees it. “This is dangerous.”

The thought of popping the hood on the Constitution at this point in our history is pretty scary. Our facts now are alternative. Our political cash comes in two flavors, shady and dark. Our nation just put a tweeting huckster in the Oval Office. Scrapping health insurance for 24 million people is what passes for sound public policy. We’re still trying to recover from the Bowling Green massacre.

A convention, now? Maybe the Russians will send delegates.

Sure, it takes 34 states to call a convention and 38 states to ratify any amendments it yields. No worries. That will never happen. Just like Donald Trump will never be president. Thank goodness.

I’m not going to defend the crushing national debt or any other boneheaded action taken by the federal government. There are many. And I can think of ways I’d like to change the Constitution.

But when the hottest trend in governing is called “the nuclear option,” the time to change the Constitution is not now. The people to do it is not us.

Legislatures across the country, including Iowa’s, are shoving through sweeping ideologically-driven initiatives with all the care, caution and concern for consequences of Visigoths on a Roman holiday. They would pick the convention delegates. That ought to work out well.

And a convention would not necessarily be “limited.”

We’ve had one such convention, in 1787. It was called by Congress to amend the Articles of Confederation. Instead, delegates tossed the articles and crafted an entirely new Constitution. It was a masterstroke for the future of America. It is not an example of cautious restraint.

Drake University Professor Dennis Goldford, who teaches constitutional law, said there were strong objections to straying from Congress’ original charge in 1787. James Madison answered those criticisms in Federalist 40.

"He said, look, if you think things are so tough and difficult right now that we can't stay where we are, then go ahead and vote for this new Constitution, and we'll take that as your consent to the rather irregular procedure we adopted," Goldford said. "If you think that we had a runaway convention ... vote against the new proposed Constitution.

"So we had precisely this issue as far back as 1787-1788. Our only constitutional convention in American history was itself a runaway convention," Goldford said.

And if a convention's actions sparked a court challenge, it's uncertain what jurisdiction the courts would have, Goldford said.

"This opens up a huge can of worms," Goldford said.

I say let's not open that can.

Conservatives who want big changes at the federal level should note they currently control Congress and the White House, with a Supreme Court majority on the way. A convention isn't necessary, unless you want to do things so unpopular they can't be accomplished through the normal political process. Many of these proposals also are known as bad ideas.

And HJR 12 is a bad idea. The Senate should grab it and scrap it.

QC Times: Q-C lawmakers weigh in on Syria strikes

Ed Tibbetts

In mostly measured tones, lawmakers representing the Quad-Cities got behind President Donald Trump's decision to launch missile strikes against Syria. But there also were warnings, mostly from Democrats, about the prospect of a deeper commitment there.

The strikes, which came late Thursday, also rekindled calls in some corners of Congress for lawmakers to come up with an authorization for use of military force in the event there was to be further action. Rep. Dave Loebsack, D-Iowa, said Friday that Trump should have come to Congress before launching Thursday's strikes.

Republicans said Trump showed resolve, and that this represented a break from the Obama administration.

"Assad's actions follow a policy under President Obama that lacked any consequences for heinous crimes against Syrian civilians," Grassley said. "The action taken by President Trump to prevent further use of chemical weapons by Assad or anyone else was appropriate."

Sen. Joni Ernst, R-Iowa, praised the strikes Thursday night. "Unlike the Obama administration, the Trump administration is showing global leadership and we must work to find an end to the root causes of this crisis," Ernst said in a statement.

Republicans have long criticized Obama over Syria. In 2013, he raised the prospect of military action after government forces launched a chemical attack. The year before, Obama had said chemical weapons would cross a red line.

Obama decided ultimately against launching an attack on his own and went to Congress for authorization. But Congress took no action, either.

As for the region's Democrats, Sen. Dick Durbin, D-Illinois, called Thursday's strikes a "measured response." Sen. Tammy Duckworth, D-Illinois, said they sent a "clear and measured message" to Syrian President Bashar al-Assad.

Rep. Cheri Bustos, D- Illinois, called Thursday's action a "proportional response."

However, they also said Trump needs to lay out a strategy before any further action is taken.

Bottom of Form

Duckworth raised concerns about heightened tensions with Russia. "After weeks of sending dangerously mixed signals on Syria, the president owes it to our troops, who are now in greater danger, to clearly and unequivocally outline the long-term strategic end-state he is seeking to achieve in Syria and the region," she said.

Bustos said the president "must present the American people and Congress a clear and transparent strategy to ensure we do not rush into another open-ended conflict in the Middle East."

Loebsack, meanwhile, also called for a "comprehensive plan." He did not weigh in specifically on the propriety of Thursday's missile strike but said it was important that the U.S. and the world "ensure that Assad is held to account for war crimes committed against his own people."

Grassley also called on the president to "develop a comprehensive strategy with respect to ending the six-year-long crisis in Syria."

QC Times Editorial: No answers in sight as Iowa exchange crumbles

Quad-City Times editorial board

Top of Form

Bottom of Form

Iowa's health insurance exchange this week became the poster child for self-fulfilling prophecies.

In just 72 hours, Iowa's version of the Affordable Care Act, or Obamacare, crumbled under its own weight and the additional heft a Republican White House with no interest in supporting it.

Wellmark Blue Cross and Blue Shield and Aetna last week both announced departures from Iowa's exchange in 2018, citing mounting financial losses and continued "uncertainty." That leaves Iowa's exchange with just one provider, Medica, which has yet to make its future intentions known. Wellmark and Aetna represent a majority of the Iowa exchange's total plans.

So, now what?

What's clear so far is Republicans in Washington have no answers.

Obamacare has always been a highly compromised, deeply troubled program. Even proponents of the massive federal program lamented its shortcomings. It's over-reliance on young, healthy populations to subsidize the elderly and sick didn't pan out. Obamacare was costly and clunky. But, by most objective measures, it was relatively successful.

Roughly 20 million Americans have health insurance thanks to the ACA. In 2016, national insurance rates reached a record low of 10.6 percent, according to Gallup. That's down from 18 percent in 2013, and it's the working poor -- a population who spent decades one heart attack away from financial ruin -- who benefited most.

An imperfect program, for sure. But Obamacare isn't responsible for the country's astronomically high health care costs. Americans pay more and get less relative to the rest of the developed world, according to the World Health Organization. It even slowed the incessant rise of health insurance premiums, concluded the Congressional Budget Office.

Republicans spent seven years wasting time on meaningless votes to repeal ACA. It was a go-to foil in congressional districts in every purple district throughout the country. It was "evil," they said. They stoked nonsensical fears about "death panels." President Donald Trump has repeatedly called it a "disaster" without bothering to actually understand it and last month promised to let ACA fail when his party couldn't offer any real solutions.

That last bit is the "uncertainty" to which Aetna and Wellmark officials were referring. Trump's promise to starve ACA to death all but doomed an already troubled Iowa exchange.

Bottom of Form

The White House and congressional Republicans, still smarting after last month's failure, spent much of last week in closed-door meetings trying to hash out a replacement to ACA, reported the New York Times. Most of the talks involving the White House concerned placating the GOP's right-wing Freedom Caucus, which killed the party's first attempt at repeal. Proposed concessions included high-risk pools, a downright scam that's failed in multiple states, and the elimination of hugely popular pre-existing conditions protections for consumers.

A bill that already turned the noses of the GOP's reasonable center reeks even worse after this week. Flailing is fine for a minority party. Chaos is not acceptable for the majority that's supposed to govern.

So, we ask again: What now?

Republicans tapped widespread confusion and fear to score political points off Obamacare. They've railed against it without any real solution. They're now actively destabilizing it. And, predictably, Iowa's exchange is quite literally falling apart amid a GOP civil war.

The well-being of thousands of Iowans are at stake here. More than 50,000 benefit from taxpayer subsidized policies on Iowa exchange. Tens of thousands of Iowa's poorest rely on the state's already foundering Medicaid system, expanded as part of the ACA and privatized by Gov. Terry Branstad.

And the very people who sowed discontent and stoked fears have, so far, proven incapable of picking up the pieces.

RI: Ashton Kutcher says good character 'is like your DNA'

APRIL 9, 2017 BY O. KAY HENDERSON

Eastern Iowa native Ashton Kutcher is the latest recipient of a "Pillar of Character" Award named in honor of former Iowa Governor Robert D. Ray.

“Thank you for having me home,” Kutcher said as he took the stage at Saturday’s ceremony in West Des Moines.

The actor who has starred in “That ’70s Show” and the current Netflix series “The Ranch” relied on some of the biochemistry he studied at the University of Iowa to explain the difference between personality and character.

“Personality is kind of the you that you show in the light,” Kutcher said. “...But your character is the you in the light and it’s the you in the darkest moment of your life. It’s just you. It’s like your DNA.”

Kutcher thanked his wife, his parents, his scoutmaster, his teachers and the neighbors from his childhood for their influence on his character.

“I’m the lucky one, but then I also had the great fortune to fail again and again and again,” Kutcher said. “I had the great fortune of going to jail when I was 18 and getting a deferred judgment, because I knew I never wanted to go back.”

Kutcher also talked about how his twin brother, Michael, has influenced his life.

“My brother was born with cerebral palsy and he taught me that loving people isn’t a choice and that people aren’t actually all created equal,” Kutcher said. “...We’re all created incredibly unequal to one another in our capabilities and what we can do and how we think and what we see, but we all have the equal capacity to love one another...He also taught me that he had gifts that I didn’t have...and that every time I felt sorry for him in life, I made him less.”

Kutcher, who is now 39 and the father of two young children, told his parents that with the experience of being a parent, he finally realized how much his own parents loved him.

“And so actually I didn’t come here, ultimately, to receive this award for myself,” Kutcher said. “I came here to receive it for all of you.”

Kutcher has become known as an entrepreneur, investor and philanthropist in addition to his work as an actor. He recently testified against human trafficking during a congressional hearing. Kutcher and his ex-wife, Demi Moore, co-founded a non-profit called “Thorn” that fights “the sexual exploitation of children.”

RI: New leader to take over at the Clarinda prison

APRIL 7, 2017 BY RADIO IOWA CONTRIBUTOR

A new warden has been named for a prison facility in southwest Iowa.

The Board of Corrections has approved the appointment of Randy Gibbs to become Warden of the Clarinda Correctional Facility on April 21. Gibbs is currently Assistant Deputy Director of Institution Operations.

The Clarinda facility currently houses over 900 inmates, many of whom are classified with “special needs” — offenders with mental health issues or intellectual disabilities.

The warden vacancy at Clarinda was created when Sheryl Dahm was appointed in January as Warden of the Iowa Correctional Institution for Women in Mitchellville. That was after former women’s prison warden Pattie Wachtendorf was named the first female warden of the Iowa State Penitentiary in Fort Madison. She replaced Nick Ludwick, who retired.

RI: Grassley, others comment on Supreme Court confirmation vote

Iowa Senator Chuck Grassley, a Republican from New Hartford, spoke to reporters today after the U.S. Senate voted to confirm Neil Gorsuch to the Supreme Court.

“I think that we just witnessed one of the most important votes that a member of the Senate can cast,” Grassley says. “Judge Gorsuch will be an independent voice on that Supreme Court. He proved that by answering questions for 20 hours.”

Grassley is the chair of the Senate Judiciary Committee which holds hearings on the Supreme Court nominees. The Senate used the so-called “nuclear option” to change the rules so Gorsuch would not need 60 votes to be confirmed. Grassley would ask if that would be a constant negative for Gorsuch in his time on the High Court. The senator says it will not be because Democrats set the precedent of changing the rules back in 2001.

“When they said ‘we’ve got to change the ground rules.’ We’ll they did change the ground rules. Those ground rules were changed for a lot of nominees that George W. Bush had, those same ground rule...continued through the Obama administration,” Grassley says. “So those Democrats who met back in 2001 poisoned the well that got us to where we are.”

Some Democrats said they were against Gorsuch’s nomination because Grassley would not hold a hearing on a judge President Obama nomination. He was asked how the whole fight over the Supreme Court nomination will impact other work in the U-S Senate.

“I think the comity will be back to the Senate in regards to legislation — but I think it’s going to take somebody like Senator Schumer who started this whole slippery slope back in 2001 — to drill a new well that’s not going to be poisoned,” Grassley replied.

Grassley says there are plenty of Republicans and Democrats who are willing to work together to make that new start when it comes to selecting Supreme Court judges.

Iowa other U.S. Senator Joni Ernst, a Republican from Red Oak, voted for Gorsuch and released this statement on her vote:

“I am thrilled that a bipartisan majority has voted to confirm Judge Gorsuch, who is eminently qualified to serve on our nation’s highest court,” said Senator Ernst. “Throughout his career, Judge Gorsuch has shown an unparalleled depth of understanding and respect for our Constitution. He is dedicated to interpreting the text of the Constitution and statutes as they are written, rather than attempting to legislate from the bench. It’s easy to see why Judge Gorsuch was previously confirmed by the Senate with unanimous support – including the support of Minority Leader Chuck Schumer.

“The American people are behind Judge Gorsuch, and I look forward to seeing him take his seat on the bench very soon.”

The group Why Courts Matter Iowa issued this statement in response to the confirmation of Neil Gorsuch, to the U.S. Supreme Court:

“Senator Grassley and Republicans in the Senate just ensured that the Supreme Court will be far more partisan and political than at any time in our country’s history, after voting to end the filibuster for Judge Gorsuch and future nominees. The so-called ‘nuclear option’ completes the partisan hatchet job on the independence of the judiciary that began last year when Grassley and Republicans engaged in unprecedented obstruction of Merrick Garland’s nomination.”

“Working side by side, President Trump, Senator Grassley, and Senate Republicans have undermined the U.S. Senate, an American institution. And their vote today undermines the independence of our highest court in the land.”

“This move to further politicize the judiciary is unfortunate, and it did not have to come to this. Republicans made a choice to strip away more than two centuries of Senate tradition. If they truly cared about bipartisanship, they would have worked across the aisle to put forward a consensus nominee who could receive the 60 votes that 25 of the past 26 justices have earned.”

“President Trump, Senator Grassley, and Senate Republicans won their vote today, but the American people lost. A judge who does not believe in protecting the constitutional rights of every citizen will be given a lifetime appointment because of a partisan vote. That’s not what we expect from our judiciary, or from our Senators, and we deserve far better.”

RI: Key senator: ‘outside chance’ for tax cuts, reform in 2017

The president of the Iowa Senate today said he and other Republicans are anxious to reform and cut Iowa income taxes, but with about two-weeks of scheduled work left in the 2017 legislative session, the task may be tabled ‘til next year.

“I was that hoping we could get to it this year,” Senate President Jack Whitver of Ankeny said. “There’s still an outside chance we could do something, but it’s looking more and more like this might be a 2018 issue.”

Whitver said the delay is mainly because when state tax revenues started falling below expectations, it forced two rounds of cuts to state budget plans.

“The reality of our situation right now in the state of Iowa is our budget is a little tighter than we hoped and we want to focus on getting our budget under control, do the fiscally responsible thing there,” Whitver said, “and then start looking at tax policy.”

After decades of resistance from within the Republican Party, Whitver said it is possible GOP lawmakers will get rid of the deduction that lets Iowans subtract their federal income taxes from their state income tax liability. Only one other state has that deduction and it makes Iowa’s income tax rates appear higher than they actually are.

“The states that are growing and thriving and are prospering right now are the states that have the lowest or even no income tax,” Whitver said. “I’m not sitting here today and saying: ‘Next year we’re going to eliminate the income tax,’ but the lower we can go on that, I think research shows we can be more prosperous.”

Whitver said he is willing to “consider anything” — including a single-rate “flat tax” on income — if it reduces the tax burden “on hard-working Iowans.” Cutting individual income taxes is a higher priority for Whitver than reducing the state’s tax rate on corporate income.

“That really isn’t that big a (part) of our state budget,” Whitver says. “What we really need to do is reform the individual tax code and that would help thousands of small business owners across our state.”

That's because the majority of small business owners do not operate a corporation. They pay taxes on their small business by filing Iowa individual income forms. Whitver made his comments during taping of tonight's "Iowa Press" program that will air on Iowa Public Television at 7:30.

RI: Iowa Supreme Court rules against request for a hospital safety report

The Iowa Supreme Court says information gathered for a patient safety study cannot be used in a lawsuit against a hospital.

Dennis Willard was seriously injured in an accident in Davenport in November of 2011 and was transferred from the hospital there to the University of Iowa Hospitals in Iowa City.

He was sedated for a scan of his stomach to check for injuries. After returning from the scan he had problems with his left arm, and an x-ray found his shoulder was dislocated.

The x-rays taken before the scan had not shown the dislocated shoulder and Willard believed the shoulder was dislocated as he was moved for the scan, so he filed a lawsuit against the hospital. He sought to get a copy of what's called a Patient Safety Net report that was filed about an incident during the scan.

The incident reports are intended to help improve the safety of hospitals and under Iowa law are required to remain confidential. The district court ruled he should be given the report as part of the discovery phase of the lawsuit.

The Iowa Supreme Court ruled Willard cannot have the report as the confidentiality given the reports allows hospital staff to feel comfortable reporting problems and that information is utilized to improve patient safety by reducing preventable medical errors. The ruling says the protection is intended to apply to documents or communications that constitute "patient safety work product."

POLITICO: White House on edge as 100-day judgment nears

'We've got essentially two-and-a-half weeks to turn everything around,' says one Trump staffer.

By SHANE GOLDMACHER

President Donald Trump has far more than three years left in his first term. But inside his pressure-cooker of a White House, aides and advisers are sweating the next three weeks.

The symbolic 100-day mark by which modern presidents are judged menaces for an image-obsessed chief executive whose opening sprint has been marred by legislative stumbles, legal setbacks, senior staff kneecapping one another, the resignation of his national security adviser and near-daily headlines and headaches about links to Russia.

The date, April 29, hangs over the West Wing like the sword of Damocles as the unofficial deadline to find their footing— or else.

But however real Trump's frustrations are with the three rival power centers he has installed — chief of staff Reince Priebus, son-in-law Jared Kushner and chief strategist Stephen Bannon — top officials inside and around the White House don't expect Trump to make any drastic changes until after 100 days, lest staff turmoil stories swamp a key stretch of media coverage.

That reprieve — unless Trump simply decides he's had enough — has both bought his staff a little time and put them on edge.

"One hundred days is the marker, and we've got essentially two-and-a-half weeks to turn everything around," said one White House official. "This is going to be a monumental task."

For a president who often begins and ends his days imbibing cable news, the burden has fallen heavily on a press team that recognizes how well they sell Trump's early tenure in the media will likely color the president's appetite for an internal shake-up.

That was the backdrop for a tense planning session for the 100-day mark last week.

More than 30 Trump staffers piled into a conference room in the Eisenhower Executive Office Building adjoining the White House, according to a half-dozen attendees who described the Tuesday meeting.

Mike Dubke, Trump's communications director, and his deputy, Jessica Ditto, kicked off the discussion of how to package Trump's tumultuous first 100 days by pitching the need for a "rebranding" to get Trump back on track.

"I think the president's head would explode if he heard that," one of the White House officials present said.

Staffers, including counselor Kellyanne Conway, were broken into three groups, complete with whiteboards, markers and giant butcher-block-type paper to brainstorm lists of early successes. One group worked in the hallway.

"It made me feel like I was back in 5th grade," complained another White House aide who was there. "That's the best way I could describe it."

Dubke, who did not work on the campaign, told the assembled aides that international affairs would present a messaging challenge because the president lacks a coherent foreign policy. Three days later, Trump would order missile strikes in Syria in a reversal of years of previous opposition to such intervention.

"There is no Trump doctrine," Dubke declared.

Some in the room were stunned by the remark.

"It rubbed people the wrong way because on the campaign we were pretty clear about what he wanted to do," said a third White House official in the room, "He was elected on a vision of America First. America First is the Trump doctrine."

One of the administration officials lamented, "We've got a comms team supposedly articulating the president's message [that] does not appear to understand the president's message."

Dubke told POLITICO he was disappointed White House staff would complain in the press rather than in real time.

"It was a brainstorming session and I really wish they had spoken up in the room so that we could have had an open and honest conversation," he said. "It is unproductive adjudicating internal discussions through the media."

As for the rebranding remark, Dubke said that had been misinterpreted. "There is not a need for a rebranding but there is a need to brand the first 100 days," Dubke said. "Because if we don't do it the media is going to do it. That's what our job is."

Trump's communications team is now plotting to divide their first 100 days into three categories of accomplishments, according to people familiar with plans: "prosperity" (such as new manufacturing jobs, reduced regulations and pulling out of the Trans-Pacific Partnership trade deal), "accountability" (following through on swamp-draining campaign promises such as lobbying restrictions) and "safety/security" (including the dramatic reduction in border crossing and the strike in Syria).

Amid near-constant talk of staff shuffling, Dubke's name has fallen below the radar, in part because he cuts such a low profile. He was a late addition to Trump's team after the initial pick for the job, Jason Miller, bowed out for personal reasons. A behind-the-scenes operator, Dubke has yet to appear on television, Trump's favorite medium.

But as most of Trump's senior team — Cabinet members, military and economic advisers, Bannon, Priebus, Kushner and White House press secretary Sean Spicer — went to Mar-a-Lago last week for the bilateral meeting with China amid the unfolding Syrian situation, Dubke was conspicuously absent and back in D.C.

"That would tell you exactly how he is perceived," said one of the White House officials.

However, another White House official defended Dubke's internal role, saying before his arrival people in the press operation were "doing whatever they wanted to do without a broader set of goals being defined." Dubke imposed structure "and that's going to ruffle some feathers."

Still, the more sympathetic aide to Dubke admitted, "He has not yet integrated into the senior leadership."

The constant presence of senior advisers encircling Trump has created a vicious — and some officials say self-defeating — cycle in which top aides feel they cannot leave his side, lest they lose influence or be perceived to have.

"People are saying, 'Why is everyone traveling with the president?' and in the next breath, 'You must not be important, you're not traveling with the president?'" another White House official complained. "You can't have it both ways."

Trump hired Dubke in mid-February after a frustrating first month of bad press, telling Fox News later that month "in terms of messaging, I would give myself a C or a C+." But even after Dubke's arrival, Trump and his senior team have continued to seek outside advice.

During the failed push to pass health care legislation, Miller drafted a short messaging memo with four bullet points that was given to top White House officials, including Kushner and Bannon, according to four people familiar with the matter.

Miller, who now works for Teneo, the consulting firm created by former aides to Bill and Hillary Clinton, has been spotted around the White House twice in recent weeks, though he has made clear to friends in the administration that he has no interest in joining the White House.

The constant palace intrigue and internal jockeying has left the White House in a state of paralysis.

Trump parted with deputy chief of staff Katie Walsh in late March, his aides are discussing a reorganization and Trump himself has begun floating names to replace Priebus, his chief of staff, for feedback, according to a person close to the White House. On Friday, Trump ordered his two other senior-most advisers, Kushner and Bannon, to settle their differences in a Mar-a-Lago sit down after a week of their increasing shadowboxing through anonymous accusations in the press.

One White House official last week questioned why Bannon was taking on a member of Trump's family

so openly.

“For a Svengali that doesn’t seem like a smart thing to do,” the official said. “I don’t think that ends well for him.”

A White House ally of Bannon noted that despite bumping up against Trump’s son-in-law, he had held sway over the most crucial policy rollouts, such as Trump’s hard line on immigration and trade. “Anyone who thinks that Steve has lost his influence, they don’t know what the f--- they’re talking about,” this person said.

The strikes on Syria, a successful summit with President Xi Jinping of China and Friday’s sit-down between Bannon and Kushner appear to have calmed some frayed nerves. Two people who have spoken with the president in recent days said Trump’s mood has improved.

Still, the question of how to frame the first 100 days remains a challenge.

Trump aides are grappling with the reality that they will end this opening period with no significant legislative achievements other than rolling back Obama-era regulations. Even the White House’s most far-reaching success, the confirmation of Justice Neil Gorsuch to the Supreme Court, required the Senate rewriting its own rules to overcome Democratic opposition.

Though the White House continues to push for progress on stalled health care legislation, there are only five legislative days remaining once Congress returns from a two-week spring break. Plus, another deadline looms: Trump and the Republican-controlled Congress must still pass a bill before April 28 to keep the government running.

If they fail, a shutdown would begin on Trump’s 100th day in office.

Bloomberg: Islamic State Kills Dozens in Egypt Palm Sunday Bombings

Egyptian President Declares 3-Month State of Emergency

Suspected suicide bombers struck two Egyptian churches on Palm Sunday, killing more than 40 people in the deadliest assault on civilians since President Abdel-Fattah El-Sisi’s election nearly three years ago.

Islamic State claimed the attacks on the St. George church in the Nile Delta city of Tanta and St. Mark’s cathedral in Alexandria, according to the U.S.-based SITE Intel Group, which monitors jihadist channels on social media. At least 27 people were killed in the Tanta bombing, the day’s first blast, Health Ministry spokesman Khaled Mogahed said. In Alexandria, at least 16 were killed in an attack on the seat of the Coptic Orthodox church there.

The violence demonstrates Islamic State’s intent to expand its presence in Egypt beyond the rugged confines of the Sinai Peninsula. That will likely add more pressure on El-Sisi to restore order as he seeks to attract foreign capital and placate a population increasingly frustrated with economic hardship.

The bombings come less than a week after El-Sisi met President Donald Trump at the White House, where he was praised for his efforts to fight terrorism. Targeting two major cities outside Sinai lets Islamic State show it’s “still able to operate -- despite this growing pressure -- and to embarrass the Egyptian government after Sisi’s visit to Washington” and before Pope Francis’s visit this month, said Michael Horowitz, director of intelligence at the political risk consultancy Prime Source.

‘Great Confidence’

Trump tweeted that he's "sad to hear about the terrorist attack in Egypt" and has "great confidence that President Al Sisi will handle the situation properly." The U.S. "will continue to support Egypt's security and stability in its efforts to defeat terrorism," State Department spokesman Mark Toner said in a statement. Al Sisi ordered the deployment of military units to help protect vital installations nationwide, the presidency said in a statement.

Egyptian shares dropped after the bombings, with the benchmark EGX 30 Index retreating 1.6 percent, the most since Feb. 27, at the close in Cairo.

The incidents bore the hallmarks of the Islamic State -- multi-pronged attacks aimed at inflicting as much damage as possible while minimizing the group's losses. In Alexandria, one of the casualties was a police officer who blocked the suspected suicide bomber from entering the church after he evaded a metal detector, security footage aired on television showed. In Tanta, the remains of a suspected suicide bomber were found in the church, the state-run Middle East News Agency said, citing an unidentified security official.

The bombings were "a mixed bag" for El-Sisi, said Samuel Tadros, a senior fellow at the Hudson Institute in Washington.

'Dangerous Development'

"On the one hand it reinforces his narrative that Egypt is in war against terrorism, rallying the nation around the flag and so forth," Tadros said. "At the same time the attacks send a message of incompetence of the security apparatus" in containing the militancy, he said.

If the jihadist group proves able to operate more extensively outside of Sinai, "that would be a very dangerous development," he added.

El-Sisi declared that the attacks "will not undermine the resolve and true will of the Egyptian people to counter the forces of evil," according to a statement from the presidency. But the violence against civilians dealt the president a new blow at a time when his support is already being tested by the hardships Egyptians are being forced to endure as part of his economic reform program.

Currency Controls

A November decision to abandon currency controls helped to secure a $12 billion International Monetary Fund loan and attract foreign investors. Yet it has also caused the pound to lose half its value against the dollar, sending prices soaring and annual core inflation climbing to over 33 percent in February.

Bottom of Form

The militant threat exploded after the 2013 military-backed popular uprising against Islamist President Mohamed Mursi and the deadly crackdown on his Muslim Brotherhood group that followed. The expansion of the attacks outside the confines of Sinai and, according to Egyptian media, a new focus on targeting Christians have only proven the jihadists' resilience. A deadly bombing at the Cairo cathedral in December, claimed by Islamic State's local affiliate, killed at least 25 worshippers.

The latest bombing "won't be the last terrorist attack because the state fights terrorism but doesn't fight terrorism-inspiring ideas, which is the main cause of the problem," billionaire Naguib Sawiris wrote on his official Twitter account.

Loyal Backers

Christians, who are widely estimated to make up around 10 percent of the nation's 92 million residents, have long complained of discrimination in the Muslim majority nation. They were among El-Sisi's strongest backers after Mursi was pushed from power, but that loyalty, too, is being strained by the government's failure to contain the assaults on their community.

"This type of attack is the most dangerous, since it inflicts maximum amount of damage on human lives, disrupts tourism, and shakes the image of the state," said Ghanem Nuseibeh, founder of London-based consulting firm Cornerstone Global Associates. "It turns the conflict from a confrontation in the desert to a civil conflict in the heart of Egypt."

"This attack is likely to embolden the government, and provide it with even more legitimacy in its crackdown on Islamists and on dissent," he said.

WSJ: Democrats' Conditions for Tax Overhaul Make Bipartisan Deal Unlikely

GOP attempts to reach across the aisle are complicated by lack of agreement on priorities

By RICHARD RUBIN

Democrats are starting to settle on a price for participating in a tax-code overhaul, and many Republicans won't want to pay it.

Democrats say they oppose net tax cuts and will resist proposals that mostly benefit high-income households. Those priorities diverge from President Donald Trump's repeated promise to "cut the hell out of taxes" and congressional Republicans' plans to lower marginal tax rates and repeal the estate tax.

"Tax reform's got to be responsible and it's got to be progressive," said Sen. Ben Cardin (D., Md.).

Republicans made overtures across the aisle in recent weeks and, in theory, Democratic participation on tax policy could ease legislative challenges for Republicans vexed by slim House and Senate majorities and internal disagreements. By attracting Democratic votes, Republicans could overcome procedural hurdles without uniting fractious wings of their own party.

TRUMP'S FIRST 100 DAYS

There is, at some level, rhetorical room for agreement. Mr. Trump says middle-class tax cuts are a top priority. House Speaker Paul Ryan (R., Wis.) says he's aiming for his plan to be revenue neutral—collecting as much money over the next decade as the current system does. Mix Mr. Trump's class rhetoric, Mr. Ryan's budgetary promise and the prospect of spending on infrastructure and there is a recipe for bipartisanship.

But so far, those priorities aren't widely shared among Republicans and GOP plans haven't matched them. Mr. Trump's campaign plan delivered half its tax cuts to the top 1% of households, according to the Tax Policy Center, a joint project of the Urban Institute and Brookings Institution. House Republicans haven't shown in detail how their plan adds up and don't want to tie infrastructure and taxes together. Lower tax rates on businesses, investors and top earners are a unifying force in the GOP, and many lawmakers are reluctant to give that up to get a deal with Democrats.

Even if the White House and Democrats reach a conceptual agreement on taxes, any accord would drive many Republicans away and require the Trump administration and lawmakers to make decisions on hundreds of details.

Still, White House officials, who declared they are taking the lead on tax policy, have been meeting with Democratic lawmakers. House Ways and Means Chairman Rep. Kevin Brady (R., Texas) met with two groups of Democrats last week.

Democrats say they are wary but listening.

Mr. Trump's unpopularity, especially among Democratic voters, gives lawmakers political advantages in opposing the admin

Part of The Des Moines Register series "Driving Drunk: Iowa's deadly problem."

In December 2013, Miranda Lalla was sent away for up to 25 years after she pleaded guilty to vehicular homicide while intoxicated for running over her friend in a pickup truck.

But two years, one month and eight days later, Lalla walked out of prison a free woman.

"It makes it feel like her life didn't matter," said Jessica Anderson, 28, the niece of Pamela Gross, the 44 year-old Iowa City woman Lalla killed. "I don't understand how you can take someone's life and then suffer very few consequences."

It's a common refrain from families whose loved ones have been killed in crashes caused by intoxicated drivers: Offenders are serving only a fraction of their sentences, which is evidence, they say, that Iowa doesn't treat drunken driving with the seriousness it deserves.

A Des Moines Register analysis of Iowa felony sentences lends credence to their argument.

Over the past six years, 47 people convicted of vehicular homicide while intoxicated were released after serving an average of 6 years and 4 months in prison — roughly one-fourth of their maximum sentence, Iowa Department of Corrections data show.

That's far less on average than inmates serving time for Iowa's other Class B felonies, including arson, robbery and manslaughter, all of which are punishable by up to 25 years in prison.

For example, released offenders serving time for second-degree murder or manslaughter spent 12 years on average behind bars, Iowa Board of Parole data show.

And prisoners doing time for arson or robbery, crimes where a victim may have been injured but not killed, spent seven to 15½ years on average in prison before they were released, a parole board report shows. "What message is that sending Iowa residents? That it's OK to get intoxicated, get in your car and go out and kill someone?" said Frank Harris, director of state government affairs for Mothers Against Drunk Driving, who has spent time in Iowa lobbying lawmakers for legislation that would strengthen Iowa's intoxicated driving laws. "Unfortunately, this is par for the course nationwide."

Others, however, caution that while there should be serious consequences for killing someone while driving drunk, it's equally important to provide treatment to offenders struggling with alcohol addiction. "The sentences should be done on a person-to-person basis," said Lilly Wisely of Clinton, who in 2006 pleaded guilty to vehicular homicide-reckless or eluding and served one year. "I didn't have a previous criminal history or a drunk driving history. "I was scared straight in prison. Serving a longer sentence would not have been beneficial to me at all."

How much time is enough?

Despite decades of attention on the issue, Iowa has struggled to curb the state's problem with drunken driving, which in 2016 resulted in the deaths of at least 84 people from alcohol-related crashes.

The state is investigating another 16 fatal crashes where alcohol is suspected, potentially driving that number higher. Vehicular homicide while intoxicated has been a criminal offense in Iowa since 1911, according to a guide written by the state's Legislative Services Agency.

In 1986, Iowa lawmakers, citing its serious nature, made the offense its own chapter in the state criminal code. They designated the crime as a Class D felony, punishable by up to five years in prison and fines up to $7,500.

Harsher sentences and fines were passed during the next decade, and by 1997, vehicular homicide while intoxicated was designated a Class B felony punishable up to 25 years.

Iowa is one of 14 states that sentences offenders up to 25 years or more for killing someone while driving impaired, but it also has one of the nation's most generous earnedtime policies for inmates. Depending on the crime, many offenders see their sentences cut by more than half the first day they are incarcerated.

On Dec. 2, 2005, Teresa Fagen, 15, was driving home after a Perry High School basketball game when a man fleeing police in a pickup rear-ended her vehicle, killing her. Joseph Phillip Long pleaded guilty to four charges, including vehicular homicide while intoxicated and was sentenced to up to 35 years in prison.

In late 2015, Long, now 46, was released to parole after serving 8 years and 10 months in prison.

"Once a sentence is handed down, you should be required to serve all of that sentence," said Michelle Brecht, 35, of Des Moines, who is Teresa's oldest sister. "When you go through the trial and the sentencing, it's all about the victim, which is the way it should be.

"But when you get to the prison part, it's like they forget there's a victim because they are so busy focusing on ways to get (the offender) out."

Efforts to reach Long were unsuccessful.

Through a spokesperson, parole board chairman John Hodges declined interview requests on what the board considers when deciding whether to release someone on parole. Hodges was appointed in May 2014 to the board, a full-time, taxpayer-paid position.

A spokeswoman provided the Register with criteria the board considers, including previous criminal and recidivism records, participation in prison programs, drug and alcohol history and propensity for violence.

Matthew Lindholm, a defense attorney whose practice is in West Des Moines, said the parole board also must take other factors into consideration, such as crowding in the state's prisons and whether there is room for "more dangerous offenders who need to be housed." "Everybody is so quick to point the finger at the offender — let's put them in jail and throw away the key," Lindholm said. "Statistics show that incarceration doesn't work. These are people with an addiction, and we need to look at solving their addictions."

Wisconsin lawmakers for the past three years have debated whether to require offenders convicted of vehicular homicide while intoxicated to serve a mandatory minimum sentence before becoming parole eligible. Polk County Attorney John Sarcone said that is worth exploring.

"The penalty (now) is such that it's almost like you're forgiving certain things," Sarcone said. "Maybe it should be higher, like second-degree murder, which has a 70 percent mandatory minimum" on the sentence.

'They haven't learned their lesson'

Intoxicated driving third or subsequent offense is Iowa's most serious charge for impaired drivers who haven't hurt or killed anyone, no matter how many times they're charged. Other states have added graduated levels and increased penalties for repeat drunken drivers. Beginning in January, Wisconsin can punish someone convicted of a fourth intoxicated driving charge with up to six years in prison. In addition, someone convicted of their 10th lifetime drunken-driving offense in Wisconsin must serve at least four years before becoming eligible for parole. However, an Iowa coalition that made recommendations last year for getting impaired drivers off the state's roads did not include stiffer penalties for current drunken driving charges.

In past years, the Iowa Peace Officers Association has supported strengthening Iowa's drunken driving laws. A spokeswoman said the group stopped advocating for changes because of the lack of interest from Iowa lawmakers. Sarcone said he would favor stricter sentences for repeat drunken driving offenders, particularly for those with three or more convictions.

"That's the one area that ought to be looked at because for that small group, they are a danger to everyone," Sarcone said. "It's obvious they haven't learned their lesson." Since 2005, at least 11,390 people have been charged in Iowa with operating while intoxicated third or subsequent offense, a Register review of court record records shows. Among them is Leon Kurt Shivers, who in May 2012 and June 2014 was charged with third or subsequent offense drunken driving. Shivers eventually was sentenced to up to five years in prison but served 8 months and 25 days. Eight months after his release to parole, Shivers was driving drunk when he slammed into the minivan of John McCartney, 82, killing him. "The lack of teeth to our laws is frustrating," said Story County Attorney Jessica Reynolds, whose staff prosecuted Shivers on the June 2014 charge. "When we send someone to prison for five years, we believe that they should go to prison for five years." A review of data provided by the Iowa Justice Data Warehouse shows that on average, people convicted of third or subsequent drunken driving spend less than three months in prison before they are released to an OWI treatment center. Offenders who don't go to a treatment center typically spend 15 months or less in prison, the data show. "It's every prosecutor's worst nightmare to have something like this happen," Reynolds said, "that you work hard to send someone to prison for a certain amount of time, they are let out and re-offend and kill someone."

'People know drunk driving is wrong'

Pamela Gross' family remains puzzled why Lalla served less than three years of her 25-year sentence.

Gross and Lalla had gotten into a fight in a parking lot after the two had been at a bar, court records show. Lalla got into her truck to leave, knocked Gross down with the truck and then ran over her, killing her.

Lalla spent more than a year in the Johnson County jail before she entered a guilty plea and was sentenced.

That jail time, as well as her time in prison, contributed toward her early release, as did her completion of a prison program, a parole board spokesman told the Iowa City Press-Citizen last year.

Lalla declined an interview request. Her parole was revoked in January because she was consuming alcohol and living with a felon. She's at a community-based corrections facility in Cedar Rapids.

Gross' family remains unsatisfied with her punishment.

"People know drunk driving is wrong and the risks involved with doing it," said Dianne Hesseltine, Gross' sister. "There should be mandatory sentences when you kill someone when you're driving drunk."

DMR: Duel on guns at public venues in Iowa

Bill's passage spurs debate on potential allowance at sites such as courts, Capitol

WILLIAM PETROSKI

BPETROSK@DMREG.COM

The passage of a wide-ranging gun rights bill by Iowa lawmakers is raising questions about whether local officials can stop gun-carrying citizens from entering courthouses and city halls, although supporters of the measure insist there won't be any problems.

Sen. Nate Boulton, D-Des Moines, an attorney who voted against House File 517, said the legislation lacks clarity in defining local government control over firearms in public buildings. A "pre-emption" section of the bill says that Iowans can sue any city, county or township that enacts firearms bans if they believe they are adversely affected by the ban.

"I think there were a lot of missed opportunities to expressly define where these rights and limitations are," Boulton said. "Right now there are a lot of grey areas and it is going to require court interpretation."

But Sen. Dan Dawson, R-Council Bluffs, the bill's floor manager, said nothing has changed in current law regarding security in Iowa's public buildings. The legislation does include a "just cause" provision for people who believe they have been adversely affected, he added.

"Our position is that it doesn't change the status-quo out there," said Dawson, who is also an Iowa Division of Criminal Investigation agent. For courthouses in Polk County and Pottawattamie County, for example, where dangerous weapons are banned and people must pass through a metal detector, there would be a "pretty high threshold" for someone to prove that while the buildings are highly secure, they are adversely affected, Dawson said. He believes city officials can prohibit weapons in city halls and he noted that schools will remain gun-free zones under a different section of state law.

The Iowa Judicial Branch, representing the state's courts, is officially opposed to the legislation, which received final approval Thursday from the Iowa House.

"The Judicial Branch registered against HF 517 solely because we are unsure if the pre-emption section of the bill (Division VII) will maintain the status-quo on courthouse security," said Steve Davis, communications director for the Iowa Judicial Branch.

Iowa Attorney General Tom Miller, the Iowa County Attorneys Association, and the Iowa Judges Association are also registered as opposed to the gun bill, which has a host of other provisions. They includes a controversial “stand your ground” section that says a law-abiding person does not have a duty to retreat before using deadly force with a gun.

Bill headed to Branstad

The bill now goes to Gov. Terry Branstad, who must decide whether to sign it or veto it. Branstad spokesman Ben Hammes said the governor is reserving judgment until he has time to carefully review the bill, as he does with all legislation. Polk County Attorney John Sarcone, a Democrat, told The Des Moines Register on Friday he wants Branstad to veto the gun bill. There is no question that local rules banning guns in courthouses and city halls will be challenged in the courts, Sarcone said, and he is concerned how the legislation will be interpreted. He also has concerns about possible difficulties in prosecuting homicide cases as a result of the stand your ground provisions. He described his stance as not political, but pro-public safety. “We come to the courthouse to resolve disputes in a peaceful fashion, not to fear if someone is carrying a weapon if they don’t like the result,” Sarcone said. “Banning all types of weapons from the courthouse just makes sense.”

Sarcone said the gun legislation raises the possibility that someone could be charged with a felony crime, yet not have a criminal record and still have a permit to carry a gun that could be brought into a courtroom.

Firearms at the Iowa Capitol

One legal issue is clear: The new legislation will allow Iowans who have a permit to carry firearms to have concealed guns as they walk inside the Capitol to visit with legislators, watch debates and attend committee meetings. Visitors to the Capitol are now screened and they aren’t allowed to bring guns into the building, although some legislators have acknowledged being armed inside the Capitol. Sen. Jake Chapman, RAdel, said he believes lawabiding Iowans should be allowed to carry firearms at the Capitol, and in courthouses and city halls as well. “The reality is that this building is owned by the people of Iowa,” Chapman said in an interview at the Capitol. “My seat out there is not my seat; it is the seat of the people of Senate District 10. This is their seat. They own the building. If they have a right to keep and bear arms, they have a right to carry in their building.” Sen. Tod Bowman, DMaquoketa, has a different view. He points to an incident in September 2014 in which a man died at the Jackson County Courthouse in Maquoketa after he pulled a gun from a briefcase and pointed it at the county assessor. Francis Glaser, 71, a former Maquoketa city manager, had become agitated and vocal about his property taxes going up during a weekly meeting of Jackson County Board of Supervisors. Glaser pulled a small gun and fired at County Assessor Deb Lane but missed. A struggle ensued with a county supervisor and Glaser died when he was struck by a second shot.

“Most people that I have talked to don’t want guns freely floating into these environments where feelings and emotions get high,” Bowman said. Bowman voted for the overall gun rights bill, but he supported an unsuccessful effort to amend the measure.

Rep. Dave Heaton, RMount Pleasant, was among a handful of Republicans who voted against the gun bill. He said last month he supported most of the gun rights provisions, but the section applying to cities and counties would keep him from voting for it. He pointed to the 1986 murder of then-Mount Pleasant Mayor Edd King, who was shot by an angry constituent during a city council meeting.

“My town will never forget what happened,” Heaton said. “They are my constituents. I can’t support this bill because of what this bill does.”

One of the gun bill’s most controversial provisions, which would have prevented the Board of Regents from enacting gun-free zones on college campuses, was previously removed from the bill.

DMR Editorial: Legislature should ban use of traffic cameras

Regulation of the devices won't solve the profit-motive problem

At the beginning of this legislative session, it appeared that Iowa's state lawmakers were finally prepared to ban the use of traffic-enforcement cameras throughout the state.

The proposal seemed to have the support of both the governor and the Senate's Judiciary Committee chairman, Brad Zaun.

Then lawmakers gravitated toward a compromise proposal that would allow the cameras to remain. The final version approved by the Senate sought only to regulate the cameras' use by limiting their deployment to state-approved, high-risk locations, with fines capped and the revenue used for infrastructure improvements and public safety.

Now, however, the pendulum may be swinging back toward an outright ban. More than two dozen representatives in the Iowa House are supporting a bill that would prohibit the use of red-light and speeding cameras.

Not surprisingly, the biggest obstacles to both proposals are the Iowa cities that rely on revenue from the cameras. Cedar Rapids, for example, generates more than $3 million a year from the cameras. Along with the cities of Muscatine and Des Moines, Cedar Rapids is now suing the Iowa Department of Transportation over the state agency's efforts to regulate the devices. It may be only a few weeks before a judge rules on the question of whether the state has the authority to order cities to take down cameras in locations where they aren't improving traffic safety.

Iowa lawmakers who remain unsure of how to proceed should take a close look at the arguments presented in this case. The cities are opposing a DOT rule that requires 1,000 feet of separation between a traffic camera and a speed-limit reduction. That rule was imposed after research conformed what common sense would indicate: placing the cameras any closer than 1,000 feet leads to more rear-end collisions as law-abiding drivers slam on the brakes to avoid being ticketed for exceeding the reduced speed limit.

It's a clear-cut example of how cities are willing to use the cameras not to make their streets safer, but to raise revenue. In fact, it could be argued that the cities are raising revenue at the expense of public safety — placing cameras in a manner that leads to more, not fewer, crashes.

Lawmakers should also be mindful of what triggered the lawsuit: In 2015, after the DOT examined the cameras' impact on traffic flow around the state, it determined that 21 of the 31 cameras in use could remain in place due to their positive impact on traffic safety. But almost one-third of the cameras couldn't meet that standard and had to either be eliminated or modified, the DOT said. The cities didn't accept that.

Again and again, backers of the technology have argued that those who don't like the cameras should just watch their speed and they'll have nothing to worry about. Not true. They'll still have to be concerned with rear-end collisions caused by obvious speed traps. They'll also have to be concerned with their local law enforcement agencies being turned into revenue centers by their city council.

As effective as the cameras are in identifying and penalizing violators, they also invite abuse. Some states have been forced to pass laws prohibiting cities from collecting more than 30 or 40 percent of their total revenue from traffic citations.

As the DOT court case makes clear, some Iowa cities not only refuse to respect the DOT's authority to regulate traffic cameras, they are also willing to spend taxpayer money arguing that point in court. They also are unwilling to act appropriately even when their own data shows the cameras aren't being used in a way that enhances public safety.

That's why the Iowa Legislature needs to move forward with its initial effort to ban the devices outright. It's the only way to prevent cities from continuing to partner with questionable, revenue-sharing companies that spit out citations in the form of civil penalties that completely bypass the criminal courts

DMR: THE FUTURE OF IOWA'S 100 COURTHOUSES

Warren County may be harbinger of efforts to meld services

GRANT RODGERS

GRODGERS@DMREG.COM

KNOXVILLE, Ia. — The court appearance here Wednesday by Warren County resident Erin Karas lasted just two minutes.

But it pulled Karas away from her restaurant job to make the 35-minute trip east from her home in Indianola to the Marion County Courthouse. Warren County's courthouse has sat mostly empty for more than nine months, evacuated amid worries about mold, plumbing issues and other problems.

"I'm missing out on work today because of this," said Karas, 45, who pleaded guilty to providing alcohol to a minor at her home last month.

For more than two decades, Iowa Supreme Court chief justices have issued intermittent warnings that budget considerations might someday force consolidation of the legal system. The move of Warren County's court operations is temporary, but what residents, attorneys and judges have experienced since June offers a glimpse of what court consolidation could bring.

State Rep. Chip Baltimore, a Boone Republican and attorney, said in an interview with The Des Moines Register that certain measures, such as closing clerks of court offices in certain counties, could be worth considering again — particularly in the age of digital filing.

"I think it has to come up," he said. "We talk about government efficiency and efficient use of tax dollars. ... Not that we are going to close a bunch of clerk's offices, but do they need to be there 40 hours a week, every week of the year with a full staff. I think that's definitely something we need to take a look at."

There is no plan in the works to consolidate court services, said State Court Administrator David Boyd, who is set to retire in September after four decades of working for Iowa's court system. And there are state laws barring certain moves, such as creating regional litigation centers or moving clerk offices out of county seats.

But Boyd admits there may come a time when offering court services in all 99 counties could be reconsidered.

"I really do hope at some point we are in fact considered to be a separate and equal branch of government and properly funded," he said. "That's not to say that we have to continue to do things in a particular way just because we've always done it that way." Legislators in January cut $3 million from of the judicial branch's current budget as part of cost-cutting effort spread across the entire state government, causing a $400,000 budget gap. In response, Boyd and court officials chose to close courts for an unpaid furlough day on May 26. The branch was already hamstrung when legislators in 2016 gave the judicial branch the same $178.7 million it received the year before, forcing a hiring freeze, Chief Justice Mark Cady told lawmakers in January. “We are starting to see delays in our court process, and I fear that this is going to continue if our needs aren’t met,” he said at the time.

While the judicial branch administers court services in the counties and employs clerk staff, judges and other workers, the responsibility for maintaining the state’s aging courthouses falls to county governments. The average age of an Iowa courthouse is 100 years old. Thirty-eight of the current courthouses were built before 1900.

In May 2016, Warren County voters shot down a $35 million plan to build a new courthouse and jail to replace the existing courthouse built in 1939 with financial support from the Public Works Administration. One month later, Arthur Gamble, chief judge of the Fifth Judicial District of Iowa, ordered court services to vacate the building amid health concerns.

Court officials hope they can return to Indianola next month. Warren County is renovating a former Fusion Fitness center into temporary courtrooms. It will spend about $100,000 annually to lease the space while a more permanent solution is found to repair or replace the town square’s deteriorating courthouse.

Years of chatter, but opposition remains

In 1991, lawmakers faced a $300 million budget deficit. In an interview with the Register, former Chief Justice Arthur McGiverin outlined several ideas aimed at saving money, including the creation of regional “litigation centers” that could replace court services in some counties. McGiverin, an Ottumwa resident, emphasized that he would prefer having court in all 99 counties, but admitted “that may well be difficult to do” in the future. In January 1993, McGiverin announced in the annual State of the Judiciary Address to legislators that court administrators were working on plans to move courts out of several county courthouses and into regional centers. But the plan met strong opposition. The Iowa State Bar Association and rural county supervisors organized opposition amid concerns, in part, that closing court services would hurt small-town economies, even if other offices like county auditors and treasurers remained in courthouses.

That same concern would likely be raised again — along with concerns about lowans’ access to justice — if lawmakers and judicial officials were to consider consolidating services again, said Skip Kenyon, president of the Iowa State Bar Association. Kenyon is a longtime attorney in the Union County seat of Creston, where a district court judge travels to the courthouse for hearings one day a week and an associate district court judge comes on a different day.

In neighboring Adams, Taylor and Ringgold counties, a judge comes to the courthouse for hearings every other week, Kenyon said.

“If you don’t have that draw to help bring commerce in, I think it’s real hard for the town to continue to thrive,” he said. “And I think the courthouse is part of that. It brings people to town.”

Judicial branch officials under Chief Justice Louis Lavorato in 2001 released a cost-savings restructuring plan that would have moved clerk of court offices out of several counties in the state and into regional centers. But the plan was pulled weeks after it was released when lawyers and county officials again spoke out.

“Chief Justice Lavorato and I took a lot of heat,” said Boyd, the deputy court administrator at the time.

Two years later, then-Gov. Tom Vilsack, a Democrat, signed a bill that included language prohibiting the creation of “regional litigation centers” — a reaction borne out of the court’s restructuring plan floated in 2001, Boyd said.

In her 2009 address to lawmakers, Chief Justice Marsha Ternus briefly raised the issue again amid a national recession.

“We simply do not want to spend precious time on a concept that you are not prepared to consider, and in the past, you have acted to prevent any movement toward consolidating court operations,” she told lawmakers at the time.

Consolidation in a microcosm

Warren County attorneys have gotten a taste of space sharing due to the forced closure of the courthouse in June 2016.

Under the order from Gamble, the Fifth District chief judge, most of Warren County’s court services were moved to the neighboring Marion and Madison county courthouses in Knoxville and Winterset, respectively. In the order, Gamble described “periodic” leaks of sewer water found in courtrooms, deteriorating air quality that made some employees sick, and dirty restrooms in the old building.

“Unfortunately, it is likely these alternate places of holding court will not be convenient for the citizens of Warren County. However, the board has not provided an alternative,” Gamble wrote at the time. Warren County Attorney Doug Eichholz, who was appointed to the position, said the emergency closure of the courthouse has put his office approximately $41,000 over its yearly budget, partly due to the travel costs now associated with cases. To cut down on the costs of driving to Knoxville, the sheriff lent the attorney’s office a spare vehicle, and prosecutors try to carpool, he said.

Sharing space in aging courthouses is a temporary fix.

Several attorneys and others interviewed by the Register agreed that consolidating court services into regional centers would require construction of new facilities. “I think that almost unquestionably that would have to happen,” Boyd said.

Others, such as the Iowa State Bar Association’s Kenyon, suggest that the most worrisome aspect of consolidation is the effect on people using court services.

Since the closure of the Warren County Courthouse, some of the biggest frustrations have come from families involved with juvenile proceedings.

Juvenile matters were moved to Winterset, a 25-mile drive from Indianola and approximately 40 miles one-way from both Carlisle and Southeast Warren Junior-Senior High School in Liberty Center. Juvenile court hearings take place on Monday mornings. Children who are being held by the county have to be driven to and from court by their parents or guardians, said Alex Crabb, the first assistant Warren County attorney. “You’re picking your kid up at school and now you’re driving all the way over to Winterset,” he said. “I think that’s where I’ve had most of the frustration.”

Mason Ouderkirk, whose Indianola law firm sits on the town square directly north of the empty courthouse, said the costs passed on to clients is the chief burden. The travel costs for the average 45 minutes he spends on the road driving to and from Knoxville or Winterset can add “hundreds of dollars to the cost of a hearing for a client,” he said. “It’s a burden directly upon the client,” said Ouderkirk, who specializes in civil cases and family law. “They’re paying me for my time, and that’s unfortunate.”

Kenyon raised a similar concern. A state budget crisis forced the judicial branch to belt-tighten around 2009 and cut back on travel costs for judges and other employees, he said. At the time, he was litigating a personal injury case filed in Adair County that ultimately went to trial at the Dallas County Courthouse to accommodate the judge’s travel schedule. That meant Kenyon and the other attorneys and witnesses were on the road daily to Adel throughout the trial. “It created a lot of additional expense for my client,” he said. “If you go to something like a regional center, that makes it that much more expensive, and the people who need (court services) are the ones that are going to have to be paying for it,” he said. Warren County officials are trying to decide their next move. They could choose to tear down the existing courthouse on the Indianola square and start from scratch at another location. Or they could keep the courthouse where it is, but build a jail at another location. A new bond referendum is currently scheduled for Aug. 8.

DMR: DRIVING DRUNK: IOWA'S DEADLY PROBLEM

State struggles to reduce number of repeat offenders

Since 2005, over 11,300 have been hit with at least their third drunken driving charge

Part of The Des Moines Register series "Driving Drunk: Iowa's deadly problem."

Randy John Stubbe was sent to prison in 2008 for driving while intoxicated in a Butler County crash that killed his wife. After he got out, he was charged twice more with driving drunk and in March returned to prison for two more years.

Deanna Marie Gliem of Des Moines was drinking before she crashed her car into another vehicle in 2015, killing the driver and passenger. Before she could go to trial, she was arrested for drunken driving in Lucas County.

And Donald Dean Gridley of Fairfield served less than a year in prison in the 1990s for causing the death of a passenger in a drunken driving crash. When he got out, he was arrested twice more for drunken driving, then charged with vehicular homicide while intoxicated in a 2012 crash that killed his father.

Talk with Iowa law enforcement officers, and they will tell story after story of people arrested repeatedly for being drunk behind the wheel. It's a constant struggle that is costing lives, they say.

"You would think, as a human being, if I killed somebody while I was drinking and driving that I wouldn't drink and drive anymore," Woodbury County Sheriff Dave Drew said. "That just shows you the power of alcohol in some people's lives. Some people are better off never touching it."

An exclusive Des Moines Register analysis of more than 200,000 Iowa court records involving intoxicated driving over the past 12 years illustrates the magnitude of that struggle:

» Since 2005, 222 people have been charged with vehicular homicide while intoxicated, and nearly one-third previously had been arrested for driving while intoxicated. Several had been arrested multiple times.

» At least 13 of those drivers were caught driving drunk again after they had been charged or convicted of killing someone while driving under the influence.

» More than 11,300 people were charged with intoxicated driving-third or subsequent offense, meaning they had been charged with driving while intoxicated at least three times in the past dozen years. The repercussions of those stark statistics play out daily on Iowa's roads, too often ending in tragedy, such as on Oct. 17, 2006, in Story County. A driver weaving in a van on U.S. Highway 30 slammed head-on into a sedan and killed Jonathan Baugh, a 17-year-old Valley High School senior who was on his way to watch a volleyball match in Ames. The van's driver, Phillip Ray Stephens, had an open bottle in the vehicle and reeked of alcohol, court records show. Stephens had already been convicted of drunken driving in 2000 and had another charge pending for a January 2005 arrest, according to court records.

Stephens was sentenced to up to 18 years in prison for the fatal crash but served only 5½ years before being released in September 2012 to a community program. In May 2016, he was discharged from parole and within weeks was arrested twice for operating a vehicle while intoxicated, with sentencing scheduled for Monday. “He’s using his vehicle like a weapon when he gets behind the wheel,” said Tracy Baugh, a Baptist minister and father of Jonathan, who was among the 1,100 people who have been killed in alcohol-related crashes in Iowa since 2005. Stephens did not respond to a request for an interview. Tracy and his wife, Pam, who now live in Spencer, want Iowa to require intoxicated drivers who kill someone to serve 80 percent or more of their sentence. And they want to see chronic offenders such as Stephens barred from driving for life. “People on the road with him are escaping death — just like if there’s a gunman in a shopping mall and people walk away unharmed,” Tracy Baugh said.

Donald Gridley, who has twice killed people while driving drunk, said people like him are “playing with disaster.”

“Bad things are going to happen to you eventually,” Gridley told the Register during a telephone interview from Mount Pleasant Correctional Facility.

A jury in 2014 convicted after a jury convicted him of vehicular homicide while intoxicated. “Drinking is a like a deadly weapon, and somebody will either be hurt or wind up dead because of it.” Of the 13 drivers in the past dozen years caught driving drunk again after already killing someone while driving drunk, nine, including Gridley, Stephens and Stubbe, had served time in prison. Four, including Gliem, were awaiting trial. Gridley’s first conviction for causing a death came in 1992, when he pleaded guilty to involuntary manslaughter and driving drunk. That was followed by two more arrests for drunken driving before the night of drinking in December 2012 when his father, Patrick Gridley, was killed. Gridley said his father had persuaded him to attend a funeral with him. Afterward, the two went to a bar and drank into the early hours. “I made a bad choice to go to the funeral and then to drink,” Gridley said. “It ended up in a mess.” Gridley said he doesn’t remember the crash or whether he was driving. Court records say he ran a stop sign and drove his father’s Ford pickup into a ditch in rural Wapello County, then walked to a nearby farmhouse for help. A county sheriff’s deputy found his father, 65, dead inside the truck.

A test administered several hours after the crash showed that Donald Gridley’s alcohol concentration was 0.198 percent, more than twice Iowa’s legal limit.

It also detected marijuana, oxycodone and an anxiety medication, court records show. Gridley was sentenced to up to 25 years in prison. His expected release date is December 2025. While in prison, Gridley said he’s attended weekly meetings of Alcoholics Anonymous and Narcotics Anonymous and attended a class called “Thinking for a Change.”

But, he said, he’s not received any treatment or counseling for his addiction to alcohol.

Nonetheless, Donald’s mother, Linda Gridley, said her son has been behind bars long enough.

“He’s not the man he was five years ago,” said Gridley, 69, of Fairfield. “He talks differently and he acts differently. He’s paid his dues — now he’s in there without any rehabilitation and with no treatment.” Donald Gridley also believes he’s ready to be released after more than two years behind bars. He said he won’t drink again because “of all the trouble and pain and agony it caused my mother and the rest of my family.”

‘He should have been sitting in jail’

The Register’s analysis of tens of thousands of intoxicated while driving arrests since 2005 illustrates Iowa’s shortcomings in keeping impaired motorists from getting back behind the wheel.

Intoxicated driving third or subsequent offense, filed against more than 11,300 people in Iowa in the past dozen years, is the state's most serious charge for impaired drivers who haven't hurt or killed anyone. The Register found offenders who had been arrested as many as eight times for impaired driving since 2005, but they still faced the "third or subsequent offense" charge. One of the people who faced that charge was 53-year-old Kirk Arnell Thomas of Marshall County, who was sentenced in February 2016 to up to 15 years in prison as a habitual drunken driving offender after his third arrest in less than six years. In fall 2015, Thomas was arrested twice for driving while intoxicated by Marshalltown police. Preliminary breath tests showed Thomas' blood al-

Signs you may be an alcoholic

People who answer "yes" to at least two questions on the so-called CAGE screening test should investigate whether they may be abusing alcohol. The screening test is widely used to determine potential problems with alcohol, according to the National Institute on Alcohol Abuse and Alcoholism. CAGE is an acronym based on key words from each of four questions: cut down, annoyed, guilty and eye-opener.

The questions to ask yourself are: » Have you ever felt you needed to cut down on your drinking?

» Have people annoyed you by criticizing your drinking?

» Have you ever felt guilty about drinking?

» Have you ever felt you needed a drink first thing in the morning (eye-opener) to steady your nerves or to get rid of a hangover?

cohol concentration at nearly three times the legal limit.

Thomas, in a telephone interview, said he has been attending Alcoholics Anonymous meetings and life-skills classes while incarcerated at Iowa's North Central Correctional Facility in Rockwell City.

He said he's lucky he didn't seriously injure or kill someone when he drove drunk.

"There was no good reason for me to be doing that," Thomas said. "But I did it, for some foolish, unknown reason."

Law enforcement officials say something is wrong that people like Thomas can't be kept from behind the wheel of a vehicle after multiple intoxicated driving charges.

“It’s frustrating to me because, one, he shouldn’t have been driving because he had been barred,” said Marshalltown police Lt. Rick Bellile, who arrested Thomas on Oct. 6, 2015, for third-offense drunken driving. Thomas had also been arrested four weeks earlier for drunken driving.

“The problem with our system is that we let these repeat offenders out of jail while they are waiting (for trial), and they go out” and continue to drive while they are intoxicated, Bellile said.

The fact is most people caught driving drunk have done it before, said Kim Brangoccio, manager of UnityPoint Health’s Powell Chemical Dependency Center in Des Moines.

Alcoholism is a “chronic relapsing disease, and although people can get treatment, sometimes they really don’t want to quit,” she said.

Typically, Iowa requires those charged with third-offense intoxicated driving to undergo treatment. Many are sent to community-based residential correctional facilities, which provide substance abuse treatment programs licensed through the Iowa Department of Public Health.

Treatment isn’t always successful, however, particularly if offenders fall back into old habits. “If they get back into similar life situations with the same stressors and the same friend and the same job, they’ll relapse,” Brangoccio said. “Changing just a few things is not enough — you have to really make some significant changes.” People need to understand what causes them to drink, she said. “If the reason you drink has to do with coping or has to do with your inability to deal with your own self-anxiety — if you don’t get help for those things at the same time you’re getting alcohol or drug help, your chance of relapse is very high.”

Searching for a better way

Meanwhile, Iowa continues to look for ways to better address its drunken driving problem, particularly repeat offenders.

Last year, a coalition submitted 66 proposals for reducing impaired driving in the state. One of those has made its way into a bill making its way through Legislature. The proposal would give law enforcement jurisdictions the option of participating in a program requiring some offenders to provide a breath sample twice a day to prove they haven’t been drinking. A similar program in South Dakota called 24-7 requires repeat drunken drivers to take a Breathalyzer test twice a day as part of their bond or parole conditions. Since the program has been in place, arrests for repeat drunken driving have fallen 12 percent, studies have shown. Polk County associate district court Judge Carol Egly wonders whether some drivers must be saved from themselves.

“There are some people that — maybe one should just assume — should not be driving regardless of what they do with their treatment program,” said Egly, whose assignments include presiding over intoxicated driving sentencing. “Maybe we should be identifying those people and making it possible for them not to be using automobiles.”

That idea appeals to Tracy and Pam Baugh, whose teenage son died in a drunken driving crash 11 years ago. Stephens, the driver who killed their son, was arrested Aug. 26, 2016, after a Johnson County sheriff’s deputy saw him swerving “all over” eastbound Interstate Highway 80 in Iowa City, court records show. Stephens “smelled strongly of ingested alcohol.”

Six weeks earlier, Stephens was arrested at Saylorville Lake in Polk County for operating a boat while intoxicated.

A trial is pending in the Polk County case; Stephens pleaded guilty to the Johnson County charge and will be sentenced Monday.

“It’s like how many more lives does it take before they throw the key away,” Pam Baugh said. “Whose life is going to be next?”

DMR: Bondurant community remembers killed family

LINH TA

LTA@DMREG.COM

The community of Bondurant is close-knit.

Most people know each other, or know of each other, residents say.

So when they learned that three of their own were killed, they did what close communities do — they gathered to support one another.

“Because it’s Bondurant, people just come to help each other,” said Samantha Hunter, a 24-yearold from the town.

Outside Bondurant-Farrar High School, people cried and embraced during a vigil to remember Mark, Charla and Tawni Nicholson.

In a circle around the flagpole, people stood shoulder-to-shoulder with candles flickering against the night sky.

It was 9:30 p.m. Thursday when Polk County deputies went to the Nicholsons’ home to conduct a welfare check. There, they found the bodies of Mark Alan Nicholson, 58, Charla Lee Nicholson, 56, and their daughter Tawni Alexis Nicholson, 24.

Chase Marcus Nicholson, 20, is currently in Polk County Jail on a valid material witness warrant, according to a news release. He is being held on a $2 million cash-only bond. He is the son of Mark and Charla, and is Tawni’s brother.

Hunter and Lindsay Schaper, 24, went to Bondurant- Farrar High School with Tawni.

They also roomed together at Iowa State University, where she graduated in August.

“She was just a ray of sunshine,” Schaper said. “She always had open arms for everybody.”

When they learned both she and her parents were killed, they were shocked.

It’s something that doesn’t happen in the town of about 5,000 people.

“It’s one of those things you can’t believe that happened here,” Hunter said. “They treated you like you were a part of their family.” As Chase Nicholson sits in Polk County Jail, additional charges in relation to the case are possible, according to law enforcement.

But as the community mourned together outside, Jeff Sanderson, pastor at the Federated Church of Bondurant, addressed them. He reminded them of one thing — that in the afterlife, anything is possible.

“I pray that we have the opportunity to watch a mother, a father, a daughter and son embrace.”

DMR: KUTCHER: ‘I ALMOST OWE EVERYTHING OF WHO I AM’ TO IOWA

Actor in W.D.M. to get award for 'good character'

MATTHEW LEIMKUEHLER

MLEIMKUEHLER@DMREG.COM

Ashton Kutcher left Iowa wanting to escape the small towns and endless farmland that surrounds each.

Now, a worldwide success at age 39 and a father of two, he seems pretty happy to be home.

"I left Iowa wanting to get out of Iowa, and the older I get the more I want to come home," he said in an exclusive interview with the Register Saturday evening. "In part, because the more places I go, the more I realize how great it is here, and the more I realize that I almost owe everything of who I am to where I come from."

The eastern Iowa-raised Hollywood superstar appeared at the Ron Pearson Center in West Des Moines Saturday night to receive the Robert D. Ray Pillar of Character Award, an annual honor given by Drake University to "individuals who demonstrate good character as a role model." Outside of acting, Kutcher, 39, is known for multiple philanthropic efforts, including cofounding (alongside Dallas Clark) the Iowa disaster relief organization The Native Fund and Thorn: Digital Defends of Children, which uses technology to combat sexual exploitation of children.

"I think the one thing that you realize the minute you become a parent is that character is the one thing you can give them as a parent," he said. "You can actually, materially impact that ... and then everything else becomes their choice."

The "That '70s Show" and "The Ranch" star was born in Cedar Rapids and went to high school in Homestead; he made his West Des Moines appearance alongside wife and fellow star Mila Kunis. Kutcher's mother, Diane Portwood, and her spouse, Mark, as well as his father Larry and his spouse, Colleen, were also in town to see one of Iowa's most celebrated bring home the award.

On fatherhood, Kutcher said there are three Iowan values that impact how he raises his children: A general kindness, always keeping your word and showing good work ethic. Kutcher and Kunis welcomed their second child, a son, Dimitri Portwood Kutcher, into the world last November. The couple became parents to a girl, Wyatt Isabelle Kutcher, in 2014.

"There's an earnestness and an honest-ness here that lacks in a lot of other places in the world," Kutcher said. "People aren't afraid to work and aren't afraid to work really hard. They understand that working hard actually gets you there."

That earnestness was on display Thursday when Kutcher and Kunis surprised students at Oskaloosa High School. When addressing the students, he delivered a short, galvanizing message: "Just because you're a kid from Iowa, don't think you can't have big dreams."

It wasn't his first time impacting Iowa schools: In 2016 he surprised teachers in more than 100 Iowa schools by fully funding every Donors Choose.org project open in the state on that day. DonorsChoose is an online crowdfunding platform teachers use to finance classroom needs. Kutcher said he wanted to let the students know that you can build "the next great thing," no matter where you're from.

"What I suggested to those kids is (that) they don't limit the scope of their pursuits to the things that see that already exist," he said.

Kutcher received the Pillar of Character award in part due to the launch of The Native Fund, which works primary in disaster relief for lowans. Kutcher said he could see the locally- based non-profit extend the model in place to other states and more causes.

First, he said, the organization must continue to grow capital. After that could come expansion into new regions and different causes.

“For us right now, it’s about raising a significant reserve capital fund for disaster relief,” Kutcher said. “And then really identifying for ourselves what constitutes disaster relief. Who actually needs disaster relief? And how do (we) build this so it’s not some wonky entitlement plan that grows and gets sloppy? ... This is all about helping people. It’s not about doing for people.”

The discussion wasn’t completely dominated by Kutcher’s character and philanthropic efforts; when asked about the Hawkeyes’ football prospects in the fall, he smiled and laughed.

“That’s a set-up,” he laughed. “I know a set-up when I see one.”

Notables intended for the “All Star Evening” featuring Kutcher and Kunis included Gov. Terry Branstad, Lt. Gov. Kim Reynolds, Super Bowl-winning former NFL tight end Dallas Clark, Drake University president Marty Martin and “The Bachelor” alum Chris Soules, a news release said. Past recipients for the award include Hayden Fry, Fred Hoiberg and Shawn Johnson.

DMR: Chinese media take interest in D.M.-based Jasper Winery

While Chinese President Xi Jinping’s first meeting with President Donald Trump has made headlines for the potential implications to trade and international relations, it has also sent reporters looking for off-the-beaten-path stories about the two nations.

That’s what recently led CGTN, China’s state-owned 24-hour English Language TV network, to a winery in Des Moines.

CGTN this week published a feature about Jasper Winery, highlighting the deep economic and political ties between Iowa and China and the growing interest from Hawkeye State companies to do business in the world’s most populous country.

Mason Groban, head winemaker at Jasper said the TV spot could help the small, Des Moines-based winery gain a larger foothold in China.

“If you understand the Chinese consumer, a story like this can be pretty significant,” he said.

The ties between Iowa and China, and specifically those between Gov. Terry Branstad and Xi, who have called each other “old friends,” are well-documented and widely celebrated.

In 1985, Xi visited Iowa on an agricultural research trip and met Branstad for the first time. The two leaders met again in 2011 during a gubernatorial trade mission to China.

In 2012, Xi returned to Iowa, for a farm tour, agricultural forum and state dinner, where he and Branstad toasted with wine from Jasper.

In December, Trump appointed Branstad ambassador to China, noting his deep ties to China and Xi. Branstad is yet to be confirmed.

CGTN toured Jasper’s vineyard and winery and then visited Muscatine, where Xi stayed as a young agricultural researcher.

The network also asked Iowa Republican Party Chair Jeff Kaufmann about the tension between Iowa's dependence on exports to China and the state's support for Trump, who has promised to get tough on China, stoking fears of a potential trade war.

"Hopefully, we can find a policy that fits our interests but at the same time doesn't alienate any economic opportunities we have with China," Kauffman told CGTN.

China Daily, a state-owned English-language newspaper, also recently featured the state in a front-page story titled "Iowa hopes to ramp up trade with China."

Jasper Winery has been eyeing the Chinese market ever since the toast between Xi and Branstad. The winery hired The China Iowa Group, a West Des Moines-based trade consulting firm, to help clear regulatory and political hurdles needed to sell wine in China.

In 2015, Jasper made its first shipment, selling about 1,000 bottles in China.

"They don't have a lot of spare capacity, but we sold as much as we could get our hands on," said Li Zhao, founder of the China Iowa Group.

Chinese consumers have a taste for wines from Napa and other well-known grape-growing regions, but few Iowa wines have made it into the market, Li said.

Groban, the winemaker, hopes the CGTN feature, as well as Branstad's pending ambassadorship, open the door to more exports. "Initially, we were just getting our feet wet in the market," he said. "We would love to export more and we definitely have the capacity to ramp up production."

China Iowa Group and LS2group form partnership

The China Iowa Group, meanwhile, recently announced a partnership with LS2group, another Des Moines-area consulting firm. The two firms said they plan to work together to help U.S. companies sell products in China and facilitate the Chinese investment in the U.S.

LS2group will focus on government affairs, lobbying for policies, like those that would allow U.S. eggs, beef and other products to be imported to China. China Iowa Group will focus on finding markets for U.S. products in China and facilitating Chinese investment in the U.S. "It's a perfect relationship because our skill sets complement each other well," said Chuck Larson, a partner with LS2group, and a former state senator and U.S. Ambassador to Latvia.

DMR: COMING OUT CONSERVATIVE

Chadwick Moore was an openly gay socialist at the University of Iowa. Now he's a pariah among New York liberals

For Chadwick Moore, admitting he was a gay man to his "Fox News-watching, gun-toting Republican" dad in Iowa was a breeze compared to coming out as a conservative this year to his liberal friends in New York.

This is the 33-year-old University of Iowa alumnus whose Out Magazine profile of former Breitbart News provocateur and "Internet super villain" Milo Yiannopoulos inspired such outcry against Moore that it made him realize he had been living a lie: He now has more in common with the GOP.

He has been lambasted as a "fake conservative" and "attention whore" on social media. But he insists that his ideological shift was glacial and gradual, not sudden and opportunistic. Even in high school, Moore said, his senior AP English thesis was an argument against hate-crime legislation based on constitutional grounds. "I'm not, like, an establishment Republican," he said. "I'm still very much the person I've always been. And I've never registered as a Democrat for that reason."

His world was simpler and more neatly defined in 2001, when Moore was a high school graduate en route to his freshman year at the University of Iowa in Iowa City. He rode shotgun in his father's pickup truck.

On the verge of dropping off his son into a teeming throng of 29,000 restless young coeds, Moore's father, Gary, finally broached the topic.

Well, his dad said, your sister told me something about you.

Moore had an inkling of what was next: Oh yeah?

She told me that you're gay. Is that true?

Moore's stomach suddenly was in knots. He already had come out to his liberal mom a few years earlier, with no problem. His parents are divorced; she lives in Nashville. But he was a little more daunted by his dad: a macho, cigarchomping accountant, farmer and hunter in Oskaloosa.

Moore braced himself and answered: Yeah, it's true. Gary was quiet for a minute. Finally, he responded: Well, I guess I'm going to have to tell your boyfriends what I tell your sister's boyfriends.

Moore, still apprehensive, suddenly was intensely curious: What's that?

If you hurt my son

I'll... To complete that sentence no doubt would offend some of you. Suffice it to say that Gary, to quote Iowa Sen. Joni Ernst, was ready to "make 'em squeal" in defense of his son. Moore thanked his dad profusely for the sweetly protective sentiment.

That tender moment, if a bit raw, was a bridge between a father and son who, at the time, stood on opposite ends of the political spectrum.

Once ensconced at the U of I, Moore "became an immediate socialist," he said. He marched and protested his way through college while decked out in a garish wardrobe of thrift store castoffs.

All the while, the identity crisis that seethed within Moore was not hormonal. It was ideological.

"Some people experiment with their sexuality in college," he said. "I experimented with farleft politics."

'Alienated and frightened'

Moore now lives in another liberal enclave — the Williamsburg neighborhood of Brooklyn, New York. He has long since set aside his college dreams of becoming a fiction writer to establish himself as a legitimate working journalist.

His profile of Yiannopoulos was posted Sept.

21 in the publication catering to the LGBT community that serves an audience of a couple hundred thousand readers, on the eve of the bitter presidential election. The Breitbart editor had become a notorious figure thanks to his loud mouth and the rampant protests over his speeches on college campuses.

(This was before Yiannopoulos resigned from Breitbart in reaction to the firestorm spurred by his comments that appeared to condone pedophilia.) Moore faced instant backlash from friends and strangers alike.

His editors went so far as to preface the profile with a lengthy disclaimer to distance themselves from Yiannopoulos' views while simultaneously decrying "social media tribalism," where "the mere act of covering a contentious person can be misrepresented as an endorsement."

Moore kept getting the cold shoulder at his local gay bar. Good friends stopped calling.

He had become a pariah.

"The gay community has been my entire life since I was 15," he said.

"And I love the gay community. I love gay culture. I love drag queens.

I love gay bars. It's been my everything, and now all that's gone. So, yeah, it's sad. I'm mourning the loss of that."

Fed up with all the backlash, Moore in February wrote a manifesto of sorts in the New York Post: "I'm a gay New Yorker — and I'm coming out as conservative." He criticized President Donald Trump for his travel ban and cabinet choices. But mostly the article served as a kiss-off to the left wing that had counted him as one of their own. "All I had done was write a balanced story on an outspoken Trump supporter for a liberal, gay magazine," he said, "and now I was being attacked. I felt alienated and frightened." "It can seem like liberals are actually against free speech if it fails to conform with the way they think," he added.

"And I don't want to be a part of that club anymore."

'It seems like if you choose a side, you're ostracized'

Among those shocked by Moore's conservative coming out were two of his best friends and college classmates, a pair of women from Iowa. Kat Durst, raised in Ottumwa and Davenport, met Moore on their first day in the college dorm, not long after the pivotal scene in the pickup truck with his father. Today, she's a 34-year-old real estate agent. She and her husband, a physician, are raising two kids, 3 and 5, in Gainesville, Florida. Moore was a bridesmaid in her 2010 wedding.

As Moore tangles with critics on Twitter, Durst fills her Facebook feed with liberal commentary fully in keeping with her former undergraduate self. Durst can't take the leap from Democratic socialist to conservatism with her friend, but that doesn't matter to her.

"Even the things that I thought he thought in college... He doesn't owe that to me — to still think that — or owe it to anyone," she said. A third friend entered their circle at the U of I when Haley Niichel spotted Moore in a computer lab clad in a white T-shirt, tight jeans and blue bandanna. She grew up in Orange City, the conservative stronghold of northwest Iowa. This was the first gay person she was aware of meeting.

Moore "knows how to kind of step on a nerve," said Niichel, who now lives in West Des Moines. "He has that innate sense of going in for the kill.

But I think he makes liberals really think about what they're fighting for."

Her job as a mortgage underwriter, as Niichel puts it, is to "document logic." She wonders whether that helps make her more of a libertarian who falls on the political spectrum somewhere between her two friends.

"It seems like if you choose a side, you're ostracized by the other side," she said. "If you're not super liberal, you're a Republican in the liberals' eyes. If you're not actively going to all these protests — in an aggressive, gnashing way — it's not enough for them.”

Are we building bridges or silos?

Moore's paternal family roots in Iowa predate the Civil War. He was born in Tennessee and raised in Illinois.

I wouldn't be surprised if he ends up writing his gay, Midwestern variation on J.D. Vance's "Hillbilly Elegy," a New York Times best-selling account of the author's roots in white workingclass Appalachia that has been embraced as a guide to the rural disaffection that helped Trump win the White House.

"I've always known these people," Moore said of his conservative Midwestern friends and family. "I've always liked these people." Moore's dad said that he and his son always have been close and have shared quality political discussions.

"I probably disagree with everybody on certain things," Gary said.

"Talk to me. I will listen.

But don't try to be overbearing and convince me that you're right unless you can really have some facts to prove it." Perhaps surprisingly, Moore in the recent election voted for Hillary Clinton — not Trump. He called it a "pre-emptive defense" against criticism from his liberal neighbors, when he still was worried about mending fences.

Moore's dilemma made me seek out one of Iowa's most prominent, stalwart gay activists: Donna Red Wing. She has fought for decades for gay rights. She's married to a woman. She recently stepped down as director of LGBTQ-advocacy group One Iowa and now directs the Eychaner Foundation that awards its own Matthew Shepard Scholarships.

Red Wing made headlines in recent years by partnering with somebody perceived as her nemesis: Bob Vander Plaats, whose Family Leader pushes the "family values" cause of evangelical conservatives and led the fight against same-sex marriage in Iowa. The unlikely pair turned their private coffee conversations into a public series of dialogues to make a point about the desperate need for civility in our polarized politics.

If not to the extent of Moore, both of them weathered criticism from their respective political camps for breaking bread with the "enemy." But Red Wing considers herself "old and cranky enough" that she's "tired of always making it one side or the other."

"Are we living in this community," she said, "or are we just building silos and living by ourselves?"

She added, "Our sexual orientation and gender identity really have little to do with where we are, in terms of being progressive and conservative."

Not that Red Wing is on the same page as Moore when it comes to Trump. He sees the president as opening up the GOP to new, more diverse voices. He sees the president's trolling of the media and his rivals as a necessary gambit to wrangle with entrenched forces.

"The most powerful institutions in our society are all toting the same narrative," he said, "and they're all left-leaning."

Red Wing, however, sees Trump promoting intolerance. She worries that his actions hampering, say, immigrants and Muslims all too easily may spread to the gay community, or already have through far-right forces grown more powerful in various courts and state and local offices.

I don't have easy answers about when to stand up and shout in protest versus when to sit quietly and talk, extending an olive branch.

Both civility and protest, if we can apply them at the proper times, are crucial to our democracy. I do know that Moore shouldn't have been spurned for writing his original profile of Yiannopoulos when he was simply doing his job as a journalist. Because Red Wing's words echo in my head: Are we living in this community, or are we just building silos and living by ourselves?

As Gary put it, "I don't know if there's ever going to be an answer" to our polarized politics.

"All I can say is I hope people will listen."

If nothing else, Moore as an outed conservative has a lot more to discuss politically with his dad and his other Republican relatives in Iowa. "If Trump does a good job," he said, "I'll be very excited to vote for him in four years." That may not be a rhetorical bomb on par with Yiannopoulos.

But it still won't play very well in Brooklyn.

DMR Editorial: State and federal forfeiture reforms fall short

Civil libertarians and small-government conservatives agree: The government should not be allowed to seize the assets of law-abiding citizens.

Yet, for the past 30 years, state and federal officials have done exactly that, wrapping the practice in the bulletproof vest of "law enforcement." The officials argue that they are keeping our streets safe by laying claim to the cash, cars and real estate belonging to individuals whose only "crime," assuming one was even committed, was a minor traffic offense or drug-possession rap. In 2013, two California men driving home after a gambling tournament in Illinois had their $100,000 bankroll seized after an Iowa police officer pulled them over for failing to signal a lane change on Interstate 80 in Poweshiek County. Authorities eventually gave back $90,000 of the money, but after the men sued, the state was forced to pay the men an additional $60,000 just to settle their case.

Such abuses are numerous and well-documented, but state and federal lawmakers have been slow to enact reforms for fear of being perceived as soft on crime. But changes are in the works.

Under a bill approved late last month by the Iowa Senate, prosecutors would have to convict a suspected offender of illegal activity before seizing any property that's valued at less than $5,000, and that property will have to be linked to the charged criminal activity.

The intent is to keep the police from shaking clean the pockets of motorists. You might not think such a law would be necessary, but it is.

Last year, there were 822 cases of cash forfeiture made in Iowa under state law, for a total of $2.6 million. Individually, none of these cases involved more than $15,000, and only eight cases involved assets worth $5,000 to $15,000.

The average value of a cash forfeiture was just $3,217. So we're not talking about cartel-caliber drug kingpins here.

In fact, the police are only too happy to seize sofa-cushion money. No amount of money seems too small. In one 2015 case, Iowa authorities seized $13 from an individual and claimed it as their own. That's one reason why the bill approved by the Senate zeroes in on amounts of less than $5,000. But of course the argument could be made that this limit preserves the profit motive for police and prosecutors to pursue high-dollar assets.

Fortunately, the Senate bill, which has to be approved by the House, would also raise the standard of proof in forfeiture cases so police and prosecutors would have to present “clear and convincing evidence” that the assets are tied to criminal activity. There’s also a proportionality test that says the assets seized cannot be “grossly disproportionate to the severity of the offense,” which should help ensure that Iowa police aren’t seizing six-figure sums from people who have been convicted of only minor offenses.

The legislation also requires law enforcement agencies to maintain certain records related to asset forfeiture, so lawmakers — and the public — will know if the abuses are continuing.

Even so, this bill is far from perfect. It does nothing to redirect assets away from the police and prosecutors who initiate property seizures, so they can continue to use the process not to enhance public safety but to enhance their own budgets. The bill also says that while police agencies will be required to keep detailed, publicly accessible records of property seizures, these “records shall not identify or enable identification of the individual officer who seized any item of property.” That provision would make it impossible to determine whether any abuses can be traced to one rogue law enforcement officer.

Even if the Senate bill becomes law, it will do nothing to address the larger problem of civil forfeitures initiated by federal authorities. On March 29, the inspector general of the U.S. Department of Justice released a report that details the manner in which the agency has failed to evaluate its own forfeiture data to determine the extent to which these property seizures benefit law enforcement and threaten civil liberties.

The report makes a series of recommendations for improvement, all of which are long overdue. The most urgent is the call to ensure that the DOJ’s state and local task-force officers are adequately trained on federal forfeiture laws.

A newly introduced, GOP-sponsored bill in the U.S. Senate, dubbed the Fifth Amendment Integrity Restoration Act, would help end some of the abuses. It would shift the burden of proof in forfeiture cases to the government; it would provide for indigent defense in all such cases; and it would eliminate the profit motive altogether by steering the proceeds away from police agencies and into the U.S. Treasury. It’s almost identical to a bill first proposed in 2014, but now, at least, it is being given serious consideration by Congress.

These state and federal initiatives represent progress, but they also underscore the fact that when it comes to civil forfeiture, much work remains to be done.

DMR: Did city councilman’s opposition to a pork plant lead to suicide?

The brief life and premature death of a dynamic Iowa politician provokes hard questions

“(One) can easily wreck in a day or two what builders have taken years to do.”

— verse from a poem Mason City Mayor Eric Bookmeyer sent to City Councilman Alex Kuhn

“ There won’t be any bullies to burden your way.

No words that cut like a knife at the end of the day.”

— verse from a poem to Alex Kuhn from his father, Mark, after his son’s death

MASON CITY, Ia. — An overflow crowd turned out for a City Council meeting last May 3 in anticipation of a final vote for construction of a $240 million, 600,000-square-foot pork-processing plant on Mason

City's southwest side. Processing up to 10,000 pigs a day, it would be the state's second- largest of its kind.

State and local officials stood ready to welcome it with generous subsidies. Realtor Dick Mathes addressed the council in favor, citing job losses and Prestage Foods' promise to add up to 2,000 jobs in four years. But the 14 supporters there to speak were outnumbered by 47 opponents, who voiced concern over the plant's potential impact on health, the environment and the community, especially if a concentration of hog confinements followed.

One young man, Dylan Daniels, handed the council a petition he said had nearly 1,000 signatures opposing the plant. "The council is still ignoring the way the majority of citizens feel," he said.

He spoke prematurely. It turned out to be a fateful night for Prestage and its proponents, who had considered passage a done deal: The vote tied at 3-3, effectively killing the proposal.

It was also, some believe, a fateful night for a popular 34-year-old at-large city councilman named Alex Kuhn, who had been heavily courted by proponents and opponents. After much research and questioning, Kuhn was not convinced that the city was getting a good deal for its investment. Unbeknownst to him and everyone else, his hesitation had paved the way for the other two "no" votes.

Two months later, Kuhn shot and killed himself, after his friends and family say he was pressured and blamed for the outcome. Once heralded by people from both parties as destined to go far in politics, praised for his compassion and commitment to the underrepresented as well as to economic development, Kuhn now found himself an outcast among the city's powerful. He became a casualty of the divisive, high-pressured, back-biting political environment.

A promising future

With his youthful good looks, intelligence, political pedigree and knack for getting along with everyone, Alex Kuhn was often likened to a young John Kennedy. He grew up around both politics and farming, having clerked for his father, a former Democratic state representative now on the Floyd County Board of Supervisors, and helped on the family's 850-acre farm in Charles City, southeast of Mason City. After graduating from high school there in 2000 and Iowa State University in 2004, he went to Houston, Texas, to student-teach. But when his father was injured the following year in a farming accident, Alex returned to help.

"He'd get up early in the morning and load corn all day," says his mother, Denise Kuhn. "At night he would do exercises with his dad. He took him to physical therapy."

In 2006, Alex went to work for U.S. Sen. Tom Harkin, directing his mobile office from Des Moines. He moved in 2008 to Mason City, where his ex-wife's family lived, where he taught and did community organizing for United Way. He got elected to the Mason City City Council in 2011. Although a Democrat, he had support from many Republicans, says a Republican friend, Todd Blodgett. "His purpose was to defend people who couldn't defend themselves."

Blodgett introduced me to a man of modest means named Jim Burgess, who previously lived in a rental home where he had awoken daily to the sounds of mice nibbling his food. The landlord's response, Burgess says, was to advise him to get cheese from the local food bank and put it out for the mice. Then Kuhn came by, saw the situation and not only worked to resolve it but also sponsored an ordinance targeting problem landlords, Burgess said.

Nearly all of the 20 people I interviewed said Kuhn was the last person they'd expect to take his own life. But his parents and others who spoke to him before his death also noted his deep distress at the furor that erupted around him after the Prestage Foods deal collapsed.

Mark Kuhn is driven to speak because of a Dec. 18, 2016, front-page story in the Mason City Globe-Gazette, which attributed Alex's suicide to an ongoing struggle with depression. True, Alex had dealt with the fallout from a divorce and co-parenting his two young sons. He had at times seen a therapist and taken anxiety medication, but had no history of depression, his parents say. They say despite their disclosures to the newspaper about Alex being taunted and blamed for his vote, the writer chose to build a narrative around depression, enabling those who had hurt Alex to turn his suffering back on him. Now Mark Kuhn wants to give Alex a voice.

The failure of the Prestage deal inflamed politicians, agribusinesses, local business boosters and government economic development folks, Mark Kuhn says. But it was the wrath of those Alex considered his friends, particularly the mayor, that really hurt him.

Blodgett agrees, saying, "The mayor bullied Alex relentlessly."

"I certainly reject the accusation," responded Mayor Eric Bookmeyer. "Did we have frank conversations? Sure." But "I know that Alex had a lot of other stuff going on in his life. I don't believe under any circumstances that it was just one thing."

Debate divides the town

The Prestage plant was the biggest economic development prospect Mason City residents can remember. It had the vocal support and lobbying of the governor, the mayor and state and local economic development officials.

But as with anything involving hogs in Iowa, the proposal sparked controversy.

"If this processing plant is so good, why not put it in West Des Moines?" bristled state Rep. Sharon Steckman, a Democrat who represents Mason City, in an interview with me last May.

Bookmeyer, in an interview, called farming "our lifeblood," and said he saw an opportunity to help the city grow and use water and sewer systems that taxpayers were already paying for.

Mark Kuhn points out that farming was Alex's lifeblood, too. Both father and son became embroiled in the debate over Big Pork during their political careers. Mark Kuhn was in the Legislature in the 1990s when Gov. Terry Branstad and the Republican majority took actions to prevent neighbors of hog confinements from suing for nuisance and stripped localities of a final say on where confinements were placed. Kuhn was also in the Legislature in 2001 under Democratic Gov. Tom Vilsack, when lawmakers commissioned a study of proposed air pollution rules, which 27 state university scientists spent two years studying and signing off on. Yet repeatedly, in 2003 and 2008 (then under Gov. Chet Culver), the rules were voided by a legislative majority and sent back for further study to satisfy lobbyists, Kuhn says.

Prestage's interest in Mason City first became known to the mayor when state economic development officials contacted Chad Shreck, who heads the North Iowa Corridor Economic Development, on Dec. 17, 2015. Prestage officials arrived the next day. The mayor was excited. "This was not your everyday, average project," Bookmeyer said.

But the mayor doesn't get to vote. So after meeting company representatives, he called council members in a few at a time to rally them in favor, without revealing Prestage's name. Kuhn spotted it in February in the city manager's folder. As mayor pro tem, Kuhn was the first to be called in, along with Councilman Travis Hickey, who is also on the North Iowa Corridor board.

In February, the city's planning and zoning commission rezoned the area from farming to heavy industrial. Secrecy surrounding the move angered some residents, who later accused the council of flouting democracy and ramming the plant through without an independent environmental impact study.

Branstad and Prestage leaders went to Mason City in March to announce the plan, and the Iowa Economic Development Board voted to issue $34 million in general obligation bonds to support it. After a six-hour meeting April 5, the council voted unanimously to set the terms for a development agreement. But Kuhn had reservations about them. He didn't necessarily oppose Prestage, people close to him say, but didn't think the city should give it a 50 percent tax abatement. And he was wary of the city offering $15.5 million in tax-increment financing. Kuhn cited reports showing a 50 percent turnover in meat processing. He wanted to require a $13-per-hour minimum wage, along with a 2.5-mile buffer zone preventing hog confinements around Mason City and Clear Lake.

"I didn't feel it was the role of local government to put that stuff in," Bookmeyer says, but he says he and city staff worked to accommodate Kuhn's concerns. Prestage committed $1.4 million to Mason City schools over 10 years to help accommodate the expected influx of employees' children, including English-language learners.

On April 21, after a seven-hour meeting, Kuhn broke ranks with the five other council members to vote no on the agreement, noting Prestage had lowered its estimate of the number of hires to 1,772, split in two phases. He brought up odors from rendering, the cost of improvements to the water utility and the fact that Prestage hadn't promised to hire local farmers for feeding operations. And in reference to the hourly wages, he asked, "Does the industry deserve incentives for these kind of wages? Why do we have to give $15.5 million to get it? I'm not going to vote for a development agreement at any cost." After the meeting, a local pork producer accosted Kuhn, accusing him of putting his career before the community, Mark Kuhn said.

On the day of the final vote, May 3, it was learned that Prestage's planned contribution to the schools fell short of meeting needs. Just before casting their votes, two other council members, John Lee and Bill Schickel, announced they were voting no. Everyone was shocked when the proposal failed, including Kuhn, several people say. Schreck says Kuhn had told him, "'There are five votes and you don't need me.'" Gary Schmit, Kuhn's boss at Henkel Construction, said, "He was hoping they would come back with answers."

Reaction spreads beyond Mason City

Opponents celebrated, but the governor told a press conference the City Council made a mistake. Ron Prestage, a principal in the company, blamed racism, and City Councilwoman Janet Solberg agreed. Iowa Economic Development Authority Director Debi Durham warned that Mason City would now be less attractive to site selectors.

Iowa Pork Producers Association CEO Pat McGonegle called it "a vote against agriculture" in the May 2016 Iowa Pork Producer newsletter. In the same issue, Kirk Leeds, CEO of the Iowa Soybean Association, declared that when leadership was needed, "a few elected officials ... apparently caved to a group of activists opposed to livestock production and Iowa agriculture."

The Globe-Gazette, which had editorially supported the project, lamented the "negative light" cast on the community and asked whether new information would change Kuhn's mind.

And Rick Mathes, a local Realtor with his father, Dick, and a Prestage booster on the city's planning and zoning commission, sent out a mass email declaring, "Prestage Blindsided." He organized a petition drive for a revote, and according to Mark Kuhn, would turn up at Alex's office to show him the names of important people who had signed it.

Mathes has since moved to Michigan, after concluding Mason City's future is bleak. He acknowledged lobbying Kuhn in weekly visits but called the idea of harassment "ludicrous."

The local chamber of commerce hosted a closed-door meeting June 2 hoping to resurrect the deal. Schickel was said to be reconsidering his vote, but Kuhn remained unsatisfied with the terms, according to his friend Jodi Draper and others. "Alex wasn't against Prestage. He was against the process," she said.

On June 2, Prestage announced it was no longer interested in Mason City. In a written statement, it blamed misinformation for the vote.

Still, even after Prestage pulled out, Kuhn approached Schreck, the economic development director, wondering if there was a chance of continued negotiations. But Schreck said the company felt there was "too much animosity" toward it.

"He was made to feel he let people down," says Denise Kuhn, Alex's mother.

It's unclear whether the pressures Kuhn felt included fears the vote would affect his job at Henkel Construction. Schmit says Henkel probably was too small to have a role in the Prestage project, but Bookmeyer says the company might have benefited from side contracts. While Blodgett and others say Kuhn did fear for his job, Schmit insists: "There was no pressure at all on Alex from me."

A friendship strained

Alex Kuhn and the mayor had been so close, Bookmeyer says, that Kuhn had the code to his garage door, and stopped by regularly for a craft beer and a chat. "We were like brothers."

Mark Kuhn says his son had received frequent emails and text messages from the mayor's private email address. But "after the first no vote, he shunned Alex," Kuhn said. "Alex said, 'He shut me out.' " "We didn't communicate much," Bookmeyer acknowledged in an interview in February 2017. "He certainly knew I was disappointed." On May 11, Alex Kuhn got a call from the mayor that lasted 51 minutes. Mark Kuhn learned that from getting Alex's cellphone records after his death. The next day, Bookmeyer sent Alex an email from a private account that Mark later found, under the subject line, "So...?" It said: "AK, It is time to find out if you can lead or not." That was followed by a poem, "A Builder or a Wrecker?" containing the lines, "I can easily wreck in a day or two what builders have taken years to do." It referred to a wrecker "who walks to town, content with the labor of tearing down."

Asked about that, Bookmeyer said, "The point was, let's not lend voice to folks who don't have our interests in mind."

His message to Kuhn went on: "One ill-timed, politically expedient vote and commentary set off an amazing set of events. We talked about the repercussions yesterday but maybe you should read it for yourself."

Attached was an email from California developer Philip Chodur to City Administrator Brent Trout. Chodur was planning to develop a hotel as part of a downtown redevelopment project, but claimed the failed Prestage plan would make it harder to get financing and as a result, he was scrapping plans to add a floor.

However, even Councilman Hickey, who was at odds with Kuhn over Prestage, believes Chodur was using Prestage as an excuse for his failure to get financing.

Family and friends say in the last weeks of his life, Kuhn's mood grew darker and he rarely went out. He told his father he wasn't attending City Council meetings in person to avoid seeing Bookmeyer and Hickey. He also stayed away from Democratic functions, says John Stone, the Cerro Gordo County Democratic Party chairman. Kuhn told Stone the mayor was very mad at him.

"Alex wanted to be friends with everyone and help everyone," Stone said. "I would have attacked back. A lot of people would have."

Scott Tornquist, a former Mason City City Council member who left last May during his third term, visited Mason City last June 29, and saw Alex Kuhn two weeks before his death. What most struck Tornquist was Kuhn saying he was grateful that Hy-Vee delivered groceries because he didn't want to be out in public running into people. "That was so diametrically opposite to who he was."

"For one and a half hours, he just unloaded," Tornquist said. "...He said he was catching unbelievable heat and pressure from both Eric (the mayor) and from Travis Hickey."

On July 5, Prestage announced it was going to locate outside Eagle Grove. The Mason City council met that night, with Kuhn participating by phone. Hickey singled him out in remarks when the council voted unanimously to grant Chodur an extension on the downtown hotel project. Noting Kuhn had been the council member most in contact with Chodur, he suggested a conflict of interest since Alex's employer, Henkel Construction, could get a contract for part of the downtown development project.

Blodgett last saw Kuhn 10 or 12 days before his July 15 death. He said during the last two months of his life, Alex made half a dozen stops at the Outing Club, a posh, members-only club near Clear Lake partly owned by Blodgett's family and frequented by Republicans. On the last two visits, he was more distraught than Blodgett had ever seen him.

"He said he was having a hard time accepting, and dealing with ... the way some people were showing such malice toward him," Blodgett said. "He said his life wasn't fun and he found it hard to get up in the mornings."

A week before Kuhn's death, Jodi Draper, who had made an unsuccessful run for city council in 2013, said Kuhn called her and asked if she had considered running again, for the at-large seat. "I said, 'Nobody's going to beat you.'" Now she believes he was already planning to end his life.

"The guilt I feel from that couldn't possibly be put into words," she said choking up. "You wish you could turn back time."

Both Tornquist and Draper had had their own run-ins with the mayor. Draper said she campaigned on giving voice to city employees, to whom she claimed Bookmeyer "was sometimes very mean and rude." At least one city employee filed a hostile work environment complaint against Bookmeyer, the Globe-Gazette reported in 2010. And North Iowa Today reported in 2014 that a lawsuit against the mayor and city council by Lionel Foster, the former director of the city's Human Rights agency, resulted in a $240,000 settlement. Foster alleged race and age discrimination and retaliation for his civil rights investigations. One of his claims was that Bookmeyer had refused to reappoint three of his commissioners, telling one, a woman, that he wanted younger commissioners with fresher perspectives.

Tornquist said he too felt pushed "to the brink" in his council position, and like Kuhn had thoughts of ending his own life. He said on one occasion, Bookmeyer put him on a committee to look at the future of the city sanitation department, and Tornquist felt he "stacked the deck to get the outcome he wanted," to keep the budget down. Then he learned the press and public were excluded. After more incidents, he left for Indianapolis.

"My wife and I were trapped in our own house. We couldn't go out to dinner," said Tornquist, about having to face constituents after being associated with such tactics.

"I think of Alex every day," said Tornquist. "How could I have not seen it? But nobody saw it in me."

Bookmeyer has his defenders. Council member John Lee was one of the three to change his mind at the last minute and vote against Prestage because of the funding shortfall with the schools. But he says, "The mayor never put undue pressure on me or called to say, 'What the hell are you doing?'" Hickey, who says he, like Bookmeyer, felt "let down" by the vote against Prestage, observed, "As a part-time mayor, Eric takes his role very seriously and does a very good job lobbying folks to go in whatever direction he thinks would be good for the community."

Kuhn's last days

On July 12, Mark Kuhn attended Alex's 11-year-old son's Little League game and sat with Alex on the bleachers. "I could tell there was really something wrong," he said of Alex's withdrawn mood. "He believed it was all his fault that the community was so divided. When I told him 'No way, most people in Mason City think you are a hero for standing up for what you believe is a bad deal,' Alex replied, " 'That's not what I hear from some people in the business community I work with.' " The Kuhns later learned from his calendar that Alex had plans to see his counselor on Thursday, July 14, (the counselor declined to answer my calls) and also to meet Hickey. "He woke up on the 14th and the very first thing he did was a Google search on conflict of interest legislation," said Mark Kuhn, referring to the other councilman's accusations.

Hickey says Kuhn showed up unexpectedly at his office that day. There had been tension between them, Hickey acknowledged. "We were on opposite sides. I was frustrated with his vote."

During a previous lunch meeting, Kuhn had expressed dismay at Hickey's allegation but neither mind was changed, Hickey said. But calling Kuhn "one of the nicest guys you'd ever want to meet," he said Alex wasn't angry.

On that day Alex also called his employer to say he wouldn't be attending a scheduled pontoon boat ride with the company that evening, according to a cell phone log of Alex's shared with me by his father. Instead, he stopped by his parent's farm and stayed for dinner, seeming OK but revealing little.

He left early, saying he'd see them the next day. They had weekend plans with his two sons.

At 7:12 p.m. he tried to call the mayor, whom he had also messaged late that morning, according to the phone records. The log didn't show what the text said. Asked about that, Bookmeyer emailed me, "I don't believe we spoke, but I sure wish we would have, to have known where he was in his mind." He said he had last seen Alex in his office a number of days earlier. "He wanted to know how I was," Bookmeyer said. "I told him I need time."

Alex then exchanged some text messages with a woman he had dated. She declined to talk to me, but the Kuhns, who are in touch with her, say she had no prior indication of his plans. Then he repeatedly watched a short compilation of clips from the TV series, "Breaking Bad" that had been posted on YouTube. Called "Jesse Pinkman: Civilian," it involved some emotional encounters between a remorseful young man, Pinkman, and the former chemistry professor he had teamed up with to cook meth, Walter White. At the end, Pinkman held a gun to White's face, and White held a gun to his own forehead, urging Pinkman to kill him. A shot was fired.

Earlier, Pinkman called himself "the bad guy," and told White, "Since I met you, everything I've ever cared about is gone. ... I have never been more alone!"

On July 15, Henkel officials showed up at the Kuhn farm wondering where Alex was, since he hadn't turned up for a presentation related to a hospital expansion project. Denise Kuhn drove over to his place, where Henkel CEO Schmit and another employee also showed up. She told them he wasn't there, but one of them went into Alex's room, she said. After picking up Alex's sons, his mother took a different route home, checking the ditches in case he'd had a car accident.

Back home, she asked Mark to check their guns. He discovered a .22-caliber pistol missing. They called police.

It was around noon when the sheriff and a deputy arrived to say they had found Alex's car and body at the end of a dead-end road near a recreation area north of Marble Rock, which is about halfway between their two homes. An autopsy revealed he died from a bullet fired from the gun taken from his parents' cabinet. There were no drugs or alcohol in his system. He didn't leave a note, and was wearing the same clothes they had last seen him in, leading the Kuhns to believe he never went home the night before.

“We can all say there were times he was pretty upset and down about some things,” said Denise Kuhn. “But I never, ever could have imagined this.”

The aftermath

Former Sen. Harkin gave a eulogy at the funeral. Former state Sen. Jack Hatch, who served alongside Mark Kuhn in the Legislature, dedicated his new book “No Surrender” in part to Alex, saying he showed courage with his vote. “Not everyone agreed with Alex’s principled stand, and he took the brunt of public and private scrutiny,” it reads. “He became depressed and was unable to reconcile the differences.”

At the Kuhns’ behest, Blodgett notified the mayor that he would not be welcome at Alex’s funeral. But Bookmeyer said he attended anyway.

Bookmeyer says he was devastated by Kuhn’s death. Asked if he believed Kuhn was bullied, he referred to Prestage opponents, saying, “We were all bullied.”

Max Weaver, a former Mason City council member, says: “Alex was on the brink. Bookmeyer pushed him over.”

In January, Bookmeyer announced he won’t seek re-election in November. He called 2016 “rough,” and noted Alex Kuhn’s contributions to moving the city forward. Asked why he wasn’t running, Bookmeyer told me he had no further political ambitions, and was ready for a new career. He said Alex knew that was his intent.

Postscript

It would be irresponsible to blame others for someone’s suicide without hearing a cause in the deceased person’s own words. But as Draper, who works in the mental health field, points out, there can be triggers in the same way that smoking can contribute to the risk of cancer.

Everyone has different triggers, and everyone has periods of particular susceptibility to being demeaned, shunned or blamed. We live in an era when gossip, lies and rumors, spread through social media, can swiftly destroy reputations, careers and relationships. Schools and communities are finally focusing on the effects of such bullying on children. But adults are not immune.

People who go into public service to make a difference sometimes find themselves confronting powerful vested interests, and then back away from a fight. Alex Kuhn neither backed away nor wanted a fight. He wanted to do right by everyone: his constituents, his family, his job, colleagues and friends. One of the tragedies of politics is how limited a space there is for that — and how devastating it can be to an idealistic leader to find out.

“He said he was having a hard time accepting, and dealing with ... the way some people were showing such malice toward him. He said his life wasn’t fun and he found it hard to get up in the mornings.”

DMR Iowa View: On abortion, liberals cite science fiction

By: Joel Kurtinitis

The growing tension between moral relativism and scientific absolutism has produced two related effects on the left: a growing rift between liberal politics and the scientific community, and the insecure, blustery hollering of the word “science” by progressives — as if repeating it three times in a mirror will summon Bill Nye in a lab coat to validate their worldview.

There’s laughable irony in liberal attempts to squeeze science into the frock of their relativistic priesthood: Science — real science — is consummately objective. It doesn’t care about your feelings, your politics, your identity, or your faith. Science is observable, testable, repeatable, falsifiable.

Even casual political observers will note that leftists rarely seek — or present — specific evidence to back their claims anymore. Rather, their continual allusion to “science” is only an appeal to authority, whether applied to climate change, vaccines, GMOs or abortion.

Such appeals abound in abortion defense pieces like the March 31 column “Myths like life at conception don’t belong in the law.”

In it, Rekha Basu opines that a prolife legislator “is free to believe whatever she wants as a matter of personal faith. But that doesn’t justify the distortion of scientific fact or the imposition of religious beliefs on the public.”

But life at conception isn’t rooted in abstract notions like faith or values — it’s rooted in basic, high-school biology.

It’s amazing that, after decades of pushing sex ed in classrooms across America, liberals still can’t figure out what pregnancy is.

The article quotes Richard J. Paulson of the American Society for Reproductive Medicine: “Life is a continuum,” Paulson wrote. “The egg cell is alive, and it has the potential to become a zygote (a single-celled embryo)” if fertilized by sperm. The resulting cell is also alive, but “from a biological perspective, no new life has been created, because it is nearly identical to the egg cell.”

There’s some good science in the above statement, but there’s also a lot of nakedly unscientific editorializing and deliberate misdirection.

Is life a continuum? In Mufasa’s Circle of Life sense, sure.

In any meaningful scientific sense, absolutely not.

We are conceived, we grow, we are born, we live, we die. Our physical existence has a definite beginning and end.

Science.

Your body can be distinguished from another person’s body by a unique genetic marker known to us as DNA. Sperm cells and egg cells contain only the respective parent’s DNA. Once a zygote is formed, a new organism (read: new life) with DNA distinct from both parents is present within hours of conception. If DNA can convict a murderer for a crime 50 years ago, it should be ample evidence of a new human life in the womb.

Because science.

This new entity is the earliest stage of human life. Prior to this, all cells involved were parts of the parent. A new genetic signature means a new, developing, genetically human organism, whether it looks “nearly identical to the egg cell” or not.

More science. Anyone — scientist or not — attempting to add ambiguity to this simplest of biological truths has an agenda.

Like maybe, I don't know, making money on reproductive tech, or raking in $127 million in "family planning" profits.

Here's another biological reality: Abortion doesn't "terminate a pregnancy" or "remove the product of conception." It kills developing human beings. That's why Planned Parenthood workers caught in the Center for Medical Progress' 2015 sting operation were shown sorting through refrigerated pans of tiny human arms and legs, discussing organ value.

If you're going to advocate for something so brutal, at least be honest about it and don't hide behind terms like "women's health" or "reproductive rights."

The political left is losing their war on science, because they aren't interested in genuine discovery or progress, only in using it as a cloak to push their own religion — yes, secular humanism is a religion— on those of us who believe every human being is endowed by our creator with an inalienable right to life.

DMR: Grassley pledges to preserve filibuster for legislation

Sen. Chuck Grassley said he doesn't expect any fallout for the future of the U.S. Supreme Court from Senate Republicans' decision to use the "nuclear option."

"It isn't going to change anything whatsoever, because for the first time in the 228-year history of our country, there's a partisan filibuster of a Supreme Court judge. So, this is the first time in 228 years, so if we aren't going to do it anymore, it's not going to be any different than it's been for those 228 years," he said in an interview Thursday.

Got that? In essence, Grassley's saying one bad apple don't spoil the whole bunch, girl.

(But if he actually said that, he'd correct the grammar and credit the Osmond Brothers.

And he wouldn't call me "girl." He's no dummy.) I watched on C-SPAN as history was being made, or unmade, depending on your perspective. Republicans and Democrats alike got up and recited the details of decades-old partisan grudges like a mournful Greek chorus. This isn't one bad apple. The whole barrel is rotten.

I tend to agree with Grassley that this wasn't about Justice Neil Gorsuch, not really.

He's conservative, to be sure.

But Democrats' best efforts to paint him as a corporate shill or heartless ideologue fell flat, in my estimation. He's qualified to serve and his addition to the court does not obviously change the balance that existed before last year's death of Justice Antonin Scalia.

Mostly, this was about Republicans' decision last year to make history by refusing to bring up President Barack Obama's nomination of Judge Merrick Garland. They blamed that on Democrats by inventing the so-called "Biden rule" that never actually delayed any justice's confirmation. It was indeed deplorable, but it worked and is now the standard.

It's all about power and the Republicans have it. So you might think it would follow that Republicans like Grassley don't fear partisan fallout on issues like tax reform or infrastructure because they can also eliminate the filibuster on legislation.

Grassley says no. He said Thursday he just signed a letter being circulated by Sen.

Susan Collins, R-Maine, saying he wouldn't vote to change the 60-vote rule for legislation.

"Because the only significant difference between the House and Senate is that in the House of Representatives, the minority has no rights. As long as the majority sticks together, they can run roughshod over minorities," Grassley said.

Guess he knows from experience what that looks like.

He said it's only happened twice during his 40 years in office that one party has held 60 seats. "If you want minorities to have any voice whatsoever in the legislative process, the only place that can be done is in the United States Senate," he said.

The real power in the nuclear option is the threat of mutually assured destruction. Both parties can imagine they'll eventually be in the minority and will have to live with whatever rules they impose while in the majority.

When it comes to judicial appointments, though, the bombs have already fallen enough times to make the threat seem weak. When a president campaigns on a list of names of potential Supreme Court nominees, as Trump did, there's no expectation of bipartisan support.

Presidents and senators say they want an independent judiciary, but that's true only if it means the courts will reliably support their partisan agenda. Meanwhile, the public's confidence in the courts continues to erode. This is the real danger of nuclear fallout. The damage lasts for generations.

Grassley says one remedy to that is his legislation to allow cameras in the Supreme Court. "I think TV in the courtrooms would help. Let the public know more about how it works," he said.

The Iowa Supreme Court started holding oral arguments on the road so people across the state could attend and learn more about how the court works, Grassley noted.

It's a good idea for many reasons. For one thing, voters might realize they need to hold their legislators accountable for writing clear, unambiguous laws. The old saying "garbage in, garbage out" may have been coined to describe the effect of bad data on computer programming, but it applies to our legal system. Poorly written laws lead to poor judicial rulings.

But real-life court is nothing like the dramas on TV. People other than hardcore court watchers will soon tune out. Video clips taken out of context may show up on the internet and, you guessed it, political campaigns. TV is not a cure for getting politics out of the courtroom.

Meanwhile, we don't know how long the tattered remnants of the filibuster will stand. I'm all for bipartisan cooperation, but there's something to be said for forcing the majority party to be entirely accountable for its action — or inaction.

Material witness on suicide watch after surrender in Missouri

A Bondurant man considered a material witness in the killing of his parents and sister allegedly told police, "I killed three people last night" as he turned himself in, said Neosho, Mo., Police Chief David Kennedy. Chase Marcus Nicholson, 20, approached Wal-Mart employees in the small southwest Missouri town about 12 hours after his family members were found dead in their Bondurant home. Kennedy said Nicholson allegedly told the Wal-Mart employees the same thing he told police.

Polk County authorities were expected to arrive in Neosho late Friday to question Nicholson in connection to the killing of his parents, Mark Alan Nicholson, 58, and Charla Lee Nicholson, 56, and his sister Tawni Alexis Nicholson, 24. They were found dead in the family home in the 9700 block of Northeast 88th Street, said Lt. Rich Blaylock, spokesman with the Polk County Sheriff's Office.

Chase and Tawni's cousin Seth Nicholson, 28, of Des Moines, said Tawni was at the house to help plan her brother's 21st birthday party.

Nicholson turned himself in at about 10 a.m. Friday in Neosho, a town of 12,000 people about a 5 1/2-hour drive from Bondurant. He is in custody in the Newton County, Missouri, jail and was on suicide watch, Kennedy said.

Seth Nicholson, one of Chase's cousins, said Friday that Chase Nicholson had been treated for mental illness for many years.

"His entire life has been a giant adjustment," he said. It was 9:30 p.m. Thursday when Polk County deputies went to the Nicholsons' home to conduct a welfare check, which may have been prompted by a friend who had spoken to Chase Nicholson. Investigators cleared the scene late Friday morning. Blaylock declined to say how the victims were killed. The Nicholsons were remembered fondly by neighbors and co-workers.

Charla Nicholson had been a teacher at Des Moines Public Schools since 1986, the school district confirmed. She worked with Goodrell Middle School students until the fall of 1999, when she moved over to Cattell Elementary. Cattell Principal Tiona Sandbulte said Charla was a dedicated teacher who loved her students. She most recently worked with children in kindergarten and first grade as an intervention teacher, who met with students who needed extra support with reading or math. She also helped monitor lunch time.

"The kids looked forward to her coming in," Sandbulte said, adding that Charla would often joke with students. "She just sparkled. She's just so great with the kids."

Charla was adored by co-workers and was always willing to help her colleagues when needed, Sandbulte said.

The school district is making counselors available to help students and staff cope with Charla's death, Sandbulte said. Cattell also planned to email students' families.

Charla's daughter, Tawni, was just starting her career at an area insurance company after graduating from Iowa State University in August, a neighbor said.

She received a bachelor's degree in business with a major in marketing, said university spokeswoman Annette Hacker.

Cadets' explicit photos cause annual dinner to be canceled

RYAN J. FOLEY

ASSOCIATED PRESS

The commander of a military training program at Iowa State University canceled an annual formal dinner Friday after news broke that explicit photographs of some male cadets had been posted on Facebook.

Capt. Scott Curtis sent an email to the Naval Reserve Officer Training Corps saying he was calling off Saturday's "Dining In" event in light of publicity about the incident, which a Navy spokesman said involved seven male cadets who were "willing participants" in inappropriate behavior around campus and online.

Curtis said the decision was unfortunate, and he warned students would likely not be refunded the full cost of tickets they bought for the dinner for upperclassmen, alumni and retirees.

"My overarching goal is to ensure that all of you personally, as well as the reputation of the Cyclone Battalion as a whole is protected to the maximum extent possible given the current media situation," Curtis wrote.

The Associated Press reported Thursday that explicit photos were taken of some cadets around campus on March 4 and posted to the Facebook page of a student group connected to the program.

Lt. Sean Brophy, spokesman for the Naval Service Training Command, said other students did the right thing by reporting the photos to program leaders.

The Navy said "appropriate administrative actions" were taken against the midshipmen, who remain with the program. Curtis apologized to Iowa State leaders.

Curtis said the incident doesn't "reflect on the Character of this Battalion — how we respond and move forward does." He called the group fantastic and urged members to "dust yourselves off and move on." A separate email sent by a student leader instructed students in the battalion to decline comment and inform program leaders of any media inquiries.

DMR: Grassley, Ernst back U.S. strike on Syria

LINH TA AND JASON NOBLE

LTA@DMREG.COM

Iowa U.S. Sens. Chuck Grassley and Joni Ernst each voiced support for airstrikes launched late Thursday against a target in Syria. Grassley, in a statement released Friday afternoon, called the airstrike ordered by Republican President Donald Trump "appropriate" following Syrian leader Bashar al-Assad's apparent use of chemical weapons on civilians.

"Assad's actions follow a policy under President Obama that lacked any consequences for heinous crimes against Syrian civilians," Grassley said.

“The action taken by President Trump to prevent further use of chemical weapons by Assad or anyone else was appropriate.”

He added that the president now must “develop a comprehensive strategy” for ending the six-year-long civil war.

Ernst, meanwhile, praised the strike within hours of its announcement on Thursday, crediting Trump with showing “global leadership” in a statement that also described Assad as a war criminal. “This has been a tragic reality for the past six years and has gone on far too long,” she said. “Unlike the Obama administration, the Trump administration is showing global leadership and we must work to find an end to the root causes of this crisis.” Both of the Republican senators’ statements represent an evolution from 2013, when Assad previously deployed chemical weapons and then-President Barack Obama, a Democrat, proposed a military response. “I don’t think the case for military action has been made. ...” Grassley said in a September 2013 statement. “If the goal is to deter and degrade Assad’s ability to use chemical weapons, how would a limited strike achieve this goal? What are the risks of military action? What is the U.S. national interest in striking Syria?”

That same month, Ernst — then a state senator and a candidate for U.S. Senate — said Obama had not made the case for “why it is in our vital interests to use force in the midst of Syria’s ongoing civil war.”

Grassley’s office clarified the senator’s shift in viewpoint in a statement to the Register, arguing that Trump’s strike was a single, clear action to disrupt Assad’s ability to launch another chemical weapons attack. Obama in 2013, by contrast, considered a wider military action “but the goal, strategy and plan were unclear.”

“Congress and the American people deserve details on the mission, and the plan to achieve it, before entering into a possible long-term conflict, regardless of which president is in the White House,” spokesman Michael Zona said. In a CNN interview on Friday, Ernst likewise argued that Trump has made the case for Thursday’s strike in a way that Obama did not four years ago. “He has laid out the case — humanitarian atrocities of course, and the use of chemical weapons — and we also have ISIS engaged in that region,” she said. “We simply do not want to see chemicals fall into the hands of ISIS operators. There’s an ongoing civil war and that paired with the ISIS threat makes it even more imperative that we make sure we’re destroying any of those deliver systems.”

Another Iowa member of Congress, U.S. Rep. Rod Blum, praised Trump’s “decisive leadership” in a tweet late Thursday, but he said if there was to be a sustained military effort, the president should seek congressional authorization.

Trump ordered the strike against Syria late Thursday in retaliation for the chemical weapons attack that killed 86 people on Tuesday.

The attack, the first conventional assault on another country ordered by Trump, comes a day after he declared that the chemical weapons assault had “crossed many, many lines,” including the deaths of 27 children.

The 59 missiles, fired from the destroyers USS Porter and Ross in the eastern Mediterranean Sea, struck the airfield where Syria based the warplanes used in the chemical attack, according to Navy Capt. Jeff Davis, a Pentagon spokesman.

The missiles destroyed aircraft, hardened hangars, ammunition supply bunkers, air defense systems and radar at the Shayrat Airfield, according to USA TODAY.

DMR: MATERIAL WITNESS IN KILLINGS TOLD COUSIN HE ‘DOESN’T FIT IN SOCIETY’

LINH TA

LTA@DMREG.COM

For Chase Nicholson's entire life, he's struggled with feeling adequate, his cousin Seth Nicholson of Des Moines said Friday. That struggle also caused friction between him and his family, the 28-year-old said. "His entire life has been a giant adjustment," Seth Nicholson said. Chase Marcus Nicholson, 20, is considered a material witness in the killing of his parents and sister in Bondurant on Thursday night. Chase Nicholson approached Wal-Mart employees in Neosho, Mo., about 12 hours after his family members were found dead in their Bondurant home. He allegedly told police, "I killed three people last night" as he turned himself in, said Neosho, Mo., Police Chief David Kennedy.

His parents, Mark Alan Nicholson, 58, and Charla Lee Nicholson, 56, and his sister Tawni Alexis Nicholson, 24, were found dead in the family home in the 9700 block of Northeast 88th Street, authorities said.

At about 4 a. m. Friday, Seth Nicholson said, his mother called his wife, Kelsea Nicholson. She was bawling on the phone and told them about the deaths. However, she also warned them to lock their doors. "She said every one of them is dead," Seth said. "It was a nightmare."

Chase had been living with his parents in Bondurant. Seth Nicholson said police told relatives that Chase had stopped at a friend's house after the slayings and told him he killed his family. Then he drove south. "His friend called the police just to make sure it wasn't just a story," Seth Nicholson said. The call apparently prompted the welfare check on the Bondurant home.

The last time the family heard from the three victims was around 8 p. m. Thursday, Seth said.

Tawni, who graduated from Iowa State University in August, was at her family's home in Bondurant to help plan her brother's 21st birthday party. It was supposed to be in conjunction with the family's Easter celebration.

Her last text to a family member was discussing plans for the party.

"Tawni was there to plan the birthday party," Seth said. "She was there to help him." Chase Nicholson stayed at Orchard Place, a Des Moines charity that provides mental health treatment for children, from age 16 to 18, his cousin said. He went to school in the Bondurant school district and later attended an area private school.

Seth said Chase seemed to do well at Orchard Place.

"He was good for a little while, and then the assault happened with dad," Seth said, referring to Chase Nicholson's arrest in 2014.

A criminal complaint filed in that incident alleges Chase Nicholson threw a piece of metal from a fireplace set at his father on May 10, 2014. Mark Nicholson was cut on the left side of his face, by his left eye. Chase, who was 18 at the time, told officers that he had thrown a soccer cleat at his dad and said that could have caused the cut, according to the complaint. The criminal charge was eventually dropped.

But Chase was often easy to talk with, his cousin said. During family gatherings, he was upbeat and smiling.

"You would never know he had these issues," Kelsea Nicholson said.

After becoming an adult, Seth Nicholson said, Chase has been in and out of mental health treatment.

Nicholson said he had a hard time finding a hospital that would allow him to stay for longer than 24 hours.

In the fall, he was enrolled at the Ankeny Des Moines Area Community College campus studying computer programming.

He did not return for the spring semester because of complications with his mental health, Seth said. He had been working at a local Wal-Mart.

Seth said Chase Nicholson looked up to him, since they grew up together and he was a few years older than him.

He would confide to him about his thoughts, Seth said. He said Chase liked video games and listened to “headbanging” music. He was also interested in weapons, including knives.

Two weeks ago, Seth said, he spoke with Chase on the phone. He said Chase confided in him and told him he “doesn’t fit in society.”

Seth said the family has no ties with people in Missouri, so they’re unsure why he ended up there.

A vigil will be held on Saturday in Bondurant to remember Mark, Charla and Tawni.

It will be held from 7: 30 to 8: 30 p. m. outside Bondurant- Farrar High School at 1000 Grant Street North in Bondurant.

Seth said the tragic story demonstrates the importance of mental health care. He said he was concerned about Chase’s future.

“It is just a classic story of good people who had something really bad happen to them,” he said. “I don’t think he knows peace. I don’t think he’s ever met it.”

DMR: Iowa Senate confirms three appointees to regents board

JEFF CHARIS- CARLSON JCHARISC@PRESS-CITIZEN.COM

The Iowa Senate voted Wednesday to confirm all three of Gov. Terry Branstad’s appointees to the board that oversees Iowa’s three public universities.

In a series of 49-0 votes, the senate approved Branstad’s decision to appoint two former state lawmakers — former Rep. Nancy Dunkel, D-Dyersville, and former Sen. Nancy Boettger, R-Harlan — to the nine-member Iowa Board of Regents. Boettger and Dunkel will join board May 1, replacing regents Bruce Rastetter and Katie Mulholland, whose six-year terms expire April 30. Rastetter did not seek a second term, and Mulholland was not reappointed to one.

In another 49-0 vote, the senate confirmed Wednesday the reappointment of regent Sherry Bates, who has served on the board since 2015 and who heads the board’s Campus and Safety Subcommittee. When reappointing Bates in March, the Governor’s Office said she deserved a full, six-year term on the board. The Senate also voted 49-0 last month to confirm last year’s recess appointment of Regent Mike Richards, who has been serving on the board since May 2016. As with Wednesday’s confirmation vote, there was no debate. Wednesday’s vote will change the gender balance on the board after May 1 to five women and four men, but the partisan balance on the board will stay the same: five Republicans, one Democratic and three independents. With Rastetter and Mulholland stepping down, the board will be without a president and a president pro tem. A new leadership election will need to take place on or after May 1. One of the new board’s first tasks will be to find a replacement for Iowa State University

President Steven Leath, who is leaving to become president of Auburn University in Alabama.

Regent Larry McKibben, who served in the Iowa Senate from 1997 to 2008, described Boettger as “the leader on issues of education and educational finance.” He said both former lawmakers are “highly qualified appointees.”

“I care very much about the system,” Boettger told the Register in an earlier phone interview. “Iowa State is what brought me to Iowa in the first place. The state is known for quality education. I want to make sure it stays that way.” Boettger said she plans to learn as much as she can from her fellow Harlan resident, Mary Louise Petersen, who served as president of the regents from 1973 to 1981. Dunkel, a Democrat who served in the House for four years, is a retired banker and a former board member of Iowa Student Loan Liquidity Corporation and the Iowa Values Fund board.

She told the Register that she views Iowa’s public universities as a key part of Iowa’s economic development landscape “in terms of their research and in terms of their business incubators.”

“Have the colleges been not given enough money? Sure. But you know you can say that about a lot of other departments as well,” Dunkel said. “Our job is to make sure they are doing the best they can with the money they are getting,” Dunkel told the Register she initially had been contacted by Lt. Gov. Kim Reynolds to inquire whether she was interested in the position.

Once she agreed, the governor called later that day to make the offer.

With Branstad scheduled to be appointed as the next U.S. ambassador to China, Reynolds will take over the governor’s responsibilities.

The governor office said the choice of appointees was made collaboratively.

“Like all of our appointments the past seven years, they were all decided upon together by Gov. Branstad and Lt. Gov. Reynolds,” Ben Hammes, a gubernatorial spokesman, said Tuesday via email last month.

DMR: Lawmakers promise to protect credit for poor families in tax reform efforts

BRIANNE PFANNENSTIEL

BPFANNENST@DMREG.COM

Iowa lawmakers promised to protect a popular tax credit benefiting more than 220,000 low-income working families in their effort to reform the tax code. House Appropriations Committee Chairman Rep. Pat Grassley, R-New Hartford, said at a subcommittee meeting Thursday the Earned Income Tax Credit, along with another that benefits community colleges, would be held harmless as lawmakers work to cut back state spending on tax credits. Grassley said he heard from legislators, advocates and others who opposed reducing benefits under the Earned Income Tax Credit, which primarily benefits those living in or near poverty.

“You have to weigh how difficult of a vote that is versus the savings that you’re going to achieve,” he said. “And I just think that this point, there wasn’t the appetite to take that on.”

Grassley recently introduced House File 187, which would cap and gradually reduce the total amount the state spends on tax credits, funneling the savings into a state account for an as-yet undetermined purpose. It also would roll back some of the most generous benefits associated with some credits, which result in refund checks for individuals and companies that have no tax liability.

But, he said Wednesday, it became too difficult to put an overall cap on state tax credit spending, which has ballooned by about 180 percent since 2005. Instead, he plans to look at each tax credit individually and find ways to cut back.

According to data from the Department of Revenue, the total value of state tax credits has grown from about $153 million in 2005 to an expected $427 million in 2018.

The state spends more on the Earned Income Tax Credit than any other on the books. During the 2016 budget year, it totaled $71.9 million. That's projected to grow to $76.3 million in 2021. About 71 percent of those credits were claimed by taxpayers with an adjusted gross income of less than $25,000.

Rep. Chris Hall, D-Sioux City and the top Democrat on the House Appropriations Committee, said he supports taking that credit off the table, saying it has been "extremely effective" at accomplishing its intended purpose.

After a year in which spending outpaced revenue by about $250 million, Hall and other Democrats have pushed for a review of tax credits as a way to save money and shore up the state's budget. But Republicans say cutting back on tax credits would provide savings that could be used to balance out a future tax cut.

"If the goal is tax reform, then you need to begin to achieve the savings from the tax credits, in my opinion," he said.

Hall said he disagrees with that approach.

"We need to make sure that this conversation is linked directly to improving and making the state's budget more sustainable, balanced, transparent and predictable," he said.

DMR: Templeton Rye one step closer to distilling whiskey in Iowa

Iowa-based manufacturer breaks ground on $26M, 99,000-square-foot complex

THE DES MOINES REGISTER

Templeton Rye, the Iowa-based whiskey manufacturer, has broken ground on its new $26 million distillery building in Templeton, Iowa.

The new 99,000-square-foot complex includes a 34,500-square-foot distillery as well as a museum and barrel-aging warehouse.

It's expected to be completed in the fall of 2018.

The new facility may muzzle critics who claim Templeton had been misrepresenting its liquor by labeling it as "small-batch rye" and "made in Iowa," when it actually was made from a stock whiskey distilled by MGP Ingredients in Indiana. Complaints culminated in a series of lawsuits over the whiskey's authenticity, which the company settled in 2015 with promises to change its marketing materials and bottle labeling.

Templeton Rye has six fulltime and about 10 part-time employees, the company said.

The distillery project will add 27 jobs and will be able to produce 500,000 proof gallons of rye whiskey annually.

The aging warehouse will be able to store 40,000 barrels.

DMR: Casino in Clinton debuts simulcast horse, dog racing

LINH TA

LTA@DMREG.COM

Iowans looking to bet on video simulcasts of horse and dog races will no longer have to go to a casino with live racing to make their wagers. On Friday, Wild Rose Casino & Resort in Clinton began to offer off-track betting, including races from Santa Anita Park, Aqueduct, Keeneland and Oak Lawn. It's the first state-regulated Iowa casino without live racing to offer off-track betting. "It's something new and fresh we're offering to people on the eastern side of the state," said Tom Timmons, president and chief operating officer of Wild Rose Casinos. "We're hoping to attract people from Clinton and the Quad Cities." The Iowa Legislature agreed in 2014 to allow state-regulated casinos that do not offer live racing to take bets on simulcasts of horse and dog races as part of a broader bill that permitted the state's greyhound tracks to stop offering live racing. The simulcasts are offered through a hub hosted by the Iowa Greyhound Association, which is operating the Dubuque dog track. Iowa's only other recent greyhound track, Bluffs Run in Council Bluffs, shut down in December 2015.

The greyhound association will receive a share of the revenues.

Previously, the only Iowa gambling operations that offered wagering on simulcasts of horse and dog races from outside tracks were Prairie Meadows Racetrack and Casino in Altoona and Iowa Greyhound Park in Dubuque, along with Meskwaki Bingo Casino Hotel at Tama. The Meskwaki casino, which is regulated by a tribal gaming commission, has long been allowed to offer off-track wagering under provisions of the federal Indian Gaming Regulatory Act.

For its debut, The Wild Rose will offer races from 16 different tracks across the country.

People interested in making bets will go into the Coaches Corner — Wild Rose's sports bar and grill. The area includes 56 new televisions including 16 screens that combine for theater-style viewing. Each booth includes screens for watching races.

Patrons can purchase a program and then let a clerk know what they're interested in betting on. They will receive a ticket and can either stay or leave Coaches Corner.

The wagering is parimutuel and people are not betting against the house. The casino will take a cut of the winnings, while the rest will be dispersed towards the winning tickets, Timmons said.

"We're excited," Timmons said "Got everything finalized and tested everything."

Timmons said they may expand simulcasting to its Jefferson and Emmetsburg locations.

"We'll be watching and see how it goes," Timmons said. "There is an investment with it."

The casino will feature the Santa Anita Derby on Saturday.

DMR Editorial: Is Harreld proposing merger or hostile takeover?

This isn't the way to unify the UI foundation and alumni

Perhaps it makes sense for the University of Iowa Foundation to merge with the school's alumni association.

But it seems odd that the school's president, Bruce Harreld, is the man who has decided to make that happen; that he hasn't given much of a rationale for it; and that he's already decided, on his own, who will lead the new organization.

Stranger still, he has done all of this without consulting with the alumni group, leaving its leaders "shocked" by Harreld's actions.

It's important to remember the entities — the school, the foundation and the alumni association — are separate and distinct entities. The University of Iowa is a public institution dedicated to higher learning and run by the Board of Regents. The foundation and alumni groups are two separate, private, tax-exempt organizations run by their own boards of directors.

Obviously, the three have common interests and they collaborate and coordinate while pursuing their individual goals. But they have missions that are fundamentally different. The school exists to educate students; the foundation exists to raise money for the school and the University of Iowa Hospitals; and the alumni association exists to strengthen the school through recruiting, alumni events, networking opportunities and career programs.

Last fall, Harreld asked the leadership of the foundation and alumni association to form a committee that would explore ways the two organizations could work together in supporting the school. He said that after reviewing the committee's recommendations — none of which involved a merger — he decided to "create one, new, unified organization," citing their "overlapping missions and aspirations."

But the report on which Harreld claims to have based his decision doesn't actually recommend the merger of the two organizations.

Still, Harreld says a newly created, single entity will better serve the university by creating "more meaningful alumni engagement and increased philanthropic support" — although it's not clear how that would occur. There's no question the alumni and foundation have overlapping objectives, but they are fundamentally different organizations. The foundation, for example, employs 233 people and recently completed an eight-year fundraising drive by securing almost $2 billion in pledges. The muchsmaller alumni organization has 25 employees and one of its biggest contractors is the foundation, which was paid $137,000 last year for information- technology services.

To put the size of the two organizations in perspective, consider this: Last year, the foundation spent $124 million, while the alumni association's total spending for the year was $4 million. In fact, the foundation's fundraising budget was more than three times the total spending by the alumni group.

Can the two be merged without the alumni association losing its identity and focus?

Perhaps. But it's easy to see why the alumni organization's leaders are worried.

"The alumni association's board of directors was not aware that (Harreld) was going to make that decision until the day he did," Clare Kelly, chairwoman of the association's board of directors, told the Cedar Rapids Gazette. "We are not happy with the manner in which it's been handled."

And Harreld has done more than decree that these two nonprofits be combined. He has also decided that once merged, they will be led by Lynette Marshall, who now earns more than a half a million dollars annually as the foundation's president and CEO.

Harreld has also instructed the association to stop accepting new members and stop collecting membership dues.

"The board didn't vote on those decisions," Kelly told the Gazette. At this point, Harreld's "merger" looks more like a hostile corporate takeover than a mutually agreed-upon consolidation. It's almost as if the two charities' boards of directors have no say in the fate of their organizations or their leadership, and their bylaws are utterly meaningless. If that's the case, the Internal Revenue Service should take a close look at their tax-exempt status and ask why it is that the head of a public university can, by his own edict, reorganize or dissolve these two independent, nonprofit organizations.

A merger might make sense, but the manner in which this one is being pursued does not.

DMR Iowa View: Women deserve to receive equal pay for equal work

This column was signed by Iowa state Sens. Rita Hart, Pam Jochum, Liz Mathis, Janet Petersen, Amanda Ragan; state Reps. Marti Anderson, Liz Bennett, Timi Brown-Powers, Abby Finkenauer, Ruth Ann Gaines, Mary Gaskill, Lisa Heddens, Monica Kurth, Vicki Lensing, Mary Mascher, Helen Miller, Amy Nielsen, Jo Oldson, Kirsten Running-Marquardt, Sharon Steckman, Beth Wessel-Kroeschell, Phyllis Thede, Cindy Winckler, Mary Wolfe.

Equal pay for equal work. It might sound like common sense, but unfortunately it's not reality.

The figures on equal pay are daunting. Women make just 80 cents for every dollar a man makes, according to data released by the Census Bureau. African-American and Hispanic women are even further behind, making just 63 and 54 cents, respectively.

Unfortunately, Iowa lags behind even those disappointing numbers. Iowa women make less than 77 cents on the dollar for what a man earns.

Women and our families are being shortchanged hundreds of thousands of dollars over the course of a lifetime.

Some argue that women choose different jobs, or choose motherhood over career opportunities. But even within the same profession, women are paid less. Female doctors and surgeons make 71 percent of what men make, and female financial specialists make 66 percent compared with men in their profession. For lawyers and judges, the pay gap is 82 percent. And while three-fourths of women who enter the workforce will get pregnant, half of working firsttime mothers receive no paid leave to have their babies, according to the Census Bureau.

Women are much more likely to have career interruptions because of child care being costly or unavailable, often resulting in lost pay raises when they return.

These are difficult financial decisions forced upon women and families because of failing economic policies.

Those are the figures. But they don't tell the whole story or how we can take action.

Tuesday was Equal Pay Day, symbolizing how long into the year women must work to earn what men earned last year. It's a day when we should remember not just the numbers, but the impact on women and families. After all, women are sole, primary, or co-breadwinners in nearly 72 percent of Iowa families.

Hardworking women trying to provide for their families are falling behind because of a discriminatory pay gap and policies that don't support the tough choices facing families.

Thankfully, there are solutions to make pay equitable.

The Legislature can create paid leave and child-care policies allowing mothers to keep their jobs, avoiding long gaps in employment that drive down wages. And we need to raise the minimum wage — two-thirds of minimum-wage earners are women — and enact other policies to raise wages instead of engaging in a race to the bottom.

Employers can get help to correct their pay practices, through equalpay guidelines from the U.S.

Department of Labor. Women must also be empowered to ask prospective employers to show women and men are paid equally, that their hiring process seeks diversity, and that they can join a union. Women in unions earn over one-third more than women in non-union workplaces.

If there is unequal pay, women should discuss the problem with their employer.

If discrimination continues, every woman has the right to file a complaint with the U.S.

Equal Employment Opportunity Commission.

Equal pay for equal work shouldn't be an idea. It should be reality. Other states are moving forward, and women continue to recognize this issue's importance. We need to move Iowa forward, and we need citizen action, legislative action and participation from the businesses to make it happen. At current pace, the wage gap will not close for 50 years. Women and hardworking Iowa families cannot afford to wait that long.

LEE: Is Iowa's ACA insurance market a sign of what's to come nationally?

CHELSEA KEENAN

Top of Form

Bottom of Form

Iowa's insurance market could be the canary in the nation's coal mine if Congress or President Donald Trump doesn't offer clarity soon on the future of the Affordable Care Act, with millions of people losing coverage, one industry expert said Friday.

Two insurers announced this week that they would stop selling individual health plans both on and off the Iowa exchange — Des Moines-based Wellmark Blue Cross and Blue Shield on Monday and Aetna on Thursday. The decisions affect some 57,600 Iowans — 21,400 Wellmark policy holders and 36,200 policy holders with Aetna.

It also leaves the vast majority of the 50,000 Iowans purchasing subsidy-eligible insurance on the exchange with only one option — Minnesota-based Medica. But that insurer is tight-lipped on what it plans to do in 2018, saying Thursday that it is "evaluating the situation and (its) options."

"Iowa is a bit different in that it's happening so early," said Cynthia Cox, associate director for the program for the study of health reform and private insurance at not-for-profit Kaiser Family Foundation. "But it might be the start of many more exits to come."

Iowa has never shown up in any of the health care policy organization's lists of states with fragile markets. States such as Tennessee, Arizona and Oklahoma have had steep premium increases and seen insurers drop out.

"This goes to show that political uncertainty can make an otherwise stable market unstable overnight," she said.

The problem Wellmark, Aetna and other insurers face is that not enough young and healthy people are choosing to enroll in plans to help spread out costs. Instead, older, sicker individuals with multiple chronic illnesses — who need insurance and coverage — are purchasing the health plans, putting a high concentration of expenses in the individual market.

Wellmark said on Monday it lost $90 million through the individual market in Iowa.

There's also quite a bit of uncertainty still looming over the future of the ACA. Trump and Congressional Republicans have promised to repeal and replace President Barack Obama's signature health care legislation, but have been stalled by disagreement over the changes they will make.

Insurers have said the unpredictability over which rules will be in place in 2018 — and over the billions of dollars in government subsidies that make the plans more affordable to millions of people — make it difficult to commit to offering such insurance.

Many have asked the government to extend the subsidies for 2018.

This comes as health insurers are preparing 2018 premium rate proposals to submit to federal and state insurance regulators over the next few months.

Whether Medica will stay in Iowa is hard to say, Kaiser's Cox added. Several states have only one insurance option on the exchange — but that insurer typically is the Blue Cross and Blue Shield plan, which are more established.

Medica is a significant player in Minnesota, Cox noted, and it has expanded into additional markets including Iowa and Kansas.

Bottom of Form

"But it's not clear if they have capacity to absorb all the enrollees in Iowa," she said. "It puts them in tough spot."

If Medica were to drop out, there isn't much in terms of a Plan B. Iowans could purchase plans off the exchange without subsidies, but Iowa insurers are pulling out of that market, too.

Trump has indicated he will not enforce the mandate or penalize those without insurance.

But that is hardly a relief if you are sick and in need of medical care, Cox said.

"This is warning sign," Cox said. If Congress "doesn't act soon, ... we can see this happen around the country."

SCJ Editorial: Election bill will strengthen system of voting in Iowa

Top of Form

Iowa's election system will be stronger as a result of a bill advancing through the Legislature.

Last month, the Senate passed and returned to the House for final approval a package of election changes. The House is expected to pass the bill, as well.

Getting the most attention within the bill is a voter ID provision.

As an additional layer of protection for the integrity of elections in this state, we long have supported a requirement that voters show some form of identification before casting a ballot. We are not alone on this within or outside Iowa.

A February Des Moines Register/Mediacom Iowa Poll showed 69 percent of Iowans support such a requirement. Voter ID requirements vary from state to state, but 34 states have passed laws requiring voters to produce a form of identification at the polls, according to the National Conference of State Legislatures.

Under the bill moving through the Iowa Legislature, voters would need to show an acceptable form of government-issued ID before casting a ballot at polling places. If a voter doesn't have one of the acceptable forms of ID, the state will issue him or her a voter-verification card, free of charge. A request for an absentee ballot would need to include an acceptable personal identification number, as well.

Within today's society, one needs some form of identification to conduct almost any kind of personal business. We do not believe asking the same of voters in the name of ensuring honest elections in our state is at all unreasonable.

Another component of the bill we support and have advocated for in this space because it also speaks to improved integrity within the process of voting is elimination of the straight-party voting option.

Bottom of Form

In our view, straight-party voting is lazy voting. We understand voters have every right to vote for all Republicans or all Democrats if they wish and even if a straight-party option didn't exist on the ballot, voters could (and some would) fill in the ovals for all candidates of one party or another.

Still, if this choice wasn't so easily available, we believe more voters would spend more time getting to know more about all of the candidates whose names appear on their ballot.

Another benefit to elimination of the straight-party voting option is this: Nonpartisan questions on the back of the ballot wouldn't be so easily forgotten or ignored.

We look forward to the House joining the Senate and sending this election bill to the governor for signature into law.

LEE: Branstad meets with senators handling his confirmation

ROD BOSHAART

Gov. Terry Branstad said Friday he had productive meetings with members of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee during this week's trip to Washington, D.C. However, he doesn't expect a hearing on his confirmation to be the next U.S. ambassador to China to take place until next month at the earliest.

Branstad said he met with committee chairman Sen. Bob Corker, R-Tenn., and ranking member, Sen. Ben Cardin, D-Md., as well as other committee members and Iowa Republican Sens. Chuck Grassley and Joni Ernst, and he plans a return trip the last week in April after the two-week Easter recess. At that time, he'll meet with more members of the committee who will consider his appointment by President Donald Trump to be America's top diplomat in China.

"I had a lot of good meetings with senators," Branstad said Friday during his first public event since his trip. He said he has completed the paperwork phase of the process and now he is "learning as much as I can about the China issues, and there are many."

The governor said he also met with Sonny Perdue, Trump's secretary of agriculture nominee, who has cleared the committee process but awaits Senate confirmation pending an April 24 vote.

"It's getting kind of frustrating, I think, for a lot of people. This process has been very slow," Branstad said of this year's Senate action. "They've now just confirmed Neil Gorsuch to the Supreme Court and that took up a significant amount of time.

"But this has been the most, I guess, disruptive process that we've ever seen in terms of appointments. Confirmations usually don't take nearly this long. But, unfortunately, I think the Democrats have decided that they're going to just basically attack everybody. I hope that by the time I get there that will have worn out and that won't be case," he said.

"They ask tough questions and there are a number of issues. But I'm hopeful that I can generate bipartisan support. Time will tell," he added.

Grassley said he expects Branstad's confirmation to "go well."

Bottom of Form

"He's personable, professional and has the proven leadership and policy skills to serve in such an important diplomatic position. As members of the Foreign Relations Committee get to know him, they'll appreciate his trustworthiness, his work ethic and his ability to get the job done for the United States as he has for Iowa for a record number of years," Grassley added.

Ernst said Branstad would make an excellent ambassador and hopes the Senate moves him through the confirmation process "as soon as possible."

"Our relationship with China is very important — from agricultural trade to national security — so I look forward to the Senate moving on his nomination soon," she said.

LEE: Branstad and Xi: From possibilities, an enduring relationship

B.A. MORELLI

Top of Form

Bottom of Form

Jack Kintzle was part of a welcome wagon in 1985 that cast such a positive light on Iowa it sparked a decades-long friendship between Xi Jinping, who would go on to become China's president, and Iowa Gov. Terry Branstad — now thrusting Branstad and Iowa into the spotlight of U.S.-Chinese relations.

Branstad, who was nominated as U.S. ambassador to China last year although has not yet been confirmed, has met with Chinese officials a handful of times over the past 30-some years. The relationship has blossomed and the impact has been far-reaching for the state, say officials in business, trade and education.

Hospitality laid the groundwork for the good relations, but Kintzle observed a measure of strategy and foresight by Branstad in encouraging the warm, respectful welcome in the midst of the farm crisis.

"Iowa was going through such a tough time with agriculture, especially farm foreclosures," said Kintzle, 73. "Iowa was at a level we needed publicity and we wanted to open doors. I think that's one of the reasons they were treated so well. How many million Chinese are there? I think he saw an opportunity to trade. I think the governor sensed the possibilities."

Pending confirmation, Branstad plans to move to Beijing with his wife, Chris, his daughter and son-in-law and granddaughters as he works to enhance the relationship between the two countries, he said during a celebration with Chinese officials during the Lunar New Year earlier this year in Muscatine.

“I’m an old friend of China,” Branstad said there. “I’ve very honored and very proud that I’ve had a number of interactions with China and the leadership of China. We’ve seen great improvement in terms of exchanges and trade. Exchanges of students is one way to improve personal relationship and friendships. That is critically important to both of our countries and the world.”

Branstad would step in amid heightened tensions between the United States and China over trade equity, punitive tariffs and how to handle North Korea. Branstad was not scheduled to be at the meeting in Florida late last week between President Donald Trump and Xi.

Kintzle was an Iowa Corn Growers Association director with a farm near Coggon in the summer of 1985 when Xi — then a county-level party leader Kintzle equated to a state secretary of agriculture in America — toured Iowa farms as part of a small agricultural delegation from Hebei province.

Kintzle’s farm was right off the highway and convenient, so he got a call wondering if the delegation could visit. Soon, a small group of Chinese men wheeled up and spent a few hours inspecting machinery, grain bins and harvesters, then came inside for coffee. At the end, they took pictures together.

“They go back to China, he becomes president, and I farm for the next 30 years,” Kintzle said. “I should have bought a lottery ticket. Although, having a president on my farm might be better than winning the lottery.”

Branstad, then in his first term as Iowa governor, was instrumental in the visit, including hosting a then-unheralded Xi in his office.

By the time of the visit, Branstad already had signed an agreement establishing a sister-state relationship between Iowa and Hebei. In 1984, he led a 50-person delegation to Hebei. It was the first of six trade missions Branstad led to China.

Branstad next traveled to China as part of a three-country trade mission in fall 1993, marking the 10-year anniversary of the sister-state relationship. The goal was to expand markets for agricultural products, appliances, machinery and other exports, as well as stress in China Iowa’s commitment to human rights and treating people with dignity.

“We think that one of the things that helped lead to the downfall of communism in Russia and Eastern Europe was all the contacts to the West — the sister states, the trade missions and the understanding that the people gain from that,” Branstad said at the time. “I feel somewhat the same way about trade and building relationships in China.

“We can, hopefully, help push the Chinese state in the direction of more freedom and opportunity for the people as opposed to the old policy of trying to isolate them,” he added.

The early legwork has made a difference for Iowa. China is the fourth-largest export market for Iowa, with $490.6 million worth of manufactured and value-added goods, according to the Iowa Department of Economic Development.

China’s spending supports 4,000 jobs, and 5,000 “young talents” are studying in Iowa universities, Hong Lei, consul general based at the Chinese Consulate of Chicago, said during the recent Muscatine visit.

“I would say because of the sheer fact he’s been involved, he’s never let go,” said Kim Heidemann, executive director of Iowa Sister States. “He’s continued to nurture this relationship. He goes to visit, goes to meetings. He’s hosted meetings. The governor has made it a point. He’s simply done things right, especially in the last few years with Xi and done it in such a way he puts Iowa first.”

The trips to China, and return visits from Chinese officials, have continued.

Xi returned to visit Muscatine and Des Moines in 2012 for an “old friends” reunion dinner stemming from the 1985 trip, and 20 Iowans traveled to China that same year for another reunion. Branstad also participated in trade missions in 2014 and 2016.

Downing Thomas, a professor and dean of International Programs at the University of Iowa, traveled with Branstad to China in 2012.

The delegation also included elected officials from Wisconsin and Virginia, along with a handful of business people and educational leaders. The significance of Branstad’s relationship with Xi was evident in the respect and attention he received compared with the other visitors. The China Daily newspaper sought him out specifically for an interview.

Bottom of Form

Iowa universities and colleges have seen enrollment among Chinese students soar in the past 10 years. More than 4,000 Chinese students are enrolled at the three state universities alone. While the influx of Chinese college students is seen beyond Iowa’s borders, the relationship between Iowa and China has helped Iowa schools, Thomas said.

“Clearly many of our students are aware of the relationship with Xi and Iowa, and their parents are aware of it.” Thomas said.

The economic impact from international students and their families in Iowa topped $365 million and has supported or created 3,700 jobs, according to an annual report from International Programs. Thomas estimates more UI alumni are living in China than anywhere else outside of Iowa and Chicago.

The visibility of Branstad’s relationship with Xi and Branstad’s personal involvement has opened doors for Iowa companies, such as West Des Moines-based Hy-Line International.

Tom Dixon, director of international sales and marketing for Hy-Line, which is one of the world’s largest breeders of laying hens, said the company received direct and indirect assistance from Branstad’s office in forging a relationship between it and the Huayu Group, based in Hebei.

Branstad was present at a deal signing in October 2013 between the companies for a breeder housing project in Hebei province. That show of support was important in a later deal in 2016 for a joint venture to distribute Hy-Line chicks in China. The ceremonial nature of the signing, particularly with someone on friendly terms with Xi, carries a lot of influence for local, state and regional officials in China, Dixon said.

“There’s some coincidence, but it certainly helped,” Dixon said. “Branstad put more prestige and elevated the deal. It gave more of an official nature, credibility it’s a real project. In China, government involvement is so very important for companies. It helped locally (in China) to get approvals.”

In China, Dixon explained, support of government officials and good relations between business and government is vital. Government officials need to sign off on acquisitions, permits and land sales, for example.

Dixon is hopeful Branstad’s agricultural background will help ease restrictions on poultry imports in China, which have been curtailed since the bird flu outbreak in 2015. He declined to be specific, but said it has cost Hy-Line millions of dollars.

“We’ve been working to try to negotiate things with health officials in China,” Dixon said. “We hope the governor of a large agricultural state could maybe lend influence to motivate or encourage some kind of solution so we can start exporting again. We hope his level of ambassador could facilitate and shed some light on the situation.”

Globe Gazette: Skipper: Government is often one big jigsaw puzzle

JOHN SKIPPER

Top of Form

Bottom of Form

Have you ever worked at putting a jigsaw puzzle together? Are you good at it?

The trick is to put all the corner pieces together first and then work your way in. You would think it would get easier as you go along, but it doesn't.

Often, the intricacies of city government are like putting a jigsaw puzzle together. The good news is you usually have an image of what the completed puzzle is supposed to look like -- the image on the cover of the box. The bad news is you have to put a thousand pieces together to get to the promised land.

Mason City seems to have to deal with one jigsaw puzzle after another. You know about many of them in the past. They're history, and that's where they should remain.

The new one is the proposal of Gatehouse Capital to build a hotel in the parking lot of Southbridge Mall, connect it to The Music Man Square with a skywalk, build a conference center/ballroom inside and relocate the museum on-site.

This is a project that has excited a lot of people, important because without public support, an important piece to the puzzle will be missing.

The city and Gatehouse have begun discussions on a development agreement.

Gatehouse is proposing a $15 million project that should bring in oodles property tax and sales tax revenue and provide a viable entertainment venue for North Iowa.

The Music Man Square and Southbridge Mall should both benefit -- and both could use a boost. The city tax base will increase. The community will have another asset.

For its efforts, Gatehouse at this point wants a $150,000 payment to get things moving and a development fee that is still negotiable but would probably be more than $150,000.

Other negotiating points are an interest-free loan to Gatehouse estimated at between $3.5 and $4.3 million to be paid back to the city after 20 years. The city wants provisions on number of jobs created.

As of now, the city would be responsible for paying for the construction of the skywalk and renovations to The Music Man Square. And that brings in another element to the puzzle -- the city's application through the Iowa Economic Development Authority for state funds to help leverage a $36.2 million River City Renaissance downtown development project.

The state has given pre-application approval for at least $7 million in funding and more could be coming if final approval is given.

But the project has changed since first approval was given. Instead of a hotel downtown next to City Hall -- the developer, Philip Chodur defaulted on that plan -- the Gatehouse proposal is now in place. The state requires $10 million in private investment to qualify for state funding. The Gatehouse plan fulfills that requirement.

Bottom of Form

Other parts of the pre-approved plan included a music pavilion, a parking ramp, a mixed-use building and an ice arena/multipurpose center.

When Trout meets with Iowa Economic Development staffers later this month, he will explain the change in hotel developers, how the parking ramp is no longer needed, and that there might be a change regarding the mixed-use building. None of this will be a surprise to the IEDA people because Trout has kept them advised for many months.

The wild card in all of this activity could be a referendum on Nov. 7 which residents petitioned for, regarding bonding for the ice arena.

The ice arena is part of the package for the state funding, so if voters reject it, the proposed state funding will probably die -- and that is the revenue Trout and the city hope to use to fund the renovations of The Music Man Square.

So, it is a big puzzle and one in which there are many opportunities for someone or something to come along and tip over the table.

Why do things have to be so complicated? It's government -- and it's puzzling.

LEE: Iowa's budget pinch: How did we get here?

ERIN MURPHY

A mere five years ago Iowa's state budget had nearly $1 billion to spare and its reserve accounts were flush with another $600 million.

And while money coming into the state continues to increase, the state budget has fallen into disrepair. This year, state lawmakers have been forced to cut make $250 million in budget cuts, and next year's budget figures to be tight as well.

It has been a fast fall from fiscal fitness to this beleaguered budget despite ever-increasing revenue.

Gov. Terry Branstad, a Republican, regularly says a sluggish agricultural economy has slowed state revenue, leading to the current budget pinch.

Capitol Democrats say the state has too many tax breaks that leave too much money in big businesses' accounts rather than the state's.

Experts in state economics say the problem has been created by myriad factors.

Busted budget

Iowa's state budget was a picture of financial health in fiscal year 2013. There was a $928 million budget surplus — unspent money in the state's general fund — and the state's two reserve accounts — a cash reserve and an emergency fund — were flush with $622 million.

Fast-forward to fiscal year 2017, which has roughly three months remaining: the budget surplus has been whittled to less than $50 million, and revenue came in roughly $250 million under projections. So lawmakers cut $118 million from state departments and used another $130 million from the reserve accounts to make the budget whole.

And lawmakers just started work the budget for fiscal 2018, which, likely for the first time in eight years, will spend less than the previous year.

The amount of money coming into the state is not the issue; post-recession revenues have increased each year.

So what is the cause of Iowa's budget pinch?

Farm economy

Branstad regularly cites this as the main issue for the state's budget trouble. Prices for corn and soybeans, Iowa's largest crops, have been low — lower than the cost of production for roughly a year. That puts a drag on farm incomes — and thus the state's income tax collections. It also impacts state manufacturing, much of which is built around agriculture — and thus hinders state sales tax collections.

"Agriculture in Iowa has changed so much," said Pat Grassley, a Republican state legislator who leads the Iowa House's budget committee and a farmer. "It isn't just your corn and soybeans and your hogs and cattle and your chickens. It's the fact then you have a plant that makes a tractor. If they lay off people, those layoffs impact you as well. And it's not just those layoffs. Maybe there's somebody that makes a headlight for them, and they lay off people. ...

"That, in my mind, is the agriculture economy because it ties to how agriculture goes. That's kind of the anchor."

David Roederer, Branstad's budget director and a member of the three-member panel that makes future revenue projections on which the state budget is based, said the average total net farm income in Iowa from 2006 through 2010 was $3.7 billion, and from 2011 through 2014 that exploded to an annual average of $7.6 billion. But in 2015 that dropped to $2.6 billion.

"Iowa still is very tied to agriculture, and generally that has served us well. But some years commodity prices are going to be better than others," Roederer said. "So you can see that in (2011 through 2014) that those were extraordinary years. If you average it out, you're going to be pretty close to what we normally have. The problem is life doesn't work on averages. ... Some years are going to be better than others."

Ernie Goss, an economics professor at Creighton University in Omaha, Nebraska, said the sluggish farm economy is impacting many Midwest states, leading to budget shortfalls in Iowa neighbors Nebraska and Kansas. Goss said net farm income has been falling since 2013, and that impact is felt in state tax collections.

"It really has to do with agriculture and those businesses tied to ag," Goss said. "Farmers are just not purchasing, for example, heavy equipment, and that shows up in the economy in Iowa and across the United States."

But not all economic experts agree the sluggish ag economy is driving Iowa's budget woes.

Dave Swenson, an economics professor at Iowa State University, said the farm economy's role in influencing the state budget often is overstated.

"The farm economy is not the main, nor a major cause of the current situation," Swenson said in an email interview. “Farmers do not contribute as much to the state’s coffers as many think, and the ebbs and flows of farmer incomes are spread out over years — both gains and losses — allowing farmers to truly minimize both their federal and state taxation bites.”

Holly Lyons, who works with the state’s non-partisan fiscal estimating agency and also serves on the budget estimating panel, said the farm economy is only a part of the equation that has led to the current budget situation.

Lyons said income tax revenues turned flat in the spring of 2016, and that can be explained in part by lower commodity prices and a decline in the manufacturing economy — again, which is heavily tied to agriculture.

But Lyons said other factors, such as slowed sales tax revenue, also impacted the budget.

“The farm economy is just one of the factors in the shortfall — it is by no means the primary cause,” Lyons wrote in an email to Democratic state legislator Cindy Winckler, of Davenport, who had asked for Lyons’ assessment of Branstad’s claims that the farm economy is driving the budget issues.

Tax cuts and credits

Democratic state legislators insist the biggest driver of state budget issues is money not collected thanks to various tax relief programs.

Iowa’s 67 tax credit programs will cost the state more than $1 billion in fiscal year 2018.

Statehouse Democrats take particular exception with the tax relief programs that they say go to big businesses that don’t need the help.

The most expensive programs are for commercial and industrial property tax relief ($152.1 million), the homestead tax credit ($136 million), and a business property tax credit ($125 million).

Bottom of Form

“Farm prices certainly have affected Iowa’s economy, but our state budget is much more directly impacted by the cost of tax cuts and tax credits that have grown in the last four years at a rate that is just unsustainable,” said Chris Hall, a state legislator from Sioux City and the top Democrat on the House budget committee. “The areas of the budget that have been increasing in cost at the most rapid rate are tax cuts primarily to out-of-state corporations and also tax credits. Both of those numbers have increased exponentially over the last few years at a pace that is faster than the state’s economy is growing.”

Swenson agrees. He said tax relief programs for businesses — including the commercial and industrial property tax relief program, another for companies that perform research and development, and a sales tax break on manufacturing sales — are the primary drivers of the state’s revenue shortage.

Grassley said he is willing to examine the state’s myriad tax credits and whether some could be reduced or eliminated. He has introduced legislation that would start that process.

However, Grassley said he would like any change in state tax credits to be a part of a larger overhaul of state tax laws.

“I think the other party (Democrats) looks at the tax credits saying that money should go to be spent (in other areas of the budget). Philosophically, I would look at it as, can we do tax policy better in the state of Iowa than just doing a bunch of different tax credits. Could we do something that benefits all Iowans,” Grassley said. “But looking at the tax credits, I think, is healthy for us to do if the objective is how can we make Iowa’s tax climate more competitive with other states.”

Roederer said he thinks the impact of tax credits on the budget is overstated. He said two programs that have experienced some of the largest growth in the past half-decade are two programs largely supported by Democrats: the earned income tax credit, which benefits low-income taxpayers, and a program that helps cities rebuild aging buildings.

“To say that is the reason (for the budget troubles) is, I don’t think the numbers support that,” Roederer said.

Missing the mark

Whatever factors may be influencing state revenues, those revenues still continue to increase.

One critical issue that led to this year’s budget cuts was a misjudgment by the budget estimating panel. The group lowered its projections three times, in October, December and January, and the state was forced to cut the current budget with only a few months remaining.

The estimating panel meets quarterly to project the coming year’s state revenue. Its December estimate is used by the governor and state lawmakers to craft the next year’s budget.

This year the panel reduced its estimate by more than $90 million in December, and then by another $130 million in March, leaving the governor and state lawmakers to scramble.

The last time the estimating conference guessed too high by such a wide margin was in fiscal years 2009 and 2010 in the immediate wake of the recession.

“Based on indicators we saw at the time, we did our revenue estimate and it appeared, at least we thought, our estimates were going to be accurate. And obviously they were not,” Roederer said. “So you can still have a growing economy, but if your budget is based on an economy that is growing faster than it actually is, then you have a belt-tightening, which is what we’re going through.”

Grassley also has introduced legislation that he said would aim to help streamline the data collection process for the budget estimating panel and make it easier to perform its work. But Grassley conceded at the end of the day legislators will always be working with an estimate.

“That’s like playing the lottery. It’s hard when you’re estimating. There are so many moving parts,” Grassley said. “There is still growth. And that’s why we’ve tried to approach the budgeting process knowing that there’s going to be times when you don’t meet your growth level, and when you spend less you set yourself up in a position that you have a cash reserve or you have some other things that may help you take care of those situations.”

LEE: Iowa Senate leader sees ‘outside chance’ for tax reform this year

JAMES Q. LYNCH

Iowa lawmakers hope to wrap up the 2017 session this month, but Senate President Jack Whitver thinks there’s an “outside chance” tax reform can be accomplished

However, the Ankeny Republican said it will be hard to do this year because of the state’s revenue and budget situation.

“The reality of the situation is our budget is a little tighter than we had hoped,” Whitver said during taping of Iowa Public Television’s Iowa Press Friday. Lawmakers had to cut the current year budget by nearly $120 million in January and tap the cash reserve fund for about $130 million last month. So majority Republicans want to “do the fiscally responsible thing and get the budget under control before looking at reform.”

Reforming Iowa’s taxes is one of the reasons he ran in 2010, Whitver said, and something he’s been working on since.

“I was hoping we could get to it this year, but it’s looking more and more like this might be a 2018 issue,” he said. Whitver acknowledged it won’t get any easier in an election year, but “frankly, to have real, true, lasting, impactful tax reform is a complicated process.”

As GOP senators look at reform possibilities, everything is on the table, including federal deductibility and tax credits, Whitver said. His priority is lowering individual income tax rates because that would affect the most Iowans and Iowa small businesses.

“The states that are growing and thriving and are prospering right now are the states with the lowest — or even no income tax,” he said. “I’m not sitting here today saying next year we’re going to eliminate the income tax, but the lower we can go on that, I think research shows we can be more prosperous.”

Not only would lower individual income tax rates affect most Iowa taxpayers, but Whitver said it would benefit small business owners like him. His food and fitness businesses are “pass through” businesses that pay individual income tax.

Bottom of Form

“When you talk about corporate tax reform, that really isn’t that big a part of our state budget,” he said. “What we really need to do is reform the individual tax code and that would help thousands of small business owners across the state.”

He ruled out a sales tax increase unless it is accompanied by “major tax reform.”

Looking at the final weeks of the session, Whitver predicts the GOP House and Senate majorities are going to iron out differences in their respective 20-week abortion ban bills. The House version called for a 72-hour waiting period and contained no exceptions for fetal anomalies. The Senate bill included a 24-hour waiting period between the time a woman meets with her doctor and has the procedure. It also allowed an exception for abortions beyond 20 weeks in the case of a fetal anomaly.

Whitver also said lawmakers will provide more money for water quality efforts, will not dismantle the Des Moines Water Works, will ban texting while driving and said that if traffic enforcement cameras aren’t banned they will be “heavily regulated.”

WCF COURIER: Does Altmayer arrest have any connection to missing cousins case?

JEFF REINITZ

Authorities have declined to comment on any investigation into possible links between Jeff Lee Altmayer and the disappearance and deaths of cousins Lyric Cook-Morrissey and Elizabeth Collins.

Altmayer, 57, of Ankeny, is charged with attempting to lure children into his silver passenger car as far west as Onawa — near the Nebraska border — to a mobile home park just east of Dike. He’s also a person of interest in a similar incident at a Cedar Falls park.

Lyric, 10, and Elizabeth, 8, disappeared while riding their bikes in Evansdale on July 13, 2012, and their bodies were found Dec. 5, 2012, in a rural wilderness area in Bremer County. No arrests have been made in their deaths.

Black Hawk County Attorney Brian Williams said investigators in the cousins case are aware of Altmayer. The Iowa Division of Criminal Investigation agent who filed the criminal complaint in Altmayer's Jasper County case is the lead agent in the cousins probe.

In the past, authorities have commented about the rarity of double abductions when talking about the cousins case, and Black Hawk County Sheriff Tony Thompson said he found "interesting" the fact at least one of Altmayer's crimes involve approaching a pair of girls at the same time.

The double abduction angle also has been a red herring for cousins investigators. In 2013, authorities began looking into Michael Klunder for possible ties to Lyric and Elizabeth's deaths. Klunder, a 42-year-old farm worker who had served prison time for abductions, picked up two girls near a Dayton bus stop in May 2013. One fled, and he killed the other before taking his own life. Investigators eventually ruled out Klunder as a suspect in the cousins case after accounting for his whereabouts.

Reached Wednesday, Elizabeth's father, Drew Collins, said he wasn't familiar with the Altmayer case and said authorities haven't contacted him about it. However, he remembers hearing about the enticement attempts last summer before Altmayer was arrested.

Collins is skeptical about any connection to his daughter's death.

Bottom of Form

"It doesn't seem like that would fit," Collins said. "Whoever this is, I think if he takes a couple of little girls, why would he let them go if he already killed a couple kids."

Collins said he's heard countless leads and rumors since his daughter's death. It can be maddening, he said.

"I think something different every day, man. I think in my head, 'it could be this,' but the next week or the next day or 20 minutes later, I'm thinking 'it's this guy or that guy.' I've heard a ton of names, I can't keep them all in my brain. All I can do is speculate, and I think about it all day, every day," Collins said.

LEE: Branstad no fan of granting pardons

His rate since 2011 is lowest in more than six decades

Since returning to the governor's office in 2011, Terry Branstad has granted fewer pardons on average than any Iowa governor in more than six decades.

His record of granting reduced jail sentences is similarly stingy.

A review of Iowa gubernatorial records going back to 1949 — a span covering 11 administrations — shows Branstad, since his return to office in 2011, granted fewer pardons than any other Iowa governor during that time span.

Branstad is closer to the middle of that pack for granting commutations, or reduced sentences, since 2011. However, remove the roughly three dozen commutations that were the direct result of a 2012 U. S. Supreme Court ruling that negated lifetime sentences for juveniles, and Branstad once again drops to the fewest granted since at least 1949.

A pardon forgives an individual for a crime committed and restores lost rights.

A commutation reduces an individual's sentence and makes him or her eligible for parole.

"I've always tried to be very thoughtful and very judicious in making these decisions. The governor is given the extraordinary power of being able to grant pardons," said Branstad, a Republican who was a lawyer before being first elected to public office — the Iowa House — in 1972.

Branstad has approved just more than four pardons per year, on average, since 2011.

Not only is that the lowest average of any governor since 1949, it is dramatically lower than the averages posted by Branstad's two immediate predecessors, both of whom were Democrats.

Chet Culver, who governed Iowa from 2007 to 2010, approved an average of nearly 24 pardons per year, a rate six times higher than Branstad. Tom Vilsack, who led Iowa for two terms from 1999 to 2006, approved more than 12 pardons per year.

Even Gov. Robert Ray, a Republican under whom Branstad served as lieutenant governor, granted nearly a dozen pardons per year on average, or a rate three times higher than Branstad's.

Since 2011, Branstad has been slightly stricter even than his previous self: He approved an annual average of seven pardons during his first stint as governor from 1983 to 1999.

Branstad said he believes a governor's power to pardon should be used sparingly. In addition to the normal application process, he requires a face-to-face interview with the applicant.

"I believe a pardon, which is an extraordinary power, which basically eliminates that conviction from their record, should only be granted if you're very confident this person is an exemplary citizen who has given back and helped other people in substantial ways," he said. "So, I have required a personal interview. I want to be able to look them straight in the eye. I want to feel confident that they're never going to commit another crime, that they're never going to embarrass me or the people of the state of Iowa."

Branstad is even less a fan of commutations.

During his first, 16-year term in office, he approved just two reduced sentences. In his second, six-year stint, he has approved 39 commutations, but 38 of those were in response to that U.S. Supreme Court ruling.

Take those out and Branstad, during 22 years in office, has approved three reduced sentences overall.

"Most governors keep in mind they're running for re-election almost always. The worst thing you can do is be called soft on crime," said Robert Rigg, a Drake University Law School professor who specializes in criminal law. "No politician ever wanted to get stuck with being soft on crime. Certainly, Terry Branstad can never be accused of being soft on crime."

Branstad's rare commutations are not as strikingly different from his predecessors as were his pardons. Culver granted no commutations during his four years in office; Vilsack granted seven during his eight years; Ray granted an average of just two per year during his 14 years in office.

The Iowa governors with the highest rates of commutations held office during the 1950s. Leo Hoegh granted 30 in two years, and Herschel C. Loveless averaged 12 per year during his one term.

"Any time you deal with a governor, you're dealing with the political office. And any governor's staff is going to sit there and try to review the downside of doing a parole, or commutations, or a pardon," Rigg said. "I'm sure all governors, whether Terry Branstad or somebody else, is going to take that into the calculus of whether you grant a pardon or commutation. But hopefully that's not the only reason."

When pardons and commutations are combined and averaged, Branstad's separate tenures account for two of the three lowest among all Iowa governors since at least 1949. If those commutations that were the result of that U.S. Supreme Court ruling are removed, Branstad's tenures are the two lowest.

Branstad received nearly 400 requests for pardons since 2011 and approved 26. He received almost 90 requests for commutations and granted 39. Branstad said the application process for pardons and commutations is thorough, and justified his rare approvals as having public safety in mind.

"We go through a very extensive process. We do an extensive (Iowa Division of Criminal Investigation) background investigation, it has to go before the parole board before it ever comes to me," Branstad said. "The good news is we've not had the tragedies that have occurred in some other states where governors haven't been as careful or judicious and people that they pardoned have then committed other serious crimes."

P.S. Ruckman, a professor at Rock Valley College in Rockford, Ill., who writes a blog on executive clemency, said while commutations can be risky, he thinks there is little downside to granting pardons.

"When I see a pardon number that low, I just don't get why that is not in the hundreds," Ruckman said. "Because, again, the political risks there are just about zero."

Ruckman said governors appear to be motivated, in part, by wanting to avoid granting a pardon or a commutation to an individual who then commits another crime. Ruckman and Rigg both noted George H.W. Bush's 1988 campaign ad that used the example of a felon who raped a woman after he escaped while on a weekend furlough program supported by Bush's opponent, Michael Dukakis. Even though that individual was given neither a commutation nor a pardon, Ruckman and Rigg said they think that kind of example weighs on governors when making those decisions.

"There's something to this idea that you should be careful, but you should be careful anyway," Ruckman said. "If you look into those high-profile things, they're almost always about commutations (not pardons). The idea that there is some risk to restoring rights is just lunacy."

WHOTV: ISU Sees 20% Decrease in International Student Applications, Says Political Climate is Responsible

Iowa State University is seeing fewer international applications as places of higher education are facing similar issues nationwide.

The school says it has received 20% fewer international applications than the year before. Forty percent of colleges across the country also report reduced interest from international students, and ISU says the reason why is clear.

"Some of our students are just concerned about safety and how welcome they're going to be in the community. So with the executive orders issued, it has some of them a little concerned about will they be welcomed once they get to the U.S.," said Director of Admissions Katharine Johnson Suski.

The executive orders aimed at stopping travel from several predominantly Muslim countries and President Trump's campaign stance on China is not going unnoticed by potential students. ISU's applications from China are down 30%, and those from predominantly Muslim countries are down 60% to 80%.

"Certainly it saddens me when students don't feel safe here because, really, we know students are going to be very welcome here and taken care of in Ames," said Suski.

International student Waasay Mirza came to study from Pakistan, and says the problem is one of perception.

"I didn't feel uncomfortable, especially on this campus. People were really good, they helped me out," said Mirza.

Mirza came four years ago to study electrical engineering, and said being an international student has changed his life for the better.

"You get a lot of exposure, you get to learn a lot of things, and not only that, you get to see and meet so many different cultures and different diverse communities that you learn a lot," he said.

This is a message the college is trying to drive home as they participate in the national "You are Welcome Here Campaign."

"The You are Welcome Here Campaign will be a video of a lot of our students, faculty, and staff standing there saying 'you are welcome,' some in their native languages so students can hear that message from across campus," said Suski.

Suski also said representatives from the school recently returned from a trip to China, where international alumni spoke to prospective students about coming to America to study.

ISU says while international applications to the United States are down, applications to schools in Canada are on the rise.

KCCI: Six years later: Ashley Okland's murder still unsolved

Saturday marks the sixth anniversary of real estate agent Ashley Okland's shooting death.

Okland, 27, was working as a real estate agent in West Des Moines when she was found shot on April 8, 2011, at 558 Stone Creek Court, a model town home for a new development.

She was rushed to Iowa Methodist Medical Center in Des Moines, where she later died.

Investigators have interviewed hundreds of witnesses since her death, but no one has been charged in the case. West Des Moines police have said it remains an active investigation.

The case sparked new calls throughout the real estate industry to increase safety for real estate agents.

Anyone with information on the case is asked to call the West Des Moines Police Department at 515-222-3344 or Crime Stoppers of Polk County at 515-223-1400.

The Gazette: Branstad expects to sign firearms bill following review

Legislation makes 'monumental' changes to Iowa's gun laws

Gov. Terry Branstad said Friday he expects to sign legislation making major changes to Iowa's firearms laws but he is reserving judgment until he and his staff have time to review the provisions of House File 517 that received final House approval on Thursday.

"Obviously, we want to review it in its final form, but generally I've been a strong supporter of the Second Amendment and I believe the legislation passed with bipartisan support with a pretty strong margin,” Branstad said in an interview. “I’m inclined to be supportive but I want to reserve judgment until I get a chance to review it in its final form.”

Branstad said he had some concerns with the original version passed by the Iowa House but those were addressed in changes adopted by the Iowa Senate that were accepted by representatives Thursday before sending it to his desk for consideration.

“It looks pretty good,” the governor said.

Included in House File 517 is a controversial “stand your ground” provision that states a law-abiding citizen does not have a duty to retreat in a public place before using deadly force when confronted with danger to life or property.

The bill also would allow children below the age of 14 to handle pistols or revolvers under the supervision of an adult parent, guardian or instructor; pre-empt local ordinances restricting gun rights; create a uniform permit to carry weapons; provide for five-year permits to acquire handguns rather than single-year permits; and create confidentiality for those with permits, legalize short-barreled rifles and shotguns and allow those with permits to carry handguns in the Iowa Capitol and other public buildings.

Iowa Republican Party Chairman Jeff Kaufmann praised Speaker Pro Tempore Matt Windschitl and House and Senate Republicans for their work in shepherding the bill through both chambers of the Legislature in a bipartisan fashion. He called the bill “the most monumental piece of pro-Second Amendment legislation in Iowa’s history.”

Earlier in the week, members of Iowans for Gun Safety expressed concerns about the bill and on Friday, the Rev. Jeremy J. Brigham, executive director of the organization, wrote Branstad a letter urging him to veto the bill.

“This bill is particularly dangerous to men of color, women and children and many from these communities have joined us in speaking out,” Brigham said in his letter.

“Gov. Branstad, we believe it is particularly important that you veto this bill. As ambassador to China, like your predecessors, you will be asked to protect the rights of minorities in China. This bill ... threatens the rights of minorities in Iowa and we ask that you veto this bill and protect the rights of minorities in Iowa.”

If the bill becomes law, members of the Iowa Chapter of Moms Demand Action for Gun Sense in America said Iowa will become only the second state to enact a new “stand-your-ground” law since the killing of Trayvon Martin in Florida in 2012.

“In the weeks since this bill was introduced, lawmakers have listened thoughtfully to the widespread concerns about certain portions of it, and we’re grateful they removed dangerous sections that would have gutted Iowa’s background check and permit-to-carry requirements,” said Amber Gustafson of the Iowa Chapter of Moms Demand Action for Gun Sense in America.

“Still, we remain deeply concerned that the stand-your-ground and punitive pre-emption portions of this bill would leave our communities less safe,” Gustafson added in a statement. Stand-your-ground laws embolden people to escalate everyday disputes, and the statistics from states that have passed them are deeply troubling. We’ll be urging the governor to keep our state from following their concerning lead.”

Burlington Hawk-Eye Editorial: A wise move

Rex Troute, Steve Delaney

Top of Form

Bottom of Form

There is a bill on Gov. Terry Branstad's desk that would consolidate elections in Iowa. School board and municipal elections would be held on the same day.

While many times on this page we take exception to what's happening in the Statehouse, this is one measure we can support, and we hope the governor signs this bill into law.

Lobbyists for schools oppose this bill. They haven't articulated why and there really is no objective reason to oppose a measure that would encourage more people to cast a ballot for someone to represent us.

A check of the records over the years reveals school elections, held in early September, have generated embarrassingly low turnout. It's been a disservice to the taxpayers who must pay the bills. It's been a disservice to the people who put their names on the ballot.

We ask people to serve and then hold them accountable for their service. That's the trade-off of public service. Greater voter turnout isn't all that much to ask.

One would think school lobbyists would embrace a law designed to get more people to the polls, get more people involved in the process. Instead, they oppose it.

That's unfortunate. And troubling.

Moreover, school districts typically charge taxpayers more than other government entities. Shouldn't they want more involvement among the public?

And equally, municipal elections have had terrible turnout when not combined with national elections.

We should remember, it's our local representatives — city council members, school board members, county supervisors — who have the most impact on us, and our pocketbooks.

We preach frequently the need for people to get involved in their government. Voting is the most important part of that process. Government should make voting convenient for people. With today's technology, there's no reason voting couldn't be done on someone's home computer. The hope here is that day will soon come.

After all, if we can pay all of our bills online, and grab cash from an ATM machine, and trust that it's secure, surely we can vote online as well. But, as with most things related to government, change takes time.

This new law will, we believe, get more people to participate in the process of electing representatives who are to work on our behalf. It's difficult to imagine why someone would be opposed to that.

Here's hoping the governor isn't opposed to that concept.

Centerville Daily lowegian: Main Street Iowa honors outstanding achievements

Centerville reaches $1 million benchmark and Ryan Stober receives leadership award during ceremony honoring award winning projects, entrepreneurs and volunteers

Main Street Iowa hosted the 31st annual Main Street Iowa awards celebration on Friday, April 7 at Hoyt Sherman Place in Des Moines. The program honored the efforts of those who work day in and day out in downtown revitalization in Iowa. The event was attended by approximately 550 individuals representing communities across the state.

Main Street Iowa has annually presented awards honoring outstanding accomplishments, activities and people that are making a difference in Iowa's Main Street districts. Projects large and small are recognized and serve as outstanding examples of what historic commercial district revitalization is all about.

Fifteen projects and activities occurring in local Main Street communities were selected to be recognized from the 160 competitive nominations submitted. The honors were presented by Gov. Terry E. Branstad, Lt. Gov. Kim Reynolds and Debi Durham, director of the Iowa Economic Development Authority.

"The Main Street Iowa program has stood the test of time since its introduction in 1985. The program continues to bring businesses, jobs, investment and vitality to our states' communities, both big and small," stated Branstad. "The Main Street Approach works, and Main Street Iowa has been a national model because we are creative, we embrace change, we demand local initiative and action, while holding strong to our roots as an historic preservation program."

"Healthy, historic commercial districts are a key deciding factor for industrial and business recruitment," said Reynolds. "Since 1986, local Main Street programs have made a significant impact on Iowa's economy with 4,514 new businesses and a net gain of 13,402 jobs. More than 740 building projects have been reported with an investment in those rehabs of over $2 billion. Last year alone, the Main Street Iowa network surpassed 156,135 total documented hours of human capital invested into Iowa's downtown revitalization efforts. This demonstrates a tremendous commitment to Iowa's Main Streets."

During the event, 10 communities were recognized for reaching significant benchmarks based on private dollar investments made in the purchase and revitalization of properties within their respective commercial districts. Centerville and Lansing were recognized for reaching the $1 million benchmark in the last year and Ft. Madison was honored for $2 million in local investment. Ames and Guthrie Center were recognized for achieving the $5 million level. Des Moines Sixth Avenue, Chariton, Corning, State Center and Ottumwa all attained $10 million in local investment since being designated as local Main Street programs. Four communities were recognized for significant anniversaries. Osceola was recognized for 20 years of participation as a designated Main Street community. Cedar Falls, Spencer and West Des Moines were recognized for 30 year anniversaries.

Two special awards were presented as well. James Walsh received the Spirit of Main Street Award, an honor that recognizes the person, organization, community or project which best demonstrates the true meaning and spirit of "Main Street at Work." The community of Oskaloosa was honored with a Signature Project Award for their inspiring and innovative place-making efforts in beautification, promotion and partnership.

In 1985, the Iowa Legislature adopted the National Main Street Center's Four Point Approach to district revitalization by establishing Main Street Iowa within the agency that is now the Iowa Economic Development Authority. Since its inception, the state program and its communities have been considered examples of excellence in the national effort to revitalize historic commercial districts across the country.

The Gazette Editorial: Affordable Housing: Second chances & better processes

Elected officials don't often get second chances, or clear-cut strategies for complex problems. Right now Cedar Rapids City Council members have both.

Minnesota-based nonprofit CommonBond Communities has submitted an updated plan for Crestwood Ridge, a northwest side housing project that fell shy of supermajority support last fall amid outcry from neighborhood residents.

Awarded $8 million in federal tax credits through the Iowa Finance Authority to develop alongside Edgewood and Crestwood roads, Crestwood Ridge included a mix of market rate and affordable apartments, including five supportive housing units. Staff from Willis Dady was tapped to provide case management for those five tenants.

Council members rejected rezoning for the project in October, when a majority neighbors voiced concerns about area sidewalks, increased traffic, lot density and water runoff. The updated Crestwood plan addresses these issues, so the nonprofit is requesting the city forego its typical 1-year delay and reconsider the project now, before the grant expires.

We continue to support the development because it earned city support for its grant application, met the strict criteria of the competitive grant, aligns with the comprehensive plan, won the recommendation of city staff and, most importantly, fills a long-standing affordable supportive housing gap. We also remain impressed by CommonBond and its partnership with Willis Dady.

Although most national reports rate the Midwest, Iowa and Cedar Rapids as generally affordable, the reality is a lack of local housing stock has increased local demand and cost. Rental vacancy rates in the city hover around 2 percent, and more than 40 percent of area renters are cost-burdened. Many households are only one financial crisis away from added reliance on taxpayer-funded safety nets or homelessness.

To make matters worse, the Trump administration wants to cut $6.2 billion, or 13 percent, from the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development. Specifically targeted are two programs that help people secure and sustain affordable housing — Community Development Block Grants, which fund initiatives ranging from disaster aid to police engagement to anti-poverty efforts like Meals on Wheels, and the HOME Investment Partnership, which helps low-income citizens repair existing homes.

Other HUD programs related to housing are in danger as well, including rental assistance, heating and air-conditioning aid, energy-efficiency assistance and various other local government partnerships like AmeriCorps and the Interagency Council on Homelessness. The Self-Help Homeownership Opportunity and Choice Neighborhoods programs, which aim to replace distressed public housing with mixed-income development, are on the chopping block too.

Given what's happening in Washington, you'd think Iowa lawmakers would be doing more to help communities prepare for worst-case scenarios. Instead, they are supporting similar policies and implementing laws that further erode the middle class, adding more Iowans to the list of those searching for housing and other assistance.

That's the economic and political backdrop Cedar Rapids Council members need to consider before they once again refuse $8 million in housing tax credits, newly offered neighborhood improvements and proven affordable housing project management partners.

This is a multifaceted challenge that needs public-private coordination and public buy-in.

Healthy communities offer diverse housing options for people at all levels of the economic ladder. Business owners, retirees, farm laborers and bus drivers all need a place to live. When they can't find one, negatives ripple out.

For instance, a lack of workforce housing impedes the ability of employers to attract talent, leaving jobs unfilled and companies thinking twice about local expansions. And, when workers can't live near employers, they must travel further. Individual cars increase traffic and impact air quality. Alternatively, public transit faces greater demands in an ever-widening service area, which costs taxpayers.

Throughout Linn County, only eight supportive housing units are open to the public. And yet housing is the foundation for well-being — food security, economic contribution, health management, stability.

This housing gap won't be closed if strategies are limited to owner-occupied, large-lot single-family housing — or if all options are regulated to only certain neighborhoods.

This is a test of political will we cannot afford to fail. Fortunately, the Safe, Equitable and Thriving Communities Task Force subcommittee on housing has recommendations:

- Expand financial incentives for development of affordable housing throughout the city
- Build community capacity for supportive services programming
- Implement ongoing landlord education efforts
- Target nuisance property owners
- Develop partnerships to revitalize aging housing stock
- Remove barriers faced by specific populations
- Strengthen and support neighborhood associations
- Coordinate and unify affordable housing efforts

While these objectives are fully and individually possible, they are more easily accomplished by first focusing on the final item.

As the task force noted “at present, there is no coordinated, collaborative, unifying body or effort that develops and implements a strategic communitywide vision for affordable housing.”

That must change. We agree with the task force that Cedar Rapids needs a group — perhaps something similar to the Johnson County Affordable Housing Coalition or the long-dormant Affordable Housing Commission mandated by municipal code — with the necessary political capital to drive public policy. Ideally, this group will spur additional regional opportunities.

Dr. Mary Wilcynski and Stacey Walker, who served as co-chairs of the SET Task Force, noted that the group's recommendations were derived from discussions with several housing experts, many of whom served on the subcommittee. They aren't commentary on any one proposal, but an attempt to establish a more comprehensive approach.

"We do know that barriers to affordable housing currently exist in our community and everyone interested in a safe, equitable and thriving community should take the challenge of affordable housing seriously," they said as part of a joint statement.

"It is imperative that local governments work with nonprofit organizations and good developers to bring more affordable housing options to our city. ... The need for safe, affordable housing is not going away, therefore it is incumbent upon leaders to act."

Perhaps due to political aspirations or concern about the next election, needed and initially supported Cedar Rapids housing projects have been successfully derailed by small groups of citizens. Each time this happens, the city's relationships with established housing developers erode, more groups are emboldened to read from the same noisy playbook, and the diverse housing supply needed for the city to thrive is delayed.

Whether the updated Crestwood development stands or falls, it shouldn't have come to this. Taxpayers shell out thousands each year for professionals who use council-approved tools like the comprehensive plan and city ordinances to determine details like landscaping and water retention.

Given the inability of council to consider recent housing projects by the standards of merit they established, we are no longer convinced the current system provides a level playing field for all developers or projects. Time for changes. Let's start with a fearless and politically-savvy team committed to meeting the city's long-term and diversified housing goals.

The Gazette Column: This is no time for a constitutional convention

Todd Dorman

So amid the deepening political divisions and thrill-a-minute volatility of our post-truth Trumpian times, Republicans running our Legislature think the moment is right to grab us by the Constitution.

Last month, the Iowa House voted 58-38 along party lines to petition Congress to convene a constitutional convention under Article V of the U.S. Constitution. The convention, according to House Joint Resolution 12, would be "limited to consideration and support of amendments that impose fiscal restraints on the federal government, and amendments that limit the power and jurisdiction of the federal government, and no amendments on any other topic."

So just money, power and jurisdiction. What else is there?

It's now awaiting action in the Iowa Senate. Its floor manager there, Sen. Jason Schultz, R-Schleswig, said a debate will come "soon."

The resolution's writers have a flare for drama. It addresses our "crushing national debt." It accuses our federal government of "abuses of power" and talks of how it's "invaded the legitimate role of states" through federal mandates. It has "ceased to live under proper interpretation of the Constitution."

Stirring, to be sure. But the convention won't come in time to stop the feds from, for instance, invading Iowa with a fresh $225 million transfusion to save Gov. Terry Branstad's hemorrhaging Medicaid scheme. Such future federal incursions, funding roads, crop insurance and water quality, surely could be halted. Ask your nearest county supervisor, after lawmakers' 2017 local control pre-emption fest, about abuses of power, legitimate roles and unfunded mandates.

But I digress.

State Rep. Zach Nunn, R-Bondurant, led the charge in the House on March 15, insisting a constitutional convention would be like a “subcommittee,” or simply a “proving ground for new ideas.” It can happen if 34 state legislatures approve petitions. Nine have taken the plunge, including Arizona, Georgia, Alaska, Florida, Alabama, Tennessee, Indiana, Oklahoma and Louisiana. Other states, including Wisconsin and Ohio, are debating the issue.

Some con-con backers claim as many as 30 states have passed resolutions, counting actions taken years or even decades ago. Maryland just rescinded its resolution, passed in 1977.

“If not us, then who? If not now, when?” Nunn asked the House as debate opened.

It was hardly a debate for the ages.

Minority Democrats questioned the wisdom of lecturing Congress at a time when Iowa’s budget is a mess. That didn’t sit well with Rep. Chip Baltimore, R-Boone, who called a “point of order,” accusing Democrats of breaking House rules by going off topic. Apparently you can’t discuss state budgetary imprudence in a debate over federal budgetary imprudence. Somehow, his point was well taken by House Speaker Linda Upmeyer, R-Clear Lake.

It was not until Rep. Tim Kacena, D-Sioux City, rose to speak did we get a solid assessment of the convention drive.

“I can honestly say this resolution scares the hell out of me,” said Kacena, a retired firefighter who probably knows scary when he sees it. “This is dangerous.”

The thought of popping the hood on the Constitution at this point in our history is pretty scary. Our facts now are alternative. Our political cash comes in two flavors, shady and dark. Our nation just put a tweeting huckster in the Oval Office. Scrapping health insurance for 24 million people is what passes for sound public policy. We’re still trying to recover from the Bowling Green massacre.

A convention, now? Maybe the Russians will send delegates.

Sure, it takes 34 states to call a convention and 38 states to ratify any amendments it yields. No worries. That will never happen. Just like Donald Trump will never be president. Thank goodness.

I’m not going to defend the crushing national debt or any other boneheaded action taken by the federal government. There are many. And I can think of ways I’d like to change the Constitution.

But when the hottest trend in governing is called “the nuclear option,” the time to change the Constitution is not now. The people to do it is not us.

Legislatures across the country, including Iowa’s, are shoving through sweeping ideologically-driven initiatives with all the care, caution and concern for consequences of Visigoths on a Roman holiday. They would pick the convention delegates. That ought to work out well.

And a convention would not necessarily be “limited.”

We’ve had one such convention, in 1787. It was called by Congress to amend the Articles of Confederation. Instead, delegates tossed the articles and crafted an entirely new Constitution. It was a masterstroke for the future of America. It is not an example of cautious restraint.

Drake University Professor Dennis Goldford, who teaches constitutional law, said there were strong objections to straying from Congress' original charge in 1787. James Madison answered those criticisms in Federalist 40.

"He said, look, if you think things are so tough and difficult right now that we can't stay where we are, then go ahead and vote for this new Constitution, and we'll take that as your consent to the rather irregular procedure we adopted," Goldford said. "If you think that we had a runaway convention ... vote against the new proposed Constitution.

"So we had precisely this issue as far back as 1787-1788. Our only constitutional convention in American history was itself a runaway convention," Goldford said.

And if a convention's actions sparked a court challenge, it's uncertain what jurisdiction the courts would have, Goldford said.

"This opens up a huge can of worms," Goldford said.

I say let's not open that can.

Conservatives who want big changes at the federal level should note they currently control Congress and the White House, with a Supreme Court majority on the way. A convention isn't necessary, unless you want to do things so unpopular they can't be accomplished through the normal political process. Many of these proposals also are known as bad ideas.

And HJR 12 is a bad idea. The Senate should grab it and scrap it.

QC Times: Q-C lawmakers weigh in on Syria strikes

Ed Tibbetts

In mostly measured tones, lawmakers representing the Quad-Cities got behind President Donald Trump's decision to launch missile strikes against Syria. But there also were warnings, mostly from Democrats, about the prospect of a deeper commitment there.

The strikes, which came late Thursday, also rekindled calls in some corners of Congress for lawmakers to come up with an authorization for use of military force in the event there was to be further action. Rep. Dave Loebsack, D-Iowa, said Friday that Trump should have come to Congress before launching Thursday's strikes.

Republicans said Trump showed resolve, and that this represented a break from the Obama administration.

"Assad's actions follow a policy under President Obama that lacked any consequences for heinous crimes against Syrian civilians," Grassley said. "The action taken by President Trump to prevent further use of chemical weapons by Assad or anyone else was appropriate."

Sen. Joni Ernst, R-Iowa, praised the strikes Thursday night. "Unlike the Obama administration, the Trump administration is showing global leadership and we must work to find an end to the root causes of this crisis," Ernst said in a statement.

Republicans have long criticized Obama over Syria. In 2013, he raised the prospect of military action after government forces launched a chemical attack. The year before, Obama had said chemical weapons would cross a red line.

Obama decided ultimately against launching an attack on his own and went to Congress for authorization. But Congress took no action, either.

As for the region's Democrats, Sen. Dick Durbin, D-Illinois, called Thursday's strikes a "measured response." Sen. Tammy Duckworth, D-Illinois, said they sent a "clear and measured message" to Syrian President Bashar al-Assad.

Rep. Cheri Bustos, D- Illinois, called Thursday's action a "proportional response."

However, they also said Trump needs to lay out a strategy before any further action is taken.

Bottom of Form

Duckworth raised concerns about heightened tensions with Russia. "After weeks of sending dangerously mixed signals on Syria, the president owes it to our troops, who are now in greater danger, to clearly and unequivocally outline the long-term strategic end-state he is seeking to achieve in Syria and the region," she said.

Bustos said the president "must present the American people and Congress a clear and transparent strategy to ensure we do not rush into another open-ended conflict in the Middle East."

Loebsack, meanwhile, also called for a "comprehensive plan." He did not weigh in specifically on the propriety of Thursday's missile strike but said it was important that the U.S. and the world "ensure that Assad is held to account for war crimes committed against his own people."

Grassley also called on the president to "develop a comprehensive strategy with respect to ending the six-year-long crisis in Syria."

QC Times Editorial: No answers in sight as Iowa exchange crumbles

Quad-City Times editorial board

Top of Form

Bottom of Form

Iowa's health insurance exchange this week became the poster child for self-fulfilling prophecies.

In just 72 hours, Iowa's version of the Affordable Care Act, or Obamacare, crumbled under its own weight and the additional heft a Republican White House with no interest in supporting it.

Wellmark Blue Cross and Blue Shield and Aetna last week both announced departures from Iowa's exchange in 2018, citing mounting financial losses and continued "uncertainty." That leaves Iowa's exchange with just one provider, Medica, which has yet to make its future intentions known. Wellmark and Aetna represent a majority of the Iowa exchange's total plans.

So, now what?

What's clear so far is Republicans in Washington have no answers.

Obamacare has always been a highly compromised, deeply troubled program. Even proponents of the massive federal program lamented its shortcomings. It's over-reliance on young, healthy populations to subsidize the elderly and sick didn't pan out. Obamacare was costly and clunky. But, by most objective measures, it was relatively successful.

Roughly 20 million Americans have health insurance thanks to the ACA. In 2016, national insurance rates reached a record low of 10.6 percent, according to Gallup. That's down from 18 percent in 2013, and it's the working poor -- a population who spent decades one heart attack away from financial ruin -- who benefited most.

An imperfect program, for sure. But Obamacare isn't responsible for the country's astronomically high health care costs. Americans pay more and get less relative to the rest of the developed world, according to the World Health Organization. It even slowed the incessant rise of health insurance premiums, concluded the Congressional Budget Office.

Republicans spent seven years wasting time on meaningless votes to repeal ACA. It was a go-to foil in congressional districts in every purple district throughout the country. It was "evil," they said. They stoked nonsensical fears about "death panels." President Donald Trump has repeatedly called it a "disaster" without bothering to actually understand it and last month promised to let ACA fail when his party couldn't offer any real solutions.

That last bit is the "uncertainty" to which Aetna and Wellmark officials were referring. Trump's promise to starve ACA to death all but doomed an already troubled Iowa exchange.

Bottom of Form

The White House and congressional Republicans, still smarting after last month's failure, spent much of last week in closed-door meetings trying to hash out a replacement to ACA, reported the New York Times. Most of the talks involving the White House concerned placating the GOP's right-wing Freedom Caucus, which killed the party's first attempt at repeal. Proposed concessions included high-risk pools, a downright scam that's failed in multiple states, and the elimination of hugely popular pre-existing conditions protections for consumers.

A bill that already turned the noses of the GOP's reasonable center reeks even worse after this week. Flailing is fine for a minority party. Chaos is not acceptable for the majority that's supposed to govern.

So, we ask again: What now?

Republicans tapped widespread confusion and fear to score political points off Obamacare. They've railed against it without any real solution. They're now actively destabilizing it. And, predictably, Iowa's exchange is quite literally falling apart amid a GOP civil war.

The well-being of thousands of Iowans are at stake here. More than 50,000 benefit from taxpayer subsidized policies on Iowa exchange. Tens of thousands of Iowa's poorest rely on the state's already foundering Medicaid system, expanded as part of the ACA and privatized by Gov. Terry Branstad.

And the very people who sowed discontent and stoked fears have, so far, proven incapable of picking up the pieces.

RI: Ashton Kutcher says good character 'is like your DNA'

APRIL 9, 2017 BY O. KAY HENDERSON

Eastern Iowa native Ashton Kutcher is the latest recipient of a "Pillar of Character" Award named in honor of former Iowa Governor Robert D. Ray.

“Thank you for having me home,” Kutcher said as he took the stage at Saturday’s ceremony in West Des Moines.

The actor who has starred in “That ’70s Show” and the current Netflix series “The Ranch” relied on some of the biochemistry he studied at the University of Iowa to explain the difference between personality and character.

“Personality is kind of the you that you show in the light,” Kutcher said. “...But your character is the you in the light and it’s the you in the darkest moment of your life. It’s just you. It’s like your DNA.”

The Robert D. Ray “Exemplar Award” is presented by the Drake University-based “Character Counts” organization to Iowans who “consistently demonstrate good character as a visible role model.”

Kutcher thanked his wife, his parents, his scoutmaster, his teachers and the neighbors from his childhood for their influence on his character.

“I’m the lucky one, but then I also had the great fortune to fail again and again and again,” Kutcher said. “I had the great fortune of going to jail when I was 18 and getting a deferred judgment, because I knew I never wanted to go back.”

Kutcher also talked about how his twin brother, Michael, has influenced his life.

“My brother was born with cerebral palsy and he taught me that loving people isn’t a choice and that people aren’t actually all created equal,” Kutcher said. “...We’re all created incredibly unequal to one another in our capabilities and what we can do and how we think and what we see, but we all have the equal capacity to love one another...He also taught me that he had gifts that I didn’t have...and that every time I felt sorry for him in life, I made him less.”

Kutcher, who is now 39 and the father of two young children, told his parents that with the experience of being a parent, he finally realized how much his own parents loved him.

“And so actually I didn’t come here, ultimately, to receive this award for myself,” Kutcher said. “I came here to receive it for all of you.”

Iowa’s current governor, Terry Branstad, handed Kutcher’s wife, Mila Kunis, a certificate that makes her an “honorary” Iowan. Other recipients of the Robert D. Ray “Pillar of Character Award” include Norman Borlaug, Hayden Fry, Dan Gable, Fred Hoiberg and Shawn Johnson.

Kutcher has become known as an entrepreneur, investor and philanthropist in addition to his work as an actor. He recently testified against human trafficking during a congressional hearing. Kutcher and his ex-wife, Demi Moore, co-founded a non-profit called “Thorn” that fights “the sexual exploitation of children.”

RI: New leader to take over at the Clarinda prison

APRIL 7, 2017 BY RADIO IOWA CONTRIBUTOR

A new warden has been named for a prison facility in southwest Iowa.

The Board of Corrections has approved the appointment of Randy Gibbs to become Warden of the Clarinda Correctional Facility on April 21. Gibbs is currently Assistant Deputy Director of Institution Operations.

The Clarinda facility currently houses over 900 inmates, many of whom are classified with “special needs” — offenders with mental health issues or intellectual disabilities.

The warden vacancy at Clarinda was created when Sheryl Dahm was appointed in January as Warden of the Iowa Correctional Institution for Women in Mitchellville. That was after former women’s prison warden Pattie Wachtendorf was named the first female warden of the Iowa State Penitentiary in Fort Madison. She replaced Nick Ludwick, who retired.

RI: Grassley, others comment on Supreme Court confirmation vote

Iowa Senator Chuck Grassley, a Republican from New Hartford, spoke to reporters today after the U.S. Senate voted to confirm Neil Gorsuch to the Supreme Court.

“I think that we just witnessed one of the most important votes that a member of the Senate can cast,” Grassley says. “Judge Gorsuch will be an independent voice on that Supreme Court. He proved that by answering questions for 20 hours.”

Grassley is the chair of the Senate Judiciary Committee which holds hearings on the Supreme Court nominees. The Senate used the so-called “nuclear option” to change the rules so Gorsuch would not need 60 votes to be confirmed. Grassley would ask if that would be a constant negative for Gorsuch in his time on the High Court. The senator says it will not be because Democrats set the precedent of changing the rules back in 2001.

“When they said ‘we’ve got to change the ground rules.’ We’ll they did change the ground rules. Those ground rules were changed for a lot of nominees that George W. Bush had, those same ground rule...continued through the Obama administration,” Grassley says. “So those Democrats who met back in 2001 poisoned the well that got us to where we are.”

Some Democrats said they were against Gorsuch’s nomination because Grassley would not hold a hearing on a judge President Obama nomination. He was asked how the whole fight over the Supreme Court nomination will impact other work in the U-S Senate.

“I think the comity will be back to the Senate in regards to legislation — but I think it’s going to take somebody like Senator Schumer who started this whole slippery slope back in 2001 — to drill a new well that’s not going to be poisoned,” Grassley replied.

Grassley says there are plenty of Republicans and Democrats who are willing to work together to make that new start when it comes to selecting Supreme Court judges.

Iowa other U.S. Senator Joni Ernst, a Republican from Red Oak, voted for Gorsuch and released this statement on her vote:

“I am thrilled that a bipartisan majority has voted to confirm Judge Gorsuch, who is eminently qualified to serve on our nation’s highest court,” said Senator Ernst. “Throughout his career, Judge Gorsuch has shown an unparalleled depth of understanding and respect for our Constitution. He is dedicated to interpreting the text of the Constitution and statutes as they are written, rather than attempting to legislate from the bench. It’s easy to see why Judge Gorsuch was previously confirmed by the Senate with unanimous support – including the support of Minority Leader Chuck Schumer.

“The American people are behind Judge Gorsuch, and I look forward to seeing him take his seat on the bench very soon.”

The group Why Courts Matter Iowa issued this statement in response to the confirmation of Neil Gorsuch, to the U.S. Supreme Court:

“Senator Grassley and Republicans in the Senate just ensured that the Supreme Court will be far more partisan and political than at any time in our country’s history, after voting to end the filibuster for Judge Gorsuch and future nominees. The so-called ‘nuclear option’ completes the partisan hatchet job on the independence of the judiciary that began last year when Grassley and Republicans engaged in unprecedented obstruction of Merrick Garland’s nomination.”

“Working side by side, President Trump, Senator Grassley, and Senate Republicans have undermined the U.S. Senate, an American institution. And their vote today undermines the independence of our highest court in the land.”

“This move to further politicize the judiciary is unfortunate, and it did not have to come to this. Republicans made a choice to strip away more than two centuries of Senate tradition. If they truly cared about bipartisanship, they would have worked across the aisle to put forward a consensus nominee who could receive the 60 votes that 25 of the past 26 justices have earned.”

“President Trump, Senator Grassley, and Senate Republicans won their vote today, but the American people lost. A judge who does not believe in protecting the constitutional rights of every citizen will be given a lifetime appointment because of a partisan vote. That’s not what we expect from our judiciary, or from our Senators, and we deserve far better.”

RI: Key senator: ‘outside chance’ for tax cuts, reform in 2017

The president of the Iowa Senate today said he and other Republicans are anxious to reform and cut Iowa income taxes, but with about two-weeks of scheduled work left in the 2017 legislative session, the task may be tabled ‘til next year.

“I was that hoping we could get to it this year,” Senate President Jack Whitver of Ankeny said. “There’s still an outside chance we could do something, but it’s looking more and more like this might be a 2018 issue.”

Whitver said the delay is mainly because when state tax revenues started falling below expectations, it forced two rounds of cuts to state budget plans.

“The reality of our situation right now in the state of Iowa is our budget is a little tighter than we hoped and we want to focus on getting our budget under control, do the fiscally responsible thing there,” Whitver said, “and then start looking at tax policy.”

After decades of resistance from within the Republican Party, Whitver said it is possible GOP lawmakers will get rid of the deduction that lets Iowans subtract their federal income taxes from their state income tax liability. Only one other state has that deduction and it makes Iowa’s income tax rates appear higher than they actually are.

“The states that are growing and thriving and are prospering right now are the states that have the lowest or even no income tax,” Whitver said. “I’m not sitting here today and saying: ‘Next year we’re going to eliminate the income tax,’ but the lower we can go on that, I think research shows we can be more prosperous.”

Whitver said he is willing to “consider anything” — including a single-rate “flat tax” on income — if it reduces the tax burden “on hard-working Iowans.” Cutting individual income taxes is a higher priority for Whitver than reducing the state’s tax rate on corporate income.

“That really isn’t that big a (part) of our state budget,” Whitver says. “What we really need to do is reform the individual tax code and that would help thousands of small business owners across our state.”

That’s because the majority of small business owners do not operate a corporation. They pay taxes on their small business by filing Iowa individual income forms. Whitver made his comments during taping of tonight’s “Iowa Press” program that will air on Iowa Public Television at 7:30.

RI: Iowa Supreme Court rules against request for a hospital safety report

The Iowa Supreme Court says information gathered for a patient safety study cannot be used in a lawsuit against a hospital.

Dennis Willard was seriously injured in an accident in Davenport in November of 2011 and was transferred from the hospital there to the University of Iowa Hospitals in Iowa City.

He was sedated for a scan of his stomach to check for injuries. After returning from the scan he had problems with his left arm, and an x-ray found his shoulder was dislocated.

The x-rays taken before the scan had not shown the dislocated shoulder and Willard believed the shoulder was dislocated as he was moved for the scan, so he filed a lawsuit against the hospital. He sought to get a copy of what’s called a Patient Safety Net report that was filed about an incident during the scan.

The incident reports are intended to help improve the safety of hospitals and under Iowa law are required to remain confidential. The district court ruled he should be given the report as part of the discovery phase of the lawsuit.

The Iowa Supreme Court ruled Willard cannot have the report as the confidentiality given the reports allows hospital staff to feel comfortable reporting problems and that information is utilized to improve patient safety by reducing preventable medical errors. The ruling says the protection is intended to apply to documents or communications that constitute “patient safety work product.”

POLITICO: White House on edge as 100-day judgment nears

‘We’ve got essentially two-and-a-half weeks to turn everything around,’ says one Trump staffer.

By SHANE GOLDMACHER

President Donald Trump has far more than three years left in his first term. But inside his pressure-cooker of a White House, aides and advisers are sweating the next three weeks.

The symbolic 100-day mark by which modern presidents are judged menaces for an image-obsessed chief executive whose opening sprint has been marred by legislative stumbles, legal setbacks, senior staff kneecapping one another, the resignation of his national security adviser and near-daily headlines and headaches about links to Russia.

The date, April 29, hangs over the West Wing like the sword of Damocles as the unofficial deadline to find their footing— or else.

But however real Trump’s frustrations are with the three rival power centers he has installed — chief of staff Reince Priebus, son-in-law Jared Kushner and chief strategist Stephen Bannon — top officials inside and around the White House don't expect Trump to make any drastic changes until after 100 days, lest staff turmoil stories swamp a key stretch of media coverage.

That reprieve — unless Trump simply decides he's had enough — has both bought his staff a little time and put them on edge.

"One hundred days is the marker, and we've got essentially two-and-a-half weeks to turn everything around," said one White House official. "This is going to be a monumental task."

For a president who often begins and ends his days imbibing cable news, the burden has fallen heavily on a press team that recognizes how well they sell Trump's early tenure in the media will likely color the president's appetite for an internal shake-up.

That was the backdrop for a tense planning session for the 100-day mark last week.

More than 30 Trump staffers piled into a conference room in the Eisenhower Executive Office Building adjoining the White House, according to a half-dozen attendees who described the Tuesday meeting.

Mike Dubke, Trump's communications director, and his deputy, Jessica Ditto, kicked off the discussion of how to package Trump's tumultuous first 100 days by pitching the need for a "rebranding" to get Trump back on track.

"I think the president's head would explode if he heard that," one of the White House officials present said.

Staffers, including counselor Kellyanne Conway, were broken into three groups, complete with whiteboards, markers and giant butcher-block-type paper to brainstorm lists of early successes. One group worked in the hallway.

"It made me feel like I was back in 5th grade," complained another White House aide who was there. "That's the best way I could describe it."

Dubke, who did not work on the campaign, told the assembled aides that international affairs would present a messaging challenge because the president lacks a coherent foreign policy. Three days later, Trump would order missile strikes in Syria in a reversal of years of previous opposition to such intervention.

"There is no Trump doctrine," Dubke declared.

Some in the room were stunned by the remark.

"It rubbed people the wrong way because on the campaign we were pretty clear about what he wanted to do," said a third White House official in the room, "He was elected on a vision of America First. America First is the Trump doctrine."

One of the administration officials lamented, "We've got a comms team supposedly articulating the president's message [that] does not appear to understand the president's message."

Dubke told POLITICO he was disappointed White House staff would complain in the press rather than in real time.

"It was a brainstorming session and I really wish they had spoken up in the room so that we could have had an open and honest conversation," he said. "It is unproductive adjudicating internal discussions through the media."

As for the rebranding remark, Dubke said that had been misinterpreted. "There is not a need for a rebranding but there is a need to brand the first 100 days," Dubke said. "Because if we don't do it the media is going to do it. That's what our job is."

Trump's communications team is now plotting to divide their first 100 days into three categories of accomplishments, according to people familiar with plans: "prosperity" (such as new manufacturing jobs, reduced regulations and pulling out of the Trans-Pacific Partnership trade deal), "accountability" (following through on swamp-draining campaign promises such as lobbying restrictions) and "safety/security" (including the dramatic reduction in border crossing and the strike in Syria).

Amid near-constant talk of staff shuffling, Dubke's name has fallen below the radar, in part because he cuts such a low profile. He was a late addition to Trump's team after the initial pick for the job, Jason Miller, bowed out for personal reasons. A behind-the-scenes operator, Dubke has yet to appear on television, Trump's favorite medium.

But as most of Trump's senior team — Cabinet members, military and economic advisers, Bannon, Priebus, Kushner and White House press secretary Sean Spicer — went to Mar-a-Lago last week for the bilateral meeting with China amid the unfolding Syrian situation, Dubke was conspicuously absent and back in D.C.

"That would tell you exactly how he is perceived," said one of the White House officials.

However, another White House official defended Dubke's internal role, saying before his arrival people in the press operation were "doing whatever they wanted to do without a broader set of goals being defined." Dubke imposed structure "and that's going to ruffle some feathers."

Still, the more sympathetic aide to Dubke admitted, "He has not yet integrated into the senior leadership."

The constant presence of senior advisers encircling Trump has created a vicious — and some officials say self-defeating — cycle in which top aides feel they cannot leave his side, lest they lose influence or be perceived to have.

"People are saying, 'Why is everyone traveling with the president?' and in the next breath, 'You must not be important, you're not traveling with the president?'" another White House official complained. "You can't have it both ways."

Trump hired Dubke in mid-February after a frustrating first month of bad press, telling Fox News later that month "in terms of messaging, I would give myself a C or a C+." But even after Dubke's arrival, Trump and his senior team have continued to seek outside advice.

During the failed push to pass health care legislation, Miller drafted a short messaging memo with four bullet points that was given to top White House officials, including Kushner and Bannon, according to four people familiar with the matter.

Miller, who now works for Teneo, the consulting firm created by former aides to Bill and Hillary Clinton, has been spotted around the White House twice in recent weeks, though he has made clear to friends in the administration that he has no interest in joining the White House.

The constant palace intrigue and internal jockeying has left the White House in a state of paralysis.

Trump parted with deputy chief of staff Katie Walsh in late March, his aides are discussing a reorganization and Trump himself has begun floating names to replace Priebus, his chief of staff, for feedback, according to a person close to the White House. On Friday, Trump ordered his two other senior-most advisers, Kushner and Bannon, to settle their differences in a Mar-a-Lago sit down after a week of their increasing shadowboxing through anonymous accusations in the press.

One White House official last week questioned why Bannon was taking on a member of Trump's family so openly.

"For a Svengali that doesn't seem like a smart thing to do," the official said. "I don't think that ends well for him."

A White House ally of Bannon noted that despite bumping up against Trump's son-in-law, he had held sway over the most crucial policy rollouts, such as Trump's hard line on immigration and trade. "Anyone who thinks that Steve has lost his influence, they don't know what the f--- they're talking about," this person said.

The strikes on Syria, a successful summit with President Xi Jinping of China and Friday's sit-down between Bannon and Kushner appear to have calmed some frayed nerves. Two people who have spoken with the president in recent days said Trump's mood has improved.

Still, the question of how to frame the first 100 days remains a challenge.

Trump aides are grappling with the reality that they will end this opening period with no significant legislative achievements other than rolling back Obama-era regulations. Even the White House's most far-reaching success, the confirmation of Justice Neil Gorsuch to the Supreme Court, required the Senate rewriting its own rules to overcome Democratic opposition.

Though the White House continues to push for progress on stalled health care legislation, there are only five legislative days remaining once Congress returns from a two-week spring break. Plus, another deadline looms: Trump and the Republican-controlled Congress must still pass a bill before April 28 to keep the government running.

If they fail, a shutdown would begin on Trump's 100th day in office.

Bloomberg: Islamic State Kills Dozens in Egypt Palm Sunday Bombings

Egyptian President Declares 3-Month State of Emergency

Suspected suicide bombers struck two Egyptian churches on Palm Sunday, killing more than 40 people in the deadliest assault on civilians since President Abdel-Fattah El-Sisi's election nearly three years ago.

Islamic State claimed the attacks on the St. George church in the Nile Delta city of Tanta and St. Mark's cathedral in Alexandria, according to the U.S.-based SITE Intel Group, which monitors jihadist channels on social media. At least 27 people were killed in the Tanta bombing, the day's first blast, Health Ministry spokesman Khaled Mogahed said. In Alexandria, at least 16 were killed in an attack on the seat of the Coptic Orthodox church there.

The violence demonstrates Islamic State's intent to expand its presence in Egypt beyond the rugged confines of the Sinai Peninsula. That will likely add more pressure on El-Sisi to restore order as he seeks to attract foreign capital and placate a population increasingly frustrated with economic hardship.

The bombings come less than a week after El-Sisi met President Donald Trump at the White House, where he was praised for his efforts to fight terrorism. Targeting two major cities outside Sinai lets Islamic State show it's "still able to operate -- despite this growing pressure -- and to embarrass the Egyptian government after Sisi's visit to Washington" and before Pope Francis's visit this month, said Michael Horowitz, director of intelligence at the political risk consultancy Prime Source.

'Great Confidence'

Trump tweeted that he's "sad to hear about the terrorist attack in Egypt" and has "great confidence that President Al Sisi will handle the situation properly." The U.S. "will continue to support Egypt's security and stability in its efforts to defeat terrorism," State Department spokesman Mark Toner said in a statement. Al Sisi ordered the deployment of military units to help protect vital installations nationwide, the presidency said in a statement.

Egyptian shares dropped after the bombings, with the benchmark EGX 30 Index retreating 1.6 percent, the most since Feb. 27, at the close in Cairo.

The incidents bore the hallmarks of the Islamic State -- multi-pronged attacks aimed at inflicting as much damage as possible while minimizing the group's losses. In Alexandria, one of the casualties was a police officer who blocked the suspected suicide bomber from entering the church after he evaded a metal detector, security footage aired on television showed. In Tanta, the remains of a suspected suicide bomber were found in the church, the state-run Middle East News Agency said, citing an unidentified security official.

The bombings were "a mixed bag" for El-Sisi, said Samuel Tadros, a senior fellow at the Hudson Institute in Washington.

'Dangerous Development'

"On the one hand it reinforces his narrative that Egypt is in war against terrorism, rallying the nation around the flag and so forth," Tadros said. "At the same time the attacks send a message of incompetence of the security apparatus" in containing the militancy, he said.

If the jihadist group proves able to operate more extensively outside of Sinai, "that would be a very dangerous development," he added.

El-Sisi declared that the attacks "will not undermine the resolve and true will of the Egyptian people to counter the forces of evil," according to a statement from the presidency. But the violence against civilians dealt the president a new blow at a time when his support is already being tested by the hardships Egyptians are being forced to endure as part of his economic reform program.

Currency Controls

A November decision to abandon currency controls helped to secure a $12 billion International Monetary Fund loan and attract foreign investors. Yet it has also caused the pound to lose half its value against the dollar, sending prices soaring and annual core inflation climbing to over 33 percent in February.

Bottom of Form

The militant threat exploded after the 2013 military-backed popular uprising against Islamist President Mohamed Mursi and the deadly crackdown on his Muslim Brotherhood group that followed. The expansion of the attacks outside the confines of Sinai and, according to Egyptian media, a new focus on targeting Christians have only proven the jihadists' resilience. A deadly bombing at the Cairo cathedral in December, claimed by Islamic State's local affiliate, killed at least 25 worshippers.

The latest bombing "won't be the last terrorist attack because the state fights terrorism but doesn't fight terrorism-inspiring ideas, which is the main cause of the problem," billionaire Naguib Sawiris wrote on his official Twitter account.

Loyal Backers

Christians, who are widely estimated to make up around 10 percent of the nation's 92 million residents, have long complained of discrimination in the Muslim majority nation. They were among El-Sisi's strongest backers after Mursi was pushed from power, but that loyalty, too, is being strained by the government's failure to contain the assaults on their community.

"This type of attack is the most dangerous, since it inflicts maximum amount of damage on human lives, disrupts tourism, and shakes the image of the state," said Ghanem Nuseibeh, founder of London-based consulting firm Cornerstone Global Associates. "It turns the conflict from a confrontation in the desert to a civil conflict in the heart of Egypt."

"This attack is likely to embolden the government, and provide it with even more legitimacy in its crackdown on Islamists and on dissent," he said.

WSJ: Democrats' Conditions for Tax Overhaul Make Bipartisan Deal Unlikely

GOP attempts to reach across the aisle are complicated by lack of agreement on priorities

By RICHARD RUBIN

Democrats are starting to settle on a price for participating in a tax-code overhaul, and many Republicans won't want to pay it.

Democrats say they oppose net tax cuts and will resist proposals that mostly benefit high-income households. Those priorities diverge from President Donald Trump's repeated promise to "cut the hell out of taxes" and congressional Republicans' plans to lower marginal tax rates and repeal the estate tax.

"Tax reform's got to be responsible and it's got to be progressive," said Sen. Ben Cardin (D., Md.).

Republicans made overtures across the aisle in recent weeks and, in theory, Democratic participation on tax policy could ease legislative challenges for Republicans vexed by slim House and Senate majorities and internal disagreements. By attracting Democratic votes, Republicans could overcome procedural hurdles without uniting fractious wings of their own party.

TRUMP'S FIRST 100 DAYS

There is, at some level, rhetorical room for agreement. Mr. Trump says middle-class tax cuts are a top priority. House Speaker Paul Ryan (R., Wis.) says he's aiming for his plan to be revenue neutral—collecting as much money over the next decade as the current system does. Mix Mr. Trump's class rhetoric, Mr. Ryan's budgetary promise and the prospect of spending on infrastructure and there is a recipe for bipartisanship.

But so far, those priorities aren't widely shared among Republicans and GOP plans haven't matched them. Mr. Trump's campaign plan delivered half its tax cuts to the top 1% of households, according to the Tax Policy Center, a joint project of the Urban Institute and Brookings Institution. House Republicans haven't shown in detail how their plan adds up and don't want to tie infrastructure and taxes together. Lower tax rates on businesses, investors and top earners are a unifying force in the GOP, and many lawmakers are reluctant to give that up to get a deal with Democrats.

Even if the White House and Democrats reach a conceptual agreement on taxes, any accord would drive many Republicans away and require the Trump administration and lawmakers to make decisions on hundreds of details.

Still, White House officials, who declared they are taking the lead on tax policy, have been meeting with Democratic lawmakers. House Ways and Means Chairman Rep. Kevin Brady (R., Texas) met with two groups of Democrats last week.

Democrats say they are wary but listening.

Mr. Trump's unpopularity, especially among Democratic voters, gives lawmakers political advantages in opposing the admin

KATHY A. BOLTEN KBOLTEN@DMREG.COM © COPYRIGHT 2017, DES MOINES REGISTER AND TRIBUNE CO.

Part of The Des Moines Register series "Driving Drunk: Iowa's deadly problem."

In December 2013, Miranda Lalla was sent away for up to 25 years after she pleaded guilty to vehicular homicide while intoxicated for running over her friend in a pickup truck.

But two years, one month and eight days later, Lalla walked out of prison a free woman.

"It makes it feel like her life didn't matter," said Jessica Anderson, 28, the niece of Pamela Gross, the 44 year-old Iowa City woman Lalla killed. "I don't understand how you can take someone's life and then suffer very few consequences."

It's a common refrain from families whose loved ones have been killed in crashes caused by intoxicated drivers: Offenders are serving only a fraction of their sentences, which is evidence, they say, that Iowa doesn't treat drunken driving with the seriousness it deserves.

A Des Moines Register analysis of Iowa felony sentences lends credence to their argument.

Over the past six years, 47 people convicted of vehicular homicide while intoxicated were released after serving an average of 6 years and 4 months in prison — roughly one-fourth of their maximum sentence, Iowa Department of Corrections data show.

That's far less on average than inmates serving time for Iowa's other Class B felonies, including arson, robbery and manslaughter, all of which are punishable by up to 25 years in prison.

For example, released offenders serving time for second-degree murder or manslaughter spent 12 years on average behind bars, Iowa Board of Parole data show.

And prisoners doing time for arson or robbery, crimes where a victim may have been injured but not killed, spent seven to 15½ years on average in prison before they were released, a parole board report shows. "What message is that sending Iowa residents? That it's OK to get intoxicated, get in your car and go out and kill someone?" said Frank Harris, director of state government affairs for Mothers Against Drunk Driving, who has spent time in Iowa lobbying lawmakers for legislation that would strengthen Iowa's intoxicated driving laws. "Unfortunately, this is par for the course nationwide."

Others, however, caution that while there should be serious consequences for killing someone while driving drunk, it's equally important to provide treatment to offenders struggling with alcohol addiction. "The sentences should be done on a person-to-person basis," said Lilly Wisely of Clinton, who in 2006 pleaded guilty to vehicular homicide-reckless or eluding and served one year. "I didn't have a previous criminal history or a drunk driving history. "I was scared straight in prison. Serving a longer sentence would not have been beneficial to me at all."

How much time is enough?

Despite decades of attention on the issue, Iowa has struggled to curb the state's problem with drunken driving, which in 2016 resulted in the deaths of at least 84 people from alcohol-related crashes.

The state is investigating another 16 fatal crashes where alcohol is suspected, potentially driving that number higher. Vehicular homicide while intoxicated has been a criminal offense in Iowa since 1911, according to a guide written by the state's Legislative Services Agency.

In 1986, Iowa lawmakers, citing its serious nature, made the offense its own chapter in the state criminal code. They designated the crime as a Class D felony, punishable by up to five years in prison and fines up to $7,500.

Harsher sentences and fines were passed during the next decade, and by 1997, vehicular homicide while intoxicated was designated a Class B felony punishable up to 25 years.

Iowa is one of 14 states that sentences offenders up to 25 years or more for killing someone while driving impaired, but it also has one of the nation's most generous earnedtime policies for inmates. Depending on the crime, many offenders see their sentences cut by more than half the first day they are incarcerated.

On Dec. 2, 2005, Teresa Fagen, 15, was driving home after a Perry High School basketball game when a man fleeing police in a pickup rear-ended her vehicle, killing her. Joseph Phillip Long pleaded guilty to four charges, including vehicular homicide while intoxicated and was sentenced to up to 35 years in prison.

In late 2015, Long, now 46, was released to parole after serving 8 years and 10 months in prison.

"Once a sentence is handed down, you should be required to serve all of that sentence," said Michelle Brecht, 35, of Des Moines, who is Teresa's oldest sister. "When you go through the trial and the sentencing, it's all about the victim, which is the way it should be.

"But when you get to the prison part, it's like they forget there's a victim because they are so busy focusing on ways to get (the offender) out."

Efforts to reach Long were unsuccessful.

Through a spokesperson, parole board chairman John Hodges declined interview requests on what the board considers when deciding whether to release someone on parole. Hodges was appointed in May 2014 to the board, a full-time, taxpayer-paid position.

A spokeswoman provided the Register with criteria the board considers, including previous criminal and recidivism records, participation in prison programs, drug and alcohol history and propensity for violence.

Matthew Lindholm, a defense attorney whose practice is in West Des Moines, said the parole board also must take other factors into consideration, such as crowding in the state's prisons and whether there is room for "more dangerous offenders who need to be housed." "Everybody is so quick to point the finger at the offender — let's put them in jail and throw away the key," Lindholm said. "Statistics show that incarceration doesn't work. These are people with an addiction, and we need to look at solving their addictions."

Wisconsin lawmakers for the past three years have debated whether to require offenders convicted of vehicular homicide while intoxicated to serve a mandatory minimum sentence before becoming parole eligible. Polk County Attorney John Sarcone said that is worth exploring.

"The penalty (now) is such that it's almost like you're forgiving certain things," Sarcone said. "Maybe it should be higher, like second-degree murder, which has a 70 percent mandatory minimum" on the sentence.

'They haven't learned their lesson'

Intoxicated driving third or subsequent offense is Iowa's most serious charge for impaired drivers who haven't hurt or killed anyone, no matter how many times they're charged. Other states have added graduated levels and increased penalties for repeat drunken drivers. Beginning in January, Wisconsin can punish someone convicted of a fourth intoxicated driving charge with up to six years in prison. In addition, someone convicted of their 10th lifetime drunken-driving offense in Wisconsin must serve at least four years before becoming eligible for parole. However, an Iowa coalition that made recommendations last year for getting impaired drivers off the state's roads did not include stiffer penalties for current drunken driving charges.

In past years, the Iowa Peace Officers Association has supported strengthening Iowa's drunken driving laws. A spokeswoman said the group stopped advocating for changes because of the lack of interest from Iowa lawmakers. Sarcone said he would favor stricter sentences for repeat drunken driving offenders, particularly for those with three or more convictions.

"That's the one area that ought to be looked at because for that small group, they are a danger to everyone," Sarcone said. "It's obvious they haven't learned their lesson." Since 2005, at least 11,390 people have been charged in Iowa with operating while intoxicated third or subsequent offense, a Register review of court record records shows. Among them is Leon Kurt Shivers, who in May 2012 and June 2014 was charged with third or subsequent offense drunken driving. Shivers eventually was sentenced to up to five years in prison but served 8 months and 25 days. Eight months after his release to parole, Shivers was driving drunk when he slammed into the minivan of John McCartney, 82, killing him. "The lack of teeth to our laws is frustrating," said Story County Attorney Jessica Reynolds, whose staff prosecuted Shivers on the June 2014 charge. "When we send someone to prison for five years, we believe that they should go to prison for five years." A review of data provided by the Iowa Justice Data Warehouse shows that on average, people convicted of third or subsequent drunken driving spend less than three months in prison before they are released to an OWI treatment center. Offenders who don't go to a treatment center typically spend 15 months or less in prison, the data show. "It's every prosecutor's worst nightmare to have something like this happen," Reynolds said, "that you work hard to send someone to prison for a certain amount of time, they are let out and re-offend and kill someone."

'People know drunk driving is wrong'

Pamela Gross' family remains puzzled why Lalla served less than three years of her 25-year sentence.

Gross and Lalla had gotten into a fight in a parking lot after the two had been at a bar, court records show. Lalla got into her truck to leave, knocked Gross down with the truck and then ran over her, killing her.

Lalla spent more than a year in the Johnson County jail before she entered a guilty plea and was sentenced.

That jail time, as well as her time in prison, contributed toward her early release, as did her completion of a prison program, a parole board spokesman told the Iowa City Press-Citizen last year.

Lalla declined an interview request. Her parole was revoked in January because she was consuming alcohol and living with a felon. She's at a community-based corrections facility in Cedar Rapids.

Gross' family remains unsatisfied with her punishment.

"People know drunk driving is wrong and the risks involved with doing it," said Dianne Hesseltine, Gross' sister. "There should be mandatory sentences when you kill someone when you're driving drunk."

DMR: Duel on guns at public venues in Iowa

Bill's passage spurs debate on potential allowance at sites such as courts, Capitol

WILLIAM PETROSKI

BPETROSK@DMREG.COM

The passage of a wide-ranging gun rights bill by Iowa lawmakers is raising questions about whether local officials can stop gun-carrying citizens from entering courthouses and city halls, although supporters of the measure insist there won't be any problems.

Sen. Nate Boulton, D-Des Moines, an attorney who voted against House File 517, said the legislation lacks clarity in defining local government control over firearms in public buildings. A "pre-emption" section of the bill says that Iowans can sue any city, county or township that enacts firearms bans if they believe they are adversely affected by the ban.

"I think there were a lot of missed opportunities to expressly define where these rights and limitations are," Boulton said. "Right now there are a lot of grey areas and it is going to require court interpretation."

But Sen. Dan Dawson, R-Council Bluffs, the bill's floor manager, said nothing has changed in current law regarding security in Iowa's public buildings. The legislation does include a "just cause" provision for people who believe they have been adversely affected, he added.

"Our position is that it doesn't change the status-quo out there," said Dawson, who is also an Iowa Division of Criminal Investigation agent. For courthouses in Polk County and Pottawattamie County, for example, where dangerous weapons are banned and people must pass through a metal detector, there would be a "pretty high threshold" for someone to prove that while the buildings are highly secure, they are adversely affected, Dawson said. He believes city officials can prohibit weapons in city halls and he noted that schools will remain gun-free zones under a different section of state law.

The Iowa Judicial Branch, representing the state's courts, is officially opposed to the legislation, which received final approval Thursday from the Iowa House.

"The Judicial Branch registered against HF 517 solely because we are unsure if the pre-emption section of the bill (Division VII) will maintain the status-quo on courthouse security," said Steve Davis, communications director for the Iowa Judicial Branch.

Iowa Attorney General Tom Miller, the Iowa County Attorneys Association, and the Iowa Judges Association are also registered as opposed to the gun bill, which has a host of other provisions. They includes a controversial “stand your ground” section that says a law-abiding person does not have a duty to retreat before using deadly force with a gun.

Bill headed to Branstad

The bill now goes to Gov. Terry Branstad, who must decide whether to sign it or veto it. Branstad spokesman Ben Hammes said the governor is reserving judgment until he has time to carefully review the bill, as he does with all legislation. Polk County Attorney John Sarcone, a Democrat, told The Des Moines Register on Friday he wants Branstad to veto the gun bill. There is no question that local rules banning guns in courthouses and city halls will be challenged in the courts, Sarcone said, and he is concerned how the legislation will be interpreted. He also has concerns about possible difficulties in prosecuting homicide cases as a result of the stand your ground provisions. He described his stance as not political, but pro-public safety. “We come to the courthouse to resolve disputes in a peaceful fashion, not to fear if someone is carrying a weapon if they don’t like the result,” Sarcone said. “Banning all types of weapons from the courthouse just makes sense.”

Sarcone said the gun legislation raises the possibility that someone could be charged with a felony crime, yet not have a criminal record and still have a permit to carry a gun that could be brought into a courtroom.

“Can they sit there at the counsel table with a gun?” Sarcone asked.

Firearms at the Iowa Capitol

One legal issue is clear: The new legislation will allow Iowans who have a permit to carry firearms to have concealed guns as they walk inside the Capitol to visit with legislators, watch debates and attend committee meetings. Visitors to the Capitol are now screened and they aren’t allowed to bring guns into the building, although some legislators have acknowledged being armed inside the Capitol. Sen. Jake Chapman, RAdel, said he believes lawabiding Iowans should be allowed to carry firearms at the Capitol, and in courthouses and city halls as well. “The reality is that this building is owned by the people of Iowa,” Chapman said in an interview at the Capitol. “My seat out there is not my seat; it is the seat of the people of Senate District 10. This is their seat. They own the building. If they have a right to keep and bear arms, they have a right to carry in their building.” Sen. Tod Bowman, DMAquoketa, has a different view. He points to an incident in September 2014 in which a man died at the Jackson County Courthouse in Maquoketa after he pulled a gun from a briefcase and pointed it at the county assessor. Francis Glaser, 71, a former Maquoketa city manager, had become agitated and vocal about his property taxes going up during a weekly meeting of Jackson County Board of Supervisors. Glaser pulled a small gun and fired at County Assessor Deb Lane but missed. A struggle ensued with a county supervisor and Glaser died when he was struck by a second shot.

“Most people that I have talked to don’t want guns freely floating into these environments where feelings and emotions get high,” Bowman said. Bowman voted for the overall gun rights bill, but he supported an unsuccessful effort to amend the measure.

Rep. Dave Heaton, RMount Pleasant, was among a handful of Republicans who voted against the gun bill. He said last month he supported most of the gun rights provisions, but the section applying to cities and counties would keep him from voting for it. He pointed to the 1986 murder of then-Mount Pleasant Mayor Edd King, who was shot by an angry constituent during a city council meeting.

“My town will never forget what happened,” Heaton said. “They are my constituents. I can’t support this bill because of what this bill does.”

One of the gun bill’s most controversial provisions, which would have prevented the Board of Regents from enacting gun-free zones on college campuses, was previously removed from the bill.

DMR Editorial: Legislature should ban use of traffic cameras

Regulation of the devices won't solve the profit-motive problem

At the beginning of this legislative session, it appeared that Iowa's state lawmakers were finally prepared to ban the use of traffic-enforcement cameras throughout the state.

The proposal seemed to have the support of both the governor and the Senate's Judiciary Committee chairman, Brad Zaun.

Then lawmakers gravitated toward a compromise proposal that would allow the cameras to remain. The final version approved by the Senate sought only to regulate the cameras' use by limiting their deployment to state-approved, high-risk locations, with fines capped and the revenue used for infrastructure improvements and public safety.

Now, however, the pendulum may be swinging back toward an outright ban. More than two dozen representatives in the Iowa House are supporting a bill that would prohibit the use of red-light and speeding cameras.

Not surprisingly, the biggest obstacles to both proposals are the Iowa cities that rely on revenue from the cameras. Cedar Rapids, for example, generates more than $3 million a year from the cameras. Along with the cities of Muscatine and Des Moines, Cedar Rapids is now suing the Iowa Department of Transportation over the state agency's efforts to regulate the devices. It may be only a few weeks before a judge rules on the question of whether the state has the authority to order cities to take down cameras in locations where they aren't improving traffic safety.

Iowa lawmakers who remain unsure of how to proceed should take a close look at the arguments presented in this case. The cities are opposing a DOT rule that requires 1,000 feet of separation between a traffic camera and a speed-limit reduction. That rule was imposed after research conformed what common sense would indicate: placing the cameras any closer than 1,000 feet leads to more rear-end collisions as law-abiding drivers slam on the brakes to avoid being ticketed for exceeding the reduced speed limit.

It's a clear-cut example of how cities are willing to use the cameras not to make their streets safer, but to raise revenue. In fact, it could be argued that the cities are raising revenue at the expense of public safety — placing cameras in a manner that leads to more, not fewer, crashes.

Lawmakers should also be mindful of what triggered the lawsuit: In 2015, after the DOT examined the cameras' impact on traffic flow around the state, it determined that 21 of the 31 cameras in use could remain in place due to their positive impact on traffic safety. But almost one-third of the cameras couldn't meet that standard and had to either be eliminated or modified, the DOT said. The cities didn't accept that.

Again and again, backers of the technology have argued that those who don't like the cameras should just watch their speed and they'll have nothing to worry about. Not true. They'll still have to be concerned with rear-end collisions caused by obvious speed traps. They'll also have to be concerned with their local law enforcement agencies being turned into revenue centers by their city council.

As effective as the cameras are in identifying and penalizing violators, they also invite abuse. Some states have been forced to pass laws prohibiting cities from collecting more than 30 or 40 percent of their total revenue from traffic citations.

As the DOT court case makes clear, some Iowa cities not only refuse to respect the DOT's authority to regulate traffic cameras, they are also willing to spend taxpayer money arguing that point in court. They also are unwilling to act appropriately even when their own data shows the cameras aren't being used in a way that enhances public safety.

That's why the Iowa Legislature needs to move forward with its initial effort to ban the devices outright. It's the only way to prevent cities from continuing to partner with questionable, revenue-sharing companies that spit out citations in the form of civil penalties that completely bypass the criminal courts

DMR: THE FUTURE OF IOWA'S 100 COURTHOUSES

Warren County may be harbinger of efforts to meld services

GRANT RODGERS

GRODGERS@DMREG.COM

KNOXVILLE, Ia. — The court appearance here Wednesday by Warren County resident Erin Karas lasted just two minutes.

But it pulled Karas away from her restaurant job to make the 35-minute trip east from her home in Indianola to the Marion County Courthouse. Warren County's courthouse has sat mostly empty for more than nine months, evacuated amid worries about mold, plumbing issues and other problems.

"I'm missing out on work today because of this," said Karas, 45, who pleaded guilty to providing alcohol to a minor at her home last month.

For more than two decades, Iowa Supreme Court chief justices have issued intermittent warnings that budget considerations might someday force consolidation of the legal system. The move of Warren County's court operations is temporary, but what residents, attorneys and judges have experienced since June offers a glimpse of what court consolidation could bring.

State Rep. Chip Baltimore, a Boone Republican and attorney, said in an interview with The Des Moines Register that certain measures, such as closing clerks of court offices in certain counties, could be worth considering again — particularly in the age of digital filing.

"I think it has to come up," he said. "We talk about government efficiency and efficient use of tax dollars. ... Not that we are going to close a bunch of clerk's offices, but do they need to be there 40 hours a week, every week of the year with a full staff. I think that's definitely something we need to take a look at."

There is no plan in the works to consolidate court services, said State Court Administrator David Boyd, who is set to retire in September after four decades of working for Iowa's court system. And there are state laws barring certain moves, such as creating regional litigation centers or moving clerk offices out of county seats.

But Boyd admits there may come a time when offering court services in all 99 counties could be reconsidered.

"I really do hope at some point we are in fact considered to be a separate and equal branch of government and properly funded," he said. "That's not to say that we have to continue to do things in a particular way just because we've always done it that way." Legislators in January cut $3 million from of the judicial branch's current budget as part of cost-cutting effort spread across the entire state government, causing a $400,000 budget gap. In response, Boyd and court officials chose to close courts for an unpaid furlough day on May 26. The branch was already hamstrung when legislators in 2016 gave the judicial branch the same $178.7 million it received the year before, forcing a hiring freeze, Chief Justice Mark Cady told lawmakers in January. “We are starting to see delays in our court process, and I fear that this is going to continue if our needs aren’t met,” he said at the time.

While the judicial branch administers court services in the counties and employs clerk staff, judges and other workers, the responsibility for maintaining the state’s aging courthouses falls to county governments. The average age of an Iowa courthouse is 100 years old. Thirty-eight of the current courthouses were built before 1900.

In May 2016, Warren County voters shot down a $35 million plan to build a new courthouse and jail to replace the existing courthouse built in 1939 with financial support from the Public Works Administration. One month later, Arthur Gamble, chief judge of the Fifth Judicial District of Iowa, ordered court services to vacate the building amid health concerns.

Court officials hope they can return to Indianola next month. Warren County is renovating a former Fusion Fitness center into temporary courtrooms. It will spend about $100,000 annually to lease the space while a more permanent solution is found to repair or replace the town square’s deteriorating courthouse.

Years of chatter, but opposition remains

In 1991, lawmakers faced a $300 million budget deficit. In an interview with the Register, former Chief Justice Arthur McGiverin outlined several ideas aimed at saving money, including the creation of regional “litigation centers” that could replace court services in some counties. McGiverin, an Ottumwa resident, emphasized that he would prefer having court in all 99 counties, but admitted “that may well be difficult to do” in the future. In January 1993, McGiverin announced in the annual State of the Judiciary Address to legislators that court administrators were working on plans to move courts out of several county courthouses and into regional centers. But the plan met strong opposition. The Iowa State Bar Association and rural county supervisors organized opposition amid concerns, in part, that closing court services would hurt small-town economies, even if other offices like county auditors and treasurers remained in courthouses.

That same concern would likely be raised again — along with concerns about lowans’ access to justice — if lawmakers and judicial officials were to consider consolidating services again, said Skip Kenyon, president of the Iowa State Bar Association. Kenyon is a longtime attorney in the Union County seat of Creston, where a district court judge travels to the courthouse for hearings one day a week and an associate district court judge comes on a different day.

In neighboring Adams, Taylor and Ringgold counties, a judge comes to the courthouse for hearings every other week, Kenyon said.

“If you don’t have that draw to help bring commerce in, I think it’s real hard for the town to continue to thrive,” he said. “And I think the courthouse is part of that. It brings people to town.”

Judicial branch officials under Chief Justice Louis Lavorato in 2001 released a cost-savings restructuring plan that would have moved clerk of court offices out of several counties in the state and into regional centers. But the plan was pulled weeks after it was released when lawyers and county officials again spoke out.

“Chief Justice Lavorato and I took a lot of heat,” said Boyd, the deputy court administrator at the time.

Two years later, then-Gov. Tom Vilsack, a Democrat, signed a bill that included language prohibiting the creation of “regional litigation centers” — a reaction borne out of the court’s restructuring plan floated in 2001, Boyd said.

In her 2009 address to lawmakers, Chief Justice Marsha Ternus briefly raised the issue again amid a national recession.

“We simply do not want to spend precious time on a concept that you are not prepared to consider, and in the past, you have acted to prevent any movement toward consolidating court operations,” she told lawmakers at the time.

Consolidation in a microcosm

Warren County attorneys have gotten a taste of space sharing due to the forced closure of the courthouse in June 2016.

Under the order from Gamble, the Fifth District chief judge, most of Warren County’s court services were moved to the neighboring Marion and Madison county courthouses in Knoxville and Winterset, respectively. In the order, Gamble described “periodic” leaks of sewer water found in courtrooms, deteriorating air quality that made some employees sick, and dirty restrooms in the old building.

“Unfortunately, it is likely these alternate places of holding court will not be convenient for the citizens of Warren County. However, the board has not provided an alternative,” Gamble wrote at the time. Warren County Attorney Doug Eichholz, who was appointed to the position, said the emergency closure of the courthouse has put his office approximately $41,000 over its yearly budget, partly due to the travel costs now associated with cases. To cut down on the costs of driving to Knoxville, the sheriff lent the attorney’s office a spare vehicle, and prosecutors try to carpool, he said.

Sharing space in aging courthouses is a temporary fix.

Several attorneys and others interviewed by the Register agreed that consolidating court services into regional centers would require construction of new facilities. “I think that almost unquestionably that would have to happen,” Boyd said.

Others, such as the Iowa State Bar Association’s Kenyon, suggest that the most worrisome aspect of consolidation is the effect on people using court services.

Since the closure of the Warren County Courthouse, some of the biggest frustrations have come from families involved with juvenile proceedings.

Juvenile matters were moved to Winterset, a 25-mile drive from Indianola and approximately 40 miles one-way from both Carlisle and Southeast Warren Junior-Senior High School in Liberty Center. Juvenile court hearings take place on Monday mornings. Children who are being held by the county have to be driven to and from court by their parents or guardians, said Alex Crabb, the first assistant Warren County attorney. “You’re picking your kid up at school and now you’re driving all the way over to Winterset,” he said. “I think that’s where I’ve had most of the frustration.”

Mason Ouderkirk, whose Indianola law firm sits on the town square directly north of the empty courthouse, said the costs passed on to clients is the chief burden. The travel costs for the average 45 minutes he spends on the road driving to and from Knoxville or Winterset can add “hundreds of dollars to the cost of a hearing for a client,” he said. “It’s a burden directly upon the client,” said Ouderkirk, who specializes in civil cases and family law. “They’re paying me for my time, and that’s unfortunate.”

Kenyon raised a similar concern. A state budget crisis forced the judicial branch to belt-tighten around 2009 and cut back on travel costs for judges and other employees, he said. At the time, he was litigating a personal injury case filed in Adair County that ultimately went to trial at the Dallas County Courthouse to accommodate the judge’s travel schedule. That meant Kenyon and the other attorneys and witnesses were on the road daily to Adel throughout the trial. “It created a lot of additional expense for my client,” he said. “If you go to something like a regional center, that makes it that much more expensive, and the people who need (court services) are the ones that are going to have to be paying for it,” he said. Warren County officials are trying to decide their next move. They could choose to tear down the existing courthouse on the Indianola square and start from scratch at another location. Or they could keep the courthouse where it is, but build a jail at another location. A new bond referendum is currently scheduled for Aug. 8.

DMR: DRIVING DRUNK: IOWA'S DEADLY PROBLEM

State struggles to reduce number of repeat offenders

Since 2005, over 11,300 have been hit with at least their third drunken driving charge

Part of The Des Moines Register series "Driving Drunk: Iowa's deadly problem."

Randy John Stubbe was sent to prison in 2008 for driving while intoxicated in a Butler County crash that killed his wife. After he got out, he was charged twice more with driving drunk and in March returned to prison for two more years.

Deanna Marie Gliem of Des Moines was drinking before she crashed her car into another vehicle in 2015, killing the driver and passenger. Before she could go to trial, she was arrested for drunken driving in Lucas County.

And Donald Dean Gridley of Fairfield served less than a year in prison in the 1990s for causing the death of a passenger in a drunken driving crash. When he got out, he was arrested twice more for drunken driving, then charged with vehicular homicide while intoxicated in a 2012 crash that killed his father.

Talk with Iowa law enforcement officers, and they will tell story after story of people arrested repeatedly for being drunk behind the wheel. It's a constant struggle that is costing lives, they say.

"You would think, as a human being, if I killed somebody while I was drinking and driving that I wouldn't drink and drive anymore," Woodbury County Sheriff Dave Drew said. "That just shows you the power of alcohol in some people's lives. Some people are better off never touching it."

An exclusive Des Moines Register analysis of more than 200,000 Iowa court records involving intoxicated driving over the past 12 years illustrates the magnitude of that struggle:

» Since 2005, 222 people have been charged with vehicular homicide while intoxicated, and nearly one-third previously had been arrested for driving while intoxicated. Several had been arrested multiple times.

» At least 13 of those drivers were caught driving drunk again after they had been charged or convicted of killing someone while driving under the influence.

» More than 11,300 people were charged with intoxicated driving-third or subsequent offense, meaning they had been charged with driving while intoxicated at least three times in the past dozen years. The repercussions of those stark statistics play out daily on Iowa's roads, too often ending in tragedy, such as on Oct. 17, 2006, in Story County. A driver weaving in a van on U.S. Highway 30 slammed head-on into a sedan and killed Jonathan Baugh, a 17-year-old Valley High School senior who was on his way to watch a volleyball match in Ames. The van's driver, Phillip Ray Stephens, had an open bottle in the vehicle and reeked of alcohol, court records show. Stephens had already been convicted of drunken driving in 2000 and had another charge pending for a January 2005 arrest, according to court records.

Stephens was sentenced to up to 18 years in prison for the fatal crash but served only 5½ years before being released in September 2012 to a community program. In May 2016, he was discharged from parole and within weeks was arrested twice for operating a vehicle while intoxicated, with sentencing scheduled for Monday. “He’s using his vehicle like a weapon when he gets behind the wheel,” said Tracy Baugh, a Baptist minister and father of Jonathan, who was among the 1,100 people who have been killed in alcohol-related crashes in Iowa since 2005. Stephens did not respond to a request for an interview. Tracy and his wife, Pam, who now live in Spencer, want Iowa to require intoxicated drivers who kill someone to serve 80 percent or more of their sentence. And they want to see chronic offenders such as Stephens barred from driving for life. “People on the road with him are escaping death — just like if there’s a gunman in a shopping mall and people walk away unharmed,” Tracy Baugh said.

‘Drinking is like a deadly weapon’

Donald Gridley, who has twice killed people while driving drunk, said people like him are “playing with disaster.”

“Bad things are going to happen to you eventually,” Gridley told the Register during a telephone interview from Mount Pleasant Correctional Facility.

A jury in 2014 convicted after a jury convicted him of vehicular homicide while intoxicated. “Drinking is a like a deadly weapon, and somebody will either be hurt or wind up dead because of it.” Of the 13 drivers in the past dozen years caught driving drunk again after already killing someone while driving drunk, nine, including Gridley, Stephens and Stubbe, had served time in prison. Four, including Gliem, were awaiting trial. Gridley’s first conviction for causing a death came in 1992, when he pleaded guilty to involuntary manslaughter and driving drunk. That was followed by two more arrests for drunken driving before the night of drinking in December 2012 when his father, Patrick Gridley, was killed. Gridley said his father had persuaded him to attend a funeral with him. Afterward, the two went to a bar and drank into the early hours. “I made a bad choice to go to the funeral and then to drink,” Gridley said. “It ended up in a mess.” Gridley said he doesn’t remember the crash or whether he was driving. Court records say he ran a stop sign and drove his father’s Ford pickup into a ditch in rural Wapello County, then walked to a nearby farmhouse for help. A county sheriff’s deputy found his father, 65, dead inside the truck.

A test administered several hours after the crash showed that Donald Gridley’s alcohol concentration was 0.198 percent, more than twice Iowa’s legal limit.

It also detected marijuana, oxycodone and an anxiety medication, court records show. Gridley was sentenced to up to 25 years in prison. His expected release date is December 2025. While in prison, Gridley said he’s attended weekly meetings of Alcoholics Anonymous and Narcotics Anonymous and attended a class called “Thinking for a Change.”

But, he said, he’s not received any treatment or counseling for his addiction to alcohol.

Nonetheless, Donald’s mother, Linda Gridley, said her son has been behind bars long enough.

“He’s not the man he was five years ago,” said Gridley, 69, of Fairfield. “He talks differently and he acts differently. He’s paid his dues — now he’s in there without any rehabilitation and with no treatment.” Donald Gridley also believes he’s ready to be released after more than two years behind bars. He said he won’t drink again because “of all the trouble and pain and agony it caused my mother and the rest of my family.”

‘He should have been sitting in jail’

The Register’s analysis of tens of thousands of intoxicated while driving arrests since 2005 illustrates Iowa’s shortcomings in keeping impaired motorists from getting back behind the wheel.

Intoxicated driving third or subsequent offense, filed against more than 11,300 people in Iowa in the past dozen years, is the state's most serious charge for impaired drivers who haven't hurt or killed anyone. The Register found offenders who had been arrested as many as eight times for impaired driving since 2005, but they still faced the "third or subsequent offense" charge. One of the people who faced that charge was 53-year-old Kirk Arnell Thomas of Marshall County, who was sentenced in February 2016 to up to 15 years in prison as a habitual drunken driving offender after his third arrest in less than six years. In fall 2015, Thomas was arrested twice for driving while intoxicated by Marshalltown police. Preliminary breath tests showed Thomas' blood al-

Signs you may be an alcoholic

People who answer "yes" to at least two questions on the so-called CAGE screening test should investigate whether they may be abusing alcohol. The screening test is widely used to determine potential problems with alcohol, according to the National Institute on Alcohol Abuse and Alcoholism. CAGE is an acronym based on key words from each of four questions: cut down, annoyed, guilty and eye-opener.

The questions to ask yourself are: » Have you ever felt you needed to cut down on your drinking?

» Have people annoyed you by criticizing your drinking?

» Have you ever felt guilty about drinking?

» Have you ever felt you needed a drink first thing in the morning (eye-opener) to steady your nerves or to get rid of a hangover?

cohol concentration at nearly three times the legal limit.

Thomas, in a telephone interview, said he has been attending Alcoholics Anonymous meetings and life-skills classes while incarcerated at Iowa's North Central Correctional Facility in Rockwell City.

He said he's lucky he didn't seriously injure or kill someone when he drove drunk.

"There was no good reason for me to be doing that," Thomas said. "But I did it, for some foolish, unknown reason."

Law enforcement officials say something is wrong that people like Thomas can't be kept from behind the wheel of a vehicle after multiple intoxicated driving charges.

“It’s frustrating to me because, one, he shouldn’t have been driving because he had been barred,” said Marshalltown police Lt. Rick Bellile, who arrested Thomas on Oct. 6, 2015, for third-offense drunken driving. Thomas had also been arrested four weeks earlier for drunken driving.

“The problem with our system is that we let these repeat offenders out of jail while they are waiting (for trial), and they go out” and continue to drive while they are intoxicated, Bellile said.

The fact is most people caught driving drunk have done it before, said Kim Brangoccio, manager of UnityPoint Health’s Powell Chemical Dependency Center in Des Moines.

Alcoholism is a “chronic relapsing disease, and although people can get treatment, sometimes they really don’t want to quit,” she said.

Typically, Iowa requires those charged with third-offense intoxicated driving to undergo treatment. Many are sent to community-based residential correctional facilities, which provide substance abuse treatment programs licensed through the Iowa Department of Public Health.

Treatment isn’t always successful, however, particularly if offenders fall back into old habits. “If they get back into similar life situations with the same stressors and the same friend and the same job, they’ll relapse,” Brangoccio said. “Changing just a few things is not enough — you have to really make some significant changes.” People need to understand what causes them to drink, she said. “If the reason you drink has to do with coping or has to do with your inability to deal with your own self-anxiety — if you don’t get help for those things at the same time you’re getting alcohol or drug help, your chance of relapse is very high.”

Searching for a better way

Meanwhile, Iowa continues to look for ways to better address its drunken driving problem, particularly repeat offenders.

Last year, a coalition submitted 66 proposals for reducing impaired driving in the state. One of those has made its way into a bill making its way through Legislature. The proposal would give law enforcement jurisdictions the option of participating in a program requiring some offenders to provide a breath sample twice a day to prove they haven’t been drinking. A similar program in South Dakota called 24-7 requires repeat drunken drivers to take a Breathalyzer test twice a day as part of their bond or parole conditions. Since the program has been in place, arrests for repeat drunken driving have fallen 12 percent, studies have shown. Polk County associate district court Judge Carol Egly wonders whether some drivers must be saved from themselves.

“There are some people that — maybe one should just assume — should not be driving regardless of what they do with their treatment program,” said Egly, whose assignments include presiding over intoxicated driving sentencing. “Maybe we should be identifying those people and making it possible for them not to be using automobiles.”

That idea appeals to Tracy and Pam Baugh, whose teenage son died in a drunken driving crash 11 years ago. Stephens, the driver who killed their son, was arrested Aug. 26, 2016, after a Johnson County sheriff’s deputy saw him swerving “all over” eastbound Interstate Highway 80 in Iowa City, court records show. Stephens “smelled strongly of ingested alcohol.”

Six weeks earlier, Stephens was arrested at Saylorville Lake in Polk County for operating a boat while intoxicated.

A trial is pending in the Polk County case; Stephens pleaded guilty to the Johnson County charge and will be sentenced Monday.

“It’s like how many more lives does it take before they throw the key away,” Pam Baugh said. “Whose life is going to be next?”

DMR: Bondurant community remembers killed family

LINH TA

LTA@DMREG.COM

The community of Bondurant is close-knit.

Most people know each other, or know of each other, residents say.

So when they learned that three of their own were killed, they did what close communities do — they gathered to support one another.

“Because it’s Bondurant, people just come to help each other,” said Samantha Hunter, a 24-yearold from the town.

Outside Bondurant-Farrar High School, people cried and embraced during a vigil to remember Mark, Charla and Tawni Nicholson.

In a circle around the flagpole, people stood shoulder-to-shoulder with candles flickering against the night sky.

It was 9:30 p.m. Thursday when Polk County deputies went to the Nicholsons’ home to conduct a welfare check. There, they found the bodies of Mark Alan Nicholson, 58, Charla Lee Nicholson, 56, and their daughter Tawni Alexis Nicholson, 24.

Chase Marcus Nicholson, 20, is currently in Polk County Jail on a valid material witness warrant, according to a news release. He is being held on a $2 million cash-only bond. He is the son of Mark and Charla, and is Tawni’s brother.

Hunter and Lindsay Schaper, 24, went to Bondurant- Farrar High School with Tawni.

They also roomed together at Iowa State University, where she graduated in August.

“She was just a ray of sunshine,” Schaper said. “She always had open arms for everybody.”

When they learned both she and her parents were killed, they were shocked.

It’s something that doesn’t happen in the town of about 5,000 people.

“It’s one of those things you can’t believe that happened here,” Hunter said. “They treated you like you were a part of their family.” As Chase Nicholson sits in Polk County Jail, additional charges in relation to the case are possible, according to law enforcement.

But as the community mourned together outside, Jeff Sanderson, pastor at the Federated Church of Bondurant, addressed them. He reminded them of one thing — that in the afterlife, anything is possible.

“I pray that we have the opportunity to watch a mother, a father, a daughter and son embrace.”

DMR: KUTCHER: ‘I ALMOST OWE EVERYTHING OF WHO I AM’ TO IOWA

Actor in W.D.M. to get award for 'good character'

MATTHEW LEIMKUEHLER

MLEIMKUEHLER@DMREG.COM

Ashton Kutcher left Iowa wanting to escape the small towns and endless farmland that surrounds each.

Now, a worldwide success at age 39 and a father of two, he seems pretty happy to be home.

"I left Iowa wanting to get out of Iowa, and the older I get the more I want to come home," he said in an exclusive interview with the Register Saturday evening. "In part, because the more places I go, the more I realize how great it is here, and the more I realize that I almost owe everything of who I am to where I come from."

The eastern Iowa-raised Hollywood superstar appeared at the Ron Pearson Center in West Des Moines Saturday night to receive the Robert D. Ray Pillar of Character Award, an annual honor given by Drake University to "individuals who demonstrate good character as a role model." Outside of acting, Kutcher, 39, is known for multiple philanthropic efforts, including cofounding (alongside Dallas Clark) the Iowa disaster relief organization The Native Fund and Thorn: Digital Defends of Children, which uses technology to combat sexual exploitation of children.

"I think the one thing that you realize the minute you become a parent is that character is the one thing you can give them as a parent," he said. "You can actually, materially impact that ... and then everything else becomes their choice."

The "That '70s Show" and "The Ranch" star was born in Cedar Rapids and went to high school in Homestead; he made his West Des Moines appearance alongside wife and fellow star Mila Kunis. Kutcher's mother, Diane Portwood, and her spouse, Mark, as well as his father Larry and his spouse, Colleen, were also in town to see one of Iowa's most celebrated bring home the award.

On fatherhood, Kutcher said there are three Iowan values that impact how he raises his children: A general kindness, always keeping your word and showing good work ethic. Kutcher and Kunis welcomed their second child, a son, Dimitri Portwood Kutcher, into the world last November. The couple became parents to a girl, Wyatt Isabelle Kutcher, in 2014.

"There's an earnestness and an honest-ness here that lacks in a lot of other places in the world," Kutcher said. "People aren't afraid to work and aren't afraid to work really hard. They understand that working hard actually gets you there."

That earnestness was on display Thursday when Kutcher and Kunis surprised students at Oskaloosa High School. When addressing the students, he delivered a short, galvanizing message: "Just because you're a kid from Iowa, don't think you can't have big dreams."

It wasn't his first time impacting Iowa schools: In 2016 he surprised teachers in more than 100 Iowa schools by fully funding every Donors Choose.org project open in the state on that day. DonorsChoose is an online crowdfunding platform teachers use to finance classroom needs. Kutcher said he wanted to let the students know that you can build "the next great thing," no matter where you're from.

"What I suggested to those kids is (that) they don't limit the scope of their pursuits to the things that see that already exist," he said.

Kutcher received the Pillar of Character award in part due to the launch of The Native Fund, which works primary in disaster relief for lowans. Kutcher said he could see the locally- based non-profit extend the model in place to other states and more causes.

First, he said, the organization must continue to grow capital. After that could come expansion into new regions and different causes.

“For us right now, it’s about raising a significant reserve capital fund for disaster relief,” Kutcher said. “And then really identifying for ourselves what constitutes disaster relief. Who actually needs disaster relief? And how do (we) build this so it’s not some wonky entitlement plan that grows and gets sloppy? ... This is all about helping people. It’s not about doing for people.”

The discussion wasn’t completely dominated by Kutcher’s character and philanthropic efforts; when asked about the Hawkeyes’ football prospects in the fall, he smiled and laughed.

“That’s a set-up,” he laughed. “I know a set-up when I see one.”

Notables intended for the “All Star Evening” featuring Kutcher and Kunis included Gov. Terry Branstad, Lt. Gov. Kim Reynolds, Super Bowl-winning former NFL tight end Dallas Clark, Drake University president Marty Martin and “The Bachelor” alum Chris Soules, a news release said. Past recipients for the award include Hayden Fry, Fred Hoiberg and Shawn Johnson.

DMR: Chinese media take interest in D.M.-based Jasper Winery

While Chinese President Xi Jinping’s first meeting with President Donald Trump has made headlines for the potential implications to trade and international relations, it has also sent reporters looking for off-the-beaten-path stories about the two nations.

That’s what recently led CGTN, China’s state-owned 24-hour English Language TV network, to a winery in Des Moines.

CGTN this week published a feature about Jasper Winery, highlighting the deep economic and political ties between Iowa and China and the growing interest from Hawkeye State companies to do business in the world’s most populous country.

Mason Groban, head winemaker at Jasper said the TV spot could help the small, Des Moines-based winery gain a larger foothold in China.

“If you understand the Chinese consumer, a story like this can be pretty significant,” he said.

The ties between Iowa and China, and specifically those between Gov. Terry Branstad and Xi, who have called each other “old friends,” are well-documented and widely celebrated.

In 1985, Xi visited Iowa on an agricultural research trip and met Branstad for the first time. The two leaders met again in 2011 during a gubernatorial trade mission to China.

In 2012, Xi returned to Iowa, for a farm tour, agricultural forum and state dinner, where he and Branstad toasted with wine from Jasper.

In December, Trump appointed Branstad ambassador to China, noting his deep ties to China and Xi. Branstad is yet to be confirmed.

CGTN toured Jasper’s vineyard and winery and then visited Muscatine, where Xi stayed as a young agricultural researcher.

The network also asked Iowa Republican Party Chair Jeff Kaufmann about the tension between Iowa's dependence on exports to China and the state's support for Trump, who has promised to get tough on China, stoking fears of a potential trade war.

"Hopefully, we can find a policy that fits our interests but at the same time doesn't alienate any economic opportunities we have with China," Kauffman told CGTN.

China Daily, a state-owned English-language newspaper, also recently featured the state in a front-page story titled "Iowa hopes to ramp up trade with China."

Jasper Winery has been eyeing the Chinese market ever since the toast between Xi and Branstad. The winery hired The China Iowa Group, a West Des Moines-based trade consulting firm, to help clear regulatory and political hurdles needed to sell wine in China.

In 2015, Jasper made its first shipment, selling about 1,000 bottles in China.

"They don't have a lot of spare capacity, but we sold as much as we could get our hands on," said Li Zhao, founder of the China Iowa Group.

Chinese consumers have a taste for wines from Napa and other well-known grape-growing regions, but few Iowa wines have made it into the market, Li said.

Groban, the winemaker, hopes the CGTN feature, as well as Branstad's pending ambassadorship, open the door to more exports. "Initially, we were just getting our feet wet in the market," he said. "We would love to export more and we definitely have the capacity to ramp up production."

China Iowa Group and LS2group form partnership

The China Iowa Group, meanwhile, recently announced a partnership with LS2group, another Des Moines-area consulting firm. The two firms said they plan to work together to help U.S. companies sell products in China and facilitate the Chinese investment in the U.S.

LS2group will focus on government affairs, lobbying for policies, like those that would allow U.S. eggs, beef and other products to be imported to China. China Iowa Group will focus on finding markets for U.S. products in China and facilitating Chinese investment in the U.S. "It's a perfect relationship because our skill sets complement each other well," said Chuck Larson, a partner with LS2group, and a former state senator and U.S. Ambassador to Latvia.

DMR: COMING OUT CONSERVATIVE

Chadwick Moore was an openly gay socialist at the University of Iowa. Now he's a pariah among New York liberals

For Chadwick Moore, admitting he was a gay man to his "Fox News-watching, gun-toting Republican" dad in Iowa was a breeze compared to coming out as a conservative this year to his liberal friends in New York.

This is the 33-year-old University of Iowa alumnus whose Out Magazine profile of former Breitbart News provocateur and "Internet super villain" Milo Yiannopoulos inspired such outcry against Moore that it made him realize he had been living a lie: He now has more in common with the GOP.

He has been lambasted as a "fake conservative" and "attention whore" on social media. But he insists that his ideological shift was glacial and gradual, not sudden and opportunistic. Even in high school, Moore said, his senior AP English thesis was an argument against hate-crime legislation based on constitutional grounds. "I'm not, like, an establishment Republican," he said. "I'm still very much the person I've always been. And I've never registered as a Democrat for that reason."

His world was simpler and more neatly defined in 2001, when Moore was a high school graduate en route to his freshman year at the University of Iowa in Iowa City. He rode shotgun in his father's pickup truck.

On the verge of dropping off his son into a teeming throng of 29,000 restless young coeds, Moore's father, Gary, finally broached the topic.

Well, his dad said, your sister told me something about you.

Moore had an inkling of what was next: Oh yeah?

She told me that you're gay. Is that true?

Moore's stomach suddenly was in knots. He already had come out to his liberal mom a few years earlier, with no problem. His parents are divorced; she lives in Nashville. But he was a little more daunted by his dad: a macho, cigarchomping accountant, farmer and hunter in Oskaloosa.

Moore braced himself and answered: Yeah, it's true. Gary was quiet for a minute. Finally, he responded: Well, I guess I'm going to have to tell your boyfriends what I tell your sister's boyfriends.

Moore, still apprehensive, suddenly was intensely curious: What's that?

If you hurt my son

I'll... To complete that sentence no doubt would offend some of you. Suffice it to say that Gary, to quote Iowa Sen. Joni Ernst, was ready to "make 'em squeal" in defense of his son. Moore thanked his dad profusely for the sweetly protective sentiment.

That tender moment, if a bit raw, was a bridge between a father and son who, at the time, stood on opposite ends of the political spectrum.

Once ensconced at the U of I, Moore "became an immediate socialist," he said. He marched and protested his way through college while decked out in a garish wardrobe of thrift store castoffs.

All the while, the identity crisis that seethed within Moore was not hormonal. It was ideological.

"Some people experiment with their sexuality in college," he said. "I experimented with farleft politics."

'Alienated and frightened'

Moore now lives in another liberal enclave — the Williamsburg neighborhood of Brooklyn, New York. He has long since set aside his college dreams of becoming a fiction writer to establish himself as a legitimate working journalist.

His profile of Yiannopoulos was posted Sept.

21 in the publication catering to the LGBT community that serves an audience of a couple hundred thousand readers, on the eve of the bitter presidential election. The Breitbart editor had become a notorious figure thanks to his loud mouth and the rampant protests over his speeches on college campuses.

(This was before Yiannopoulos resigned from Breitbart in reaction to the firestorm spurred by his comments that appeared to condone pedophilia.) Moore faced instant backlash from friends and strangers alike.

His editors went so far as to preface the profile with a lengthy disclaimer to distance themselves from Yiannopoulos' views while simultaneously decrying "social media tribalism," where "the mere act of covering a contentious person can be misrepresented as an endorsement."

Moore kept getting the cold shoulder at his local gay bar. Good friends stopped calling.

He had become a pariah.

"The gay community has been my entire life since I was 15," he said.

"And I love the gay community. I love gay culture. I love drag queens.

I love gay bars. It's been my everything, and now all that's gone. So, yeah, it's sad. I'm mourning the loss of that."

Fed up with all the backlash, Moore in February wrote a manifesto of sorts in the New York Post: "I'm a gay New Yorker — and I'm coming out as conservative." He criticized President Donald Trump for his travel ban and cabinet choices. But mostly the article served as a kiss-off to the left wing that had counted him as one of their own. "All I had done was write a balanced story on an outspoken Trump supporter for a liberal, gay magazine," he said, "and now I was being attacked. I felt alienated and frightened." "It can seem like liberals are actually against free speech if it fails to conform with the way they think," he added.

"And I don't want to be a part of that club anymore."

'It seems like if you choose a side, you're ostracized'

Among those shocked by Moore's conservative coming out were two of his best friends and college classmates, a pair of women from Iowa. Kat Durst, raised in Ottumwa and Davenport, met Moore on their first day in the college dorm, not long after the pivotal scene in the pickup truck with his father. Today, she's a 34-year-old real estate agent. She and her husband, a physician, are raising two kids, 3 and 5, in Gainesville, Florida. Moore was a bridesmaid in her 2010 wedding.

As Moore tangles with critics on Twitter, Durst fills her Facebook feed with liberal commentary fully in keeping with her former undergraduate self. Durst can't take the leap from Democratic socialist to conservatism with her friend, but that doesn't matter to her.

"Even the things that I thought he thought in college... He doesn't owe that to me — to still think that — or owe it to anyone," she said. A third friend entered their circle at the U of I when Haley Niichel spotted Moore in a computer lab clad in a white T-shirt, tight jeans and blue bandanna. She grew up in Orange City, the conservative stronghold of northwest Iowa. This was the first gay person she was aware of meeting.

Moore "knows how to kind of step on a nerve," said Niichel, who now lives in West Des Moines. "He has that innate sense of going in for the kill.

But I think he makes liberals really think about what they're fighting for."

Her job as a mortgage underwriter, as Niichel puts it, is to "document logic." She wonders whether that helps make her more of a libertarian who falls on the political spectrum somewhere between her two friends.

"It seems like if you choose a side, you're ostracized by the other side," she said. "If you're not super liberal, you're a Republican in the liberals' eyes. If you're not actively going to all these protests — in an aggressive, gnashing way — it's not enough for them.”

Are we building bridges or silos?

Moore's paternal family roots in Iowa predate the Civil War. He was born in Tennessee and raised in Illinois.

I wouldn't be surprised if he ends up writing his gay, Midwestern variation on J.D. Vance's "Hillbilly Elegy," a New York Times best-selling account of the author's roots in white workingclass Appalachia that has been embraced as a guide to the rural disaffection that helped Trump win the White House.

"I've always known these people," Moore said of his conservative Midwestern friends and family. "I've always liked these people." Moore's dad said that he and his son always have been close and have shared quality political discussions.

"I probably disagree with everybody on certain things," Gary said.

"Talk to me. I will listen.

But don't try to be overbearing and convince me that you're right unless you can really have some facts to prove it." Perhaps surprisingly, Moore in the recent election voted for Hillary Clinton — not Trump. He called it a "pre-emptive defense" against criticism from his liberal neighbors, when he still was worried about mending fences.

Moore's dilemma made me seek out one of Iowa's most prominent, stalwart gay activists: Donna Red Wing. She has fought for decades for gay rights. She's married to a woman. She recently stepped down as director of LGBTQ-advocacy group One Iowa and now directs the Eychaner Foundation that awards its own Matthew Shepard Scholarships.

Red Wing made headlines in recent years by partnering with somebody perceived as her nemesis: Bob Vander Plaats, whose Family Leader pushes the "family values" cause of evangelical conservatives and led the fight against same-sex marriage in Iowa. The unlikely pair turned their private coffee conversations into a public series of dialogues to make a point about the desperate need for civility in our polarized politics.

If not to the extent of Moore, both of them weathered criticism from their respective political camps for breaking bread with the "enemy." But Red Wing considers herself "old and cranky enough" that she's "tired of always making it one side or the other."

"Are we living in this community," she said, "or are we just building silos and living by ourselves?"

She added, "Our sexual orientation and gender identity really have little to do with where we are, in terms of being progressive and conservative."

Not that Red Wing is on the same page as Moore when it comes to Trump. He sees the president as opening up the GOP to new, more diverse voices. He sees the president's trolling of the media and his rivals as a necessary gambit to wrangle with entrenched forces.

"The most powerful institutions in our society are all toting the same narrative," he said, "and they're all left-leaning."

Red Wing, however, sees Trump promoting intolerance. She worries that his actions hampering, say, immigrants and Muslims all too easily may spread to the gay community, or already have through far-right forces grown more powerful in various courts and state and local offices.

I don't have easy answers about when to stand up and shout in protest versus when to sit quietly and talk, extending an olive branch.

Both civility and protest, if we can apply them at the proper times, are crucial to our democracy. I do know that Moore shouldn't have been spurned for writing his original profile of Yiannopoulos when he was simply doing his job as a journalist. Because Red Wing's words echo in my head: Are we living in this community, or are we just building silos and living by ourselves?

As Gary put it, "I don't know if there's ever going to be an answer" to our polarized politics.

"All I can say is I hope people will listen."

If nothing else, Moore as an outed conservative has a lot more to discuss politically with his dad and his other Republican relatives in Iowa. "If Trump does a good job," he said, "I'll be very excited to vote for him in four years." That may not be a rhetorical bomb on par with Yiannopoulos.

But it still won't play very well in Brooklyn.

DMR Editorial: State and federal forfeiture reforms fall short

Civil libertarians and small-government conservatives agree: The government should not be allowed to seize the assets of law-abiding citizens.

Yet, for the past 30 years, state and federal officials have done exactly that, wrapping the practice in the bulletproof vest of "law enforcement." The officials argue that they are keeping our streets safe by laying claim to the cash, cars and real estate belonging to individuals whose only "crime," assuming one was even committed, was a minor traffic offense or drug-possession rap. In 2013, two California men driving home after a gambling tournament in Illinois had their $100,000 bankroll seized after an Iowa police officer pulled them over for failing to signal a lane change on Interstate 80 in Poweshiek County. Authorities eventually gave back $90,000 of the money, but after the men sued, the state was forced to pay the men an additional $60,000 just to settle their case.

Such abuses are numerous and well-documented, but state and federal lawmakers have been slow to enact reforms for fear of being perceived as soft on crime. But changes are in the works.

Under a bill approved late last month by the Iowa Senate, prosecutors would have to convict a suspected offender of illegal activity before seizing any property that's valued at less than $5,000, and that property will have to be linked to the charged criminal activity.

The intent is to keep the police from shaking clean the pockets of motorists. You might not think such a law would be necessary, but it is.

Last year, there were 822 cases of cash forfeiture made in Iowa under state law, for a total of $2.6 million. Individually, none of these cases involved more than $15,000, and only eight cases involved assets worth $5,000 to $15,000.

The average value of a cash forfeiture was just $3,217. So we're not talking about cartel-caliber drug kingpins here.

In fact, the police are only too happy to seize sofa-cushion money. No amount of money seems too small. In one 2015 case, Iowa authorities seized $13 from an individual and claimed it as their own. That's one reason why the bill approved by the Senate zeroes in on amounts of less than $5,000. But of course the argument could be made that this limit preserves the profit motive for police and prosecutors to pursue high-dollar assets.

Fortunately, the Senate bill, which has to be approved by the House, would also raise the standard of proof in forfeiture cases so police and prosecutors would have to present “clear and convincing evidence” that the assets are tied to criminal activity. There’s also a proportionality test that says the assets seized cannot be “grossly disproportionate to the severity of the offense,” which should help ensure that Iowa police aren’t seizing six-figure sums from people who have been convicted of only minor offenses.

The legislation also requires law enforcement agencies to maintain certain records related to asset forfeiture, so lawmakers — and the public — will know if the abuses are continuing.

Even so, this bill is far from perfect. It does nothing to redirect assets away from the police and prosecutors who initiate property seizures, so they can continue to use the process not to enhance public safety but to enhance their own budgets. The bill also says that while police agencies will be required to keep detailed, publicly accessible records of property seizures, these “records shall not identify or enable identification of the individual officer who seized any item of property.” That provision would make it impossible to determine whether any abuses can be traced to one rogue law enforcement officer.

Even if the Senate bill becomes law, it will do nothing to address the larger problem of civil forfeitures initiated by federal authorities. On March 29, the inspector general of the U.S. Department of Justice released a report that details the manner in which the agency has failed to evaluate its own forfeiture data to determine the extent to which these property seizures benefit law enforcement and threaten civil liberties.

The report makes a series of recommendations for improvement, all of which are long overdue. The most urgent is the call to ensure that the DOJ’s state and local task-force officers are adequately trained on federal forfeiture laws.

A newly introduced, GOP-sponsored bill in the U.S. Senate, dubbed the Fifth Amendment Integrity Restoration Act, would help end some of the abuses. It would shift the burden of proof in forfeiture cases to the government; it would provide for indigent defense in all such cases; and it would eliminate the profit motive altogether by steering the proceeds away from police agencies and into the U.S. Treasury. It’s almost identical to a bill first proposed in 2014, but now, at least, it is being given serious consideration by Congress.

These state and federal initiatives represent progress, but they also underscore the fact that when it comes to civil forfeiture, much work remains to be done.

DMR: Did city councilman’s opposition to a pork plant lead to suicide?

The brief life and premature death of a dynamic Iowa politician provokes hard questions

“(One) can easily wreck in a day or two what builders have taken years to do.”

— verse from a poem Mason City Mayor Eric Bookmeyer sent to City Councilman Alex Kuhn

“ There won’t be any bullies to burden your way.

No words that cut like a knife at the end of the day.”

— verse from a poem to Alex Kuhn from his father, Mark, after his son’s death

MASON CITY, Ia. — An overflow crowd turned out for a City Council meeting last May 3 in anticipation of a final vote for construction of a $240 million, 600,000-square-foot pork-processing plant on Mason

City's southwest side. Processing up to 10,000 pigs a day, it would be the state's second- largest of its kind.

State and local officials stood ready to welcome it with generous subsidies. Realtor Dick Mathes addressed the council in favor, citing job losses and Prestage Foods' promise to add up to 2,000 jobs in four years. But the 14 supporters there to speak were outnumbered by 47 opponents, who voiced concern over the plant's potential impact on health, the environment and the community, especially if a concentration of hog confinements followed.

One young man, Dylan Daniels, handed the council a petition he said had nearly 1,000 signatures opposing the plant. "The council is still ignoring the way the majority of citizens feel," he said.

He spoke prematurely. It turned out to be a fateful night for Prestage and its proponents, who had considered passage a done deal: The vote tied at 3-3, effectively killing the proposal.

It was also, some believe, a fateful night for a popular 34-year-old at-large city councilman named Alex Kuhn, who had been heavily courted by proponents and opponents. After much research and questioning, Kuhn was not convinced that the city was getting a good deal for its investment. Unbeknownst to him and everyone else, his hesitation had paved the way for the other two "no" votes.

Two months later, Kuhn shot and killed himself, after his friends and family say he was pressured and blamed for the outcome. Once heralded by people from both parties as destined to go far in politics, praised for his compassion and commitment to the underrepresented as well as to economic development, Kuhn now found himself an outcast among the city's powerful. He became a casualty of the divisive, high-pressured, back-biting political environment.

A promising future

With his youthful good looks, intelligence, political pedigree and knack for getting along with everyone, Alex Kuhn was often likened to a young John Kennedy. He grew up around both politics and farming, having clerked for his father, a former Democratic state representative now on the Floyd County Board of Supervisors, and helped on the family's 850-acre farm in Charles City, southeast of Mason City. After graduating from high school there in 2000 and Iowa State University in 2004, he went to Houston, Texas, to student-teach. But when his father was injured the following year in a farming accident, Alex returned to help.

"He'd get up early in the morning and load corn all day," says his mother, Denise Kuhn. "At night he would do exercises with his dad. He took him to physical therapy."

In 2006, Alex went to work for U.S. Sen. Tom Harkin, directing his mobile office from Des Moines. He moved in 2008 to Mason City, where his ex-wife's family lived, where he taught and did community organizing for United Way. He got elected to the Mason City City Council in 2011. Although a Democrat, he had support from many Republicans, says a Republican friend, Todd Blodgett. "His purpose was to defend people who couldn't defend themselves."

Blodgett introduced me to a man of modest means named Jim Burgess, who previously lived in a rental home where he had awoken daily to the sounds of mice nibbling his food. The landlord's response, Burgess says, was to advise him to get cheese from the local food bank and put it out for the mice. Then Kuhn came by, saw the situation and not only worked to resolve it but also sponsored an ordinance targeting problem landlords, Burgess said.

Nearly all of the 20 people I interviewed said Kuhn was the last person they'd expect to take his own life. But his parents and others who spoke to him before his death also noted his deep distress at the furor that erupted around him after the Prestage Foods deal collapsed.

Mark Kuhn is driven to speak because of a Dec. 18, 2016, front-page story in the Mason City Globe-Gazette, which attributed Alex's suicide to an ongoing struggle with depression. True, Alex had dealt with the fallout from a divorce and co-parenting his two young sons. He had at times seen a therapist and taken anxiety medication, but had no history of depression, his parents say. They say despite their disclosures to the newspaper about Alex being taunted and blamed for his vote, the writer chose to build a narrative around depression, enabling those who had hurt Alex to turn his suffering back on him. Now Mark Kuhn wants to give Alex a voice.

The failure of the Prestage deal inflamed politicians, agribusinesses, local business boosters and government economic development folks, Mark Kuhn says. But it was the wrath of those Alex considered his friends, particularly the mayor, that really hurt him.

Blodgett agrees, saying, "The mayor bullied Alex relentlessly."

"I certainly reject the accusation," responded Mayor Eric Bookmeyer. "Did we have frank conversations? Sure." But "I know that Alex had a lot of other stuff going on in his life. I don't believe under any circumstances that it was just one thing."

Debate divides the town

The Prestage plant was the biggest economic development prospect Mason City residents can remember. It had the vocal support and lobbying of the governor, the mayor and state and local economic development officials.

But as with anything involving hogs in Iowa, the proposal sparked controversy.

"If this processing plant is so good, why not put it in West Des Moines?" bristled state Rep. Sharon Steckman, a Democrat who represents Mason City, in an interview with me last May.

Bookmeyer, in an interview, called farming "our lifeblood," and said he saw an opportunity to help the city grow and use water and sewer systems that taxpayers were already paying for.

Mark Kuhn points out that farming was Alex's lifeblood, too. Both father and son became embroiled in the debate over Big Pork during their political careers. Mark Kuhn was in the Legislature in the 1990s when Gov. Terry Branstad and the Republican majority took actions to prevent neighbors of hog confinements from suing for nuisance and stripped localities of a final say on where confinements were placed. Kuhn was also in the Legislature in 2001 under Democratic Gov. Tom Vilsack, when lawmakers commissioned a study of proposed air pollution rules, which 27 state university scientists spent two years studying and signing off on. Yet repeatedly, in 2003 and 2008 (then under Gov. Chet Culver), the rules were voided by a legislative majority and sent back for further study to satisfy lobbyists, Kuhn says.

Prestage's interest in Mason City first became known to the mayor when state economic development officials contacted Chad Shreck, who heads the North Iowa Corridor Economic Development, on Dec. 17, 2015. Prestage officials arrived the next day. The mayor was excited. "This was not your everyday, average project," Bookmeyer said.

But the mayor doesn't get to vote. So after meeting company representatives, he called council members in a few at a time to rally them in favor, without revealing Prestage's name. Kuhn spotted it in February in the city manager's folder. As mayor pro tem, Kuhn was the first to be called in, along with Councilman Travis Hickey, who is also on the North Iowa Corridor board.

In February, the city's planning and zoning commission rezoned the area from farming to heavy industrial. Secrecy surrounding the move angered some residents, who later accused the council of flouting democracy and ramming the plant through without an independent environmental impact study.

Branstad and Prestage leaders went to Mason City in March to announce the plan, and the Iowa Economic Development Board voted to issue $34 million in general obligation bonds to support it. After a six-hour meeting April 5, the council voted unanimously to set the terms for a development agreement. But Kuhn had reservations about them. He didn't necessarily oppose Prestage, people close to him say, but didn't think the city should give it a 50 percent tax abatement. And he was wary of the city offering $15.5 million in tax-increment financing. Kuhn cited reports showing a 50 percent turnover in meat processing. He wanted to require a $13-per-hour minimum wage, along with a 2.5-mile buffer zone preventing hog confinements around Mason City and Clear Lake.

"I didn't feel it was the role of local government to put that stuff in," Bookmeyer says, but he says he and city staff worked to accommodate Kuhn's concerns. Prestage committed $1.4 million to Mason City schools over 10 years to help accommodate the expected influx of employees' children, including English-language learners.

On April 21, after a seven-hour meeting, Kuhn broke ranks with the five other council members to vote no on the agreement, noting Prestage had lowered its estimate of the number of hires to 1,772, split in two phases. He brought up odors from rendering, the cost of improvements to the water utility and the fact that Prestage hadn't promised to hire local farmers for feeding operations. And in reference to the hourly wages, he asked, "Does the industry deserve incentives for these kind of wages? Why do we have to give $15.5 million to get it? I'm not going to vote for a development agreement at any cost." After the meeting, a local pork producer accosted Kuhn, accusing him of putting his career before the community, Mark Kuhn said.

On the day of the final vote, May 3, it was learned that Prestage's planned contribution to the schools fell short of meeting needs. Just before casting their votes, two other council members, John Lee and Bill Schickel, announced they were voting no. Everyone was shocked when the proposal failed, including Kuhn, several people say. Schreck says Kuhn had told him, "'There are five votes and you don't need me.'" Gary Schmit, Kuhn's boss at Henkel Construction, said, "He was hoping they would come back with answers."

Reaction spreads beyond Mason City

Opponents celebrated, but the governor told a press conference the City Council made a mistake. Ron Prestage, a principal in the company, blamed racism, and City Councilwoman Janet Solberg agreed. Iowa Economic Development Authority Director Debi Durham warned that Mason City would now be less attractive to site selectors.

Iowa Pork Producers Association CEO Pat McGonegle called it "a vote against agriculture" in the May 2016 Iowa Pork Producer newsletter. In the same issue, Kirk Leeds, CEO of the Iowa Soybean Association, declared that when leadership was needed, "a few elected officials ... apparently caved to a group of activists opposed to livestock production and Iowa agriculture."

The Globe-Gazette, which had editorially supported the project, lamented the "negative light" cast on the community and asked whether new information would change Kuhn's mind.

And Rick Mathes, a local Realtor with his father, Dick, and a Prestage booster on the city's planning and zoning commission, sent out a mass email declaring, "Prestage Blindsided." He organized a petition drive for a revote, and according to Mark Kuhn, would turn up at Alex's office to show him the names of important people who had signed it.

Mathes has since moved to Michigan, after concluding Mason City's future is bleak. He acknowledged lobbying Kuhn in weekly visits but called the idea of harassment "ludicrous."

The local chamber of commerce hosted a closed-door meeting June 2 hoping to resurrect the deal. Schickel was said to be reconsidering his vote, but Kuhn remained unsatisfied with the terms, according to his friend Jodi Draper and others. "Alex wasn't against Prestage. He was against the process," she said.

On June 2, Prestage announced it was no longer interested in Mason City. In a written statement, it blamed misinformation for the vote.

Still, even after Prestage pulled out, Kuhn approached Schreck, the economic development director, wondering if there was a chance of continued negotiations. But Schreck said the company felt there was "too much animosity" toward it.

"He was made to feel he let people down," says Denise Kuhn, Alex's mother.

It's unclear whether the pressures Kuhn felt included fears the vote would affect his job at Henkel Construction. Schmit says Henkel probably was too small to have a role in the Prestage project, but Bookmeyer says the company might have benefited from side contracts. While Blodgett and others say Kuhn did fear for his job, Schmit insists: "There was no pressure at all on Alex from me."

A friendship strained

Alex Kuhn and the mayor had been so close, Bookmeyer says, that Kuhn had the code to his garage door, and stopped by regularly for a craft beer and a chat. "We were like brothers."

Mark Kuhn says his son had received frequent emails and text messages from the mayor's private email address. But "after the first no vote, he shunned Alex," Kuhn said. "Alex said, 'He shut me out.' " "We didn't communicate much," Bookmeyer acknowledged in an interview in February 2017. "He certainly knew I was disappointed." On May 11, Alex Kuhn got a call from the mayor that lasted 51 minutes. Mark Kuhn learned that from getting Alex's cellphone records after his death. The next day, Bookmeyer sent Alex an email from a private account that Mark later found, under the subject line, "So...?" It said: "AK, It is time to find out if you can lead or not." That was followed by a poem, "A Builder or a Wrecker?" containing the lines, "I can easily wreck in a day or two what builders have taken years to do." It referred to a wrecker "who walks to town, content with the labor of tearing down."

Asked about that, Bookmeyer said, "The point was, let's not lend voice to folks who don't have our interests in mind."

His message to Kuhn went on: "One ill-timed, politically expedient vote and commentary set off an amazing set of events. We talked about the repercussions yesterday but maybe you should read it for yourself."

Attached was an email from California developer Philip Chodur to City Administrator Brent Trout. Chodur was planning to develop a hotel as part of a downtown redevelopment project, but claimed the failed Prestage plan would make it harder to get financing and as a result, he was scrapping plans to add a floor.

However, even Councilman Hickey, who was at odds with Kuhn over Prestage, believes Chodur was using Prestage as an excuse for his failure to get financing.

Family and friends say in the last weeks of his life, Kuhn's mood grew darker and he rarely went out. He told his father he wasn't attending City Council meetings in person to avoid seeing Bookmeyer and Hickey. He also stayed away from Democratic functions, says John Stone, the Cerro Gordo County Democratic Party chairman. Kuhn told Stone the mayor was very mad at him.

"Alex wanted to be friends with everyone and help everyone," Stone said. "I would have attacked back. A lot of people would have."

Scott Tornquist, a former Mason City City Council member who left last May during his third term, visited Mason City last June 29, and saw Alex Kuhn two weeks before his death. What most struck Tornquist was Kuhn saying he was grateful that Hy-Vee delivered groceries because he didn't want to be out in public running into people. "That was so diametrically opposite to who he was."

"For one and a half hours, he just unloaded," Tornquist said. "...He said he was catching unbelievable heat and pressure from both Eric (the mayor) and from Travis Hickey."

On July 5, Prestage announced it was going to locate outside Eagle Grove. The Mason City council met that night, with Kuhn participating by phone. Hickey singled him out in remarks when the council voted unanimously to grant Chodur an extension on the downtown hotel project. Noting Kuhn had been the council member most in contact with Chodur, he suggested a conflict of interest since Alex's employer, Henkel Construction, could get a contract for part of the downtown development project.

Blodgett last saw Kuhn 10 or 12 days before his July 15 death. He said during the last two months of his life, Alex made half a dozen stops at the Outing Club, a posh, members-only club near Clear Lake partly owned by Blodgett's family and frequented by Republicans. On the last two visits, he was more distraught than Blodgett had ever seen him.

"He said he was having a hard time accepting, and dealing with ... the way some people were showing such malice toward him," Blodgett said. "He said his life wasn't fun and he found it hard to get up in the mornings."

A week before Kuhn's death, Jodi Draper, who had made an unsuccessful run for city council in 2013, said Kuhn called her and asked if she had considered running again, for the at-large seat. "I said, 'Nobody's going to beat you.'" Now she believes he was already planning to end his life.

"The guilt I feel from that couldn't possibly be put into words," she said choking up. "You wish you could turn back time."

Both Tornquist and Draper had had their own run-ins with the mayor. Draper said she campaigned on giving voice to city employees, to whom she claimed Bookmeyer "was sometimes very mean and rude." At least one city employee filed a hostile work environment complaint against Bookmeyer, the Globe-Gazette reported in 2010. And North Iowa Today reported in 2014 that a lawsuit against the mayor and city council by Lionel Foster, the former director of the city's Human Rights agency, resulted in a $240,000 settlement. Foster alleged race and age discrimination and retaliation for his civil rights investigations. One of his claims was that Bookmeyer had refused to reappoint three of his commissioners, telling one, a woman, that he wanted younger commissioners with fresher perspectives.

Tornquist said he too felt pushed "to the brink" in his council position, and like Kuhn had thoughts of ending his own life. He said on one occasion, Bookmeyer put him on a committee to look at the future of the city sanitation department, and Tornquist felt he "stacked the deck to get the outcome he wanted," to keep the budget down. Then he learned the press and public were excluded. After more incidents, he left for Indianapolis.

"My wife and I were trapped in our own house. We couldn't go out to dinner," said Tornquist, about having to face constituents after being associated with such tactics.

"I think of Alex every day," said Tornquist. "How could I have not seen it? But nobody saw it in me."

Bookmeyer has his defenders. Council member John Lee was one of the three to change his mind at the last minute and vote against Prestage because of the funding shortfall with the schools. But he says, "The mayor never put undue pressure on me or called to say, 'What the hell are you doing?'" Hickey, who says he, like Bookmeyer, felt "let down" by the vote against Prestage, observed, "As a part-time mayor, Eric takes his role very seriously and does a very good job lobbying folks to go in whatever direction he thinks would be good for the community."

Kuhn's last days

On July 12, Mark Kuhn attended Alex's 11-year-old son's Little League game and sat with Alex on the bleachers. "I could tell there was really something wrong," he said of Alex's withdrawn mood. "He believed it was all his fault that the community was so divided. When I told him 'No way, most people in Mason City think you are a hero for standing up for what you believe is a bad deal,' Alex replied, "'That's not what I hear from some people in the business community I work with.'" The Kuhns later learned from his calendar that Alex had plans to see his counselor on Thursday, July 14, (the counselor declined to answer my calls) and also to meet Hickey. "He woke up on the 14th and the very first thing he did was a Google search on conflict of interest legislation," said Mark Kuhn, referring to the other councilman's accusations.

Hickey says Kuhn showed up unexpectedly at his office that day. There had been tension between them, Hickey acknowledged. "We were on opposite sides. I was frustrated with his vote."

During a previous lunch meeting, Kuhn had expressed dismay at Hickey's allegation but neither mind was changed, Hickey said. But calling Kuhn "one of the nicest guys you'd ever want to meet," he said Alex wasn't angry.

On that day Alex also called his employer to say he wouldn't be attending a scheduled pontoon boat ride with the company that evening, according to a cell phone log of Alex's shared with me by his father. Instead, he stopped by his parent's farm and stayed for dinner, seeming OK but revealing little.

He left early, saying he'd see them the next day. They had weekend plans with his two sons.

At 7:12 p.m. he tried to call the mayor, whom he had also messaged late that morning, according to the phone records. The log didn't show what the text said. Asked about that, Bookmeyer emailed me, "I don't believe we spoke, but I sure wish we would have, to have known where he was in his mind." He said he had last seen Alex in his office a number of days earlier. "He wanted to know how I was," Bookmeyer said. "I told him I need time."

Alex then exchanged some text messages with a woman he had dated. She declined to talk to me, but the Kuhns, who are in touch with her, say she had no prior indication of his plans. Then he repeatedly watched a short compilation of clips from the TV series, "Breaking Bad" that had been posted on YouTube. Called "Jesse Pinkman: Civilian," it involved some emotional encounters between a remorseful young man, Pinkman, and the former chemistry professor he had teamed up with to cook meth, Walter White. At the end, Pinkman held a gun to White's face, and White held a gun to his own forehead, urging Pinkman to kill him. A shot was fired.

Earlier, Pinkman called himself "the bad guy," and told White, "Since I met you, everything I've ever cared about is gone. ... I have never been more alone!"

On July 15, Henkel officials showed up at the Kuhn farm wondering where Alex was, since he hadn't turned up for a presentation related to a hospital expansion project. Denise Kuhn drove over to his place, where Henkel CEO Schmit and another employee also showed up. She told them he wasn't there, but one of them went into Alex's room, she said. After picking up Alex's sons, his mother took a different route home, checking the ditches in case he'd had a car accident.

Back home, she asked Mark to check their guns. He discovered a .22-caliber pistol missing. They called police.

It was around noon when the sheriff and a deputy arrived to say they had found Alex's car and body at the end of a dead-end road near a recreation area north of Marble Rock, which is about halfway between their two homes. An autopsy revealed he died from a bullet fired from the gun taken from his parents' cabinet. There were no drugs or alcohol in his system. He didn't leave a note, and was wearing the same clothes they had last seen him in, leading the Kuhns to believe he never went home the night before.

“We can all say there were times he was pretty upset and down about some things,” said Denise Kuhn. “But I never, ever could have imagined this.”

The aftermath

Former Sen. Harkin gave a eulogy at the funeral. Former state Sen. Jack Hatch, who served alongside Mark Kuhn in the Legislature, dedicated his new book “No Surrender” in part to Alex, saying he showed courage with his vote. “Not everyone agreed with Alex’s principled stand, and he took the brunt of public and private scrutiny,” it reads. “He became depressed and was unable to reconcile the differences.”

At the Kuhns’ behest, Blodgett notified the mayor that he would not be welcome at Alex’s funeral. But Bookmeyer said he attended anyway.

Bookmeyer says he was devastated by Kuhn’s death. Asked if he believed Kuhn was bullied, he referred to Prestage opponents, saying, “We were all bullied.”

Max Weaver, a former Mason City council member, says: “Alex was on the brink. Bookmeyer pushed him over.”

In January, Bookmeyer announced he won’t seek re-election in November. He called 2016 “rough,” and noted Alex Kuhn’s contributions to moving the city forward. Asked why he wasn’t running, Bookmeyer told me he had no further political ambitions, and was ready for a new career. He said Alex knew that was his intent.

Postscript

It would be irresponsible to blame others for someone’s suicide without hearing a cause in the deceased person’s own words. But as Draper, who works in the mental health field, points out, there can be triggers in the same way that smoking can contribute to the risk of cancer.

Everyone has different triggers, and everyone has periods of particular susceptibility to being demeaned, shunned or blamed. We live in an era when gossip, lies and rumors, spread through social media, can swiftly destroy reputations, careers and relationships. Schools and communities are finally focusing on the effects of such bullying on children. But adults are not immune.

People who go into public service to make a difference sometimes find themselves confronting powerful vested interests, and then back away from a fight. Alex Kuhn neither backed away nor wanted a fight. He wanted to do right by everyone: his constituents, his family, his job, colleagues and friends. One of the tragedies of politics is how limited a space there is for that — and how devastating it can be to an idealistic leader to find out.

“He said he was having a hard time accepting, and dealing with ... the way some people were showing such malice toward him. He said his life wasn’t fun and he found it hard to get up in the mornings.”

DMR Iowa View: On abortion, liberals cite science fiction

By: Joel Kurtinitis

The growing tension between moral relativism and scientific absolutism has produced two related effects on the left: a growing rift between liberal politics and the scientific community, and the insecure, blustery hollering of the word “science” by progressives — as if repeating it three times in a mirror will summon Bill Nye in a lab coat to validate their worldview.

There’s laughable irony in liberal attempts to squeeze science into the frock of their relativistic priesthood: Science — real science — is consummately objective. It doesn’t care about your feelings, your politics, your identity, or your faith. Science is observable, testable, repeatable, falsifiable.

Even casual political observers will note that leftists rarely seek — or present — specific evidence to back their claims anymore. Rather, their continual allusion to “science” is only an appeal to authority, whether applied to climate change, vaccines, GMOs or abortion.

Such appeals abound in abortion defense pieces like the March 31 column “Myths like life at conception don’t belong in the law.”

In it, Rekha Basu opines that a prolife legislator “is free to believe whatever she wants as a matter of personal faith. But that doesn’t justify the distortion of scientific fact or the imposition of religious beliefs on the public.”

But life at conception isn’t rooted in abstract notions like faith or values — it’s rooted in basic, high-school biology.

It’s amazing that, after decades of pushing sex ed in classrooms across America, liberals still can’t figure out what pregnancy is.

The article quotes Richard J. Paulson of the American Society for Reproductive Medicine: “Life is a continuum,” Paulson wrote. “The egg cell is alive, and it has the potential to become a zygote (a single-celled embryo)” if fertilized by sperm. The resulting cell is also alive, but “from a biological perspective, no new life has been created, because it is nearly identical to the egg cell.”

There’s some good science in the above statement, but there’s also a lot of nakedly unscientific editorializing and deliberate misdirection.

Is life a continuum? In Mufasa’s Circle of Life sense, sure.

In any meaningful scientific sense, absolutely not.

We are conceived, we grow, we are born, we live, we die. Our physical existence has a definite beginning and end.

Science.

Your body can be distinguished from another person’s body by a unique genetic marker known to us as DNA. Sperm cells and egg cells contain only the respective parent’s DNA. Once a zygote is formed, a new organism (read: new life) with DNA distinct from both parents is present within hours of conception. If DNA can convict a murderer for a crime 50 years ago, it should be ample evidence of a new human life in the womb.

Because science.

This new entity is the earliest stage of human life. Prior to this, all cells involved were parts of the parent. A new genetic signature means a new, developing, genetically human organism, whether it looks “nearly identical to the egg cell” or not.

More science. Anyone — scientist or not — attempting to add ambiguity to this simplest of biological truths has an agenda.

Like maybe, I don't know, making money on reproductive tech, or raking in $127 million in "family planning" profits.

Here's another biological reality: Abortion doesn't "terminate a pregnancy" or "remove the product of conception." It kills developing human beings. That's why Planned Parenthood workers caught in the Center for Medical Progress' 2015 sting operation were shown sorting through refrigerated pans of tiny human arms and legs, discussing organ value.

If you're going to advocate for something so brutal, at least be honest about it and don't hide behind terms like "women's health" or "reproductive rights."

The political left is losing their war on science, because they aren't interested in genuine discovery or progress, only in using it as a cloak to push their own religion — yes, secular humanism is a religion— on those of us who believe every human being is endowed by our creator with an inalienable right to life.

DMR: Grassley pledges to preserve filibuster for legislation

Sen. Chuck Grassley said he doesn't expect any fallout for the future of the U.S. Supreme Court from Senate Republicans' decision to use the "nuclear option."

"It isn't going to change anything whatsoever, because for the first time in the 228-year history of our country, there's a partisan filibuster of a Supreme Court judge. So, this is the first time in 228 years, so if we aren't going to do it anymore, it's not going to be any different than it's been for those 228 years," he said in an interview Thursday.

Got that? In essence, Grassley's saying one bad apple don't spoil the whole bunch, girl.

(But if he actually said that, he'd correct the grammar and credit the Osmond Brothers.

And he wouldn't call me "girl." He's no dummy.) I watched on C-SPAN as history was being made, or unmade, depending on your perspective. Republicans and Democrats alike got up and recited the details of decades-old partisan grudges like a mournful Greek chorus. This isn't one bad apple. The whole barrel is rotten.

I tend to agree with Grassley that this wasn't about Justice Neil Gorsuch, not really.

He's conservative, to be sure.

But Democrats' best efforts to paint him as a corporate shill or heartless ideologue fell flat, in my estimation. He's qualified to serve and his addition to the court does not obviously change the balance that existed before last year's death of Justice Antonin Scalia.

Mostly, this was about Republicans' decision last year to make history by refusing to bring up President Barack Obama's nomination of Judge Merrick Garland. They blamed that on Democrats by inventing the so-called "Biden rule" that never actually delayed any justice's confirmation. It was indeed deplorable, but it worked and is now the standard.

It's all about power and the Republicans have it. So you might think it would follow that Republicans like Grassley don't fear partisan fallout on issues like tax reform or infrastructure because they can also eliminate the filibuster on legislation.

Grassley says no. He said Thursday he just signed a letter being circulated by Sen.

Susan Collins, R-Maine, saying he wouldn't vote to change the 60-vote rule for legislation.

"Because the only significant difference between the House and Senate is that in the House of Representatives, the minority has no rights. As long as the majority sticks together, they can run roughshod over minorities," Grassley said.

Guess he knows from experience what that looks like.

He said it's only happened twice during his 40 years in office that one party has held 60 seats. "If you want minorities to have any voice whatsoever in the legislative process, the only place that can be done is in the United States Senate," he said.

The real power in the nuclear option is the threat of mutually assured destruction. Both parties can imagine they'll eventually be in the minority and will have to live with whatever rules they impose while in the majority.

When it comes to judicial appointments, though, the bombs have already fallen enough times to make the threat seem weak. When a president campaigns on a list of names of potential Supreme Court nominees, as Trump did, there's no expectation of bipartisan support.

Presidents and senators say they want an independent judiciary, but that's true only if it means the courts will reliably support their partisan agenda. Meanwhile, the public's confidence in the courts continues to erode. This is the real danger of nuclear fallout. The damage lasts for generations.

Grassley says one remedy to that is his legislation to allow cameras in the Supreme Court. "I think TV in the courtrooms would help. Let the public know more about how it works," he said.

The Iowa Supreme Court started holding oral arguments on the road so people across the state could attend and learn more about how the court works, Grassley noted.

It's a good idea for many reasons. For one thing, voters might realize they need to hold their legislators accountable for writing clear, unambiguous laws. The old saying "garbage in, garbage out" may have been coined to describe the effect of bad data on computer programming, but it applies to our legal system. Poorly written laws lead to poor judicial rulings.

But real-life court is nothing like the dramas on TV. People other than hardcore court watchers will soon tune out. Video clips taken out of context may show up on the internet and, you guessed it, political campaigns. TV is not a cure for getting politics out of the courtroom.

Meanwhile, we don't know how long the tattered remnants of the filibuster will stand. I'm all for bipartisan cooperation, but there's something to be said for forcing the majority party to be entirely accountable for its action — or inaction.

Material witness on suicide watch after surrender in Missouri

CHARLY HALEY AND KIM NORVELL

CHALEY@DMREG.COM

A Bondurant man considered a material witness in the killing of his parents and sister allegedly told police, "I killed three people last night" as he turned himself in, said Neosho, Mo., Police Chief David Kennedy. Chase Marcus Nicholson, 20, approached Wal-Mart employees in the small southwest Missouri town about 12 hours after his family members were found dead in their Bondurant home. Kennedy said Nicholson allegedly told the Wal-Mart employees the same thing he told police.

Polk County authorities were expected to arrive in Neosho late Friday to question Nicholson in connection to the killing of his parents, Mark Alan Nicholson, 58, and Charla Lee Nicholson, 56, and his sister Tawni Alexis Nicholson, 24. They were found dead in the family home in the 9700 block of Northeast 88th Street, said Lt. Rich Blaylock, spokesman with the Polk County Sheriff's Office.

Chase and Tawni's cousin Seth Nicholson, 28, of Des Moines, said Tawni was at the house to help plan her brother's 21st birthday party.

Nicholson turned himself in at about 10 a.m. Friday in Neosho, a town of 12,000 people about a 5 1/2-hour drive from Bondurant. He is in custody in the Newton County, Missouri, jail and was on suicide watch, Kennedy said.

Seth Nicholson, one of Chase's cousins, said Friday that Chase Nicholson had been treated for mental illness for many years.

"His entire life has been a giant adjustment," he said. It was 9:30 p.m. Thursday when Polk County deputies went to the Nicholsons' home to conduct a welfare check, which may have been prompted by a friend who had spoken to Chase Nicholson. Investigators cleared the scene late Friday morning. Blaylock declined to say how the victims were killed. The Nicholsons were remembered fondly by neighbors and co-workers.

Charla Nicholson had been a teacher at Des Moines Public Schools since 1986, the school district confirmed. She worked with Goodrell Middle School students until the fall of 1999, when she moved over to Cattell Elementary. Cattell Principal Tiona Sandbulte said Charla was a dedicated teacher who loved her students. She most recently worked with children in kindergarten and first grade as an intervention teacher, who met with students who needed extra support with reading or math. She also helped monitor lunch time.

"The kids looked forward to her coming in," Sandbulte said, adding that Charla would often joke with students. "She just sparkled. She's just so great with the kids."

Charla was adored by co-workers and was always willing to help her colleagues when needed, Sandbulte said.

The school district is making counselors available to help students and staff cope with Charla's death, Sandbulte said. Cattell also planned to email students' families.

Charla's daughter, Tawni, was just starting her career at an area insurance company after graduating from Iowa State University in August, a neighbor said.

She received a bachelor's degree in business with a major in marketing, said university spokeswoman Annette Hacker.

Cadets' explicit photos cause annual dinner to be canceled

RYAN J. FOLEY

ASSOCIATED PRESS

The commander of a military training program at Iowa State University canceled an annual formal dinner Friday after news broke that explicit photographs of some male cadets had been posted on Facebook.

Capt. Scott Curtis sent an email to the Naval Reserve Officer Training Corps saying he was calling off Saturday's "Dining In" event in light of publicity about the incident, which a Navy spokesman said involved seven male cadets who were "willing participants" in inappropriate behavior around campus and online.

Curtis said the decision was unfortunate, and he warned students would likely not be refunded the full cost of tickets they bought for the dinner for upperclassmen, alumni and retirees.

"My overarching goal is to ensure that all of you personally, as well as the reputation of the Cyclone Battalion as a whole is protected to the maximum extent possible given the current media situation," Curtis wrote.

The Associated Press reported Thursday that explicit photos were taken of some cadets around campus on March 4 and posted to the Facebook page of a student group connected to the program.

Lt. Sean Brophy, spokesman for the Naval Service Training Command, said other students did the right thing by reporting the photos to program leaders.

The Navy said "appropriate administrative actions" were taken against the midshipmen, who remain with the program. Curtis apologized to Iowa State leaders.

Curtis said the incident doesn't "reflect on the Character of this Battalion — how we respond and move forward does." He called the group fantastic and urged members to "dust yourselves off and move on." A separate email sent by a student leader instructed students in the battalion to decline comment and inform program leaders of any media inquiries.

DMR: Grassley, Ernst back U.S. strike on Syria

LINH TA AND JASON NOBLE

LTA@DMREG.COM

Iowa U.S. Sens. Chuck Grassley and Joni Ernst each voiced support for airstrikes launched late Thursday against a target in Syria. Grassley, in a statement released Friday afternoon, called the airstrike ordered by Republican President Donald Trump "appropriate" following Syrian leader Bashar al-Assad's apparent use of chemical weapons on civilians.

"Assad's actions follow a policy under President Obama that lacked any consequences for heinous crimes against Syrian civilians," Grassley said.

“The action taken by President Trump to prevent further use of chemical weapons by Assad or anyone else was appropriate.”

He added that the president now must “develop a comprehensive strategy” for ending the six-year-long civil war.

Ernst, meanwhile, praised the strike within hours of its announcement on Thursday, crediting Trump with showing “global leadership” in a statement that also described Assad as a war criminal. “This has been a tragic reality for the past six years and has gone on far too long,” she said. “Unlike the Obama administration, the Trump administration is showing global leadership and we must work to find an end to the root causes of this crisis.” Both of the Republican senators’ statements represent an evolution from 2013, when Assad previously deployed chemical weapons and then-President Barack Obama, a Democrat, proposed a military response. “I don’t think the case for military action has been made. ...” Grassley said in a September 2013 statement. “If the goal is to deter and degrade Assad’s ability to use chemical weapons, how would a limited strike achieve this goal? What are the risks of military action? What is the U.S. national interest in striking Syria?”

That same month, Ernst — then a state senator and a candidate for U.S. Senate — said Obama had not made the case for “why it is in our vital interests to use force in the midst of Syria’s ongoing civil war.”

Grassley’s office clarified the senator’s shift in viewpoint in a statement to the Register, arguing that Trump’s strike was a single, clear action to disrupt Assad’s ability to launch another chemical weapons attack. Obama in 2013, by contrast, considered a wider military action “but the goal, strategy and plan were unclear.”

“Congress and the American people deserve details on the mission, and the plan to achieve it, before entering into a possible long-term conflict, regardless of which president is in the White House,” spokesman Michael Zona said. In a CNN interview on Friday, Ernst likewise argued that Trump has made the case for Thursday’s strike in a way that Obama did not four years ago. “He has laid out the case — humanitarian atrocities of course, and the use of chemical weapons — and we also have ISIS engaged in that region,” she said. “We simply do not want to see chemicals fall into the hands of ISIS operators. There’s an ongoing civil war and that paired with the ISIS threat makes it even more imperative that we make sure we’re destroying any of those deliver systems.”

Another Iowa member of Congress, U.S. Rep. Rod Blum, praised Trump’s “decisive leadership” in a tweet late Thursday, but he said if there was to be a sustained military effort, the president should seek congressional authorization.

Trump ordered the strike against Syria late Thursday in retaliation for the chemical weapons attack that killed 86 people on Tuesday.

The attack, the first conventional assault on another country ordered by Trump, comes a day after he declared that the chemical weapons assault had “crossed many, many lines,” including the deaths of 27 children.

The 59 missiles, fired from the destroyers USS Porter and Ross in the eastern Mediterranean Sea, struck the airfield where Syria based the warplanes used in the chemical attack, according to Navy Capt. Jeff Davis, a Pentagon spokesman.

The missiles destroyed aircraft, hardened hangars, ammunition supply bunkers, air defense systems and radar at the Shayrat Airfield, according to USA TODAY.

DMR: MATERIAL WITNESS IN KILLINGS TOLD COUSIN HE ‘DOESN’T FIT IN SOCIETY’

LINH TA

LTA@DMREG.COM

For Chase Nicholson's entire life, he's struggled with feeling adequate, his cousin Seth Nicholson of Des Moines said Friday. That struggle also caused friction between him and his family, the 28-year-old said. "His entire life has been a giant adjustment," Seth Nicholson said. Chase Marcus Nicholson, 20, is considered a material witness in the killing of his parents and sister in Bondurant on Thursday night. Chase Nicholson approached Wal-Mart employees in Neosho, Mo., about 12 hours after his family members were found dead in their Bondurant home. He allegedly told police, "I killed three people last night" as he turned himself in, said Neosho, Mo., Police Chief David Kennedy.

His parents, Mark Alan Nicholson, 58, and Charla Lee Nicholson, 56, and his sister Tawni Alexis Nicholson, 24, were found dead in the family home in the 9700 block of Northeast 88th Street, authorities said.

At about 4 a. m. Friday, Seth Nicholson said, his mother called his wife, Kelsea Nicholson. She was bawling on the phone and told them about the deaths. However, she also warned them to lock their doors. "She said every one of them is dead," Seth said. "It was a nightmare."

Chase had been living with his parents in Bondurant. Seth Nicholson said police told relatives that Chase had stopped at a friend's house after the slayings and told him he killed his family. Then he drove south. "His friend called the police just to make sure it wasn't just a story," Seth Nicholson said. The call apparently prompted the welfare check on the Bondurant home.

The last time the family heard from the three victims was around 8 p. m. Thursday, Seth said.

Tawni, who graduated from Iowa State University in August, was at her family's home in Bondurant to help plan her brother's 21st birthday party. It was supposed to be in conjunction with the family's Easter celebration.

Her last text to a family member was discussing plans for the party.

"Tawni was there to plan the birthday party," Seth said. "She was there to help him." Chase Nicholson stayed at Orchard Place, a Des Moines charity that provides mental health treatment for children, from age 16 to 18, his cousin said. He went to school in the Bondurant school district and later attended an area private school.

Seth said Chase seemed to do well at Orchard Place.

"He was good for a little while, and then the assault happened with dad," Seth said, referring to Chase Nicholson's arrest in 2014.

A criminal complaint filed in that incident alleges Chase Nicholson threw a piece of metal from a fireplace set at his father on May 10, 2014. Mark Nicholson was cut on the left side of his face, by his left eye. Chase, who was 18 at the time, told officers that he had thrown a soccer cleat at his dad and said that could have caused the cut, according to the complaint. The criminal charge was eventually dropped.

But Chase was often easy to talk with, his cousin said. During family gatherings, he was upbeat and smiling.

"You would never know he had these issues," Kelsea Nicholson said.

After becoming an adult, Seth Nicholson said, Chase has been in and out of mental health treatment.

Nicholson said he had a hard time finding a hospital that would allow him to stay for longer than 24 hours.

In the fall, he was enrolled at the Ankeny Des Moines Area Community College campus studying computer programming.

He did not return for the spring semester because of complications with his mental health, Seth said. He had been working at a local Wal-Mart.

Seth said Chase Nicholson looked up to him, since they grew up together and he was a few years older than him.

He would confide to him about his thoughts, Seth said. He said Chase liked video games and listened to “headbanging” music. He was also interested in weapons, including knives.

Two weeks ago, Seth said, he spoke with Chase on the phone. He said Chase confided in him and told him he “doesn’t fit in society.”

Seth said the family has no ties with people in Missouri, so they’re unsure why he ended up there.

A vigil will be held on Saturday in Bondurant to remember Mark, Charla and Tawni.

It will be held from 7: 30 to 8: 30 p. m. outside Bondurant- Farrar High School at 1000 Grant Street North in Bondurant.

Seth said the tragic story demonstrates the importance of mental health care. He said he was concerned about Chase’s future.

“It is just a classic story of good people who had something really bad happen to them,” he said. “I don’t think he knows peace. I don’t think he’s ever met it.”

DMR: Iowa Senate confirms three appointees to regents board

JEFF CHARIS- CARLSON JCHARISC@PRESS-CITIZEN.COM

The Iowa Senate voted Wednesday to confirm all three of Gov. Terry Branstad’s appointees to the board that oversees Iowa’s three public universities.

In a series of 49-0 votes, the senate approved Branstad’s decision to appoint two former state lawmakers — former Rep. Nancy Dunkel, D-Dyersville, and former Sen. Nancy Boettger, R-Harlan — to the nine-member Iowa Board of Regents. Boettger and Dunkel will join board May 1, replacing regents Bruce Rastetter and Katie Mulholland, whose six-year terms expire April 30. Rastetter did not seek a second term, and Mulholland was not reappointed to one.

In another 49-0 vote, the senate confirmed Wednesday the reappointment of regent Sherry Bates, who has served on the board since 2015 and who heads the board’s Campus and Safety Subcommittee. When reappointing Bates in March, the Governor’s Office said she deserved a full, six-year term on the board. The Senate also voted 49-0 last month to confirm last year’s recess appointment of Regent Mike Richards, who has been serving on the board since May 2016. As with Wednesday’s confirmation vote, there was no debate. Wednesday’s vote will change the gender balance on the board after May 1 to five women and four men, but the partisan balance on the board will stay the same: five Republicans, one Democratic and three independents. With Rastetter and Mulholland stepping down, the board will be without a president and a president pro tem. A new leadership election will need to take place on or after May 1. One of the new board’s first tasks will be to find a replacement for Iowa State University

President Steven Leath, who is leaving to become president of Auburn University in Alabama.

Regent Larry McKibben, who served in the Iowa Senate from 1997 to 2008, described Boettger as “the leader on issues of education and educational finance.” He said both former lawmakers are “highly qualified appointees.”

“I care very much about the system,” Boettger told the Register in an earlier phone interview. “Iowa State is what brought me to Iowa in the first place. The state is known for quality education. I want to make sure it stays that way.” Boettger said she plans to learn as much as she can from her fellow Harlan resident, Mary Louise Petersen, who served as president of the regents from 1973 to 1981. Dunkel, a Democrat who served in the House for four years, is a retired banker and a former board member of Iowa Student Loan Liquidity Corporation and the Iowa Values Fund board.

She told the Register that she views Iowa’s public universities as a key part of Iowa’s economic development landscape “in terms of their research and in terms of their business incubators.”

“Have the colleges been not given enough money? Sure. But you know you can say that about a lot of other departments as well,” Dunkel said. “Our job is to make sure they are doing the best they can with the money they are getting,” Dunkel told the Register she initially had been contacted by Lt. Gov. Kim Reynolds to inquire whether she was interested in the position.

Once she agreed, the governor called later that day to make the offer.

With Branstad scheduled to be appointed as the next U.S. ambassador to China, Reynolds will take over the governor’s responsibilities.

The governor office said the choice of appointees was made collaboratively.

“Like all of our appointments the past seven years, they were all decided upon together by Gov. Branstad and Lt. Gov. Reynolds,” Ben Hammes, a gubernatorial spokesman, said Tuesday via email last month.

DMR: Lawmakers promise to protect credit for poor families in tax reform efforts

BRIANNE PFANNENSTIEL

BPFANNENST@DMREG.COM

Iowa lawmakers promised to protect a popular tax credit benefiting more than 220,000 low-income working families in their effort to reform the tax code. House Appropriations Committee Chairman Rep. Pat Grassley, R-New Hartford, said at a subcommittee meeting Thursday the Earned Income Tax Credit, along with another that benefits community colleges, would be held harmless as lawmakers work to cut back state spending on tax credits. Grassley said he heard from legislators, advocates and others who opposed reducing benefits under the Earned Income Tax Credit, which primarily benefits those living in or near poverty.

“You have to weigh how difficult of a vote that is versus the savings that you’re going to achieve,” he said. “And I just think that this point, there wasn’t the appetite to take that on.”

Grassley recently introduced House File 187, which would cap and gradually reduce the total amount the state spends on tax credits, funneling the savings into a state account for an as-yet undetermined purpose. It also would roll back some of the most generous benefits associated with some credits, which result in refund checks for individuals and companies that have no tax liability.

But, he said Wednesday, it became too difficult to put an overall cap on state tax credit spending, which has ballooned by about 180 percent since 2005. Instead, he plans to look at each tax credit individually and find ways to cut back.

According to data from the Department of Revenue, the total value of state tax credits has grown from about $153 million in 2005 to an expected $427 million in 2018.

The state spends more on the Earned Income Tax Credit than any other on the books. During the 2016 budget year, it totaled $71.9 million. That's projected to grow to $76.3 million in 2021. About 71 percent of those credits were claimed by taxpayers with an adjusted gross income of less than $25,000.

Rep. Chris Hall, DSioux City and the top Democrat on the House Appropriations Committee, said he supports taking that credit off the table, saying it has been "extremely effective" at accomplishing its intended purpose.

After a year in which spending outpaced revenue by about $250 million, Hall and other Democrats have pushed for a review of tax credits as a way to save money and shore up the state's budget. But Republicans say cutting back on tax credits would provide savings that could be used to balance out a future tax cut.

"If the goal is tax reform, then you need to begin to achieve the savings from the tax credits, in my opinion," he said.

Hall said he disagrees with that approach.

"We need to make sure that this conversation is linked directly to improving and making the state's budget more sustainable, balanced, transparent and predictable," he said.

DMR: Templeton Rye one step closer to distilling whiskey in Iowa

Iowa-based manufacturer breaks ground on $26M, 99,000-square-foot complex

THE DES MOINES REGISTER

Templeton Rye, the Iowa-based whiskey manufacturer, has broken ground on its new $26 million distillery building in Templeton, Iowa.

The new 99,000-square-foot complex includes a 34,500-square-foot distillery as well as a museum and barrel-aging warehouse.

It's expected to be completed in the fall of 2018.

The new facility may muzzle critics who claim Templeton had been misrepresenting its liquor by labeling it as "small-batch rye" and "made in Iowa," when it actually was made from a stock whiskey distilled by MGP Ingredients in Indiana. Complaints culminated in a series of lawsuits over the whiskey's authenticity, which the company settled in 2015 with promises to change its marketing materials and bottle labeling.

Templeton Rye has six fulltime and about 10 part-time employees, the company said.

The distillery project will add 27 jobs and will be able to produce 500,000 proof gallons of rye whiskey annually.

The aging warehouse will be able to store 40,000 barrels.

DMR: Casino in Clinton debuts simulcast horse, dog racing

LINH TA

LTA@DMREG.COM

Iowans looking to bet on video simulcasts of horse and dog races will no longer have to go to a casino with live racing to make their wagers. On Friday, Wild Rose Casino & Resort in Clinton began to offer off-track betting, including races from Santa Anita Park, Aqueduct, Keeneland and Oak Lawn. It's the first state-regulated Iowa casino without live racing to offer off-track betting. "It's something new and fresh we're offering to people on the eastern side of the state," said Tom Timmons, president and chief operating officer of Wild Rose Casinos. "We're hoping to attract people from Clinton and the Quad Cities." The Iowa Legislature agreed in 2014 to allow state-regulated casinos that do not offer live racing to take bets on simulcasts of horse and dog races as part of a broader bill that permitted the state's greyhound tracks to stop offering live racing. The simulcasts are offered through a hub hosted by the Iowa Greyhound Association, which is operating the Dubuque dog track. Iowa's only other recent greyhound track, Bluffs Run in Council Bluffs, shut down in December 2015.

The greyhound association will receive a share of the revenues.

Previously, the only Iowa gambling operations that offered wagering on simulcasts of horse and dog races from outside tracks were Prairie Meadows Racetrack and Casino in Altoona and Iowa Greyhound Park in Dubuque, along with Meskwaki Bingo Casino Hotel at Tama. The Meskwaki casino, which is regulated by a tribal gaming commission, has long been allowed to offer off-track wagering under provisions of the federal Indian Gaming Regulatory Act.

For its debut, The Wild Rose will offer races from 16 different tracks across the country.

People interested in making bets will go into the Coaches Corner — Wild Rose's sports bar and grill. The area includes 56 new televisions including 16 screens that combine for theater-style viewing. Each booth includes screens for watching races.

Patrons can purchase a program and then let a clerk know what they're interested in betting on. They will receive a ticket and can either stay or leave Coaches Corner.

The wagering is parimutuel and people are not betting against the house. The casino will take a cut of the winnings, while the rest will be dispersed towards the winning tickets, Timmons said.

"We're excited," Timmons said "Got everything finalized and tested everything."

Timmons said they may expand simulcasting to its Jefferson and Emmetsburg locations.

"We'll be watching and see how it goes," Timmons said. "There is an investment with it."

The casino will feature the Santa Anita Derby on Saturday.

DMR Editorial: Is Harreld proposing merger or hostile takeover?

This isn't the way to unify the UI foundation and alumni

Perhaps it makes sense for the University of Iowa Foundation to merge with the school's alumni association.

But it seems odd that the school's president, Bruce Harreld, is the man who has decided to make that happen; that he hasn't given much of a rationale for it; and that he's already decided, on his own, who will lead the new organization.

Stranger still, he has done all of this without consulting with the alumni group, leaving its leaders "shocked" by Harreld's actions.

It's important to remember the entities — the school, the foundation and the alumni association — are separate and distinct entities. The University of Iowa is a public institution dedicated to higher learning and run by the Board of Regents. The foundation and alumni groups are two separate, private, tax-exempt organizations run by their own boards of directors.

Obviously, the three have common interests and they collaborate and coordinate while pursuing their individual goals. But they have missions that are fundamentally different. The school exists to educate students; the foundation exists to raise money for the school and the University of Iowa Hospitals; and the alumni association exists to strengthen the school through recruiting, alumni events, networking opportunities and career programs.

Last fall, Harreld asked the leadership of the foundation and alumni association to form a committee that would explore ways the two organizations could work together in supporting the school. He said that after reviewing the committee's recommendations — none of which involved a merger — he decided to "create one, new, unified organization," citing their "overlapping missions and aspirations."

But the report on which Harreld claims to have based his decision doesn't actually recommend the merger of the two organizations.

Still, Harreld says a newly created, single entity will better serve the university by creating "more meaningful alumni engagement and increased philanthropic support" — although it's not clear how that would occur. There's no question the alumni and foundation have overlapping objectives, but they are fundamentally different organizations. The foundation, for example, employs 233 people and recently completed an eight-year fundraising drive by securing almost $2 billion in pledges. The much smaller alumni organization has 25 employees and one of its biggest contractors is the foundation, which was paid $137,000 last year for information-technology services.

To put the size of the two organizations in perspective, consider this: Last year, the foundation spent $124 million, while the alumni association's total spending for the year was $4 million. In fact, the foundation's fundraising budget was more than three times the total spending by the alumni group.

Can the two be merged without the alumni association losing its identity and focus?

Perhaps. But it's easy to see why the alumni organization's leaders are worried.

"The alumni association's board of directors was not aware that (Harreld) was going to make that decision until the day he did," Clare Kelly, chairwoman of the association's board of directors, told the Cedar Rapids Gazette. "We are not happy with the manner in which it's been handled."

And Harreld has done more than decree that these two nonprofits be combined. He has also decided that once merged, they will be led by Lynette Marshall, who now earns more than a half a million dollars annually as the foundation's president and CEO.

Harreld has also instructed the association to stop accepting new members and stop collecting membership dues.

"The board didn't vote on those decisions," Kelly told the Gazette. At this point, Harreld's "merger" looks more like a hostile corporate takeover than a mutually agreed-upon consolidation. It's almost as if the two charities' boards of directors have no say in the fate of their organizations or their leadership, and their bylaws are utterly meaningless. If that's the case, the Internal Revenue Service should take a close look at their tax-exempt status and ask why it is that the head of a public university can, by his own edict, reorganize or dissolve these two independent, nonprofit organizations.

A merger might make sense, but the manner in which this one is being pursued does not.

DMR Iowa View: Women deserve to receive equal pay for equal work

This column was signed by Iowa state Sens. Rita Hart, Pam Jochum, Liz Mathis, Janet Petersen, Amanda Ragan; state Reps. Marti Anderson, Liz Bennett, Timi Brown-Powers, Abby Finkenauer, Ruth Ann Gaines, Mary Gaskill, Lisa Heddens, Monica Kurth, Vicki Lensing, Mary Mascher, Helen Miller, Amy Nielsen, Jo Oldson, Kirsten Running-Marquardt, Sharon Steckman, Beth Wessel-Kroeschell, Phyllis Thede, Cindy Winckler, Mary Wolfe.

Equal pay for equal work. It might sound like common sense, but unfortunately it's not reality.

The figures on equal pay are daunting. Women make just 80 cents for every dollar a man makes, according to data released by the Census Bureau. African-American and Hispanic women are even further behind, making just 63 and 54 cents, respectively.

Unfortunately, Iowa lags behind even those disappointing numbers. Iowa women make less than 77 cents on the dollar for what a man earns.

Women and our families are being shortchanged hundreds of thousands of dollars over the course of a lifetime.

Some argue that women choose different jobs, or choose motherhood over career opportunities. But even within the same profession, women are paid less. Female doctors and surgeons make 71 percent of what men make, and female financial specialists make 66 percent compared with men in their profession. For lawyers and judges, the pay gap is 82 percent. And while three-fourths of women who enter the workforce will get pregnant, half of working firsttime mothers receive no paid leave to have their babies, according to the Census Bureau.

Women are much more likely to have career interruptions because of child care being costly or unavailable, often resulting in lost pay raises when they return.

These are difficult financial decisions forced upon women and families because of failing economic policies.

Those are the figures. But they don't tell the whole story or how we can take action.

Tuesday was Equal Pay Day, symbolizing how long into the year women must work to earn what men earned last year. It's a day when we should remember not just the numbers, but the impact on women and families. After all, women are sole, primary, or co-breadwinners in nearly 72 percent of Iowa families.

Hardworking women trying to provide for their families are falling behind because of a discriminatory pay gap and policies that don't support the tough choices facing families.

Thankfully, there are solutions to make pay equitable.

The Legislature can create paid leave and child-care policies allowing mothers to keep their jobs, avoiding long gaps in employment that drive down wages. And we need to raise the minimum wage — two-thirds of minimum-wage earners are women — and enact other policies to raise wages instead of engaging in a race to the bottom.

Employers can get help to correct their pay practices, through equalpay guidelines from the U.S.

Department of Labor. Women must also be empowered to ask prospective employers to show women and men are paid equally, that their hiring process seeks diversity, and that they can join a union. Women in unions earn over one-third more than women in non-union workplaces.

If there is unequal pay, women should discuss the problem with their employer.

If discrimination continues, every woman has the right to file a complaint with the U.S.

Equal Employment Opportunity Commission.

Equal pay for equal work shouldn't be an idea. It should be reality. Other states are moving forward, and women continue to recognize this issue's importance. We need to move Iowa forward, and we need citizen action, legislative action and participation from the businesses to make it happen. At current pace, the wage gap will not close for 50 years. Women and hardworking Iowa families cannot afford to wait that long.

LEE: Is Iowa's ACA insurance market a sign of what's to come nationally?

CHELSEA KEENAN

Top of Form

Bottom of Form

Iowa's insurance market could be the canary in the nation's coal mine if Congress or President Donald Trump doesn't offer clarity soon on the future of the Affordable Care Act, with millions of people losing coverage, one industry expert said Friday.

Two insurers announced this week that they would stop selling individual health plans both on and off the Iowa exchange — Des Moines-based Wellmark Blue Cross and Blue Shield on Monday and Aetna on Thursday. The decisions affect some 57,600 Iowans — 21,400 Wellmark policy holders and 36,200 policy holders with Aetna.

It also leaves the vast majority of the 50,000 Iowans purchasing subsidy-eligible insurance on the exchange with only one option — Minnesota-based Medica. But that insurer is tight-lipped on what it plans to do in 2018, saying Thursday that it is "evaluating the situation and (its) options."

"Iowa is a bit different in that it's happening so early," said Cynthia Cox, associate director for the program for the study of health reform and private insurance at not-for-profit Kaiser Family Foundation. "But it might be the start of many more exits to come."

Iowa has never shown up in any of the health care policy organization's lists of states with fragile markets. States such as Tennessee, Arizona and Oklahoma have had steep premium increases and seen insurers drop out.

"This goes to show that political uncertainty can make an otherwise stable market unstable overnight," she said.

The problem Wellmark, Aetna and other insurers face is that not enough young and healthy people are choosing to enroll in plans to help spread out costs. Instead, older, sicker individuals with multiple chronic illnesses — who need insurance and coverage — are purchasing the health plans, putting a high concentration of expenses in the individual market.

Wellmark said on Monday it lost $90 million through the individual market in Iowa.

There's also quite a bit of uncertainty still looming over the future of the ACA. Trump and Congressional Republicans have promised to repeal and replace President Barack Obama's signature health care legislation, but have been stalled by disagreement over the changes they will make.

Insurers have said the unpredictability over which rules will be in place in 2018 — and over the billions of dollars in government subsidies that make the plans more affordable to millions of people — make it difficult to commit to offering such insurance.

Many have asked the government to extend the subsidies for 2018.

This comes as health insurers are preparing 2018 premium rate proposals to submit to federal and state insurance regulators over the next few months.

Whether Medica will stay in Iowa is hard to say, Kaiser's Cox added. Several states have only one insurance option on the exchange — but that insurer typically is the Blue Cross and Blue Shield plan, which are more established.

Medica is a significant player in Minnesota, Cox noted, and it has expanded into additional markets including Iowa and Kansas.

Bottom of Form

"But it's not clear if they have capacity to absorb all the enrollees in Iowa," she said. "It puts them in tough spot."

If Medica were to drop out, there isn't much in terms of a Plan B. Iowans could purchase plans off the exchange without subsidies, but Iowa insurers are pulling out of that market, too.

Trump has indicated he will not enforce the mandate or penalize those without insurance.

But that is hardly a relief if you are sick and in need of medical care, Cox said.

"This is warning sign," Cox said. If Congress "doesn't act soon, ... we can see this happen around the country."

SCJ Editorial: Election bill will strengthen system of voting in Iowa

Top of Form

Iowa's election system will be stronger as a result of a bill advancing through the Legislature.

Last month, the Senate passed and returned to the House for final approval a package of election changes. The House is expected to pass the bill, as well.

Getting the most attention within the bill is a voter ID provision.

As an additional layer of protection for the integrity of elections in this state, we long have supported a requirement that voters show some form of identification before casting a ballot. We are not alone on this within or outside Iowa.

A February Des Moines Register/Mediacom Iowa Poll showed 69 percent of Iowans support such a requirement. Voter ID requirements vary from state to state, but 34 states have passed laws requiring voters to produce a form of identification at the polls, according to the National Conference of State Legislatures.

Under the bill moving through the Iowa Legislature, voters would need to show an acceptable form of government-issued ID before casting a ballot at polling places. If a voter doesn't have one of the acceptable forms of ID, the state will issue him or her a voter-verification card, free of charge. A request for an absentee ballot would need to include an acceptable personal identification number, as well.

Within today's society, one needs some form of identification to conduct almost any kind of personal business. We do not believe asking the same of voters in the name of ensuring honest elections in our state is at all unreasonable.

Another component of the bill we support and have advocated for in this space because it also speaks to improved integrity within the process of voting is elimination of the straight-party voting option.

Bottom of Form

In our view, straight-party voting is lazy voting. We understand voters have every right to vote for all Republicans or all Democrats if they wish and even if a straight-party option didn't exist on the ballot, voters could (and some would) fill in the ovals for all candidates of one party or another.

Still, if this choice wasn't so easily available, we believe more voters would spend more time getting to know more about all of the candidates whose names appear on their ballot.

Another benefit to elimination of the straight-party voting option is this: Nonpartisan questions on the back of the ballot wouldn't be so easily forgotten or ignored.

We look forward to the House joining the Senate and sending this election bill to the governor for signature into law.

LEE: Branstad meets with senators handling his confirmation

ROD BOSHAART

Gov. Terry Branstad said Friday he had productive meetings with members of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee during this week's trip to Washington, D.C. However, he doesn't expect a hearing on his confirmation to be the next U.S. ambassador to China to take place until next month at the earliest.

Branstad said he met with committee chairman Sen. Bob Corker, R-Tenn., and ranking member, Sen. Ben Cardin, D-Md., as well as other committee members and Iowa Republican Sens. Chuck Grassley and Joni Ernst, and he plans a return trip the last week in April after the two-week Easter recess. At that time, he'll meet with more members of the committee who will consider his appointment by President Donald Trump to be America's top diplomat in China.

"I had a lot of good meetings with senators," Branstad said Friday during his first public event since his trip. He said he has completed the paperwork phase of the process and now he is "learning as much as I can about the China issues, and there are many."

The governor said he also met with Sonny Perdue, Trump's secretary of agriculture nominee, who has cleared the committee process but awaits Senate confirmation pending an April 24 vote.

"It's getting kind of frustrating, I think, for a lot of people. This process has been very slow," Branstad said of this year's Senate action. "They've now just confirmed Neil Gorsuch to the Supreme Court and that took up a significant amount of time.

"But this has been the most, I guess, disruptive process that we've ever seen in terms of appointments. Confirmations usually don't take nearly this long. But, unfortunately, I think the Democrats have decided that they're going to just basically attack everybody. I hope that by the time I get there that will have worn out and that won't be case," he said.

"They ask tough questions and there are a number of issues. But I'm hopeful that I can generate bipartisan support. Time will tell," he added.

Grassley said he expects Branstad's confirmation to "go well."

Bottom of Form

"He's personable, professional and has the proven leadership and policy skills to serve in such an important diplomatic position. As members of the Foreign Relations Committee get to know him, they'll appreciate his trustworthiness, his work ethic and his ability to get the job done for the United States as he has for Iowa for a record number of years," Grassley added.

Ernst said Branstad would make an excellent ambassador and hopes the Senate moves him through the confirmation process "as soon as possible."

"Our relationship with China is very important — from agricultural trade to national security — so I look forward to the Senate moving on his nomination soon," she said.

LEE: Branstad and Xi: From possibilities, an enduring relationship

B.A. MORELLI

Top of Form

Bottom of Form

Jack Kintzle was part of a welcome wagon in 1985 that cast such a positive light on Iowa it sparked a decades-long friendship between Xi Jinping, who would go on to become China's president, and Iowa Gov. Terry Branstad — now thrusting Branstad and Iowa into the spotlight of U.S.-Chinese relations.

Branstad, who was nominated as U.S. ambassador to China last year although has not yet been confirmed, has met with Chinese officials a handful of times over the past 30-some years. The relationship has blossomed and the impact has been far-reaching for the state, say officials in business, trade and education.

Hospitality laid the groundwork for the good relations, but Kintzle observed a measure of strategy and foresight by Branstad in encouraging the warm, respectful welcome in the midst of the farm crisis.

"Iowa was going through such a tough time with agriculture, especially farm foreclosures," said Kintzle, 73. "Iowa was at a level we needed publicity and we wanted to open doors. I think that's one of the reasons they were treated so well. How many million Chinese are there? I think he saw an opportunity to trade. I think the governor sensed the possibilities."

Pending confirmation, Branstad plans to move to Beijing with his wife, Chris, his daughter and son-in-law and granddaughters as he works to enhance the relationship between the two countries, he said during a celebration with Chinese officials during the Lunar New Year earlier this year in Muscatine.

"I'm an old friend of China," Branstad said there. "I've very honored and very proud that I've had a number of interactions with China and the leadership of China. We've seen great improvement in terms of exchanges and trade. Exchanges of students is one way to improve personal relationship and friendships. That is critically important to both of our countries and the world."

Branstad would step in amid heightened tensions between the United States and China over trade equity, punitive tariffs and how to handle North Korea. Branstad was not scheduled to be at the meeting in Florida late last week between President Donald Trump and Xi.

Kintzle was an Iowa Corn Growers Association director with a farm near Coggon in the summer of 1985 when Xi — then a county-level party leader Kintzle equated to a state secretary of agriculture in America — toured Iowa farms as part of a small agricultural delegation from Hebei province.

Kintzle's farm was right off the highway and convenient, so he got a call wondering if the delegation could visit. Soon, a small group of Chinese men wheeled up and spent a few hours inspecting machinery, grain bins and harvesters, then came inside for coffee. At the end, they took pictures together.

"They go back to China, he becomes president, and I farm for the next 30 years," Kintzle said. "I should have bought a lottery ticket. Although, having a president on my farm might be better than winning the lottery."

Branstad, then in his first term as Iowa governor, was instrumental in the visit, including hosting a then-unheralded Xi in his office.

By the time of the visit, Branstad already had signed an agreement establishing a sister-state relationship between Iowa and Hebei. In 1984, he led a 50-person delegation to Hebei. It was the first of six trade missions Branstad led to China.

Branstad next traveled to China as part of a three-country trade mission in fall 1993, marking the 10-year anniversary of the sister-state relationship. The goal was to expand markets for agricultural products, appliances, machinery and other exports, as well as stress in China Iowa's commitment to human rights and treating people with dignity.

"We think that one of the things that helped lead to the downfall of communism in Russia and Eastern Europe was all the contacts to the West — the sister states, the trade missions and the understanding that the people gain from that," Branstad said at the time. "I feel somewhat the same way about trade and building relationships in China.

"We can, hopefully, help push the Chinese state in the direction of more freedom and opportunity for the people as opposed to the old policy of trying to isolate them," he added.

The early legwork has made a difference for Iowa. China is the fourth-largest export market for Iowa, with $490.6 million worth of manufactured and value-added goods, according to the Iowa Department of Economic Development.

China's spending supports 4,000 jobs, and 5,000 "young talents" are studying in Iowa universities, Hong Lei, consul general based at the Chinese Consulate of Chicago, said during the recent Muscatine visit.

"I would say because of the sheer fact he's been involved, he's never let go," said Kim Heidemann, executive director of Iowa Sister States. “He’s continued to nurture this relationship. He goes to visit, goes to meetings. He’s hosted meetings. The governor has made it a point. He’s simply done things right, especially in the last few years with Xi and done it in such a way he puts Iowa first.”

The trips to China, and return visits from Chinese officials, have continued.

Xi returned to visit Muscatine and Des Moines in 2012 for an “old friends” reunion dinner stemming from the 1985 trip, and 20 Iowans traveled to China that same year for another reunion. Branstad also participated in trade missions in 2014 and 2016.

Downing Thomas, a professor and dean of International Programs at the University of Iowa, traveled with Branstad to China in 2012.

The delegation also included elected officials from Wisconsin and Virginia, along with a handful of business people and educational leaders. The significance of Branstad’s relationship with Xi was evident in the respect and attention he received compared with the other visitors. The China Daily newspaper sought him out specifically for an interview.

Bottom of Form

Iowa universities and colleges have seen enrollment among Chinese students soar in the past 10 years. More than 4,000 Chinese students are enrolled at the three state universities alone. While the influx of Chinese college students is seen beyond Iowa’s borders, the relationship between Iowa and China has helped Iowa schools, Thomas said.

“Clearly many of our students are aware of the relationship with Xi and Iowa, and their parents are aware of it.” Thomas said.

The economic impact from international students and their families in Iowa topped $365 million and has supported or created 3,700 jobs, according to an annual report from International Programs. Thomas estimates more UI alumni are living in China than anywhere else outside of Iowa and Chicago.

The visibility of Branstad’s relationship with Xi and Branstad’s personal involvement has opened doors for Iowa companies, such as West Des Moines-based Hy-Line International.

Tom Dixon, director of international sales and marketing for Hy-Line, which is one of the world’s largest breeders of laying hens, said the company received direct and indirect assistance from Branstad’s office in forging a relationship between it and the Huayu Group, based in Hebei.

Branstad was present at a deal signing in October 2013 between the companies for a breeder housing project in Hebei province. That show of support was important in a later deal in 2016 for a joint venture to distribute Hy-Line chicks in China. The ceremonial nature of the signing, particularly with someone on friendly terms with Xi, carries a lot of influence for local, state and regional officials in China, Dixon said.

“There’s some coincidence, but it certainly helped,” Dixon said. “Branstad put more prestige and elevated the deal. It gave more of an official nature, credibility it’s a real project. In China, government involvement is so very important for companies. It helped locally (in China) to get approvals.”

In China, Dixon explained, support of government officials and good relations between business and government is vital. Government officials need to sign off on acquisitions, permits and land sales, for example.

Dixon is hopeful Branstad’s agricultural background will help ease restrictions on poultry imports in China, which have been curtailed since the bird flu outbreak in 2015. He declined to be specific, but said it has cost Hy-Line millions of dollars.

“We’ve been working to try to negotiate things with health officials in China,” Dixon said. “We hope the governor of a large agricultural state could maybe lend influence to motivate or encourage some kind of solution so we can start exporting again. We hope his level of ambassador could facilitate and shed some light on the situation.”

Globe Gazette: Skipper: Government is often one big jigsaw puzzle

JOHN SKIPPER

Top of Form

Bottom of Form

Have you ever worked at putting a jigsaw puzzle together? Are you good at it?

The trick is to put all the corner pieces together first and then work your way in. You would think it would get easier as you go along, but it doesn't.

Often, the intricacies of city government are like putting a jigsaw puzzle together. The good news is you usually have an image of what the completed puzzle is supposed to look like -- the image on the cover of the box. The bad news is you have to put a thousand pieces together to get to the promised land.

Mason City seems to have to deal with one jigsaw puzzle after another. You know about many of them in the past. They're history, and that's where they should remain.

The new one is the proposal of Gatehouse Capital to build a hotel in the parking lot of Southbridge Mall, connect it to The Music Man Square with a skywalk, build a conference center/ballroom inside and relocate the museum on-site.

This is a project that has excited a lot of people, important because without public support, an important piece to the puzzle will be missing.

The city and Gatehouse have begun discussions on a development agreement.

Gatehouse is proposing a $15 million project that should bring in oodles property tax and sales tax revenue and provide a viable entertainment venue for North Iowa.

The Music Man Square and Southbridge Mall should both benefit -- and both could use a boost. The city tax base will increase. The community will have another asset.

For its efforts, Gatehouse at this point wants a $150,000 payment to get things moving and a development fee that is still negotiable but would probably be more than $150,000.

Other negotiating points are an interest-free loan to Gatehouse estimated at between $3.5 and $4.3 million to be paid back to the city after 20 years. The city wants provisions on number of jobs created.

As of now, the city would be responsible for paying for the construction of the skywalk and renovations to The Music Man Square. And that brings in another element to the puzzle -- the city's application through the Iowa Economic Development Authority for state funds to help leverage a $36.2 million River City Renaissance downtown development project.

The state has given pre-application approval for at least $7 million in funding and more could be coming if final approval is given.

But the project has changed since first approval was given. Instead of a hotel downtown next to City Hall -- the developer, Philip Chodur defaulted on that plan -- the Gatehouse proposal is now in place. The state requires $10 million in private investment to qualify for state funding. The Gatehouse plan fulfills that requirement.

Bottom of Form

Other parts of the pre-approved plan included a music pavilion, a parking ramp, a mixed-use building and an ice arena/multipurpose center.

When Trout meets with Iowa Economic Development staffers later this month, he will explain the change in hotel developers, how the parking ramp is no longer needed, and that there might be a change regarding the mixed-use building. None of this will be a surprise to the IEDA people because Trout has kept them advised for many months.

The wild card in all of this activity could be a referendum on Nov. 7 which residents petitioned for, regarding bonding for the ice arena.

The ice arena is part of the package for the state funding, so if voters reject it, the proposed state funding will probably die -- and that is the revenue Trout and the city hope to use to fund the renovations of The Music Man Square.

So, it is a big puzzle and one in which there are many opportunities for someone or something to come along and tip over the table.

Why do things have to be so complicated? It's government -- and it's puzzling.

LEE: Iowa's budget pinch: How did we get here?

ERIN MURPHY

A mere five years ago Iowa's state budget had nearly $1 billion to spare and its reserve accounts were flush with another $600 million.

And while money coming into the state continues to increase, the state budget has fallen into disrepair. This year, state lawmakers have been forced to cut make $250 million in budget cuts, and next year's budget figures to be tight as well.

It has been a fast fall from fiscal fitness to this beleaguered budget despite ever-increasing revenue.

Gov. Terry Branstad, a Republican, regularly says a sluggish agricultural economy has slowed state revenue, leading to the current budget pinch.

Capitol Democrats say the state has too many tax breaks that leave too much money in big businesses' accounts rather than the state's.

Experts in state economics say the problem has been created by myriad factors.

Busted budget

Iowa's state budget was a picture of financial health in fiscal year 2013. There was a $928 million budget surplus — unspent money in the state's general fund — and the state's two reserve accounts — a cash reserve and an emergency fund — were flush with $622 million.

Fast-forward to fiscal year 2017, which has roughly three months remaining: the budget surplus has been whittled to less than $50 million, and revenue came in roughly $250 million under projections. So lawmakers cut $118 million from state departments and used another $130 million from the reserve accounts to make the budget whole.

And lawmakers just started work the budget for fiscal 2018, which, likely for the first time in eight years, will spend less than the previous year.

The amount of money coming into the state is not the issue; post-recession revenues have increased each year.

So what is the cause of Iowa's budget pinch?

Farm economy

Branstad regularly cites this as the main issue for the state's budget trouble. Prices for corn and soybeans, Iowa's largest crops, have been low — lower than the cost of production for roughly a year. That puts a drag on farm incomes — and thus the state's income tax collections. It also impacts state manufacturing, much of which is built around agriculture — and thus hinders state sales tax collections.

"Agriculture in Iowa has changed so much," said Pat Grassley, a Republican state legislator who leads the Iowa House's budget committee and a farmer. "It isn't just your corn and soybeans and your hogs and cattle and your chickens. It's the fact then you have a plant that makes a tractor. If they lay off people, those layoffs impact you as well. And it's not just those layoffs. Maybe there's somebody that makes a headlight for them, and they lay off people. ...

"That, in my mind, is the agriculture economy because it ties to how agriculture goes. That's kind of the anchor."

David Roederer, Branstad's budget director and a member of the three-member panel that makes future revenue projections on which the state budget is based, said the average total net farm income in Iowa from 2006 through 2010 was $3.7 billion, and from 2011 through 2014 that exploded to an annual average of $7.6 billion. But in 2015 that dropped to $2.6 billion.

"Iowa still is very tied to agriculture, and generally that has served us well. But some years commodity prices are going to be better than others," Roederer said. "So you can see that in (2011 through 2014) that those were extraordinary years. If you average it out, you're going to be pretty close to what we normally have. The problem is life doesn't work on averages. ... Some years are going to be better than others."

Ernie Goss, an economics professor at Creighton University in Omaha, Nebraska, said the sluggish farm economy is impacting many Midwest states, leading to budget shortfalls in Iowa neighbors Nebraska and Kansas. Goss said net farm income has been falling since 2013, and that impact is felt in state tax collections.

"It really has to do with agriculture and those businesses tied to ag," Goss said. "Farmers are just not purchasing, for example, heavy equipment, and that shows up in the economy in Iowa and across the United States."

But not all economic experts agree the sluggish ag economy is driving Iowa's budget woes.

Dave Swenson, an economics professor at Iowa State University, said the farm economy's role in influencing the state budget often is overstated.

"The farm economy is not the main, nor a major cause of the current situation," Swenson said in an email interview. “Farmers do not contribute as much to the state’s coffers as many think, and the ebbs and flows of farmer incomes are spread out over years — both gains and losses — allowing farmers to truly minimize both their federal and state taxation bites.”

Holly Lyons, who works with the state’s non-partisan fiscal estimating agency and also serves on the budget estimating panel, said the farm economy is only a part of the equation that has led to the current budget situation.

Lyons said income tax revenues turned flat in the spring of 2016, and that can be explained in part by lower commodity prices and a decline in the manufacturing economy — again, which is heavily tied to agriculture.

But Lyons said other factors, such as slowed sales tax revenue, also impacted the budget.

“The farm economy is just one of the factors in the shortfall — it is by no means the primary cause,” Lyons wrote in an email to Democratic state legislator Cindy Winckler, of Davenport, who had asked for Lyons’ assessment of Branstad’s claims that the farm economy is driving the budget issues.

Tax cuts and credits

Democratic state legislators insist the biggest driver of state budget issues is money not collected thanks to various tax relief programs.

Iowa’s 67 tax credit programs will cost the state more than $1 billion in fiscal year 2018.

Statehouse Democrats take particular exception with the tax relief programs that they say go to big businesses that don’t need the help.

The most expensive programs are for commercial and industrial property tax relief ($152.1 million), the homestead tax credit ($136 million), and a business property tax credit ($125 million).

Bottom of Form

“Farm prices certainly have affected Iowa’s economy, but our state budget is much more directly impacted by the cost of tax cuts and tax credits that have grown in the last four years at a rate that is just unsustainable,” said Chris Hall, a state legislator from Sioux City and the top Democrat on the House budget committee. “The areas of the budget that have been increasing in cost at the most rapid rate are tax cuts primarily to out-of-state corporations and also tax credits. Both of those numbers have increased exponentially over the last few years at a pace that is faster than the state’s economy is growing.”

Swenson agrees. He said tax relief programs for businesses — including the commercial and industrial property tax relief program, another for companies that perform research and development, and a sales tax break on manufacturing sales — are the primary drivers of the state’s revenue shortage.

Grassley said he is willing to examine the state’s myriad tax credits and whether some could be reduced or eliminated. He has introduced legislation that would start that process.

However, Grassley said he would like any change in state tax credits to be a part of a larger overhaul of state tax laws.

“I think the other party (Democrats) looks at the tax credits saying that money should go to be spent (in other areas of the budget). Philosophically, I would look at it as, can we do tax policy better in the state of Iowa than just doing a bunch of different tax credits. Could we do something that benefits all Iowans,” Grassley said. “But looking at the tax credits, I think, is healthy for us to do if the objective is how can we make Iowa’s tax climate more competitive with other states.”

Roederer said he thinks the impact of tax credits on the budget is overstated. He said two programs that have experienced some of the largest growth in the past half-decade are two programs largely supported by Democrats: the earned income tax credit, which benefits low-income taxpayers, and a program that helps cities rebuild aging buildings.

“To say that is the reason (for the budget troubles) is, I don’t think the numbers support that,” Roederer said.

Missing the mark

Whatever factors may be influencing state revenues, those revenues still continue to increase.

One critical issue that led to this year’s budget cuts was a misjudgment by the budget estimating panel. The group lowered its projections three times, in October, December and January, and the state was forced to cut the current budget with only a few months remaining.

The estimating panel meets quarterly to project the coming year’s state revenue. Its December estimate is used by the governor and state lawmakers to craft the next year’s budget.

This year the panel reduced its estimate by more than $90 million in December, and then by another $130 million in March, leaving the governor and state lawmakers to scramble.

The last time the estimating conference guessed too high by such a wide margin was in fiscal years 2009 and 2010 in the immediate wake of the recession.

“Based on indicators we saw at the time, we did our revenue estimate and it appeared, at least we thought, our estimates were going to be accurate. And obviously they were not,” Roederer said. “So you can still have a growing economy, but if your budget is based on an economy that is growing faster than it actually is, then you have a belt-tightening, which is what we’re going through.”

Grassley also has introduced legislation that he said would aim to help streamline the data collection process for the budget estimating panel and make it easier to perform its work. But Grassley conceded at the end of the day legislators will always be working with an estimate.

“That’s like playing the lottery. It’s hard when you’re estimating. There are so many moving parts,” Grassley said. “There is still growth. And that’s why we’ve tried to approach the budgeting process knowing that there’s going to be times when you don’t meet your growth level, and when you spend less you set yourself up in a position that you have a cash reserve or you have some other things that may help you take care of those situations.”

LEE: Iowa Senate leader sees ‘outside chance’ for tax reform this year

JAMES Q. LYNCH

Iowa lawmakers hope to wrap up the 2017 session this month, but Senate President Jack Whitver thinks there’s an “outside chance” tax reform can be accomplished

However, the Ankeny Republican said it will be hard to do this year because of the state’s revenue and budget situation.

“The reality of the situation is our budget is a little tighter than we had hoped,” Whitver said during taping of Iowa Public Television’s Iowa Press Friday. Lawmakers had to cut the current year budget by nearly $120 million in January and tap the cash reserve fund for about $130 million last month. So majority Republicans want to “do the fiscally responsible thing and get the budget under control before looking at reform.”

Reforming Iowa’s taxes is one of the reasons he ran in 2010, Whitver said, and something he’s been working on since.

“I was hoping we could get to it this year, but it’s looking more and more like this might be a 2018 issue,” he said. Whitver acknowledged it won’t get any easier in an election year, but “frankly, to have real, true, lasting, impactful tax reform is a complicated process.”

As GOP senators look at reform possibilities, everything is on the table, including federal deductibility and tax credits, Whitver said. His priority is lowering individual income tax rates because that would affect the most Iowans and Iowa small businesses.

“The states that are growing and thriving and are prospering right now are the states with the lowest — or even no income tax,” he said. “I’m not sitting here today saying next year we’re going to eliminate the income tax, but the lower we can go on that, I think research shows we can be more prosperous.”

Not only would lower individual income tax rates affect most Iowa taxpayers, but Whitver said it would benefit small business owners like him. His food and fitness businesses are “pass through” businesses that pay individual income tax.

Bottom of Form

“When you talk about corporate tax reform, that really isn’t that big a part of our state budget,” he said. “What we really need to do is reform the individual tax code and that would help thousands of small business owners across the state.”

He ruled out a sales tax increase unless it is accompanied by “major tax reform.”

Looking at the final weeks of the session, Whitver predicts the GOP House and Senate majorities are going to iron out differences in their respective 20-week abortion ban bills. The House version called for a 72-hour waiting period and contained no exceptions for fetal anomalies. The Senate bill included a 24-hour waiting period between the time a woman meets with her doctor and has the procedure. It also allowed an exception for abortions beyond 20 weeks in the case of a fetal anomaly.

Whitver also said lawmakers will provide more money for water quality efforts, will not dismantle the Des Moines Water Works, will ban texting while driving and said that if traffic enforcement cameras aren’t banned they will be “heavily regulated.”

WCF COURIER: Does Altmayer arrest have any connection to missing cousins case?

JEFF REINITZ

Authorities have declined to comment on any investigation into possible links between Jeff Lee Altmayer and the disappearance and deaths of cousins Lyric Cook-Morrissey and Elizabeth Collins.

Altmayer, 57, of Ankeny, is charged with attempting to lure children into his silver passenger car as far west as Onawa — near the Nebraska border — to a mobile home park just east of Dike. He’s also a person of interest in a similar incident at a Cedar Falls park.

Lyric, 10, and Elizabeth, 8, disappeared while riding their bikes in Evansdale on July 13, 2012, and their bodies were found Dec. 5, 2012, in a rural wilderness area in Bremer County. No arrests have been made in their deaths.

Black Hawk County Attorney Brian Williams said investigators in the cousins case are aware of Altmayer. The Iowa Division of Criminal Investigation agent who filed the criminal complaint in Altmayer's Jasper County case is the lead agent in the cousins probe.

In the past, authorities have commented about the rarity of double abductions when talking about the cousins case, and Black Hawk County Sheriff Tony Thompson said he found "interesting" the fact at least one of Altmayer's crimes involve approaching a pair of girls at the same time.

The double abduction angle also has been a red herring for cousins investigators. In 2013, authorities began looking into Michael Klunder for possible ties to Lyric and Elizabeth's deaths. Klunder, a 42-year-old farm worker who had served prison time for abductions, picked up two girls near a Dayton bus stop in May 2013. One fled, and he killed the other before taking his own life. Investigators eventually ruled out Klunder as a suspect in the cousins case after accounting for his whereabouts.

Reached Wednesday, Elizabeth's father, Drew Collins, said he wasn't familiar with the Altmayer case and said authorities haven't contacted him about it. However, he remembers hearing about the enticement attempts last summer before Altmayer was arrested.

Collins is skeptical about any connection to his daughter's death.

Bottom of Form

"It doesn't seem like that would fit," Collins said. "Whoever this is, I think if he takes a couple of little girls, why would he let them go if he already killed a couple kids."

Collins said he's heard countless leads and rumors since his daughter's death. It can be maddening, he said.

"I think something different every day, man. I think in my head, 'it could be this,' but the next week or the next day or 20 minutes later, I'm thinking 'it's this guy or that guy.' I've heard a ton of names, I can't keep them all in my brain. All I can do is speculate, and I think about it all day, every day," Collins said.

LEE: Branstad no fan of granting pardons

His rate since 2011 is lowest in more than six decades

Since returning to the governor's office in 2011, Terry Branstad has granted fewer pardons on average than any Iowa governor in more than six decades.

His record of granting reduced jail sentences is similarly stingy.

A review of Iowa gubernatorial records going back to 1949 — a span covering 11 administrations — shows Branstad, since his return to office in 2011, granted fewer pardons than any other Iowa governor during that time span.

Branstad is closer to the middle of that pack for granting commutations, or reduced sentences, since 2011. However, remove the roughly three dozen commutations that were the direct result of a 2012 U. S. Supreme Court ruling that negated lifetime sentences for juveniles, and Branstad once again drops to the fewest granted since at least 1949.

A pardon forgives an individual for a crime committed and restores lost rights.

A commutation reduces an individual's sentence and makes him or her eligible for parole.

"I've always tried to be very thoughtful and very judicious in making these decisions. The governor is given the extraordinary power of being able to grant pardons," said Branstad, a Republican who was a lawyer before being first elected to public office — the Iowa House — in 1972.

Branstad has approved just more than four pardons per year, on average, since 2011.

Not only is that the lowest average of any governor since 1949, it is dramatically lower than the averages posted by Branstad's two immediate predecessors, both of whom were Democrats.

Chet Culver, who governed Iowa from 2007 to 2010, approved an average of nearly 24 pardons per year, a rate six times higher than Branstad. Tom Vilsack, who led Iowa for two terms from 1999 to 2006, approved more than 12 pardons per year.

Even Gov. Robert Ray, a Republican under whom Branstad served as lieutenant governor, granted nearly a dozen pardons per year on average, or a rate three times higher than Branstad's.

Since 2011, Branstad has been slightly stricter even than his previous self: He approved an annual average of seven pardons during his first stint as governor from 1983 to 1999.

Branstad said he believes a governor's power to pardon should be used sparingly. In addition to the normal application process, he requires a face-to-face interview with the applicant.

"I believe a pardon, which is an extraordinary power, which basically eliminates that conviction from their record, should only be granted if you're very confident this person is an exemplary citizen who has given back and helped other people in substantial ways," he said. "So, I have required a personal interview. I want to be able to look them straight in the eye. I want to feel confident that they're never going to commit another crime, that they're never going to embarrass me or the people of the state of Iowa."

Branstad is even less a fan of commutations.

During his first, 16-year term in office, he approved just two reduced sentences. In his second, six-year stint, he has approved 39 commutations, but 38 of those were in response to that U.S. Supreme Court ruling.

Take those out and Branstad, during 22 years in office, has approved three reduced sentences overall.

"Most governors keep in mind they're running for re-election almost always. The worst thing you can do is be called soft on crime," said Robert Rigg, a Drake University Law School professor who specializes in criminal law. "No politician ever wanted to get stuck with being soft on crime. Certainly, Terry Branstad can never be accused of being soft on crime."

Branstad's rare commutations are not as strikingly different from his predecessors as were his pardons. Culver granted no commutations during his four years in office; Vilsack granted seven during his eight years; Ray granted an average of just two per year during his 14 years in office.

The Iowa governors with the highest rates of commutations held office during the 1950s. Leo Hoegh granted 30 in two years, and Herschel C. Loveless averaged 12 per year during his one term.

"Any time you deal with a governor, you're dealing with the political office. And any governor's staff is going to sit there and try to review the downside of doing a parole, or commutations, or a pardon," Rigg said. "I'm sure all governors, whether Terry Branstad or somebody else, is going to take that into the calculus of whether you grant a pardon or commutation. But hopefully that's not the only reason."

When pardons and commutations are combined and averaged, Branstad's separate tenures account for two of the three lowest among all Iowa governors since at least 1949. If those commutations that were the result of that U.S. Supreme Court ruling are removed, Branstad's tenures are the two lowest.

Branstad received nearly 400 requests for pardons since 2011 and approved 26. He received almost 90 requests for commutations and granted 39. Branstad said the application process for pardons and commutations is thorough, and justified his rare approvals as having public safety in mind.

"We go through a very extensive process. We do an extensive (Iowa Division of Criminal Investigation) background investigation, it has to go before the parole board before it ever comes to me," Branstad said. "The good news is we've not had the tragedies that have occurred in some other states where governors haven't been as careful or judicious and people that they pardoned have then committed other serious crimes."

P.S. Ruckman, a professor at Rock Valley College in Rockford, Ill., who writes a blog on executive clemency, said while commutations can be risky, he thinks there is little downside to granting pardons.

"When I see a pardon number that low, I just don't get why that is not in the hundreds," Ruckman said. "Because, again, the political risks there are just about zero."

Ruckman said governors appear to be motivated, in part, by wanting to avoid granting a pardon or a commutation to an individual who then commits another crime. Ruckman and Rigg both noted George H.W. Bush's 1988 campaign ad that used the example of a felon who raped a woman after he escaped while on a weekend furlough program supported by Bush's opponent, Michael Dukakis. Even though that individual was given neither a commutation nor a pardon, Ruckman and Rigg said they think that kind of example weighs on governors when making those decisions.

"There's something to this idea that you should be careful, but you should be careful anyway," Ruckman said. "If you look into those high-profile things, they're almost always about commutations (not pardons). The idea that there is some risk to restoring rights is just lunacy."

WHOTV: ISU Sees 20% Decrease in International Student Applications, Says Political Climate is Responsible

Iowa State University is seeing fewer international applications as places of higher education are facing similar issues nationwide.

The school says it has received 20% fewer international applications than the year before. Forty percent of colleges across the country also report reduced interest from international students, and ISU says the reason why is clear.

"Some of our students are just concerned about safety and how welcome they're going to be in the community. So with the executive orders issued, it has some of them a little concerned about will they be welcomed once they get to the U.S.," said Director of Admissions Katharine Johnson Suski.

The executive orders aimed at stopping travel from several predominantly Muslim countries and President Trump's campaign stance on China is not going unnoticed by potential students. ISU's applications from China are down 30%, and those from predominantly Muslim countries are down 60% to 80%.

"Certainly it saddens me when students don't feel safe here because, really, we know students are going to be very welcome here and taken care of in Ames," said Suski.

International student Waasay Mirza came to study from Pakistan, and says the problem is one of perception.

"I didn't feel uncomfortable, especially on this campus. People were really good, they helped me out," said Mirza.

Mirza came four years ago to study electrical engineering, and said being an international student has changed his life for the better.

"You get a lot of exposure, you get to learn a lot of things, and not only that, you get to see and meet so many different cultures and different diverse communities that you learn a lot," he said.

This is a message the college is trying to drive home as they participate in the national "You are Welcome Here Campaign."

"The You are Welcome Here Campaign will be a video of a lot of our students, faculty, and staff standing there saying 'you are welcome,' some in their native languages so students can hear that message from across campus," said Suski.

Suski also said representatives from the school recently returned from a trip to China, where international alumni spoke to prospective students about coming to America to study.

ISU says while international applications to the United States are down, applications to schools in Canada are on the rise.

KCCI: Six years later: Ashley Okland's murder still unsolved

Saturday marks the sixth anniversary of real estate agent Ashley Okland's shooting death.

Okland, 27, was working as a real estate agent in West Des Moines when she was found shot on April 8, 2011, at 558 Stone Creek Court, a model town home for a new development.

She was rushed to Iowa Methodist Medical Center in Des Moines, where she later died.

Investigators have interviewed hundreds of witnesses since her death, but no one has been charged in the case. West Des Moines police have said it remains an active investigation.

The case sparked new calls throughout the real estate industry to increase safety for real estate agents.

Anyone with information on the case is asked to call the West Des Moines Police Department at 515-222-3344 or Crime Stoppers of Polk County at 515-223-1400.

The Gazette: Branstad expects to sign firearms bill following review

Legislation makes 'monumental' changes to Iowa's gun laws

Gov. Terry Branstad said Friday he expects to sign legislation making major changes to Iowa's firearms laws but he is reserving judgment until he and his staff have time to review the provisions of House File 517 that received final House approval on Thursday.

"Obviously, we want to review it in its final form, but generally I've been a strong supporter of the Second Amendment and I believe the legislation passed with bipartisan support with a pretty strong margin,” Branstad said in an interview. “I’m inclined to be supportive but I want to reserve judgment until I get a chance to review it in its final form.”

Branstad said he had some concerns with the original version passed by the Iowa House but those were addressed in changes adopted by the Iowa Senate that were accepted by representatives Thursday before sending it to his desk for consideration.

“It looks pretty good,” the governor said.

Included in House File 517 is a controversial “stand your ground” provision that states a law-abiding citizen does not have a duty to retreat in a public place before using deadly force when confronted with danger to life or property.

The bill also would allow children below the age of 14 to handle pistols or revolvers under the supervision of an adult parent, guardian or instructor; pre-empt local ordinances restricting gun rights; create a uniform permit to carry weapons; provide for five-year permits to acquire handguns rather than single-year permits; and create confidentiality for those with permits, legalize short-barreled rifles and shotguns and allow those with permits to carry handguns in the Iowa Capitol and other public buildings.

Iowa Republican Party Chairman Jeff Kaufmann praised Speaker Pro Tempore Matt Windschitl and House and Senate Republicans for their work in shepherding the bill through both chambers of the Legislature in a bipartisan fashion. He called the bill “the most monumental piece of pro-Second Amendment legislation in Iowa’s history.”

Earlier in the week, members of Iowans for Gun Safety expressed concerns about the bill and on Friday, the Rev. Jeremy J. Brigham, executive director of the organization, wrote Branstad a letter urging him to veto the bill.

“This bill is particularly dangerous to men of color, women and children and many from these communities have joined us in speaking out,” Brigham said in his letter.

“Gov. Branstad, we believe it is particularly important that you veto this bill. As ambassador to China, like your predecessors, you will be asked to protect the rights of minorities in China. This bill ... threatens the rights of minorities in Iowa and we ask that you veto this bill and protect the rights of minorities in Iowa.”

If the bill becomes law, members of the Iowa Chapter of Moms Demand Action for Gun Sense in America said Iowa will become only the second state to enact a new “stand-your-ground” law since the killing of Trayvon Martin in Florida in 2012.

“In the weeks since this bill was introduced, lawmakers have listened thoughtfully to the widespread concerns about certain portions of it, and we’re grateful they removed dangerous sections that would have gutted Iowa’s background check and permit-to-carry requirements,” said Amber Gustafson of the Iowa Chapter of Moms Demand Action for Gun Sense in America.

“Still, we remain deeply concerned that the stand-your-ground and punitive pre-emption portions of this bill would leave our communities less safe,” Gustafson added in a statement. Stand-your-ground laws embolden people to escalate everyday disputes, and the statistics from states that have passed them are deeply troubling. We’ll be urging the governor to keep our state from following their concerning lead.”

Bottom of Form

There is a bill on Gov. Terry Branstad's desk that would consolidate elections in Iowa. School board and municipal elections would be held on the same day.

While many times on this page we take exception to what's happening in the Statehouse, this is one measure we can support, and we hope the governor signs this bill into law.

Lobbyists for schools oppose this bill. They haven't articulated why and there really is no objective reason to oppose a measure that would encourage more people to cast a ballot for someone to represent us.

A check of the records over the years reveals school elections, held in early September, have generated embarrassingly low turnout. It's been a disservice to the taxpayers who must pay the bills. It's been a disservice to the people who put their names on the ballot.

We ask people to serve and then hold them accountable for their service. That's the trade-off of public service. Greater voter turnout isn't all that much to ask.

One would think school lobbyists would embrace a law designed to get more people to the polls, get more people involved in the process. Instead, they oppose it.

That's unfortunate. And troubling.

Moreover, school districts typically charge taxpayers more than other government entities. Shouldn't they want more involvement among the public?

And equally, municipal elections have had terrible turnout when not combined with national elections.

We should remember, it's our local representatives — city council members, school board members, county supervisors — who have the most impact on us, and our pocketbooks.

We preach frequently the need for people to get involved in their government. Voting is the most important part of that process. Government should make voting convenient for people. With today's technology, there's no reason voting couldn't be done on someone's home computer. The hope here is that day will soon come.

After all, if we can pay all of our bills online, and grab cash from an ATM machine, and trust that it's secure, surely we can vote online as well. But, as with most things related to government, change takes time.

This new law will, we believe, get more people to participate in the process of electing representatives who are to work on our behalf. It's difficult to imagine why someone would be opposed to that.

Here's hoping the governor isn't opposed to that concept.

Centerville Daily lowegian: Main Street Iowa honors outstanding achievements

Centerville reaches $1 million benchmark and Ryan Stober receives leadership award during ceremony honoring award winning projects, entrepreneurs and volunteers

Main Street Iowa hosted the 31st annual Main Street Iowa awards celebration on Friday, April 7 at Hoyt Sherman Place in Des Moines. The program honored the efforts of those who work day in and day out in downtown revitalization in Iowa. The event was attended by approximately 550 individuals representing communities across the state.

Main Street Iowa has annually presented awards honoring outstanding accomplishments, activities and people that are making a difference in Iowa's Main Street districts. Projects large and small are recognized and serve as outstanding examples of what historic commercial district revitalization is all about.

Fifteen projects and activities occurring in local Main Street communities were selected to be recognized from the 160 competitive nominations submitted. The honors were presented by Gov. Terry E. Branstad, Lt. Gov. Kim Reynolds and Debi Durham, director of the Iowa Economic Development Authority.

"The Main Street Iowa program has stood the test of time since its introduction in 1985. The program continues to bring businesses, jobs, investment and vitality to our states' communities, both big and small," stated Branstad. "The Main Street Approach works, and Main Street Iowa has been a national model because we are creative, we embrace change, we demand local initiative and action, while holding strong to our roots as an historic preservation program."

"Healthy, historic commercial districts are a key deciding factor for industrial and business recruitment," said Reynolds. "Since 1986, local Main Street programs have made a significant impact on Iowa's economy with 4,514 new businesses and a net gain of 13,402 jobs. More than 740 building projects have been reported with an investment in those rehabs of over $2 billion. Last year alone, the Main Street Iowa network surpassed 156,135 total documented hours of human capital invested into Iowa's downtown revitalization efforts. This demonstrates a tremendous commitment to Iowa's Main Streets."

During the event, 10 communities were recognized for reaching significant benchmarks based on private dollar investments made in the purchase and revitalization of properties within their respective commercial districts. Centerville and Lansing were recognized for reaching the $1 million benchmark in the last year and Ft. Madison was honored for $2 million in local investment. Ames and Guthrie Center were recognized for achieving the $5 million level. Des Moines Sixth Avenue, Chariton, Corning, State Center and Ottumwa all attained $10 million in local investment since being designated as local Main Street programs. Four communities were recognized for significant anniversaries. Osceola was recognized for 20 years of participation as a designated Main Street community. Cedar Falls, Spencer and West Des Moines were recognized for 30 year anniversaries.

Two special awards were presented as well. James Walsh received the Spirit of Main Street Award, an honor that recognizes the person, organization, community or project which best demonstrates the true meaning and spirit of "Main Street at Work." The community of Oskaloosa was honored with a Signature Project Award for their inspiring and innovative place-making efforts in beautification, promotion and partnership.

In 1985, the Iowa Legislature adopted the National Main Street Center's Four Point Approach to district revitalization by establishing Main Street Iowa within the agency that is now the Iowa Economic Development Authority. Since its inception, the state program and its communities have been considered examples of excellence in the national effort to revitalize historic commercial districts across the country.

The Gazette Editorial: Affordable Housing: Second chances & better processes

Elected officials don't often get second chances, or clear-cut strategies for complex problems. Right now Cedar Rapids City Council members have both.

Minnesota-based nonprofit CommonBond Communities has submitted an updated plan for Crestwood Ridge, a northwest side housing project that fell shy of supermajority support last fall amid outcry from neighborhood residents.

Awarded $8 million in federal tax credits through the Iowa Finance Authority to develop alongside Edgewood and Crestwood roads, Crestwood Ridge included a mix of market rate and affordable apartments, including five supportive housing units. Staff from Willis Dady was tapped to provide case management for those five tenants.

Council members rejected rezoning for the project in October, when a majority neighbors voiced concerns about area sidewalks, increased traffic, lot density and water runoff. The updated Crestwood plan addresses these issues, so the nonprofit is requesting the city forego its typical 1-year delay and reconsider the project now, before the grant expires.

We continue to support the development because it earned city support for its grant application, met the strict criteria of the competitive grant, aligns with the comprehensive plan, won the recommendation of city staff and, most importantly, fills a long-standing affordable supportive housing gap. We also remain impressed by CommonBond and its partnership with Willis Dady.

Although most national reports rate the Midwest, Iowa and Cedar Rapids as generally affordable, the reality is a lack of local housing stock has increased local demand and cost. Rental vacancy rates in the city hover around 2 percent, and more than 40 percent of area renters are cost-burdened. Many households are only one financial crisis away from added reliance on taxpayer-funded safety nets or homelessness.

To make matters worse, the Trump administration wants to cut $6.2 billion, or 13 percent, from the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development. Specifically targeted are two programs that help people secure and sustain affordable housing — Community Development Block Grants, which fund initiatives ranging from disaster aid to police engagement to anti-poverty efforts like Meals on Wheels, and the HOME Investment Partnership, which helps low-income citizens repair existing homes.

Other HUD programs related to housing are in danger as well, including rental assistance, heating and air-conditioning aid, energy-efficiency assistance and various other local government partnerships like AmeriCorps and the Interagency Council on Homelessness. The Self-Help Homeownership Opportunity and Choice Neighborhoods programs, which aim to replace distressed public housing with mixed-income development, are on the chopping block too.

Given what's happening in Washington, you'd think Iowa lawmakers would be doing more to help communities prepare for worst-case scenarios. Instead, they are supporting similar policies and implementing laws that further erode the middle class, adding more lowans to the list of those searching for housing and other assistance.

That's the economic and political backdrop Cedar Rapids Council members need to consider before they once again refuse $8 million in housing tax credits, newly offered neighborhood improvements and proven affordable housing project management partners.

This is a multifaceted challenge that needs public-private coordination and public buy-in.

Healthy communities offer diverse housing options for people at all levels of the economic ladder. Business owners, retirees, farm laborers and bus drivers all need a place to live. When they can't find one, negatives ripple out.

For instance, a lack of workforce housing impedes the ability of employers to attract talent, leaving jobs unfilled and companies thinking twice about local expansions. And, when workers can't live near employers, they must travel further. Individual cars increase traffic and impact air quality. Alternatively, public transit faces greater demands in an ever-widening service area, which costs taxpayers.

Throughout Linn County, only eight supportive housing units are open to the public. And yet housing is the foundation for well-being — food security, economic contribution, health management, stability.

This housing gap won't be closed if strategies are limited to owner-occupied, large-lot single-family housing — or if all options are regulated to only certain neighborhoods.

This is a test of political will we cannot afford to fail. Fortunately, the Safe, Equitable and Thriving Communities Task Force subcommittee on housing has recommendations:

- Expand financial incentives for development of affordable housing throughout the city
- Build community capacity for supportive services programming
- Implement ongoing landlord education efforts
- Target nuisance property owners
- Develop partnerships to revitalize aging housing stock
- Remove barriers faced by specific populations
- Strengthen and support neighborhood associations
- Coordinate and unify affordable housing efforts

While these objectives are fully and individually possible, they are more easily accomplished by first focusing on the final item.

As the task force noted “at present, there is no coordinated, collaborative, unifying body or effort that develops and implements a strategic communitywide vision for affordable housing.”

That must change. We agree with the task force that Cedar Rapids needs a group — perhaps something similar to the Johnson County Affordable Housing Coalition or the long-dormant Affordable Housing Commission mandated by municipal code — with the necessary political capital to drive public policy. Ideally, this group will spur additional regional opportunities.

Dr. Mary Wilcynski and Stacey Walker, who served as co-chairs of the SET Task Force, noted that the group's recommendations were derived from discussions with several housing experts, many of whom served on the subcommittee. They aren't commentary on any one proposal, but an attempt to establish a more comprehensive approach.

"We do know that barriers to affordable housing currently exist in our community and everyone interested in a safe, equitable and thriving community should take the challenge of affordable housing seriously," they said as part of a joint statement.

"It is imperative that local governments work with nonprofit organizations and good developers to bring more affordable housing options to our city. ... The need for safe, affordable housing is not going away, therefore it is incumbent upon leaders to act."

Perhaps due to political aspirations or concern about the next election, needed and initially supported Cedar Rapids housing projects have been successfully derailed by small groups of citizens. Each time this happens, the city's relationships with established housing developers erode, more groups are emboldened to read from the same noisy playbook, and the diverse housing supply needed for the city to thrive is delayed.

Whether the updated Crestwood development stands or falls, it shouldn't have come to this. Taxpayers shell out thousands each year for professionals who use council-approved tools like the comprehensive plan and city ordinances to determine details like landscaping and water retention.

Given the inability of council to consider recent housing projects by the standards of merit they established, we are no longer convinced the current system provides a level playing field for all developers or projects. Time for changes. Let's start with a fearless and politically-saavy team committed to meeting the city's long-term and diversified housing goals.

The Gazette Column: This is no time for a constitutional convention

Todd Dorman

So amid the deepening political divisions and thrill-a-minute volatility of our post-truth Trumpian times, Republicans running our Legislature think the moment is right to grab us by the Constitution.

Last month, the Iowa House voted 58-38 along party lines to petition Congress to convene a constitutional convention under Article V of the U.S. Constitution. The convention, according to House Joint Resolution 12, would be "limited to consideration and support of amendments that impose fiscal restraints on the federal government, and amendments that limit the power and jurisdiction of the federal government, and no amendments on any other topic."

So just money, power and jurisdiction. What else is there?

It's now awaiting action in the Iowa Senate. Its floor manager there, Sen. Jason Schultz, R-Schleswig, said a debate will come "soon."

The resolution's writers have a flare for drama. It addresses our "crushing national debt." It accuses our federal government of "abuses of power" and talks of how it's "invaded the legitimate role of states" through federal mandates. It has "ceased to live under proper interpretation of the Constitution."

Stirring, to be sure. But the convention won't come in time to stop the feds from, for instance, invading Iowa with a fresh $225 million transfusion to save Gov. Terry Branstad's hemorrhaging Medicaid scheme. Such future federal incursions, funding roads, crop insurance and water quality, surely could be halted. Ask your nearest county supervisor, after lawmakers' 2017 local control pre-emption fest, about abuses of power, legitimate roles and unfunded mandates.

But I digress.

State Rep. Zach Nunn, R-Bondurant, led the charge in the House on March 15, insisting a constitutional convention would be like a “subcommittee,” or simply a “proving ground for new ideas.” It can happen if 34 state legislatures approve petitions. Nine have taken the plunge, including Arizona, Georgia, Alaska, Florida, Alabama, Tennessee, Indiana, Oklahoma and Louisiana. Other states, including Wisconsin and Ohio, are debating the issue.

Some con-con backers claim as many as 30 states have passed resolutions, counting actions taken years or even decades ago. Maryland just rescinded its resolution, passed in 1977.

“If not us, then who? If not now, when?” Nunn asked the House as debate opened.

It was hardly a debate for the ages.

Minority Democrats questioned the wisdom of lecturing Congress at a time when Iowa’s budget is a mess. That didn’t sit well with Rep. Chip Baltimore, R-Boone, who called a “point of order,” accusing Democrats of breaking House rules by going off topic. Apparently you can’t discuss state budgetary imprudence in a debate over federal budgetary imprudence. Somehow, his point was well taken by House Speaker Linda Upmeyer, R-Clear Lake.

It was not until Rep. Tim Kacena, D-Sioux City, rose to speak did we get a solid assessment of the convention drive.

“I can honestly say this resolution scares the hell out of me,” said Kacena, a retired firefighter who probably knows scary when he sees it. “This is dangerous.”

The thought of popping the hood on the Constitution at this point in our history is pretty scary. Our facts now are alternative. Our political cash comes in two flavors, shady and dark. Our nation just put a tweeting huckster in the Oval Office. Scrapping health insurance for 24 million people is what passes for sound public policy. We’re still trying to recover from the Bowling Green massacre.

A convention, now? Maybe the Russians will send delegates.

Sure, it takes 34 states to call a convention and 38 states to ratify any amendments it yields. No worries. That will never happen. Just like Donald Trump will never be president. Thank goodness.

I’m not going to defend the crushing national debt or any other boneheaded action taken by the federal government. There are many. And I can think of ways I’d like to change the Constitution.

But when the hottest trend in governing is called “the nuclear option,” the time to change the Constitution is not now. The people to do it is not us.

Legislatures across the country, including Iowa’s, are shoving through sweeping ideologically-driven initiatives with all the care, caution and concern for consequences of Visigoths on a Roman holiday. They would pick the convention delegates. That ought to work out well.

And a convention would not necessarily be “limited.”

We’ve had one such convention, in 1787. It was called by Congress to amend the Articles of Confederation. Instead, delegates tossed the articles and crafted an entirely new Constitution. It was a masterstroke for the future of America. It is not an example of cautious restraint.

Drake University Professor Dennis Goldford, who teaches constitutional law, said there were strong objections to straying from Congress' original charge in 1787. James Madison answered those criticisms in Federalist 40.

"He said, look, if you think things are so tough and difficult right now that we can't stay where we are, then go ahead and vote for this new Constitution, and we'll take that as your consent to the rather irregular procedure we adopted," Goldford said. "If you think that we had a runaway convention ... vote against the new proposed Constitution.

"So we had precisely this issue as far back as 1787-1788. Our only constitutional convention in American history was itself a runaway convention," Goldford said.

And if a convention's actions sparked a court challenge, it's uncertain what jurisdiction the courts would have, Goldford said.

"This opens up a huge can of worms," Goldford said.

I say let's not open that can.

Conservatives who want big changes at the federal level should note they currently control Congress and the White House, with a Supreme Court majority on the way. A convention isn't necessary, unless you want to do things so unpopular they can't be accomplished through the normal political process. Many of these proposals also are known as bad ideas.

And HJR 12 is a bad idea. The Senate should grab it and scrap it.

QC Times: Q-C lawmakers weigh in on Syria strikes

Ed Tibbetts

Top of Form

Bottom of Form

In mostly measured tones, lawmakers representing the Quad-Cities got behind President Donald Trump's decision to launch missile strikes against Syria. But there also were warnings, mostly from Democrats, about the prospect of a deeper commitment there.

The strikes, which came late Thursday, also rekindled calls in some corners of Congress for lawmakers to come up with an authorization for use of military force in the event there was to be further action. Rep. Dave Loebsack, D-Iowa, said Friday that Trump should have come to Congress before launching Thursday's strikes.

Republicans said Trump showed resolve, and that this represented a break from the Obama administration.

"Assad's actions follow a policy under President Obama that lacked any consequences for heinous crimes against Syrian civilians," Grassley said. "The action taken by President Trump to prevent further use of chemical weapons by Assad or anyone else was appropriate."

Sen. Joni Ernst, R-Iowa, praised the strikes Thursday night. "Unlike the Obama administration, the Trump administration is showing global leadership and we must work to find an end to the root causes of this crisis," Ernst said in a statement.

Republicans have long criticized Obama over Syria. In 2013, he raised the prospect of military action after government forces launched a chemical attack. The year before, Obama had said chemical weapons would cross a red line.

Obama decided ultimately against launching an attack on his own and went to Congress for authorization. But Congress took no action, either.

As for the region's Democrats, Sen. Dick Durbin, D-Illinois, called Thursday's strikes a "measured response." Sen. Tammy Duckworth, D-Illinois, said they sent a "clear and measured message" to Syrian President Bashar al-Assad.

Rep. Cheri Bustos, D- Illinois, called Thursday's action a "proportional response."

However, they also said Trump needs to lay out a strategy before any further action is taken.

Bottom of Form

Duckworth raised concerns about heightened tensions with Russia. "After weeks of sending dangerously mixed signals on Syria, the president owes it to our troops, who are now in greater danger, to clearly and unequivocally outline the long-term strategic end-state he is seeking to achieve in Syria and the region," she said.

Bustos said the president "must present the American people and Congress a clear and transparent strategy to ensure we do not rush into another open-ended conflict in the Middle East."

Loebsack, meanwhile, also called for a "comprehensive plan." He did not weigh in specifically on the propriety of Thursday's missile strike but said it was important that the U.S. and the world "ensure that Assad is held to account for war crimes committed against his own people."

Grassley also called on the president to "develop a comprehensive strategy with respect to ending the six-year-long crisis in Syria."

QC Times Editorial: No answers in sight as Iowa exchange crumbles

Quad-City Times editorial board

Top of Form

Bottom of Form

Iowa's health insurance exchange this week became the poster child for self-fulfilling prophecies.

In just 72 hours, Iowa's version of the Affordable Care Act, or Obamacare, crumbled under its own weight and the additional heft a Republican White House with no interest in supporting it.

Wellmark Blue Cross and Blue Shield and Aetna last week both announced departures from Iowa's exchange in 2018, citing mounting financial losses and continued "uncertainty." That leaves Iowa's exchange with just one provider, Medica, which has yet to make its future intentions known. Wellmark and Aetna represent a majority of the Iowa exchange's total plans.

So, now what?

What's clear so far is Republicans in Washington have no answers.

Obamacare has always been a highly compromised, deeply troubled program. Even proponents of the massive federal program lamented its shortcomings. It's over-reliance on young, healthy populations to subsidize the elderly and sick didn't pan out. Obamacare was costly and clunky. But, by most objective measures, it was relatively successful.

Roughly 20 million Americans have health insurance thanks to the ACA. In 2016, national insurance rates reached a record low of 10.6 percent, according to Gallup. That's down from 18 percent in 2013, and it's the working poor -- a population who spent decades one heart attack away from financial ruin -- who benefited most.

An imperfect program, for sure. But Obamacare isn't responsible for the country's astronomically high health care costs. Americans pay more and get less relative to the rest of the developed world, according to the World Health Organization. It even slowed the incessant rise of health insurance premiums, concluded the Congressional Budget Office.

Republicans spent seven years wasting time on meaningless votes to repeal ACA. It was a go-to foil in congressional districts in every purple district throughout the country. It was "evil," they said. They stoked nonsensical fears about "death panels." President Donald Trump has repeatedly called it a "disaster" without bothering to actually understand it and last month promised to let ACA fail when his party couldn't offer any real solutions.

That last bit is the "uncertainty" to which Aetna and Wellmark officials were referring. Trump's promise to starve ACA to death all but doomed an already troubled Iowa exchange.

Bottom of Form

The White House and congressional Republicans, still smarting after last month's failure, spent much of last week in closed-door meetings trying to hash out a replacement to ACA, reported the New York Times. Most of the talks involving the White House concerned placating the GOP's right-wing Freedom Caucus, which killed the party's first attempt at repeal. Proposed concessions included high-risk pools, a downright scam that's failed in multiple states, and the elimination of hugely popular pre-existing conditions protections for consumers.

A bill that already turned the noses of the GOP's reasonable center reeks even worse after this week. Flailing is fine for a minority party. Chaos is not acceptable for the majority that's supposed to govern.

So, we ask again: What now?

Republicans tapped widespread confusion and fear to score political points off Obamacare. They've railed against it without any real solution. They're now actively destabilizing it. And, predictably, Iowa's exchange is quite literally falling apart amid a GOP civil war.

The well-being of thousands of Iowans are at stake here. More than 50,000 benefit from taxpayer subsidized policies on Iowa exchange. Tens of thousands of Iowa's poorest rely on the state's already foundering Medicaid system, expanded as part of the ACA and privatized by Gov. Terry Branstad.

And the very people who sowed discontent and stoked fears have, so far, proven incapable of picking up the pieces.

RI: Ashton Kutcher says good character 'is like your DNA'

APRIL 9, 2017 BY O. KAY HENDERSON

Eastern Iowa native Ashton Kutcher is the latest recipient of a "Pillar of Character" Award named in honor of former Iowa Governor Robert D. Ray.

“Thank you for having me home,” Kutcher said as he took the stage at Saturday’s ceremony in West Des Moines.

The actor who has starred in “That ’70s Show” and the current Netflix series “The Ranch” relied on some of the biochemistry he studied at the University of Iowa to explain the difference between personality and character.

“Personality is kind of the you that you show in the light,” Kutcher said. “...But your character is the you in the light and it’s the you in the darkest moment of your life. It’s just you. It’s like your DNA.”

The Robert D. Ray “Exemplar Award” is presented by the Drake University-based “Character Counts” organization to Iowans who “consistently demonstrate good character as a visible role model.”

Kutcher thanked his wife, his parents, his scoutmaster, his teachers and the neighbors from his childhood for their influence on his character.

“I’m the lucky one, but then I also had the great fortune to fail again and again and again,” Kutcher said. “I had the great fortune of going to jail when I was 18 and getting a deferred judgment, because I knew I never wanted to go back.”

Kutcher also talked about how his twin brother, Michael, has influenced his life.

“My brother was born with cerebral palsy and he taught me that loving people isn’t a choice and that people aren’t actually all created equal,” Kutcher said. “...We’re all created incredibly unequal to one another in our capabilities and what we can do and how we think and what we see, but we all have the equal capacity to love one another...He also taught me that he had gifts that I didn’t have...and that every time I felt sorry for him in life, I made him less.”

Kutcher, who is now 39 and the father of two young children, told his parents that with the experience of being a parent, he finally realized how much his own parents loved him.

“And so actually I didn’t come here, ultimately, to receive this award for myself,” Kutcher said. “I came here to receive it for all of you.”

Iowa’s current governor, Terry Branstad, handed Kutcher’s wife, Mila Kunis, a certificate that makes her an “honorary” Iowan. Other recipients of the Robert D. Ray “Pillar of Character Award” include Norman Borlaug, Hayden Fry, Dan Gable, Fred Hoiberg and Shawn Johnson.

Kutcher has become known as an entrepreneur, investor and philanthropist in addition to his work as an actor. He recently testified against human trafficking during a congressional hearing. Kutcher and his ex-wife, Demi Moore, co-founded a non-profit called “Thorn” that fights “the sexual exploitation of children.”

RI: New leader to take over at the Clarinda prison

APRIL 7, 2017 BY RADIO IOWA CONTRIBUTOR

A new warden has been named for a prison facility in southwest Iowa.

The Board of Corrections has approved the appointment of Randy Gibbs to become Warden of the Clarinda Correctional Facility on April 21. Gibbs is currently Assistant Deputy Director of Institution Operations.

The Clarinda facility currently houses over 900 inmates, many of whom are classified with “special needs” — offenders with mental health issues or intellectual disabilities.

The warden vacancy at Clarinda was created when Sheryl Dahm was appointed in January as Warden of the Iowa Correctional Institution for Women in Mitchellville. That was after former women’s prison warden Pattie Wachtendorf was named the first female warden of the Iowa State Penitentiary in Fort Madison. She replaced Nick Ludwick, who retired.

RI: Grassley, others comment on Supreme Court confirmation vote

Iowa Senator Chuck Grassley, a Republican from New Hartford, spoke to reporters today after the U.S. Senate voted to confirm Neil Gorsuch to the Supreme Court.

“I think that we just witnessed one of the most important votes that a member of the Senate can cast,” Grassley says. “Judge Gorsuch will be an independent voice on that Supreme Court. He proved that by answering questions for 20 hours.”

Grassley is the chair of the Senate Judiciary Committee which holds hearings on the Supreme Court nominees. The Senate used the so-called “nuclear option” to change the rules so Gorsuch would not need 60 votes to be confirmed. Grassley would ask if that would be a constant negative for Gorsuch in his time on the High Court. The senator says it will not be because Democrats set the precedent of changing the rules back in 2001.

“When they said ‘we’ve got to change the ground rules.’ We’ll they did change the ground rules. Those ground rules were changed for a lot of nominees that George W. Bush had, those same ground rule...continued through the Obama administration,” Grassley says. “So those Democrats who met back in 2001 poisoned the well that got us to where we are.”

Some Democrats said they were against Gorsuch’s nomination because Grassley would not hold a hearing on a judge President Obama nomination. He was asked how the whole fight over the Supreme Court nomination will impact other work in the U-S Senate.

“I think the comity will be back to the Senate in regards to legislation — but I think it’s going to take somebody like Senator Schumer who started this whole slippery slope back in 2001 — to drill a new well that’s not going to be poisoned,” Grassley replied.

Grassley says there are plenty of Republicans and Democrats who are willing to work together to make that new start when it comes to selecting Supreme Court judges.

Iowa other U.S. Senator Joni Ernst, a Republican from Red Oak, voted for Gorsuch and released this statement on her vote:

“I am thrilled that a bipartisan majority has voted to confirm Judge Gorsuch, who is eminently qualified to serve on our nation’s highest court,” said Senator Ernst. “Throughout his career, Judge Gorsuch has shown an unparalleled depth of understanding and respect for our Constitution. He is dedicated to interpreting the text of the Constitution and statutes as they are written, rather than attempting to legislate from the bench. It’s easy to see why Judge Gorsuch was previously confirmed by the Senate with unanimous support – including the support of Minority Leader Chuck Schumer.

“The American people are behind Judge Gorsuch, and I look forward to seeing him take his seat on the bench very soon.”

The group Why Courts Matter Iowa issued this statement in response to the confirmation of Neil Gorsuch, to the U.S. Supreme Court:

“Senator Grassley and Republicans in the Senate just ensured that the Supreme Court will be far more partisan and political than at any time in our country’s history, after voting to end the filibuster for Judge Gorsuch and future nominees. The so-called ‘nuclear option’ completes the partisan hatchet job on the independence of the judiciary that began last year when Grassley and Republicans engaged in unprecedented obstruction of Merrick Garland’s nomination.”

“Working side by side, President Trump, Senator Grassley, and Senate Republicans have undermined the U.S. Senate, an American institution. And their vote today undermines the independence of our highest court in the land.”

“This move to further politicize the judiciary is unfortunate, and it did not have to come to this. Republicans made a choice to strip away more than two centuries of Senate tradition. If they truly cared about bipartisanship, they would have worked across the aisle to put forward a consensus nominee who could receive the 60 votes that 25 of the past 26 justices have earned.”

“President Trump, Senator Grassley, and Senate Republicans won their vote today, but the American people lost. A judge who does not believe in protecting the constitutional rights of every citizen will be given a lifetime appointment because of a partisan vote. That’s not what we expect from our judiciary, or from our Senators, and we deserve far better.”

RI: Key senator: ‘outside chance’ for tax cuts, reform in 2017

The president of the Iowa Senate today said he and other Republicans are anxious to reform and cut Iowa income taxes, but with about two-weeks of scheduled work left in the 2017 legislative session, the task may be tabled ‘til next year.

“I was that hoping we could get to it this year,” Senate President Jack Whitver of Ankeny said. “There’s still an outside chance we could do something, but it’s looking more and more like this might be a 2018 issue.”

Whitver said the delay is mainly because when state tax revenues started falling below expectations, it forced two rounds of cuts to state budget plans.

“The reality of our situation right now in the state of Iowa is our budget is a little tighter than we hoped and we want to focus on getting our budget under control, do the fiscally responsible thing there,” Whitver said, “and then start looking at tax policy.”

After decades of resistance from within the Republican Party, Whitver said it is possible GOP lawmakers will get rid of the deduction that lets Iowans subtract their federal income taxes from their state income tax liability. Only one other state has that deduction and it makes Iowa’s income tax rates appear higher than they actually are.

“The states that are growing and thriving and are prospering right now are the states that have the lowest or even no income tax,” Whitver said. “I’m not sitting here today and saying: ‘Next year we’re going to eliminate the income tax,’ but the lower we can go on that, I think research shows we can be more prosperous.”

Whitver said he is willing to “consider anything” — including a single-rate “flat tax” on income — if it reduces the tax burden “on hard-working Iowans.” Cutting individual income taxes is a higher priority for Whitver than reducing the state’s tax rate on corporate income.

“That really isn’t that big a (part) of our state budget,” Whitver says. “What we really need to do is reform the individual tax code and that would help thousands of small business owners across our state.”

That’s because the majority of small business owners do not operate a corporation. They pay taxes on their small business by filing Iowa individual income forms. Whitver made his comments during taping of tonight’s “Iowa Press” program that will air on Iowa Public Television at 7:30.

RI: Iowa Supreme Court rules against request for a hospital safety report

The Iowa Supreme Court says information gathered for a patient safety study cannot be used in a lawsuit against a hospital.

Dennis Willard was seriously injured in an accident in Davenport in November of 2011 and was transferred from the hospital there to the University of Iowa Hospitals in Iowa City.

He was sedated for a scan of his stomach to check for injuries. After returning from the scan he had problems with his left arm, and an x-ray found his shoulder was dislocated.

The x-rays taken before the scan had not shown the dislocated shoulder and Willard believed the shoulder was dislocated as he was moved for the scan, so he filed a lawsuit against the hospital. He sought to get a copy of what’s called a Patient Safety Net report that was filed about an incident during the scan.

The incident reports are intended to help improve the safety of hospitals and under Iowa law are required to remain confidential. The district court ruled he should be given the report as part of the discovery phase of the lawsuit.

The Iowa Supreme Court ruled Willard cannot have the report as the confidentiality given the reports allows hospital staff to feel comfortable reporting problems and that information is utilized to improve patient safety by reducing preventable medical errors. The ruling says the protection is intended to apply to documents or communications that constitute “patient safety work product.”

POLITICO: White House on edge as 100-day judgment nears

‘We’ve got essentially two-and-a-half weeks to turn everything around,’ says one Trump staffer.

By SHANE GOLDMACHER

President Donald Trump has far more than three years left in his first term. But inside his pressure-cooker of a White House, aides and advisers are sweating the next three weeks.

The symbolic 100-day mark by which modern presidents are judged menaces for an image-obsessed chief executive whose opening sprint has been marred by legislative stumbles, legal setbacks, senior staff kneecapping one another, the resignation of his national security adviser and near-daily headlines and headaches about links to Russia.

The date, April 29, hangs over the West Wing like the sword of Damocles as the unofficial deadline to find their footing— or else.

But however real Trump’s frustrations are with the three rival power centers he has installed — chief of staff Reince Priebus, son-in-law Jared Kushner and chief strategist Stephen Bannon — top officials inside and around the White House don't expect Trump to make any drastic changes until after 100 days, lest staff turmoil stories swamp a key stretch of media coverage.

That reprieve — unless Trump simply decides he's had enough — has both bought his staff a little time and put them on edge.

"One hundred days is the marker, and we've got essentially two-and-a-half weeks to turn everything around," said one White House official. "This is going to be a monumental task."

For a president who often begins and ends his days imbibing cable news, the burden has fallen heavily on a press team that recognizes how well they sell Trump's early tenure in the media will likely color the president's appetite for an internal shake-up.

That was the backdrop for a tense planning session for the 100-day mark last week.

More than 30 Trump staffers piled into a conference room in the Eisenhower Executive Office Building adjoining the White House, according to a half-dozen attendees who described the Tuesday meeting.

Mike Dubke, Trump's communications director, and his deputy, Jessica Ditto, kicked off the discussion of how to package Trump's tumultuous first 100 days by pitching the need for a "rebranding" to get Trump back on track.

"I think the president's head would explode if he heard that," one of the White House officials present said.

Staffers, including counselor Kellyanne Conway, were broken into three groups, complete with whiteboards, markers and giant butcher-block-type paper to brainstorm lists of early successes. One group worked in the hallway.

"It made me feel like I was back in 5th grade," complained another White House aide who was there. "That's the best way I could describe it."

Dubke, who did not work on the campaign, told the assembled aides that international affairs would present a messaging challenge because the president lacks a coherent foreign policy. Three days later, Trump would order missile strikes in Syria in a reversal of years of previous opposition to such intervention.

"There is no Trump doctrine," Dubke declared.

Some in the room were stunned by the remark.

"It rubbed people the wrong way because on the campaign we were pretty clear about what he wanted to do," said a third White House official in the room, "He was elected on a vision of America First. America First is the Trump doctrine."

One of the administration officials lamented, "We've got a comms team supposedly articulating the president's message [that] does not appear to understand the president's message."

Dubke told POLITICO he was disappointed White House staff would complain in the press rather than in real time.

"It was a brainstorming session and I really wish they had spoken up in the room so that we could have had an open and honest conversation," he said. "It is unproductive adjudicating internal discussions through the media."

As for the rebranding remark, Dubke said that had been misinterpreted. "There is not a need for a rebranding but there is a need to brand the first 100 days," Dubke said. "Because if we don't do it the media is going to do it. That's what our job is."

Trump's communications team is now plotting to divide their first 100 days into three categories of accomplishments, according to people familiar with plans: "prosperity" (such as new manufacturing jobs, reduced regulations and pulling out of the Trans-Pacific Partnership trade deal), "accountability" (following through on swamp-draining campaign promises such as lobbying restrictions) and "safety/security" (including the dramatic reduction in border crossing and the strike in Syria).

Amid near-constant talk of staff shuffling, Dubke's name has fallen below the radar, in part because he cuts such a low profile. He was a late addition to Trump's team after the initial pick for the job, Jason Miller, bowed out for personal reasons. A behind-the-scenes operator, Dubke has yet to appear on television, Trump's favorite medium.

But as most of Trump's senior team — Cabinet members, military and economic advisers, Bannon, Priebus, Kushner and White House press secretary Sean Spicer — went to Mar-a-Lago last week for the bilateral meeting with China amid the unfolding Syrian situation, Dubke was conspicuously absent and back in D.C.

"That would tell you exactly how he is perceived," said one of the White House officials.

However, another White House official defended Dubke's internal role, saying before his arrival people in the press operation were "doing whatever they wanted to do without a broader set of goals being defined." Dubke imposed structure "and that's going to ruffle some feathers."

Still, the more sympathetic aide to Dubke admitted, "He has not yet integrated into the senior leadership."

The constant presence of senior advisers encircling Trump has created a vicious — and some officials say self-defeating — cycle in which top aides feel they cannot leave his side, lest they lose influence or be perceived to have.

"People are saying, 'Why is everyone traveling with the president?' and in the next breath, 'You must not be important, you're not traveling with the president?'" another White House official complained. "You can't have it both ways."

Trump hired Dubke in mid-February after a frustrating first month of bad press, telling Fox News later that month "in terms of messaging, I would give myself a C or a C+." But even after Dubke's arrival, Trump and his senior team have continued to seek outside advice.

During the failed push to pass health care legislation, Miller drafted a short messaging memo with four bullet points that was given to top White House officials, including Kushner and Bannon, according to four people familiar with the matter.

Miller, who now works for Teneo, the consulting firm created by former aides to Bill and Hillary Clinton, has been spotted around the White House twice in recent weeks, though he has made clear to friends in the administration that he has no interest in joining the White House.

The constant palace intrigue and internal jockeying has left the White House in a state of paralysis.

Trump parted with deputy chief of staff Katie Walsh in late March, his aides are discussing a reorganization and Trump himself has begun floating names to replace Priebus, his chief of staff, for feedback, according to a person close to the White House. On Friday, Trump ordered his two other senior-most advisers, Kushner and Bannon, to settle their differences in a Mar-a-Lago sit down after a week of their increasing shadowboxing through anonymous accusations in the press.

One White House official last week questioned why Bannon was taking on a member of Trump's family so openly.

"For a Svengali that doesn't seem like a smart thing to do," the official said. "I don't think that ends well for him."

A White House ally of Bannon noted that despite bumping up against Trump's son-in-law, he had held sway over the most crucial policy rollouts, such as Trump's hard line on immigration and trade. "Anyone who thinks that Steve has lost his influence, they don't know what the f--- they're talking about," this person said.

The strikes on Syria, a successful summit with President Xi Jinping of China and Friday's sit-down between Bannon and Kushner appear to have calmed some frayed nerves. Two people who have spoken with the president in recent days said Trump's mood has improved.

Still, the question of how to frame the first 100 days remains a challenge.

Trump aides are grappling with the reality that they will end this opening period with no significant legislative achievements other than rolling back Obama-era regulations. Even the White House's most far-reaching success, the confirmation of Justice Neil Gorsuch to the Supreme Court, required the Senate rewriting its own rules to overcome Democratic opposition.

Though the White House continues to push for progress on stalled health care legislation, there are only five legislative days remaining once Congress returns from a two-week spring break. Plus, another deadline looms: Trump and the Republican-controlled Congress must still pass a bill before April 28 to keep the government running.

If they fail, a shutdown would begin on Trump's 100th day in office.

Bloomberg: Islamic State Kills Dozens in Egypt Palm Sunday Bombings

Egyptian President Declares 3-Month State of Emergency

Suspected suicide bombers struck two Egyptian churches on Palm Sunday, killing more than 40 people in the deadliest assault on civilians since President Abdel-Fattah El-Sisi's election nearly three years ago.

Islamic State claimed the attacks on the St. George church in the Nile Delta city of Tanta and St. Mark's cathedral in Alexandria, according to the U.S.-based SITE Intel Group, which monitors jihadist channels on social media. At least 27 people were killed in the Tanta bombing, the day's first blast, Health Ministry spokesman Khaled Mogahed said. In Alexandria, at least 16 were killed in an attack on the seat of the Coptic Orthodox church there.

The violence demonstrates Islamic State's intent to expand its presence in Egypt beyond the rugged confines of the Sinai Peninsula. That will likely add more pressure on El-Sisi to restore order as he seeks to attract foreign capital and placate a population increasingly frustrated with economic hardship.

The bombings come less than a week after El-Sisi met President Donald Trump at the White House, where he was praised for his efforts to fight terrorism. Targeting two major cities outside Sinai lets Islamic State show it's "still able to operate -- despite this growing pressure -- and to embarrass the Egyptian government after Sisi's visit to Washington" and before Pope Francis's visit this month, said Michael Horowitz, director of intelligence at the political risk consultancy Prime Source.

'Great Confidence'

Trump tweeted that he's "sad to hear about the terrorist attack in Egypt" and has "great confidence that President Al Sisi will handle the situation properly." The U.S. "will continue to support Egypt's security and stability in its efforts to defeat terrorism," State Department spokesman Mark Toner said in a statement. Al Sisi ordered the deployment of military units to help protect vital installations nationwide, the presidency said in a statement.

Egyptian shares dropped after the bombings, with the benchmark EGX 30 Index retreating 1.6 percent, the most since Feb. 27, at the close in Cairo.

The incidents bore the hallmarks of the Islamic State -- multi-pronged attacks aimed at inflicting as much damage as possible while minimizing the group's losses. In Alexandria, one of the casualties was a police officer who blocked the suspected suicide bomber from entering the church after he evaded a metal detector, security footage aired on television showed. In Tanta, the remains of a suspected suicide bomber were found in the church, the state-run Middle East News Agency said, citing an unidentified security official.

The bombings were "a mixed bag" for El-Sisi, said Samuel Tadros, a senior fellow at the Hudson Institute in Washington.

'Dangerous Development'

"On the one hand it reinforces his narrative that Egypt is in war against terrorism, rallying the nation around the flag and so forth," Tadros said. "At the same time the attacks send a message of incompetence of the security apparatus" in containing the militancy, he said.

If the jihadist group proves able to operate more extensively outside of Sinai, "that would be a very dangerous development," he added.

El-Sisi declared that the attacks "will not undermine the resolve and true will of the Egyptian people to counter the forces of evil," according to a statement from the presidency. But the violence against civilians dealt the president a new blow at a time when his support is already being tested by the hardships Egyptians are being forced to endure as part of his economic reform program.

Currency Controls

A November decision to abandon currency controls helped to secure a $12 billion International Monetary Fund loan and attract foreign investors. Yet it has also caused the pound to lose half its value against the dollar, sending prices soaring and annual core inflation climbing to over 33 percent in February.

Bottom of Form

The militant threat exploded after the 2013 military-backed popular uprising against Islamist President Mohamed Mursi and the deadly crackdown on his Muslim Brotherhood group that followed. The expansion of the attacks outside the confines of Sinai and, according to Egyptian media, a new focus on targeting Christians have only proven the jihadists' resilience. A deadly bombing at the Cairo cathedral in December, claimed by Islamic State's local affiliate, killed at least 25 worshippers.

The latest bombing "won't be the last terrorist attack because the state fights terrorism but doesn't fight terrorism-inspiring ideas, which is the main cause of the problem," billionaire Naguib Sawiris wrote on his official Twitter account.

Loyal Backers

Christians, who are widely estimated to make up around 10 percent of the nation's 92 million residents, have long complained of discrimination in the Muslim majority nation. They were among El-Sisi's strongest backers after Mursi was pushed from power, but that loyalty, too, is being strained by the government's failure to contain the assaults on their community.

"This type of attack is the most dangerous, since it inflicts maximum amount of damage on human lives, disrupts tourism, and shakes the image of the state," said Ghanem Nuseibeh, founder of London-based consulting firm Cornerstone Global Associates. "It turns the conflict from a confrontation in the desert to a civil conflict in the heart of Egypt."

"This attack is likely to embolden the government, and provide it with even more legitimacy in its crackdown on Islamists and on dissent," he said.

WSJ: Democrats' Conditions for Tax Overhaul Make Bipartisan Deal Unlikely

GOP attempts to reach across the aisle are complicated by lack of agreement on priorities

By RICHARD RUBIN

Democrats are starting to settle on a price for participating in a tax-code overhaul, and many Republicans won't want to pay it.

Democrats say they oppose net tax cuts and will resist proposals that mostly benefit high-income households. Those priorities diverge from President Donald Trump's repeated promise to "cut the hell out of taxes" and congressional Republicans' plans to lower marginal tax rates and repeal the estate tax.

"Tax reform's got to be responsible and it's got to be progressive," said Sen. Ben Cardin (D., Md.).

Republicans made overtures across the aisle in recent weeks and, in theory, Democratic participation on tax policy could ease legislative challenges for Republicans vexed by slim House and Senate majorities and internal disagreements. By attracting Democratic votes, Republicans could overcome procedural hurdles without uniting fractious wings of their own party.

TRUMP'S FIRST 100 DAYS

There is, at some level, rhetorical room for agreement. Mr. Trump says middle-class tax cuts are a top priority. House Speaker Paul Ryan (R., Wis.) says he's aiming for his plan to be revenue neutral—collecting as much money over the next decade as the current system does. Mix Mr. Trump's class rhetoric, Mr. Ryan's budgetary promise and the prospect of spending on infrastructure and there is a recipe for bipartisanship.

But so far, those priorities aren't widely shared among Republicans and GOP plans haven't matched them. Mr. Trump's campaign plan delivered half its tax cuts to the top 1% of households, according to the Tax Policy Center, a joint project of the Urban Institute and Brookings Institution. House Republicans haven't shown in detail how their plan adds up and don't want to tie infrastructure and taxes together. Lower tax rates on businesses, investors and top earners are a unifying force in the GOP, and many lawmakers are reluctant to give that up to get a deal with Democrats.

Even if the White House and Democrats reach a conceptual agreement on taxes, any accord would drive many Republicans away and require the Trump administration and lawmakers to make decisions on hundreds of details.

Still, White House officials, who declared they are taking the lead on tax policy, have been meeting with Democratic lawmakers. House Ways and Means Chairman Rep. Kevin Brady (R., Texas) met with two groups of Democrats last week.

Democrats say they are wary but listening.

Mr. Trump's unpopularity, especially among Democratic voters, gives lawmakers political advantages in opposing the admin

New momentum for Medicaid expansion, as more Republicans conclude Obamacare won't get repealed

Two Kansas state senators confer during the chamber's debate on a bill expanding the state's Medicaid program yesterday at the Statehouse in Topeka. These two Republicans oppose the measure, but supporters have been buoyed by the failure of Republicans in Washington to pass a bill repealing the 2010 health care law. (John Hanna/AP)

BY JAMES HOHMANN
with Breanne Deppisch

THE BIG IDEA: Paul Ryan promised his donors yesterday that he will keep pushing to overhaul the health care system this year, despite his failure last week. But in the 19 states that never expanded Medicaid under the Affordable Care Act, the calculus has quickly changed.

A lot of state legislators, including Republicans, are putting more stock in what the Speaker said Friday, that Obamacare will be the law of the land for the foreseeable future.

The bill that was being considered in the House would have phased out the expansion under the 2010 law, which has already grown the Medicaid rolls by more than 11 million people. It could have left states holding the bag over the next couple of years.

With Obamacare repeal less likely, opponents of expansion in the states have just lost their best argument.

-- The Kansas Senate voted last night to expand Medicaid, which would mean coverage for 150,000 currently uninsured Kansans. Senators cleared a procedural hurdle by a vote of 25-13. There will be a final vote today. Republican Gov. Sam Brownback has signaled a likely veto, but he's also expected to soon get appointed to an overseas posting by President Trump. So the legislature might be able to try again soon.

“The failure of the federal effort to repeal the Affordable Care Act hung over the debate,” the Wichita Eagle reports of the floor fight. “Elections last fall swept a number of moderate Republicans and Democrats into (state) office, giving supporters of expansion a boost. ... The House already passed the bill 81-44. The House vote and the initial Senate vote are just shy of the number needed to override a veto. Override takes 84 votes in the House and 27 votes in the Senate.”

-- In Georgia, Republican Gov. Nathan Deal announced yesterday that his administration is exploring changes to the state's Medicaid program now that the House bill has gone down. A former congressman, he said he'll get with HHS Secretary Tom Price, who hails from Georgia, about what kind of waivers the state might be able to get now to sweeten the deal. “We will be looking at those possibilities,” Deal said at a press conference. “We have not formulated any proposal at this time, but the waivers will be primarily restricted to our Medicaid program.”

“Georgia lawmakers in 2014 passed legislation that gives the Legislature the final say over any expansion to the Medicaid program,” the Atlanta Journal Constitution explains. “Georgia flirted with a wide-ranging waiver in 2015 under Barack Obama's administration that would have sought more Medicaid money to help the state's struggling rural hospitals and its big ‘safety net’ hospitals like Grady Memorial in Atlanta. But the state later quietly abandoned those discussions.”

Terry McAuliffe vents his frustration. (Steve Earley/The Virginian-Pilot via AP)

-- In Virginia, meanwhile, the failure of Congress has emboldened Democratic Gov. Terry McAuliffe to renew his stalled crusade to expand Medicaid. Yesterday he proposed an amendment to state budget language to give him power to set an expansion in motion, and called on the Republican-controlled General Assembly to immediately begin making plans. Republican legislators were unmoved by the plea, saying they would reject the amendment and that they stood firm against expanding Medicaid. But it ensures that Medicaid expansion will now be a top issue in this year's open gubernatorial contest. (Gregory S. Schneider has more.)

-- Forbes Magazine says to keep an eye on other places like North Carolina, which now has a Democratic governor. “And there may be even more states that will resurrect state legislative efforts to expand Medicaid. Before Trump was elected ... Idaho, Nebraska and South Dakota were considering expansion,” notes Bruce Japsen. Legislators stopped debating expansion in those places when it seemed like the ACA would be repealed.

“In Maine, GOP Gov. Paul LePage has vetoed several bills to expand Medicaid passed by the state's Democratic-controlled legislature, most recently last year. But Mainers will get a chance to vote on expansion in a referendum this November,” the Huffington Post notes.

-- A robust debate over Medicaid is playing out this week in Arkansas, as well. “An effort to continue the hybrid Arkansas Medicaid expansion another year failed (last night) in the state Senate,” the AP reports from Little Rock. “The budget bill for the state's Medicaid program and the expansion failed on two votes. ... Legislative leaders said they planned to try again with the proposal on Tuesday, and were confident they had the votes needed. The top Republican in the Senate said he didn't believe the program would be blocked while the future of the federal health law remains in limbo. ‘I don't think there's sufficient will right now to start blocking budgets when we don't even know what's going to happen or how long it's going to take,’ Senate Majority Jim Hendren said after the votes.” More than 300,000 people are on Arkansas' hybrid program, which uses Medicaid funds to purchase private insurance for low-income residents.

-- Once Medicaid is expanded, it is politically very hard to take coverage away from people. Key opponents of the House GOP bill, for example, included Michigan Gov. Rick Snyder and Ohio Gov. John Kasich, two Republicans who chose to expand Medicaid. A lot of the House moderates from the Tuesday Group who helped torpedo the bill hailed from expansion states and did so because they were concerned about Medicaid recipients in their districts getting hurt.

-- The New York Times has a good story on its front page today about how the health care fight last week showed the degree to which Medicaid has come of age: "When it was created more than a half century ago, Medicaid almost escaped notice. Front-page stories hailed the bigger, more controversial part of the law that President Lyndon B. Johnson signed that July day in 1965 — health insurance for elderly people, or Medicare, which the American Medical Association had bitterly denounced as socialized medicine. ... But over the past five decades, Medicaid has surpassed Medicare in the number of Americans it covers. It has grown gradually into a behemoth that provides for the medical needs of one in five Americans — 74 million people — starting for many in the womb, and for others, ending only when they go to their graves."

Some remarkable figures: "In 2015, the nation spent more than $532 billion on Medicaid, of which about 63 percent was federal money and the rest from the states. ... Medicaid now provides medical care to four out of 10 American children. It covers the costs of nearly half of all births in the United States. It pays for the care for two-thirds of people in nursing homes. And it provides for 10 million children and adults with physical or mental disabilities. For states, it accounts for 60 percent of federal funding — meaning that cuts hurt not only poor and middle-class families caring for their children with autism or dying parents, but also bond ratings."

-- Speaking to his donors on a conference call, Ryan insisted that the House got pretty close to passing his bill. "Basically ... 90 percent of our members of the conference were there and ready to go and be a governing party and were happy with where we were, and around 10 percent were still in what I would call 'opposition party mode,'" Ryan said on the call, an audio recording of which was obtained by The Post. "About 10 percent of our people, a particular bloc, just weren't there yet, even with the president's involvement."

Ryan said he intends to work "on two tracks" as he pursues other elements of Trump's agenda at the same time he keeps working on health care. "We are going to keep getting at this thing," Ryan said on the call. "We're not going to just all of a sudden abandon health care and move on to the rest. We are going to move on with rest of our agenda, keep that on track, while we work the health-care problem."

Ryan did not disclose details of what the next iteration of the bill might look like, but he suggested that a plan was being developed in time to brief the donors at a retreat scheduled for Thursday and Friday in Florida, according to Mike DeBonis.

-- Former Rep. Tom Davis (R-Va.), who twice chaired the NRCC, warns in an op-ed for The Post today that Republicans could lose the House if they don't quickly get their act together: "Unless the current trajectory is reversed, the Trump administration faces a difficult midterm that could undo its agenda and put House gavels and subpoena power in Democratic hands. ... The collapse of the Republican health-care bill was a massive case of legislative malpractice. But playing the blame game and pointing fingers does little to advance the ball. ... There is time to recover from a difficult start. This will entail compromise and, in some cases, working with Democrats to get half a loaf. But your fumbling of health care puts you in a weakened bargaining position and your internecine fighting dispirits the party base. As James Bond's nemesis liked to say, 'Choose your next move carefully, Mr. Bond, it may be your last.'"

-- But Republican strategists and elected officials are deeply divided over the best path forward. The Times's Jonathan Martin talked to players on both sides of the debate—

The case for moving on: "We've got a lot of time to do real things on infrastructure, to do real things on tax reform, on red tape reform, and really get the American economy moving," said Rep. Steve Stivers (R-Ohio), the current chairman of the NRCC. "We do those things and we still have a lot of time to recover. ... If you're going to fumble the ball, better to do so in the first quarter of a football game. ... I think we need to start negotiating with Democrats instead of the Freedom Caucus. They don't know how to get to yes."

Even if leadership tried and Trump re-engaged, it's not clear they could get it done: "Not unless Harry Houdini wins a special election to help us," said Rep. Billy Long (R-Mo.).

The case for circling back: "What troubles many Republican strategists is the specter of the party's most reliable voters being bombarded by reminders of their leaders' failure to address the health law. They fear a recurring story line sure to pop up every time insurance premiums increase, providers leave local networks, or, most worrisome, Republicans fund Barack Obama's signature achievement. Conservatives ... now warn that it is untenable to stand pat on the issue — and that lawmakers will face retribution if they do not return to the repeal-and-replace effort. 'If people are looking at a situation where there's no action on this, there are going to be conversations about primaries,' warned Michael A. Needham, the chief executive of Heritage Action for America ... which worked to scuttle the ... bill last week."

-- John Cornyn, the number two Republican in Senate leadership, said flatly that health care will not be attempted again via the budget reconciliation process. "It's clear it needs to be done on a bipartisan basis," the Texan told the AP.

-- Trump, for his part, tweeted last night that he'll come back to the issue "as soon as ObamaCare folds":

Max Scherzer pitches against Tim Tebow in the fifth inning of yesterday's Nationals-Mets game in Port St. Lucie, Fla. (John Bazemore/AP)

-- Greetings from spring training in West Palm Beach, Fla. The Nationals were in great form against the Mets yesterday. Bryce Harper and Trea Turner each homered twice, and Washington beat New York 6-0. The game showed why all the handicappers think the Nats will win the NL East again. The most memorable moments in Port St. Lucie were when Max Scherzer kept striking out Tim Tebow, the Heisman-winning quarterback who fizzled in the NFL and now wants to be a pro baseball player. Tebow was no match for our Cy Young winner, one of the best pitchers in baseball, who clearly relished the match-up. Then my dad and I drove down A1A and enjoyed some delicious Cuban food.

-- The Trump administration sought to block former acting attorney general Sally Yates from testifying to Congress in the House investigation of links between Russian officials and Donald Trump's presidential campaign, Devlin Barrett and Adam Entous scooped this morning. "According to letters The Post reviewed, the Justice Department notified Yates earlier this month that the administration considers a great deal of her possible testimony to be barred from discussion in a congressional hearing because the topics are covered by the presidential communication privilege. Yates and other former intelligence officials had been asked to testify before the House Intelligence Committee this week, a hearing that was abruptly canceled by the panel's chairman, Rep. Devin Nunes (R-Calif.). ... Trump fired Yates in January after she ordered Justice Department lawyers not to defend his first immigration order temporarily banning entry to United States for citizens of seven Muslim-majority countries and refugees from around the world...

"As acting attorney general, Yates played a key part in the investigation surrounding Michael T. Flynn, a Trump campaign aide who became national security adviser before revelations that he had discussed sanctions with the Russian ambassador to the United States in late December led to his ouster. Yates and another witness at the planned hearing, former CIA director John Brennan, had made clear to government officials by Thursday that their testimony to the committee probably would contradict some statements that White House officials had made, according to a person familiar with the matter who spoke on the condition of anonymity. The following day, when Yates's lawyer sent a letter to the White House indicating that she still wanted to testify, the hearing was canceled."

Devin Nunes speaks with reporters outside the White House. (AP/Pablo Martinez Monsivais)

THERE’S A BEAR IN THE ... WHITE HOUSE?

-- House Intelligence Committee Chairman David Nunes acknowledged Monday that he secretly visited the White House last week to view intelligence documents he then cited as proof of “potentially improper spying activity” against Trump and his associates, casting new doubt on the independence of his panel’s Russian investigation. Karoun Demirjian, Greg Miller and Philip Rucker report: “Current and former national security officials described Nunes’s trip to the White House complex, apparently late in the evening after he had slipped away from his staff, as highly unusual. Doing so would ordinarily require Nunes and the person he met with to have been cleared in advance and accompanied by an escort — requirements that seemed to undercut White House claims to have no information about the encounter.”

“How incredibly irregular,” said Matt Olsen, who formerly served as the head of the National Counterterrorism Center. “The only explanation you’re left with is that this is all being orchestrated by the White House.”

-- Nunes' admission immediately prompted calls for him to recuse himself from the Intelligence committee's investigation of the Trump campaign's ties with Russian officials:

*Adam Schiff, the ranking Democrat on the committee, said: "There was no legitimate justification for bringing that information to the White House instead of the committee. That it was also obtained at the White House makes this departure all the more concerning. ... I believe that the Chairman should recuse himself from any further involvement in the Russia investigation, as well as any involvement in oversight of matters pertaining to any incidental collection of the Trump transition."

*Nancy Pelosi called on Paul Ryan to demand Nunes recuse himself. "That leadership is long overdue," she said.

*Chuck Schumer agreed: "If Speaker Ryan wants the House to have a credible investigation, he needs to replace Chairman Nunes."

-- Nunes denied any wrongdoing and dismissed calls for him to step down: "I'm sure that the Democrats do want me to quit because they know that I'm effective at getting to the bottom of things," he told Bill O'Reilly on Fox News last night.

-- The speculation among insiders is that Michael Ellis is Nunes's source, a lawyer who worked for Nunes on his committee staff until he was recently hired to work on national security matters at the White House, per Yahoo's Michael Isikoff.

-- Trump, true to form, attempted to create a diversion on Twitter:

HAWKS EXPRESS CONCERN:

-- Republican Sen. Lindsey Graham, a former military prosecutor who understands the danger of interfering with an investigation, said Nunes's trip to the White House is "not good." "It's not a confidence builder," the South Carolina senator said. We're "rapidly getting" to the point where a select committee or independent commission is needed to conduct the investigation, he added.

John McCain echoed his mejor amigo this morning on CBS:

Bill Kristol, the conservative editor of The Weekly Standard and a Trump critic, kept his eye on the ball:

-- Dick Cheney says Russia's meddling in the U.S. election could be "considered an act of war." "There's not any argument at this stage that somehow the election of President Trump was not legitimate, but there's no question that there was a very serious effort made by Mr. Putin and his government, his organization, to interfere in major ways with our basic, fundamental democratic processes," the former vice president said at an event sponsored by The Economic Times. "In some quarters, that would be considered an act of war." (Politico)

-- Subterfuge? A new University of Oxford study finds that nearly a quarter of web content shared by Twitter users in Michigan during the 10 days before the presidential election was false. Researchers determined that a sample of 140,000 users shared approximately as many fake news items as "professional news" over the same period. (Financial Times)

-- Former U.S. ambassador to Russia Michael McFaul says the Kremlin is the real beneficiary from the House Intelligence Committee investigation: "Trump already seems to many Russian observers as a weak president, incapable of delivering on his pro-Russian campaign pledges. But the spectacle of the ... hearing on Russia must have given the Kremlin renewed inspiration about achieving another foreign policy goal: weakening the United States. In the Trump era, our society is deeply divided, even on the Russian threat. That serves Russia's purposes well. Even more amazing is how the United States' current ruling party, the Republican Party, (mostly) does not want to acknowledge the Russian attack on our sovereignty last year, let alone take steps to prevent future assaults in 2018 or 2020. Putin violated our sovereignty, influenced our elections, smugly dared us to respond and now gets to watch us do nothing because of partisan divides. Imagine hearings after Pearl Harbor or 9/11 that barely mentioned the attackers? Without question, Putin was the big winner from last Monday's hearing."

-- The Post's David Filipov shares his experience from Sunday's anti-corruption protest in Moscow, where more than 20,000 demonstrators gathered – and where even holding up a yellow rubber duck toy was enough to get arrested: "The young man with the sign had looked so confident, striding by the cheering crowd and seemingly indifferent to police, his poster decrying official corruption held high, like a homemade flag. Then, in an instant, five riot police in full body armor dragged the man down, picked him up and carted him away as the cheers turned to jeers of 'Shame! Shame!' As fearsome-looking police in urban camouflage lined the streets, I was amazed at the festive attitude among the protesters."

Spicer: White House is 'not concerned' about potential leak to Nunes

-- Is Sean Spicer out of the loop? He claims he is in the dark when it comes to who signed Nunes into the White House grounds: "I'm not sure that that's how that works," he told reporters, pleading ignorance. The Wall Street Journal's Rebecca Ballhaus notes that the problem has an easy fix: "One way the White House could help clear up potential future controversies: if it began updating the online visitor log maintained by former [Obama's] administration. Under the former administration, visitor logs were typically updated within 90 to 120 days. Since [Trump] took office, the website has been down, with a message that says: 'This page is being updated. It will post records of White House visitors on an ongoing basis, once they become available.' The White House in recent months has declined to say when or even if it will update the log."

NEPOTISM WATCH:

-- The Nunes news coincided with yet another Monday disclosure that Jared Kushner privately met last year with the CEO of a Russian bank being targeted by U.S. sanctions. He has agreed to discuss his contacts with the Senate Intelligence Committee. Spicer defended the meetings as "insignificant," noting that Kushner was the "official primary point of contact" with foreign governments and officials during the campaign and transition period. "I'm not going to get into who he met with or why he met with them," Spicer told reporters.

-- "Trump and his family's myriad financial activities are unique for a White House occupant," Walter Pincus notes in his column for The Cipher Brief today:

"It was announced in January that Kushner would be covered by conflict rules applying to senior federal officeholders, which includes filing a financial disclosure form. He joined the administration on January 21, yet to this date the so-called Form 278 financial disclosure statement has yet to be made public by the Office of Government Ethics...

"Ivanka Trump, now an unpaid White House advisor to the president, still owns her clothing, jewelry and accessories company through a revocable trust. She has turned over its daily management to her firm's president. Nonetheless she will retain veto power over any new deals or licensing arrangements, according to her attorney. She has a West Wing White House office, is getting a security clearance and a government-issued phone, but because she is not taking an oath of office, Ivanka apparently will not be required to file a financial disclosure statement."

-- The Huffington Post's Jason Linkins reminds us just how massive the 36-year-old Kushner's White House portfolio has become: "So, if you're keeping track, Kushner, who comes to Washington with no government experience, no policy experience, no diplomatic experience, and business experience limited to his family's real estate development firm, a brief stint as a newspaper publisher, and briefly bidding to acquire the Los Angeles Dodgers, will be working on trade, Middle East policy in general, an Israel-Palestine peace deal more specifically, reforming the Veterans Administration, and solving the opioid crisis."

CONFLICTS WATCH:

-- A prominent Turkish gold trader who has been jailed in New York on charges of violating the United States sanctions on Iran, has added Rudy Giuliani to his legal team, adding intrigue to a case that has been steeped in international politicking between Turkey and the United States. The New York Times's Benjamin Weiser and Maggie Haberman report that, just last month, Giuliani and former George W. Bush attorney general Michael B. Mukasey traveled to meet with the Turkish president, Recep Tayyip Erdogan, as part of their efforts on behalf of Reza Zarrab. Giuliani is close to Trump He's technically the cyber czar. The Times says this raises "the question of whether Mr. Zarrab has retained him in an effort to negotiate a beneficial resolution of his case at the highest levels of the Trump administration." Since Trump won, there has been a warming of ties between Turkey and the U.S. Erdogan has publicly criticized Zarrab's prosecution in the United States. He said last fall that he had raised this case with Joe Biden during talks at the U.N.

-- Ranking Senate Finance Committee Democrat Ron Wyden has asked the top government ethics watchdog to probe Steven Mnuchin's comments plugging the "Lego Batman Movie" during a live interview Friday, saying that promotion of the film – which was produced by one of his companies – could present a possible ethics breach. Trump to slash federal climate protections

TRUMP UPROOTS KEY OBAMA-ERA PROVISIONS:

-- Trump is slated to sign a sweeping executive order at the EPA today ordering the agency to begin rewriting key rules that curb U.S. carbon emissions. The move is Trump's most decisive action yet to obliterate his predecessor's climate-change record. Juliet Eilperin and Brady Dennis report: "Some of the measures could take years to implement and are unlikely to alter broader economic trends that are shifting the nation's electricity mix from coal-fired generation to natural gas and renewables. The order sends an unmistakable signal that just as [Obama] sought to weave climate considerations into every aspect of the federal government, Trump is hoping to rip that approach out by its roots. 'This policy is in keeping with [Trump's] desire to make the United States energy independent,' said a senior administration official ... 'When it comes to climate change, we want to take our course and do it in our own form and fashion.' ...

"The sweeping executive order also seeks to lift a moratorium on federal coal leasing and remove the requirement that federal officials consider the impact of climate change when making decisions. Accelerating fossil-fuel production ... could lead to higher emissions of the greenhouse gases driving climate change and complicate a global effort to curb the world's carbon output. But Trump has repeatedly questioned whether climate change is underway and emphasized that he is determined to deliver for the voters in coal country who helped him win the Oval Office."

-- Trump yesterday signed a bill killing an Obama-era worker safety rule requiring large businesses to disclose and correct serious safety and labor law violations. Kimberly Kindy reports: "The Fair Pay and Safe Workplaces regulation was finalized in August but most of it was never implemented. Within days of it being finalized, the Associated Builders and Contractors sued, securing a temporary injunction that prohibited the federal government from implementing it."

In a last-minute effort to fight for the rule, Sen. Elizabeth Warren released a staff report that showed 66 of the federal government's 100 largest contractors have at some point violated federal wage and hour laws. Warren criticized the Republican-led effort during a speech on the Senate floor moments before the vote: "Instead of creating jobs or raising wages," she said, "they're trying to make it easier for companies that get big-time, taxpayer-funded government contracts to steal wages from their employees and injure their workers without admitting responsibility."

-- Trump also signed bills overturning two Obama-era education regulations, scrapping requirements for programs that train new K-12 teachers, and rolling back a set of rules outlining how states must comply with the "Every Student Succeeds Act," a bipartisan federal law meant to hold schools accountable for student performance. ## THE IMMIGRATION WARS:

-- Jeff Sessions threatened to strip some "sanctuary cities" of coveted Justice Department grants for local law enforcement, saying places that "did not comply with a particular federal law on immigration" would not be eligible for the funds. "I urge our nation's states and cities to consider carefully the harm they are doing to their citizens by refusing to enforce our immigration laws, and to rethink these policies," the attorney general said in a speech Monday. "Such policies make their cities and states less safe, and put them at risk of losing valuable federal dollars."

"This effort to punish cities where local leaders refuse to hand over undocumented immigrants for deportation is the latest effort by the Trump administration to crack down on illegal immigration," Sari Horwitz and Maria Sacchetti write. "Sessions said jurisdictions would not be eligible for grant money if they could not certify compliance with a law against blocking the sharing of information about a person's immigration status with Immigration and Customs Enforcement."

Critics of Trump's sanctuary-city crackdown said they had no plans to reverse their policies and accused Trump of wrongly portraying undocumented immigrants as criminals when studies show their communities tend to be safer: "California State Senate president pro tempore Kevin de León ... called Sessions's crackdown 'nothing short of blackmail.' 'Instead of making us safer, the Trump administration is spreading fear and promoting race-based scapegoating,' he said. 'Their gun-to-the-head method to force resistant cities and counties to participate in Trump's inhumane and counterproductive mass-deportation is unconstitutional and will fail.'"

-- An ICE agent shot and injured a man in Chicago while attempting to arrest another person in the city.

However, it is still not clear whether immigration officials were attempting to arrest someone due to their immigration status or if the person was being sought on other charges, a potentially key distinction at a time of fear nationwide among immigrants. (Mark Berman)

-- The father of an 18-year-old Rockville, Maryland, high school student who was charged raping a freshman girl has been arrested for being in the country illegally. ICE officials confirmed his arrest, saying he has been issued a notice to appear in immigration court and is currently being detained at the Howard County Detention Center. (Fox News)

-- "Congress may stiff Trump on wall funding," by Politico's Burgess Everett and Rachael Bade: "Congressional Republicans might deliver some more bad news for [Trump], fresh off their embarrassing failure to scrap Obamacare: No new money is coming to build his wall. Trump hoped to jump-start construction of a massive wall on the U.S.-Mexico border with money in a must-pass government funding bill. But Democratic leaders are vowing to block any legislation that includes a single penny for the wall. Republican leaders, wary of this, are considering a plan that would not directly tie the border wall money to the April 28 government funding deadline. While no decision has been made by GOP leadership, Republican lawmakers may decide to decouple the two to avoid a confrontation with Democrats. If they do, the chances of getting Trump's wall funding passed this spring become slim."

-- In Sweden, hundreds of refugee children have fallen unconscious after being told that their families are facing deportation – robbed of the ability to eat, drink, or respond to any pain or physical stimuli, sometimes for years. The New Yorker's Rachel Aviv chronicles the bizarre phenomenon: "They are like Snow White," a doctor told her. "They just fall away from the world."

WHAT'S NEXT?

-- The Trump administration is gearing up for its next big legislative battle: Tax reform. And unlike the health care bill, White House officials are planning a "much more assertive role" in its overhaul – with some advisers working to create concrete blueprint for specific changes rather than letting Congress dictate details. Damian Paletta reports: "Some GOP allies say they have already produced tax legislation and that it would not make sense for the White House to produce its own. Key division points could be about whether to seek a broad overhaul of the tax code or whether to limit it to more specific provisions — such as those affecting corporations — and whether such an initiative could increase the deficit without offsetting spending cuts or changes to tax policy. Also highly controversial is a proposal to impose a new tax affecting imports."

Within the administration, meanwhile, there are open questions about who will lead the charge on tax policy: "The Treasury Department has close to 100 people working on the issue, and [Steven Mnuchin] has signaled to lawmakers that he will be a point person in any negotiations. At the same time, some legislators say National Economic Council Director Gary Cohn has also emerged as a powerful force within the White House for overseeing economic policy and that he could attempt to take the reins of what is likely to be the administration's most important policy issue going forward."

-- The State Department didn't hold a single on-camera press conference for the first six weeks of Trump's presidency. And after less than three weeks, they've stopped again. The Wall Street Journal's Felicia Schwartz reports: "The pause comes as Mark Toner, a foreign service officer who has served as the department's acting spokesman, is slated for another assignment. Administration officials said the on-camera briefings won't resume for at least another two weeks, as Tillerson moves to get a permanent spokesperson in place. He is widely expected to pick Fox News anchor Heather Nauert, but she has not yet been officially named, and is still awaiting approval of her security clearance."

An incomplete history of the filibuster

-- "Neil Gorsuch may fall short of votes needed for smooth Supreme Court confirmation," Ed O'Keefe and Dave Weigel report: "He needs 60 votes to clear a procedural hurdle required of high-court confirmations in the Senate, but Republicans, who hold just 52 seats, may not have the votes in a chamber that is divided deeply along partisan lines. Republicans do, however, have the votes to choose the 'nuclear' option — to change the rules and allow Gorsuch's confirmation (and others after it) to proceed on a simple majority vote. That would upend a longstanding Senate tradition that forces the governing party to seek bipartisan support."

*Senate Minority Leader Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.) announced plans to filibuster Gorsuch last week, and others, including Thomas R. Carper (D-Del.), Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.), Al Franken (D-Minn.) and Tom Udall (D-N.M.) quickly followed suit.

*No Democrat has announced support for Gorsuch, and some moderates say they are still mulling a final decision. Sen. Joe Manchin III (D-W.Va.) said he is planning to meet with Gorsuch again before deciding. Sen. Heidi Heitkamp (D-N.D.) said in a statement that she is "in the process of reviewing" the nomination and will not make a final decision for several days. Others, including Sen. Joe Donnelly (D-Ind.), did not reply to requests for comment.

*At a town hall meeting Sunday afternoon in Rhode Island, Sen. Sheldon Whitehouse (D-R.I.) was welcomed with a standing ovation for his role in the Gorsuch hearings as a member of the judiciary panel.

WAPO HIGHLIGHTS:

Melania Trump speaks at a luncheon she was hosting to mark International Women's Day. (Jabin Botsford/The Washington Post)

-- "In New York, searching for the reclusive and elusive Melania Trump," by Paul Schwartzman: "Two months after her husband's swearing-in, the nation's new first lady approaches her role with a discernible reticence, her paucity of public appearances — each defined by tight smiles and spare verbiage — overshadowed by a vanishing act that stretches days on end. Melania Trump is a Rorschach test in Louboutins, inspiring praise from those who see in her inscrutable gaze an elegant, dutiful mother charting a new role for the first lady; compassion from those imagining her as the president's unhappy captive, her penthouse-turned-prison costing taxpayers ungodly sums to secure; and contempt from those rendering her as her husband's chief enabler, abiding his sexist and anti-immigrant bluster ... The hashtag #FreeMelania is now a pillar of Twitter-speak, while questions about the Trumps' marriage inspire headlines such as 'Melania's Struggle,' an Us Weekly yarn that claimed the 46-year-old first lady is 'secretly miserable.'"

Philippine President Rodrigo Duterte (R) is welcomed by Myanmar's President Htin Kyaw last week. (Pyay Kyaw Aung/Reuters)

-- "Duterte plays a winning hand with foreign policy, but will his luck run out?," by Emily Rauhala: "Rodrigo Duterte does not need your money. But he will take it. Since his electoral triumph last summer, the man famous for cursing foreign leaders and calling for mass killing seems to be raking in the cash for Manila. A tidy $24 billion in deals with China. Fresh billions from Japan. Not to mention the tens of millions in military and development aid the U.S. sends each year — despite his call for a 'separation.' Indeed, eight months into his tenure, with [Trump] in power and Asian affairs in flux, Duterte's devil-may-care diplomacy and relentless talk of 'slaughter' seem to be paying off, propping up his domestic popularity even as an International Criminal Court prosecutor warns of a possible war crimes investigation against him. Courting the president of the Philippines are new friends such as [China and Russia] ... [who] see Duterte as an ally against the U.S. military's Asian ambitions. Duterte, meanwhile, seems happy to flirt with his various suitors, alternating between swearing and sweet talk, backtracking as required."

GOOD READS FROM ELSEWHERE:

-- SHOT: Wall Street Journal, "With Help From France's Elite, Le Pen Tries to Steer Far-Right Party to Mainstream," by Stacy Meichtry and William Horobin: "For more than a year, French presidential candidate Marine Le Pen, representing the once-ostracized National Front, met with influential bankers, corporate executives and government officials to get advice on the radical changes vowed by her campaign. Ms. Le Pen has dubbed these members of France's elite "Les Horaces," a reference to the poet who penned verses for the first Roman emperor. It's a measure of her rise that she has lured talent and expertise from parts of the same establishment she rails against. Her recruitment of elites is a delicate matter that began years [ago] ... [and] nearly all the Horaces have remained in their jobs while clandestinely lending assistance to her. "They're what you call shadow advisers, and they want to remain as such," said Jean Messiha, a Horace who recently took a leave of absence ... to join Ms. Le Pen's campaign.

"Believers, including members of the country's leadership class, are eager to help Ms. Le Pen prepare for the practicalities of governance—and are willing to accept her incendiary campaign rhetoric and a result that would threaten the concept of a united Europe."

-- CHASER: "Is it possible the populist tide is cresting?" asks the Wall Street Journal's Gerald F. Seib: "The reverse seemed true last fall, when British voters defied their prime minister and voted to exit the E .U., and when [Trump] smashed expectations as well as the establishment. ... Those forces still undoubtedly exert more influence than they did just a year ago, but exactly how much influence has been the question. The rocky opening weeks of the new Trump administration, as well as some buyer's remorse in the wake of the Brexit vote in the United Kingdom, may have served to erode some of the appeal of populist movements elsewhere ... It's also likely, though, that if the political establishment in the West is regaining its footing, it is doing so in part because it has moved to co-opt some of the nationalist messages of its opponents. The sentiments unearthed by the Brexit vote and the Trump victory are real and aren't going away. It may be, though, that the establishment now is learning better how to adapt to them."

-- McClatchy DC, "Steve Bannon's man in the Middle East," by Katie Glueck in Tel Aviv: "When [Trump] named Steve Bannon his chief strategist, backlash from Jewish leaders was swift amid fears that the ex-Breitbart News boss would bring white nationalist sympathies to the White House. So in one of his first interviews ... Bannon tried to quiet those concerns by invoking something most people had never heard of: 'Breitbart Jerusalem.' It's a line that Bannon and his allies have used repeatedly since his appointment, turning to the fledgling media operation as a shield against suggestions that he, and the administration by extension, are tolerant of anti-Semitism. And Klein, Bannon's choice to lead Breitbart's Middle East outpost, is playing his part, emerging as a vocal validator for Bannon while building the controversial outlet's international brand. On a Wednesday afternoon in March, Klein was found running Breitbart Jerusalem operations from his luxurious three-story apartment located, notably, not in Jerusalem but in Tel Aviv."

-- Related: Breitbart News was declined – at least temporarily -- from obtaining permanent press credentials on Capitol Hill. #### HOT ON THE LEFT:

"Fox News said Trump spent the weekend 'working at the White House.' He was at his golf club," from Amy B Wang: "The alert from Fox News went out at 5:30 p.m. Sunday. 'PRESIDENT TRUMP SPENDING WEEKEND WORKING AT THE WHITE HOUSE,' the chyron announced ... The timing of the tweet alert was curious ... And, as it turned out, the announcement wasn't entirely true. According to pool reports, the president spent Saturday visiting the Trump National Golf Club in Potomac Falls ... wearing a suit, a white shirt with no tie and a red hat with 'USA' emblazoned on the front. Though the traveling press pool asked multiple times about the president's activities, Trump's team did not provide answers, the report stated. The press pool was told that Trump had 'meetings' at the golf club. But by the time he departed, pictures had emerged on social media of Trump riding a golf cart and dressed in golf attire. Another post appears to show Trump watching the Golf Channel with two unidentified people."

HOT ON THE RIGHT:

“California Bill Forces Transgender Bathrooms Into Nursing Homes,” from the Daily Caller: “A new bill introduced in California’s state senate requires nursing homes and similar long-term care facilities to implement transgender bathroom policies. The bill makes it unlawful to require transgender residents to use the biologically correct bathroom, and prohibits nursing home employees from calling residents anything other than their chosen name and pronoun. Section 1 of the bill argues that ‘many LGBT seniors are members of multiple underrepresented groups, and as a result, are doubly marginalized.’ ... [and] devotes a whole paragraph to defining the term ‘gender identity.’ The Pacific Justice Institute, a non-profit legal organization, sent a letter to the committee opposing the bill on free speech and religious freedom grounds.”

Chairman says investigation was prompted by Finn's case, but analysis of DHS practices will be more broad

BRIANNE PFANNENSTIEL

BPFANNENST@DMREG.COM

A legislative oversight committee will begin formally investigating child welfare practices that may have contributed to the death of Natalie Finn, a 16-year-old who was found neglected and starving in her West Des Moines home despite previous visits from police and state workers.

"The committee wants to understand how this process works so we can look at ways to prevent another tragic situation like the Natalie Finn case," said Rep. Bobby Kaufmann, R-Wilton and chair of the House Government Oversight Committee, which is leading the investigation. "We are not interested in politicizing this tragic situation or jeopardizing an ongoing criminal investigation."

Recently unsealed court documents revealed that medics found Finn wearing an adult diaper and lying in her own waste on the floor of her bare bedroom Oct. 24. She was unresponsive and later died after being transported to a hospital. The Polk County medical examiner's office found she had died of emaciation after being denied critical care.

Police reports show that child welfare workers had been called to the house five months before Finn's death to investigate concerns that she had been begging for food and showed other signs of abuse.

Legislative leaders said they want to know whether problems that exist within the Department of Human Services, which oversees child abuse complaints, could allow cases like Finn's to fall through the cracks. Kaufmann said the investigation is inspired by Finn's case, but he said the panel does not plan to investigate Finn's case specifically.

"I don't believe it's my role as oversight chair, as a legislator or as a person to say I know more than the people that are trying to prosecute (Finn's parents)," he said. So I'm trying to navigate the line between recognizing that this is certainly inspired by this (case), but also not interfering with it." A spokeswoman for the Department of Human Services said in a statement they "welcome a meaningful conversation" about their policies, procedures and quality improvement practices.

"Through the oversight committee meeting, we'll have an opportunity to let the public know about our child welfare processes, the actions we take to examine our responses when there is a tragedy and about our ongoing commitment to protecting vulnerable children," said DHS spokeswoman Amy McCoy.

In addition to the ongoing criminal investigation, others already are underway. The Department of Human Services is conducting its own internal review, and the Iowa Citizens Aide Ombudsman and the Child Death Review Team of the state Medical Examiner's Office have also announced their own inspections after a request from state Sen. Matt McCoy, D-Des Moines. McCoy also is leading a series of informal hearings at the Capitol that are intended to address many of the same issues. He has questioned whether more oversight is needed of homeschool students and whether budget and staff reductions at the department may have led to higher caseloads that ultimately affected child safety.

McCoy has received a confidential briefing from Department of Human Services officials, and later told the Des Moines Register that Natalie Finn and her siblings had been the subject of “numerous” reports of alleged child abuse and neglect leading up to Natalie’s death. Gov. Terry Branstad, though, has been sharply critical of McCoy, telling reporters at his weekly news conference that “it’s terrible to play politics with the tragic death of a teenage girl.” On Thursday, Branstad spokesman Ben Hammes said in a statement that the governor continues to believe the Legislature should not jeopardize a criminal investigation.

“Our administration would support an effort by legislators to learn more information about the overall adoption, child welfare and foster care systems at the Department of Human Services,” Hammes said.

McCoy disputed the characterization of his efforts.

“Anything that I have talked about on the Natalie Finn case has been on the public record,” he said. “It has already been released. I am in no way trying to work on that investigation.”

Democrats on the House Government Oversight Committee meeting said they’re glad to see the issue gain attention, though they wish it would have come sooner.

Rep. Abby Finkenauer, D-Dubuque, the top Democrat on the House committee, said she’s participated in the Senate hearings and found them to be helpful. But legislators still “are left with so many questions,” she said “These are our kids we’re talking about,” she said. “So however it’s being investigated, it needs to be investigated. And I’m very happy to hear that you are absolutely taking this seriously and willing to work with us to do this investigation and get to the bottom of this.” House Majority Leader Rep. Chris Hagenow, RWest Des Moines, said he also supports the efforts and believes it’s the role of the Legislature to investigate problems with state agencies.

“I absolutely, through the criminal investigation, want to see that proceed and be successful in finding out exactly what happened,” he said. “As these things come to light, we also want to look at state government and the overall processes that DHS or others might have to try and prevent that in the future.”

Kaufmann said he’s prepared to call meetings of the House Oversight Committee after the legislative session has adjourned if the investigation remains unfinished.

A criminal trial is scheduled for October.

Nicole Finn, 42, has been charged with firstdegree murder for Natalie’s death along with several other felonies related to her treatment Natalie’s two siblings, who were found to be underweight and suffering from bedsores. Finn’s exhusband, Joseph Finn, 46, has been charged with kidnapping, neglect or abandonment and child endangerment.

DMR: Iowa Senate approves voter ID measure

One provision would reduce state’s early voting period and send out absentee ballots later

WILLIAM PETROSKI

BPETROSK@DMREG.COM

Iowa voters would need to provide government-issued identification at the polls under an election bill approved Thursday by the Iowa Senate.

House File 516, which was initiated by Secretary of State Paul Pate, was passed on a 26-21 vote after a contentious debate. All Republicans supported the bill, and all Democrats and one independent were opposed. The bill returns to the House because it was amended by the Senate.

The legislation is aimed at making sweeping changes to the state's election laws that Republicans say are needed to ensure the integrity of the process and prevent fraud.

"Elections are the backbone of a representative republic. Every election is important," said Sen. Roby Smith, R-Davenport, chairman of the Iowa Senate State Government Committee and the bill's floor manager.

Democrats called the legislation a "voter suppression bill" intended to help Republicans win elections by reducing voter participation by minorities, older people and people with disabilities. Statistics from the American Civil Liberties Union and others show that minorities are less likely to have government-issued ID cards. That has, in part, led some courts to decide strict photo ID laws are discriminatory, and those laws have been struck down in some states. "The partisan bias of this bill is clear. That is reprehensible," Sen. Herman Quirmbach, D-Ames, told Republican lawmakers. "We know why you are doing this bill. Shame on all of those who support it."

Democrats insisted that election reforms are not needed. They pointed to a statement by Pate after November's election in which he declared that Iowa has "one of the cleanest, best election systems in the country."

But Smith said current Iowa law does not require county auditors or county attorneys to investigate or report irregularities in voting. He said records show dozens of cases of Iowa voter misconduct over the past five years, examples of felons voting and other voting irregularities, and he suggested they represent a much larger problem.

"We have voter fraud in Iowa. That is a fact," Smith said.

Democrats have called the Republican-backed bill a solution in search of a problem. They pointed to an Associated Press report in February that showed Pate's office was notified of 10 potentially improper votes cast out of 1.6 million counted statewide in the most recent elections.

Sen. Nate Boulton, D-Des Moines, contended the legislation would negatively affect thousands of Iowa voters for what appears to be a handful of irregular votes.

"We are putting new barriers in the process and excluding voters. That is a fact," Boulton said.

Smith insisted Democrats' warnings of hurdles to voting and discrimination aren't true.

"You can be out for a run and have T-shirt and tennis shoes on and walk into the voting booth and you will not be turned away under this bill. This bill is about you are who you want to say you are. Nobody will be turned away," Smith said.

Republicans said their legislation was drafted to comply with past court decisions, including a 2008 U.S. Supreme Court case, which upheld a photo ID law in Indiana. According to the National Conference of State Legislatures, 34 states require some form of documented evidence of voter identification at the polls.

The bill outlines five forms of identification that would be valid at the polls, four of which include a photo. The fifth would be a new voter verification card that would be issued to every voter free of charge.

Under an amendment approved Thursday, the new voter ID card would require a four-digit private number, a signature and no birth date. Those who show up to the polls without a valid ID could vote using a provisional ballot.

About 85,000 registered voters do not have a current driver's license or a non-operator's card issued by the Iowa Department of Transportation, according to the Secretary of State's Office.

Another provision in the bill would eliminate the option for voters to check a single box for straight-party voting. The bill also would put money toward helping precincts purchase digital poll books and establish postelection audits.

In addition, an amendment reduces the time to mail out an absentee ballot, vote in the auditor's office or vote at a satellite station, from 40 days currently to no more than 29 days before a general election. However, those absentee ballot changes would not apply to voters in the military and for people overseas. The bill also would let minors vote in primary elections if they would be 18 years old by the date of a general election.

Smith was questioned on the cost of the legislation. He said the expense for implementation is estimated at $350,000, or about a dime per citizen of Iowa. Democrats disagreed, suggesting the cost could be much higher. But Smith said there will be no mandate to counties, and they can continue to use paper poll books.

A Des Moines Register/ Mediacom Iowa Poll conducted in February showed that 69 percent of adult Iowans surveyed favor the idea of requiring to present a government-issued identification card before casting a ballot. Twenty-eight percent are opposed and 3 percent are not sure.

The bill is officially supported by the Iowa Minuteman Civil Defense Corps. It is opposed by a long list of groups, including the American Civil Liberties Union of Iowa, the Iowa State Association of Counties, AARP Iowa, Iowa Citizens for Community Improvement, Iowa State Education Association, League of Women Voters of Iowa, League of United Latin American Citizens, Iowa Developmental Disabilities Council, One Iowa Education Fund, Iowa Federation of Labor, AFLCIO and Interfaith Alliance of Iowa Action Fund.

DMR: D.M. set to decide on dueling skyscraper proposals

JOEL ASCHBRENNER

JASCHBRENN@DMREG.COM

On Friday morning, the two developers competing to build a residential skyscraper near Court Avenue will find out who will gain the upper hand.

The Des Moines City Council is hosting a workshop, during which the city's economic development staff is expected to recommend one of the two projects: Mandelbaum Properties' 32-story development called The Fifth or Blackbird Investments 33-story project called Four-22. Longtime city officials say such a face-off is unprecedented in recent memory.

The staff's decision could be a significant victory for one of the two. The City Council often follows the advice of the economic development staff on such decisions.

A few years ago, for example, the City Council heeded the staff's recommendation to pick Hy-Vee's proposal over four other bids for a Court Avenue site.

The final word could come April 3, when the City Council is scheduled to select one of the projects. Council members could also vote to delay the decision.

Both developers want to replace a decommissioned cityowned parking garage at Fifth and Court avenues with a privately owned parking garage, a residential tower and other commercial development.

Mandelbaum announced his project in 2015 and recently finalized a development agreement with the city. Before selling the public property to Mandelbaum, the city held a 30-day hearing to allow other developers to make competing offers, as required by state law.

Two hours before the deadline expired, Blackbird submitted its proposal.

Both developers expressed confidence.

“The real important thing is we have been working collaboratively with the city for over two years,” said Justin Mandelbaum, a principal with Mandelbaum properties. “This agreement is fully baked.”

Justin Doyle, a principal with Blackbird Investments, said: “I’m cautiously optimistic. I know we’ve put our best foot forward.”

Here is a look at how the projects compare:

The proposals

Mandelbaum Properties’ The Fifth » A 32-story apartment and hotel tower facing Walnut Street. The boutique hotel would occupy the lower floors and would feature about 50 rooms. The upper floors would feature about 200 luxury apartment units.

» A nine-screen, first-run movie theater facing Court Avenue. It would be operated by Omaha-based Main Street Theaters and would serve food and drinks and would offer recliner seats.

» A nine-story, 564-stall parking garage facing Fifth Avenue.

Blackbird Investment’s Four-22 » A 33-story residential co-op tower facing Walnut Street. Like condos, co-ops offer homeownership, but instead of buying an individual unit, residents buy a share in the building.

» A 150-room hotel facing Court Avenue. Officials at Blackbird said they would sell the land to a separate hotel developer.

» A 700-stall parking garage facing Fifth Avenue. Roughly one-third of the garage would serve as the base of the co-op building and would be converted later into residential units, according to Blackbird.

Cost

Mandelbaum: $111 million Blackbird: $137 million Timing

Mandelbaum’s development agreement gives him until August 2020 to finish the garage and until August 2028 to finish the theater and the tower, but Mandelbaum said he will finish the projects much sooner. He plans to demolish the garage this summer and start construction in late 2017.

Blackbird’s proposed development agreement requires Blackbird finish the garage by Nov. 1, 2018, finish the hotel by Aug. 1, 2019, and finish the residential tower by Dec. 1, 2021.

Height

Mandelbaum: 32 stories. Mandelbaum's development agreement requires the tower to be 25 to 32 stories. The parking garage would be nine stories and the theater would be two stories.

Blackbird: 33 stories. Blackbird's development agreement requires the tower to be 26 to 33 stories. The parking garage would be six stories and early plans show the hotel standing eight stories, though officials at Blackbird say the design could change.

Project team

Mandelbaum Properties:

General contractor: Weitz Co. Architect: SCB.

Blackbird Investments declined to reveal their contractor or architect.

Incentives from the city

Mandelbaum would qualify for up to $20.5 million in city incentives, including tax abatement and rebates worth an estimated $9.7 million, a $4 million forgivable loan for the purchase of the property and up to $6.8 million forgivable loans for operating the parking garage.

Blackbird would qualify for some of the same incentives as Mandelbaum Properties, including a $4 million forgivable loan for the purchase of the property and up to $6.8 million in forgivable loans for the parking garage.

Both projects would receive tax breaks for 20 years, but the details differ. Mandelbaum would receive a mix of property tax abatement and rebates.

Blackbird's proposal calls for property tax rebates, but no abatement. Officials at Blackbird said that means they would receive less taxpayer money because some property taxes paid are protected from rebates.

Highlights

Mandelbaum : City leaders have applauded Mandelbaum's project for promising a movie theater. While downtown has had second-run theaters and IMAX facilities, it has been years since a traditional movie theater operated in the heart of the city.

Blackbird: The firm has promised several elements in its proposal, including:

- » $1 million to renovate the unconventional three-way intersections on Fifth Avenue at Court Avenue and Mulberry Street.
- » $2 million to commission an art installation covering the parking garage.
- » The extension of the skywalk to Court Avenue.
- » The garage would be built with flat decks so it could be converted to housing or offices in the future if the demand for parking diminishes.
- » 20 percent of the housing units would be set aside for low to moderate-income residents.

Detractors

Mandelbaum: Some City Council members have questioned Mandelbaum's progress on the project.

About two years have passed since Mandelbaum first started working with the city on his plans for the site.

Blackbird: Some City Council members have questioned Blackbird's capacity to take on the development, noting the firm has several unfinished projects around the city and several other projects in the queue that haven't broken ground.

The proposed co-op tower has also raised questions.

While co-ops have been used for suburban senior housing developments in the region, no one has ever tried to build a downtown high-rise co-op.

Mandelbaum's pitch

Mandelbaum said what's most important is his team. Des Moines-based Weitz Co. has built numerous high-rise developments around the country and Chicago-based SCB is one of the top residential tower designers nationwide, according to Mandelbaum.

"As a developer we're in business to get projects done, not to talk about projects," he said. "And by surrounding ourselves with the strongest team that we possibly could we have the greatest (potential) for making the project a reality."

Blackbird's pitch

Blackbird contends its proposed deal would repay the city faster for the garage and generate more tax revenue for the city, while taking a smaller tax break.

"Economically, it's a huge difference," Doyle said. Doyle added that Blackbird's proposal includes several elements that elevate it above Mandelbaum's, including new intersections, affordable housing and a skywalk extension. "There is so much the city is getting out of this that isn't in the agreement with Mandelbaum," he said.

About Mandelbaum Properties

Mandelbaum Properties has completed several real estate developments around the metro, notably the construction of the federal courthouse annex at 218 E. Second St., as well as several strip malls and suburban housing developments.

A family company, Mandelbaum Properties is led by John Mandelbaum and his sons: Justin, Sean and Chad.

Justin Mandelbaum has led the development of The Fifth. He also heads a nonprofit called Main Frame Studios, which is renovating a 1980s office building on Keosauqua Way into artist studios.

Mandelbaum also co-founded the China Iowa Group, which works as a consultant for Iowa firms seeking to do business in China and vice-versa.

Mandelbaum previously worked for the investment firms Goldman Sachs and Starwood Capital Group and helped develop an artist studio complex outside Boston. The Mandelbaum family has been in Des Moines for more than 150 years and owned a dry goods store that eventually was incorporated into Younkers.

About Blackbird Investments

Since forming in 2013, Blackbird Investment has quickly taken on several projects around the state.

The firm renovated an East Village warehouse into an environmentally friendly office. It has started renovating several historic buildings into apartments, including the Wilkins Building (formerly the Younkers building), the Clemens Building (formerly the home of Raccoon River Brewing Co.), the old Fort Des Moines barracks near Army Post Road and the Sheldon-Munn hotel in Ames.

Blackbird has announced plans but not broken ground on several projects, including a proposed 33-story tower at the former Younkers building site and a 55-acre development in Iowa City.

The firm has five partners: Justin Doyle, a principal at Modus engineering; his brother Ryan Doyle, a real estate developer; their father Harry Doyle, also a principal at Modus Engineering; commercial real estate broker T.J. Jacobs; and former insurance businessman Hugh O'Hagan. Before forming Blackbird Investments, the Doyles got their start in real estate by selling homes on contract in Des Moines and Waterloo, their hometown.

DMR: Water Works bill stalls in Iowa House

GOP fails to reach a consensus on how or whether to advance controversial legislation dismantling D. M. utility

BRIANNE PFANNENSTIEL

BPFANNENST@DMREG.COM

A controversial bill dismantling the Des Moines Water Works has stalled in the Iowa House with Republicans so far failing to reach a consensus on how or whether to advance the legislation.

"Obviously you get something like that, there's a lot of different ideas, and people want to go different directions," House Majority Leader Rep. Chris Hagenow, R-West Des Moines said Thursday. "And we try to reach consensus on that and haven't gotten there yet. But the overall goal is one that I think we share and many of our local elected officials share. But it is a big issue and we're still having those conversations."

The legislation moved quickly after being introduced in February. Full committees advanced matching bills through both the House and the Senate, and the public weighed in during a contentious public hearing at the Capitol. But House leaders have declined to bring the bill up for floor debate for more than a week.

Hagenow said it has nothing to do with a federal judge's March 17 decision to dismiss the Des Moines Water Works' lawsuit against three northern Iowa drainage districts, though Des Moines Water Works CEO Bill Stowe has said he suspects the legislation was filed in "retaliation" to that suit.

That lawsuit claimed the districts funnel high levels of nitrates into the Raccoon River, a source of drinking water for 500,000 central Iowa residents, that the utility later must pay to remove.

But Hagenow said Thursday, "That bill was, from our perspective, never about the lawsuit. It was about trying to make sure that ratepayers for Des Moines Water Works had a seat at the table and in governance."

House File 484, introduced by Rep. Jarad Klein, R-Keota, would strip water utilities in Des Moines, Urbandale and West Des Moines of their independent boards of directors and instead shift control to their respective city councils.

Klein has filed an amendment to the legislation that would direct central Iowa mayors, city managers and rural water administrators to begin studying a regional water utility, and it tasks them with agreeing on a governance and operational structure by the end of the year.

Hagenow said it's still the goal to create a regional utility. "We have, many of my constituents, that are ratepayers but don't have a seat at the table," he said. The Des Moines City Council voted earlier in the week to continue its support of the legislation, despite a room full of angry citizens who spoke against it. In West Des Moines, the city council voted to scale back its support, instead choosing to register as "neutral" on the bill.

DMR: Iowa sheriffs dispute claim by feds

Officials question accuracy of report saying they are not cooperating with immigration requests

MACKENZIE ELMER

MELMER@DMREG.COM

Four Iowa sheriffs are among the city and law enforcement officials around the U.S. questioning the accuracy of a Department of Homeland Security report that lists jurisdictions refusing to cooperate with federal requests to detain undocumented immigrants.

The report was prompted by an executive order signed by President Donald Trump in January that called on the government to document jurisdictions that are not cooperating with federal efforts to find and deport immigrants in the country illegally.

The first list was released Monday, citing 206 examples of immigrants who were said to have been released from custody by local jails despite requests from federal agents. The requests, often called "detainers," have taken on a greater role in the immigration debate under Trump, who opposes local policies that grant leniency to people in the country illegally.

According to the report, U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement issued 12 detention requests to Montgomery County and five requests to Franklin County during the week of Jan. 28 to Feb. 3.

Montgomery County, in southwest Iowa, ranked fourth nationally among non-compliant jurisdictions for the number of detainers it received during that week, according to the report. It fell just behind Cook County, Ill., which includes Chicago. Franklin County, about 90 miles north of Des Moines, ranked ninth nationally.

But Montgomery County Sheriff Joe Sampson and Franklin County Sheriff Linn Larson, both Republicans, said their departments did not receive any detainer requests during that period.

"If we get a detainer, we hold them," Sampson said. "I don't know how the hell we made the list."

Sampson said his department has not been contacted by anyone from ICE since October. Larson said his department has proactively flagged ICE to check the immigration status of five people since the start of the year.

Shawn Neudauer, an ICE spokesman, said Thursday that the agency is standing by its information.

"These are jurisdictions that at some point in the past have declared themselves to be noncompliant with ICE detainees,” Neudauer said.

Counties that disagree with the reported information will be instructed to take it up with their local field office, he said.

Sac County Sheriff Kenneth McClure said he plans to do that. Sac County was listed in the report for refusing to detain an individual from Mexico on Feb. 11, 2014, who was jailed on a drug possession charge.

Neudauer said in some cases older detainer requests were included in the report because ICE was never previously informed that the inmate had been released from custody. Some of those hold requests were still active in ICE records when the agency created the report.

But McClure, a Republican, said his jail staff has checked records dating back to 2013 and found no record of a detainer matching those facts. He said he has received angry calls to his office questioning whether he’s doing his job since the report was released.

“Quite frankly, if ICE wants to detain these people so they can determine whether they’re illegal or not, then maybe they should come and get them,” McClure said.

Sioux County was listed in the report for a Jan. 27 detainer request for a Guatemalan man who committed a traffic offense.

Sioux City Sheriff Dan Altena said the individual was booked into the jail at 9 p.m. and released by a judge at 10:30 a.m. the next day. He said there was “almost no way we would have gotten that detainer before the next morning.” ICE officials issue detainers that ask local authorities to hold an individual for up to 48 hours to give the agency more time to investigate immigration status. Some jurisdictions, including Franklin and Sioux counties, began ignoring the requests in 2014 after the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Philadelphia ruled local police departments are not required to hold undocumented immigrants for the federal agency. “I can’t do my job based on what my opinion might be on immigration. I have to do my job based on what the law has decided, and the law has decided (local agencies) will be liable criminally and civilly if (they) hold somebody on a detainer. If someone changes that, that’s fine,” said Altena, also a Republican. While Sioux County continues to ignore ICE detainer requests for inmates who are otherwise eligible for release, Franklin County changed its policy in January when Larson became the sheriff. He replaced the department’s 10-page policy for dealing with ICE officials with one line. It states: The office will cooperate with any federal law enforcement agency.

“My problem was we were separating out what agencies we will and won’t work with and from an operational standpoint ... (that) became very confusing,” Larson said.

In total, 12 Iowa counties are listed in the report for having policies that limit their cooperation with ICE. Larson said the ICE report inaccurately names Franklin County as noncompliant, but he’s giving the agency the benefit of the doubt.

“We knew it would take us a period of time before we would migrate off that list,” Larson said. “But we have not received anything from (ICE) saying, please certify that you’ve made this change ... It would have been nice.”

ICE issued a statement Thursday that stated jurisdictions listed in the report had — in the past — expressed unwillingness to fully comply with detainer requests or have not provided ICE with sufficient time to allow for the safe transfer of a detainee.

“ICE seeks cooperation from all its law enforcement partners to achieve our mutual goal of protecting public safety,” the statement read. “If a law enforcement jurisdiction publicly changes its policies to honor ICE detainees, ICE will revise the DDOR report accordingly.”

DMR: Democrat considering bid for Iowa governor

JASON NOBLE

JNOBLE2@DMREG.COM

Iowa state Rep. Todd Prichard is formally considering a run for governor in 2018.

Prichard, a Democrat from Charles City, announced the formation of an exploratory campaign committee on Thursday ahead of a Des Moines event in which he appeared with several other potential Democratic candidates for office in 2018.

"We need a new vision for Iowa," he said in a statement announcing the committee. "I am considering a run for governor because Iowa needs fresh leadership with the vision to drive meaningful economic growth across the entire state, and I look forward to offering some new ideas as well as a new approach to getting things done for all Iowans."

Prichard, 42, is a threeterm state representative, a former county prosecutor and Army veteran.

Although he's not well known beyond Floyd County and the Statehouse, Prichard's rural Democrat-country lawyer- Iraq War veteran profile is seen by many as politically marketable for a party often perceived as urban and liberal and currently suffering through a long losing streak in statewide races.

Publicly backing Prichard's candidacy already are several prominent Democrats, including former state party chairman Sue Dvorsky, state Sen. Bob Dvorsky, 2014 Secretary of State candidate Brad Anderson and longtime labor leader Marcia Nichols. The exploratory committee allows Prichard to begin raising money in anticipation of a run for office, but stops short of a formal candidacy. Several other Democrats are expected to vie for the office in 2018, including Polk County Conservation Director Rich Leopold, who has already declared his candidacy, and former Iowa Democratic Party Chairwoman Andy McGuire. On the Republican side, Lt. Gov. Kim Reynolds is widely expected to run in 2018. Reynolds will almost certainly enter the race as the incumbent, as she will succeed incumbent Gov. Terry Branstad sometime this spring after he's confirmed as ambassador to China. Republican Cedar Rapids Mayor Ron Corbett is also considering a run.

DMR: Medical malpractice lawsuit caps slammed

Families of severely injured Iowans denounce bills that would limit awards

TONY LEYS

TLEYS@DMREG.COM

Families of Iowans who were severely injured by medical errors traveled to the Statehouse on Thursday to denounce bills that would limit awards in malpractice lawsuits. The families said if the bills were in effect, they probably couldn't have found lawyers to take their cases, even though medical providers' mistakes or neglect caused permanent disabilities or death of patients. "I want every doctor to know that when they cause an injury to someone, it doesn't just change the life of that person, it changes the life of an entire family," Ingrid Gerling of Burlington told reporters.

Gerling brought her 10-year-old daughter, Nyasia, whose right hand and arm are virtually unusable because nerves were torn away from her spine as medical professionals tried to pry her out of the birth canal during a difficult birth. The doctor had ignored clear signs that the birth should have been done by cesarean section, she said. “This was not my fault. This was not my husband’s fault. This was definitely not my daughter’s fault. This was the doctor’s fault,” Ingrid Gerling said. “Why should we be left paying for the doctor’s mistakes?”

The Gerlings sued, and a jury awarded them $5.5 million. The Gerlings were among several families who spoke Thursday at a news conference organized by a group representing lawyers who bring such lawsuits to court.

Their lawyer, Brian Galligan of Des Moines, said the Gerlings’ award would have been limited to $250,000 under medical malpractice bills moving forward in the Legislature.

Under that scenario, they probably would be unable to file a lawsuit, because lawyers would shy away from their case, he said. Plaintiffs’ lawyers routinely spend tens of thousands of dollars to hire medical experts and cover other expenses, but the lawyers are only paid if such lawsuits are successful. They gain a percentage of the award.

Kelly Denham of West Des Moines spoke about the experience of her 20-year-old son, T.J., who was left with severe brain damage because of a surgeon’s mistake while trying to fix a blood-vessel problem. T.J., who attended the news conference in a wheelchair, was an energetic student at Valley High School, his mother said, tearing up at the memory. But since the surgery, he can’t talk, swallow, walk or sit up. “Because the doctor made a mistake, T.J.’s hopes and dreams of his future are gone, and so are the hopes and dreams of those who love him,” she said as her son moaned behind her. “... Doctors are human, and they make mistakes, but they still need to be held accountable,” she said.

Denham said afterward that her family reached a confidential settlement with Mercy Medical Center in the case. If the current bill had been in effect, she might not have been able to find a lawyer to take the case, she said.

The Senate has already passed one of the bills, and the House is considering a similar one. The bills would cap “non-economic damages” at $250,000. They define such damages as being for such things as “pain, suffering, inconvenience, physical impairment or mental anguish.” Proponents say the bills would help control malpractice-insurance costs for doctors, hospitals, nursing homes and other care providers.

Clare Kelly, executive director of the Iowa Medical Society, said Thursday that the bills would not limit other damages juries could award to patients harmed by medical errors. “We agree that severely injured patients should have the ability to recover their loss in future wages and future health care costs related to their injury. This is why the bill does not seek to cap economic damages,” Kelly wrote in an email to The Register. She denied that the bills would hamper Iowans’ ability to file suits.

Kelly, whose group represents physicians, said Iowa doctors pay higher medical malpractice insurance premiums than those in neighboring states of Nebraska, Minnesota, South Dakota and Wisconsin.

Kelly cited an Iowa Insurance Division report on medical malpractice claims paid, which she said showed that only $394,584 was paid in noneconomic damages in Iowa medical malpractice cases in 2015. But representatives of plaintiffs’ lawyers disputed that figure, saying it only represents damages for “fright.” They said it doesn’t include substantial payments for such things as “pain and suffering” and harm to family relationships. Brad Lint, executive director of the Iowa Association for Justice, said at the news conference that Iowa doctors pay some of the lowest malpractice insurance premiums in the nation. Lint, whose group represents plaintiffs’ attorneys, noted that the number of medical malpractice lawsuits filed in Iowa has dropped by more than half in a decade. He called the new bills “an arbitrary, government-knows-best power play,” which would add unnecessary limits on citizens’ right to seek justice in the courts. He said Supreme Courts in 11 other states had declared such limits unconstitutional, and he predicted Iowa’s Supreme Court would likely do the same. “We already have reasonable limitations on lawsuits — they are called juries,” he said. “Have you ever tried to get a unanimous opinion from eight Iowans on anything?”

DMR: Health vote to cost Young support from PAC

JASON NOBLE

JNOBLE2@DMREG.COM

Iowa U.S. Rep. David Young will face political consequences for his opposition to the Republican Obamacare repeal effort that has stalled in Congress.

A spokesman for a super PAC run by House Speaker Paul Ryan said on Thursday that it will pull back support for Young, a Republican whose district includes the Des Moines metro, according to the Wall Street Journal. The hardball political move by the Congressional Leadership Fund comes 24 hours after Young announced publicly he'd be a "no" vote on the American Health Care Act.

The PAC has said it's already opened an office in Des Moines to aid Young's 2018 re-election campaign — resources it's now pulling back in retaliation for Young's opposition to a top GOP legislative priority.

"CLF will be terminating our lease because David Young has decided not to support President Trump and House leadership," PAC Executive Director Corry Bliss told the Journal.

If the group follows through on the threat, it could have major financial implications for 2018 in what is seen as a politically competitive district. It reportedly spent $1.9 million on Young's behalf in 2016.

An aide to Young said the congressman's campaign was not aware of any aid being provided by the Congressional Leadership Fund nor any plans by the PAC to withdraw that support. But, he added, Young wouldn't be swayed by any pressure from political leaders in Washington.

"David Young from day one has said that whoever the speaker is, the majority leader or president, they are not his bosses," Young aide James Carstensen told The Des Moines Register on Thursday. "His bosses are the people of the 3rd District of Iowa."

The health care bill was scheduled for consideration on the House floor on Thursday, but leaders canceled that vote after several dozen Republicans expressed opposition to the measure.

DMR: Once-threadbare Broadlawns to open $22 million addition

Polk County's public medical center, which is thriving under Obamacare, is expanding services in new building

TONY LEYS

TLEYS@DMREG.COM

Many patients at Polk County's public hospital will start seeing doctors, dentists and counselors in a new building next week, partly thanks to Obamacare.

Leaders of Broadlawns Medical Center celebrated the new, four-story addition Thursday. It will house an expanded dental clinic, outpatient mental-health services, addiction treatment, a pain-treatment clinic and a family-practice clinic whose goals will include training young doctors.

The gleaming building is part of a five-year, $60 million plan to rebuild and expand Broadlawns. The addition is on the east end of a hospital complex that used to be threadbare. "You couldn't have imagined, I don't think, 10 years ago, where Broadlawns is today," said Gov. Terry Branstad, who helped cut the ribbon at Thursday's celebration.

Broadlawns, which is owned by Polk County taxpayers, has thrived in recent years after nearing financial collapse more than a decade ago. Part of the reason for its success has been that many lowans who used to lack health insurance now have coverage due to the Affordable Care Act, also known as Obamacare. More than 150,000 poor Iowa adults have gained Medicaid coverage under the law. In the Des Moines area, many of those people used to rely on free care from Broadlawns.

Broadlawns Chief Executive Officer Jody Jenner said the 72,000-square foot addition is the result of years of planning and examination of what the Des Moines area needs. "Today really represents a major step in closing a lot of health care shortages and gaps in this community," he said. The $22 million building's dental area has twice as much capacity as the old one. It will be able to handle up to 22 patients at a time. The dental program's patients will include many poor lowans, who often have trouble finding private dentists who will take their Medicaid coverage.

Jenner said the expanded outpatient mental health program in the new building should take some pressure off Broadlawns' inpatient psychiatric unit, which is almost always full. The public hospital also plans to add 14 beds to that 30-bed inpatient wing, at a time when many other Iowa hospitals are closing or trimming their inpatient psychiatric units. Jenner said the public hospital's improved facilities have helped leaders recruit new staff members, including psychiatrists, who are in severely short supply.

Branstad, a Republican who opposed Obamacare, agreed in 2013 to go along with a version of the law's Medicaid expansion, with the federal government picking up most of the tab. President Donald Trump and Republicans controlling Congress are working to repeal the law.

Branstad, who is set to become Trump's ambassador to China, said in an interview after Thursday's ribbon-cutting that lowans who gained Medicaid coverage under Obamacare won't be left in the lurch. "We're very confident we're going to be able to maintain this program," he said. "I've been in touch both with the administration and with Congress on this issue, and we feel very good about it." He said the Obamacare replacement plan being debated in Congress this week should offer states more flexibility to try new ways to manage Medicaid programs.

DMR: Senate OKs ban on selling fetal body parts

WILLIAM PETROSKI

BPETROSK@DMREG.COM

A bill intended to prevent the sale of fetal body parts was overwhelmingly approved Wednesday night by the Iowa Senate, although a key Democratic lawmaker opposed the measure, saying it could hamper medical research.

Senate File 359 was approved on a 43-6 vote, sending the measure to the House for consideration.

The legislation prohibits persons from acquiring, providing, receiving or transferring fetal body parts in Iowa regardless of whether it was for "valuable consideration." Sen. Jake Chapman, RAdel, said the bill is intended to avoid shocking circumstances that were discussed in congressional hearings on the alleged sale of fetal body parts.

The issue arose after a series of videos purported to show Planned Parenthood employees attempting to illegally profit from the sale of fetal body parts. A Texas grand jury investigated the claims, but cleared Planned Parenthood and instead indicted two of the antiabortion activists who filmed the videos. A Texas judge subsequently threw out the charges. The bill was earlier amended in a Senate committee to address concerns raised by university medical researchers who want to continue work on existing fetal cell lines. It will also allow tissue from stillborn births and miscarriages to be donated in the future. But Sen. Joe Bolckom, D-Iowa City, who serves on the Senate Health and Human Services Appropriations Subcommittee, criticized the bill Wednesday night.

“The bill puts politics above good science and medicine. It could have a negative impact on the future of research for lifesaving treatments. The bill is nothing more than a platform for people who are opposed to abortion,” Bolckom said.

Fetal tissue has been successfully used for decades in medical research. It was critical in creating a vaccine for polio and more recently it has been used in effort to find treatments for spinal cord injuries, eye disease, strokes and Parkinson’s disease.

Senate Democrats pointed out that federal law currently prevents the transfer of fetal body parts for valuable consideration. They said Planned Parenthood of the Heartland, Iowa’s largest provider of abortions, does not violate this law.

DMR: Senate approves health coverage for autism

WILLIAM PETROSKI

BPETROSK@DMREG.COM

The Iowa Senate voted 48-0 Thursday to require many employer-provided health insurance policies to provide coverage for treatment of autism spectrum disorder for young people. House File 215 was sent to Gov. Terry Branstad for his consideration. Both Republican and Democratic lawmakers praised the bill’s final passage, saying it represents years of work by advocates for people with autism.

Sen. Bill Anderson, R-Pierson, the bill’s floor manager, said the legislation will apply to employers of more than 50 fulltime workers. It will require coverage of applied behavioral analysis for persons under age 19 diagnosed with autism spectrum disorder. The bill provides maximum annual benefits, depending upon a person’s age. Coverage can also be subject to deductibles, co-payments or co-insurance provisions.

Anderson thanked his colleagues and families of persons with autism for pursuing the legislation. He has a nephew diagnosed with severe autism spectrum disorder and he said treatment has resulted in “amazing” progress. “Unlike previous years, we were able to get everybody to the table to get this worked out and that is what made it possible,” Anderson said.

Sen. Amanda Ragan, D-Mason City, said the legislation will have huge and positive impact on many families and many children. “You should all be proud you are voting for it,” she told her colleagues.

DMR: 20-week abortion ban advances in Iowa House

BRIANNE PFANNENSTIEL

BPFANNENST@DMREG.COM

A bill banning most abortions after 20 weeks is advancing through the Iowa House, though some Republicans say it doesn't go far enough.

Rep. Shannon Lundgren, RPeosta, led a House subcommittee on the 20-week ban Wednesday. The three-person panel voted to advance the bill to a full committee, but Lundgren said it faces a tough road as some Republicans continue to push for stricter "personhood" legislation that would define life as beginning at conception, effectively banning all abortions.

"There are a lot of our caucus who are very (supportive of) life at conception, period," Lundgren said, noting that's why a previous bill banning abortion after 20 weeks did not advance in the House.

"It's not that I'm not (for) life at conception, either. I campaigned on that," she said. "But some of us are willing to take an incremental look at how we can start to save lives immediately."

Senate File 471 already has cleared the Senate. It says any person who intentionally terminates a pregnancy that has reached 20 weeks post-fertilization commits a Class C felony, which is punishable by up to 10 years in prison.

"I think that putting these criminal penalties on here puts a woman's life at risk immediately, because trying to save a woman's life now potentially makes a doctor a criminal," said subcommittee member Rep. Beth Woessel-Kroeschell, DAmes. "I just don't see how we can possibly do that in this state and feel good about ourselves."

The bill allows exceptions to preserve the life of the mother or the fetus, or to avert a "serious risk" to the woman of "substantial and irreversible physical impairment of a bodily function."

It also allows exceptions for fetal abnormalities where a child could not survive outside the womb.

Amanda Acton of Waukee previously testified before the Senate about the need for that exception. She told of being informed by her doctor 21 weeks into her pregnancy that her baby had a rare disorder, would not survive long after birth and would have an agonizing life. She said she and her husband concluded the most compassionate decision was to end the pregnancy.

"I remember thanking God," Acton said at the time. "I don't regret my abortion, not one little bit."

But Joan Thompson, a lobbyist with the Iowa Catholic Conference, said Wednesday her organization cannot support that exception.

"Even though these infants are very sick, disabled or dying, we do not support taking their lives," she said.

Lundgren said the bill likely will see amendments as it moves to the House Human Resources Committee.

"There's just a lot of work to be done yet," she said.

DMR: Tax reform plan is being drafted in Iowa Senate

WILLIAM PETROSKI

BPETROSK@DMREG.COM

Iowa Senate Majority Leader Bill Dix says a state tax reform plan is being drafted and it likely will be unveiled by Senate Republicans within the next two weeks. "We need to continue to stay focused on growth," Dix told reporters Thursday in his Iowa Capitol office. "Tax policy is a key component of that."

We are not taking our eye off of sensible tax reform that puts Iowa in a better position to attract new investment to our state and keep high-paying jobs here.” But the Shell Rock Republican isn’t disclosing any details yet about the plan, such as whether it will include tax cuts. He said Sen. Randy Feenstra, R-Hull, who chairs the Iowa Senate Ways and Means Committee, is still fine-tuning the details, adding, “We will talk about that when the release time comes.”

Dix made his remarks as the GOP-led Iowa House has just begun discussions on a bill that would cap state spending on tax credits. According to the Department of Revenue, the total value of state tax credits has grown dramatically from about $153 million in 2005 to an expected $427 million in 2018 — an increase of about 180 percent. The Iowa Taxpayers Association says the state’s tax credits are intended to offset Iowa’s high rate for corporate income taxes and suggests any discussion about removing them should be coupled with lowering the overall tax rate. Dix said he expects the 2017 session to end April 18, and he considers the Legislature’s major policy issues either to have already been addressed or in the pipeline headed toward approval. He also anticipates budget targets will be released next week that will help lawmakers shape state spending for the 2018 state fiscal year, which begins July 1. The upcoming budget will be tight with limited state revenue, which could mean some budget cuts, Dix acknowledged. “Everything will be on the table” for discussion, he added, saying the budget won’t exceed available revenue. For the upcoming fiscal year, a state panel has forecast total revenue of $7.364 billion, an increase of 3.6 percent, but a decline of $191.8 million compared with an estimate made three months ago. For fiscal year 2019, which starts July 1, 2018, the revenue forecast is for $7.626 billion, up 3.6 percent over the previous year. Senate Minority Leader Robert Hogg, D-Cedar Rapids, said Thursday that Senate Democrats would welcome a discussion about reforming Iowa’s tax code, but he believes state government can’t accommodate additional tax cuts. Hogg said Gov. Terry Branstad and Lt. Gov. Kim Reynolds, who are both Republicans, have gotten carried away with tax cuts, which has hurt the state’s financial position.

“We are in a fiscal mess today, not because of a global or national recession. We are in a fiscal mess today because of budget decisions that the Branstad-Reynolds administration and Republican legislators have made over the last six years,” Hogg said. “If the state goes down the route of cutting taxes even more it will make the budget mess even worse.” Hogg also said he is concerned that Iowans will be hurt by additional budget cuts, and he believes Iowa’s revenue figures would be more favorable if the state had better economic development policies.

DMR: Hensley to face challenge from environmental lawyer for seat

MACKENZIE ELMER AND JASON NOBLE

MELMER@DMREG.COM

An environmental lawyer backed by former a former Democratic lieutenant governor and attorney general announced his bid for Des Moines City Councilwoman Christine Hensley’s seat Thursday night. Josh Mandelbaum, 37, delivered the news before a fundraiser for the Democratic blog Iowa Starting Line among other candidates for office in 2018. And he wasted no time drawing water quality as the battle line in the race.

“Time and time again, Councilwoman Hensley has sided with special interests against the Des Moines Water Works and residents of Des Moines,” Mandelbaum told the crowd. “She’s demonstrated time and again that she’s incapable of being our voice on water quality. I’m running for city council because I will be dedicated to being our voice for our values and our concerns and our interests.” Mandelbaum works as a staff attorney and lobbyist for the Environmental Law and Policy Center, which is currently registered against controversial legislation in the Iowa Statehouse that would place water utilities and its assets under the control of local city councils.

He’s slammed the bills at a March 7 public hearing at the Capitol, saying the legislation does nothing to protect ratepayer investments and places responsibility for safe drinking water “with entities that don’t have experience or expertise in doing so. Just like in Flint, Mich.” In a 4-2 vote Monday, Des Moines City Council reasserted its support of the legislation in a response to public demand for a vote that showed where each council member stood on the issue. Hensley, who represents Ward III, has been most vocal in supporting the legislation and calling for changes to the way water utilities are governed.

Hensley wouldn’t say whether she’ll be running for reelection on the council, or when she might make a decision.

But in terms of Mandelbaum’s candidacy, Hensley said she looks forward to the debate.

“I’ve only had a couple (elections) where I’ve not been challenged,” Hensley said.

Former Lt. Governor Sally Pederson and former Iowa Attorney General Bonnie Campbell have signed on as Mandelbaum’s campaign cochairs, according to a press release. Mandelbaum served as a policy adviser from 2003 to 2006 under former Gov. Tom Vilsack and Pederson’s administration. Mandelbaum is a graduate of Roosevelt High School, Central Academy and the University of Iowa Law School. He serves on the Polk County Early Childhood Iowa board, the advisory board of University of Iowa REACH (Realizing Education and Career Hopes) program, and the Greater Des Moines Jewish Federation.

He attends Temple B’nai Jeshurun on Grand Avenue. He currently lives on the west side of Des Moines with his wife Katherine, his threeyear- old son, Liam, oneyear- old daughter, Ayla, and black lab Truman.

Mandelbaum is the cousin of Justin Mandelbaum, a Des Moines developer currently vying to build a downtown skyscraper at Fifth Avenue and Walnut Street.

USA Today: Ag secretary nominee addresses cuts

Ex-Georgia governor says he was not consulted on targeted programs

ARTHOLOMEW D. SULLIVAN

USA TODAY

WASHINGTON — Former Georgia governor George “Sonny” Perdue sought to assure farm-state senators on Thursday that he understands the importance of trade for farmers and supports many of the U.S. Department of Agriculture programs targeted in last week’s proposed 21 percent budget cut.

President Trump’s nominee to head the department, named just the day before the president took office, said he was not consulted on the proposed $4.7 billion cut over this year’s funding level that would eliminate water and wastewater loan programs, the department’s statistical capabilities and foreign food aid.

Asked by the ranking Democrat on the Agriculture Committee, Sen. Debbie Stabenow of Michigan, whether he supported clean water for rural communities, access to research tools, and the USDA organic program — programs she said are “zeroed out” in the president’s budget — Perdue said he did. Asked if he had been consulted during preparation of the budget blueprint, Perdue was clear he had not.

“I had no input in the budget,” he said.

Perdue’s late nomination has some in rural communities concerned that Trump has made agriculture policy a low priority, and several senators on the committee, including North Dakota Democrat Sen. Heidi Heitkamp, echoed that view. Perdue sought to change that perception by joking that while there had been “some anxiety” over the late nomination, “I think the president saved the best for last.”

The two-hour-and-20-minute hearing was mostly friendly and non-confrontational, steering clear of questions about Perdue’s past ethical lapses, including the 13 complaints to the Georgia Ethics Commission during his two terms as governor. Most senators wanted to explore with the nominee, who was raised on a dairy farm, the parochial interests of their states, like the margin protection program established in the 2014 farm bill to help dairy farmers. Other issues raised during the questioning were improving the health of national forests, preserving the sugar program and the impact of new immigration policies on farm labor needs.

Chairman Pat Roberts, RKan., said farmers are particularly concerned about finding strong markets for their goods.

“Now more than ever agriculture needs a voice — an advocate — at the highest levels of government,” Roberts said.

He asked Perdue to work “hand-in-hand” with the Office of the U.S. Trade Representative to expand export markets. Roberts added as an aside that the new administration has “too many cooks in the kitchen when it comes to trade.”

Perdue assured him he would be a strong advocate for trade and that he had talked while awaiting his confirmation hearing with the nominee for trade representative, Robert Lighthizer, and with Trump’s Commerce Department pick, Wilbur Ross.

Perdue, who has a doctorate in veterinary medicine from the University of Georgia, sprinkled his testimony with homey, farm country references. He said he had picked watermelons in his youth with one member of the committee, his cousin Sen. David Perdue, R Ga. He mentioned training bird dogs and milking cows, and said he avoided “dangling participles” after instruction from his English teacher mother. And he offered some wisdom from his late father: “If you take care of the land, it will take care of you.”

In his opening statement, he said that after a stint in the U.S. Air Force and briefly practicing veterinary medicine in North Carolina, he returned to Georgia to build a grain elevator for his county in 1976.

“Farming and farmers have been my life ever since,” he said. “Agriculture is in my heart.”

Perdue made it clear he has been paying attention to falling commodity prices and the 50 percent reduction in net farm income since the record high in 2013.

He said he understands concerns about proposed cuts to local government water and wastewater financing programs but that they might be addressed by Trump’s pending infrastructure initiatives.

If confirmed, he said he would pursue four goals: to maximize the opportunity to create jobs; “customer service everyday”; to meet consumers’ expectations for meeting food safety standards; and to expand markets for agriculture goods.

DMR Editorial: Branstad cheerfully ignores threat to Medicaid expansion

Does the governor support the Trump administration’s plan?

On Dec. 12, 2013, Gov.

Terry Branstad' office issued a press release trumpeting an agreement with federal officials to expand Medicaid and help more than 100,000 low-income and disabled lowans obtain access to health care.

Under the expansion, premiums for new enrollees were limited to 2 percent of income — about $19 per month for someone at the poverty line — and beneficiaries could reduce their payment by participating in wellness programs. The press release described the governor as “enthusiastic,” and quoted him as saying, “This is an Iowa plan that fits the health needs of our state.” Lt. Gov. Kim Reynolds was equally effusive, and was quoted as saying the expansion “allows Iowa to move forward in improving the health and wellness of our state.”

Now, however, Health and Human Service Secretary Thomas Price and Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Service Administrator Seema Verma have sent a letter to Branstad and the governors of 30 other states who expanded Medicaid at the expense of the federal government, telling them the expansion represents “a clear departure from the core, historical mission of the program.”

They're also urging the governors to pursue changes in Medicaid, such as charging beneficiaries higher premiums and requiring beneficiaries to pay for emergency-room visits to discourage such visits.

When asked about all of this, the best that Branstad spokesman Ben Hammes can muster is this: “Gov. Branstad extends his congratulations and is proud to see that Seema Verma was recently confirmed as the new CMS Director. She worked very closely with Iowa in obtaining the federal waiver for the Iowa Health and Wellness Plan and Medicaid Modernization. She fully understands the complexities of the Medicaid system and we look forward to working with her and Secretary Price in their new roles.”

Apparently, the governor's enthusiasm for Medicaid expansion has been supplanted by his enthusiasm for a CMS director determined to scuttle that effort. Could it be “the health needs of our state” are less of a priority than the president's political agenda?

DMR Editorial: Schools shouldn't sell extra-credit points to students

Unfortunately, 'stupid' legislation might be the answer if school boards don't act

At first blush, the proposal by Iowa Rep.

Chip Baltimore might seem like an overreaction.

Baltimore, a Republican from Boone, has introduced legislation that would prohibit public schools from awarding students extracredit points for providing classroom supplies such as paper towels and Kleenex.

“Frankly, we didn't know this was a problem,” says Melissa Peterson, an Iowa teachers union lobbyist. “I can never imagine a teacher saying, ‘I'll give you extra credit (for purchasing supplies),’ because there's plenty of families who can't.”

Yes, the practice is hard to imagine. But this sort of thing is fairly widespread and in recent years has proved to be a source of controversy in Florida, California, New York and other states. At some schools, teachers have actually handed out lists of classroom supplies — erasers, tissues, disinfecting wipes, etc. — at the beginning of the semester and promised that students who helped stock the supply closet will see their final letter grade bumped up one level.

Just last year, area teachers told a Des Moines Register reporter they could recall times when students earned enough extra-credit points by “donating” boxes of Kleenex to the classroom that they were able to squeak by with a passing grade.

So, regrettably, this does happen. While it's the sort of practice best addressed by school boards, it appears that some of them have yet to act.

To his credit, Baltimore admits he'd rather not spend his time on this issue. "I hate legislation like this — because I think it's stupid — but sometimes you have to legislate common sense," he says. "If it gets some attention and schools stop doing it, maybe it has the intended purpose. Maybe we don't have to put it in the law."

That would be the ideal outcome, but if school districts don't act, Baltimore would be justified in pursuing the matter.

DMR Iowa View: Why it's time for a regional water utility for metro Des Moines

RICK CLARK of Cleveland, Ohio, is former city manager of Des Moines.

An indelible lesson about local government is that sharing services is one of the best ways that local governments, working together, can reduce cost and increase the quality of service. This was a point I made to the Des Moines City Council when I retired as city manager almost three years ago.

Nowhere is the benefit of shared service more apparent than with public utilities such as wastewater treatment and the provision of potable water. These are essential public utilities used by virtually every citizen.

To be cost effective, a utility needs to spread the cost of its operating overhead and capital investment across as many customers as possible. If, for example, there are multiple water utilities with multiple water treatment facilities, the cost of potable water will increase and quality of service will decrease. And that's not good for anybody, and that is the real issue that should be driving the decision about creating a regional water utility for the Des Moines metro area.

The current governing structure for Des Moines Water Works has remained essentially unchanged since it was created in 1919. The five-member Water Board is appointed by the mayor of Des Moines but acts independent of the city and has all the authority necessary to operate, construct improvements, set water rates, and bring lawsuits on behalf of the utility. In the intervening years, the service area for Des Moines Water Works has undergone a radical transformation. In 1920 Des Moines had a population of 126,468, West Des Moines had 3,631 residents, Urbandale, 298, and Ankeny, 648.

Today, Des Moines remains the dominant city; however, West Des Moines now has a population of 64,000, Urbandale is about 44,000, and Ankeny is about 56,000. The current Des Moines Water Works governance structure is simply not adequate to address the challenges brought about by the growth in the metro area.

Suburban communities seek to build their own water treatment facilities. Why? Because the suburbs have no voice in the management and overall direction of Des Moines Water Works, and they are not confident they'll continue to receive water at a reasonable rate. Although this fear may not be entirely warranted, the longterm consequence could well be that the metro area evolves into a system of duplicative water treatment facilities competing with one another for customers. Water treatment cost will increase and so will the price of water. Des Moines residents do not escape adverse consequences because as suburban customers pull away from the Des Moines Water Works, then the burden of maintaining large treatment facilities and all administrative costs will fall more and more on the backs of Des Moines customers. At the same time, the suburbs will carry the entire burden of separate water treatment facilities. Everyone loses.

So what's the solution? Legislation considered by the Iowa Legislature will provide an opportunity for Des Moines and surrounding suburbs to work together to create a more representative regional water utility, which prevents the costly proliferation of new water treatment facilities and allows cities to work together to provide the most efficient system to treat and distribute water to the metro area. Water customers win with this solution.

For the record, the cities in metro Des Moines have a strong record of creating and managing regional utilities. One good example is the Des Moines Metropolitan Waste Water Reclamation Authority, which comprises 17 municipalities that work together to successfully construct and operate regional wastewater treatment facilities.

A final comment: The lawsuit filed by Des Moines Water Works attempted to address the issue of water quality in Iowa. The lawsuit failed. The U.S. District Court called Des Moines Water Works' claims "without merit" and dismissed the case in its entirety.

However, the need to address water quality remains. A new Des Moines regional water utility could be an effective partner working with the state towards the goal of clean water.

It is time to set aside the distractions and misdirected accusations about creating a regional water utility and do the right thing for the people of Des Moines and central Iowa. As a first step, the Iowa Legislature needs to enact the pending legislation that will allow the negotiations to create a new regional water utility to go forward.

DMR: Newborn health screening bill passes Iowa Senate

WILLIAM PETROSKI

BPETROSK@DMREG.COM

Newborns in Iowa would be tested for congenital cytomegalovirus if a screening demonstrates hearing loss under a bill passed Wednesday night by the Iowa Senate.

Cytomegalovirus, or CMV, is a common virus that infects people of all ages, according to the Centers for Disease Control and Health Prevention. Most people infected with CMV show no signs or symptoms. However, CMV infection can cause serious health problems for people with weakened immune systems, as well as babies infected with the virus before they are born, experts said.

Senate File 51, which now heads to the House for consideration, says the testing requirement would need to be accomplished before the newborn is 21 days old. In addition, information would be provided to the parent of the newborn regarding birth defects caused by congenital cytomegalovirus and early intervention and treatment resources and services available for children diagnosed with it. However, the testing requirement would not apply if the parent objects.

Sen. Jake Chapman, RAdel, the bill's floor manager, said the complications of CMV can be as extensive as death, adding he would like to see this bill be extended to across-the-board screenings. However, Chapman and several other lawmakers said they were happy the legislation is moving forward.

"This is certainly a step in the right direction for some of these kids," said Sen. Pam Jochum, D-Dubuque.

The Senate bill, which was approved on a 49-0 vote, also proposes educational and awareness campaigns regarding cytomegalovirus and congenital cytomegalovirus. The initiatives would be targeted towards women who may become pregnant, expectant parents, parents of infants, attending health care providers, and others.

LEE: Democratic House member exploring run for governor

James Q. Lynch

After announcing that he's exploring a campaign for governor in 2018, Rep. Todd Prichard delivered his maiden campaign speech to a nearly empty Iowa House of Representative on Thursday afternoon.

The empty seats and faint applause are not indicative of what the third-term Democrat from Charles City said he is finding when he talks to party members at soup suppers, off-year caucuses and central committee meetings.

"There's a lot of anger. I think there's a lot of concern and I think there is a lot of fear (because) of the way they see the state changing," Prichard said in an interview earlier Thursday. The Republican legislative agenda is "not in line with what I would consider Iowa values."

Running for governor was not part of his agenda when Prichard, 42, ran for a vacant House seat in 2012. That's changed this year, he said, as he's watched majority Republicans stripping public employees of collective bargaining rights, weakening the state's workers' compensation program and limiting spending on traditional priorities like education.

That's frustrating because "regardless of where we are from or what party we are in, we were elected to create good-paying jobs, raise wages and make it easier to raise a family and get ahead," Prichard said. Republicans, he said, "have failed in that mission."

Republican Party of Iowa Chairman Jeff Kaufmann doubts Prichard will be the last Democrat to get into the race.

Advertisement

"I would imagine whenever you have the loss of an incumbent, there will be a lot of people exploring," he said, referring to Gov. Terry Branstad's anticipated departure to be U.S. ambassador to China. "But let me tell you something, there's a lot of experience and a lot of money and a lot of shoe leather between exploring and running against a lady who has been already trained and ready to go on Day 1. (Lt. Gov.) Kim Reynolds has the complete package."

If Prichard runs — and he thinks he has until next year to make a decision, he'll be running against Branstad as much as Reynolds, who is expected to serve out the governor's term.

Bottom of Form

"I haven't seen any points of separation between Gov. Branstad and Lt. Gov. Kim Reynolds," he said "Their agenda seems to be one and the same, so I think the policies and decisions made by the Branstad administration are very much tied to Lt. Gov. Reynolds."

As a challenger, Prichard said, he would have to make the case that he can do a better job and lead Iowa to a better place.

"Given the decline of education, lack of wage growth, there's a narrative there we can tell voters," he said. "This administration, these policies, have not advanced the interests of the people of Iowa."

LEE: Iowa Senate approves election law changes

ROD BOSHART

Iowa senators approved GOP-backed election law changes Thursday that proponents say will improve election integrity but that critics insist will suppress turnout and raise costs to county taxpayers.

Majority Republicans made several changes to a House-passed bill before voting 26-21 to pass House File 516 and return it to the House for consideration.

The bill was opposed by 20 minority Democrats and Ocheyedan independent Sen. David Johnson.

"The bill would require all voters voting at the polls to provide proof of eligibility, as well as all absentee ballot requests to contain a personal voter identification number on the request form," said Sen. Roby Smith, R-Davenport, the bill's floor manager.

"The public realizes that they have to show their photo ID to get on an airplane, buy a beer or open a checking account. This legislation is common sense," he said.

Democrats countered that the bill would put up barriers to elderly, disabled, minority and other Iowa voters that would discourage participation in a fundamental American right. They argued it would increase costs to the state and counties and create unintended consequences in a state with a track record of clean elections with high participation rates.

They also said it likely would trigger a legal challenge.

"I think it's an unnecessary political document," said Sen. Tony Bisignano, D-Des Moines.

Sen. Pam Jochum, D-Dubuque, called the bill "a very expensive solution in search of a problem."

Smith countered by pointing to 27 cases of first-degree election misconduct in the past five years and eight instances where people voted twice as evidence of a problem.

"We have voter fraud in Iowa, that is a fact," he said. "With so many close elections in the past, including members of this chamber (who won by 22, 17 and 10 votes in three races), we need to do everything we can to prevent fraud and this bill has safeguards."

Sen. Nate Boulton, D-Des Moines, dismissed Smith's fraud contentions, saying "there is not a bogeyman out there," while Johnson called the election bill "a farce" that was not for the people's interests but rather for special interests.

Bottom of Form

"This isn't a welcoming place right now, this 87th General Assembly," Johnson said.

House File 516 would make several changes to state election administration, including voter registration, absentee voting and requiring voters to present an ID to vote.

Other provisions would eliminate the option for voters to check a single box for straight-party voting, put money toward helping precincts purchase digital poll books, and establish post-election audits.

Also, the bill would provide for technology upgrades and additional poll worker training for consistency throughout the state and provide additional resources for those system upgrades.

Republicans made changes that would reduce the time for sending out absentee ballots before an election from 40 days to 29; would allow teenagers who turn 18 by the general election to vote in the earlier primary; and would establish four-digit voter ID cards.

Sen. Tod Bowman, D-Maquoketa, offered an amendment to strike the entire bill and replace it with a voter identification verification process, but his proposal lost 27-20.

"This is something Iowans want," Smith said. "This is something that we have delivered for them to make sure that elections are fair," Smith said.

LEE: Iowa Republican leaders: No minimum wage increase

Rod Boshart

Top Republicans in the Iowa House and the Iowa Senate said Thursday they do not expect the Legislature to consider increasing the statewide minimum wage of $7.25 an hour this session.

GOP senators held out the possibility of a separate minimum wage bill this week during a committee discussion of legislation to void higher county-level wage minimums, but Senate Majority Leader Bill Dix, R-Shell Rock, and House Speaker Linda Upmeyer, R-Clear Lake, said that won't happen.

"I anticipate no separate minimum wage bill," Dix told reporters.

Upmeyer said representatives approved the local pre-emption bill earlier this month after turning back Democratic amendments "to do just that." Members of the House GOP caucus, she said, are not asking to take up a bill to increase the minimum wage this session.

"That's not been one of their priorities this year," Upmeyer told reporters.

House File 295, which currently is eligible for debate in the Senate, includes provisions to immediately bar cities and counties from usurping state authority in business and employment matters and the sale or marketing of consumer merchandise.

Bottom of Form

That would include prohibiting cities and counties from setting minimum wages higher than the statewide $7.25 hourly level and nullify the higher minimum wages approved by officials in Johnson, Linn, Polk and Wapello counties.

Senate Minority Leader Rob Hogg, D-Cedar Rapids, said he anticipates Democrats will offer amendments to raise the statewide minimum wage if Republicans bring up House File 295 for consideration.

"I would imagine there are members of the Republican caucus who don't think they should be voting for bills that drive down wages for Iowans," he said.

Gov. Terry Branstad has told reporters he would be open to considering a "modest" increase in the state's minimum wage, but Upmeyer said Thursday "the governor and I have not discussed that topic."

LEE: House panel to launch investigation of child welfare system

James Q. Lynch

Days after Gov. Terry Branstad warned that Democratic prying into state child welfare services could negatively impact a criminal prosecution, a House Republican announced the Government Oversight Committee will launch its own investigation.

Rep. Bobby Kaufmann, R-Wilton, chairman of the Government Oversight Committee, said he doesn't want to interfere with the Polk County Attorney's Office prosecution in the case of Natalie Finn, a 16-year-old West Des Moines girl who died from emaciation last October because of the denial of critical care.

But Kaufmann said told the committee he is exploring the possibility of bringing in the Department of Human Services "to have them walk committee members through the process of how reports for child placement, follow-up, child abuse, or neglect are handled. The committee wants to understand how this process works so that we can look at ways to prevent another tragic situation like the Natalie Finn case.

"We are not interested in politicizing this tragic situation or jeopardizing an ongoing criminal investigation," Kaufmann continued.

DHS spokeswoman Amy McCoy said the department welcomes a discussion with the House panel "about the authority the Legislature provides DHS to investigate allegations, about how our policies and procedures are established, as well as discussing our efforts toward continuous quality improvement,"

Branstad is not happy with the Democrats on the Senate Government Oversight Committee having informal hearings to look into the state's child welfare system. So far, DHS officials have declined to appear to answer questions, they said.

However, as long as they don't jeopardize the prosecution in the Finn case, Branstad also would "support an effort by legislators to learn more information about the overall adoption, child welfare and foster care systems" as DHS, his spokesman Ben Hammes said.

Kaufmann will invite the Senate Government Oversight Committee, chaired by Sen. Michael Breitbach, R-Strawberry Point, to join the investigation.

Advertisement (1 of 1): 0:15

Breitbach wasn't sure if senators will work with the House panel and was hesitant about how deep they could delve into child-welfare issues at this time.

"It's a very delicate situation right now. There is a legal case going on, and the last thing I want to do is interfere with that proceeding and murder trial," Breitbach said.

Bottom of Form

He and Kaufmann agree on that. The investigation should be "thoughtful and prudent" without politicizing the Finn case or being conducted with a "gotcha attitude."

Breitbach seemed to see a more limited scope of investigation than Kaufmann.

"I believe that the DHS has reviewed all of their staffing options over the past years, and I think they feel comfortable with where they're at and the training that they're doing, but otherwise I just can't go further," Breitbach said.

House Speaker Linda Upmeyer, R-Clear Lake, agreed that lawmakers' role is not the criminal investigation, but to look at the system to see if it meets Iowans' needs. House Republicans, she said, are "very interested" in knowing whether the state has an adequate system that serves the needs of Iowa children.

"Our job is the function of state government," House Majority Leader Chris Hagenow, R-Windsor Heights, said. While he wants to see the criminal case proceed, "we also want to look at state government and the overall process that DHS or others have to try to prevent that in the future."

House Government Oversight Committee member Rep. Vicki Lensing, D-Iowa City, suggested inviting law enforcement to explain its role in child welfare cases in order to understand whether there are gaps in the law.

LEE: Fantasy sports wagering advances in Iowa House

JAMES Q. LYNCH

It's unlikely fantasy sports betting will be legal in Iowa before this year's NCAA men's basketball championship, but an Iowa lawmaker is looking ahead to next year.

A bill to legalize fantasy sports betting cleared the House Ways and Means Committee 23-2 Wednesday and will be eligible for full House debate next week.

If representatives approve the bill, which is similar to a version approved by the Senate in the past, Iowans could legally bet on the 2018 NCAA championships as well as other sports events.

The American Gaming Association estimates Americans will wager $10.4 billion on March Madness, a 13 percent increase from 2016.

However, only 3 percent of the money wagered — $295 million — will be wagered legally. The remaining $10.1 billion will go to illegal off-shore websites or through bookies, the association said.

If House Study Bill 52 is approved, wagering on fantasy sports would be legal in Iowa, taxed and regulated by the Iowa Racing and Gaming Commission that oversees gambling and gaming in the state.

Fantasy sports wagering would not be a big payout for Iowa.

Bill manager Rep. Matt Windschitl, R-Missouri Valley, hasn't received a fiscal note on the 2017 version of the bill, but estimated the return could be $250,000 for the Rebuild Iowa Infrastructure Fund and $250,000 for the general fund.

"I'm not doing this for the revenue," he said. "I'm doing this to give Iowans more freedom. To give them the freedom to play, if they want."

According to a 2015 Legislative Services Agency fiscal note, fantasy sports wagering trade association estimated 300,000 Iowans would play daily fantasy sports through an internet fantasy sports contest service provider. It found that in a similarly populated states, participants paid $4.4 million in entry fees and charges. About $4 million was used for cash prizes and payouts.

Bottom of Form

Taxing the adjusted gross receipts would yield somewhere between $33,000 and $578,000 for the state, the Legislative Services Agency concluded.

Although Windschitl is optimistic about passage of House Study Bill 52, House Speaker Linda Upmeyer, R-Clear Lake, joked that the House seems to talk about it every year.

"I suspect the caucus is ready to move that forward," she said.

The way Windschitl sees it, in previous years the Senate approved fantasy sports betting and sent it to the House where no action was taken. In the past, the House has sent a bill to legalize fireworks to the Senate, but nothing happened.

This year, he pointed out, the Senate has approved a fireworks bill, and the House is working on a wagering bill

Muscatine Journal: PROGRESS: Muscatine has high hopes for Branstad's nomination to China

Jan Touney

Community and business leaders look forward to continuing a strong relationship with their Chinese friends in the wake of Iowa Gov. Terry Branstad's nomination by President Donald Trump as U.S. ambassador to China.

Confirmation proceedings have yet to be scheduled in Washington, D.C. Ben Hammes, communications director for Branstad, said there will be no official comment on the process until after the confirmation hearing. Branstad said in January that he was humbled and honored to accept Trump's nomination.

Iowa's exports to China, predominantly agricultural products, have boomed under Branstad's administration. He has long been considered a friend of Chinese President Xi Jinping, dating back from Xi's first visit to the state as a student in 1985, shortly after Branstad took office. The governor has made six trade missions to China.

Tony Joseph, president and founder of Joseph International Freight Service in Muscatine, has been doing business in China for 14 years.

He said Branstad's appointment gives the state of Iowa "a good seeding compared with other states who are vying for Chinese attention," particularly other Midwest states like Michigan and Wisconsin.

"In Muscatine, we also have a great opportunity because of our standing in the Chinese mind," said Joseph, who was chairman of the Muscatine-China Initiatives Committee until fall 2016. He continues as a committee member.

Current committee Chairman Daniel P. Stein, Senior Vice President and Senior Loan Officer at CBI Bank & Trust, said he believes Branstad's position in Beijing will help Muscatine.

"I think as a committee we were obviously excited" by the nomination of Branstad by Trump, Stein said.

Bottom of Form

"It will be a very tough job; the Trump administration wants to rebalance trade," Stein said. "But I'm optimistic. Both countries have so much to lose if they don't deal with each other."

Greg Jenkins, president and CEO of the Greater Muscatine Chamber of Commerce and Industry, said that organization is "looking forward to our governor being in such a prominent position (in China) because he has such a great relationship there."

Sarah Lande, a longtime friend of Branstad's who has been instrumental in Muscatine's relationship with Xi Jinping, said she and her husband, Roger, called Branstad after he visited the president-elect at Trump Tower in December.

"We asked him, 'Well, what do you think about it?'" she said. "I was so excited when President Trump nominated him."

LEE: Some budget areas will get less state money next year

Rod Boshart

Republican legislative leaders believe some budget areas will be getting less money for the fiscal year than begins July 1.

That's due to revised revenue projections that are forcing the governor and lawmakers to temporarily tap reserves to plug a shortfall and then repay the money over the next two years.

"We will be looking at budget reductions, absolutely," said House Speaker Linda Upmeyer, R-Clear Lake. "I suspect every budget will see reductions. I think that's inevitable when we're looking at taking at least $130 million out of the budget from what we had projected earlier."

Downsized fiscal 2018 revenue growth projections — coupled with Iowa's expenditure limitation, the reserve "backfill" — and other issues have significantly shaved the amount of new money legislators have to spend, given that the Legislature and Gov. Terry Branstad already have committed $40 million to K-12 schools and face more Medicaid demands, Upmeyer said.

"We need to keep everything on the table," said Senate Majority Leader Bill Dix, R-Shell Rock. "We can't continue to spread ourselves so thin. The state has had too broad of priorities, and we're making sure we're really focusing in on what Iowans want us to do."

"Bottom line, we're going to do as Iowa families do, and that is not spend more than what the state projections are revenues to come in," Dix added.

Branstad is required to submit revisions to the two-year budget he proposed in January by next Wednesday, Upmeyer said.

After that she expects Republicans will issue spending targets and begin formulating budget plans for fiscal years 2018 and 2019.

Dix and Upmeyer said Republicans' agenda this year still includes a tax reform package that looks at simplifying and streamlining the state's income tax system.

But the House speaker conceded the state's financial situation has posed challenges.

Bottom of Form

"There's no doubt it is much more difficult to imagine how we would move forward with tax reform, perhaps tax cuts, in an environment where we've cutting budgets. We're just going to work through all of it," she said. "People will contemplate how this might be done and, when the opportunity arises, we will have some of the plans in place. There are still opportunities for reform I believe that could very well work anyway."

Dix said tax reform is a key component of the effort to focus on growth, telling reporters "we're not taking our eye off of sensible tax reform that puts Iowa in a better position to attract new investment to our state and keep high-paying jobs here."

Senate Democratic Leader Rob Hogg of Cedar Rapids said he was "very concerned that Iowans will be hurt by budget cuts that will be proposed by the Republican majority."

The state, he said, is "absolutely not" in a position to consider tax cuts that aren't affordable.

“We are very interested in tax reform that modernizes our tax code and helps spur our economy,” he said. “I am not interested in big tax cuts in the guise of tax reform.

“The Branstad-Reynolds’ Republican direction has gotten carried away with tax cuts, and that’s why we’re in the fiscal mess that we today,” he added. “If they go down the route of cutting taxes more, that will make the budget mess even worse.

The Gazette: Iowa wire transfer fee would fund criminal investigations

The House Ways and Means Committee approved adding a 1 percent fee to the cost of wire transfers to raise money for undercover investigations of criminal activity including drugs and human trafficking.

However, Democrats who voted against the bill called it a punitive move that targets the poor who rely on wire transfers to move their money.

House File 494 was approved on a 15-11 party line vote Wednesday night, despite allegations it targets “small Latino grocery stores,” according to Rep. Dave Jacoby, D-Coralville, and amounts to civil asset forfeiture, according to Rep. Mary Wolfe, D-Clinton.

The bill would require non-financial institutions providing wire transfers to charge a fee of 1 percent of the transfer amount. The fee would not be applied to bank transfers, bill pay systems, PayPal or similar operations.

Bill manager Rep. Chip Baltimore, R-Boone, said the state Division of Banking estimated the wire transfers that would be covered by the bill amount to about $3 billion a year. That would generate $30 million a year. However, people using wire transfers could apply for an individual income tax credit equal to the amount of money transfer service fees they paid if they include a valid tax identification number.

Baltimore called it “one piece in the war we have against criminal activity” and said it is modeled on a successful Oklahoma law.

Rep. Todd Prichard, D-Charles City, called it “not fair, not right.”

Wire transfers are likely to be used by low-income people without bank accounts, he said.

“When I prosecuted drug crimes, I noticed a lot of marijuana was wrapped in Saran Wrap. Why not tax Saran Wrap?” he asked.

It’s not the government’s role to “scorn, scold, punish people for being poor,” added Rep. Liz Bennett, D-Cedar Rapids.

Baltimore pointed out wire transfers generally cost more than moving money by money orders or other methods.

The bill also would create a financial crime and wire transmitter fund for the Department of Public Safety to use to investigate indictable financial criminal offenses.

The bill now goes to the full House.

The Gazette: Iowa City metro second-fastest growing in Iowa

New census data show Iowa is gaining people, but at a slower pace than the nation

Both the Iowa City and Cedar Rapids metro areas gained people since 2010, but Iowa City's growth rate far outpaces that of its sister city.

The Iowa City metro, which includes Coralville and North Liberty, was the second-fastest growing in Iowa between July 2010 and July 2016, new Census numbers show.

Here's some more information about Iowa from the new data:

3,134,693 TOTAL

Iowa's total population has continued to rise so far this decade, hitting more than 3.13 million people in 2016.

Even so, the state's growth rate lags behind that of the United States as a whole. The nation's population grew by 4.5 percent from July 2010 to July 2016. Iowa's grew only 2.8 percent.

DES MOINES FASTEST

The Des Moines metro claims the fastest growing population in Iowa. From 2010 to 2016, the central Iowa metro grew by 11 percent to more than 634,700 people.

The rate of change in Iowa City's metro wasn't far behind, however, as it saw population grow 10.4 percent to more than 168,800. Ames and the Omaha-Council Bluffs area grew 8.3 percent and 6.4 percent, respectively.

The Cedar Rapids metro population rose by 3.6 percent to just under 267,800 people.

"We have four economies that are growing relatively rapidly and then you've got, right dead in the middle, Cedar Rapids, which is growing at just a little over half" the average metro growth rate, Iowa State University economist Dave Swenson said.

JOHNSON POSTS GAIN

Des Moines' growth can be tied in part to Dallas County, which includes the western suburbs of Des Moines. When population changes are examined by county, Dallas County grew by 27.8 percent so far this decade. Johnson County took second place in that regard, with a 12 percent growth rate. And Linn County's population grew by about 5 percent in that time period.

73 COUNTIES DECLINE

Although Iowa's overall population has grown, the increase is largely concentrated in the state's urban centers.

Only 26 of Iowa's 99 counties saw their populations increase from 2010 to 2016, an analysis by Gary Krob of the State Data Center shows.

That leaves 73 Iowa counties having lost people so far this decade, continuing a trend Swenson said Iowa has seen since the 1980s.

"What we have is a subset of our metropolitan areas doing really well and then the majority of the next set of cities down are doing poorly," he said. "These regional trade centers are struggling to hold onto their economic potency and their demographic base."

51.8 PERCENT

More than half of Iowa's population lives in just 10 counties, according to Krob's analysis.

Of Iowa's 3.13 million total, 51.8 percent reside in Polk, Linn, Scott, Johnson, Black Hawk, Woodbury, Story, Dubuque, Pottawattamie and Dallas counties. Each of these is part of an Iowa metro, Krob noted.

Business leaders in Iowa often have said they can't fill open job positions due to a lack of qualified applicants. Part of that problem, some have said, is lackluster population growth, especially in rural areas.

The Census numbers released Thursday do not include population changes by specific cities.

The Gazette: Iowa Politics Today: Requiring insurers to cover an autism treatment

FREEDOM TO BINGE: A House Judiciary subcommittee delayed action in a "medical amnesty" bill that would provide legal protection to 911 callers who are under the legal drinking age of 21 but need help in an emergency when underage drinking has taken place.

"No one should have to think about the legal implications of calling for help," Cole Staudt, an Iowa State University student from Rockford, told the subcommittee considering SF 415.

The bill was approved 49-0 in the Senate.

The immunity, similar to laws in 36 other states, Staudt said, would not extend to anyone already the subject of a criminal investigation or under correctional supervision and would not extend to emergencies where illegal drugs were involved. The caller must remain on the scene and cooperate with law enforcement.

Lawmakers are waiting to learn whether the law would put Iowa out of compliance with federal laws regarding the legal drinking age and open containers. If Iowa is not in compliance, it could jeopardize $82 million in transportation funding, said Renee Jerman of the Iowa Department of Transportation.

"That's not a huge concern for us," Staudt said.

Similar amnesty for people who call for emergency assistance in the case of an opioid overdose was stripped out in the Senate. Rep. Mary Wolfe, D-Clinton, said she hoped that could be added in the future.

Rep. Megan Jones, R-Spencer, said the subcommittee will wait to hear from the DOT on the federal funds before deciding whether to send the bill to the full committee.

ADJOURNMENT TARGET: Republicans, who hold majorities in the Iowa House and Iowa Senate, say they are on track to end the 2017 session close to the April 18 adjournment target.

Normally the first session of a General Assembly is scheduled for 110 days of expense money for legislators, but budget cutbacks prompted lawmakers to scale that back by 10 days this year to save money.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Dix, R-Shell Rock, said there still is significant work left to do, which includes crafting a fiscal 2018 state budget. But he expects things to wind down after lawmakers get back the session's second funnel deadline next week

That deadline requires bills to clear one chamber and a committee of the other to remain eligible for consideration this year.

“We want to continue to accomplish the agenda we set out to do and I have the expectation that that can be done within the time frame of the 100 days that have been set out. I would expect us to adjourn some time very near to that 100th day,” he said.

House Speaker Linda Upmeyer, R-Clear Lake, said she is “building my calendar to be done” around the April 18 adjournment target.

HOUSE TRAFFIC ISSUES: House Speaker Linda Upmeyer, R-Clear Lake, was non-committal Thursday on two transportation-related bills approved by the Iowa Senate because her GOP majority members have not discussed them. But she said she expected legislation to further restrict texting while driving would get passed this session.

“We absolutely want to move forward with safety,” she told reporters. “I think there’s an appetite to move something forward.”

Drivers would be able to use their hand-held devices to make phone calls or check GPS directions but could be pulled over by law officers for using them to write, send or view an electronic message under Senate File 234, which cleared the Senate by a 43-6 margin Wednesday.

A House committee has approved a tougher bill that also would make texting a primary offense like the Senate approved. But the House version would ban the use of hand-held devices while driving and would allow a one-year transition period before law officers would switch from issuing warnings to ticketing violators.

Upmeyer said she expected the House GOP caucus to discuss both approaches and choose one or come up with “something different.”

Senators also approved a separate measure to bring traffic cameras under stricter state regulation but not ban them.

Upmeyer said the Senate bill would get committee consideration before next week’s second funnel deadline for bills to pass one chamber and a committee of the other to remain eligible for action this year.

AUTISM TREATMENT: Iowa senators voted 48-0 Thursday to send Gov. Terry Branstad legislation that would require insurance companies to cover a treatment for autism that parents believe can help improve the quality of life for their kids.

House File 215 would require insurance providers to cover applied behavior analysis for children with autism in group coverage plans exceeding 50 employees.

“It will help a lot of people. This is a big day,” said Sen. Bill Anderson, R-Pierson, the bill’s floor manager.

He said the legislation was a positive result of collaboration by many people over a number of years to reach Thursday’s legislative approval.

“This is about more than passing legislation,” said Sen. Amanda Ragan, D-Mason City. “This will impact people’s lives. This will have a huge impact.”

Under the bill, insurance coverage would become available for families with dependents younger than 19 who have been diagnosed with autism spectrum disorder.

SIGNED INTO LAW: Gov. Terry Branstad signed the following seven bills into law Thursday: • House

File 303, relating to notifications made by the commissioner of insurance about the need for a receivership for certain preened sellers and cemeteries.

- House File 372, allowing turns against red lights.
- House File 203, authorizing the use of primary road fund moneys for the secondary road and municipal street systems.
- House File 577, relating to the treatment of Lyme disease or other tick-borne diseases
- Senate File 409, relating to state credit union examinations and boards meetings.
- Senate File 376, relating to disclosure of asbestos bankruptcy trust claims.
- Senate File 357 modifying licensing provisions applicable to electricians and electrical contractors.

QUOTE OF THE DAY: “The public realizes that they have to show their photo ID to get on an airplane, buy a beer or open a checking account. This legislation is common sense.” — Sen. Roby Smith, R-Davenport, in promoting an “election integrity” bill with a provision that would require every voter to present government-issued identification at the poll on Election Day — with four eligible forms that included a photo.

The Gazette: Iowa water hopes not dead yet

So your Iowa Legislature, presented by Sizzler University, may still do something smart and meaty on water quality this year.

Chances remain lean. But even that’s remarkable, considering not so long ago it looked like the nothing-to-see-here caucus had the upper hand. I figured the recent dismissal of the Des Moines Water Works’ lawsuit over polluted farm runoff, which sparked Iowa’s water quality debate, sponged up the last drops of hope.

But then 13 Republicans led by Rep. Bobby Kaufmann, R-Wilton, got behind a push to raise the state sales tax by one-eighth of a cent each year for three years to fill the Natural Resources and Outdoor Recreation Trust Fund. The constitutionally protected fund was created by voters in 2010, but lawmakers have refused to raise the sales tax to fill it.

Kaufmann made headlines before the session by proposing his famous “suck it up, buttercup” bill aimed at universities coddling students shaken by our Trumped election. Maybe this new effort could be called “drink it up, buttercup.”

Fully phased in, the tax would raise $180 million or more for an array of conservation and recreation efforts. The bill, HF 597, filed Monday, says 60 percent must be spent on ag pollution controls inspired by the state’s Nutrient Reduction Strategy. That proportion roughly matches the current trust fund spending plan outlined in state law.

But these are Republicans, after all, so the sales tax increase would be offset by reductions in income tax rates, starting with reductions in the lowest income brackets. Kaufmann says that’s intended to reduce the sting of raising the regressive sales tax.

So far, the bill is supported by a large coalition of groups lobbying lawmakers to fill the trust fund. No groups have yet registered opposition.

“We’ve really been activating the grass roots, a lot of folks who support the cause have been showing up at forums, writing emails, making phone calls,” Kaufmann told me. “I think it’s had an impact on people at the Capitol, creating a buzz for the issue.”

You don’t need to be a Sizzler U grad to know much is at stake. (Sorry.) Cutting the flow of nitrates and phosphorus from farmland pays big dividends in safeguarding drinking water, protecting lakes, reducing soil loss and mitigating flooding. There’s also that big dead zone in the Gulf of Mexico you may have heard about.

Federal agencies watching water are on the verge of Trumpian decimation. Iowa’s tight budget is an argument against income tax cuts, but it’s also an argument for creating protected funding for the environment, which is often first on the chopping block.

Obstacles abound. It’s not certain the bill will even get a committee hearing. Another bill, using unprotected gambling dollars to provide less water funding, is moving first. Kaufmann insists his bill could be coupled with that effort. We’ll see.

Democrats no doubt will balk at tax reductions hitting a general fund already unable to cover needs. Some rural Republicans see no problem and want little or no action. And if the bill does move, a pitched battle over how the money will be spent is likely.

But what looked like a cooling back-burner issue now has some sizzle. A rare bright spot.

The Gazette: Guest View: Developing skills for our innovation economy

Jim Wohlpart is provost and executive vice president for academic affairs at the University of Northern Iowa.

Recently, Gov. Terry Branstad organized the Future Ready Iowa Alliance, chaired by Lieutenant Gov. Kim Reynolds and Dan Houston, CEO of Principal. The focus of the alliance is to address the skills gap in Iowa. The University of Northern Iowa, as a member of the Iowa Campus Compact, is developing unique strategies to fill that gap and to prepare graduates as citizens and professionals for the coming innovation economy.

By 2025, Iowa is expected to add 612,000 jobs to its economy, 68 percent of which will require postsecondary education. Yet there aren’t enough adults with college degrees to fill these jobs. While much of the focus for bridging this gap centers on job training for technical skills, such as coding and data analysis, what we need more than ever are graduates with the core skills to meet workforce and community needs, students who are prepared to create, innovate, and lead change.

The essential skills of the twenty-first century include critical thinking, complex problem-solving, and written and oral communication, and these skills are more important to employers than a student’s major. More recently, surveys have demonstrated that students must not only develop these skills in the classroom, but also apply them in real world settings solving real world problems. Such engaged learning experiences also assist students in developing their curiosity, which leads to lifelong learning and the ability to be adaptable and innovate.

Significantly, the development of these essential skills in applied and engaged settings not only prepares students for professional careers — they also prepare students to meet the public purposes of higher education: to become active and engaged citizens who are invested in their communities and their civic obligations. Instead of pitting career preparation against education for citizenship and democracy, we need to recognize their intrinsic connection. The University of Northern Iowa is working with Iowa Campus Compact to go beyond the lecture hall to help students build these core skills.

One of the more salient engaged learning experiences that students can have is that of an extended service learning project with a nonprofit organization in the community. UNI recently created a summer Service Learning Institute so that faculty members can transform their courses to include a community engaged project. Working with community organizations, students become engaged in the challenges of the "real world" and gain valuable skills in new ways through applying their learning outside of the classroom.

The University of Northern Iowa is committed to expanding these valuable experiences for our students so that they are prepared to innovate, create, and lead change. Students must be prepared for a life that emphasizes their well-being at work, in the community, and at home. Join UNI and Iowa Campus Compact in meeting the civic mission of higher education. QC Times Editorial: Editorial: Students pay for tax cuts

Quad-City Times

Top of Form

Bottom of Form

Basic fairness will die in Appropriations. And Iowa's busted tax policy will kill it.

That's the fate of school equity legislation now sitting in the Iowa House, according to predictions of a half-dozen state lawmakers representing the Quad-Cities. The bipartisan soothsaying late Wednesday and early Thursday put a cloud over what, until now, had been a high-point of the legislative cycle.

The bill passed earlier this month in the state Senate, SF 455, was the "best opportunity yet" for fairness among all public school students in Iowa, Davenport Community School District Superintendent Art Tate told us. For too long, Iowa has touted a grossly unjust funding model where some districts receive more state funding than others. But, as we predicted earlier this week, years of tax cuts, exemptions and corporate welfare has hamstrung Iowa's ability to do much of anything.

And that's the reality faced by proponents of the equity bill, which breezed through the House Education Committee on Wednesday. Now, the $203 million, 10-year package heads to the House Appropriations Committee. And that's where Quad-Cities Reps. Norlin Mommsen, Republican, and Democrats Phyllis Thede and Cindy Winckler -- all committee members -- predicted the legislation's demise, in light of yet another revenue shortfall of more than $100 million.

For their part, all House members surveyed support the bill, at least in concept. Reps. Winckler and Monica Kurth would back it should it ever reach the floor. Republicans Ross Paustian and Gary Mohr, too, would back it in concept. But they just don't see Appropriations freeing up the $14 million needed for its first year.

"It's unfortunate that the Senate rushed a bill over to us without any idea on how to fund it," Paustian said.

So, now what?

The legislation's very existence is a moral victory, some will say. It's an acknowledgement that the system is broken. It's an official recognition that more than 300 districts statewide, including Davenport and Maquoketa, can't compete with their neighbors and, as a result, are further hamstrung by incessant middle class flight and sagging property values, they'll contend.

There can be no moral victory until the structural injustice is undone. Still, Tate would find himself facing career-ending sanctions because of his budgetary protests against an inequitable funding model. His district would continue to live under a mandate that bilks it of $2.4 million every year.

It's possible that lawmakers will forgive Tate's legal transgressions as a consolation prize. Bills kicking around both chambers would legalize the budgetary maneuver he enacted. A simple retroactive provision could clear Tate and salvage his career. That's the least lawmakers could do. In so doing, they'd provide themselves political cover by avoiding a public spat with a respected school official standing on principle.

Bottom of Form

But, as Tate would tell you, this isn't about him. It's about his students.

And that's who, yet again, gets failed by a state that's gutted its revenue to the tune of $12 billion a year through tax hand-outs to special interests.

SF 455 wasn't perfect, which the Democrats will tell you. The decade-long roll-out opens the door for future legislatures to kill it. It was, however, the most politically feasible path forward.

The fact remains, tens of thousands of children in Iowa will continue to be second-class citizens if the bill dies. And it's those students who would pay for the state handouts for the well connected.

RI: Branstad approves new rules for asbestos-related lawsuits

MARCH 24, 2017 BY O. KAY HENDERSON

Governor Terry Branstad has signed a bill into law that changes the rules for Iowans who file asbestos-related lawsuits.

Asbestos causes cancer. In 1989, the federal government banned its use in new products. Backers of the new law say some attorneys are "double-dipping" — finding a way to get two settlements for one injured person — and that depletes resources for people who were exposed to asbestos and need help.

Senator Brad Zaun, Republican from Urbandale, said during Senate debate on the measure that more than 60 companies that made asbestos are out of business, but trust funds have been established to pay cancer victims.

"Ten-thousand people are affected by this disease now," Zaun said. "...The average person is getting a $600,000 settlement and, at 10,000 a year, what we're trying to do here is to preserve that fund for future people who've been affected by these working conditions."

Representative Kirsten Running-Marquardt, a Democrat from Cedar Rapids, said during House debate that people who will be affected by this new law pleaded with legislators to oppose it.

"Iowans went to work, worked hard to provide for their families and they were exposed to a horrible chemical that took years off their life," she said.

Senator Nate Boulton, a Democrat from Des Moines who's a lawyer, said the legislation places a "harsh trap door" under cancer victims who now will face a quick and unusual deadline for filing claims.

"There are real Iowans affected. Exposure that's latent for decades. You're walking around, you have no idea that this time bomb is going to go off," Boulton said. "Are we really here to create an escape hatch for the companies that created this monster?"

Representative Andy McKean, a Republican attorney from Anamosa, said the new law will prioritize claims from patients in the end-stage of cancer.

“This bill does nothing to deprive claimants to receive 100 percent of what they’re entitled to,” McKean said. “...It’s going to help them get their day in court sooner.”

McKean said portions of this law are in effect in other states. Iowa’s new law would not affect the 17 Iowa cases of asbestos exposure making their way through the state’s courts. More than 2000 Iowans have died of asbestos-related cancer since 1999.

RI: Senate Republicans alter House GOP’s ‘voter ID’ plan

MARCH 23, 2017 BY O. KAY HENDERSON

Republicans in the Iowa Senate have put their own stamp on a “voter ID” bill.

The GOP senators have voted to shorten the “early” voting window in Iowa from 40 days down to 29. In addition,

Senate Republicans want precinct workers to check a prospective voter’s signature on a driver’s license or voter ID card to verify the voter’s eligibility. Republican Senator Roby Smith of Davenport said it’s common sense.

“We need to do everything we can to prevent fraud,” Smith said, “and this bill has safeguards.”

Democrats predicted there’ll be longer lines at the polls on Election Day as fewer Iowans will vote early and it’ll take time for precinct workers to evaluate each voter’s signature.

“Rather than making it harder or restricting time frames, we should be making it easier, removing barriers,” said Senator Pam Jochum a Democrat from Dubuque.

All 26 Republican senators present this evening voted for their plan. It would let 17 year olds who’ll turn 18 by Election Day in November vote in the party primaries in June. The bill now goes back to the House for consideration of those Senate changes. House Republicans passed their own “voter ID” proposal back on March 9.

RI: Likely gubernatorial candidate Todd Prichard says Iowa ‘can do better’

A Democrat who’s a 42-year-old veteran of the Iraq War has formed an “exploratory committee” — his first step toward officially launching a campaign for governor. Todd Prichard of Charles City is currently in his fifth year as a state representative.

“I’m discouraged with the focus of our legislative agenda and the Republican leadership right now,” Prichard said during an interview this afternoon, “and I think we need to find a new direction.”

Prichard said his goal as governor would be to help more “regular Iowans” land in the middle class.

“I don’t think that the Branstad Administration and, therefore, Kim Reynolds have addressed the real issues that are affecting Iowans across the state in rural areas and urban areas and that’s really the issue of the family budget and pocketbook issues,” Prichard said.

Prichard pointed to Branstad’s 2010 campaign promise to raise the average income of Iowans by 25 percent.

“That hasn’t happened,” Prichard said. “I’ve never seen an administration fight so hard for low-paying jobs and I think we can do better.”

Prichard is a small town attorney who also had a career in the military. That means his bio is similar to successful statewide candidates like former Governor Tom Vilsack, who was an attorney in Mount Pleasant, and U.S. Senator Joni Ernst, an Iowa National Guard veteran. Prichard is pitching himself as someone who can provide “fresh” leadership for the state.

“I have over 21 years in the Army as an Army officer. I’ve been overseas four times,” Prichard said. “The last time I was the company commander of approximately 200 soldiers with the Iowa National Guard in Iraq and that definitely gives you leadership experience and the experience of taking care of people in tough situations.”

Prichard has assembled a team of advisors with statewide campaign experience and secured the services of key consultants who worked on President Obama’s successful campaigns in Iowa in 2008 and 2012.

A few other Democrats have expressed an interest in running for governor, so Prichard would most likely face a Democratic Primary in June of 2018.

Lieutenant Governor Kim Reynolds will soon take over as governor once her Republican colleague Terry Branstad leaves to serve as U.S. Ambassador to China. Reynolds has already raised more than a million dollars for a race for governor and has signalled she intends to ask next year’s voters to elect her to a four-year term.

RI: Federal agents investigating pipeline vandalism in Northwest Iowa

MARCH 23, 2017 BY RADIO IOWA CONTRIBUTOR

The FBI is investigating vandalism at Dakota Access Pipeline sites in northwest Iowa’s Sioux County.

On Friday, March 17th at 2 p.m., Sioux County Sheriff’s Deputies were dispatched to two locations south of Hospers to check out reports of vandalism to the pipeline. Sometime in the previous 24 hours someone apparently tried to burn holes in the above-ground valves at the two locations. The deputies were able to secure both locations.

The FBI is conducting an investigation into similar incidents at other Dakota Access pipeline locations in Iowa and South Dakota.

RI: House panel to investigate DHS child welfare system

Republican leaders in the Iowa House are launching an investigation “inspired by” the case of a central Iowa teen who died last October of starvation, but House Speaker Linda Upmeyer today said they do not plan to ask direct questions that might jeopardize the criminal case against Natalie Finn’s adoptive mother and the woman’s ex-husband.

“We certainly don’t want to do anything that would prevent the law from dealing with this the way they should,” Upmeyer told reporters during her weekly statehouse news conference. “Now, I think, we are at (time) where we have a responsibility to look at the system and the process.”

The House Government Oversight Committee will conduct the investigation. Committee chairman Bobby Kaufmann, a Republican from Wilton, said the panel will look at how the Department of Human Services handles child abuse and neglect allegations and how the agency follows up after placing a child in foster homes or with adoptive parents.

"I'm not going in with a 'gotcha' attitude," Kaufmann said. "I'm truly looking to understand and for us as a committee to understand how this whole thing works."

The committee may meet into the summer and fall and could make recommendations for some sort of legislative action according to Kaufmann. The goal, he said, is to prevent tragedies like Finn's from happening in the future.

"I don't think it's unusual for us to make sure that there's not a systemic problem in any department where there've been resulting issues," Kaufmann said.

A few Democrats have been pressing for an investigation of the Department of Human Services since January and accusing Governor Branstad of trying to "cover up" inadequate staffing levels in the state agency that handles reports of child abuse. Kaufmann today accused Democratic Senator Matt McCoy of politicizing the issue and walking a "thin line" that could hurt the prosecution's case against Finn's adoptive parents by revealing too much information to the public. Democrats on Kaufmann's committee in the House say they're glad Republicans are finally showing an interest in investigating the DHS.

"There's a huge issue here and these are our kids we're talking about here, so however it's being investigated, it needs to be investigated," said Representative Abby Finenauer, a Democrat from Dubuque.

The Republican leader of the Oversight Committee in the Iowa Senate this is a "delicate situation" and the Department of Human Services "has reviewed all of their staffing options...and feel comfortable with where they're at and the training they're doing." It's unclear whether Senate Republicans will join the House investigation.

Governor Branstad on Monday warned legislators against investigating the agency until after the criminal case against Finn's alleged tormentors has concluded. That runs counter to a previous House and Senate Oversight Committee investigation which probed mispending in a state agency before the successful criminal case against the agency's manager had concluded.

RI: Report details impact of new Prestage pork processing plant

Creighton University economics professor Ernie Goss presented the findings last night of a comprehensive report on the financial impact of the major new pork processing plant that will be built in northern Iowa.

Goss spoke in the Hamilton County town of Stanhope on the pros and cons of the $246 million Prestage Farms plant that's planned south of Eagle Grove. "There's an increase in the first year of operations of about $45-million in state and local tax collections," Goss says. "There are costs as well. You've got to increase hiring of teachers, there'll be school costs, there'll be highway costs."

Overall, Goss says there will be a net gain from the plant going online, saying state and local tax collections will be greater than the costs. The report says the plant will increase the price of hogs by 3.5 percent. The estimated average added revenue is expected to be $724 per farm in the 10-county north-central Iowa area. It's also estimated the plant will support 193 packer and non-packer farms. Goss says employment is another key factor.

"Direct jobs, you're talking about at least on the first shift, 900 to 1,000 jobs at the facility itself," Goss says. “When you take into account the spill-over jobs in the 10-county area, you’re in the neighborhood of 3,500 total jobs, so that’s quite significant.” Goss says the report also covered the impact on school districts in the area, at a time when many schools are closing or consolidating.

“For a lot of school districts, it’s going to be welcome news to have more students rather than fewer students,” Goss says, “but the overall cost is about, we estimate, $21-million per year, and that cost is borne by some federal dollars, some state dollars, and of course, local dollars.”

The ten counties considered in the report are: Calhoun, Franklin, Hamilton, Hardin, Humboldt, Kossuth, Palo Alto, Pocahontas, Webster and Wright. Construction is set to begin this spring and may take 18 to 21 months. Goss will make another presentation this afternoon at 4:30 at Robert Blue Middle School in Eagle Grove, with presentations next week in Fort Dodge and Humboldt.

The complete report will be posted next week on the Mid Iowa Growth Partnership website.

Fox News: Potential 'smoking gun' showing Obama administration spied on Trump team, source says

Republican congressional investigators expect a potential “smoking gun” establishing that the Obama administration spied on the Trump transition team, and possibly the president-elect himself, will be produced to the House Intelligence Committee this week, a source told Fox News.

Classified intelligence showing incidental collection of Trump team communications, purportedly seen by committee Chairman Devin Nunes, R-Calif., and described by him in vague terms at a bombshell Wednesday afternoon news conference, came from multiple sources, Capitol Hill sources told Fox News. The intelligence corroborated information about surveillance of the Trump team that was known to Nunes, sources said, even before President Trump accused his predecessor of having wiretapped him in a series of now-infamous tweets posted on March 4.

The intelligence is said to leave no doubt the Obama administration, in its closing days, was using the cover of legitimate surveillance on foreign targets to spy on President-elect Trump, according to sources.

The key to that conclusion is the unmasking of selected U.S. persons whose names appeared in the intelligence, the sources said, adding that the paper trail leaves no other plausible purpose for the unmasking other than to damage the incoming Trump administration.

The FBI hasn’t been responsive to the House Intelligence Committee’s request for documents, but the National Security Agency is expected to produce documents to the committee by Friday. The NSA document production is expected to produce more intelligence than Nunes has so far seen or described – including what one source described as a potential “smoking gun” establishing the spying.

Some time will be needed to properly assess the materials, with the likely result being that congressional investigators and attorneys won’t have a solid handle on the contents of the documents – and their implications – until next week.

Because Nunes’s intelligence came from multiple sources during a span of several weeks, and he has not shared the actual materials with his committee colleagues, he will be the only member of the panel in a position to know whether the NSA has turned over some or all of the intelligence he is citing. However, Fox News was told Intelligence Committee Ranking Member Rep. Adam Schiff, D-Calif., had been briefed on the basic contents of the intelligence described by Nunes.

CIA Director Mike Pompeo is also sympathetic to the effort to determine, with documentary evidence, the extent of any alleged Obama administration spying on the Trump team, sources said.

At a dramatic Wednesday news conference, Nunes claimed to have seen evidence that members of the Trump transition team, possibly including the president-elect, were subjected to “incidental surveillance” collection that Nunes characterized as legal but troubling.

“What I've read bothers me,” he told reporters, “and I think it should bother the president himself, and his team because I think some of it seems to be inappropriate.”

Schiff blasted Nunes for not coming first to the Intelligence Committee with the information.

“If accurate, this information should have been shared with members of the committee, but it has not been,” Schiff said in a Wednesday statement.

POLITICO: Trump demands Friday vote on health care plan

If the House rejects the GOP plan, the president says, Obamacare will stay.

By RACHAEL BADE, KYLE CHENEY and JOSH DAWSEY

President Donald Trump is demanding a vote Friday in the House on the Republican plan to repeal and replace Obamacare, White House budget director Mick Mulvaney told GOP lawmakers. If the bill fails, Trump is prepared to move on and leave Obamacare in place, Mulvaney warned.

The surprise announcement by the top White House official — made with the full support of Speaker Paul Ryan (R-Wis.) and other House GOP leaders — came during a closed-door meeting of Republicans Thursday evening in the basement of the Capitol.

Mulvaney, a member of the House until a few weeks ago who now heads the Office of Management and Budget, said Trump was done negotiating and wanted an up-or-down vote now.

The move by Trump and Ryan is an enormous gamble, setting up a real cliffhanger when the legislation hits the floor on Friday.

All day Thursday, the White House and GOP leaders lacked the votes to pass the American Health Care Act. A loss on the House floor would be a glaring embarrassment for the new president and House speaker — one that could undermine other parts of the GOP legislative agenda, including tax reform.

A victory, on the other hand, would provide not just a shot of badly-needed momentum for both men, but undermine the House Freedom Caucus, the group of conservative hard-liners who've fought the GOP health care plan because it doesn't go far enough.

The group's opposition was seen as a public rebuke to both the White House and House GOP leadership. If the the Freedom Caucus loses to Trump and Ryan, its power will be curtailed. If it wins, the group will once again be able to dictate terms to party leaders.

Yet this is the showdown that many mainstream GOP rank-and-file members have sought. They want a fight out in the open with the Freedom Caucus — either the group votes against Trump, or it gives in.

Negotiations between Trump and the Freedom Caucus hit an impasse earlier Thursday its members were told recent concessions from the White House and GOP leadership represented a final offer. The group rejected that, wanting more.

The setbacks triggered another series of meetings later Thursday — between Trump and the moderate Tuesday Group, and separately between the Freedom Caucus and Ryan. That was followed by a full GOP Conference meeting where Trump played his trump card.

Trump and Ryan had found themselves playing see-saw with moderates and hard-liners: Lean too much toward one faction and they lose votes from the other. So far, they've been unable to find a sweet spot.

Ryan can afford to lose only 22 votes on the floor. The Freedom Caucus has three dozen members, many of whom have vowed to block the bill unless they get what they want. More than a dozen centrist Republicans have also come out against the bill, further endangering its prospects.

But the Trump-Ryan gambit may pay off. Freedom Caucus Chairman Mark Meadows (R-N.C.) said the move by Trump and Ryan "certainly does" put enormous pressure on the Freedom Caucus to get behind the bill. And already a handful sounded like their positions were softer than they had been before.

Rep. Trent Franks (R-Ariz.), who said he remains undecided, added that efforts by the Freedom Caucus had "improved the bill." Rep. Mark Sanford (R-S.C.) said members will feel more pressure to vote "yes" with the bill on the floor, even if they may have felt comfortable opposing it before. Sanford said he was undecided.

Rep. Scott DesJarlais (R-Tenn.) was a "no" but is now undecided.

"I've got to decide whether this is best for my district and best for the president and best for my country. And I'm not convinced it will bend the cost curve down... but it may be as good as it gets on this one," DesJarlais said.

"We get elected to make votes, and this is a big vote," added Rep. Joe Barton (R-Texas), a Freedom Caucus member who supports the bill and called it "the right thing to do."

"I think it passes," he added.

GOP Rep. Tom Reed (R-N.Y.) said Mulvaney "put it completely in focus. The moment is now. Do we advance the cause so we can move forward and move on and accomplish what we said we would and repeal and replace Obamacare ... and also tax reform? It's a major test, and we're gonna pass that test tomorrow."

"If we vote it down, we will neuter Donald Trump's presidency ... We are not going to undermine the president's ability to get things done," Rep. Dana Rohrabacher told reporters after the meeting.

A senior administration official in the room for the Freedom Caucus meeting at the White House said most members left the meeting as "no's" but suggested some flipped to "yes." While Trump did not go around the room and ask people how they would vote, it became immediately clear GOP leaders did not appear to win over enough members to put the measure over the top.

"We're down right now," the official said.

Freedom Caucus chairman Mark Meadows (R-N.C.) told reporters in the Capitol Thursday afternoon that "we have not gotten enough of our members to get to yes at this point. ... However, I would say progress is being made." He called Trump's engagement in the negotiations perhaps "unparalleled in the history of our country."

There were daunting obstacles to a deal heading into the White House meeting Thursday morning. A number of Freedom Caucus members had suggested Trump's latest concession — repealing Obamacare's mandate that insurance plans provide a minimum level of "essential" benefits — wasn't enough. The group wants a complete repeal of all Affordable Care Act regulations — including popular provisions Trump promised he would maintain.

The conservatives' target list encompasses a prohibition against discriminating against people with pre-existing conditions and a requirement that adults up to age 26 can remain on their parents' health insurance.

"Repealing [essential health benefits], w/out making other substantial changes, would make the bill worse, not better," tweeted Freedom Caucus member Justin Amash (R-Mich.). "It would hurt the sickest people on exchanges."

The Freedom Caucus has been a constant thorn in the side of House GOP leadership, sinking bills its members believe were too accommodating to Democrats. The group was expected to fall in line behind Trump after he won, but it has refused to do so on the health care bill.

Now, Freedom Caucus members are threatening to trip up not John Boehner or Ryan, but a Republican commander-in-chief who remains highly popular in their districts.

Many House Republicans are furious with the Freedom Caucus, saying the group keeps moving the goal posts and that it really wants to sink the health care bill altogether.

"The president is good at negotiating, but he has to have someone who wants to get to yes," Rep. Mike Kelly (R-Pa.), an ardent Trump supporter, told POLITICO. "I was never able to sell a car or a truck to someone who didn't want a car or a truck. It just doesn't work. And that's where we are right now. I don't think they're really interested in getting to an 'end.'"

Kelly then added: "Maybe the 'end' is: making sure it doesn't pass."

POLITICO: Schumer prepared to force nuclear showdown over Gorsuch

The Senate minority leader is confident his party will not provide the eight votes needed to break a filibuster.

Chuck Schumer is prepared to push the Senate into a nuclear confrontation over the Supreme Court.

In an extensive interview with POLITICO Thursday, the Senate minority leader made his most definitive statement to date that Democrats will deny Neil Gorsuch the 60 votes he needs to clear a Senate filibuster and ascend to the Supreme Court. Dismissing the notion of a deal to confirm Gorsuch floated by some members of his caucus this week, Schumer all but declared that Donald Trump's nominee will not receive the requisite eight Democratic votes — and that it will be up to Majority Leader Mitch McConnell as to whether to try to blow up the filibuster to get Gorsuch through.

"There's been an almost seismic shift in the caucus [against Gorsuch]," Schumer said as the Senate Judiciary confirmation hearings wrapped up Thursday. "He did not win anybody over with his testimony."

If Schumer stops Gorsuch during a filibuster vote in early April — and the New Yorker was brimming with confidence that he will — it will almost certainly force McConnell's hand on the so-called nuclear option. Schumer is betting McConnell does not have the votes to do away with the 60-vote requirement for Supreme Court nominees.

"I don't think it's a foregone conclusion that Mitch McConnell changes the rules," Schumer said. "There are people in his caucus who really don't want to change the rules, OK?"

Blocking Gorsuch would be a major win for the left. Liberal activists have been urging Schumer to do everything in his power to stop Trump's pick, even as Senate Democrats have struggled to mount a case against him.

But a battle that potentially brings about the end of the filibuster for Supreme Court nominees would further erode the Senate's character as the more deliberative chamber of the legislative branch. And it would have dramatic consequences for both political parties.

Supreme Court selections would no longer need bipartisan buy-in, possibly resulting in more ideologically extreme justices. And in general, the two parties in the Senate would have one less occasion to cooperate. The partisan food fight over Trump's Cabinet nominees — facilitated by Democrats' move to eliminate the filibuster for those votes in 2013 — offered a possible preview.

While longtime Republicans hope to avoid a rules change, they're ready to respond to Schumer by gutting the filibuster if that's what it takes. McConnell himself has guaranteed Gorsuch's confirmation. He has explicitly declined to rule out changing the rules via a party-line vote, also known as the "nuclear option."

Schumer said the "onus" will be on McConnell if the filibuster is further diluted. The majority leader's office declined to comment for this story.

McConnell can lose only two members on a vote to alter Senate rules. Some of the Republicans long thought to be most resistant to such a move sound increasingly likely to back their leader in such a showdown.

Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) has vowed to do "whatever it takes" to get Gorsuch confirmed. However, his friend, Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) said it was "too early" to talk about.

"We'll see if we can get eight Democratic votes," McCain said Thursday.

While many Democrats are still assessing Gorsuch after four days of hearings this week, sources within the caucus said Thursday that the high court nominee appears increasingly likely to fall short of 60 votes. They attribute that to pressure from liberals, who blasted Democrats after POLITICO reported this week that some Democrats are mulling a deal with Republicans to confirm Gorsuch and preserve the filibuster for a subsequent nomination.

"Every nominee is extremely important. This is such a powerful position," Schumer said. "I will make the argument with all the members why I think he's bad. Everyone can make up their own mind, but I'll do what I can."

It's Schumer's first major test of his vote-whipping skills after serving for years as consigliere to former Democratic Leader Harry Reid of Nevada for years. No Democrat so far has announced support for Gorsuch. To the contrary, the nominee lost two critical swing votes on Thursday: Sens. Bob Casey of Pennsylvania and Tom Carper of Delaware.

For Democrats, beating Gorsuch is as much about payback for the stalled nomination of Merrick Garland as it is about objections to his judicial record.

Republicans are incensed that Schumer is leading the Democratic caucus into a new phase of the nominations war.

Schumer is "a good legislator," Senate Judiciary Chairman Chuck Grassley said, but "your good wisdom gets clouded" serving in leadership.

"So I don't really know what's up based on the performance of this guy for 22 hours," Grassley said of Gorsuch. "It's going to be hard for people to want to vote against him, and I wonder if this threat of a filibuster isn't a smokescreen."

Schumer has also pushed for a delay in the confirmation process, given the ongoing FBI investigation into possible collusion between the Trump campaign and Russia. The move was cheered by liberal groups.

But Schumer's tactics aren't shared by some Democrats who remain undecided on Gorsuch. Sen. Joe Manchin of West Virginia appears highly uncomfortable with blocking Gorsuch.

Virginia Sen. Tim Kaine, the party's vice presidential nominee last year, said he would "decide over the weekend" how he would vote on the judge. A potential change to Senate rules is the domain of leadership, he added, "so I don't think that's going to affect my view of his candidacy on the merits."

Sen. Jon Tester (D-Mont.), a swing vote who faces reelection in a state Trump won, said that the FBI-related concern is "Chuck's view," not his.

"I'm going to take a look at the hearing and read some of his opinions, as many as I possibly can, and will make it based off of that, not off of FBI investigations," Tester said in an interview, adding that he expects to "hash out a decision sometime next week."

Beyond Manchin, Kaine and Tester, at least 10 other Democrats have yet to weigh in on a potential filibuster of Gorsuch. Sens. Michael Bennet of Colorado, Amy Klobuchar of Minnesota, Angus King (I-Maine), Claire McCaskill of Missouri, and Mark Warner of Virginia declined to answer questions about the nominee on Thursday.

Also considered potential gets for the Gorsuch nomination, at least on opposing a filibuster, are Democratic Sens. Chris Coons of Delaware, a member of the Judiciary Committee; Sen. Maggie Hassan of New Hampshire, who met with the nominee last month; and three others who face reelection battles next year: Sens. Joe Donnelly of Indiana, Bill Nelson of Florida and Heidi Heitkamp of North Dakota.

Schumer didn't entirely rule out that Gorsuch could prevail. The minority leader said it would be "difficult to get 60 votes after his testimony went as poorly as it did," a characterization of Gorsuch's performance that not everyone shared.

But Schumer is now being explicit that he wants his members to side with him in opposition. And he doesn't think it will be difficult to get them to go along.

"It's not hard these days," Schumer said. "We're doing very well. And [Gorsuch] helped us by being poor with his hearings."

Roll Call: That's a wrap: Gorsuch hearings conclude, Senate Democrats ponder filibuster

With Judge Neil Gorsuch's Supreme Court confirmation hearings wrapping up, senators will soon confront whether his nomination will upend Senate rules.

Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell has not yet said whether he would move to change Senate rules that currently require 60 votes to end debate on Gorsuch's nomination. If eight members of the Democratic caucus do not join the 52 Republicans to move the nomination forward, McConnell could move to change the rules, lowering the threshold to a simple majority.

At his regularly scheduled Tuesday press conference with his leadership team, McConnell did not directly address whether he would do so. But he did question whether a Democratic blockade of Gorsuch would signal a broader issue for future high court nominees.

"I haven't seen a single Democrat, unless there's one you've observed, indicate they were prepared to either vote for cloture or to vote for him,” the Kentucky Republican said.

“Leading you to ask the following question: If Judge Gorsuch can’t achieve 60 votes in the Senate, could any judge appointed by a Republican president be approved with 60 or more votes in the Senate?” McConnell said.

That suggestion — that a blockade of Gorsuch could mean an indefinite vacancy — could set up the GOP argument for changing the procedural rules to end debate. McConnell could invoke the so-called nuclear option, a procedural gambit to change the Senate rules by a majority vote rather than two-thirds of senators.

“It does sound like he’s laying the groundwork for the nuclear option,” Senate Minority Whip Richard J. Durbin said of McConnell. “Let’s wait and see how this evolves.”

Some Republicans have acknowledged that changing the Senate rules would not be their first choice. Keeping the 60-vote threshold typically ensures nominees have bipartisan support. But Republicans are preparing to blame Democrats for forcing their hands.

“I think we ought to take it one step at a time, and before we threaten anything, we ought to see how (Democrats) act,” said Arizona Sen. John McCain.

Utah Sen. Orrin G. Hatch, a senior Judiciary member, said he was not in favor of the nuclear option “except as a last resort.”

“And I would hope that the Democrats won’t require that,” he added.

That last straw could come after a failed cloture vote on Gorsuch’s nomination, according to Senate Majority Whip John Cornyn.

“We’re hoping that the Democrats will agree to an up-or-down vote. What happens is really in their hands,” the Texas Republican said in a brief interview. “We’ll have a cloture vote and see how the Democrats vote.”

When Senate Democrats changed the procedural rules for most judicial nominees and executive nominations in November 2013, Republicans seethed and accused Democrats of breaking the rules and changing the chamber for the worse.

“Let me say, we are not interested in having a gun put to our head any longer. If you think this is in the best interests of the Senate and the American people to make advice and consent, in effect, mean nothing — obviously, you can break the rules to change the rules to achieve that,” McConnell said on the floor at the time.

Cloture votes rarely occur on Supreme Court nominations, but Democrats are signaling one will happen for Gorsuch.

“I believe we need 60 votes,” Senate Minority Leader Charles E. Schumer said at a Tuesday press conference. “Any one member can ask for 60 votes. It’s going to happen.”

If Republicans fail to get 60 votes to shut off debate, invoking cloture, that would set up a scenario similar to when Democrats eliminated the filibuster for most nominees in 2013. Then-Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid moved to reconsider a failed cloture vote on a D.C. Circuit judicial nominee, which set off the procedural steps that led to the effective rule change.

As the most senior GOP senator, Hatch would likely be in the presiding officer’s chair if Republicans invoked the nuclear option.

Asked Wednesday if he was prepared to do what would be necessary to ensure Gorsuch is confirmed, Hatch said, "Yeah, I'm prepared."

Cornyn said holding a cloture vote on Gorsuch's nomination may pressure some vulnerable Senate Democrats to vote in favor of ending debate.

"I actually think it would be good to put (Democrats) on record because I think there's a number of them that are vulnerable in red states in 2018," he said. "My hope is that they will see it in their self-interest to go ahead and allow for cloture."

Those Democrats in Republican-leaning states are facing pressure from outside groups to support Gorsuch. The Judicial Crisis Network, a conservative group that has been spearheading an ad campaign supporting his nomination, has spent more than $3.4 million in Indiana, Missouri, Montana, North Dakota and West Virginia. Each of those states have a Democratic senator up for re-election in 2015.

The network's chief counsel Carrie Severino said Democrats would "lay the groundwork for gridlock" if they block Gorsuch's nomination.

Asked if the outside groups would ramp up pressure on those Democratic senators after the hearings end, Severino said, "We'll have to decide our strategy based on what Democrats decide to do after the hearing."

Democrats are also facing pressure from the more liberal wing of their party to filibuster Gorsuch's nomination. Liberal groups recently launched a campaign dubbed "The People's Defense," warning that Democrats will be held accountable for their votes.

Some Democrats expressed concern that Republicans could invoke the nuclear option, damaging Senate operations. But they also say Republicans would be responsible for the consequences.

"It would be a huge mistake for Republicans to force this nomination through because they can't get consensus," Connecticut Sen. Christopher S. Murphy said. "I don't think we can calculate our strategy based on the potential that they might use the nuclear option. They're going to do that or not do that based on their own politics."

POLITICO: Friedman confirmed as U.S. ambassador to Israel

By NAHAL TOOSI

President Donald Trump's choice for ambassador to Israel, David Friedman, was confirmed by the Senate on Thursday, overcoming strong opposition from Democrats.

Friedman was approved 52-46 in a roll call vote, an unusual step. U.S. ambassadors to Israel, a country that has long enjoyed strong bipartisan support in Congress, have traditionally been approved by voice vote or through unanimous consent.

Friedman, an Orthodox Jew with no diplomatic experience, was previously Trump's bankruptcy lawyer. In the past, he's downplayed the importance of a two-state solution to the Middle East conflict and raised funds for Israeli settlements built on land claimed by the Palestinians.

He's also used extreme language, accusing the State Department of anti-Semitism and comparing left-leaning Jewish activists to "kapos" — a reference to Jews assigned by Nazis to oversee prisoners at concentration camps.

But during his confirmation hearing, Friedman apologized for his past rhetoric and pledged to uphold U. S. policy, whatever that may prove to be under Trump.

While the president has said he'd be comfortable with either a one-state or two-state solution, others in his administration insist the U.S. remains committed to the two-state approach. So far, the Trump administration appears to view continued Israeli settlement construction as detrimental to the Israeli-Palestinian peace process.

Republicans appear willing to accept Friedman's apologies and assurances that he would take his responsibilities as a U.S. ambassador seriously. "David Friedman has the skills and experience to represent the United States in one of the most complex regions in the world," GOP Sen. David Perdue of Georgia said in a statement after Friedman was confirmed.

Several Democrats spoke on the floor against his nomination. "We should not risk confirming him to this important post. We have seen how distracting and destructive hot-headedness is in the seat of power," said Sen. Tom Udall of New Mexico.

One key question Friedman will face upon taking his new position involves the location of the U.S. Embassy in Israel. Conservative pro-Israel groups want the Embassy moved from Tel Aviv to the contested city of Jerusalem. Such a move would anger many in the Arab world. Friedman reportedly has said he would live in Jerusalem as ambassador.

REUTERS: U.S. State Department to approve Keystone pipeline permit on Friday: sources

The U.S. State Department plans to approve on Friday the permit needed to proceed with construction of the Canada-to-United States Keystone XL oil pipeline, a project blocked by former President Barack Obama, according to two government sources familiar with the process.

White House spokesman Sean Spicer said the administration would provide an update on Keystone on Friday but did not offer any details.

Two government sources, who declined to be identified, said on Thursday that the pipeline approval would be announced by the White House.

One of the sources said the State Department was working to get the approval completed before Monday, the end of the 60-day timeline under Trump's January executive order for the construction of Keystone and the Dakota Access pipelines.

The move would mark the beginning of a process that could be lengthy. Approvals are needed from state regulators, and the project could face legal challenges.

But Republican President Donald Trump supports Keystone and, days after he took office in January, ordered its construction. That could mean the project, proposed in 2008, will eventually be completed.

The State Department's undersecretary for political affairs, Tom Shannon, is expected approve the cross-border permit for TransCanada Corp's pipeline since Secretary of State Rex Tillerson, the former CEO of ExxonMobil, recused himself from the matter.

The multi-billion dollar Keystone pipeline would bring more than 800,000 barrels-per-day of heavy crude from Canada's oil sands to U.S. refineries and ports along the Gulf of Mexico, via an existing pipeline network in Nebraska.

Obama had rejected the pipeline saying it would do nothing to reduce fuel prices for U.S. motorists and would contribute emissions linked to global warming.

TransCanada resubmitted its permit application after Trump's executive order. Spokesman Terry Cunha said the company was working closely with the State Department.

"Monday is the deadline, so that's what we're working towards," Cunha said.

Conservatives said they supported quick approval. Nick Loris, an energy and environment researcher at the Heritage Foundation, said approval would "reestablish some certainty and sanity to a permitting process that was hijacked by political pandering."

Environmental groups said they had been prepared for the approval and vowed Thursday to fight the pipeline at every turn with petitions, political pressure and mass protests.

"The same communities who defeated this pipeline before - indigenous leaders, landowners, farmers and grassroots activists - are ready to fight again," said May Boeve, director of activist group 350.org.

Diana Best, a Greenpeace climate campaign specialist said, "We will resist these projects with our allies across the country and across borders."

FURTHER HURDLES

A stretch of Keystone XL also awaits approval from Nebraska regulators. TransCanada has to file its pipeline route plans with the state's Public Service Commission, which is required to hold public hearings on the proposal.

Keystone's construction costs could be higher than the $7 billion estimated after it was first proposed, said Michael Wojciechowski, vice president of Americas oil and refining markets research at Wood Mackenzie.

"Final costs are still to be determined, but they have done nothing but go up over time," he said.

Still, there could also be some savings on labor given recent layoffs due to the recent oil price drop, he said.

REUTERS: U.S.-Israeli teen arrested in Israel for Jewish center bomb threats

A teenager with dual Israeli-U.S. citizenship was arrested in Israel on Thursday on suspicion of making dozens of hoax bomb threats against Jewish community centers in the United States, Australia and New Zealand.

The suspect, whose identity remains sealed pursuant to a court order, is 18, Jewish and a dual U.S.-Israeli national, a police spokesman said.

The teenager's alleged motives were not immediately clear.

At a court hearing near Tel Aviv, the suspect's defense attorney, Galit Bash, said the young man has a growth in his head that causes behavioral problems. She later told Reuters he has a brain tumor, which "may affect his behavior, his ability to understand right and wrong," and said the teen's father had also been held in connection with the case.

U.S. federal authorities have been investigating a surge of threats against Jewish organizations, including more than 100 bomb threats in separate waves over the past three months targeting Jewish community centers (JCCs) in dozens of states.

The threats prompted criticism of U.S. President Donald Trump for what some Jewish groups saw as an inadequate response from his administration. He condemned the incidents in a major speech to Congress in February.

U.S. Attorney General Jeff Sessions on Thursday said the arrest reflected the government's determination to prosecute those who perpetrate hate crimes.

"... we will not tolerate the targeting of any community in this country on the basis of their religious beliefs," Sessions said in a statement.

Israeli police said the teenager is believed to be responsible for most of the threats, though the precise number was not immediately clear.

The suspect, who is accused of targeting centers in Australia and New Zealand as well as the United States, began making the calls in January using advanced masking technologies to hide his identity, police said.

Authorities also said he was responsible for a previous bomb threat against a Delta Airlines flight in January 2015 at New York's John F. Kennedy International Airport.

The Federal Bureau of Investigation, which took part in the probe, confirmed the arrest but declined to offer further details.

The threats forced the evacuation of many JCCs, including some with day care and school facilities for infants and young children. Coupled with other incidents such as the desecration of Jewish cemeteries, they have stoked fears of a resurgence in anti-Semitism in the United States.

In a statement, the president of the JCC Association of North America said JCC leaders were "troubled" the teenager appears to be Jewish.

The Anti-Defamation League, which fights anti-Semitism in the United States, said the alleged perpetrator's actions mattered more than his background.

"While the details of this crime remain unclear, the impact of this individual's actions is crystal clear: these were acts of anti-Semitism," the organization said in a statement.

Bash said her client was home-schooled and incapable of holding down a job. She added he had been found medically unfit for Israel's compulsory military service.

A judge ruled that he be held for at least eight more days.

U.S. authorities previously made one other arrest in connection with the threats. Juan Thompson, a former journalist from St. Louis, is accused of making several threats to Jewish organizations while posing as an ex-girlfriend as part of a revenge plot against her.

REUTERS: U.S. senators set bipartisan bill to tighten sanctions on Iran

Iran would face tighter U.S. sanctions over ballistic missile launches and other non-nuclear activities under a bill announced on Thursday by a bipartisan group of senators, echoing a harder line on Tehran espoused by Republican President Donald Trump.

The bill has seven Republican and seven Democratic sponsors, and aides said it has a good chance of eventually becoming law.

It would set mandatory sanctions for anyone involved with Iran's ballistic missile program. And it would apply sanctions to the Islamic Revolutionary Guard Corps (IRGC), putting into law sanctions imposed via executive order on individuals tied to what the bill's sponsors describe as Iranian support for terrorism.

The IRGC, an elite military body, is powerful in Iranian politics and the economy.

The legislation would also require the U.S. president to block the property of any person or entity involved in specific activities that violate the U.N. arms embargo on Iran.

Iran has suggested about past proposed sanctions bills that they would violate the international nuclear agreement reached during the administration of former President Barack Obama.

Democratic Senator Robert Menendez, a co-author of the measure, told Reuters the new bill had been written not to interfere with that accord.

"We assiduously worked to make sure that no provisions actually affect the agreement as it is," he said in an interview.

Aides said the bill is expected to pass the Senate because of the breadth of its support. Its lead sponsors include Republican Senator Bob Corker, the foreign relations committee chairman, and Ben Cardin, the panel's ranking Democrat.

TRUMP WANTS HARD LINE ON IRAN

While the legislation would be expected to have strong Republican support, it would also need Democrats' backing to advance in the Senate. To become law, the measure would also have to get through the House of Representatives and be signed by Trump.

Trump has made clear he wants to take a tough stance against Iran. Aides to Corker did not immediately respond when asked whether the senator had been consulting with the Trump administration.

In February, the Trump administration imposed sanctions on 25 individuals and entities in Iran, which it said were just "initial steps" in its effort to counteract what it sees as provocations.

Tehran has angered Washington by supporting Yemen's rebel Houthi movement, and Syrian President Bashar al-Assad in his country's six-year-long civil war. It has also conducted repeated tests of ballistic missile technology in violation of a U.N. resolution.

Menendez said the bill was intended to take a "regional" strategy because of the breadth of Iran's activities.

"It calls for a regional strategy because Iran is obviously involved in the region in various ways, whether it be in Yemen or Syria and beyond," he told Reuters.

Chairman says investigation was prompted by Finn's case, but analysis of DHS practices will be more broad

BRIANNE PFANNENSTIEL

BPFANNENST@DMREG.COM

A legislative oversight committee will begin formally investigating child welfare practices that may have contributed to the death of Natalie Finn, a 16-year-old who was found neglected and starving in her West Des Moines home despite previous visits from police and state workers.

"The committee wants to understand how this process works so we can look at ways to prevent another tragic situation like the Natalie Finn case," said Rep. Bobby Kaufmann, R-Wilton and chair of the House Government Oversight Committee, which is leading the investigation. "We are not interested in politicizing this tragic situation or jeopardizing an ongoing criminal investigation."

Recently unsealed court documents revealed that medics found Finn wearing an adult diaper and lying in her own waste on the floor of her bare bedroom Oct. 24. She was unresponsive and later died after being transported to a hospital. The Polk County medical examiner's office found she had died of emaciation after being denied critical care.

Police reports show that child welfare workers had been called to the house five months before Finn's death to investigate concerns that she had been begging for food and showed other signs of abuse.

Legislative leaders said they want to know whether problems that exist within the Department of Human Services, which oversees child abuse complaints, could allow cases like Finn's to fall through the cracks. Kaufmann said the investigation is inspired by Finn's case, but he said the panel does not plan to investigate Finn's case specifically.

"I don't believe it's my role as oversight chair, as a legislator or as a person to say I know more than the people that are trying to prosecute (Finn's parents)," he said. So I'm trying to navigate the line between recognizing that this is certainly inspired by this (case), but also not interfering with it." A spokeswoman for the Department of Human Services said in a statement they "welcome a meaningful conversation" about their policies, procedures and quality improvement practices.

"Through the oversight committee meeting, we'll have an opportunity to let the public know about our child welfare processes, the actions we take to examine our responses when there is a tragedy and about our ongoing commitment to protecting vulnerable children," said DHS spokeswoman Amy McCoy.

In addition to the ongoing criminal investigation, others already are underway. The Department of Human Services is conducting its own internal review, and the Iowa Citizens Aide Ombudsman and the Child Death Review Team of the state Medical Examiner's Office have also announced their own inspections after a request from state Sen. Matt McCoy, D-Des Moines. McCoy also is leading a series of informal hearings at the Capitol that are intended to address many of the same issues. He has questioned whether more oversight is needed of homeschool students and whether budget and staff reductions at the department may have led to higher caseloads that ultimately affected child safety.

McCoy has received a confidential briefing from Department of Human Services officials, and later told the Des Moines Register that Natalie Finn and her siblings had been the subject of “numerous” reports of alleged child abuse and neglect leading up to Natalie’s death. Gov. Terry Branstad, though, has been sharply critical of McCoy, telling reporters at his weekly news conference that “it’s terrible to play politics with the tragic death of a teenage girl.” On Thursday, Branstad spokesman Ben Hammes said in a statement that the governor continues to believe the Legislature should not jeopardize a criminal investigation.

“Our administration would support an effort by legislators to learn more information about the overall adoption, child welfare and foster care systems at the Department of Human Services,” Hammes said.

McCoy disputed the characterization of his efforts.

“Anything that I have talked about on the Natalie Finn case has been on the public record,” he said. “It has already been released. I am in no way trying to work on that investigation.”

Democrats on the House Government Oversight Committee meeting said they’re glad to see the issue gain attention, though they wish it would have come sooner.

Rep. Abby Finkenauer, D-Dubuque, the top Democrat on the House committee, said she’s participated in the Senate hearings and found them to be helpful. But legislators still “are left with so many questions,” she said “These are our kids we’re talking about,” she said. “So however it’s being investigated, it needs to be investigated. And I’m very happy to hear that you are absolutely taking this seriously and willing to work with us to do this investigation and get to the bottom of this.” House Majority Leader Rep. Chris Hagenow, RWest Des Moines, said he also supports the efforts and believes it’s the role of the Legislature to investigate problems with state agencies.

“I absolutely, through the criminal investigation, want to see that proceed and be successful in finding out exactly what happened,” he said. “As these things come to light, we also want to look at state government and the overall processes that DHS or others might have to try and prevent that in the future.”

Kaufmann said he’s prepared to call meetings of the House Oversight Committee after the legislative session has adjourned if the investigation remains unfinished.

A criminal trial is scheduled for October.

Nicole Finn, 42, has been charged with firstdegree murder for Natalie’s death along with several other felonies related to her treatment Natalie’s two siblings, who were found to be underweight and suffering from bedsores. Finn’s exhusband, Joseph Finn, 46, has been charged with kidnapping, neglect or abandonment and child endangerment.

DMR: Iowa Senate approves voter ID measure

One provision would reduce state’s early voting period and send out absentee ballots later

WILLIAM PETROSKI

BPETROSK@DMREG.COM

Iowa voters would need to provide government-issued identification at the polls under an election bill approved Thursday by the Iowa Senate.

House File 516, which was initiated by Secretary of State Paul Pate, was passed on a 26-21 vote after a contentious debate. All Republicans supported the bill, and all Democrats and one independent were opposed. The bill returns to the House because it was amended by the Senate.

The legislation is aimed at making sweeping changes to the state's election laws that Republicans say are needed to ensure the integrity of the process and prevent fraud.

"Elections are the backbone of a representative republic. Every election is important," said Sen. Roby Smith, R-Davenport, chairman of the Iowa Senate State Government Committee and the bill's floor manager.

Democrats called the legislation a "voter suppression bill" intended to help Republicans win elections by reducing voter participation by minorities, older people and people with disabilities. Statistics from the American Civil Liberties Union and others show that minorities are less likely to have government-issued ID cards. That has, in part, led some courts to decide strict photo ID laws are discriminatory, and those laws have been struck down in some states. "The partisan bias of this bill is clear. That is reprehensible," Sen. Herman Quirnbach, D-Ames, told Republican lawmakers. "We know why you are doing this bill. Shame on all of those who support it."

Democrats insisted that election reforms are not needed. They pointed to a statement by Pate after November's election in which he declared that Iowa has "one of the cleanest, best election systems in the country."

But Smith said current Iowa law does not require county auditors or county attorneys to investigate or report irregularities in voting. He said records show dozens of cases of Iowa voter misconduct over the past five years, examples of felons voting and other voting irregularities, and he suggested they represent a much larger problem.

"We have voter fraud in Iowa. That is a fact," Smith said.

Democrats have called the Republican-backed bill a solution in search of a problem. They pointed to an Associated Press report in February that showed Pate's office was notified of 10 potentially improper votes cast out of 1.6 million counted statewide in the most recent elections.

Sen. Nate Boulton, D-Des Moines, contended the legislation would negatively affect thousands of Iowa voters for what appears to be a handful of irregular votes.

"We are putting new barriers in the process and excluding voters. That is a fact," Boulton said.

Smith insisted Democrats' warnings of hurdles to voting and discrimination aren't true.

"You can be out for a run and have T-shirt and tennis shoes on and walk into the voting booth and you will not be turned away under this bill. This bill is about you are who you want to say you are. Nobody will be turned away," Smith said.

Republicans said their legislation was drafted to comply with past court decisions, including a 2008 U.S. Supreme Court case, which upheld a photo ID law in Indiana. According to the National Conference of State Legislatures, 34 states require some form of documented evidence of voter identification at the polls.

The bill outlines five forms of identification that would be valid at the polls, four of which include a photo. The fifth would be a new voter verification card that would be issued to every voter free of charge.

Under an amendment approved Thursday, the new voter ID card would require a four-digit private number, a signature and no birth date. Those who show up to the polls without a valid ID could vote using a provisional ballot.

About 85,000 registered voters do not have a current driver's license or a non-operator's card issued by the Iowa Department of Transportation, according to the Secretary of State's Office.

Another provision in the bill would eliminate the option for voters to check a single box for straight-party voting. The bill also would put money toward helping precincts purchase digital poll books and establish postelection audits.

In addition, an amendment reduces the time to mail out an absentee ballot, vote in the auditor's office or vote at a satellite station, from 40 days currently to no more than 29 days before a general election. However, those absentee ballot changes would not apply to voters in the military and for people overseas. The bill also would let minors vote in primary elections if they would be 18 years old by the date of a general election.

Smith was questioned on the cost of the legislation. He said the expense for implementation is estimated at $350,000, or about a dime per citizen of Iowa. Democrats disagreed, suggesting the cost could be much higher. But Smith said there will be no mandate to counties, and they can continue to use paper poll books.

A Des Moines Register/ Mediacom Iowa Poll conducted in February showed that 69 percent of adult Iowans surveyed favor the idea of requiring to present a government-issued identification card before casting a ballot. Twenty-eight percent are opposed and 3 percent are not sure.

The bill is officially supported by the Iowa Minuteman Civil Defense Corps. It is opposed by a long list of groups, including the American Civil Liberties Union of Iowa, the Iowa State Association of Counties, AARP Iowa, Iowa Citizens for Community Improvement, Iowa State Education Association, League of Women Voters of Iowa, League of United Latin American Citizens, Iowa Developmental Disabilities Council, One Iowa Education Fund, Iowa Federation of Labor, AFLCIO and Interfaith Alliance of Iowa Action Fund.

DMR: D.M. set to decide on dueling skyscraper proposals

JOEL ASCHBRENNER

JASCHBRENN@DMREG.COM

On Friday morning, the two developers competing to build a residential skyscraper near Court Avenue will find out who will gain the upper hand.

The Des Moines City Council is hosting a workshop, during which the city's economic development staff is expected to recommend one of the two projects: Mandelbaum Properties' 32-story development called The Fifth or Blackbird Investments 33-story project called Four-22. Longtime city officials say such a face-off is unprecedented in recent memory.

The staff's decision could be a significant victory for one of the two. The City Council often follows the advice of the economic development staff on such decisions.

A few years ago, for example, the City Council heeded the staff's recommendation to pick Hy-Vee's proposal over four other bids for a Court Avenue site.

The final word could come April 3, when the City Council is scheduled to select one of the projects. Council members could also vote to delay the decision.

Both developers want to replace a decommissioned cityowned parking garage at Fifth and Court avenues with a privately owned parking garage, a residential tower and other commercial development.

Mandelbaum announced his project in 2015 and recently finalized a development agreement with the city. Before selling the public property to Mandelbaum, the city held a 30-day hearing to allow other developers to make competing offers, as required by state law.

Two hours before the deadline expired, Blackbird submitted its proposal.

Both developers expressed confidence.

“The real important thing is we have been working collaboratively with the city for over two years,” said Justin Mandelbaum, a principal with Mandelbaum properties. “This agreement is fully baked.”

Justin Doyle, a principal with Blackbird Investments, said: “I’m cautiously optimistic. I know we’ve put our best foot forward.”

Here is a look at how the projects compare:

The proposals

Mandelbaum Properties’ The Fifth » A 32-story apartment and hotel tower facing Walnut Street. The boutique hotel would occupy the lower floors and would feature about 50 rooms. The upper floors would feature about 200 luxury apartment units.

» A nine-screen, first-run movie theater facing Court Avenue. It would be operated by Omaha-based Main Street Theaters and would serve food and drinks and would offer recliner seats.

» A nine-story, 564-stall parking garage facing Fifth Avenue.

Blackbird Investment’s Four-22 » A 33-story residential co-op tower facing Walnut Street. Like condos, co-ops offer homeownership, but instead of buying an individual unit, residents buy a share in the building.

» A 150-room hotel facing Court Avenue. Officials at Blackbird said they would sell the land to a separate hotel developer.

» A 700-stall parking garage facing Fifth Avenue. Roughly one-third of the garage would serve as the base of the co-op building and would be converted later into residential units, according to Blackbird.

Cost

Mandelbaum: $111 million Blackbird: $137 million Timing

Mandelbaum’s development agreement gives him until August 2020 to finish the garage and until August 2028 to finish the theater and the tower, but Mandelbaum said he will finish the projects much sooner. He plans to demolish the garage this summer and start construction in late 2017.

Blackbird’s proposed development agreement requires Blackbird finish the garage by Nov. 1, 2018, finish the hotel by Aug. 1, 2019, and finish the residential tower by Dec. 1, 2021.

Height

Mandelbaum: 32 stories. Mandelbaum's development agreement requires the tower to be 25 to 32 stories. The parking garage would be nine stories and the theater would be two stories.

Blackbird: 33 stories. Blackbird's development agreement requires the tower to be 26 to 33 stories. The parking garage would be six stories and early plans show the hotel standing eight stories, though officials at Blackbird say the design could change.

Project team

Mandelbaum Properties:

General contractor: Weitz Co. Architect: SCB.

Blackbird Investments declined to reveal their contractor or architect.

Incentives from the city

Mandelbaum would qualify for up to $20.5 million in city incentives, including tax abatement and rebates worth an estimated $9.7 million, a $4 million forgivable loan for the purchase of the property and up to $6.8 million forgivable loans for operating the parking garage.

Blackbird would qualify for some of the same incentives as Mandelbaum Properties, including a $4 million forgivable loan for the purchase of the property and up to $6.8 million in forgivable loans for the parking garage.

Both projects would receive tax breaks for 20 years, but the details differ. Mandelbaum would receive a mix of property tax abatement and rebates.

Blackbird's proposal calls for property tax rebates, but no abatement. Officials at Blackbird said that means they would receive less taxpayer money because some property taxes paid are protected from rebates.

Highlights

Mandelbaum : City leaders have applauded Mandelbaum's project for promising a movie theater. While downtown has had second-run theaters and IMAX facilities, it has been years since a traditional movie theater operated in the heart of the city.

Blackbird: The firm has promised several elements in its proposal, including:

- » $1 million to renovate the unconventional three-way intersections on Fifth Avenue at Court Avenue and Mulberry Street.
- » $2 million to commission an art installation covering the parking garage.
- » The extension of the skywalk to Court Avenue.
- » The garage would be built with flat decks so it could be converted to housing or offices in the future if the demand for parking diminishes.
- » 20 percent of the housing units would be set aside for low to moderate-income residents.

Detractors

Mandelbaum: Some City Council members have questioned Mandelbaum's progress on the project.

About two years have passed since Mandelbaum first started working with the city on his plans for the site.

Blackbird: Some City Council members have questioned Blackbird's capacity to take on the development, noting the firm has several unfinished projects around the city and several other projects in the queue that haven't broken ground.

The proposed co-op tower has also raised questions.

While co-ops have been used for suburban senior housing developments in the region, no one has ever tried to build a downtown high-rise co-op.

Mandelbaum's pitch

Mandelbaum said what's most important is his team. Des Moines-based Weitz Co. has built numerous high-rise developments around the country and Chicago-based SCB is one of the top residential tower designers nationwide, according to Mandelbaum.

"As a developer we're in business to get projects done, not to talk about projects," he said. "And by surrounding ourselves with the strongest team that we possibly could we have the greatest (potential) for making the project a reality."

Blackbird's pitch

Blackbird contends its proposed deal would repay the city faster for the garage and generate more tax revenue for the city, while taking a smaller tax break.

"Economically, it's a huge difference," Doyle said. Doyle added that Blackbird's proposal includes several elements that elevate it above Mandelbaum's, including new intersections, affordable housing and a skywalk extension. "There is so much the city is getting out of this that isn't in the agreement with Mandelbaum," he said.

About Mandelbaum Properties

Mandelbaum Properties has completed several real estate developments around the metro, notably the construction of the federal courthouse annex at 218 E. Second St., as well as several strip malls and suburban housing developments.

A family company, Mandelbaum Properties is led by John Mandelbaum and his sons: Justin, Sean and Chad.

Justin Mandelbaum has led the development of The Fifth. He also heads a nonprofit called Main Frame Studios, which is renovating a 1980s office building on Keosauqua Way into artist studios.

Mandelbaum also co-founded the China Iowa Group, which works as a consultant for Iowa firms seeking to do business in China and vice-versa.

Mandelbaum previously worked for the investment firms Goldman Sachs and Starwood Capital Group and helped develop an artist studio complex outside Boston. The Mandelbaum family has been in Des Moines for more than 150 years and owned a dry goods store that eventually was incorporated into Younkers.

About Blackbird Investments

Since forming in 2013, Blackbird Investment has quickly taken on several projects around the state.

The firm renovated an East Village warehouse into an environmentally friendly office. It has started renovating several historic buildings into apartments, including the Wilkins Building (formerly the Younkers building), the Clemens Building (formerly the home of Raccoon River Brewing Co.), the old Fort Des Moines barracks near Army Post Road and the Sheldon-Munn hotel in Ames.

Blackbird has announced plans but not broken ground on several projects, including a proposed 33-story tower at the former Younkers building site and a 55-acre development in Iowa City.

The firm has five partners: Justin Doyle, a principal at Modus engineering; his brother Ryan Doyle, a real estate developer; their father Harry Doyle, also a principal at Modus Engineering; commercial real estate broker T.J. Jacobs; and former insurance businessman Hugh O'Hagan. Before forming Blackbird Investments, the Doyles got their start in real estate by selling homes on contract in Des Moines and Waterloo, their hometown.

DMR: Water Works bill stalls in Iowa House

GOP fails to reach a consensus on how or whether to advance controversial legislation dismantling D. M. utility

BRIANNE PFANNENSTIEL

BPFANNENST@DMREG.COM

A controversial bill dismantling the Des Moines Water Works has stalled in the Iowa House with Republicans so far failing to reach a consensus on how or whether to advance the legislation.

"Obviously you get something like that, there's a lot of different ideas, and people want to go different directions," House Majority Leader Rep. Chris Hagenow, R-West Des Moines said Thursday. "And we try to reach consensus on that and haven't gotten there yet. But the overall goal is one that I think we share and many of our local elected officials share. But it is a big issue and we're still having those conversations."

The legislation moved quickly after being introduced in February. Full committees advanced matching bills through both the House and the Senate, and the public weighed in during a contentious public hearing at the Capitol. But House leaders have declined to bring the bill up for floor debate for more than a week.

Hagenow said it has nothing to do with a federal judge's March 17 decision to dismiss the Des Moines Water Works' lawsuit against three northern Iowa drainage districts, though Des Moines Water Works CEO Bill Stowe has said he suspects the legislation was filed in "retaliation" to that suit.

That lawsuit claimed the districts funnel high levels of nitrates into the Raccoon River, a source of drinking water for 500,000 central Iowa residents, that the utility later must pay to remove.

But Hagenow said Thursday, "That bill was, from our perspective, never about the lawsuit. It was about trying to make sure that ratepayers for Des Moines Water Works had a seat at the table and in governance."

House File 484, introduced by Rep. Jarad Klein, R-Keota, would strip water utilities in Des Moines, Urbandale and West Des Moines of their independent boards of directors and instead shift control to their respective city councils.

Klein has filed an amendment to the legislation that would direct central Iowa mayors, city managers and rural water administrators to begin studying a regional water utility, and it tasks them with agreeing on a governance and operational structure by the end of the year.

Hagenow said it's still the goal to create a regional utility. "We have, many of my constituents, that are ratepayers but don't have a seat at the table," he said. The Des Moines City Council voted earlier in the week to continue its support of the legislation, despite a room full of angry citizens who spoke against it. In West Des Moines, the city council voted to scale back its support, instead choosing to register as "neutral" on the bill.

DMR: Iowa sheriffs dispute claim by feds

Officials question accuracy of report saying they are not cooperating with immigration requests

MACKENZIE ELMER

MELMER@DMREG.COM

Four Iowa sheriffs are among the city and law enforcement officials around the U.S. questioning the accuracy of a Department of Homeland Security report that lists jurisdictions refusing to cooperate with federal requests to detain undocumented immigrants.

The report was prompted by an executive order signed by President Donald Trump in January that called on the government to document jurisdictions that are not cooperating with federal efforts to find and deport immigrants in the country illegally.

The first list was released Monday, citing 206 examples of immigrants who were said to have been released from custody by local jails despite requests from federal agents. The requests, often called "detainers," have taken on a greater role in the immigration debate under Trump, who opposes local policies that grant leniency to people in the country illegally.

According to the report, U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement issued 12 detention requests to Montgomery County and five requests to Franklin County during the week of Jan. 28 to Feb. 3.

Montgomery County, in southwest Iowa, ranked fourth nationally among non-compliant jurisdictions for the number of detainers it received during that week, according to the report. It fell just behind Cook County, Ill., which includes Chicago. Franklin County, about 90 miles north of Des Moines, ranked ninth nationally.

But Montgomery County Sheriff Joe Sampson and Franklin County Sheriff Linn Larson, both Republicans, said their departments did not receive any detainer requests during that period.

"If we get a detainer, we hold them," Sampson said. "I don't know how the hell we made the list."

Sampson said his department has not been contacted by anyone from ICE since October. Larson said his department has proactively flagged ICE to check the immigration status of five people since the start of the year.

Shawn Neudauer, an ICE spokesman, said Thursday that the agency is standing by its information.

“These are jurisdictions that at some point in the past have declared themselves to be noncompliant with ICE detainers,” Neudauer said.

Counties that disagree with the reported information will be instructed to take it up with their local field office, he said.

Sac County Sheriff Kenneth McClure said he plans to do that. Sac County was listed in the report for refusing to detain an individual from Mexico on Feb. 11, 2014, who was jailed on a drug possession charge.

Neudauer said in some cases older detainer requests were included in the report because ICE was never previously informed that the inmate had been released from custody. Some of those hold requests were still active in ICE records when the agency created the report.

But McClure, a Republican, said his jail staff has checked records dating back to 2013 and found no record of a detainer matching those facts. He said he has received angry calls to his office questioning whether he’s doing his job since the report was released.

“Quite frankly, if ICE wants to detain these people so they can determine whether they’re illegal or not, then maybe they should come and get them,” McClure said.

Sioux County was listed in the report for a Jan. 27 detainer request for a Guatemalan man who committed a traffic offense.

Sioux City Sheriff Dan Altena said the individual was booked into the jail at 9 p.m. and released by a judge at 10:30 a.m. the next day. He said there was “almost no way we would have gotten that detainer before the next morning.” ICE officials issue detainers that ask local authorities to hold an individual for up to 48 hours to give the agency more time to investigate immigration status. Some jurisdictions, including Franklin and Sioux counties, began ignoring the requests in 2014 after the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Philadelphia ruled local police departments are not required to hold undocumented immigrants for the federal agency. “I can’t do my job based on what my opinion might be on immigration. I have to do my job based on what the law has decided, and the law has decided (local agencies) will be liable criminally and civilly if (they) hold somebody on a detainer. If someone changes that, that’s fine,” said Altena, also a Republican. While Sioux County continues to ignore ICE detainer requests for inmates who are otherwise eligible for release, Franklin County changed its policy in January when Larson became the sheriff. He replaced the department’s 10-page policy for dealing with ICE officials with one line. It states: The office will cooperate with any federal law enforcement agency.

“My problem was we were separating out what agencies we will and won’t work with and from an operational standpoint ... (that) became very confusing,” Larson said.

In total, 12 Iowa counties are listed in the report for having policies that limit their cooperation with ICE. Larson said the ICE report inaccurately names Franklin County as noncompliant, but he’s giving the agency the benefit of the doubt.

“We knew it would take us a period of time before we would migrate off that list,” Larson said. “But we have not received anything from (ICE) saying, please certify that you’ve made this change ... It would have been nice.”

ICE issued a statement Thursday that stated jurisdictions listed in the report had — in the past — expressed unwillingness to fully comply with detainer requests or have not provided ICE with sufficient time to allow for the safe transfer of a detainee.

“ICE seeks cooperation from all its law enforcement partners to achieve our mutual goal of protecting public safety,” the statement read. “If a law enforcement jurisdiction publicly changes its policies to honor ICE detainers, ICE will revise the DDOR report accordingly.”

DMR: Democrat considering bid for Iowa governor

JASON NOBLE

JNOBLE2@DMREG.COM

Iowa state Rep. Todd Prichard is formally considering a run for governor in 2018.

Prichard, a Democrat from Charles City, announced the formation of an exploratory campaign committee on Thursday ahead of a Des Moines event in which he appeared with several other potential Democratic candidates for office in 2018.

"We need a new vision for Iowa," he said in a statement announcing the committee. "I am considering a run for governor because Iowa needs fresh leadership with the vision to drive meaningful economic growth across the entire state, and I look forward to offering some new ideas as well as a new approach to getting things done for all Iowans."

Prichard, 42, is a threeterm state representative, a former county prosecutor and Army veteran.

Although he's not well known beyond Floyd County and the Statehouse, Prichard's rural Democrat-country lawyer- Iraq War veteran profile is seen by many as politically marketable for a party often perceived as urban and liberal and currently suffering through a long losing streak in statewide races.

Publicly backing Prichard's candidacy already are several prominent Democrats, including former state party chairman Sue Dvorsky, state Sen. Bob Dvorsky, 2014 Secretary of State candidate Brad Anderson and longtime labor leader Marcia Nichols. The exploratory committee allows Prichard to begin raising money in anticipation of a run for office, but stops short of a formal candidacy. Several other Democrats are expected to vie for the office in 2018, including Polk County Conservation Director Rich Leopold, who has already declared his candidacy, and former Iowa Democratic Party Chairwoman Andy McGuire. On the Republican side, Lt. Gov. Kim Reynolds is widely expected to run in 2018. Reynolds will almost certainly enter the race as the incumbent, as she will succeed incumbent Gov. Terry Branstad sometime this spring after he's confirmed as ambassador to China. Republican Cedar Rapids Mayor Ron Corbett is also considering a run.

DMR: Medical malpractice lawsuit caps slammed

Families of severely injured Iowans denounce bills that would limit awards

TONY LEYS

TLEYS@DMREG.COM

Families of Iowans who were severely injured by medical errors traveled to the Statehouse on Thursday to denounce bills that would limit awards in malpractice lawsuits. The families said if the bills were in effect, they probably couldn't have found lawyers to take their cases, even though medical providers' mistakes or neglect caused permanent disabilities or death of patients. "I want every doctor to know that when they cause an injury to someone, it doesn't just change the life of that person, it changes the life of an entire family," Ingrid Gerling of Burlington told reporters.

Gerling brought her 10-year-old daughter, Nyasia, whose right hand and arm are virtually unusable because nerves were torn away from her spine as medical professionals tried to pry her out of the birth canal during a difficult birth. The doctor had ignored clear signs that the birth should have been done by cesarean section, she said. "This was not my fault. This was not my husband's fault. This was definitely not my daughter's fault. This was the doctor's fault," Ingrid Gerling said. "Why should we be left paying for the doctor's mistakes?"

The Gerlings sued, and a jury awarded them $5.5 million. The Gerlings were among several families who spoke Thursday at a news conference organized by a group representing lawyers who bring such lawsuits to court.

Their lawyer, Brian Galligan of Des Moines, said the Gerlings' award would have been limited to $250,000 under medical malpractice bills moving forward in the Legislature.

Under that scenario, they probably would be unable to file a lawsuit, because lawyers would shy away from their case, he said. Plaintiffs' lawyers routinely spend tens of thousands of dollars to hire medical experts and cover other expenses, but the lawyers are only paid if such lawsuits are successful. They gain a percentage of the award.

Kelly Denham of West Des Moines spoke about the experience of her 20-year-old son, T.J., who was left with severe brain damage because of a surgeon's mistake while trying to fix a blood-vessel problem. T.J., who attended the news conference in a wheelchair, was an energetic student at Valley High School, his mother said, tearing up at the memory. But since the surgery, he can't talk, swallow, walk or sit up. "Because the doctor made a mistake, T.J.'s hopes and dreams of his future are gone, and so are the hopes and dreams of those who love him," she said as her son moaned behind her. "... Doctors are human, and they make mistakes, but they still need to be held accountable," she said.

Denham said afterward that her family reached a confidential settlement with Mercy Medical Center in the case. If the current bill had been in effect, she might not have been able to find a lawyer to take the case, she said.

The Senate has already passed one of the bills, and the House is considering a similar one. The bills would cap "non-economic damages" at $250,000. They define such damages as being for such things as "pain, suffering, inconvenience, physical impairment or mental anguish." Proponents say the bills would help control malpractice-insurance costs for doctors, hospitals, nursing homes and other care providers.

Clare Kelly, executive director of the Iowa Medical Society, said Thursday that the bills would not limit other damages juries could award to patients harmed by medical errors. "We agree that severely injured patients should have the ability to recover their loss in future wages and future health care costs related to their injury. This is why the bill does not seek to cap economic damages," Kelly wrote in an email to The Register. She denied that the bills would hamper Iowans' ability to file suits.

Kelly, whose group represents physicians, said Iowa doctors pay higher medical malpractice insurance premiums than those in neighboring states of Nebraska, Minnesota, South Dakota and Wisconsin.

Kelly cited an Iowa Insurance Division report on medical malpractice claims paid, which she said showed that only $394,584 was paid in noneconomic damages in Iowa medical malpractice cases in 2015. But representatives of plaintiffs' lawyers disputed that figure, saying it only represents damages for "fright." They said it doesn't include substantial payments for such things as "pain and suffering" and harm to family relationships. Brad Lint, executive director of the Iowa Association for Justice, said at the news conference that Iowa doctors pay some of the lowest malpractice insurance premiums in the nation. Lint, whose group represents plaintiffs' attorneys, noted that the number of medical malpractice lawsuits filed in Iowa has dropped by more than half in a decade. He called the new bills "an arbitrary, government-knows-best power play," which would add unnecessary limits on citizens' right to seek justice in the courts. He said Supreme Courts in 11 other states had declared such limits unconstitutional, and he predicted Iowa's Supreme Court would likely do the same. "We already have reasonable limitations on lawsuits — they are called juries," he said. "Have you ever tried to get a unanimous opinion from eight lowans on anything?”

DMR: Health vote to cost Young support from PAC

JASON NOBLE

JNOBLE2@DMREG.COM

Iowa U.S. Rep. David Young will face political consequences for his opposition to the Republican Obamacare repeal effort that has stalled in Congress.

A spokesman for a super PAC run by House Speaker Paul Ryan said on Thursday that it will pull back support for Young, a Republican whose district includes the Des Moines metro, according to the Wall Street Journal. The hardball political move by the Congressional Leadership Fund comes 24 hours after Young announced publicly he'd be a "no" vote on the American Health Care Act.

The PAC has said it's already opened an office in Des Moines to aid Young's 2018 re-election campaign — resources it's now pulling back in retaliation for Young's opposition to a top GOP legislative priority.

"CLF will be terminating our lease because David Young has decided not to support President Trump and House leadership," PAC Executive Director Corry Bliss told the Journal.

If the group follows through on the threat, it could have major financial implications for 2018 in what is seen as a politically competitive district. It reportedly spent $1.9 million on Young's behalf in 2016.

An aide to Young said the congressman's campaign was not aware of any aid being provided by the Congressional Leadership Fund nor any plans by the PAC to withdraw that support. But, he added, Young wouldn't be swayed by any pressure from political leaders in Washington.

"David Young from day one has said that whoever the speaker is, the majority leader or president, they are not his bosses," Young aide James Carstensen told The Des Moines Register on Thursday. "His bosses are the people of the 3rd District of Iowa."

The health care bill was scheduled for consideration on the House floor on Thursday, but leaders canceled that vote after several dozen Republicans expressed opposition to the measure.

DMR: Once-threadbare Broadlawns to open $22 million addition

Polk County's public medical center, which is thriving under Obamacare, is expanding services in new building

TONY LEYS

TLEYS@DMREG.COM

Many patients at Polk County's public hospital will start seeing doctors, dentists and counselors in a new building next week, partly thanks to Obamacare.

Leaders of Broadlawns Medical Center celebrated the new, four-story addition Thursday. It will house an expanded dental clinic, outpatient mental-health services, addiction treatment, a pain-treatment clinic and a family-practice clinic whose goals will include training young doctors.

The gleaming building is part of a five-year, $60 million plan to rebuild and expand Broadlawns. The addition is on the east end of a hospital complex that used to be threadbare. "You couldn't have imagined, I don't think, 10 years ago, where Broadlawns is today," said Gov. Terry Branstad, who helped cut the ribbon at Thursday's celebration.

Broadlawns, which is owned by Polk County taxpayers, has thrived in recent years after nearing financial collapse more than a decade ago. Part of the reason for its success has been that many lowans who used to lack health insurance now have coverage due to the Affordable Care Act, also known as Obamacare. More than 150,000 poor Iowa adults have gained Medicaid coverage under the law. In the Des Moines area, many of those people used to rely on free care from Broadlawns.

Broadlawns Chief Executive Officer Jody Jenner said the 72,000-square foot addition is the result of years of planning and examination of what the Des Moines area needs. "Today really represents a major step in closing a lot of health care shortages and gaps in this community," he said. The $22 million building's dental area has twice as much capacity as the old one. It will be able to handle up to 22 patients at a time. The dental program's patients will include many poor lowans, who often have trouble finding private dentists who will take their Medicaid coverage.

Jenner said the expanded outpatient mental health program in the new building should take some pressure off Broadlawns' inpatient psychiatric unit, which is almost always full. The public hospital also plans to add 14 beds to that 30-bed inpatient wing, at a time when many other Iowa hospitals are closing or trimming their inpatient psychiatric units. Jenner said the public hospital's improved facilities have helped leaders recruit new staff members, including psychiatrists, who are in severely short supply.

Branstad, a Republican who opposed Obamacare, agreed in 2013 to go along with a version of the law's Medicaid expansion, with the federal government picking up most of the tab. President Donald Trump and Republicans controlling Congress are working to repeal the law.

Branstad, who is set to become Trump's ambassador to China, said in an interview after Thursday's ribbon-cutting that lowans who gained Medicaid coverage under Obamacare won't be left in the lurch. "We're very confident we're going to be able to maintain this program," he said. "I've been in touch both with the administration and with Congress on this issue, and we feel very good about it." He said the Obamacare replacement plan being debated in Congress this week should offer states more flexibility to try new ways to manage Medicaid programs.

DMR: Senate OKs ban on selling fetal body parts

WILLIAM PETROSKI

BPETROSK@DMREG.COM

A bill intended to prevent the sale of fetal body parts was overwhelmingly approved Wednesday night by the Iowa Senate, although a key Democratic lawmaker opposed the measure, saying it could hamper medical research.

Senate File 359 was approved on a 43-6 vote, sending the measure to the House for consideration.

The legislation prohibits persons from acquiring, providing, receiving or transferring fetal body parts in Iowa regardless of whether it was for "valuable consideration." Sen. Jake Chapman, RAdel, said the bill is intended to avoid shocking circumstances that were discussed in congressional hearings on the alleged sale of fetal body parts.

The issue arose after a series of videos purported to show Planned Parenthood employees attempting to illegally profit from the sale of fetal body parts. A Texas grand jury investigated the claims, but cleared Planned Parenthood and instead indicted two of the antiabortion activists who filmed the videos. A Texas judge subsequently threw out the charges. The bill was earlier amended in a Senate committee to address concerns raised by university medical researchers who want to continue work on existing fetal cell lines. It will also allow tissue from stillborn births and miscarriages to be donated in the future. But Sen. Joe Bolkcom, D-Iowa City, who serves on the Senate Health and Human Services Appropriations Subcommittee, criticized the bill Wednesday night.

“The bill puts politics above good science and medicine. It could have a negative impact on the future of research for lifesaving treatments. The bill is nothing more than a platform for people who are opposed to abortion,” Bolkcom said.

Fetal tissue has been successfully used for decades in medical research. It was critical in creating a vaccine for polio and more recently it has been used in effort to find treatments for spinal cord injuries, eye disease, strokes and Parkinson’s disease.

Senate Democrats pointed out that federal law currently prevents the transfer of fetal body parts for valuable consideration. They said Planned Parenthood of the Heartland, Iowa’s largest provider of abortions, does not violate this law.

DMR: Senate approves health coverage for autism

WILLIAM PETROSKI

BPETROSK@DMREG.COM

The Iowa Senate voted 48-0 Thursday to require many employer-provided health insurance policies to provide coverage for treatment of autism spectrum disorder for young people. House File 215 was sent to Gov. Terry Branstad for his consideration. Both Republican and Democratic lawmakers praised the bill’s final passage, saying it represents years of work by advocates for people with autism.

Sen. Bill Anderson, R-Pierson, the bill’s floor manager, said the legislation will apply to employers of more than 50 fulltime workers. It will require coverage of applied behavioral analysis for persons under age 19 diagnosed with autism spectrum disorder. The bill provides maximum annual benefits, depending upon a person’s age. Coverage can also be subject to deductibles, co-payments or co-insurance provisions.

Anderson thanked his colleagues and families of persons with autism for pursuing the legislation. He has a nephew diagnosed with severe autism spectrum disorder and he said treatment has resulted in “amazing” progress. “Unlike previous years, we were able to get everybody to the table to get this worked out and that is what made it possible,” Anderson said.

Sen. Amanda Ragan, D-Mason City, said the legislation will have huge and positive impact on many families and many children. “You should all be proud you are voting for it,” she told her colleagues.

DMR: 20-week abortion ban advances in Iowa House

BRIANNE PFANNENSTIEL

BPFANNENST@DMREG.COM

A bill banning most abortions after 20 weeks is advancing through the Iowa House, though some Republicans say it doesn't go far enough.

Rep. Shannon Lundgren, R-Peosta, led a House subcommittee on the 20-week ban Wednesday. The three-person panel voted to advance the bill to a full committee, but Lundgren said it faces a tough road as some Republicans continue to push for stricter "personhood" legislation that would define life as beginning at conception, effectively banning all abortions.

"There are a lot of our caucus who are very (supportive of) life at conception, period," Lundgren said, noting that's why a previous bill banning abortion after 20 weeks did not advance in the House.

"It's not that I'm not (for) life at conception, either. I campaigned on that," she said. "But some of us are willing to take an incremental look at how we can start to save lives immediately."

Senate File 471 already has cleared the Senate. It says any person who intentionally terminates a pregnancy that has reached 20 weeks post-fertilization commits a Class C felony, which is punishable by up to 10 years in prison.

"I think that putting these criminal penalties on here puts a woman's life at risk immediately, because trying to save a woman's life now potentially makes a doctor a criminal," said subcommittee member Rep. Beth Woessel-Kroeschell, D-Ames. "I just don't see how we can possibly do that in this state and feel good about ourselves."

The bill allows exceptions to preserve the life of the mother or the fetus, or to avert a "serious risk" to the woman of "substantial and irreversible physical impairment of a bodily function."

It also allows exceptions for fetal abnormalities where a child could not survive outside the womb.

Amanda Acton of Waukee previously testified before the Senate about the need for that exception. She told of being informed by her doctor 21 weeks into her pregnancy that her baby had a rare disorder, would not survive long after birth and would have an agonizing life. She said she and her husband concluded the most compassionate decision was to end the pregnancy.

"I remember thanking God," Acton said at the time. "I don't regret my abortion, not one little bit."

But Joan Thompson, a lobbyist with the Iowa Catholic Conference, said Wednesday her organization cannot support that exception.

"Even though these infants are very sick, disabled or dying, we do not support taking their lives," she said.

Lundgren said the bill likely will see amendments as it moves to the House Human Resources Committee.

"There's just a lot of work to be done yet," she said.

DMR: Tax reform plan is being drafted in Iowa Senate

WILLIAM PETROSKI

BPETROSK@DMREG.COM

Iowa Senate Majority Leader Bill Dix says a state tax reform plan is being drafted and it likely will be unveiled by Senate Republicans within the next two weeks. "We need to continue to stay focused on growth,” Dix told reporters Thursday in his Iowa Capitol office. “Tax policy is a key component of that. We are not taking our eye off of sensible tax reform that puts Iowa in a better position to attract new investment to our state and keep high-paying jobs here.” But the Shell Rock Republican isn’t disclosing any details yet about the plan, such as whether it will include tax cuts. He said Sen. Randy Feenstra, R-Hull, who chairs the Iowa Senate Ways and Means Committee, is still fine-tuning the details, adding, “We will talk about that when the release time comes.”

Dix made his remarks as the GOP-led Iowa House has just begun discussions on a bill that would cap state spending on tax credits. According to the Department of Revenue, the total value of state tax credits has grown dramatically from about $153 million in 2005 to an expected $427 million in 2018 — an increase of about 180 percent. The Iowa Taxpayers Association says the state’s tax credits are intended to offset Iowa’s high rate for corporate income taxes and suggests any discussion about removing them should be coupled with lowering the overall tax rate. Dix said he expects the 2017 session to end April 18, and he considers the Legislature’s major policy issues either to have already been addressed or in the pipeline headed toward approval. He also anticipates budget targets will be released next week that will help lawmakers shape state spending for the 2018 state fiscal year, which begins July 1. The upcoming budget will be tight with limited state revenue, which could mean some budget cuts, Dix acknowledged. “Everything will be on the table” for discussion, he added, saying the budget won’t exceed available revenue. For the upcoming fiscal year, a state panel has forecast total revenue of $7.364 billion, an increase of 3.6 percent, but a decline of $191.8 million compared with an estimate made three months ago. For fiscal year 2019, which starts July 1, 2018, the revenue forecast is for $7.626 billion, up 3.6 percent over the previous year. Senate Minority Leader Robert Hogg, D-Cedar Rapids, said Thursday that Senate Democrats would welcome a discussion about reforming Iowa’s tax code, but he believes state government can’t accommodate additional tax cuts. Hogg said Gov. Terry Branstad and Lt. Gov. Kim Reynolds, who are both Republicans, have gotten carried away with tax cuts, which has hurt the state’s financial position.

“We are in a fiscal mess today, not because of a global or national recession. We are in a fiscal mess today because of budget decisions that the Branstad-Reynolds administration and Republican legislators have made over the last six years,” Hogg said. “If the state goes down the route of cutting taxes even more it will make the budget mess even worse.” Hogg also said he is concerned that Iowans will be hurt by additional budget cuts, and he believes Iowa’s revenue figures would be more favorable if the state had better economic development policies.

DMR: Hensley to face challenge from environmental lawyer for seat

MACKENZIE ELMER AND JASON NOBLE

MELMER@DMREG.COM

An environmental lawyer backed by former a former Democratic lieutenant governor and attorney general announced his bid for Des Moines City Councilwoman Christine Hensley’s seat Thursday night. Josh Mandelbaum, 37, delivered the news before a fundraiser for the Democratic blog Iowa Starting Line among other candidates for office in 2018. And he wasted no time drawing water quality as the battle line in the race.

“Time and time again, Councilwoman Hensley has sided with special interests against the Des Moines Water Works and residents of Des Moines,” Mandelbaum told the crowd. “She’s demonstrated time and again that she’s incapable of being our voice on water quality. I’m running for city council because I will be dedicated to being our voice for our values and our concerns and our interests.” Mandelbaum works as a staff attorney and lobbyist for the Environmental Law and Policy Center, which is currently registered against controversial legislation in the Iowa Statehouse that would place water utilities and its assets under the control of local city councils.

He's slammed the bills at a March 7 public hearing at the Capitol, saying the legislation does nothing to protect ratepayer investments and places responsibility for safe drinking water "with entities that don't have experience or expertise in doing so. Just like in Flint, Mich." In a 4-2 vote Monday, Des Moines City Council reasserted its support of the legislation in a response to public demand for a vote that showed where each council member stood on the issue. Hensley, who represents Ward III, has been most vocal in supporting the legislation and calling for changes to the way water utilities are governed.

Hensley wouldn't say whether she'll be running for reelection on the council, or when she might make a decision.

But in terms of Mandelbaum's candidacy, Hensley said she looks forward to the debate.

"I've only had a couple (elections) where I've not been challenged," Hensley said.

Former Lt. Governor Sally Pederson and former Iowa Attorney General Bonnie Campbell have signed on as Mandelbaum's campaign cochairs, according to a press release. Mandelbaum served as a policy adviser from 2003 to 2006 under former Gov. Tom Vilsack and Pederson's administration. Mandelbaum is a graduate of Roosevelt High School, Central Academy and the University of Iowa Law School. He serves on the Polk County Early Childhood Iowa board, the advisory board of University of Iowa REACH (Realizing Education and Career Hopes) program, and the Greater Des Moines Jewish Federation.

He attends Temple B'nai Jeshurun on Grand Avenue. He currently lives on the west side of Des Moines with his wife Katherine, his three-year-old son, Liam, one-year-old daughter, Ayla, and black lab Truman.

Mandelbaum is the cousin of Justin Mandelbaum, a Des Moines developer currently vying to build a downtown skyscraper at Fifth Avenue and Walnut Street.

USA Today: Ag secretary nominee addresses cuts

Ex-Georgia governor says he was not consulted on targeted programs

ARTHLOMEW D. SULLIVAN

USA TODAY

WASHINGTON — Former Georgia governor George "Sonny" Perdue sought to assure farm-state senators on Thursday that he understands the importance of trade for farmers and supports many of the U.S. Department of Agriculture programs targeted in last week's proposed 21 percent budget cut.

President Trump's nominee to head the department, named just the day before the president took office, said he was not consulted on the proposed $4.7 billion cut over this year's funding level that would eliminate water and wastewater loan programs, the department's statistical capabilities and foreign food aid.

Asked by the ranking Democrat on the Agriculture Committee, Sen. Debbie Stabenow of Michigan, whether he supported clean water for rural communities, access to research tools, and the USDA organic program — programs she said are "zeroed out" in the president's budget — Perdue said he did. Asked if he had been consulted during preparation of the budget blueprint, Perdue was clear he had not.

"I had no input in the budget," he said.

Perdue's late nomination has some in rural communities concerned that Trump has made agriculture policy a low priority, and several senators on the committee, including North Dakota Democrat Sen. Heidi Heitkamp, echoed that view. Perdue sought to change that perception by joking that while there had been "some anxiety" over the late nomination, "I think the president saved the best for last."

The two-hour-and-20-minute hearing was mostly friendly and non-confrontational, steering clear of questions about Perdue's past ethical lapses, including the 13 complaints to the Georgia Ethics Commission during his two terms as governor. Most senators wanted to explore with the nominee, who was raised on a dairy farm, the parochial interests of their states, like the margin protection program established in the 2014 farm bill to help dairy farmers. Other issues raised during the questioning were improving the health of national forests, preserving the sugar program and the impact of new immigration policies on farm labor needs.

Chairman Pat Roberts, RKan., said farmers are particularly concerned about finding strong markets for their goods.

"Now more than ever agriculture needs a voice — an advocate — at the highest levels of government," Roberts said.

He asked Perdue to work "hand-in-hand" with the Office of the U.S. Trade Representative to expand export markets. Roberts added as an aside that the new administration has "too many cooks in the kitchen when it comes to trade."

Perdue assured him he would be a strong advocate for trade and that he had talked while awaiting his confirmation hearing with the nominee for trade representative, Robert Lighthizer, and with Trump's Commerce Department pick, Wilbur Ross.

Perdue, who has a doctorate in veterinary medicine from the University of Georgia, sprinkled his testimony with homey, farm country references. He said he had picked watermelons in his youth with one member of the committee, his cousin Sen. David Perdue, R Ga. He mentioned training bird dogs and milking cows, and said he avoided "dangling participles" after instruction from his English teacher mother. And he offered some wisdom from his late father: "If you take care of the land, it will take care of you."

In his opening statement, he said that after a stint in the U.S. Air Force and briefly practicing veterinary medicine in North Carolina, he returned to Georgia to build a grain elevator for his county in 1976.

"Farming and farmers have been my life ever since," he said. "Agriculture is in my heart."

Perdue made it clear he has been paying attention to falling commodity prices and the 50 percent reduction in net farm income since the record high in 2013.

He said he understands concerns about proposed cuts to local government water and wastewater financing programs but that they might be addressed by Trump's pending infrastructure initiatives.

If confirmed, he said he would pursue four goals: to maximize the opportunity to create jobs; "customer service everyday"; to meet consumers' expectations for meeting food safety standards; and to expand markets for agriculture goods.

DMR Editorial: Branstad cheerfully ignores threat to Medicaid expansion

Does the governor support the Trump administration's plan?

On Dec. 12, 2013, Gov.

Terry Branstad' office issued a press release trumpeting an agreement with federal officials to expand Medicaid and help more than 100,000 low-income and disabled lowans obtain access to health care.

Under the expansion, premiums for new enrollees were limited to 2 percent of income — about $19 per month for someone at the poverty line — and beneficiaries could reduce their payment by participating in wellness programs. The press release described the governor as “enthusiastic,” and quoted him as saying, “This is an Iowa plan that fits the health needs of our state.” Lt. Gov. Kim Reynolds was equally effusive, and was quoted as saying the expansion “allows Iowa to move forward in improving the health and wellness of our state.”

Now, however, Health and Human Service Secretary Thomas Price and Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Service Administrator Seema Verma have sent a letter to Branstad and the governors of 30 other states who expanded Medicaid at the expense of the federal government, telling them the expansion represents “a clear departure from the core, historical mission of the program.”

They're also urging the governors to pursue changes in Medicaid, such as charging beneficiaries higher premiums and requiring beneficiaries to pay for emergency-room visits to discourage such visits.

When asked about all of this, the best that Branstad spokesman Ben Hammes can muster is this: “Gov. Branstad extends his congratulations and is proud to see that Seema Verma was recently confirmed as the new CMS Director. She worked very closely with Iowa in obtaining the federal waiver for the Iowa Health and Wellness Plan and Medicaid Modernization. She fully understands the complexities of the Medicaid system and we look forward to working with her and Secretary Price in their new roles.”

Apparently, the governor's enthusiasm for Medicaid expansion has been supplanted by his enthusiasm for a CMS director determined to scuttle that effort. Could it be “the health needs of our state” are less of a priority than the president's political agenda?

DMR Editorial: Schools shouldn't sell extra-credit points to students

Unfortunately, 'stupid' legislation might be the answer if school boards don't act

At first blush, the proposal by Iowa Rep.

Chip Baltimore might seem like an overreaction.

Baltimore, a Republican from Boone, has introduced legislation that would prohibit public schools from awarding students extracredit points for providing classroom supplies such as paper towels and Kleenex.

“Frankly, we didn't know this was a problem,” says Melissa Peterson, an Iowa teachers union lobbyist. “I can never imagine a teacher saying, ‘I'll give you extra credit (for purchasing supplies),’ because there's plenty of families who can't.”

Yes, the practice is hard to imagine. But this sort of thing is fairly widespread and in recent years has proved to be a source of controversy in Florida, California, New York and other states. At some schools, teachers have actually handed out lists of classroom supplies — erasers, tissues, disinfecting wipes, etc. — at the beginning of the semester and promised that students who helped stock the supply closet will see their final letter grade bumped up one level.

Just last year, area teachers told a Des Moines Register reporter they could recall times when students earned enough extra-credit points by “donating” boxes of Kleenex to the classroom that they were able to squeak by with a passing grade.

So, regrettably, this does happen. While it's the sort of practice best addressed by school boards, it appears that some of them have yet to act.

To his credit, Baltimore admits he'd rather not spend his time on this issue. "I hate legislation like this — because I think it's stupid — but sometimes you have to legislate common sense," he says. "If it gets some attention and schools stop doing it, maybe it has the intended purpose. Maybe we don't have to put it in the law."

That would be the ideal outcome, but if school districts don't act, Baltimore would be justified in pursuing the matter.

DMR Iowa View: Why it's time for a regional water utility for metro Des Moines

RICK CLARK of Cleveland, Ohio, is former city manager of Des Moines.

An indelible lesson about local government is that sharing services is one of the best ways that local governments, working together, can reduce cost and increase the quality of service. This was a point I made to the Des Moines City Council when I retired as city manager almost three years ago.

Nowhere is the benefit of shared service more apparent than with public utilities such as wastewater treatment and the provision of potable water. These are essential public utilities used by virtually every citizen.

To be cost effective, a utility needs to spread the cost of its operating overhead and capital investment across as many customers as possible. If, for example, there are multiple water utilities with multiple water treatment facilities, the cost of potable water will increase and quality of service will decrease. And that's not good for anybody, and that is the real issue that should be driving the decision about creating a regional water utility for the Des Moines metro area.

The current governing structure for Des Moines Water Works has remained essentially unchanged since it was created in 1919. The five-member Water Board is appointed by the mayor of Des Moines but acts independent of the city and has all the authority necessary to operate, construct improvements, set water rates, and bring lawsuits on behalf of the utility. In the intervening years, the service area for Des Moines Water Works has undergone a radical transformation. In 1920 Des Moines had a population of 126,468, West Des Moines had 3,631 residents, Urbandale, 298, and Ankeny, 648.

Today, Des Moines remains the dominant city; however, West Des Moines now has a population of 64,000, Urbandale is about 44,000, and Ankeny is about 56,000. The current Des Moines Water Works governance structure is simply not adequate to address the challenges brought about by the growth in the metro area.

Suburban communities seek to build their own water treatment facilities. Why? Because the suburbs have no voice in the management and overall direction of Des Moines Water Works, and they are not confident they'll continue to receive water at a reasonable rate. Although this fear may not be entirely warranted, the longterm consequence could well be that the metro area evolves into a system of duplicative water treatment facilities competing with one another for customers. Water treatment cost will increase and so will the price of water. Des Moines residents do not escape adverse consequences because as suburban customers pull away from the Des Moines Water Works, then the burden of maintaining large treatment facilities and all administrative costs will fall more and more on the backs of Des Moines customers. At the same time, the suburbs will carry the entire burden of separate water treatment facilities. Everyone loses.

So what's the solution? Legislation considered by the Iowa Legislature will provide an opportunity for

Des Moines and surrounding suburbs to work together to create a more representative regional water utility, which prevents the costly proliferation of new water treatment facilities and allows cities to work together to provide the most efficient system to treat and distribute water to the metro area. Water customers win with this solution.

For the record, the cities in metro Des Moines have a strong record of creating and managing regional utilities. One good example is the Des Moines Metropolitan Waste Water Reclamation Authority, which comprises 17 municipalities that work together to successfully construct and operate regional wastewater treatment facilities.

A final comment: The lawsuit filed by Des Moines Water Works attempted to address the issue of water quality in Iowa. The lawsuit failed. The U.S. District Court called Des Moines Water Works' claims "without merit" and dismissed the case in its entirety.

However, the need to address water quality remains. A new Des Moines regional water utility could be an effective partner working with the state towards the goal of clean water.

It is time to set aside the distractions and misdirected accusations about creating a regional water utility and do the right thing for the people of Des Moines and central Iowa. As a first step, the Iowa Legislature needs to enact the pending legislation that will allow the negotiations to create a new regional water utility to go forward.

DMR: Newborn health screening bill passes Iowa Senate

WILLIAM PETROSKI

BPETROSK@DMREG.COM

Newborns in Iowa would be tested for congenital cytomegalovirus if a screening demonstrates hearing loss under a bill passed Wednesday night by the Iowa Senate.

Cytomegalovirus, or CMV, is a common virus that infects people of all ages, according to the Centers for Disease Control and Health Prevention. Most people infected with CMV show no signs or symptoms. However, CMV infection can cause serious health problems for people with weakened immune systems, as well as babies infected with the virus before they are born, experts said.

Senate File 51, which now heads to the House for consideration, says the testing requirement would need to be accomplished before the newborn is 21 days old. In addition, information would be provided to the parent of the newborn regarding birth defects caused by congenital cytomegalovirus and early intervention and treatment resources and services available for children diagnosed with it. However, the testing requirement would not apply if the parent objects.

Sen. Jake Chapman, R-Adel, the bill's floor manager, said the complications of CMV can be as extensive as death, adding he would like to see this bill be extended to across-the-board screenings. However, Chapman and several other lawmakers said they were happy the legislation is moving forward.

"This is certainly a step in the right direction for some of these kids," said Sen. Pam Jochum, D-Dubuque.

The Senate bill, which was approved on a 49-0 vote, also proposes educational and awareness campaigns regarding cytomegalovirus and congenital cytomegalovirus. The initiatives would be targeted towards women who may become pregnant, expectant parents, parents of infants, attending health care providers, and others.

LEE: Democratic House member exploring run for governor

James Q. Lynch

After announcing that he's exploring a campaign for governor in 2018, Rep. Todd Prichard delivered his maiden campaign speech to a nearly empty Iowa House of Representative on Thursday afternoon.

The empty seats and faint applause are not indicative of what the third-term Democrat from Charles City said he is finding when he talks to party members at soup suppers, off-year caucuses and central committee meetings.

"There's a lot of anger. I think there's a lot of concern and I think there is a lot of fear (because) of the way they see the state changing," Prichard said in an interview earlier Thursday. The Republican legislative agenda is "not in line with what I would consider Iowa values."

Running for governor was not part of his agenda when Prichard, 42, ran for a vacant House seat in 2012. That's changed this year, he said, as he's watched majority Republicans stripping public employees of collective bargaining rights, weakening the state's workers' compensation program and limiting spending on traditional priorities like education.

That's frustrating because "regardless of where we are from or what party we are in, we were elected to create good-paying jobs, raise wages and make it easier to raise a family and get ahead," Prichard said. Republicans, he said, "have failed in that mission."

Republican Party of Iowa Chairman Jeff Kaufmann doubts Prichard will be the last Democrat to get into the race.

Advertisement

"I would imagine whenever you have the loss of an incumbent, there will be a lot of people exploring," he said, referring to Gov. Terry Branstad's anticipated departure to be U.S. ambassador to China. "But let me tell you something, there's a lot of experience and a lot of money and a lot of shoe leather between exploring and running against a lady who has been already trained and ready to go on Day 1. (Lt. Gov.) Kim Reynolds has the complete package."

If Prichard runs — and he thinks he has until next year to make a decision, he'll be running against Branstad as much as Reynolds, who is expected to serve out the governor's term.

Bottom of Form

"I haven't seen any points of separation between Gov. Branstad and Lt. Gov. Kim Reynolds," he said. "Their agenda seems to be one and the same, so I think the policies and decisions made by the Branstad administration are very much tied to Lt. Gov. Reynolds."

As a challenger, Prichard said, he would have to make the case that he can do a better job and lead Iowa to a better place.

"Given the decline of education, lack of wage growth, there's a narrative there we can tell voters," he said. "This administration, these policies, have not advanced the interests of the people of Iowa."

LEE: Iowa Senate approves election law changes

ROD BOSHAART

Iowa senators approved GOP-backed election law changes Thursday that proponents say will improve election integrity but that critics insist will suppress turnout and raise costs to county taxpayers.

Majority Republicans made several changes to a House-passed bill before voting 26-21 to pass House File 516 and return it to the House for consideration.

The bill was opposed by 20 minority Democrats and Ocheyedan independent Sen. David Johnson.

"The bill would require all voters voting at the polls to provide proof of eligibility, as well as all absentee ballot requests to contain a personal voter identification number on the request form," said Sen. Roby Smith, R-Davenport, the bill's floor manager.

"The public realizes that they have to show their photo ID to get on an airplane, buy a beer or open a checking account. This legislation is common sense," he said.

Democrats countered that the bill would put up barriers to elderly, disabled, minority and other Iowa voters that would discourage participation in a fundamental American right. They argued it would increase costs to the state and counties and create unintended consequences in a state with a track record of clean elections with high participation rates.

They also said it likely would trigger a legal challenge.

"I think it's an unnecessary political document," said Sen. Tony Bisignano, D-Des Moines.

Sen. Pam Jochum, D-Dubuque, called the bill "a very expensive solution in search of a problem."

Smith countered by pointing to 27 cases of first-degree election misconduct in the past five years and eight instances where people voted twice as evidence of a problem.

"We have voter fraud in Iowa, that is a fact," he said. "With so many close elections in the past, including members of this chamber (who won by 22, 17 and 10 votes in three races), we need to do everything we can to prevent fraud and this bill has safeguards."

Sen. Nate Boulton, D-Des Moines, dismissed Smith's fraud contentions, saying "there is not a bogeyman out there," while Johnson called the election bill "a farce" that was not for the people's interests but rather for special interests.

Bottom of Form

"This isn't a welcoming place right now, this 87th General Assembly," Johnson said.

House File 516 would make several changes to state election administration, including voter registration, absentee voting and requiring voters to present an ID to vote.

Other provisions would eliminate the option for voters to check a single box for straight-party voting, put money toward helping precincts purchase digital poll books, and establish post-election audits.

Also, the bill would provide for technology upgrades and additional poll worker training for consistency throughout the state and provide additional resources for those system upgrades.

Republicans made changes that would reduce the time for sending out absentee ballots before an election from 40 days to 29; would allow teenagers who turn 18 by the general election to vote in the earlier primary; and would establish four-digit voter ID cards.

Sen. Tod Bowman, D-Maquoketa, offered an amendment to strike the entire bill and replace it with a voter identification verification process, but his proposal lost 27-20.

"This is something Iowans want," Smith said. "This is something that we have delivered for them to make sure that elections are fair," Smith said.

LEE: Iowa Republican leaders: No minimum wage increase

Rod Boshart

Top Republicans in the Iowa House and the Iowa Senate said Thursday they do not expect the Legislature to consider increasing the statewide minimum wage of $7.25 an hour this session.

GOP senators held out the possibility of a separate minimum wage bill this week during a committee discussion of legislation to void higher county-level wage minimums, but Senate Majority Leader Bill Dix, R-Shell Rock, and House Speaker Linda Upmeyer, R-Clear Lake, said that won't happen.

"I anticipate no separate minimum wage bill," Dix told reporters.

Upmeyer said representatives approved the local pre-emption bill earlier this month after turning back Democratic amendments "to do just that." Members of the House GOP caucus, she said, are not asking to take up a bill to increase the minimum wage this session.

"That's not been one of their priorities this year," Upmeyer told reporters.

House File 295, which currently is eligible for debate in the Senate, includes provisions to immediately bar cities and counties from usurping state authority in business and employment matters and the sale or marketing of consumer merchandise.

Bottom of Form

That would include prohibiting cities and counties from setting minimum wages higher than the statewide $7.25 hourly level and nullify the higher minimum wages approved by officials in Johnson, Linn, Polk and Wapello counties.

Senate Minority Leader Rob Hogg, D-Cedar Rapids, said he anticipates Democrats will offer amendments to raise the statewide minimum wage if Republicans bring up House File 295 for consideration.

"I would imagine there are members of the Republican caucus who don't think they should be voting for bills that drive down wages for Iowans," he said.

Gov. Terry Branstad has told reporters he would be open to considering a "modest" increase in the state's minimum wage, but Upmeyer said Thursday "the governor and I have not discussed that topic."

LEE: House panel to launch investigation of child welfare system

James Q. Lynch

Days after Gov. Terry Branstad warned that Democratic prying into state child welfare services could negatively impact a criminal prosecution, a House Republican announced the Government Oversight

Committee will launch its own investigation.

Rep. Bobby Kaufmann, R-Wilton, chairman of the Government Oversight Committee, said he doesn't want to interfere with the Polk County Attorney's Office prosecution in the case of Natalie Finn, a 16-year-old West Des Moines girl who died from emaciation last October because of the denial of critical care.

But Kaufmann said told the committee he is exploring the possibility of bringing in the Department of Human Services "to have them walk committee members through the process of how reports for child placement, follow-up, child abuse, or neglect are handled. The committee wants to understand how this process works so that we can look at ways to prevent another tragic situation like the Natalie Finn case.

"We are not interested in politicizing this tragic situation or jeopardizing an ongoing criminal investigation," Kaufmann continued.

DHS spokeswoman Amy McCoy said the department welcomes a discussion with the House panel "about the authority the Legislature provides DHS to investigate allegations, about how our policies and procedures are established, as well as discussing our efforts toward continuous quality improvement,"

Branstad is not happy with the Democrats on the Senate Government Oversight Committee having informal hearings to look into the state's child welfare system. So far, DHS officials have declined to appear to answer questions, they said.

However, as long as they don't jeopardize the prosecution in the Finn case, Branstad also would "support an effort by legislators to learn more information about the overall adoption, child welfare and foster care systems" as DHS, his spokesman Ben Hammes said.

Kaufmann will invite the Senate Government Oversight Committee, chaired by Sen. Michael Breitbach, R-Strawberry Point, to join the investigation.

Advertisement (1 of 1): 0:15

Breitbach wasn't sure if senators will work with the House panel and was hesitant about how deep they could delve into child-welfare issues at this time.

"It's a very delicate situation right now. There is a legal case going on, and the last thing I want to do is interfere with that proceeding and murder trial," Breitbach said.

Bottom of Form

He and Kaufmann agree on that. The investigation should be "thoughtful and prudent" without politicizing the Finn case or being conducted with a "gotcha attitude."

Breitbach seemed to see a more limited scope of investigation than Kaufmann.

"I believe that the DHS has reviewed all of their staffing options over the past years, and I think they feel comfortable with where they're at and the training that they're doing, but otherwise I just can't go further," Breitbach said.

House Speaker Linda Upmeyer, R-Clear Lake, agreed that lawmakers' role is not the criminal investigation, but to look at the system to see if it meets lowans' needs. House Republicans, she said, are "very interested" in knowing whether the state has an adequate system that serves the needs of Iowa children.

"Our job is the function of state government," House Majority Leader Chris Hagenow, R-Windsor Heights, said. While he wants to see the criminal case proceed, "we also want to look at state government and the overall process that DHS or others have to try to prevent that in the future.”

House Government Oversight Committee member Rep. Vicki Lensing, D-Iowa City, suggested inviting law enforcement to explain its role in child welfare cases in order to understand whether there are gaps in the law.

LEE: Fantasy sports wagering advances in Iowa House

JAMES Q. LYNCH

It's unlikely fantasy sports betting will be legal in Iowa before this year's NCAA men's basketball championship, but an Iowa lawmaker is looking ahead to next year.

A bill to legalize fantasy sports betting cleared the House Ways and Means Committee 23-2 Wednesday and will be eligible for full House debate next week.

If representatives approve the bill, which is similar to a version approved by the Senate in the past, Iowans could legally bet on the 2018 NCAA championships as well as other sports events.

The American Gaming Association estimates Americans will wager $10.4 billion on March Madness, a 13 percent increase from 2016.

However, only 3 percent of the money wagered — $295 million — will be wagered legally. The remaining $10.1 billion will go to illegal off-shore websites or through bookies, the association said.

If House Study Bill 52 is approved, wagering on fantasy sports would be legal in Iowa, taxed and regulated by the Iowa Racing and Gaming Commission that oversees gambling and gaming in the state.

Fantasy sports wagering would not be a big payout for Iowa.

Bill manager Rep. Matt Windschitl, R-Missouri Valley, hasn't received a fiscal note on the 2017 version of the bill, but estimated the return could be $250,000 for the Rebuild Iowa Infrastructure Fund and $250,000 for the general fund.

“I'm not doing this for the revenue,” he said. “I'm doing this to give Iowans more freedom. To give them the freedom to play, if they want.”

According to a 2015 Legislative Services Agency fiscal note, fantasy sports wagering trade association estimated 300,000 Iowans would play daily fantasy sports through an internet fantasy sports contest service provider. It found that in a similarly populated states, participants paid $4.4 million in entry fees and charges. About $4 million was used for cash prizes and payouts.

Bottom of Form

Taxing the adjusted gross receipts would yield somewhere between $33,000 and $578,000 for the state, the Legislative Services Agency concluded.

Although Windschitl is optimistic about passage of House Study Bill 52, House Speaker Linda Upmeyer, R-Clear Lake, joked that the House seems to talk about it every year.

“I suspect the caucus is ready to move that forward,” she said.

The way Windschitl sees it, in previous years the Senate approved fantasy sports betting and sent it to the House where no action was taken. In the past, the House has sent a bill to legalize fireworks to the Senate, but nothing happened.

This year, he pointed out, the Senate has approved a fireworks bill, and the House is working on a waging bill

Muscatine Journal: PROGRESS: Muscatine has high hopes for Branstad's nomination to China

Jan Touney

Community and business leaders look forward to continuing a strong relationship with their Chinese friends in the wake of Iowa Gov. Terry Branstad's nomination by President Donald Trump as U.S. ambassador to China.

Confirmation proceedings have yet to be scheduled in Washington, D.C. Ben Hammes, communications director for Branstad, said there will be no official comment on the process until after the confirmation hearing. Branstad said in January that he was humbled and honored to accept Trump's nomination.

Iowa's exports to China, predominantly agricultural products, have boomed under Branstad's administration. He has long been considered a friend of Chinese President Xi Jinping, dating back from Xi's first visit to the state as a student in 1985, shortly after Branstad took office. The governor has made six trade missions to China.

Tony Joseph, president and founder of Joseph International Freight Service in Muscatine, has been doing business in China for 14 years.

He said Branstad's appointment gives the state of Iowa "a good seeding compared with other states who are vying for Chinese attention," particularly other Midwest states like Michigan and Wisconsin.

"In Muscatine, we also have a great opportunity because of our standing in the Chinese mind," said Joseph, who was chairman of the Muscatine-China Initiatives Committee until fall 2016. He continues as a committee member.

Current committee Chairman Daniel P. Stein, Senior Vice President and Senior Loan Officer at CBI Bank & Trust, said he believes Branstad's position in Beijing will help Muscatine.

"I think as a committee we were obviously excited" by the nomination of Branstad by Trump, Stein said.

Bottom of Form

"It will be a very tough job; the Trump administration wants to rebalance trade," Stein said. "But I'm optimistic. Both countries have so much to lose if they don't deal with each other."

Greg Jenkins, president and CEO of the Greater Muscatine Chamber of Commerce and Industry, said that organization is "looking forward to our governor being in such a prominent position (in China) because he has such a great relationship there."

Sarah Lande, a longtime friend of Branstad's who has been instrumental in Muscatine's relationship with Xi Jinping, said she and her husband, Roger, called Branstad after he visited the president-elect at Trump Tower in December.

"We asked him, 'Well, what do you think about it?'" she said. "I was so excited when President Trump nominated him."

LEE: Some budget areas will get less state money next year

Rod Boshart

Republican legislative leaders believe some budget areas will be getting less money for the fiscal year than begins July 1.

That's due to revised revenue projections that are forcing the governor and lawmakers to temporarily tap reserves to plug a shortfall and then repay the money over the next two years.

"We will be looking at budget reductions, absolutely," said House Speaker Linda Upmeyer, R-Clear Lake. "I suspect every budget will see reductions. I think that's inevitable when we're looking at taking at least $130 million out of the budget from what we had projected earlier."

Downsized fiscal 2018 revenue growth projections — coupled with Iowa's expenditure limitation, the reserve "backfill" — and other issues have significantly shaved the amount of new money legislators have to spend, given that the Legislature and Gov. Terry Branstad already have committed $40 million to K-12 schools and face more Medicaid demands, Upmeyer said.

"We need to keep everything on the table," said Senate Majority Leader Bill Dix, R-Shell Rock. "We can't continue to spread ourselves so thin. The state has had too broad of priorities, and we're making sure we're really focusing in on what Iowans want us to do."

"Bottom line, we're going to do as Iowa families do, and that is not spend more than what the state projections are revenues to come in," Dix added.

Branstad is required to submit revisions to the two-year budget he proposed in January by next Wednesday, Upmeyer said.

After that she expects Republicans will issue spending targets and begin formulating budget plans for fiscal years 2018 and 2019.

Dix and Upmeyer said Republicans' agenda this year still includes a tax reform package that looks at simplifying and streamlining the state's income tax system.

But the House speaker conceded the state's financial situation has posed challenges.

Bottom of Form

"There's no doubt it is much more difficult to imagine how we would move forward with tax reform, perhaps tax cuts, in an environment where we've cutting budgets. We're just going to work through all of it," she said. "People will contemplate how this might be done and, when the opportunity arises, we will have some of the plans in place. There are still opportunities for reform I believe that could very well work anyway."

Dix said tax reform is a key component of the effort to focus on growth, telling reporters "we're not taking our eye off of sensible tax reform that puts Iowa in a better position to attract new investment to our state and keep high-paying jobs here."

Senate Democratic Leader Rob Hogg of Cedar Rapids said he was "very concerned that Iowans will be hurt by budget cuts that will be proposed by the Republican majority."

The state, he said, is "absolutely not" in a position to consider tax cuts that aren't affordable.

“We are very interested in tax reform that modernizes our tax code and helps spur our economy,” he said. “I am not interested in big tax cuts in the guise of tax reform.

“The Branstad-Reynolds’ Republican direction has gotten carried away with tax cuts, and that’s why we’re in the fiscal mess that we today,” he added. “If they go down the route of cutting taxes more, that will make the budget mess even worse.

The Gazette: Iowa wire transfer fee would fund criminal investigations

The House Ways and Means Committee approved adding a 1 percent fee to the cost of wire transfers to raise money for undercover investigations of criminal activity including drugs and human trafficking.

However, Democrats who voted against the bill called it a punitive move that targets the poor who rely on wire transfers to move their money.

House File 494 was approved on a 15-11 party line vote Wednesday night, despite allegations it targets “small Latino grocery stores,” according to Rep. Dave Jacoby, D-Coralville, and amounts to civil asset forfeiture, according to Rep. Mary Wolfe, D-Clinton.

The bill would require non-financial institutions providing wire transfers to charge a fee of 1 percent of the transfer amount. The fee would not be applied to bank transfers, bill pay systems, PayPal or similar operations.

Bill manager Rep. Chip Baltimore, R-Boone, said the state Division of Banking estimated the wire transfers that would be covered by the bill amount to about $3 billion a year. That would generate $30 million a year. However, people using wire transfers could apply for an individual income tax credit equal to the amount of money transfer service fees they paid if they include a valid tax identification number.

Baltimore called it “one piece in the war we have against criminal activity” and said it is modeled on a successful Oklahoma law.

Rep. Todd Prichard, D-Charles City, called it “not fair, not right.”

Wire transfers are likely to be used by low-income people without bank accounts, he said.

“When I prosecuted drug crimes, I noticed a lot of marijuana was wrapped in Saran Wrap. Why not tax Saran Wrap?” he asked.

It’s not the government’s role to “scorn, scold, punish people for being poor,” added Rep. Liz Bennett, D-Cedar Rapids.

Baltimore pointed out wire transfers generally cost more than moving money by money orders or other methods.

The bill also would create a financial crime and wire transmitter fund for the Department of Public Safety to use to investigate indictable financial criminal offenses.

The bill now goes to the full House.

The Gazette: Iowa City metro second-fastest growing in Iowa

New census data show Iowa is gaining people, but at a slower pace than the nation

Both the Iowa City and Cedar Rapids metro areas gained people since 2010, but Iowa City's growth rate far outpaces that of its sister city.

The Iowa City metro, which includes Coralville and North Liberty, was the second-fastest growing in Iowa between July 2010 and July 2016, new Census numbers show.

Here's some more information about Iowa from the new data:

3,134,693 TOTAL

Iowa's total population has continued to rise so far this decade, hitting more than 3.13 million people in 2016.

Even so, the state's growth rate lags behind that of the United States as a whole. The nation's population grew by 4.5 percent from July 2010 to July 2016. Iowa's grew only 2.8 percent.

DES MOINES FASTEST

The Des Moines metro claims the fastest growing population in Iowa. From 2010 to 2016, the central Iowa metro grew by 11 percent to more than 634,700 people.

The rate of change in Iowa City's metro wasn't far behind, however, as it saw population grow 10.4 percent to more than 168,800. Ames and the Omaha-Council Bluffs area grew 8.3 percent and 6.4 percent, respectively.

The Cedar Rapids metro population rose by 3.6 percent to just under 267,800 people.

"We have four economies that are growing relatively rapidly and then you've got, right dead in the middle, Cedar Rapids, which is growing at just a little over half" the average metro growth rate, Iowa State University economist Dave Swenson said.

JOHNSON POSTS GAIN

Des Moines' growth can be tied in part to Dallas County, which includes the western suburbs of Des Moines. When population changes are examined by county, Dallas County grew by 27.8 percent so far this decade. Johnson County took second place in that regard, with a 12 percent growth rate. And Linn County's population grew by about 5 percent in that time period.

73 COUNTIES DECLINE

Although Iowa's overall population has grown, the increase is largely concentrated in the state's urban centers.

Only 26 of Iowa's 99 counties saw their populations increase from 2010 to 2016, an analysis by Gary Krob of the State Data Center shows.

That leaves 73 Iowa counties having lost people so far this decade, continuing a trend Swenson said Iowa has seen since the 1980s.

"What we have is a subset of our metropolitan areas doing really well and then the majority of the next set of cities down are doing poorly," he said. "These regional trade centers are struggling to hold onto their economic potency and their demographic base."

51.8 PERCENT

More than half of Iowa's population lives in just 10 counties, according to Krob's analysis.

Of Iowa's 3.13 million total, 51.8 percent reside in Polk, Linn, Scott, Johnson, Black Hawk, Woodbury, Story, Dubuque, Pottawattamie and Dallas counties. Each of these is part of an Iowa metro, Krob noted.

Business leaders in Iowa often have said they can't fill open job positions due to a lack of qualified applicants. Part of that problem, some have said, is lackluster population growth, especially in rural areas.

The Census numbers released Thursday do not include population changes by specific cities.

The Gazette: Iowa Politics Today: Requiring insurers to cover an autism treatment

FREEDOM TO BINGE: A House Judiciary subcommittee delayed action in a "medical amnesty" bill that would provide legal protection to 911 callers who are under the legal drinking age of 21 but need help in an emergency when underage drinking has taken place.

"No one should have to think about the legal implications of calling for help," Cole Staudt, an Iowa State University student from Rockford, told the subcommittee considering SF 415.

The bill was approved 49-0 in the Senate.

The immunity, similar to laws in 36 other states, Staudt said, would not extend to anyone already the subject of a criminal investigation or under correctional supervision and would not extend to emergencies where illegal drugs were involved. The caller must remain on the scene and cooperate with law enforcement.

Lawmakers are waiting to learn whether the law would put Iowa out of compliance with federal laws regarding the legal drinking age and open containers. If Iowa is not in compliance, it could jeopardize $82 million in transportation funding, said Renee Jerman of the Iowa Department of Transportation.

"That's not a huge concern for us," Staudt said.

Similar amnesty for people who call for emergency assistance in the case of an opioid overdose was stripped out in the Senate. Rep. Mary Wolfe, D-Clinton, said she hoped that could be added in the future.

Rep. Megan Jones, R-Spencer, said the subcommittee will wait to hear from the DOT on the federal funds before deciding whether to send the bill to the full committee.

ADJOURNMENT TARGET: Republicans, who hold majorities in the Iowa House and Iowa Senate, say they are on track to end the 2017 session close to the April 18 adjournment target.

Normally the first session of a General Assembly is scheduled for 110 days of expense money for legislators, but budget cutbacks prompted lawmakers to scale that back by 10 days this year to save money.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Dix, R-Shell Rock, said there still is significant work left to do, which includes crafting a fiscal 2018 state budget. But he expects things to wind down after lawmakers get back the session's second funnel deadline next week

That deadline requires bills to clear one chamber and a committee of the other to remain eligible for consideration this year.

“We want to continue to accomplish the agenda we set out to do and I have the expectation that that can be done within the time frame of the 100 days that have been set out. I would expect us to adjourn some time very near to that 100th day,” he said.

House Speaker Linda Upmeyer, R-Clear Lake, said she is “building my calendar to be done” around the April 18 adjournment target.

HOUSE TRAFFIC ISSUES: House Speaker Linda Upmeyer, R-Clear Lake, was non-committal Thursday on two transportation-related bills approved by the Iowa Senate because her GOP majority members have not discussed them. But she said she expected legislation to further restrict texting while driving would get passed this session.

“We absolutely want to move forward with safety,” she told reporters. “I think there’s an appetite to move something forward.”

Drivers would be able to use their hand-held devices to make phone calls or check GPS directions but could be pulled over by law officers for using them to write, send or view an electronic message under Senate File 234, which cleared the Senate by a 43-6 margin Wednesday.

A House committee has approved a tougher bill that also would make texting a primary offense like the Senate approved. But the House version would ban the use of hand-held devices while driving and would allow a one-year transition period before law officers would switch from issuing warnings to ticketing violators.

Upmeyer said she expected the House GOP caucus to discuss both approaches and choose one or come up with “something different.”

Senators also approved a separate measure to bring traffic cameras under stricter state regulation but not ban them.

Upmeyer said the Senate bill would get committee consideration before next week’s second funnel deadline for bills to pass one chamber and a committee of the other to remain eligible for action this year.

AUTISM TREATMENT: Iowa senators voted 48-0 Thursday to send Gov. Terry Branstad legislation that would require insurance companies to cover a treatment for autism that parents believe can help improve the quality of life for their kids.

House File 215 would require insurance providers to cover applied behavior analysis for children with autism in group coverage plans exceeding 50 employees.

“It will help a lot of people. This is a big day,” said Sen. Bill Anderson, R-Pierson, the bill’s floor manager.

He said the legislation was a positive result of collaboration by many people over a number of years to reach Thursday’s legislative approval.

“This is about more than passing legislation,” said Sen. Amanda Ragan, D-Mason City. “This will impact people’s lives. This will have a huge impact.”

Under the bill, insurance coverage would become available for families with dependents younger than 19 who have been diagnosed with autism spectrum disorder.

SIGNED INTO LAW: Gov. Terry Branstad signed the following seven bills into law Thursday: • House File 303, relating to notifications made by the commissioner of insurance about the need for a receivership for certain preened sellers and cemeteries.

- House File 372, allowing turns against red lights.
- House File 203, authorizing the use of primary road fund moneys for the secondary road and municipal street systems.
- House File 577, relating to the treatment of Lyme disease or other tick-borne diseases
- Senate File 409, relating to state credit union examinations and boards meetings.
- Senate File 376, relating to disclosure of asbestos bankruptcy trust claims.
- Senate File 357 modifying licensing provisions applicable to electricians and electrical contractors.

QUOTE OF THE DAY: “The public realizes that they have to show their photo ID to get on an airplane, buy a beer or open a checking account. This legislation is common sense.” — Sen. Roby Smith, R-Davenport, in promoting an “election integrity” bill with a provision that would require every voter to present government-issued identification at the poll on Election Day — with four eligible forms that included a photo.

The Gazette: Iowa water hopes not dead yet

So your Iowa Legislature, presented by Sizzler University, may still do something smart and meaty on water quality this year.

Chances remain lean. But even that’s remarkable, considering not so long ago it looked like the nothing-to-see-here caucus had the upper hand. I figured the recent dismissal of the Des Moines Water Works’ lawsuit over polluted farm runoff, which sparked Iowa’s water quality debate, sponged up the last drops of hope.

But then 13 Republicans led by Rep. Bobby Kaufmann, R-Wilton, got behind a push to raise the state sales tax by one-eighth of a cent each year for three years to fill the Natural Resources and Outdoor Recreation Trust Fund. The constitutionally protected fund was created by voters in 2010, but lawmakers have refused to raise the sales tax to fill it.

Kaufmann made headlines before the session by proposing his famous “suck it up, buttercup” bill aimed at universities coddling students shaken by our Trumped election. Maybe this new effort could be called “drink it up, buttercup.”

Fully phased in, the tax would raise $180 million or more for an array of conservation and recreation efforts. The bill, HF 597, filed Monday, says 60 percent must be spent on ag pollution controls inspired by the state’s Nutrient Reduction Strategy. That proportion roughly matches the current trust fund spending plan outlined in state law.

But these are Republicans, after all, so the sales tax increase would be offset by reductions in income tax rates, starting with reductions in the lowest income brackets. Kaufmann says that’s intended to reduce the sting of raising the regressive sales tax.

So far, the bill is supported by a large coalition of groups lobbying lawmakers to fill the trust fund. No groups have yet registered opposition.

“We’ve really been activating the grass roots, a lot of folks who support the cause have been showing up at forums, writing emails, making phone calls,” Kaufmann told me. “I think it’s had an impact on people at the Capitol, creating a buzz for the issue.”

You don’t need to be a Sizzler U grad to know much is at stake. (Sorry.) Cutting the flow of nitrates and phosphorus from farmland pays big dividends in safeguarding drinking water, protecting lakes, reducing soil loss and mitigating flooding. There’s also that big dead zone in the Gulf of Mexico you may have heard about.

Federal agencies watching water are on the verge of Trumpian decimation. Iowa’s tight budget is an argument against income tax cuts, but it’s also an argument for creating protected funding for the environment, which is often first on the chopping block.

Obstacles abound. It’s not certain the bill will even get a committee hearing. Another bill, using unprotected gambling dollars to provide less water funding, is moving first. Kaufmann insists his bill could be coupled with that effort. We’ll see.

Democrats no doubt will balk at tax reductions hitting a general fund already unable to cover needs. Some rural Republicans see no problem and want little or no action. And if the bill does move, a pitched battle over how the money will be spent is likely.

But what looked like a cooling back-burner issue now has some sizzle. A rare bright spot.

The Gazette: Guest View: Developing skills for our innovation economy

Jim Wohlpart is provost and executive vice president for academic affairs at the University of Northern Iowa.

Recently, Gov. Terry Branstad organized the Future Ready Iowa Alliance, chaired by Lieutenant Gov. Kim Reynolds and Dan Houston, CEO of Principal. The focus of the alliance is to address the skills gap in Iowa. The University of Northern Iowa, as a member of the Iowa Campus Compact, is developing unique strategies to fill that gap and to prepare graduates as citizens and professionals for the coming innovation economy.

By 2025, Iowa is expected to add 612,000 jobs to its economy, 68 percent of which will require postsecondary education. Yet there aren’t enough adults with college degrees to fill these jobs. While much of the focus for bridging this gap centers on job training for technical skills, such as coding and data analysis, what we need more than ever are graduates with the core skills to meet workforce and community needs, students who are prepared to create, innovate, and lead change.

The essential skills of the twenty-first century include critical thinking, complex problem-solving, and written and oral communication, and these skills are more important to employers than a student’s major. More recently, surveys have demonstrated that students must not only develop these skills in the classroom, but also apply them in real world settings solving real world problems. Such engaged learning experiences also assist students in developing their curiosity, which leads to lifelong learning and the ability to be adaptable and innovate.

Significantly, the development of these essential skills in applied and engaged settings not only prepares students for professional careers — they also prepare students to meet the public purposes of higher education: to become active and engaged citizens who are invested in their communities and their civic obligations. Instead of pitting career preparation against education for citizenship and democracy, we need to recognize their intrinsic connection. The University of Northern Iowa is working with Iowa Campus Compact to go beyond the lecture hall to help students build these core skills.

One of the more salient engaged learning experiences that students can have is that of an extended service learning project with a nonprofit organization in the community. UNI recently created a summer Service Learning Institute so that faculty members can transform their courses to include a community engaged project. Working with community organizations, students become engaged in the challenges of the "real world" and gain valuable skills in new ways through applying their learning outside of the classroom.

The University of Northern Iowa is committed to expanding these valuable experiences for our students so that they are prepared to innovate, create, and lead change. Students must be prepared for a life that emphasizes their well-being at work, in the community, and at home. Join UNI and Iowa Campus Compact in meeting the civic mission of higher education. QC Times Editorial: Editorial: Students pay for tax cuts

Top of Form

Bottom of Form

Basic fairness will die in Appropriations. And Iowa's busted tax policy will kill it.

That's the fate of school equity legislation now sitting in the Iowa House, according to predictions of a half-dozen state lawmakers representing the Quad-Cities. The bipartisan soothsaying late Wednesday and early Thursday put a cloud over what, until now, had been a high-point of the legislative cycle.

The bill passed earlier this month in the state Senate, SF 455, was the "best opportunity yet" for fairness among all public school students in Iowa, Davenport Community School District Superintendent Art Tate told us. For too long, Iowa has touted a grossly unjust funding model where some districts receive more state funding than others. But, as we predicted earlier this week, years of tax cuts, exemptions and corporate welfare has hamstrung Iowa's ability to do much of anything.

And that's the reality faced by proponents of the equity bill, which breezed through the House Education Committee on Wednesday. Now, the $203 million, 10-year package heads to the House Appropriations Committee. And that's where Quad-Cities Reps. Norlin Mommsen, Republican, and Democrats Phyllis Thede and Cindy Winckler -- all committee members -- predicted the legislation's demise, in light of yet another revenue shortfall of more than $100 million.

For their part, all House members surveyed support the bill, at least in concept. Reps. Winckler and Monica Kurth would back it should it ever reach the floor. Republicans Ross Paustian and Gary Mohr, too, would back it in concept. But they just don't see Appropriations freeing up the $14 million needed for its first year.

"It's unfortunate that the Senate rushed a bill over to us without any idea on how to fund it," Paustian said.

So, now what?

The legislation's very existence is a moral victory, some will say. It's an acknowledgement that the system is broken. It's an official recognition that more than 300 districts statewide, including Davenport and Maquoketa, can't compete with their neighbors and, as a result, are further hamstrung by incessant middle class flight and sagging property values, they'll contend.

There can be no moral victory until the structural injustice is undone. Still, Tate would find himself facing career-ending sanctions because of his budgetary protests against an inequitable funding model. His district would continue to live under a mandate that bilks it of $2.4 million every year.

It's possible that lawmakers will forgive Tate's legal transgressions as a consolation prize. Bills kicking around both chambers would legalize the budgetary maneuver he enacted. A simple retroactive provision could clear Tate and salvage his career. That's the least lawmakers could do. In so doing, they'd provide themselves political cover by avoiding a public spat with a respected school official standing on principle.

Bottom of Form

But, as Tate would tell you, this isn't about him. It's about his students.

And that's who, yet again, gets failed by a state that's gutted its revenue to the tune of $12 billion a year through tax hand-outs to special interests.

SF 455 wasn't perfect, which the Democrats will tell you. The decade-long roll-out opens the door for future legislatures to kill it. It was, however, the most politically feasible path forward.

The fact remains, tens of thousands of children in Iowa will continue to be second-class citizens if the bill dies. And it's those students who would pay for the state handouts for the well connected.

RI: Branstad approves new rules for asbestos-related lawsuits

MARCH 24, 2017 BY O. KAY HENDERSON

Governor Terry Branstad has signed a bill into law that changes the rules for Iowans who file asbestos-related lawsuits.

Asbestos causes cancer. In 1989, the federal government banned its use in new products. Backers of the new law say some attorneys are "double-dipping" — finding a way to get two settlements for one injured person — and that depletes resources for people who were exposed to asbestos and need help.

Senator Brad Zaun, Republican from Urbandale, said during Senate debate on the measure that more than 60 companies that made asbestos are out of business, but trust funds have been established to pay cancer victims.

"Ten-thousand people are affected by this disease now," Zaun said. "...The average person is getting a $600,000 settlement and, at 10,000 a year, what we're trying to do here is to preserve that fund for future people who've been affected by these working conditions."

Representative Kirsten Running-Marquardt, a Democrat from Cedar Rapids, said during House debate that people who will be affected by this new law pleaded with legislators to oppose it.

"Iowans went to work, worked hard to provide for their families and they were exposed to a horrible chemical that took years off their life," she said.

Senator Nate Boulton, a Democrat from Des Moines who's a lawyer, said the legislation places a "harsh trap door" under cancer victims who now will face a quick and unusual deadline for filing claims.

"There are real Iowans affected. Exposure that's latent for decades. You're walking around, you have no idea that this time bomb is going to go off," Boulton said. "Are we really here to create an escape hatch for the companies that created this monster?"

Representative Andy McKean, a Republican attorney from Anamosa, said the new law will prioritize claims from patients in the end-stage of cancer.

“This bill does nothing to deprive claimants to receive 100 percent of what they’re entitled to,” McKean said. “...It’s going to help them get their day in court sooner.”

McKean said portions of this law are in effect in other states. Iowa’s new law would not affect the 17 Iowa cases of asbestos exposure making their way through the state’s courts. More than 2000 Iowans have died of asbestos-related cancer since 1999.

RI: Senate Republicans alter House GOP’s ‘voter ID’ plan

MARCH 23, 2017 BY O. KAY HENDERSON

Republicans in the Iowa Senate have put their own stamp on a “voter ID” bill.

The GOP senators have voted to shorten the “early” voting window in Iowa from 40 days down to 29. In addition,

Senate Republicans want precinct workers to check a prospective voter’s signature on a driver’s license or voter ID card to verify the voter’s eligibility. Republican Senator Roby Smith of Davenport said it’s common sense.

“We need to do everything we can to prevent fraud,” Smith said, “and this bill has safeguards.”

Democrats predicted there’ll be longer lines at the polls on Election Day as fewer Iowans will vote early and it’ll take time for precinct workers to evaluate each voter’s signature.

“Rather than making it harder or restricting time frames, we should be making it easier, removing barriers,” said Senator Pam Jochum a Democrat from Dubuque.

All 26 Republican senators present this evening voted for their plan. It would let 17 year olds who’ll turn 18 by Election Day in November vote in the party primaries in June. The bill now goes back to the House for consideration of those Senate changes. House Republicans passed their own “voter ID” proposal back on March 9.

RI: Likely gubernatorial candidate Todd Prichard says Iowa ‘can do better’

A Democrat who’s a 42-year-old veteran of the Iraq War has formed an “exploratory committee” — his first step toward officially launching a campaign for governor. Todd Prichard of Charles City is currently in his fifth year as a state representative.

“I’m discouraged with the focus of our legislative agenda and the Republican leadership right now,” Prichard said during an interview this afternoon, “and I think we need to find a new direction.”

Prichard said his goal as governor would be to help more “regular Iowans” land in the middle class.

“I don’t think that the Branstad Administration and, therefore, Kim Reynolds have addressed the real issues that are affecting Iowans across the state in rural areas and urban areas and that’s really the issue of the family budget and pocketbook issues,” Prichard said.

Prichard pointed to Branstad's 2010 campaign promise to raise the average income of Iowans by 25 percent.

"That hasn't happened," Prichard said. "I've never seen an administration fight so hard for low-paying jobs and I think we can do better."

Prichard is a small town attorney who also had a career in the military. That means his bio is similar to successful statewide candidates like former Governor Tom Vilsack, who was an attorney in Mount Pleasant, and U.S. Senator Joni Ernst, an Iowa National Guard veteran. Prichard is pitching himself as someone who can provide "fresh" leadership for the state.

"I have over 21 years in the Army as an Army officer. I've been overseas four times," Prichard said. "The last time I was the company commander of approximately 200 soldiers with the Iowa National Guard in Iraq and that definitely gives you leadership experience and the experience of taking care of people in tough situations."

Prichard has assembled a team of advisors with statewide campaign experience and secured the services of key consultants who worked on President Obama's successful campaigns in Iowa in 2008 and 2012.

A few other Democrats have expressed an interest in running for governor, so Prichard would most likely face a Democratic Primary in June of 2018.

Lieutenant Governor Kim Reynolds will soon take over as governor once her Republican colleague Terry Branstad leaves to serve as U.S. Ambassador to China. Reynolds has already raised more than a million dollars for a race for governor and has signalled she intends to ask next year's voters to elect her to a four-year term.

RI: Federal agents investigating pipeline vandalism in Northwest Iowa

MARCH 23, 2017 BY RADIO IOWA CONTRIBUTOR

The FBI is investigating vandalism at Dakota Access Pipeline sites in northwest Iowa's Sioux County.

On Friday, March 17th at 2 p.m., Sioux County Sheriff's Deputies were dispatched to two locations south of Hospers to check out reports of vandalism to the pipeline. Sometime in the previous 24 hours someone apparently tried to burn holes in the above-ground valves at the two locations. The deputies were able to secure both locations.

The FBI is conducting an investigation into similar incidents at other Dakota Access pipeline locations in Iowa and South Dakota.

RI: House panel to investigate DHS child welfare system

Republican leaders in the Iowa House are launching an investigation "inspired by" the case of a central Iowa teen who died last October of starvation, but House Speaker Linda Upmeyer today said they do not plan to ask direct questions that might jeopardize the criminal case against Natalie Finn's adoptive mother and the woman's ex-husband.

"We certainly don't want to do anything that would prevent the law from dealing with this the way they should," Upmeyer told reporters during her weekly statehouse news conference. "Now, I think, we are at (time) where we have a responsibility to look at the system and the process."

The House Government Oversight Committee will conduct the investigation. Committee chairman Bobby Kaufmann, a Republican from Wilton, said the panel will look at how the Department of Human Services handles child abuse and neglect allegations and how the agency follows up after placing a child in foster homes or with adoptive parents.

"I'm not going in with a 'gotcha' attitude," Kaufmann said. "I'm truly looking to understand and for us as a committee to understand how this whole thing works."

The committee may meet into the summer and fall and could make recommendations for some sort of legislative action according to Kaufmann. The goal, he said, is to prevent tragedies like Finn's from happening in the future.

"I don't think it's unusual for us to make sure that there's not a systemic problem in any department where there've been resulting issues," Kaufmann said.

A few Democrats have been pressing for an investigation of the Department of Human Services since January and accusing Governor Branstad of trying to "cover up" inadequate staffing levels in the state agency that handles reports of child abuse. Kaufmann today accused Democratic Senator Matt McCoy of politicizing the issue and walking a "thin line" that could hurt the prosecution's case against Finn's adoptive parents by revealing too much information to the public. Democrats on Kaufmann's committee in the House say they're glad Republicans are finally showing an interest in investigating the DHS.

"There's a huge issue here and these are our kids we're talking about here, so however it's being investigated, it needs to be investigated," said Representative Abby Finenauer, a Democrat from Dubuque.

The Republican leader of the Oversight Committee in the Iowa Senate this is a "delicate situation" and the Department of Human Services "has reviewed all of their staffing options...and feel comfortable with where they're at and the training they're doing." It's unclear whether Senate Republicans will join the House investigation.

Governor Branstad on Monday warned legislators against investigating the agency until after the criminal case against Finn's alleged tormentors has concluded. That runs counter to a previous House and Senate Oversight Committee investigation which probed misspending in a state agency before the successful criminal case against the agency's manager had concluded.

RI: Report details impact of new Prestage pork processing plant

Creighton University economics professor Ernie Goss presented the findings last night of a comprehensive report on the financial impact of the major new pork processing plant that will be built in northern Iowa.

Goss spoke in the Hamilton County town of Stanhope on the pros and cons of the $246 million Prestage Farms plant that's planned south of Eagle Grove. "There's an increase in the first year of operations of about $45-million in state and local tax collections," Goss says. "There are costs as well. You've got to increase hiring of teachers, there'll be school costs, there'll be highway costs."

Overall, Goss says there will be a net gain from the plant going online, saying state and local tax collections will be greater than the costs. The report says the plant will increase the price of hogs by 3.5 percent. The estimated average added revenue is expected to be $724 per farm in the 10-county north-central Iowa area. It's also estimated the plant will support 193 packer and non-packer farms. Goss says employment is another key factor.

“Direct jobs, you’re talking about at least on the first shift, 900 to 1,000 jobs at the facility itself,” Goss says. “When you take into account the spill-over jobs in the 10-county area, you’re in the neighborhood of 3,500 total jobs, so that’s quite significant.” Goss says the report also covered the impact on school districts in the area, at a time when many schools are closing or consolidating.

“For a lot of school districts, it’s going to be welcome news to have more students rather than fewer students,” Goss says, “but the overall cost is about, we estimate, $21-million per year, and that cost is borne by some federal dollars, some state dollars, and of course, local dollars.”

The ten counties considered in the report are: Calhoun, Franklin, Hamilton, Hardin, Humboldt, Kossuth, Palo Alto, Pocahontas, Webster and Wright. Construction is set to begin this spring and may take 18 to 21 months. Goss will make another presentation this afternoon at 4:30 at Robert Blue Middle School in Eagle Grove, with presentations next week in Fort Dodge and Humboldt.

The complete report will be posted next week on the Mid Iowa Growth Partnership website.

Fox News: Potential 'smoking gun' showing Obama administration spied on Trump team, source says

Republican congressional investigators expect a potential “smoking gun” establishing that the Obama administration spied on the Trump transition team, and possibly the president-elect himself, will be produced to the House Intelligence Committee this week, a source told Fox News.

Classified intelligence showing incidental collection of Trump team communications, purportedly seen by committee Chairman Devin Nunes, R-Calif., and described by him in vague terms at a bombshell Wednesday afternoon news conference, came from multiple sources, Capitol Hill sources told Fox News. The intelligence corroborated information about surveillance of the Trump team that was known to Nunes, sources said, even before President Trump accused his predecessor of having wiretapped him in a series of now-infamous tweets posted on March 4.

The intelligence is said to leave no doubt the Obama administration, in its closing days, was using the cover of legitimate surveillance on foreign targets to spy on President-elect Trump, according to sources.

The key to that conclusion is the unmasking of selected U.S. persons whose names appeared in the intelligence, the sources said, adding that the paper trail leaves no other plausible purpose for the unmasking other than to damage the incoming Trump administration.

The FBI hasn’t been responsive to the House Intelligence Committee’s request for documents, but the National Security Agency is expected to produce documents to the committee by Friday. The NSA document production is expected to produce more intelligence than Nunes has so far seen or described – including what one source described as a potential “smoking gun” establishing the spying.

Some time will be needed to properly assess the materials, with the likely result being that congressional investigators and attorneys won’t have a solid handle on the contents of the documents – and their implications – until next week.

Because Nunes’s intelligence came from multiple sources during a span of several weeks, and he has not shared the actual materials with his committee colleagues, he will be the only member of the panel in a position to know whether the NSA has turned over some or all of the intelligence he is citing. However, Fox News was told Intelligence Committee Ranking Member Rep. Adam Schiff, D-Calif., had been briefed on the basic contents of the intelligence described by Nunes.

CIA Director Mike Pompeo is also sympathetic to the effort to determine, with documentary evidence, the extent of any alleged Obama administration spying on the Trump team, sources said.

At a dramatic Wednesday news conference, Nunes claimed to have seen evidence that members of the Trump transition team, possibly including the president-elect, were subjected to “incidental surveillance” collection that Nunes characterized as legal but troubling.

“What I've read bothers me,” he told reporters, “and I think it should bother the president himself, and his team because I think some of it seems to be inappropriate.”

Schiff blasted Nunes for not coming first to the Intelligence Committee with the information.

“If accurate, this information should have been shared with members of the committee, but it has not been,” Schiff said in a Wednesday statement.

POLITICO: Trump demands Friday vote on health care plan

If the House rejects the GOP plan, the president says, Obamacare will stay.

By RACHAEL BADE, KYLE CHENEY and JOSH DAWSEY

President Donald Trump is demanding a vote Friday in the House on the Republican plan to repeal and replace Obamacare, White House budget director Mick Mulvaney told GOP lawmakers. If the bill fails, Trump is prepared to move on and leave Obamacare in place, Mulvaney warned.

The surprise announcement by the top White House official — made with the full support of Speaker Paul Ryan (R-Wis.) and other House GOP leaders — came during a closed-door meeting of Republicans Thursday evening in the basement of the Capitol.

Mulvaney, a member of the House until a few weeks ago who now heads the Office of Management and Budget, said Trump was done negotiating and wanted an up-or-down vote now.

The move by Trump and Ryan is an enormous gamble, setting up a real cliffhanger when the legislation hits the floor on Friday.

All day Thursday, the White House and GOP leaders lacked the votes to pass the American Health Care Act. A loss on the House floor would be a glaring embarrassment for the new president and House speaker — one that could undermine other parts of the GOP legislative agenda, including tax reform.

A victory, on the other hand, would provide not just a shot of badly-needed momentum for both men, but undermine the House Freedom Caucus, the group of conservative hard-liners who've fought the GOP health care plan because it doesn't go far enough.

The group's opposition was seen as a public rebuke to both the White House and House GOP leadership. If the the Freedom Caucus loses to Trump and Ryan, its power will be curtailed. If it wins, the group will once again be able to dictate terms to party leaders.

Yet this is the showdown that many mainstream GOP rank-and-file members have sought. They want a fight out in the open with the Freedom Caucus — either the group votes against Trump, or it gives in.

Negotiations between Trump and the Freedom Caucus hit an impasse earlier Thursday its members were told recent concessions from the White House and GOP leadership represented a final offer. The group rejected that, wanting more.

The setbacks triggered another series of meetings later Thursday — between Trump and the moderate

Tuesday Group, and separately between the Freedom Caucus and Ryan. That was followed by a full GOP Conference meeting where Trump played his trump card.

Trump and Ryan had found themselves playing see-saw with moderates and hard-liners: Lean too much toward one faction and they lose votes from the other. So far, they've been unable to find a sweet spot.

Ryan can afford to lose only 22 votes on the floor. The Freedom Caucus has three dozen members, many of whom have vowed to block the bill unless they get what they want. More than a dozen centrist Republicans have also come out against the bill, further endangering its prospects.

But the Trump-Ryan gambit may pay off. Freedom Caucus Chairman Mark Meadows (R-N.C.) said the move by Trump and Ryan "certainly does" put enormous pressure on the Freedom Caucus to get behind the bill. And already a handful sounded like their positions were softer than they had been before.

Rep. Trent Franks (R-Ariz.), who said he remains undecided, added that efforts by the Freedom Caucus had "improved the bill." Rep. Mark Sanford (R-S.C.) said members will feel more pressure to vote "yes" with the bill on the floor, even if they may have felt comfortable opposing it before. Sanford said he was undecided.

Rep. Scott DesJarlais (R-Tenn.) was a "no" but is now undecided.

"I've got to decide whether this is best for my district and best for the president and best for my country. And I'm not convinced it will bend the cost curve down... but it may be as good as it gets on this one," DesJarlais said.

"We get elected to make votes, and this is a big vote," added Rep. Joe Barton (R-Texas), a Freedom Caucus member who supports the bill and called it "the right thing to do."

"I think it passes," he added.

GOP Rep. Tom Reed (R-N.Y.) said Mulvaney "put it completely in focus. The moment is now. Do we advance the cause so we can move forward and move on and accomplish what we said we would and repeal and replace Obamacare ... and also tax reform? It's a major test, and we're gonna pass that test tomorrow."

"If we vote it down, we will neuter Donald Trump's presidency ... We are not going to undermine the president's ability to get things done," Rep. Dana Rohrabacher told reporters after the meeting.

A senior administration official in the room for the Freedom Caucus meeting at the White House said most members left the meeting as "no's" but suggested some flipped to "yes." While Trump did not go around the room and ask people how they would vote, it became immediately clear GOP leaders did not appear to win over enough members to put the measure over the top.

"We're down right now," the official said.

Freedom Caucus chairman Mark Meadows (R-N.C.) told reporters in the Capitol Thursday afternoon that "we have not gotten enough of our members to get to yes at this point. ... However, I would say progress is being made." He called Trump's engagement in the negotiations perhaps "unparalleled in the history of our country."

There were daunting obstacles to a deal heading into the White House meeting Thursday morning. A number of Freedom Caucus members had suggested Trump's latest concession — repealing Obamacare's mandate that insurance plans provide a minimum level of "essential" benefits — wasn't enough. The group wants a complete repeal of all Affordable Care Act regulations — including popular provisions Trump promised he would maintain.

The conservatives' target list encompasses a prohibition against discriminating against people with pre-existing conditions and a requirement that adults up to age 26 can remain on their parents' health insurance.

"Repealing [essential health benefits], w/out making other substantial changes, would make the bill worse, not better," tweeted Freedom Caucus member Justin Amash (R-Mich.). "It would hurt the sickest people on exchanges."

The Freedom Caucus has been a constant thorn in the side of House GOP leadership, sinking bills its members believe were too accommodating to Democrats. The group was expected to fall in line behind Trump after he won, but it has refused to do so on the health care bill.

Now, Freedom Caucus members are threatening to trip up not John Boehner or Ryan, but a Republican commander-in-chief who remains highly popular in their districts.

Many House Republicans are furious with the Freedom Caucus, saying the group keeps moving the goal posts and that it really wants to sink the health care bill altogether.

"The president is good at negotiating, but he has to have someone who wants to get to yes," Rep. Mike Kelly (R-Pa.), an ardent Trump supporter, told POLITICO. "I was never able to sell a car or a truck to someone who didn't want a car or a truck. It just doesn't work. And that's where we are right now. I don't think they're really interested in getting to an 'end.'"

Kelly then added: "Maybe the 'end' is: making sure it doesn't pass."

POLITICO: Schumer prepared to force nuclear showdown over Gorsuch

The Senate minority leader is confident his party will not provide the eight votes needed to break a filibuster.

Chuck Schumer is prepared to push the Senate into a nuclear confrontation over the Supreme Court.

In an extensive interview with POLITICO Thursday, the Senate minority leader made his most definitive statement to date that Democrats will deny Neil Gorsuch the 60 votes he needs to clear a Senate filibuster and ascend to the Supreme Court. Dismissing the notion of a deal to confirm Gorsuch floated by some members of his caucus this week, Schumer all but declared that Donald Trump's nominee will not receive the requisite eight Democratic votes — and that it will be up to Majority Leader Mitch McConnell as to whether to try to blow up the filibuster to get Gorsuch through.

"There's been an almost seismic shift in the caucus [against Gorsuch]," Schumer said as the Senate Judiciary confirmation hearings wrapped up Thursday. "He did not win anybody over with his testimony."

If Schumer stops Gorsuch during a filibuster vote in early April — and the New Yorker was brimming with confidence that he will — it will almost certainly force McConnell's hand on the so-called nuclear option. Schumer is betting McConnell does not have the votes to do away with the 60-vote requirement for Supreme Court nominees.

"I don't think it's a foregone conclusion that Mitch McConnell changes the rules," Schumer said. "There are people in his caucus who really don't want to change the rules, OK?"

Blocking Gorsuch would be a major win for the left. Liberal activists have been urging Schumer to do everything in his power to stop Trump's pick, even as Senate Democrats have struggled to mount a case against him.

But a battle that potentially brings about the end of the filibuster for Supreme Court nominees would further erode the Senate's character as the more deliberative chamber of the legislative branch. And it would have dramatic consequences for both political parties.

Supreme Court selections would no longer need bipartisan buy-in, possibly resulting in more ideologically extreme justices. And in general, the two parties in the Senate would have one less occasion to cooperate. The partisan food fight over Trump's Cabinet nominees — facilitated by Democrats' move to eliminate the filibuster for those votes in 2013 — offered a possible preview.

While longtime Republicans hope to avoid a rules change, they're ready to respond to Schumer by gutting the filibuster if that's what it takes. McConnell himself has guaranteed Gorsuch's confirmation. He has explicitly declined to rule out changing the rules via a party-line vote, also known as the "nuclear option."

Schumer said the "onus" will be on McConnell if the filibuster is further diluted. The majority leader's office declined to comment for this story.

McConnell can lose only two members on a vote to alter Senate rules. Some of the Republicans long thought to be most resistant to such a move sound increasingly likely to back their leader in such a showdown.

Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) has vowed to do "whatever it takes" to get Gorsuch confirmed. However, his friend, Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) said it was "too early" to talk about.

"We'll see if we can get eight Democratic votes," McCain said Thursday.

While many Democrats are still assessing Gorsuch after four days of hearings this week, sources within the caucus said Thursday that the high court nominee appears increasingly likely to fall short of 60 votes. They attribute that to pressure from liberals, who blasted Democrats after POLITICO reported this week that some Democrats are mulling a deal with Republicans to confirm Gorsuch and preserve the filibuster for a subsequent nomination.

"Every nominee is extremely important. This is such a powerful position," Schumer said. "I will make the argument with all the members why I think he's bad. Everyone can make up their own mind, but I'll do what I can."

It's Schumer's first major test of his vote-whipping skills after serving for years as consigliere to former Democratic Leader Harry Reid of Nevada for years. No Democrat so far has announced support for Gorsuch. To the contrary, the nominee lost two critical swing votes on Thursday: Sens. Bob Casey of Pennsylvania and Tom Carper of Delaware.

For Democrats, beating Gorsuch is as much about payback for the stalled nomination of Merrick Garland as it is about objections to his judicial record.

Republicans are incensed that Schumer is leading the Democratic caucus into a new phase of the nominations war.

Schumer is "a good legislator," Senate Judiciary Chairman Chuck Grassley said, but "your good wisdom gets clouded" serving in leadership.

"So I don't really know what's up based on the performance of this guy for 22 hours," Grassley said of Gorsuch. "It's going to be hard for people to want to vote against him, and I wonder if this threat of a filibuster isn't a smokescreen."

Schumer has also pushed for a delay in the confirmation process, given the ongoing FBI investigation into possible collusion between the Trump campaign and Russia. The move was cheered by liberal groups.

But Schumer's tactics aren't shared by some Democrats who remain undecided on Gorsuch. Sen. Joe Manchin of West Virginia appears highly uncomfortable with blocking Gorsuch.

Virginia Sen. Tim Kaine, the party's vice presidential nominee last year, said he would "decide over the weekend" how he would vote on the judge. A potential change to Senate rules is the domain of leadership, he added, "so I don't think that's going to affect my view of his candidacy on the merits."

Sen. Jon Tester (D-Mont.), a swing vote who faces reelection in a state Trump won, said that the FBI-related concern is "Chuck's view," not his.

"I'm going to take a look at the hearing and read some of his opinions, as many as I possibly can, and will make it based off of that, not off of FBI investigations," Tester said in an interview, adding that he expects to "hash out a decision sometime next week."

Beyond Manchin, Kaine and Tester, at least 10 other Democrats have yet to weigh in on a potential filibuster of Gorsuch. Sens. Michael Bennet of Colorado, Amy Klobuchar of Minnesota, Angus King (I-Maine), Claire McCaskill of Missouri, and Mark Warner of Virginia declined to answer questions about the nominee on Thursday.

Also considered potential gets for the Gorsuch nomination, at least on opposing a filibuster, are Democratic Sens. Chris Coons of Delaware, a member of the Judiciary Committee; Sen. Maggie Hassan of New Hampshire, who met with the nominee last month; and three others who face reelection battles next year: Sens. Joe Donnelly of Indiana, Bill Nelson of Florida and Heidi Heitkamp of North Dakota.

Schumer didn't entirely rule out that Gorsuch could prevail. The minority leader said it would be "difficult to get 60 votes after his testimony went as poorly as it did," a characterization of Gorsuch's performance that not everyone shared.

But Schumer is now being explicit that he wants his members to side with him in opposition. And he doesn't think it will be difficult to get them to go along.

"It's not hard these days," Schumer said. "We're doing very well. And [Gorsuch] helped us by being poor with his hearings."

Roll Call: That's a wrap: Gorsuch hearings conclude, Senate Democrats ponder filibuster

With Judge Neil Gorsuch's Supreme Court confirmation hearings wrapping up, senators will soon confront whether his nomination will upend Senate rules.

Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell has not yet said whether he would move to change Senate rules that currently require 60 votes to end debate on Gorsuch's nomination. If eight members of the Democratic caucus do not join the 52 Republicans to move the nomination forward, McConnell could move to change the rules, lowering the threshold to a simple majority.

At his regularly scheduled Tuesday press conference with his leadership team, McConnell did not directly address whether he would do so. But he did question whether a Democratic blockade of Gorsuch would signal a broader issue for future high court nominees.

“I haven’t seen a single Democrat, unless there’s one you’ve observed, indicate they were prepared to either vote for cloture or to vote for him,” the Kentucky Republican said.

“Leading you to ask the following question: If Judge Gorsuch can’t achieve 60 votes in the Senate, could any judge appointed by a Republican president be approved with 60 or more votes in the Senate?” McConnell said.

That suggestion — that a blockade of Gorsuch could mean an indefinite vacancy — could set up the GOP argument for changing the procedural rules to end debate. McConnell could invoke the so-called nuclear option, a procedural gambit to change the Senate rules by a majority vote rather than two-thirds of senators.

“It does sound like he’s laying the groundwork for the nuclear option,” Senate Minority Whip Richard J. Durbin said of McConnell. “Let’s wait and see how this evolves.”

Some Republicans have acknowledged that changing the Senate rules would not be their first choice. Keeping the 60-vote threshold typically ensures nominees have bipartisan support. But Republicans are preparing to blame Democrats for forcing their hands.

“I think we ought to take it one step at a time, and before we threaten anything, we ought to see how (Democrats) act,” said Arizona Sen. John McCain.

Utah Sen. Orrin G. Hatch, a senior Judiciary member, said he was not in favor of the nuclear option “except as a last resort.”

“And I would hope that the Democrats won’t require that,” he added.

That last straw could come after a failed cloture vote on Gorsuch’s nomination, according to Senate Majority Whip John Cornyn.

“We’re hoping that the Democrats will agree to an up-or-down vote. What happens is really in their hands,” the Texas Republican said in a brief interview. “We’ll have a cloture vote and see how the Democrats vote.”

When Senate Democrats changed the procedural rules for most judicial nominees and executive nominations in November 2013, Republicans seethed and accused Democrats of breaking the rules and changing the chamber for the worse.

“Let me say, we are not interested in having a gun put to our head any longer. If you think this is in the best interests of the Senate and the American people to make advice and consent, in effect, mean nothing — obviously, you can break the rules to change the rules to achieve that,” McConnell said on the floor at the time.

Cloture votes rarely occur on Supreme Court nominations, but Democrats are signaling one will happen for Gorsuch.

“I believe we need 60 votes,” Senate Minority Leader Charles E. Schumer said at a Tuesday press conference. “Any one member can ask for 60 votes. It’s going to happen.”

If Republicans fail to get 60 votes to shut off debate, invoking cloture, that would set up a scenario similar to when Democrats eliminated the filibuster for most nominees in 2013. Then-Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid moved to reconsider a failed cloture vote on a D.C. Circuit judicial nominee, which set off the procedural steps that led to the effective rule change.

As the most senior GOP senator, Hatch would likely be in the presiding officer’s chair if Republicans invoked the nuclear option.

Asked Wednesday if he was prepared to do what would be necessary to ensure Gorsuch is confirmed, Hatch said, "Yeah, I'm prepared."

Cornyn said holding a cloture vote on Gorsuch's nomination may pressure some vulnerable Senate Democrats to vote in favor of ending debate.

"I actually think it would be good to put (Democrats) on record because I think there's a number of them that are vulnerable in red states in 2018," he said. "My hope is that they will see it in their self-interest to go ahead and allow for cloture."

Those Democrats in Republican-leaning states are facing pressure from outside groups to support Gorsuch. The Judicial Crisis Network, a conservative group that has been spearheading an ad campaign supporting his nomination, has spent more than $3.4 million in Indiana, Missouri, Montana, North Dakota and West Virginia. Each of those states have a Democratic senator up for re-election in 2015.

The network's chief counsel Carrie Severino said Democrats would "lay the groundwork for gridlock" if they block Gorsuch's nomination.

Asked if the outside groups would ramp up pressure on those Democratic senators after the hearings end, Severino said, "We'll have to decide our strategy based on what Democrats decide to do after the hearing."

Democrats are also facing pressure from the more liberal wing of their party to filibuster Gorsuch's nomination. Liberal groups recently launched a campaign dubbed "The People's Defense," warning that Democrats will be held accountable for their votes.

Some Democrats expressed concern that Republicans could invoke the nuclear option, damaging Senate operations. But they also say Republicans would be responsible for the consequences.

"It would be a huge mistake for Republicans to force this nomination through because they can't get consensus," Connecticut Sen. Christopher S. Murphy said. "I don't think we can calculate our strategy based on the potential that they might use the nuclear option. They're going to do that or not do that based on their own politics."

POLITICO: Friedman confirmed as U.S. ambassador to Israel

By NAHAL TOOSI

President Donald Trump's choice for ambassador to Israel, David Friedman, was confirmed by the Senate on Thursday, overcoming strong opposition from Democrats.

Friedman was approved 52-46 in a roll call vote, an unusual step. U.S. ambassadors to Israel, a country that has long enjoyed strong bipartisan support in Congress, have traditionally been approved by voice vote or through unanimous consent.

Friedman, an Orthodox Jew with no diplomatic experience, was previously Trump's bankruptcy lawyer. In the past, he's downplayed the importance of a two-state solution to the Middle East conflict and raised funds for Israeli settlements built on land claimed by the Palestinians.

He's also used extreme language, accusing the State Department of anti-Semitism and comparing left-leaning Jewish activists to "kapos" — a reference to Jews assigned by Nazis to oversee prisoners at concentration camps.

But during his confirmation hearing, Friedman apologized for his past rhetoric and pledged to uphold U. S. policy, whatever that may prove to be under Trump.

While the president has said he'd be comfortable with either a one-state or two-state solution, others in his administration insist the U.S. remains committed to the two-state approach. So far, the Trump administration appears to view continued Israeli settlement construction as detrimental to the Israeli-Palestinian peace process.

Republicans appear willing to accept Friedman's apologies and assurances that he would take his responsibilities as a U.S. ambassador seriously. "David Friedman has the skills and experience to represent the United States in one of the most complex regions in the world," GOP Sen. David Perdue of Georgia said in a statement after Friedman was confirmed.
